> As to their origins, we know that they are found, largely, in the upheaval on the various countries that took part in them. We don't forget that from 1939 to 1945 the people of the United Kingdom—whose present financial difficulties bring us here—were mobilized for total war to an extent not reached by the other western allies; and that the gigantic effort then made is a major source of the difficulties which they are experiencing today. We also know that when victory was won they did not relax. They kept on working. We in Canada pay tribute to that spirit—and to the magnificent assistance and encouragement given to it by the government and people of the United States.
> The two things together make a fine chapter in the story of co-operation between countries. It would be nothing less than tragedy—from which only the men behind the Kremlin walls would benefit—if that co-operation in which Canada and I'm sure other countries would wish to share—could not be effectively continued in the search for a solution to the problems on our agenda. Certainly no solution can be found except through co-operative action—

One can see how often the word "co-operation" comes into the statement.

> Certainly no solution can be found except through co-operative action—extending beyond this meeting. Such action means, of course, more than finding a solution which requires action only by someone else.
> In recent months the western democracies have made great progress in building a structure for political co-operation, particularly through the Atlantic pact. In that pact, we recognize the simple but essential fact that an attack on one is an attack on all and that we will, individually and in concert, take the necessary action to restore and maintain security. That principle is as important in economic as it is in political co-operation. In fact, one may not be able to exist without the other. Economically and in the field of human welfare our fortunes are also linked and we go up or down together.

I should like to repeat the last three lines.

> That principle is as important in economic as it is in political co-operation. In fact, one may not be able to exist without the other. Economically and in the field of human welfare our fortunes are also linked and we go up or down together.

I do not believe that anything could make the urgent necessity of economic co-operation as well as military co-operation more clear than the words of the Minister of Finance. If there is not military aggression, the one will not be needed; but whether or not there is military aggression the prosperity not only of Canada but of the European countries—indeed of the countries of the whole world—depends upon co-operation amongst the nations.

Referring to another of the world's prominent people, I may say that Dean Acheson, the Secretary of State of the United States, spoke along similar lines at a meeting of the national foreign trade council about two weeks ago. He pointed out to the people of the United States—I should like the members to note this—that gifts of goods and money to other countries was not enough. He said there must be co-operation in trade. The United States must buy as well as sell if there is to be a balance in world trade and stability in economic affairs. May I say that here—in the matter of trade—is where the great difficulty arises because so many countries today are organized to produce the same things, to build the same things, or to provide the same services.

I am convinced that if we are to have any freedom of trade, it must mean more than the removal of trade barriers. We shall have to sit down with the countries of the world and decide what we are prepared to take from them in the way of goods and services, and what they are prepared to take from us. It will be poor economy, indeed useless, for us to be competing as to which one can more cheaply produce the same type of goods or, indeed, come to the point where goods are being subsidized in order that they may be sold abroad.

It would be quite easy, Mr. Speaker, to multiply many times the few names I have mentioned of men prominent in different phases of world affairs who are convinced that economic progress, if not the survival of civilization itself as we know it depends upon closer co-operation among the nations of the world than we have had up to now. That co-operation, let me repeat, must first be in economic matters. Political co-operation cannot long survive competition or a policy of everyone for himself. I stress this point now because it seems to me that we are approaching a new phase in international relations. The war co-operation and the pooling of resources for war purposes came to an end with the end of hostilities. Then came the phase of rebuilding the economies of the countries engaged with us in the war and of some enemy countries as well. We were also catching up on the shortages of goods and services in our own countries. I believe that stage, too, is about finished. I do not mean that the damages of war have been repaired or the dislocations caused by the war overcome. We must realize that the productive capacities of the countries of Europe have now been restored to a point where, in some countries, it is greater than pre-war. As always happens under our system, it creates a struggle for markets. A struggle for markets must be resolved in co-operation. Otherwise the struggle for markets, if it does not lead the western nations themselves into war, will destroy that co-operation that has been so helpful from the beginning of the war to now.

Not only that—and this point also was mentioned by the minister in his speech—but we have to consider Germany and Japan, two former enemy countries. With the assistance of the victor nations, they too are building their economic and political institutions and have already restored them to such a point that, very shortly, Canada in concert with the other nations of like mind must, in my opinion, decide where those people are going to fit in the community of nations. Where will there be a market for the enormous production of the industrial capacity of the countries of Japan and Germany? These are questions that we must solve before we are sure of peace. Again, in my opinion they can only be solved through economic co-operation.

Some few weeks ago this parliament extended a warm and sincere welcome to Pandit Nehru, the prime minister of India. I was glad to note that the welcome he received here was repeated when he visited my city only a few days later. Perhaps no other visitor to that city has received a warmer and more spontaneous welcome than that which was given to the prime minister of India.

I should like to pause here just for a moment, because members of this house are sometimes critical of the present government of the United Kingdom. But I wonder whether we in Canada appreciate the service which the Labour government did for the democratic peoples of the whole world when they gave unconditional independence to India and Burma. Just think of what the situation would be in Asia today if that independence had been withheld or if India had gained her independence by force; surely we must all realize that the situation in Asia would be much darker today than it is. I would agree with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), although possibly not just exactly in the same terms, that the time is ripe for closer economic co-operation between India and Canada.

I am not pessimistic about the future. I do not say that I am optimistic either. But on balance, I believe there are in the world trends toward both economic and political co-operation. I do not think anyone could have heard the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) today without feeling that he also is thinking in that way. Any pessimism on my part arises from the fact that I fear that we are too lackadaisical about peace and war. I am afraid we have not nearly as much time as we think we have, and that we should move much faster in seeking the economic and political co-operation of other nations that think as we do. In that way only can we find a permanent solution to the difficulties of our time.

There are indications in that direction. In the Ottawa Citizen of November 11—that is Armistice day—there was a report of a conference held at Canberra, Australia, where representatives of Britain, New Zealand and Australia met to discuss "the extension of friendly relations as the best bulwark against any extremist or disruptive developments in southeast Asian countries."

The Secretary of State for External Affairs today mentioned the situation in the Far East, and he rightly said, I think, that we were interested in the east because of our Pacific coast as well as in Europe because we border on the Atlantic ocean. I wonder why we, as a member of the commonwealth, did not have a representative at Canberra. I think these meetings are just as important as any others; Canada has today just as many interests on the Pacific coast or in the Pacific ocean as it has on the Atlantic ocean.

I am just about finished, Mr. Speaker; I have only one or two words to say.

Mr. Graydon: Go ahead.

Mr. MacInnis: I conclude by saying that such items as the one I mentioned, the meeting in Canberra, give us hope because they indicate a new approach in our dealings with primitive and colonial peoples. Too long have we thought of such countries and such peoples in terms of natural resources and cheap labour, both to be exploited for profit. I hope that those days have disappeared and that, when we think of people, we will think of them as human beings, not as of some particular race, creed or colour.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, at the very outset of my remarks I should like to compliment the minister on his very able presentation of Canada's position in the international drama. Only this morning I thought as I had on a previous occasion the former prime minister did make one wise move when he picked the hon. gentleman out from the diplomatic corps and placed him in a position where he eventually found himself a minister of the crown. I do not suppose the former prime minister did it because the present Minister of External Affairs was a Liberal. I do not suppose anybody knew what he was politically, and I doubt whether even today by his expressions, except those in an election campaign, one could tell what he is politically. I believe he has a sincere desire to give his life to the service in which he has so successfully served over the past years.

I feel slightly reluctant to speak in this debate today. I must say I am extremely sorry that the leader of this group is unable to be with us today and take part in the initial debate on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. The leader of this group is a member of a very important parliamentary committee, namely, the atomic energy committee, which committee today is sitting at Chalk River. Therefore, in much that I shall say I shall reflect perhaps my own personal views.

There was a time when hon. members knew that when discussion was taking place on external affairs the house would not be involved in a discussion of other departments of government administration. Likewise, when the estimates of expenditures for other departments were up for discussion hon. members could rest assured that foreign policy would have no reason to be discussed. It seems to me that that day is gone. The business of government has grown so complex that one department is found to be vitally interrelated with other departments. One hardly knows where to draw boundary lines between some of these departments. For instance, there is the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Finance, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of National Defence. One knows not where one department ends and the other begins. Certainly, they overlap in their administrative duties. While I say that, I am not criticizing at all. I only repeat that over the years the business of government has become tremendously complex. In all probability this is due to the growing complexities of internationalism which confronts all nations in their relationship one with another.

To illustrate what I have been saying on this point may I refer to the recent Washington conference on the sterling-dollar crisis. It is to be noted that three of Canada's top-ranking cabinet ministers were in attendance. There was the Minister of Finance

(Mr. Abbott), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). No doubt lesser lights from other departments of government were there. This only goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that nowadays domestic policy and foreign policy are parts of the vast, complex and sometimes very serious world situations.

May I refer, Mr. Speaker, to a passage from a speech by the Minister of Finance at this same Washington conference on the sterling-dollar crisis. I read from the monthly bulletin entitled "External Affairs", which is published by the Department of External Affairs in Canada. The Minister of Finance is reported to have said:

> The forces of aggressive communism have recently been set back by concerted political action. They hope to regain that lost ground by exploiting the economic stability and difficulties which they claim are inherent in our system. It is up to us here—and in what follows these talks—to prove that these hopes and calculations are false.

It is pleasant, Mr. Speaker, to hear ministers of the crown, state officials and men of high diplomatic rank, express their good intentions. Those of us in parliament who are charged to legislate for the good of the nation, and if possible for the good of the world, want to know something more than that. We are not satisfied to learn that men in high places have good intentions. When he was speaking in another debate the other day, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) reminded us that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. It is not enough for the doctor to be called in, and upon examining the patient, feeling his pulse, asking him to stick out his tongue and say "ah", to turn and scratch his head and say: "That is bad; we shall have to do something about it". We want to know what responsible government is going to do about it. The people who pay the bills and who may suffer if mistakes are made have a right to know why we do what we do and how we propose to do it.

In passing I might refer to a speech made not long ago by the President of the United States. This speech was publicized very widely and was regarded by some journalists as being one of the greatest speeches that he had ever made in his career. In that speech he promised economic security and welfare to the people of the United States. So publicized was this speech that I read it very carefully from beginning to end. While the President of the United States simply reiterated what had been said many times before by his predecessors and by the leaders of many nations, in all the speech he never once indicated in the least degree how the matter was to be accomplished.

Mr. Blackmore: That is the way they all do it.

Mr. Hansell: I feel certain, Mr. Speaker, that the entire world situation has resolved itself into a struggle between communism and democracy. It is not enough to use the words "communism" and "democracy". Those words have been bounced around so often that they have come to mean all things to all men according to the individual using them. The words have sometimes been used deliberately to confuse and confound.

I ask the government: What do they regard as the meanings of these words? Does communism merely mean the governing of nations by men whose first loyalty is to Stalin? Does democracy merely mean the government of free nations, so-called, with free parliaments, so-called? To me the meaning is much deeper. When one once gets the deeper meaning, the struggle is seen in its true light and appears to be more intricately involved and more intense.

Right here I do not think I could do better than to quote from an article which appeared not long ago in Redbook magazine. This was written by J. Edgar Hoover, director of the federal bureau of investigation in the United States. In his article Mr. Hoover pulls no punches. No one will doubt that when Mr. Hoover writes an article for publication he means what he says. I quote:

> The struggle between communism and democracy is more than a clash of political ideologies. It is the offensive of atheism against all forms of religions that base themselves on the belief in God.

Until we get that, we shall never be able to diagnose properly the extent of the disease which is beginning to grip the world. Perhaps it may appear that I am reverting to the practice of my profession when I speak in these terms; but may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that at the opening of each session of this house it is your privilege to read a prayer which I believe is one of the greatest ever penned. I have tried in my small way to find out who penned that prayer and I have not been successful. In that prayer, unceasingly day by day, you pray on behalf of this house, "Thy kingdom come". Perhaps I might be so bold as to take you back to Holy Writ and show you where one of the greatest prophets of all time declared to the house of Israel: Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder.

Seen in that light, the struggle I believe, becomes one between satanic powers and God's righteous power. Fundamentally it is a struggle in this world between Satan on the one hand and Christ on the other, each having a program. The satanic program is for the eventual setting up of a ruthless world dictatorship while the other program is designed to establish eventually the kingdom of God on earth. The spoils of battle are the very souls, the very bodies, the very hearts and minds of the human race.

What all men in public life must determine, yea what the government above everyone else must determine, is whether this or that movement fits into the one program or the other. When it comes to government policy we must ask: Does this aid and abet the program for the eventual realization of a world satanic dictatorship, or does it aid in exposing the enemies of men, and assist in the program for the eventual establishment of the kingdom of God on earth when government shall be upon his shoulder?

Perhaps right here I should read a further extract from the article by Mr. J. Edgar Hoover. I want hon. members to notice this, because not only members of the government but every individual in public life, whether he be a government official, whether he be a teacher, whether he be a clergyman, or whatever he is, has reason to take note of these words. Mr. Hoover says:

> To every honest student of communism, the evidence is clear and unequivocal that communism is anti-God, anti-Christ and anti-moral. Communism is religion's mortal foe. . .
> No religion, denomination or sect has been spared the fury and contempt of the communists. God is their foe, and God's power over the civilized world is a barrier to their advances. The communist printing presses turned out thousands upon thousands of posters portraying God, Christ and religion in the vilest and most obscene manner conceivable.

The article goes on to bring out a point which I think should be impressed upon all public men and those who are interested in world affairs, and I quote:

> Many communist fronts have operated under the guise of some church commission or religious body. It is ghastly to see the monster atheism being nourished in the churches which it seeks to destroy. Church leaders can stop this nefarious infiltration by taking vigorous action in the boards and commissions under church supervision. Individual ministers and church members can avoid being hoodwinked if they will stay close to the fundamentals of their faith. Any minister who cannot find in his Bible sufficient argument for the cause of liberty and social justice—who has to borrow the double-talk of the communists—is in the wrong profession and should be carefully watched by his official superiors and by his congregation.

I for one in my capacity as a clergyman will say "Amen" to J. Edgar Hoover's remarks in that respect. When we are dealing with communism, we are dealing with a satanic force, the most powerful force on earth next to the almighty power of an omnipotent God. The struggle is one for world conquest. High ranking communists regard no price as too high, no sacrifice too great, as long as they can gain the ends of their satanic attempts to frustrate and defeat the purposes of God for the full and complete redemption of mankind, and the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth.

I have read rather considerably about the investigations that have been made in the United States by their congressional committees and subcommittees as to un-American activities. Without taking the time to read from some of their reports, I will say that these committees conclude that the intellectual doctrine of communism has frozen and does not change. Let us remember that in all our dealings with this vicious force. The forces of communism in their essential principles and objectives never change. Tactics may, strategy may, but their objectives never change. When we think of communist forces in that respect our minds turn to the way in which they deal with political offenders. I am not going into all the details, but one cannot help believing that these communist forces are satanic when one reads of the recent trial of Cardinal Mindszenty. His trial was one of the most inhuman and ghastly pieces of work that have ever been perpetrated upon any human being. The amazing and ghastly thing is that it was done according to satanic and communist concepts in the name of justice.

Is the danger over in Canada? We have not heard a great deal about these forces since the spy trials of a few years ago. I trust that those responsible for law and order in Canada are not resting upon their oars on the assumption that, since they were able to round up a few spies and send one or two of them to the penitentiary, therefore all is well. In the United States recently several top-ranking communists were declared guilty of attempting by force to overthrow the government. I am afraid there may be a danger that even the people of the United States will sit back now that all the fanfare is over, rest upon their oars and say: Now we can rest easy. That is not the case because, if communism is as satanic as I believe it to be, they will not relinquish their efforts until they have eventually gained their ultimate objective. As the saying goes, eternal vigilance is the price of freedom.

I turn now to another phase of the subject. I do not know how to view the recent reports that the United States of America is beginning to look upon Yugoslavia with some degree of favour. I am well aware, as we all are, that Tito and Stalin have had perhaps unpleasant words. Possibly matters have reached a rather intense state between them. In his speech this morning the minister indicated as much, but even though that may be so, I wonder if the communist regime as such in Yugoslavia is any different to what it was in the days of Mihailovich. I for one would not presume to be qualified to say whether or not the United States should give aid to Yugoslavia, but we know that negotiations have been going on which indicate that the United States looks with some favour upon supplying war potential to Yugoslavia. I understand Yugoslavia has already applied to the world bank for a loan, in order to secure enough dollars under the world monetary fund. I am not expressing an opinion now whether the United States is doing right or wrong. I must confess my inability to arrive at a proper conclusion. I wish to say, however, that whatever is done about the relationship of the United States with Yugoslavia, I am afraid that our close connection with the United States will mean that we may automatically follow suit. I say I am not qualified to decide whether it would be right or wrong, but if we do so we must do so convinced in our own minds that communism in its essential characteristics does not change, whether it be in one of the satellite states, whether it be in Russia, or whether it be infiltrating into any other nation in the world.

I now come to China. I do not know how to view the situation with respect to our possible relationship with China. The minister gave a rather extended explanation of the situation there, and I think it was a truthful appraisal. Somehow or other I cannot free my mind from its rather confused and puzzled condition concerning our relationship with China over the past few years. Not many years ago the members of this house welcomed Madame Chiang Kai-shek to Canada. We remember her standing at the Clerk's table with microphones in front of her. We welcomed her with open arms. I happened to take some motion pictures as she was entering the parliament buildings with the former prime minister, a former speaker, the Speaker of the Senate and other dignitaries who welcomed her to the parliament of Canada. I cannot help thinking of the glorious reception given to her then. When she went to the United States a great reception was also held for her by the United States government and the people of that country. A few years later the same Madame Chiang Kai-shek came back. She did not visit Canada on that occasion but visited the United States seeking aid for her husband's regime, and what happened? The United States turned its back upon her, and sent her home.

Well, we can say what we like about the ruthlessness of the Chiang Kai-shek regime. Granting that it was ruthless in many aspects of its administration, I only ask this: was it any more ruthless when Madame Chiang Kai-shek visited North America first than when she made her second visit? Just here I should like to quote a passage from an article I read the other day by George Moorad, who wrote "Chiang Kai-shek: A Patriot Departs." I am going to read only one short paragraph:

> As for the charges of corruption in his government—

Referring to Chiang Kai-shek.

> —notably not against the person of Chiang Kai-shek but rather "the men around him"—a distinction between east and west must be made. Graft is the curse of Asiatic society, but if Stalin has been unable to shoot it out of soviet Russia, it is quite unreasonable to expect the weak Chinese to hold off invaders with one hand and clean up their Augean stables with the other. In view of his uphill struggle for Chinese independence it can hardly be argued that Chiang sought profit for himself or wilfully allowed corruption to thrive around him.

And later in this condensed article:

> As for America, whether we approved of Chiang Kai-shek or not, we did not hedge our bets with any other policy. Our chips were laid entirely on Chiang, and as he departs so goes our hard-won stake in China.

I have noticed in the press recently considerable space devoted to recognition of the new communist government in China. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made only passing reference to this point in his remarks. Somehow or other it seems that pressure is being brought to bear upon the nations in order to have them recognize the new government in China; but I cannot help noticing that in these press dispatches there are singular references to the various financial interests that some of the western democracies have in China. Here is one reference in an Associated Press dispatch of November 14:

> Hong Kong island was ceded to Britain in 1841, and she has a lease on the Kowloon peninsula until 1997. Until then, Britain's strained economy demands an effort to keep it, recognizing the reds could hardly make it harder to hang on, and might make it easier.

Another Associated Press dispatch from Washington under date of November 12 has this to say:

> Several motives are said by diplomatic authorities here to underlie the British decision to establish relations with the communists.
> Britain has extensive commercial interests in China . . .

Then further on:

There is some internal economic pressure upon Washington to recognize Peiping, but it is relatively small. Export-import firms and shipping lines in Pacific coast ports are urging recognition for business reasons.

I repeat that I do not feel qualified to say when Canada should agree to recognize the new government in China; but after reading these dispatches suggesting that China should be recognized because of certain financial stakes in that country, can it be that recognition of the Chinese government is to be speeded up by reason of economic investments and financial considerations? Let us pause and examine any contemplated recognition of the communist regime in China or anywhere else, as far as that goes, lest we sell our principles on the auction block of financial self-interest.

With respect to the recognition of China, I spoke to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who is the leader of our national Social Credit party. I consulted him with regard to what formula we might propose for the recognition of new governments, and we came to this conclusion. The Social Credit movement favours diplomatic recognition of any country which has demonstrated (1) that it has a reasonably stable government; (2) that it has at least fairly well defined boundaries; (3) that it is independent of domination by any other country or force outside its own borders. Those are the three prerequisites we would require for recognition of any new government. My own view is that I would add another. I would say that should there be any shift of government following civil war, the new government should be given probation for a definite period of time, during which it must prove itself to be democratic in all essential principles, and its people free as we count men free.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that any diplomatic moves by our government or any other democratic government must be made with the greatest care. At the same time we must have vision and courage, and more than anything else the keenest sense of our responsibility toward the Creator of all men, our God, Who controls the destinies of worlds and nations and men, and Whose purpose is the establishment of a righteous peace among all men. Never was there a time when men talked so much of peace as they do today. And yet, never was there a time when men's hearts failed them so for fear of those things which are coming upon the earth. I plead with the government to move with the greatest caution in all that they do, particularly in the administration of their foreign policy. They should seek to determine a course that will coincide with the purpose of God in the realization of His kingdom which we, at the commencement of every sitting of this house, pray shall come upon the earth.

If Canada does this, I am sure we can leave the rest to an all-wise omnipotent God whose purpose is the establishment of the righteous reign of His own Son when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ, when He shall reign forever and ever.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to publicly apologize to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) for interrupting him in the course of his eloquent address today. I have already told him personally but I felt that the house was a little shocked by my interruption, and I am sorry it occurred. I was following the interesting remarks of the secretary of state so intently when he was discussing the position in regard to China and describing some of the conditions that Canada should have in mind in granting recognition to any government, that when he mentioned the "approval of the people of the country" the whole situation in Europe immediately surged to my mind. I felt like asking him in what country that is dominated by communism today have the people ever had an opportunity of expressing their opinion of the government that now dominates them.

If we are to begin with Russia and the countries that are described as satellites, in which minority communist organizations have controlled the major portion of the country, I do not think we can honestly find one country that could truly call itself democratic.

An hon. Member: What about Czechoslovakia?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am glad my hon. friend has referred to Czechoslovakia. With that country in mind I went to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I told him that when I was listening to him I thought there was no country except Czechoslovakia which had accepted the communist government. The election in that country was rigged. I was under the impression, mistakenly, that Czechoslovakia had voted freely for the communist government. There are some who seem to be of a different opinion. I did not know anything about the elections being rigged, but there may be greater authorities on that subject than I am. There is no doubt about the other countries however, and there is no doubt that if the people of Czechoslovakia, after a year and a half of the tyranny of the communists, had it to do over again they would not vote for the communist government.

I suppose most of the members in this house have been interested in this great Russian experiment in communism. I was glad to hear the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the member who just took his seat express sentiments that were certainly not in sympathy with communism. Although it is my feeling that socialism in all countries is likely to lead to communism eventually, there are many sincere socialists who detest communism. We have only to look at the experience in England to see how the British government ejected from the ranks of the Labour party those who had come out strongly in favour of communism.

I should like to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the lucid statement he gave this morning. I am sure everyone thoroughly enjoyed such a clear statement of policy on behalf of our government. As the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has said, it is a pity we do not more frequently receive information on these important matters. It was only the evening before last that I made reference to this subject when I said we would not think there was such a country as Russia in the world, nor would we think that China was now being overrun by a horde of armies which are supported by the government of Russia. I was glad, therefore, to have the opportunity of listening to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to get his views on matters of such importance.

I believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs deserve congratulations on the manner in which they have carried on their duties at Lake Success. From what we read in the newspapers, there can be no doubt that they are up against hard-headed men who have a definite brief that they must take a certain line from which they cannot depart. This debate today affords us an opportunity of expressing our views on these important international questions. What seems to me to be most important of all is our attitude towards communism.

I believe, sir, that the mistake was made back in the days of Yalta. It probably does not do very much good to criticize two great public men such as the late President of the United States and the former Prime Minister of England. There can be no doubt about it, however, the initial mistake was made when Poland was sacrificed to Russia. In 1940 I remember reading an article by Hilaire Belloc, who was an authority on international affairs if there ever was one, and certainly on European affairs. In 1913 he predicted exactly what was going to happen in 1914. In 1940, he wrote this:

"We shall win the war if Poland is restored to its former status with an outlet to the sea."

When the great men who were leading us at the time sacrificed the Polish people and divided up the country, giving half of it to Russia, that was the beginning of the present international troubles. The two great allies were then in the strongest position they ever were, because they had supplied enormous quantities of munitions to Russia to enable her to withstand the gigantic assault of the German armies. If Russia had not had that source of supply, who would be so bold as to say they could have won the battle of Stalingrad and driven the Germans from their country? When the Polish people were urged by the Russians to rise in Warsaw and drive out the Germans, Russia would not assist the allies in sending aid. This extraordinary situation and the failure of our statesmen to make better provision for Poland have resulted in the more complicated situation that seems to be developing from time to time.

I am sure every hon. member was glad to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs speaking about the conditions in Europe and the improvement in the western part of Europe. Last year and this year I had the privilege of visiting Europe. Last year in France I could see the beginnings of the work being undertaken there and could notice the energy with which the people were applying themselves to solving their problems. But this year it was obvious that great improvement had been made. Last year the people were in the throes of political troubles but eventually they got a government that lasted over a year. It was an anxious time for the people of France when they found it so difficult to get a government that commanded the confidence of the chamber of deputies. But they did get one, and the year was a great help to them.

In Italy this year the people were in good spirits and certainly were working hard to try to re-establish their country after the conquest over the communists. I have often thought—and I have so expressed myself a number of times—that we in this country do not appreciate what a terrific menace to the world communism is. If I make some extraordinary statements in regard to the social structure of this country, Mr. Speaker, it is because I have seen at first hand over in Europe the fear that exists among such a large proportion of the people of what a minority might do if, through force, it got into power. We sail along on calm and pleasant seas and everything seems all right. But we know that these other countries were strong and healthy ones at one time, under the capitalist system. What happened to them to turn them into communist countries today, or at least into countries where communism has been so strong? Not all hon. members, perhaps, are aware of the situation that exists today in France, where so many of the young people have turned their backs upon religion, do not practise any religion, and are therefore the proper soil for communist doctrine; because to my mind communism seems to grow more rapidly when it is set in soil that is without religion. Therefore the hon. member who has just taken his seat was right when he was saying how important religion was as an offset to communism.

Do hon. members recall the beginning of the United Nations at San Francisco four years ago when the dispute came up about whether in their charter they were going to say anything about the Christian religion or about Almighty God, and when it was decided, out of deference to Russia again, that nothing would be said about Almighty God on Whom we all depend? That was an initial mistake, and the troubles that have followed have been perhaps partly due to that cause.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made reference to Newfoundland on two occasions during his speech. He said that the airport at Gander was a great acquisition; and I have no doubt that it was a great acquisition to this country. It seems to me that our negotiators of confederation did not realize how strong a bargaining factor they had in their possession when they had the Gander airport. I hope that the negotiations that the Secretary of State for External Affairs speaks about will result in benefits to the whole of Canada, and to Newfoundland especially.

The bases were another thing about which we were worried and on which we criticized those who favoured confederation, because we were afraid that the Canadian government, if they took over those bases, would allow them to fall down. We are aware of the large amount of money—the hundreds of millions, I would say—which the United States government has spent in Newfoundland in order to build up these great bases. If the Canadian government took possession, we were doubtful whether they could maintain them on the same scale or not; and I am certainly doubtful whether this government could do so. Certainly they could not have built them on the same scale as the Americans built them. I hope, however, that there will be friendly co-operation between the two countries and that a satisfactory solution will eventually be worked out.

The hon. gentleman referred to the visits that we had here from members of the United Kingdom government and to the importance of co-operation between that government and our own. There is no doubt about that. But I am not sure whether the United Kingdom government in its internal policy—with which I suppose we have not much concern—has been following a line that would eventually lead to good international understanding. The members of the United Nations are not supposed to be concerned with the internal policies of other countries. I intended to say that one means by which a country tries to promote good will among nations is by its representation abroad and by international exhibitions. I had the privilege of attending the international exhibition at Milan in April of this year, at which there was a Canadian exhibit. It was a fine affair. Although they did not have a large exhibit, Canadians could be proud of what they had there at that time.

Mr. Cruickshank: Were there any British Columbia apples there?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There was nothing from Newfoundland there. I inquired from those in charge of the exhibition whether they had anything from Newfoundland. They said no, that when they organized the exhibition they did not have time for that. I do not think there was anything there from British Columbia either. The exhibit from Canada was principally a fur exhibit.

There is no doubt that this country is certainly dependent, to a large extent, on friendship with the United States. This friendship that has lasted so long and has been cemented so firmly by comradeship in two great wars must continue to be the foundation stone of this country's foreign policy. Reference to the international border is, I think, a good guarantee that this friendship is going to continue. We all have many reasons for wishing that this friendship would become stronger; I have many personal reasons for that wish. Many of the people of Newfoundland have gone to live in the United States. It is said that there are as many Newfoundlanders in the city of Boston as there are in the whole of Newfoundland. There are therefore strong ties between our little country and the United States, as I am sure there are between other provinces and that country.

It seems to me that the United States has not been given as much credit as it deserves for the tremendous work it has done on behalf of international understanding and the rehabilitation of the countries of Europe. The American people deserve the thanks of all peoples, and especially those of this country, for the way in which they have paid the money for this purpose. It is out of their pockets, out of their taxes, that they have subscribed this money to help to rehabilitate Europe, and on which this country has to some extent depended. Certainly the United Kingdom, which was in such a bad way, would never have been able to weather the storm so long as this if it had not been for the great help which she received from the United States; and I am sure that we all wish that help to continue.

Now, sir, I do not profess any right to speak on Asiatic affairs, but it seems to me that Canada, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said, ought to be just as much concerned with what is going on in the Pacific as it is with what is going on in the north Atlantic. When Russia gets control of China, as seems inevitable now, since Chiang Kai-shek has been refused aid, what is going to stop her from organizing this vast subcontinent of 400 million people in the same fashion as she has been organizing her satellite countries in Europe? When these are organized what is going to withstand the hordes of armies that can be created out of that vast population? It seems to me that we may have to fall back, strange as it may seem, upon former enemies for assistance. A famous United States professor told us in Newfoundland many years ago, before 1939, when he described what was going to happen in Europe in the second world war, that after it was over we may have to join up with Germany to fight against Russia. It may be that the forces of Japan and the Japanese people who are comparable to the Germans in Europe, resourceful people who make good soldiers, may have to be called on. We may have to utilize these forces if we wish to withstand the influence of communism in that part of the world.

As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said this morning, this country is only a small country when compared with other countries, and when it comes to war it is numbers that count. There is no doubt that this is a very wealthy country in proportion to its population, but when it comes to war numbers count in the long run. Russia has control of such a vast potential of war material that we have to get allies wherever we can find them. I have no doubt that it is certainly in the backs of the minds of the western democracies that Japan will eventually be brought to our aid.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would we need a pipe line then?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, we shall probably need all the pipe lines we can get. However, I am not an authority on pipe lines.

There is one other matter about which I wish to speak, namely, Spain. The name of Spain did not appear in the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning. We must recognize that Spain was the first country that stood up squarely to the communist menace, and although many people of socialist sympathies are inclined to condemn Spain outright as an authoritarian or totalitarian regime, bearing in mind the traditional form of government in that country, we have to recognize that the Spanish government of General Franco preserved Spain from communism, and perhaps preserved western Europe or the western world from communism as well. It was one of the ambitions of Lenin to light the fires of revolution not only in Russia but at both ends of the continent. Spain was to be the place where communism was to take root in the western part of Europe.

As most hon. members must be aware, the chief leaders in the satellite countries today, including Tito himself, were sent to Spain to organize communism in that country. Great credit must therefore be given to General Franco. I do not think he has had the recognition that he should have had for the work that he did in preserving Spain from the domination of communism.

As I said a moment ago, if we are to defend ourselves against communism, if that seems to be inevitable, at least we want to have all the influences we can get to help protect us from communism. In that event we must look for allies and Spain is one country with which Newfoundland has had most cordial relations for four hundred or four hundred and fifty years, almost since its discovery. She has been one of our best customers, and we have had a good deal to do with her from time to time. Her people visit our country every year to purchase fish. They seem to be very industrious and patriotic people. It seems to me that the United Nations must soon take up that problem again, grant recognition to Franco and send their ambassadors and ministers back to that country.

On motion of Mr. Browne (St. John's West) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue this debate. I understand there is a lengthy list of speakers for tomorrow. If perchance we conclude the debate we will take up Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and probably resolution No. 24 on today's order paper in the name of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Graydon: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether we might have some clarification from the government as to just how we are to carry on with respect to external affairs. Is it understood that, when this resolution is passed, immediately afterwards the committee on external affairs will be called, or will it go over until next week regardless of when this resolution passes?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the resolution should pass at one o'clock, there would be time in the afternoon, and perhaps in the evening, for a sitting of the committee on external affairs.

Mr. Graydon: If the debate goes on until tomorrow night, would it mean that there would be a meeting of the committee on external affairs on Friday? That is the point I want cleared up.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not quite sure. I shall be in a better position tomorrow to give that information to my hon. friend.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The government has no intention of amending this act at the present time.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES, 1948 AND 1949

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State if he will table an order for return, standing in my name, which was passed on September 29?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I will inquire into the matter.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Secretary of State a question with reference to sessional paper No. 53F, tabled in response to an order of the house for copies of all communications received by all ministers with respect to suggested changes in the Combines Investigation Act. I may say to the Secretary of State that on the front of the return it is indicated that the correspondence contained therein is that received by his department from the Department of Labour and the wartime prices and trade board. Actually what it contains is the answer of the Department of Labour and the answer of the Minister of Justice. In addition to checking up on that discrepancy, I should like him to find out whether or not there are answers from all the other ministers. That was the order of the house.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to inquire.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED ON STATEMENT OF MR. PEARSON

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson that certain estimates of the Department of External Affairs be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that I have the opportunity to congratulate a minister, not only upon his speech but also upon the policy he enunciates. I find myself in substantial agreement with what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said yesterday. As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) pointed out, our support may be embarrassing; nevertheless it is a fact. I have had the opportunity of visiting Lake Success on several occasions during the past few years. It has been most gratifying to realize the high position which Canada has among the nations of the world. It is attributable, of course, in no small measure to the efforts of Canadians themselves during the last ten years, to the high calibre of our civil servants abroad and to the present minister himself. Indeed I regard his appointment to the important position of chairman of the political committee of the assembly as a personal tribute to him as well as a tribute to Canada.

I should like to express my gratitude for the courtesy and co-operation I have always received from members of his department, and for the information which has always been so willingly given when asked for. Yesterday the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said he felt there was not enough publicity about our policies. That may be so, but I do not think the fault is entirely that of the department. Perhaps part of the fault lies with the Canadian daily newspapers, which give a regrettably small space to foreign affairs. This is something the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association might look into, rather than the minister. I have always received information when I asked for it. Sometimes it has been given in confidence, which I hope I have never violated any more than I have violated confidences in respect to information received in personal conversations with a minister.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out the successes the United Nations organization had achieved—partial successes, it is true—in Kashmir, Palestine and Indonesia, and we have to give the organization credit for those. Indeed it is obvious that had the United Nations not existed, we should have had to create it. But there was also the most significant failure of all—the failure of the organization to provide the security which the nations feel they need. If this failure was not met with the hopelessness and cynicism which followed the failures of the league of nations, perhaps the league did not die in vain. But today I think it is much more generally understood that the problem of international government, which has defied the wit of man through the centuries, cannot be solved merely by drawing up paper constitutions. However, since the United Nations could not provide us with the security we felt we required, it was obviously the responsibility of government and of parliament to take measures to provide it in other ways, under the aegis of the United Nations organization. This we hope we have achieved through the North Atlantic treaty. We hope it will provide a measure of security which is not provided in any other way.

Yet while I agree completely with what the minister said yesterday about article 2 of the treaty, I cannot but underline what the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said as to the economic bases for peace. On occasions I have found the hon. member for Vancouver East to be wrong; but I have also found that when he and I agree on something, there is very little room left for argument. Article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty deals with international economic co-operation, while article 9 deals with the immediate establishment of a defence committee. A careful reading of the communiqué tabled in this house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on September 19, following the first meeting of the ministers of external affairs of the various countries signatory to the treaty, indicates that this question of economic co-operation was given but scant recognition. In paragraph VIII the communiqué states:

> The council recognizes the importance of economic and financial factors in the development and implementation of military plans for the defence of the north Atlantic area.

That is certainly putting the cart before the horse, because if as the result of an economic collapse our allies in western Europe become bankrupt, there will be no military security whatever. Indeed our military security will be enhanced by the improvement of the economic conditions of those countries. I hope, therefore, that the minister will constantly endeavour to bring before the members of this group the tremendous importance of economic co-operation and collaboration, so that we may all play our part with the knowledge that we are strong economically as well as in a military sense.

Obviously the problem which obsesses the world is Russia. Members rose in this house yesterday and expressed their fear of communism. This fear, which we all share, is something that we as democratic socialists have known about for a long time, for we have no illusions about communism or communist parties. But the answer is not to be found by people standing up here or on other platforms, tearing their hair and rending their garments and offering no alternative. There has to be an alternative to communism if we are to survive. The alternative might be rather expensive, but I know of no other.

Communism breeds on hunger, on poverty, and on racialism. Just a few weeks ago the Prime Minister of India spoke in this chamber. When I heard Liberals and Conservatives, along with the rest of us, applaud, and quite rightly, that great world figure, the situation seemed to me to be ironical. I could not rid my mind of the thought that if Mr. Nehru had been a citizen of British Columbia three years ago these same Liberals and Conservatives, because of the colour of his skin, would not have seen fit to give him the vote. Now the wheel has turned with a vengeance, and I am glad of it. Mr. Nehru said in part, at page 1104 of Hansard:

> There is another facet of this Asian situation to which reference must be made. The so-called revolt of Asia is a striving of the legitimate pride of ancient peoples against the arrogance of certain western nations. Racial discrimination is still in evidence in some countries, and there is still not enough realization of the importance of Asia in the councils of the world.

I do not think—at least I would rather not think—that those remarks were addressed to us in Canada. They may have been directed to another member of the commonwealth of nations—South Africa, where today the administration is carrying out a policy toward the native population which can only give aid and comfort to communist movements all through Asia. The racialism we see there is every bit as bad as that which existed in Hitler's reich, and every bit as dangerous. South Africa cannot plead that this is South Africa's business only; for questions which were once solely domestic affairs now concern the whole world and the safety of all. And it is quite conceivable that the attitude of Asia as a whole may be conditioned by what happens in the Union of South Africa. Already the coloured population have powerful champions, and I hope we in Canada will number ourselves among them.

On the same occasion Mr. Nehru spoke of the dire poverty which afflicted so many thousands, indeed millions, of the people of Asia. This dire poverty is a situation we have to face up to. Yesterday there was much reference to Christianity, and the fight between atheistic materialism and Christianity in this world; but the Christian faith can survive only when it can deliver the goods; when it can show that we mean business; when we can say that we are prepared to practise what we preach—and that is what we may find to be expensive. Anything which has been expended on the Marshall plan is but a drop in the bucket compared with what will have to be spent from now on. If we say that we adhere to the Christian faith, we have to accept its implications, the implication that there is the fatherhood of God, and therefore a brotherhood amongst man—and the natives of Asia are as much our brothers as anyone else.

The practical application of this belief means that if we have surpluses which we cannot use after our own people are looked after, and after we have sold what we can, rather than destroy them we have to be prepared to give them away. It will pay us handsomely to be in a position to help alleviate the starvation in Asia and in other areas of the world. It will be expensive. There is only one way in which we can do it, and that is by taxing our own people. Already there are indications that we are going back to the situation which existed in the thirties when, rather than give food away, we used to destroy it. Already this administration has subsidized the apple growers, paid them to uproot trees which could have borne fruit to be given to those who needed it. The philosophy is still there; the mentality is still there.

Nothing will please the communists more than to realize that the western nations are prepared to destroy food which starving millions need. I repeat that it will be an expensive proposition to live up to our responsibilities, but it is the surest way of defeating communism. Communism cannot be defeated by great armies; for bullets can never destroy ideas. If we can show people that we have a better way of life than the communists, then of necessity we shall emerge victorious.

Russia is working not only in the areas of the mind, but also in geographic areas. I am reminded that yesterday the member for Peel spoke of the lack of information about our foreign policy. Information is lacking not only about our current policies but about history as well. Sometimes we are the victims of our own lack of perspective. In Europe today we see the beginning of a union among certain nations. They are advancing a little, but perhaps in the light of history the advance has been great. There is still impatience, however, over here at the slowness of the progress in this direction. We have to remember that the problems of Europe are rooted in two thousand years of history, and we cannot expect them to act with the same celerity as we might on this continent. It is a lamentable fact, but true, that they might complete that integration rapidly as a result of aggression, and perhaps then this union would become almost immediately operative. But it would be too expensive a price to pay for it; so we must approach the problems of Europe with sympathy and with some understanding.

We need not fall into the error, which is ours as well as Europe's, of believing that Europe is still the centre of the universe, with the nations of the Far East on some dim and distant periphery. In deference to the Secretary of State for External Affairs I used that phrase "nations of the Far East" as a European colloquialism. Obviously the centre of affairs is shifting to the west. In this century the centre is going to be the North American continent. By the same token we must be ready to realize in years to come that the centre may move still farther west. We have to realize, too, that the rest of the world, perhaps the majority of the world, does not reason as we do. This in no way makes it inferior to us; but it is a fact which we have to face. Russia, India, Pakistan, China, and the other nations, look upon history quite differently from the way we do as a member of the western nations. They have not the same philosophy or the same attitude towards life, or indeed the same religion.

Some people in the United States—a minority, it is true—believed that a few years' military occupation of Japan would, in some mysterious way, change Japanese thinking. The statement of Premier Yoshida last week should rid them of that idea. One of our great tasks is to encourage the middle groups in many areas—the people who are struggling between reaction and communism. They are the groups known as democratic socialists. Last night the member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) said that socialism is likely to lead to communism. I believe that is a misreading of history because wherever communism is indigenous it has sprung not from socialism but from black reaction such as we saw in countries like Russia before 1918. In those countries where democratic socialism is strong, communism is at its weakest. We have to be prepared to encourage every movement which will lead to any improvement in the standard of living and literacy of the peoples of the world.

We have to realize that in some countries such a position may mean revolution. We are mortally afraid of that word "revolution," although we are the products of it. Our parliament and our democratic processes, our conception of freedom, are the fruits of revolution carried on by our fathers in the past. The liberty we have today is the result of the revolt against tyranny in England, France, and the United States, so perhaps there is something to be said for revolution. There is much to be said for those groups who are trying to improve the conditions of the people and to remove oppression so that communism may be held in check. If that improvement can be achieved only by revolution, I do not think we should fear it as much as we say we do. Yet we are faced with the fact that among the major western powers the principal support is for reaction, and that support, of course, means that they are playing directly into the hands of the communists.

Many of us on this continent, as well as in Europe, are completely unable to understand why the allied forces in Germany are approving the appointment of nazis to high positions in industry. There is the situation in Greece to which the minister referred yesterday, and I must admit that I do not share his optimism. For some years that country has been torn by strife and I fear will continue to be torn by strife for some time to some. There was a guerilla movement in Greece, in many ways completely legitimate. It was made up not only of communists but also of democratic socialists, such as myself, and Liberals such as those on the opposite side of this house. They had to flee to the mountains because of the persecution of a tyrannical government. It so happens that they were taken over by the communists and their grievances exploited by the Kremlin. In an attempt to rectify that situation, the United States has continued to pour money into Greece, perhaps $300 million a year, hoping for reforms which would hold communism in check. The only result we have seen of that vast expenditure is the continued greed and avarice of the Athens group which is still in power.

Every move that Russia has made in Greece has been carefully calculated, even to the betrayal of the guerillas. Betrayal is nothing new in Soviet Russia's history. Of this I am certain; even if the great powers of the world get out of Greece, there will still be a struggle between the dispossessed majority and a reactionary government. Our policy should be one of hands off. It is a policy which we might have to change, however, if other nations continue to interfere in what is happening in that country. I find it difficult to understand, let alone explain to others to whom we speak of our democratic faith, just why the great nations of the western world support reaction while they talk so glibly about democracy. I find it difficult to explain the inconsistencies in British and United States policies which accommodate themselves with great ease to the non-democratic institutions of countries such as Portugal, Turkey, the Arab nations, and conceivably yet, Yugoslavia. I feel that our government must have some policy in regard to that matter, because, if we are to take the minister's speech at its face value—and I think we are entitled to do so—these are not policies to which we can give support.

In this review yesterday the minister mentioned that communism was not making headway in Europe—in France, Italy, Finland, and I think he might also have mentioned Norway where, on October 10 last, the Labour government was once again returned to power with a greater majority. Not only was it returned to power, but the eleven communists who were members of the previous parliament were defeated. We should remember that the borders of Norway are contiguous to those of the Soviet union and the communists there were not eliminated by repression —which incidentally will never eliminate communism. They were eliminated because of the constructive measures of the government designed to improve the standards of living of the people. As we have said so often, this is the only way to combat communism.

There are other sore spots in the world. There is the Middle East, where even yet there is neither security nor peace, and I do not think there ever will be until the conflict over oil is stopped and the conditions of the Arabs materially improved. It is true—and I welcome it—that Israel is now recognized by the world. But unfortunately the neighbours of that country are still pawns in the game of power politics. In the Middle East the strategic importance of oil is paramount. Some nations feel it is a struggle for survival because oil is so important to the modern economy. But it is also a struggle by private groups for their own profit. There is only one answer that I can see. Again I may be accused of suggesting interference in the affairs of other nations, but I feel that the responsibility eventually will have to be assumed by the United Nations by its creating a trusteeship over the oil resources of the Middle East. That trusteeship should be used to protect the interests of the people who have been exploited for so many years by feudal rulers, and also to see that all countries are given free access to the oil which is there. The United Nations has a commission just now studying the economic conditions in the Middle East. What it will report I do not profess to know, but I hope that a trusteeship such as I have suggested will be one of the recommendations made. Of this much I am certain: if the situation in the Middle East is handled properly, this question of security may settle itself.

What about China? I think we might almost paraphrase the words of a certain statesman and say that it is a great country of which we know but little. I do not share the minister's modified eulogy of the regime which is vanishing. Indeed, I give it little credit. Whatever credit there is I reserve for those tens of thousands of Chinese peasants who died helping to make our cause victorious. What we see today is a venal administration, clad in corruption, rapidly disappearing; and its place is being taken by a Chinese politburo.

The western nations did not realize the strength of the nationalism which existed in China. The Russians did, and they capitalized on that feeling in China, just as they are capitalizing on it in other areas; and of course they have designed it as far as they could for their own ends. While I may be unduly optimistic, I do not feel that Russian nationalism will in the long run prove a greater or more powerful force than the indigenous Chinese nationalism. China is not yet under the direct domination of the Soviet union; it may never be. But it is certain that many of its rulers have great sympathy with the ideas of the Kremlin. There are also some who cast an eye toward the west because they realize the tremendous need for western help. Who will survive, we cannot tell. The tip-off obviously will be when the purges start in China, as of necessity they must.

The great need for China is industrialization. Yet from the point of view of national resources, if one excludes Manchuria, it is not a rich country. As I said before, industrialization is impossible without help from the west. We can count on this. Russian influence will be used to the utmost to eliminate foreign markets, so that they may cripple us commercially still further; and Russian influence may be used to prevent the Chinese, or certain of them, from appealing to the west for the aid which they need if China is to become an industrial nation. It is much too early to decide what is going to happen. The situation is confused and in no small way bedevilled by the equally confused and vacillating policy followed recently by the United States which has been costly not only in terms of money but also in terms of prestige.

As to the recognition of China, I do not think anybody would be brave enough to say when that should take place. It is entirely a matter of timing. Recognition must take place obviously at the moment when too great prestige will not be given to the regime, and yet before it is too late for us to capitalize on that recognition.

In the debate on external affairs eighteen months ago I spoke at some length on the aims and aspirations of Russia. I gave my reasons then for believing that Russia was not ready for war. I see no reason for repeating them. But the real menace in Russia today, in my opinion, is not entirely the menace of what for want of a better word we call communism; it is Russian nationalism, which is a legacy from Ivan the Terrible down through Alexander the Great to the last of the Romanovs. I am convinced that although the people of the Soviet union loathe the idea of war as much as we do, their leaders believe it to be inevitable. If that final tragedy of war should come, the atom bomb is going to be used and the results will be more appalling than any of us dares to contemplate. I agree therefore with General Romulo when he said in the assembly that "the means for controlling the destructive potentialities of this new force must be found", with the emphasis on the "must". This means that we must continue, with all the patience we have, to explore avenues of co-operation with the Soviet union. Mr. Vishinsky's hostile and insolent manner makes clear the tremendous difficulty there is of finding some common ground. Unquestionably, power must be on our side in a world of power politics. But in the long run that is not the best road to peace. Nevertheless, possession of adequate military power, and the additional moral power resulting from policies which are rooted firmly in our democratic and Christian traditions, may provide the time which is so necessary to break down the suspicion and the fear which besets the world. In the pursuit of that aim we Canadians have an increasingly important part to play.

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent): I first want to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who has returned to us after his heavy duties at Lake Success in connection with United Nations work. I want to compliment him on the brief though comprehensive résumé that he gave of his work there. I am sure hon. members appreciate to the full the involved and intricate work that they have to do; and it will probably become more and more involved and more difficult as days go by.

In view of the fact that several references have been made to the Chinese situation, I felt that I should say something in that regard. As many hon. members know, I spent a little over two years with the United Nations relief and rehabilitation administration. Approximately two years of that time were spent in the China field. I have always been interested in this type of work. The first intimation I had of it was when Winston Churchill, that great wartime leader, said in the House of Commons in Great Britain in 1940, and through the House of Commons to the world at large, and particularly to the people of the nations who had been overrun by the Hitler forces and were held in subjection to them: "Hold on; do not give up. The allies will win the war, and when victory is achieved and the war is ended the United Nations will bring you food, clothing, relief and rehabilitation." He invited all other nations of similar views to join with him in this very large project. Consequently, after some meetings and after a good deal of correspondence and publicity the members of the United Nations met in Atlantic City on November 3, 1943, and that is where the UNRRA agreement and the UNRRA charter were drawn up.

Nothing of its kind had ever been attempted in the world before. There was no precedent to go by. They had to venture out into a new field. They had to do something for these people. At that meeting they agreed that one per cent of the 1943 national income of these nations would be a fair basis on which to work. Representatives of many nations were there. Later others came in, until eventually thirty-three nations that had not been invaded and sixteen that had been invaded by the enemy during the war became members of the United Nations relief and rehabilitation administration.

The amount of money that was contributed to that organization was stupendous. It amounted to something over $3,500 million in United States funds. Of course the United States contributed much the larger amount, because they had much the larger income. Of the total they contributed something over seventy per cent. Great Britain was second and Canada was third. Canada's contribution was approximately $150 million. Of the total amount of money that was subscribed, the largest amount was earmarked for China. It amounted to $530 million. The total amount of supplies shipped in to China under this rehabilitation program approximated three million long tons. That in itself was a stupendous task.

As hon. members know, China is a very old country. It has a history which goes back at least six thousand years. It comprises almost one-quarter of the world's population. The population runs anywhere from 450 million to 500 million people. Therefore we must admit that that country is possessed of extraordinary powers of stamina and resistance. After all these years, and in spite of famine, flood, disease and war, both foreign and civil, they comprise one-quarter of the world's population.

I was in that country almost two years doing UNRRA work. It would be presumptuous on my part to say that I know much about their problems, because a country with a civilization that old and steeped in tradition after all these years has problems that could not be solved by a foreigner going into that country and staying such a short time. A noted war correspondent, and later a press correspondent, was once asked to write the bottom facts of China. He replied that there was no bottom and there were no facts.

I was assigned to the department of investigation and inspection, to see that the supplies that were sent into China were channelled through their proper courses and went to the places to which they were allotted and assigned, and to see also that they did not get sidetracked and on the black market. That in itself was quite a problem. It was a stupendous task because the transportation system of China was totally inadequate to handle that amount of supplies, and it had been further disrupted by the war.

In this capacity I visited many parts of China. I was intensely interested in seeing that these supplies did go to the place to which they were allotted and that the people did get the maximum amount of relief. I was also interested in the standard of living of the people, and in the type of government they had. I also wanted to find out, if I could, what had kept that vast body of people in such a primitive state as they had been all through these centuries.

I found that China was a country of approximately four million square miles in area. It has an area larger by one-third than that of the United States. It has thirty-four provinces, with a governor over each province, including, of course, Manchuria.

In the ordinary course of events the UNRRA supplies that were distributed in Europe were distributed through the municipal offices, the Red Cross organizations and other government agencies, but in China that was not possible. Therefore a different procedure was followed in China. The Chinese national government set up an organization of their own called CNRRA. They set up approximately the same kind of organization as UNRRA, and we dealt through the CNRRA organization. Fifteen regional offices were set up in places which had been devastated and war ravaged by the Japanese invasion. The problem was to distribute these supplies in the proper places. That was the first time that I had some slight differences with the CNRRA organization, whose function it was to see that these goods and supplies were distributed properly. Under the terms of the agreement with the UNRRA organization these supplies were to be distributed without discrimination as to race, creed, or political differences in the war ravaged and war devastated areas. The CNRRA organization was at times reluctant to send the supplies to the communist held territories, which after all had been devastated and ravaged the same as the others. With that in mind I worked in China. I must confess that I went to China wholly convinced that the national government, which was headed by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, was the government that should be reinstated and supported by other nations. After I was there a while I wondered whether that was true. I began gradually to change my mind, and often used to think of the Shakespearian play, Hamlet, where Polonius was saying farewell to Laertes and, not expecting to see him again, gave him this as his farewell warning:

> Neither a borrower nor a lender be;
> For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
> And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry:
> This above all: to thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

With this in mind I tried to draw my own conclusions as to the exact problem in China, or as to what was the solution, if there was any. I did as the late General Stilwell did; I wrote my own diary, and wrote it carefully from day to day. I do not expect I shall ever publish it, but if it is published it will show what I saw from day to day.

During the week end I reviewed my diary to be sure that I had it correct. I will say that I could not believe such poverty could have existed—such privation, such hardship, such misery. I could not believe that such want prevailed anywhere in the world in the year of our Lord 1946, the first year I was in China.

Even the great city of Shanghai, the greatest metropolis in China, with many modern buildings—even in that great city the poverty was indescribable. It beggared description. According to their own census, they would pick up each morning the corpses of forty or fifty people who had passed away in the preceding twenty-four hours.

Another condition which brought about great misery was inflation. When I went to China in 1946, through the medium of brokerage offices and exchange shops one could buy United States dollars and gold bars. One could buy the British pound, but most of the business was based upon United States dollars. When I went there, one United States dollar would buy 1,200 Chinese dollars. The Chinese currency became more and more depreciated until it reached the point of 200,000 to one. When I left China late in 1947 the exchange rate was 500,000 Chinese dollars for one United States dollar.

This meant great privation for the people, because the price of rice was greatly inflated. People were not able to buy, because they did not have enough of their own devalued money. It became so bad that in many places shops were closed and commodities were not sold. In some places people would pay for meals when they went into restaurants for fear the prices of the meals would go up before the meals had been eaten. The merchants raised or marked up the prices of their goods many times, even three times in one day. All this caused misery and hardship; it resulted in much suffering among the common people of the country.

I have kept in fairly close touch with China since my return. About a year after I came back the exchange rate stood at about eight and one-half to nine million for one United States dollar.

I found that illiteracy in China was prevalent to the extent of at least eighty per cent. I believe it is a fact that eighty per cent of the people in that great country are illiterate—able neither to read nor to write. They had no schools to go to, and no teachers to teach them. This fact in itself added greatly to the difficulties we experienced in supplying the people with the food and clothing, relief and rehabilitation contributed by the United Nations.

It must be kept in mind of course that the Japanese began their invasion of China as early as 1931, and gradually took over the country. They first took over Manchuria, and by 1945 nearly one-half of the total country was in their hands. UNRRA was the greatest humanitarian plan ever devised by the mind of man; there can be no question about it. To my mind it was a preliminary Marshall plan; it was a stopgap. It was merely to stop people going to the left in large numbers and forming themselves into bandits who would have entirely disrupted the country. It was a plan to bring people back to a normal way of living.

I was pleased of course to be associated with that humanitarian organization, one with such a fine background. We know some mistakes were made. It is true, yes, that some of the cotton sent over in 1946 by UNRRA to be used for the relief of the Chinese people never reached the people. In the main, however, it did. I believe there were something like 550,000 bales of cotton sent. It is true that some of that cotton reached the cotton mills, and some was used to make uniforms for the armed forces. It is true that about 20 million feet of lumber, the finest that could be purchased from California to British Columbia, was not used for the purpose for which it was intended, namely, the rehabilitation of the fishing industry. It is true that some of the food did reach the army.

All this was inevitable. But in the main the organization did succeed in what it set out to do, and many millions of lives were saved. Much hardship, suffering and privation was alleviated by the distribution of supplies and the work done by UNRRA in the Chinese field. Let me say that the people of China did know where those goods came from and, in the main, were most thankful. They did appreciate the services and the supplies given by the United Nations.

Because of war some of China's potential production was lost. For instance, in 1935 she produced enough cotton for her own industry—something in the neighbourhood of two million bales. That supply, however, was pretty well dissipated and destroyed during the war. UNRRA brought over many tons of better types of cottonseed, types which would produce longer staple. This was distributed among the cotton farmers—in itself a worth-while contribution.

Many hundreds of tons of vegetable seeds were brought over, with the result that they were able to produce a much better type of vegetable, and were in a position to produce their own seed. I am convinced that China could increase her production by one-third if a proper system of fertilization were introduced and improvements were made in the types of seeds and in farm cultivation.

Another worth-while form of aid took place during the war of 1939, when a portion of the dikes of the Yellow river were blown out, with the idea of stopping the progress of the Japanese forces. This was an attempt to flood out the Japanese, and to drown them; but not many of them were drowned. In the Yellow river basin more than two million acres of the best fertile land were flooded and kept out of cultivation. One of the things UNRRA did—and it was a stupendous engineering task—was to rebuild those dikes so that the river might be returned to its former course and two million acres of fertile land brought back into cultivation to relieve the suffering and the hunger of the Chinese people.

A first-class job was done by UNRRA in connection with displaced persons. This organization undertook to bring back to their former homes people who had been displaced during the war. When the Japanese came, they carried away many of the Chinese to the inland areas to be used in the building of bridges and roads, thus virtually making slaves of them. These displaced persons had no means of returning to their homes; therefore UNRRA undertook to provide transportation, food and shelter during the period of rehabilitation.

In 1946 I visited some of these refugee camps where UNRRA was supplying temporary shelter, food and clothing to help the people return to their homes. I went with some of these refugees when they were being returned to their homes in Honkew, people who had been separated from their families for several years. In most instances what they went back to was only a hovel, a mass of rubble; but they picked out pieces of their own furniture, took their bamboo poles and started to rebuild their mud houses with straw-thatched roofs. The re-establishment of these people in their homes was a most worth-while project.

I think the IRO took over the displaced persons program in April, 1947, and they have been carrying on since then. During the days of UNRRA operations, there were 800,000 displaced persons who had to be brought back to their former homes. UNRRA also undertook to transport Europeans who had been caught there during the war back to their own lands. When IRO took over in April, 1947, there were still some 11,300 Europeans waiting to be transported to their homes. Many of them were probably hard cores who could never go back, but a great many of them did, and have by now been transported to their own countries. There were also many thousands of Chinese still to be returned to their homes.

I knew Mr. Jennings Wong, the director of IRO, very well. He was a most capable Chinese, and I worked with him during the fisheries rehabilitation program. A year ago he asked me to go back to China and help him with the IRO program. He knew of my attitude to the then Chinese government, and was appreciative of it; we talked about it many times. In view of the situation in China, and the expectation I had of conditions becoming rapidly worse and worse, I sent him a cable and told him I could not go.

While a part of the rehabilitation project has not been completed, by and large the UNRRA program was a worth-while contribution, and did much to relieve the suffering, hardship and privation of the Chinese people. That is something that will never be lost, because it will be remembered for many years. The Chinese are a very friendly people. We made many friends among them, and they will not forget the work we did.

It seemed to me that the background of the Chinese people was that one dynasty would rule year after year until it became so weak and corrupt in its court life that another dynasty would overthrow it and come into power. The last dynasty that held power in China was the Manchu. It carried on until October 10, 1911, when that young revolutionist, Dr. Sun Yat-sen, upset the Manchu dynasty and set up his so-called republic. Since that time the 10th day of October has been celebrated as a national holiday and is called "double tenth day". There is national patriotism, but a national viewpoint seems to be lacking when personal interests are at stake. In 1925 Dr. Sun Yat-sen was in Peking negotiating a peace treaty with the so-called communists of that day in order to establish a national government, but he took ill and died. In 1947 I visited Peking again. Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek came into power after Sun Yat-sen died, and he was president of the republic until a short time ago.

I remember visiting Peking in July, 1947, and I had lunch at the great Waggon Lee hotel there. I saw on the bulletin board that there was to be a Rotary dinner that day, and I went in and found they had a large club. Seventy-five per cent of the members were Chinese, and the remaining twenty-five per cent were foreigners like myself. The speaker of the day was Mr. Wells, a New York Times correspondent from Tientsin, and his subject was the economic crisis there. He spoke in English, because the ceremonies were practically all conducted in that language. He told us of the graft and corruption in the operations of the nationalist government in the city of Tientsin. In conversation with him afterwards he told me about conditions that to me were unbelievable. I could not believe that they could exist anywhere in the world.

While I know nothing about the personal integrity of Chiang Kai-shek, I understand from his friends that it is quite good; nevertheless I know that his government officials practised a policy of graft and corruption that was incredible to me. I have also visited many cities of China and met many merchants. I met Colonel Kearney, of the United States army, who was stationed there. He told me about many things that happened in the Chinese army which to me were inconceivable. When I went to China I understood that it was one of the great democracies of the world. According to my understanding and appraisal of democracy, it was as far removed from the principles and doctrine of democracy as it possibly could be. I could not conceive of conditions being as bad as they were. To me it was capitalism at its worst, where a few people controlled the whole policy and the rest lived in poverty and privation.

In my opinion Russia is capitalism in reverse; the people of Russia have lost their liberties and rights through a system of state socialism or communism. In both Russia and China it seems to me that the people are helpless pawns in the hands of their rulers. When I returned home in 1948 I told people not only in Washington but in Canada many times that I did not see how the then Chinese government could possibly win the war. That was the opinion I had formed after exhaustive investigations. I visited the merchants in many cities of China, men who had been Chinese merchants for years, and I asked them about the situation. They told me that they could not continue, that there would have to be a change, because they could not go on under present conditions. When I came home I suggested that the only way to achieve peace and unity in China was to follow a middle-of-the-road course.

When secretary of state George Marshall visited China in 1946, on several occasions he endeavoured to get the fighting forces together, and he almost accomplished it. I met many people connected with student bodies and democratic leagues, and I used one of the best interpreters available in order to try to get at the real cause of existing conditions. I found there was practically no support among the better thinking people for the government then in power.

What will the situation be under the present regime? That is something we probably cannot foresee. When I saw so much trouble, so much privation, and such terrible conditions, I said to myself many times: How can you support a government which condones, approves and contributes to a policy of feudalism, oppression, graft and corruption? How, in the name of democracy, liberty and Christianity, can you support such an outfit anywhere in the world? I could not do so. I do not know what will happen in the United Nations if the present regime in China should be recognized by Canada. It is two years since I visited China, and probably conditions have entirely changed. Many of the people I met in China were not pro-Russian, but anti-Russian. They were afraid of the Russian regime, but they could not continue under the old set-up. If that is the condition today, as I am firmly convinced it was two years ago, then if you want to maintain some stability —and I believe there is some stability now— I believe the new regime should be recognized as soon as possible. If that is not done, the result will be to drive these people into the open arms of Russia, which I think would be disastrous. This is something, of course, the United Nations will have to take into consideration. I think I saw in this morning's newspaper that Mr. Bevin was going to consult with the other nations about recognition of the new government in China.

When I was in China, associated with this great international body, it had a personnel of about two thousand, most of whom were from the United States. Others, however, came from all over the world—from South Africa, from India, from Egypt and other countries. Most of them could speak a little

English. It was what we call pigeon English, but at least we could understand each other and could carry on correspondence. Invariably they would ask me: "What state do you come from?" When I told them I did not come from a state, that I came from Canada, without exception they replied, "We think that is a wonderful country to live in. We think it is the best place in the world. Unfortunately your immigration restrictions will not permit us to go there, but we would like to go." I am fully convinced that no country stands in as high regard among the nations of the world as Canada does today; and this is something of which we should be very proud.

Many factors have contributed to Canada's position in this regard—the stand Canada has taken at international conferences, where we have always adopted the middle-of-the-road course; the fact that we have no territorial ambitions of our own, and that we have always stood for the rights of the common people. I must confess that I had to leave the shores of Canada and go to a foreign land before I fully appreciated what this country should mean to us and what this country has to offer. I believe we have a better standard of living, greater security and a brighter future than any other country in the world. I believe we have the best form of government, and I think we should support it. It is true that we have not solved all our problems; but as long as the world lasts you will never get a government that functions one hundred per cent. If we want to halt communism; if we want to make sure that communism finds no place here, let us teach Canada to the children in the schools and the young people in our universities. Let them compare this country with Russia and her satellites, and I am sure they will appreciate that Canada really is the best country in the world.

Then when the revolutionary days are over—and they will be over—we will need all our intelligence to adapt ourselves to the conditions of the new era. I am quite sure I do not need to tell the minister that it will be a matter of compromise and co-operation—though you cannot compromise too much. I mean that there must be a certain amount of give and take, but it cannot be all give or all take. We should never give up hope, however, as long as we can keep the nations of the world around the conference table, as long as we can maintain some kind of co-operation. You will remember that the league of nations failed because one country after another left it and refused to co-operate. Then we had two separate groups of countries that strengthened themselves in preparation for war; and no doubt that is what we would see if the United Nations should fail. I repeat that if we are to have peace in the world—and we must have it—it will have to be a matter of co-operation and compromise.

Many times I thought, when reading the late Wendell Willkie's book "One World", that if he had lived in China or India for any considerable period he would have realized that one world would not be possible in our time, but it probably will come much closer to realization in the life of this generation. In the United Nations we have racial divisions, we have differences of creed, we have economic conflict. But we have all those problems here in this country in some degree. The United Nations can draw up a basis of agreement, to be sure, but beyond that it is up to the individual people. We must support the United Nations, and must support its policies; for they touch the lives of all of us. Unless we live those policies in our hearts and souls and minds, unless we support that organization completely, it can never be a success.

In conclusion I urge that we make it our aim and ambition so to live, so to strive and so to serve and work that we shall be able to play our part in creating a better understanding among the races of the world and making a contribution toward the raising of the standards of living of those poor unfortunate people who are unable to help themselves without help from the European and western powers.

Let me close my remarks with a proverb I learned in China. It was written in Chinese, but I had it translated; and it went like this:

> Where there is righteousness in the heart, there is beauty of character. Where there is beauty of character, there is harmony in the home. Where there is harmony in the home, there is order in the nation; and where there is order in the nation, there is peace in the world.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate yesterday and today my mind has kept turning back to a scene in a third-year classroom at the university of Toronto some twenty-six years ago, when a young professor arrived to deliver his first lecture. He was very young; in fact he looked as though he might be an undergraduate himself. He spoke with a slight lisp; but he quickly commanded the attention of his students and, in a very short time, won their complete affection. I had the good fortune to be a member of that class; and the young professor who came to deliver his first lecture, in English constitutional history, was one Lester B. Pearson, who soon became known to all undergraduates as Mike. Little did I think then that he and I would today be sitting on opposite sides of this house participating in a debate of this nature.

If he will permit me—because I must still treat him with the deference that a former student must ever show to his professor—I should like to compliment and congratulate him on the admirable speech he made yesterday, in which he gave such a comprehensive review of our external relations. One thing I admired about it, in addition to its comprehensiveness, was that it was realistic and did not pull any punches, especially when dealing with the Kremlin menace which overhangs great sections of the world today. I thought it was refreshing to hear from the lips of the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs plain, bold truths, spoken without mincing words. It seems to me that is a refreshing and encouraging note in discussion of our international relations.

This debate, sir, is timely. I am one of those who feel that this parliament should have more frequent debates on external affairs. If we are to do our duty to those who sent us here, it is necessary to see that the Canadian people are provided with essential information concerning world affairs, so that great developments may not take place unknown to them, or cataclysmic and startling events burst upon them without warning. Such debate is necessary, too, so that the beneficial effect of public opinion may be felt in this chamber and in that way exerted upon those who are responsible for administering Canadian external policy.

Yesterday the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said something I do not intend to repeat but wish to concur in completely. He laid great emphasis upon the necessity for discussion in this house and for provision of the fullest information as to the developments in our external relations. A good example of that is the interesting speech which has just been delivered by the member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie). It brings to our minds this fact, sir, that our interest in the great events that are taking place in distant areas of the globe is not merely an academic interest. We listened closely to the hon. member's account of events in China, not as something remote from us, but, apart from the fact that he spoke from personal experience, as relating to events, unfolding themselves in China today, which have a direct bearing upon our life and our future in Canada.

As this world shrinks, and as Canada grows in strength and importance, so our horizons as citizens of Canada must broaden. This will be possible only if parliament does its share in shaping the thought of Canadians.

Mention has been made, sir, of the fact that in essence we have in Canada—I shall not say a nonpartisan foreign policy, but certainly a bi-, or tri-, or quadri-partisan foreign policy. It is revealed in the speeches which have been delivered in this debate. It seems to me that has been one of the elements of strength in Canada's external relations in these eventful post-war years. The fact that the two principal parties at least have seen substantially eye to eye in matters affecting Canada's external policies has been a contributing factor of great significance in the rising importance attached to Canada's voice, and her position in relation to the other nations of the world. I hope that condition may continue. I feel it is the duty of every member of the house to strive to make it possible for our foreign policy to be continued on that level and not be drawn into the area of partisan conflict. This will be possible if between the government and the house—and when I say "house" I mean all parties in the house—there exist mutual confidence and a disposition on the part of the government to be thoroughly frank with the house on these subjects at all times.

With this thought in mind, I should like to echo what my colleague the member for Peel said yesterday in urging the government to make a clear statement as to the extent to which the government may have gone in any particular in committing itself in the conferences that have been proceeding in recent months following recent international treaties and agreements.

We are actually debating, sir, a motion to refer certain of the estimates, namely the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, to the standing committee on external affairs. I believe this procedure is worthy of comment, in view of one or two remarks that were made yesterday.

As one who has sat on that committee since it was first established in 1945, I wish to commend the procedure that the house is asked to approve. Not only has that procedure been beneficial in past sessions, but it has provided a vehicle serving two useful purposes. First, it has enabled the members of this house sitting on that committee to elicit more detailed information about the operation of the Department of External Affairs and the way in which government policy in relation to foreign affairs works itself out through that department than would be possible in the house. In the second place, it affords an opportunity for a more efficient review of the estimates and expenditures.

These two worthy purposes have been well served under the procedure that has been followed with respect to the estimates of this department. We welcome the opportunity for accounting furnished by this motion, and urge that the example be followed by ministers of other departments in relation to other standing committees of the house.

My principal reason for speaking in this debate today is to lay before the members of the house some conclusions reached and some observations made largely in the course of my travels in Britain and on the continent of Europe a year ago. Since that time there has not been a debate in the house which would provide an opportunity for discussing some of the observations made on that tour, which in itself was a very interesting experience. With some other hon. members of this house, it was my good fortune to be one of the Canadian delegates to the commonwealth parliamentary conference which assembled in London in October, 1948. It afforded to the delegates an opportunity to meet some exceedingly interesting people in England, Scotland and Northern Ireland, and representatives from all parts of the commonwealth and the empire. After the conclusion of the conference, it was my good fortune to visit Greece, Italy, France, Belgium, The Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany, and Ireland, which at that time was still Eire. I do not pretend, sir, that that tour makes me an authority on this subject. If, however, the house will bear with me, I should like to share some of the experiences and some of the observations made in the course of that eventful tour.

In the first place, one cannot undertake a tour of that kind, coming in close contact, as I had the opportunity of doing, with Canada's representatives abroad—when I say "representatives" I mean not only those of ambassadorial or ministerial rank but the staffs in the embassies and legations—without a feeling of pride and satisfaction in the realization that the diplomatic side of the public service has attracted to it so many able men. I wish to speak now particularly of the younger men. This department had the good fortune to enlist the services of a large number of young men who came out of the armed services at the conclusion of the war. They are men with a good education, a clear mind and, in many cases, I believe they have a bright future before them. That has been one of the great advantages that Canada has enjoyed, because it has given vigour and clarity to our relations in the capitals of other nations. I hope that as time passes these younger men will be given encouragement, and will from time to time be appointed to leading positions in the diplomatic services as men who have earned those positions by right of promotion and by long service. I do not say that every ambassadorial post must be filled by a career diplomat, but I hope that as time goes on the young men who have been brought into the public service in this field, and who have had the opportunity of developing, will not be denied the opportunity of reaching the higher posts in the diplomatic service of Canada.

I should like to say, too, that visits from Canadians, particularly those in public life, to some of the more distant countries I have mentioned, would be good for our representatives there and for those who have the good fortune to visit those countries. Particularly in the three Scandinavian countries that I visited I was told that few members of the Canadian parliament are ever seen there. May I say this to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I hope he will encourage his able deputy to visit as many as possible of these diplomatic posts abroad if he cannot do it himself. Firsthand contact will be extremely useful on both sides. It will be possible in that way to understand some of the immediate problems that men in the diplomatic service abroad, in all ranks, are facing. There are many acute difficulties as a result of exchange problems in these recent times.

One cannot visit Britain without a thrill of pride when one sees that, submitted as it was to the severest test that any nation in all history has ever undergone, it came through in such way as to fulfil the prophecy of Winston Churchill: so long as the world shall last, though the nation shall last a thousand years, men will say that that was Britain's finest hour. It is with sadness that one sees today the heavy price that that nation is still paying for her tremendous exertions and her almost unlimited sacrifices during the war.

As the minister has said, the commonwealth today can boast of increased achievements. Within the past year and a half we have seen the addition of three young partners to the list of the members of this British commonwealth of nations. They are old countries, but young members of this commonwealth. It was the great privilege of those of us who were delegates to the commonwealth parliamentary conference to come in close contact with the delegates from these new dominions. They were a most interesting study. The Indian delegation, for instance, was a strong one. In fact, one can say that about all those delegations. Nearly every one of them—and there was one woman among them—had a record of imprisonment sometimes aggregating a long period of years. Yet there was not in the conversation of one of them—and to me this was a most agreeable fact—the slightest trace of bitterness toward Britain. This surprised me, and I made it my business to ask some of these Indian delegates the reason. The answer was: It is due to Gandhi, because Gandhi always insisted that we were not fighting Britain; that we were fighting against what we considered to be the imperialistic system, and Gandhi always insisted that there should be no bitterness.

It is an amazing fact, Mr. Speaker, that today those who are leading India into the new paths of self-government upon which she has entered are men whose minds, notwithstanding their experiences of the past, are, with hardly any exception, free from bitterness arising out of their past experiences. Their whole attitude could be summed up in this way: We thank Britain for this gift of self-government; we are determined to show Britain and the other nations of the world that we deserve this gift, and that we are going to make good. The same may be said of the delegates of Pakistan and Ceylon, although they have not had the experiences I have mentioned in relation to most of the Indian delegates.

In the light of events elsewhere in Asia, particularly in China, and events that may soon make themselves felt in the smaller countries south of China, it is of the greatest importance, not only to Canada but to the whole civilized world, that we should see rising on this subcontinent of India a nation dedicated to peace and to democracy, and representing the principal hope of the world today for the maintenance of stability in the Far East. There was a time when many people of the western world regarded China, because of her long record of faithful attachment to peace, as the hope of the future in Asia. But having regard to events that are occurring in China today, the thoughts of the world are being transferred to India as the principal basis for the hopes that we build of peace, stability and democracy in the Far East. We may be thankful for the vitality of democracy in that land, and the vitality of the belief in democracy that is shared by Mr. Nehru and the other Indian leaders who are following him so faithfully in their tasks.

Looking at what is happening there, is it not a thousand pities that Burma was so hasty in her decision, in view of what she might have been saved in the light of the decisions made at the prime ministers' conference in April last? She might have had everything she sought in the way of sovereignty and yet have continued to enjoy the benefits of membership in this great commonwealth.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned with regret the departure of Ireland from the commonwealth. I am sure it is a matter of the most profound regret to all Canadians that the government and the Dail of Ireland have not seen their way clear to remain as a sister nation in the commonwealth. I simply make this observation on that departure. While in Dublin it was my good fortune to discuss this matter with the Prime Minister, Mr. Costello. I had the opportunity of meeting individually all the members of his cabinet, as well as Mr. de Valera, the leader of the opposition. The reasons that were given by the government for the course which it had then announced, and which became effective within a short time afterwards, do not reflect any ill will, either toward Britain or toward other nations in the commonwealth.

Mr. Costello said two things. He believed, first, that the step that was being taken would be a contribution toward better relations with Britain. In the second place, he said that it would remove, as a source of political strife, the question of relations with Britain, which had been exploited in times past by politicians there as a means of advancing their political interests. Just as we in Canada, to our great loss, have had racial and other differences basely exploited for political purposes, so in Ireland differences with Britain have been exploited for political purposes. We can only hope that there will continue to prevail that measure of good will which was professed by all the leaders of that country at the time they took their fateful step.

Europe is a fascinating study at any time; and I do not think one could have visited the countries in Europe I have mentioned at a time when a more interesting study would have been possible. Of the importance of recovery in Europe, particularly in western Europe, both politically and economically—and I may say spiritually as well—there can be no question. If the world is to tread the paths of peace and to be delivered from the uneasy mood under which it has laboured since the war, then Europe must undergo that restoration, political, economic and spiritual.

There are two bright rays of hope in the European scene. One is the fact that in some of the countries statesmen of great stature have arisen who are giving leadership to their people. In the second place, United States aid, both in the material sense in the way of money and in leadership, has been invaluable. No Canadian ever ought to underestimate the contribution that the United States has been making to the restoration of Europe and the preservation of democracy in western Europe.

One thinks, of course, of France because of its leading position. One thinks of conditions a year ago, when strikes and riots, precipitated by the communists, were being aimed at the breakdown of government in that country—diabolical attempts which that nation has survived. France now seems to be moving into smoother paths, although she still faces formidable economic difficulties.

Belgium came through the war and entered the post-war period with her economy probably in better condition than that of any other nation involved in the war. The Netherlands suffered terribly during the war, and one of the great difficulties in working out a customs union between Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg has been the great disparity between economic conditions in Belgium on the one hand and in The Netherlands on the other. Progress has been made, and the good feeling among those nations augurs well for the future.

As to Italy, several of us Canadians who were there at the time had the opportunity of conferring with the Prime Minister, Mr. de Gasperi, and members of the Italian government. Italy has had a heavy struggle against tremendous economic and political difficulties. By those of us who may be prone to think of Italy principally in terms of her role as an enemy country in the earlier years of the war, and of the treachery and the perfidy that accompanied Italy's entry into the war under the hand of that villain Mussolini, this fact should be remembered: Italy today is led by a man who is a great democrat. Mr. de Gasperi was in exile throughout the twenty years of Mussolini's regime. He found exile in the Vatican; otherwise undoubtedly he would have ended his days in a concentration camp. After twenty years of exile in the Vatican throughout Mussolini's regime, he returned and is today taking a prominent place among the statesmen of Europe in leading his country forward. Italy has a tremendous population problem. There are two million unemployed in that country. That is the essence of Italy's great economic difficulty.

Mention has already been made in this house, and I do not need to dwell upon it, of the way in which the tide of communism has receded in Europe, in all the countries that I have mentioned, and also in the Scandinavian countries. In moving through the Scandinavian countries one was conscious of the fact that the communists are losing ground. Naturally I made it my business to try to find the reason. Everywhere I went I found from those with whom I talked—people in public life, members of the press and citizens—that the factor that made the impression upon those countries, which were countries attached to the democratic way of life, the thing that had opened their eyes to the reality of communist aims in Europe, was what happened in Czechoslovakia. It was all very well for them to shrug their shoulders at what happened in Poland, in Roumania, in Bulgaria, in Hungary and in Albania, because those countries seemed to be far away, and all of them had not had the record of wholesome attachment to democratic ideals that had prevailed among the brave Czechoslovakian people. What happened in Czechoslovakia? The communists found their way into the government under the guise of colleagues, under the guise of coalition. They quickly grasped the key posts of power in the government. Then when the time was ripe, and acting on instructions from the Kremlin, they seized power. There cannot be any compromise between democracy and communism. Events in Czechoslovakia have proven forever that democrats and communists cannot work together in the same government. The events in Czechoslovakia contributed mightily to the opening of the eyes of the peoples in the democratic nations in western Europe, and not least of all in the Scandinavian countries. What has happened in elections that have occurred there since is simply the culmination of a process that was quite evident at the time.

A year ago today I was in Berlin. It was an amazing experience to be in that city of ruin. But probably more impressive than the ruin was the airlift. The airlift is not simply a closed chapter of history. The political significance of the airlift should not be underestimated by those who are shaping events in the world scene, and who are looking forward to what may happen in the days to come. It was a marvel of organization; it was a tremendous triumph of the western nations, Britain and the United States, over Russia in the cold war. I do not stop now to examine the technical features of it. It fell to the good fortune of a member of the other place, Senator Moraud, and myself to see this airlift in actual operation, to fly in on it to Berlin and out on it, to see it in operation, both at Gatow airport, which was used by the Royal Air Force, and at Tempelhof airport, used by the United States air force. On both fields freight planes were landing and taking off every three minutes. An aeroplane was taking off or landing every one and a half minutes, and all of them were controlled by one man in the control tower. It was our good fortune to be in that control tower, and to see this whole operation laid out before us. It was a costly operation, but it was successful.

There are those who say that a great mistake was made by the leaders of the allied powers during the war in planning for the joint occupation of Berlin. Well, sir, whether a mistake was made or not—and I for one am not convinced that a mistake was made—the fact of the matter is that, once joint occupation was decided upon, its continuance was essential; it was necessary that the western nations, which Russia was trying to push out of Berlin, should stand their ground. A decision of the most vital and far-reaching importance was taken in concert by Great Britain and the United States when they decided that they would stand their ground in the face of tremendous pressure exerted upon them by the Russians, deliberately exerted to force them out, and thus to cause loss of prestige to the western nations in eastern and middle Europe, and also to snuff out the flicker of hope still entertained by the peoples in those countries that some day they might live to recover their freedom; and to show them that their hopes were in vain.

It was a triumph of unity between Great Britain and the United States. Not only did it preserve their position in Berlin; not only did it preserve the hopes of those who were outside the iron curtain that the western powers were still strong enough to stand up to pressure from Russia, but it has served to keep alive behind the iron curtain the hope of those unfortunate, unhappy people that the day will come when they will recover their freedom.

That triumph of the airlift has been responsible, to a greater extent than has been recognized, for the fact that it became possible to enlarge the scope of the Brussels pact into the North Atlantic treaty. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will bear me out when I say that the strong stand of Great Britain and the United States, their show not only of strength but of will to stand up to the Russians in that situation, was largely responsible for creating in the minds of the smaller nations of western Europe a willingness to enter into military commitments with the stronger nations and to make this North Atlantic pact an effective and comprehensive instrument of policy on the part of the democratic nations to restrain further Russian aggression in Europe.

May I digress to say that I hope, before he closes the debate, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will say something further to the house about whatever efforts are being made to pursue the drafting of the peace treaties with Germany and Austria.

One is conscious of the tremendous difficulties. One is conscious of the fact that the western nations must certainly keep alive a loyalty to the cause of democracy, and the support that democratic leaders in Germany enjoy from the people of Germany today. I am not commenting on just how deep that loyalty is, or how quickly it may be lost; but I am sure that those who are responsible for directing the external policies of the western nations are alive to the necessity of strengthening the hands of the democratic leaders in Germany today. I had the opportunity of talking to some of these democratic leaders in Berlin, and learning the feelings they harbour as to the uncertainties facing them if their hands are not strengthened.

In the very few moments remaining to me I should like to say something about Greece. All too little is known in the western world about what has been happening in Greece. If more were known, less would be said on the part of some to the effect that what has occurred in Greece since the war has been merely a civil war. I spent some days in Greece—not simply in Athens, but also up in the battlefields of the north. We were taken to Janina; there we were within view of the battleground of the Grammos mountains where a very important battle had been fought against the guerrillas in April, 1948.

What has happened in Greece has not been a civil war. It is true that large numbers of the guerrillas were Greeks; but that was no cold war: that was a hot, shooting war, and that force of guerrillas had foreign help behind them. Russian planes were supplying the guerrillas who were fighting in large numbers in the difficult mountain areas of Greece. It was the communist countries to the north of Greece—Yugoslavia, Bulgaria and Albania—which were harbouring those guerrilla forces, supplying them with bases and hospitals, and seeing that they were armed with everything they needed to make their incursions into Greece from those bases.

Their methods were the typical communist methods—diabolical in the extreme. When they raided the villages they shot the men who would not consent to being conscripted into the guerrilla ranks. Their homes were destroyed, and their children were abducted by the thousands and carried over the border to the communist countries to the north. When I was in Paris—where, I may say, I was treated with the greatest kindness by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—while the United Nations assembly and the political committee of which the minister is this year's distinguished chairman were in session, I heard the Yugoslav delegate complaining in the strongest terms against the action of Mr. Trygve Lie, the Secretary General, who had banned the showing, under

United Nations auspices, of a film which, the delegate said, showed the conditions under which Greek children were being reared in the schools of Yugoslavia.

Those children had been taken from their homes, from their parents in Greece, by these communist raiders, and carried across the border to the communist countries in the north. They were to be reared there and filled with communist hatred and communist doctrine until they were old enough to bear arms. Then they were to be sent back to join the guerrilla forces for the purpose of overthrowing the lawfully constituted government of Greece.

I wish to say something about democracy in Greece. If free discussion in the parliament of a country, the utmost freedom on the part of an opposition to attack and to criticize the government, is a true badge of democracy, then there is democracy in Greece today. Half a dozen of us Canadians were accorded a reception in the parliament of Greece, something for which we must always be thankful. We saw there with our own eyes the kind of debate that was taking place. I can tell you that there was no pulling of punches on the part of opposition members in that house. There we saw democracy working in an elected chamber, just as it works in this chamber, with the utmost freedom on the part of members of the opposition to speak and to criticize.

Greece holds a most strategic position in the world today. If Greece had fallen behind the iron curtain, the whole balance of power in the world would have changed, throwing the eastern Mediterranean under the power of Russia in that vital area where Russian policy has been trying to advance Russian influence for the last two hundred years.

The brave people of Greece have suffered great privations. Their attitude is one of profound gratitude to our nation for the gifts of wheat and other supplies from this country, through the Red Cross, and the Aid-to-Greece fund operating with the Allied War Relief fund. These gifts actually rescued that whole nation from the verge of starvation, because when the Germans moved out they took everything with them. They took all the medical supplies; they took all the food. They denuded the hospitals and other institutions of healing in the same way.

It filled us Canadians who were there with pride, to receive on every hand an unrestrained expression of gratitude from the Greek people to Canada for what this country has done. There is no more grateful people in the world than the people of Greece. It filled us with pride to see the Greek people standing on the streets of Athens and cheering when the car of the Canadian ambassador drove by flying the Canadian red ensign. General LaFleche has done great work there. He has been a very popular figure in Greece.

I hope we shall hear in this chamber no word of criticism—although I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) came very close to it today—I hope we shall hear no word of criticism of American aid to Greece, because it was that American aid that has made it possible for the Greek people to expel these diabolical communist guerrillas from their midst, and give the people the chance, which they have been denied from the time war burst upon them in 1940, to rebuild their country and walk in the paths of peace. A great task of reconstruction awaits the Greek people who have suffered so much, and have earned our admiration and our gratitude for holding fast the gateway to the west against the invaders from the east.

Then, sir, this is my final word: whatever may be found disappointing in the international situation; whatever may be the misgivings of some in view of our disappointments, particularly in the security council of the United Nations, failure, should it come, must never be the result of any defection on our part from these institutions or the ideals they represent. The obligations we have undertaken are sacred to us. No matter what others may do to dishonour their obligations, ours must remain inviolate.

As we survey the uneasy present and the dark past I think we can all take fresh heart when we remember that there is committed to us as one of the western nations the cause of freedom, the cause of the dignity of man, the cause of honour and fair dealing among nations.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. R. O. Campney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every hon. member of the house is grateful indeed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) for the clear, frank, comprehensive and informative survey, which he gave us yesterday morning, of conditions as they exist today in this troubled world. It was a sombre statement. There was not much ground for optimism, certainly none for overoptimism, but there were rays of hope and encouragement here and there, for which we are all thankful. I think also that in the course of giving his review the Secretary of State for External Affairs impressed each of us with the fact that the conduct of the external relations of Canada rests in very capable and understanding hands. Lastly, I am sure that we were all impressed, as we listened to him reviewing world affairs, with the tremendous responsibility which he carries as the responsible minister, and which this government or any other government carries in the field of international relations today.

In rising to make a few remarks—incidentally, the first which I have made—I do not propose to try to resurvey world affairs or even to deal with questions of high policy. I should like to undertake a much more humble task. I should like to speak for a short time about the Department of External Affairs itself because I believe it is a department of vital importance and concern to our whole future, and that its history has contributed a good deal to the development of our nationhood.

I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that the work of the department is not as well known as it should be, but I cannot agree with him as to the reasons. If I understood him correctly, I think he attributed the situation to a lack of education and publicity on the part of the government, and to some sort of attitude that possibly the department had a self-appointed aloofness. I do not think either of these reasons is correct. I do not think either of them is the reason why the department is not adequately known, appraised and appreciated.

In my opinion there are two reasons for this condition. In the first place I think a specific interest in external affairs on the part of every individual is hard to establish and maintain except in relation to the broadest terms of policy. After all, every man has his duties and responsibilities, and he is quick enough to appreciate anything the government does that affects him. If taxes are raised you do not have to worry about publicity; but if somebody propounds that the Secretary of State for External Affairs possibly is not taking the right position in regard to something that happened a month ago in Pakistan I do not think people become greatly enthused about it. We tend to leave these matters in the hands of the government. We tend to leave consideration of these matters to others because we cannot hope to keep up day by day with the facts on which judgment must be based.

Second, I think the Department of External Affairs must, almost of necessity, be a somewhat silent department. It is an advisory department; it collects facts and information and advises the ministerial heads of the government. Its service to Canada is an indirect one. I do not think it can be put in the same position as, for example, the Department of Public Works and the Post Office Department, which touch on tangible things that concern most members of parliament, and probably most people throughout the country. Nevertheless I believe that the department is doing an outstandingly good job.

I should like to point out that the work of the department and of its responsible heads day by day is most exacting. They must deal with a multitude of varied and complex questions which must of necessity be dealt with promptly and effectively, and frequently without any clear idea ascertainable at the time as to what the ultimate effect may be, because in foreign affairs the world is never static. It is changing every day, and the department and its responsible heads must keep abreast of every development and try to interpret it. Therefore it seems to me that the actions of the responsible heads of the Department of External Affairs must be the responsibility of the government which has to be judged and approved in the final analysis. I think that is true of other countries. I do not think therefore that the government or the department is open to criticism of any kind as to that phase of the matter.

The Department of External Affairs goes back a long way. It originated out of confusion because each department of the government was writing its own letters to different departments of other governments in the world. Sir Joseph Pope, who was under-secretary of state at the time, and who had been Sir John A. Macdonald's private secretary, in order to bring order out of confusion suggested that some department should be created to handle such matters, and he prepared a memorandum of which I shall read only a couple of sentences. It seems almost quaint now in the light of what has happened since that time. This is what he said in 1907:

> I recommend that a small staff of young men, well educated and carefully selected, be attached to the department which I have advocated, and that they be specially trained in the knowledge and treatment of these subjects. In this way we shall acquire an organized method of dealing with international questions which at present we wholly lack.

Two years later, in 1909, forty years ago, that recommendation was followed and the Department of External Affairs was created. It was then a mere adjunct of the Department of the Secretary of State. It had a small staff consisting of one deputy minister, two chief clerks and four clerks. It was little more than a channel of external communication, but soon after it was formed it was attached to the Prime Minister's office and he became Secretary of State for External Affairs. In this particular I do agree with the hon. member for Peel that we might well find a less unwieldy title. The department continued growing steadily until 1946, when a separate portfolio was created which was assumed by our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He continued in that portfolio until 1948, when the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was appointed.

In the meantime the department has grown from its inception in 1909, until now we have over 170 highly trained and specialized technical officers, and a staff of over 800, operating through twenty-three embassies and legations, seven high commissioners, numerous other special representatives, and many consular offices.

I should like to pause for a moment to pay tribute to the under-secretaries who have made this great development possible. Because he was a close friend of mine, first of all I should like to pay tribute to the late Dr. Skelton, a very able, self-effacing and industrious man, who literally worked himself to death in the service of this country. He was succeeded by Mr. Norman Robertson who, as we all know, has represented us as high commissioner in Great Britain, then by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, and finally by Mr. Arnold Heeney, whom we all know. I wish to pay tribute to these men for the work they have done. I think Mr. Mackenzie King should be regarded as the father of this department whose estimates are now before us, since he was in charge of its development during the formative years.

Prior to world war II these estimates were not very large, amounting to perhaps six, seven or eight hundred thousand dollars a year. Today, leaving out the extraordinary expenditures, they amount to about ten million dollars, or about one-half of one per cent of the total estimates of the country.

For a moment or two I should like to examine what we get in return for this expenditure. Perhaps we could put it in this way, that such expenditure is supplementary to our vast expenditures for national defence, which I suppose we must regard as the cost of our police force. These estimates, it seems to me, might well be called an insurance premium against the risk of war; and, like all insurance premiums, they carry no guarantee. However, it is the best we can do and offers the best protection open to us. It enables us to pool our risk of war with the other nations of the free world in what we might call an international Lloyd's and I think it gives Canada an outstanding opportunity, as events have proved, to work in the interests of peace and security, which are the keystones of our policy.

It enables this government, representing this country, to contribute effectively and continuously to the diplomatic effort now being put forward—the cold war, if you like, in which we are desperately engaged—in the hope that we may later avoid a shooting war in which we and all the other peoples of the world might perish. This is a bitter struggle; the stakes are great, and I do not think any other department of government bears the heavy responsibility that is carried by the Department of External Affairs.

The greatest field of its activities, of course, is within the United Nations organization. We all realize, with some sadness, that that organization has not fulfilled to any major degree the high hopes held when it was formed; but our hopes still live, and we dare not let them die. Yesterday I was pleased when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said he believed—and he should be in the best position to know—that the United Nations had strengthened rather than weakened during the past year. That is a heartening and encouraging statement.

Now let us look for a moment at the contribution made by this government, working through the Department of External Affairs, to the work of the United Nations. In the formulation of the charter at San Francisco; in the deliberations of that organization year after year; on the atomic energy committee; on the security council; on the economic and social council; and now through our chairmanship of the political committee, this country has made a contribution second to none and in my opinion far greater than that of any country in the world at all comparable with us in either size or population. In passing I should like to observe, and I believe all hon. members will agree, that the election of our Secretary of State for External Affairs to the chairmanship of the political committee was no accident. It was a tribute to this government and this country, and a personal tribute to the great qualities of the man himself.

A number of specific phases have been mentioned in which this country has given active leadership; but for a moment I should like to deal with only one; that is, the drawing up of the North Atlantic pact. Who contributed to the success of that effort more than or even as much as our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)? No man gave more of his effort in the early days of the United Nations in an endeavour to establish the rule of law throughout the world than our Prime Minister; and when he saw that was going to be impossible of attainment at least within the appreciable future he threw his energies, and this time with success, into the formation of what we call the North Atlantic pact, to provide collective security in this area. This was a new departure; it broke new ground in international affairs, and in itself was a practical step forward which may lead to other steps should the United Nations fail in its over-all objectives.

I had the privilege of attending one of the assemblies of the league of nations as secretary of the Canadian delegation. That was a place where I could never find in authority anyone whose thoughts matched the realities. It was a very pleasant, platitudinous place, but they did not tackle serious, practical problems. Whether it succeeds in whole or in part the United Nations has moved one step forward, because no one can accuse it of being platitudinous; no one can accuse it of not facing up to the problems. I think the North Atlantic pact may yet stand as one of the great contributions made within the organization of the United Nations; and with that contribution our own country, through the efforts of the present Prime Minister, has been closely associated.

There is another point about the North Atlantic pact I should like to emphasize. It is not merely a military alliance, which was the old method of entering into mutual defence pacts. It provides also for complete economic co-operation. About a year ago the Prime Minister put it in these words:

> We must get clearly into our minds the fact that a security treaty will not be fully effective if it is nothing more than a military alliance. In order to create and maintain an overwhelming preponderance we must have on our side not only military strength but also economic and moral strength.

That represents to me, Mr. Speaker, the highest order of international statesmanship, because it marks a new step forward in the close association of the free nations of the world. It was accentuated yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he said:

> We must bring about the widest possible economic collaboration at the earliest possible date.

So I say this government is certainly taking its full part, and more, in the strenuous battle to establish peace and security in this troubled world. In that connection the minister said yesterday:

> Canada has made a good and effective contribution, and her prestige stands high among the nations of the world.

To my mind that was sheer understatement. I think he might have said, had he not been too modest, that Canada has made an outstanding contribution, and that her prestige stands very high in the world today.

[Mr. Campney.]

Finally, I believe the department has indirectly made a great contribution to the growing unity of this country and the development of our nation. Our active participation in the United Nations organization I believe has brought our people closer together than ever before, has made every Canadian feel a greater pride in his country, and has stimulated the Canadian spirit to the point where the development of this country and its vast resources has begun to move forward at an unprecedented pace.

It is an historical fact that after each of the two world wars Canada, by reason of her policies, the valour of her armed forces and the energy of her participation, took a marked step forward in her influence in international affairs. I think it is equally historically true but possibly not as well known that every extension of Canadian influence in the field of world affairs has been inevitably followed by a corresponding forward step at home along the road to nationhood.

Following world war I, Canada was admitted for the first time to a peace conference in her own right. We won our own representation at the league of nations. We won the right to enter into treaties on our own behalf and to establish our own representation abroad.

These developments in the field of external affairs were paralleled at home by a whole series of constitutional developments which culminated in the Statute of Westminster, which marked the final stage of transition from a colonial empire to a commonwealth of independent nations.

Following world war II our progress in the field of world affairs is well known to all. The forward steps in this field are again being paralleled in this very parliament and at this very session by changes in our constitutional set-up. I refer to the change in the status of our supreme court and the change in the method of amending our constitution. These changes are following a pattern. We seem to make headway first in the field of international affairs and then we catch up at home.

The increasing importance of our country, owing to its outstanding participation in world affairs as we move along the road of destiny, is due in a large part to the important role played by the Department of External Affairs. In a sense, that department is becoming the mirror in which Canada is seeing herself in her true proportions for the first time. If I am right in that, the modest estimates of the department which are the subject of the resolution before the house probably represent the most fruitful expenditure which this house will be called upon to approve.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to extend any more compliments to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am afraid that he may think he has the problems of the world settled. I believe he deserves the tributes that he has received this morning, but I should like to remind him that he has to return to Lake Success and face Vishinsky and a few other people who may not believe all the things we have heard about him in this chamber. I appreciate the difficulties facing the minister, but I believe he is a great improvement over what we previously had in external affairs.

For some time there was no Secretary of State for External Affairs and the department was pigeonholed with the Prime Minister. He had very little time to devote to the many complicated problems that are involved in international affairs. As a result of that not many discussions such as we are having at this time took place. I have listened attentively to the discussion so far. This morning we heard two addresses and, without detracting from any of the others, I believe the addresses of the member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie) and the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) gave us the picture from a practical standpoint.

The member for Lambton-Kent gave us a description based on his personal experience. I thought it was valuable. It is worth reading. I was rather surprised at my friend the member for Eglinton, and quite pleased. I believe he justified the existence of the parliamentary association. Because of a trip he was able to take through the medium of that association, he was able to give the house a complete, and I think fair, picture of what he saw in the different countries he visited. It was an encouraging picture. His report, and he is always inclined to be quite critical, was to the effect that progress is being made despite a lot of the press statements to the contrary. I believe the house owes something to the hon. member for the effort he made this morning. It was a fair and reasoned approach to the whole problem. The hon. member even gave credit to the government where credit was due, something that is very unusual for him. It means something, coming from him.

I should like to express my own thoughts on this particular subject. First, I should like to say that since the end of the war I have thought there has been too much stress placed on war. A reading of the newspapers of the United States and Canada would lead one to believe that we are on the verge of war, and that war is inevitable. I believe that is far from the truth. Since the end of the war, my thought has been the other way. I believe that one of the greatest instruments for the maintenance of peace in the future is the United Nations organization. It is an organization that is working under great difficulties. We realize that. I have heard opinions expressed that the old league of nations failed and the United Nations is going to fail. The old league of nations did not fail. In my opinion, an ideal was sown at that time and the league struggled under great handicaps. It was hamstrung and betrayed in the work it was attempting to do in that period in which it functioned. Nevertheless the idea was sown and it is as a result of that idea that the United Nations is functioning today. It is benefiting from the experience of the old league of nations.

I said the United Nations was working under difficulties. Perhaps one of the main reasons for those difficulties is the lack of understanding between Russia and the western world. This is largely due to the propaganda that was disseminated during the war. For many years before the war the people of this country were led to believe that Russia was everything that was not right. Then Russia became our ally in the war, and immediately the propaganda machine in this continent went into reverse. It went out of its way to lead the people of North America to believe that Russia is a fine country. For some time the press was filled with stories that Russia was not irreligious, the churches were free. We all remember those statements. Even J. S. McLean of Canada Packers travelled around the country raising funds for Russia. That was only a few years ago, and today the people you are trying to convince that Russia is disturbing the peace of the world are the people this propaganda led to believe that Russia was a fine country. The man on the street is now wondering where he is going to draw the line of demarcation between propaganda and fact. That is one of the difficulties with which the United Nations has to contend at this time.

Various members have made suggestions that we are not receiving sufficient information about what is happening at Lake Success. I believe that is correct. When the minister returns to Lake Success, perhaps he could see to it that everything that happens there receives full publicity in this country and the United States. Unfortunately it is impossible to get the story through to Russia. If we can keep our own people on an even keel and dispel the illusion that war is inevitable, in my opinion that will go a long way toward the maintenance of peace in this world.

There is a great deal of controversy about what the United Nations is doing and what it is not doing. In my opinion it has failed in two respects. First, it has failed to put into operation the machinery that was provided by the charter. I am not saying that is the fault of anyone because there have been difficulties in that direction. That is what made the North Atlantic pact necessary.

In discussing the charter we in this house were led to believe that an international police force was going to be set up. The military staffs of each country, under the supervision and direction of the security council, were going to get together and, on a per capita basis, were going to establish a police force that would supervise the peace of the world. I know that, as far as we are concerned and as far as the United States and the other countries within that body are concerned, that would have been done. Russia has been the stumbling block in that direction.

Then the illusion is created in the minds of a great many people across the country that the North Atlantic pact is something that has not anything to do with the league of nations, that it is an instrument that has been built by warmongers in order to make war on Soviet Russia. That opinion is current in some sectors of our society. But that is not true either. The North Atlantic pact was made absolutely necessary because of the failure of the United Nations, because of Russia's opposition to forming the international police force which is to provide the machinery if and when it is set up. The Atlantic pact is an outgrowth of the United Nations. The charter makes provision for the setting up of regional pacts if that is necessary. Hence the Atlantic pact is set up, and I am glad that it is; because in linking up the nations that form that pact for economic and military purposes, it is a step in the right direction. But in my opinion that machinery should go a little bit further.

While there is a certain amount of economic arrangement within the North Atlantic pact, in the United States and Canada I think there is a growing opinion that not only should it be a military and a partial economic pact but that we should go further with that machinery and that there should be an alliance of the nations that are set up today, a union of these countries, for all purposes. Following that idea to its logical conclusion, I think that eventually within that structure we should perhaps have a common currency, and trade arrangements which would eliminate many of the difficulties we are having today. That opinion is becoming strong in the United States and in many sections of Canada where people are thinking and reading; because the future of the world on the road ahead is, in my opinion, within the structure of those united nations in following through these ideas.

Another place where I think we have fallen down is in implementing the machinery set up at Bretton Woods for the purpose of stabilizing currency and developing backward countries. These principles were enunciated in the Atlantic charter. They were discussed in this house and all over the country. To Bretton Woods were sent the ablest men in finance in Canada, the United States and in every other country. My friends in the Social Credit party say that the Bretton Woods agreement failed. But it did not fail. It was not tried.

Mr. Blackmore: It could not be tried.

Mr. Gillis: The international bank and the international monetary fund were outgrowths of the Bretton Woods agreement. The fund was established. The forty-five nations that are now members of the United Nations are members of that international bank and international monetary fund. Some $750 million was subscribed, but that bank has never functioned. If it had functioned for the purpose for which it was intended, we would not have had devaluation of Britain's currency. We would not have the mess there is in certain parts of the world today if we had accepted our responsibilities, through the medium of that financial machinery, to develop backward countries and to give them a chance to get on their feet. The Marshall plan has, to some extent, done that; but it has not been a united effort on the part of the forty-five nations that are members of that international bank and international monetary fund. As for myself, I think that particular subject has been overlooked; at least, I cannot find that it has been discussed at all in the United Nations.

I am merely making these observations to direct the minister's thoughts to these points so that when he goes back, in addition to attending to his many other duties, he can try to do a little bit of thinking about them and to interest in them someone who happens to be on the committees that have to do with subjects of that kind. But definitely I think we must get our own people in the United States and Canada down to more basic thinking.

Then as to this business about China: I have heard it discussed here and I had heard it discussed before I came here. Many people say that there is a move on foot now for Britain to recognize China and to do business with her. My suggestion is this. What else can she do under the circumstances? She has possessions at Hong Kong. She is standing there facing an army that conquered China. Is she going to precipitate a war on that country? I should like to leave this thought with some of the members of the house and with some outside it. China today, in my opinion, is not being invaded from the outside. She is taking the only course that is left open to her. If we stop and think for a moment, we realize that, for six or seven years before the last war broke out, China was standing practically alone fighting the invasion of fascism from Japan—bombed, starved, and all the rest of it. Then in 1941, when she was in desperate straits, somebody closed the Burma road on her and thereby closed off the only route through which she could take in supplies and carry on resistance. After war was declared by Germany, Japan was supplied with scrap from this country. China has been in a terrible mess; and the people of China today are taking the only means by which they can provide themselves with some security, a means of livelihood and a means of developing their own country.

I see them taking that position because there is no other road out for them. Chiang Kai-shek is trying to maintain the status quo. While I have heard some hon. members defending his regime, yet there are some pretty black pages in that regime when it comes to ruthlessness and all that goes with it. Let us not get the idea that China must be isolated. In my opinion she took the only way out of her present difficulties that she could. We have to come to an understanding with her.

With regard to Russia, let us not forget that it was dictatorship, tyranny and everything that goes with it that compelled these people to seek the only way out. I have no quarrel with them for what they are doing in their own country, because they never had freedom, they never had democracy. Eighty-five per cent of them are illiterate, and they have practically no standard of living. They took the only way out in their own country. Where I quarrel with them is in what they are trying to do outside their own country. I have nothing but contempt, and have had nothing but contempt for the last twenty-five years, for anyone who calls himself a Canadian or an American and becomes an ally of that particular kind of organization within Canada But let us not forget that it was hunger, poverty, the absence of security, and misery that drove these people in the direction in which they are going at the present time. There was no alternative for them; but there is on this continent. We have to demonstrate to the people of the outside world that we are prepared to see their problems as they really are and do what we can to help them restore freedom in their countries.

There has to be a lot of basic thinking and a lot of careful talking on these particular subjects. I am not unmindful of the fact—and of course most of the hon. members are not—that while today, on this continent, we have the highest standard of living in the world, and our mass production is unequalled, yet we must not forget that it is not many years ago that Britain was in that position. Our resources are not inexhaustible. In the not too distant future, in terms of generations, we may find another continent giving world leadership. India and China have vast sources of wealth. These countries, with their millions and millions of people who are just beginning to tap their resources, may become world leaders. We have to understand one another and try to work together. In my opinion the United Nations is providing that leadership. We are fortunate in having the man there that we have. I believe that our present Secretary of State for External Affairs, with his background, his knowledge of international affairs over the years, is contributing in a valuable way to that end. I hope that he does not develop the complex that we are a little country and that we should not have too much to say; because one man who is honest and knows where he is going in that organization, whether he represent a little country or a big one, may be able to sell to the big countries ideas that will stick in the future. I think we have in that organization a man of whom we can be proud. I hope he does not get a swelled head and develop a statesmanship complex. I like to think of him as just plain honest Mike. I hope he remains that way.

The difficulties that are being created are exemplified in a little editorial which I picked out of the last issue of the Western Co-Operator. I am not going to read it. In this editorial it is stated that a man in the United States by the name of Armstrong had $50 million which he wanted to give to a certain university with the stipulation that no negroes or Asiatics were to be admitted. He was to write the bylaws of the university. The university was to do what he asked. That is the old Hitler complex. It is quite difficult for a man to sit on the United Nations organization under present world conditions when that kind of stuff is sent abroad. Here is a man who is a big industrialist. He is very influential in the affairs of the United States, and he comes up with a proposal of that kind. I can hear radio Moscow picking it up and saying: "Here are the people who are looking for co-operation. This is the kind of thing that they are doing behind the scenes at a time when they are making a lot of promises within the United Nations organization."

Mr. Graydon: Thank goodness, the university turned it down.

Mr. Gillis: I do not know about that. I hope they did. Nevertheless a thing of that kind does the whole country a disservice.

I do not want to delay this debate any longer. I merely wanted to express my opinion along these lines. Through the United Nations we should try to do a job with the international monetary fund. We should try to make it function. I believe there is a solution there for the difficulties of world currencies. If that bank were working properly it could do a good job there. It is staffed well. It has made a good start, but it is not functioning as it should. If it were it would go a long way toward helping the people in the backward countries. These were the principles upon which we fought the war and it is upon these principles that we established the structure of the North Atlantic pact. It is an idea that is workable. It is what made the United States. It is the same pattern. There is no reason why we cannot do it on an international scale. There is a large body of public opinion in the United States and Canada in favour of it now. We should go forward with it carefully and see that it works properly.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): One thing that has been very noticeable in this debate has been the obvious spirit of agreement that within this chamber there should be no difference of purpose in regard to the objectives of this country in relation to the very simple but very ominous threat that faces us and faces the rest of the world. Probably at no time has the responsibility imposed upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the corresponding members of government in other countries, been heavier than it is at the present time. It would appear that never before have the issues been so clearly in focus as they have been during this past year, and they seem to be becoming more clearly in focus all the time.

Everything that has been said since the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave his very comprehensive review of the position of his department and the basis upon which the Canadian government is approaching these great problems today has been an attempt to contribute something to a greater appreciation of various aspects of this problem. And everything that has been said has been more with the hope of adding something to a general appreciation of this great problem than to be critical of any point of view that has been expressed, or to minimize in any way the significance of the summary that was made in this house yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is from that point of view that I should like to emphasize some features of the present situation which I believe all of us should bear in mind in expressing our opinions now and in seeking to play our part in awakening a lively public interest in the subject that we are discussing, and in creating the opinion in the minds of the people of Canada that this is the business of every Canadian; and that the whole future of Canada, as well as the future of free people elsewhere throughout the world, will depend upon the extent to which people themselves, who still have the greatest concern about what happens, devote their thoughts to this subject and express their opinions as to how they think world events should be faced by the government of this country in the years ahead.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has outlined the situation with which the countries are confronted in view of the attitude of the representatives of Russia at this time. I should like to underline the words "representatives of Russia at this time". I do not believe that the people of Russia themselves are reluctant in any way to establish a basis of friendship with the other nations of the world if that opportunity were only open to them.

Unfortunately under the system of rigid dictatorship which has been imposed upon the 200 million people of Russia itself, and upon more than 500 million others throughout the world in these past four years, there is little opportunity for the people to know what other people are thinking. Unfortunately the people of Russia, and those others living under communist dictatorship elsewhere, are unaware of the fact that throughout the free world the people in that free world want nothing more than an opportunity to demonstrate their real friendship for the people of Russia, and of every other country in the world.

Unhappily it would not serve the purposes of the communistic dictatorship to let their people know that this spirit of friendship does exist; and consequently not only is a barrier being created between them and the free world, which prevents access to their country by the people of the free world, but equally they are preventing people living behind the iron curtain from knowing anything about the way the rest of the world really lives, and what the sentiments of the rest of the world really are.

There is one feature of the present situation which it does seem to me is too reminiscent of what happened in the years before the last war. It is a feature which perhaps is not discussed often enough in approaching the problem we face today. When the nations which had been joined in arms to destroy the military power of Germany and Germany's associates in that war met at San Francisco before the war had actually ended to draft a charter which would provide a working basis for co-operation between those nations which had been associated in that terrible conflict on the side of freedom, the very beginning of that charter was the proposition that every nation had the right to choose its own form of government, and that no nation in the world would have a form of government imposed upon it by any outside power.

That was the foundation upon which the whole concept of the charter of the United Nations was drafted. It applied to Russia just as it applied to China and as it applied to every other country which signed that charter. It was also intended ultimately to apply to those countries which were then ranged as enemies against the nations whose representatives met at San Francisco in 1945.

As we discuss the external affairs of this country today, and our association with the nations of the Atlantic community in an effort to preserve their freedom within the circumstances which now confront us, it is essential that we remember how far that basic proposition has already been denied. We are not simply in a position where we are preventing Russia from denying it. Russia has already denied it; she has repudiated that proposition and has carried aggression to a point far beyond what Germany had done up to the outbreak of war in September of 1939. And we shall not be facing reality unless we keep that truth in mind.

Russia is not only today threatening the freedom of the western world both by its accumulation of military power and by its fifth column organized in every free country, but also has already imposed its will by force upon one nation after another which had no more desire to submit to communist dictatorship than we have here in Canada today. The Baltic states of Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia are countries with a tradition of freedom, countries which have demonstrated a love of freedom which makes communist dictatorship no more acceptable to them than it would be to us.

Poland throughout long years had cherished a love of freedom and had asserted that love in the struggle it had made against Germany in 1939. It would always be well for us to remember that in September of that year we did not go to war as a free people by our own choice because our soil was attacked. We went to war because Poland at that time had become the symbol of the right of every nation to have its own form of government and to have its own territorial integrity respected. This country went to war when Poland was attacked because we, along with other free countries, recognized at that time that if aggression of that kind was permitted to carry forward its terrible course, it would only be a question of time before the right of any nation anywhere to have its own form of government would be destroyed. And as we see Poland today, under the iron heel of communism, at this very hour undergoing one of those purges directed from Moscow, which means that any pretence of legal authority is hypocrisy of the worst kind, we might well bear in mind that it was the attack on Poland in 1939 that brought the United Kingdom, France, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India and the other parts of the great British fellowship into this conflict.

Then, as we look at the other countries throughout Europe which have been placed under communist domination, whether they had democracy or not before that form of government was set up, at least they had their own form of government. And under the United Nations charter—the very first chapter of it—they had a right to have their freedom respected and to have their own form of government chosen by themselves.

One by one we have seen Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia, along with other smaller nations, brought under communist control and dictatorship from the Kremlin. It is not likely that more than ten per cent of the people of Czechoslovakia at the very outside supported even to a limited extent the ideas of communism prior to the time that the dictatorship was set up there early last year. That is a warning as to what can happen elsewhere, and as it happened in Czechoslovakia it is well for us to remember that when communism came to Russia in 1917 less than two per cent of the people subscribed to communist doctrines or were members of the communist party. A small compact minority with military power has demonstrated what it can do in any land.

During the last year the greatest tragedy since the war has taken place and China has been brought under communist domination. In the review of the situation which was given to us yesterday, it was indicated that there would be certain requirements which must be fulfilled before the communist government of China could be recognized. As I understand, one of them was that there should be evidence that this was a government that was accepted by the people of China. We have no way of testing the acceptance of a communist government in any land because once a communist government is set up acceptance of it is not a matter of free choice but is enforced upon the people by rifles and machine guns, and every device of suppression known to man. Therefore, if that is to be the test, I submit there can be no recognition of the communist government of China.

The pattern is clear. The government there will, as in every other land, still be a government subservient to the Kremlin, and if in any country the people should seek to assert their national beliefs as something separate from international communism undoubtedly it will be greeted in the same way as the assertion of that right was greeted when the communist government of Yugoslavia expressed the simple belief that they were first of all Yugoslavs, and that they did not believe the communist doctrine meant they must of necessity submit to controls from the Kremlin. These events are moving so fast that not one of us can see clearly yet what may happen in Yugoslavia. Any one of a number of events may occur. In any case, it is unlikely that things will just stand still.

Although we detest communism as a doctrine, I imagine that every Canadian will welcome the assertion of Yugoslav pride in their own national integrity, and will hope that the people of Yugoslavia, under whatever form of government they have, will be able to retain control over their own affairs free from domination by the Kremlin. If they succeed in doing that, then it may well be a hopeful and encouraging sign to those other lands now under communist governments that they too can do the same thing. Step by step, if nations are able to free themselves from the domination and control of the Russian communist party, as distinguished from the communist parties in their own lands, the day will be that much nearer when there may be some hope that the people of these countries will evolve a free system of government which will in fact become a democracy as we understand it.

Prepared as the nations of the Atlantic community are today to do what is necessary to preserve our freedom, it is essential that we all remember that we shall not have carried out our full purpose merely by the preservation of our own freedom. If we believe in the charter of the United Nations, this will only be the first vital step. Nothing can be more vital to any one of us than the preservation of our free system of government, but when we have assured the preservation of that freedom in our own country we still must remember that, to the extent that we still assert our belief in the principles of the United Nations charter, we must do what we can in the days ahead to assure the acceptance of the doctrine that every nation has a right to determine its own course. We must do what we can to bring to those nations which have been brought under Russian domination the hope of freedom that was extended to them when the nations signed that great charter at San Francisco in 1945. Anything less than that is a denial of the very principles for which this country and the other free nations were fighting so short a time ago.

This does not mean that we must contemplate the possibility of aggressive acts of any kind. If the free nations of the west establish a position of such strength and certainty of purpose that Russia is in no doubt whatever about their determination to stand together to preserve their freedom, then we shall have gone a long way towards the fulfilment of that ideal of the United Nations charter. Russia and the nations now satellite to Russian power cannot contemplate with any degree of satisfaction a rigid division between that part of the world under communist governments and that part under free and democratic governments on the other side of the iron curtain. There are many things that Russia needs for the development of her vast territory. There are many things that Russia needs for the restoration of her damaged cities and countryside which can only be obtained from the free countries of the west. There are many skills and techniques that Russia needs to assist them in their hope of development in the years ahead.

If the free nations of the west, the nations of the Atlantic community, stand firm and leave no doubt about their purpose, the time may well come—and sooner than many of us may hope today—when it will be possible to say to Russia: Carry out the provisions of the Atlantic charter. Free

Poland; free Yugoslavia; free Bulgaria and Roumania; free the Baltic states; free Czechoslovakia and China from your threat of power. Leave them free to make their own choice, in their own way. Then we shall be prepared to say we do not pretend to tell you what form of government you should have within your own land; and if you give that evidence of acceptance of the charter we shall recognize you as a member of the great fellowship which was established at San Francisco.

That is not an impossible dream or hope. In fact it is the only hope of sanity in the years ahead. It is the only hope for a steady growth of freedom in those lands which have known freedom but which today are under communist control. But the starting point is the firmness of purpose and effective co-operation of the nations now associated in that famous pact, who have been brought together for the preservation of their own freedom and for no other purpose, certainly none which could threaten any other nation.

Here in Canada, as elsewhere, it becomes increasingly important that our intentions be clear beyond doubt. For that reason I want to point out a kind of uncertainty which it seems to me should be removed here in our own country, for it is the kind of uncertainty which may cause confusion in the minds of our people and of people outside Canada. In a speech in this house on November 11 the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said, as reported at page 1698 of Hansard:

> It is perfectly clear that we have no commitments whatever under the North Atlantic treaty.

He went on to indicate that as a result of subsequent discussions which might take place certain commitments might be considered by the government. But I would like to compare his words with those of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) yesterday, as they appear at page 1843 of Hansard:

> In broad terms, we are committed to provide such aid as we can reasonably be expected to contribute, in the form in which we can most effectively furnish it.

I think no doubt should be left in the mind of any member of this house, and no doubt should be left in the minds of the people of Canada, as to our actual position. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is the member of the government responsible for our external policies and their expression, has said that in broad terms we are committed to provide such aid as we can reasonably be expected to contribute, in the form in which we can most effectively furnish it; while the Minister of National Defence, who would be responsible for the form any military preparation would take, has stated that we have no commitments. This may be simply a difference in the use of the same terms, but I do believe any doubt created by those two expressions should be removed so that no one in this house and no Canadian would be in any uncertainty as to what actually is our position.

This is more than the matter of the definition of a sentence or the particular use of a word. It was out of uncertainties that the last war crept upon us and ultimately became almost unavoidable. We have heard a great deal of what happened in China, and none of us can be for a moment unaware of the direct effect those tragic events have upon this country as a Pacific nation. We should remember that the first dangerous weakening of the league of nations and the first dangerous departure from the principles set out in the covenant occurred when Japan was permitted to carry forward its aggression in Manchuria in 1931 and the years following, with no effective steps taken by those nations which could have asserted their voice and prevented that aggression without a shot being fired.

Hon. members will recall that a commission of great leaders of thought from Canada, Great Britain, the United States, France and other nations went to China and reported upon the situation there. The Canadian leading that delegation was the late Mr. Justice Rowell. Hon members will also recall that it was pointed out that the failure of the nations, who had joined in the league of nations to preserve peace, to act at that time marked the beginning of a steady weakening of that association which had been formed after the first world war to prevent a repetition of that tragedy. Then came the Italian occupation of Ethiopia; then came the German invasion of the Rhineland.

Step by step aggression moved forward, and no effective voices were raised in unity of purpose or in clarity of expression which said to the aggressor nations, "We meant what we said when we signed the charter of the league of nations at Versailles in 1919." Many times since the end of the last war numbers of people have been subjected to acts of aggression. Although the nations of the Atlantic community are joining to preserve their own freedom today, no united voice has been raised to challenge that aggression which has been taking place in the rest of the world in a manner which would stem that flood. For that reason it is essential that we in Canada have no doubt where we stand, and that the nations with whom we are associated have no doubt where we stand. We should have no doubt where they stand.

In 1939 the people who lived in the free nations said that never again would the word appeasement be written in letters of blood across the face of the world. There has been appeasement. Perhaps that appeasement was unavoidable, but there has been appeasement. Now the nations of the Atlantic community are taking a stand in the face of the threat which confronts them. The effectiveness of the new pact for the preservation of our freedom will depend upon the extent to which each of the member nations knows exactly what that pact means. Whatever it means, let us be quite clear about it. It is only to the extent that we are clear that the nations who are associated together can hope to carry forward the great purposes they have undertaken.

Whatever limitations there are, let those limitations be disclosed. Whatever commitments there are, let those commitments be stated with clarity and without reserve. Whatever the basis of co-operation is, let us, as the elected representatives of the people, know what that basis is so that, through the reporting of the proceedings here, the people of Canada will know exactly what our part is going to be. Let us not once again be uncertain as to what it is we are undertaking or what the course is upon which we have actually embarked. For that reason I would hope that the remarks of the minister which will sum up this debate will clarify those points.

Yesterday, in his comprehensive and constructive speech following that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) referred to the importance of the use of atomic energy for industrial purposes. He referred to statements that have been made about the difficulty of developing industrial uses while we are still under the threat of the military use of the atom bomb. To the extent that it may be certain that Russia actually has the secret of the atom bomb in practical form, then it would seem that the necessity for some measure of secrecy may have been removed—at any rate in regard to certain processes related to the use of nuclear energy. To the extent that Russia already has knowledge of this great development with its many possibilities for peace, it would seem that the development of this source of energy for peaceful purposes could be extended without fear of any disclosure to a nation that could use that knowledge against us at some time in the future if we were not able to find a peaceful solution to our differences.

As has been pointed out, it may well be that this discovery will usher in the greatest advancement in human welfare in the history of the world. If that immense power can be directed to peaceful ends, then the opportunity for human advancement and for the reduction of human energy in certain activities will have been carried forward to a great degree. Canada is in a unique position to open up opportunities associated with this great discovery. As has been suggested, we need not approach the problems associated with this dramatic discovery with any feeling of limitation because we are a nation of less than 14 million in a world of so many hundreds of millions. The very fact that we are still a nation with a relatively small population opens special opportunities for us to speak with a voice which cannot be suspected because of the certainty that under no conceivable circumstances could we have any aggressive designs.

I believe it can be said, to the credit of those who have spoken on behalf of Canada at the United Nations' meetings and elsewhere, that the Canadian voice has been heard and that all of us welcome the extent to which Canada's opinion is respected in the councils of the nations of the world.

As we go into the years immediately ahead, years which perhaps will be more fateful than any that we have ever known, those who speak on behalf of Canada will undoubtedly receive the wholehearted support of every member of this house and of every Canadian to the extent that, with clarity, with courage and with constructive thought, they lay before the meetings of the nations plans which will be the basis for possible peace in the years ahead.

We can play a great part because of our unique position as the immediate neighbour of the most powerful single nation of the world and as a partner in that great free fellowship which has been evolving throughout the centuries and which is now a partnership of free nations within the British commonwealth. On the one hand, we are partners with a group of nations with a similar system of government and with a common loyalty to fundamental principles of freedom; and we are the immediate and friendly associate of that other great nation which today is playing such a major role in the preservation of peace. We are in a unique position to be the interpreter to the British fellowship of the point of view of those living on the North American continent; and we are in an equally unique position to interpret to those living on this continent the point of view of those who are associated in that wider world fellowship. It is a great challenge to every one of us. It is a challenge which places almost no limit upon the opportunity that exists for the representatives of this country to make an effective contribution to the possibility of peace and world-wide understanding in the years ahead.

I have sought to emphasize the point that the great lesson of the years between the two world wars is as to clarity of purpose and the extent to which the nations leave no doubt about their purpose if peace is to be preserved. The nations which met in San Francisco drafted this new pact which they hoped would avoid the weaknesses which had destroyed the hopes of those who joined in the league of nations. The nations which met at San Francisco were determined that never again would the horrible tragedy of those years be repeated if it was within the power of nations working in co-operation to prevent it. It is for that reason that, within such a limited area as the Atlantic pact can operate and ultimately in that wider area embraced by the United Nations charter, each of us should keep alive today the lessons of those tragic years that made the second world war possible—a war which definitely could have been avoided, by all the evidence that is before us today, if the free nations of the world had stood together at that time as they are standing together now.

It is vital that the people of this country and of the other countries be brought fully into the confidence of their governments. It is vital to the success of any plans that are made that the people of each of those countries be brought into wholehearted support of them. For that reason this house not only welcomes the discussion which has taken place on this occasion but will certainly welcome at all times in the future the explanations that can be given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) or by any other member of the government of the plans that are under way for the preservation of peace and the strengthening of international harmony and good will. This is one subject on which none of us can be divided in purpose, no matter whether in detail any of us may hold a different opinion. The statements that have been made here, and the views that have been expressed from every part of this house, have, I know, been made only in the hope that they may strengthen the hand of the minister and the hand of the government in playing our part as a nation at this important time in our history, so that we may take our part in preserving that peace for which so many of the finest of our youth gave their lives so short a time ago.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I was delighted, Mr. Speaker, to listen to the fine oratorical effort of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). It shows that he can do well any time that he leaves politics aside.

A few moments ago I was listening to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who was saying that for a time there was no secretary of state for external affairs. I presume he referred to the time when Mr. Mackenzie King was Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think he may have overlooked the fact that the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was for a time Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Gillis: That is right.

Mr. Pouliot: —and that he did very well, especially when he sponsored the North Atlantic pact. I should like to bring a little bit of comfort to the leader of the opposition by mentioning to him some remarks that were made by a famous general who was afterwards viceroy of India. In the Journal of Tuesday, November 15, there appears a report of a conference that Field Marshal Earl Wavell held with the press right under this roof. The following words appear in quotation marks:

> I don't think we shall have a war and I'm sure the Russians don't want war if they can avoid it. I know the Russians, for I have spent about two years there at various times and I would say the Russians are looking for security and trying to build a defence against Germany.
> They have been invaded twice in a generation and they have had casualties beyond any other combatant. The devastation caused by the Germans invading Russia had to be seen to be believed.
> I think their fear of the Germans is at the bottom of the Russian attitude.
> I would say they are not aggressive like the Germans for two reasons—they do not have the German urge for what Hitler called "living space;" because they have plenty of land, and they do not have the aggressive German belief that Germans can run a country better than anyone else. I don't think Stalin and the other Russian realists believe that they can do that. They would like to spread communism into Europe but I doubt if physical aggression and domination is in their minds.

This opinion was expressed by one who was in Russia for two years, and who is supposed to know the Russians very well.

I am not a lecturer on world history and I shall never pose as such. May I quote an excerpt from Chateaubriand. It translates thus:

> Nothing seems more ridiculous than the important taciturnity of state mysteries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pouliot: It is appropriate because everyone takes a solemn tone when he talks on external affairs. Of course the situation is serious, and when we think of the atomic bomb we think that the world may be destroyed in a minute; but it has not yet occured, and I hope for the best.

For a few minutes I should like to consider external affairs from the point of view of Canada. What I regret is that the high commissioner for Canada in London is in an inferior position to all Canadian ministers and all Canadian ambassadors. It dates back to a long time ago. On September 11, 1939, the member for Temiscouata spoke as follows, as reported at page 114 of Hansard of ten years ago:

Furthermore, it is with Sir Thomas Inskip, who recently entered the House of Lords, that our high commissioner in London, Mr. Massey, had to communicate to get acquainted with the details of the negotiations taking place between the British government and the other powers. Mr. Massey has no direct contact with the French and German embassies in London, and any news he receives originates either from the Foreign Office or the members of the British cabinet.

On page 117 of Hansard I asked this question:

May I ask the Prime Minister if the high commissioner in London gets in touch with the British government or with the embassies of the various countries?

Mr. Mackenzie King replied in this way, and I should like to know if the same situation exists today:

The high commissioner in London is in touch with members of the British government, particularly the secretary of state for the dominions. Through the latter source he frequently obtains information of an inside nature which he communicates immediately to the government here. He does not however come into official relations with ambassadors of other countries.

Therefore the gentleman in question who has been replaced by another gentleman was in an inferior status as compared with ministers and ambassadors. I wonder whether the situation is still the same.

On August 6, 1940, in answer to some suggestions that had been made by the then hon. member for Leeds and the hon. member for Temiscouata to have a treaty with the United States and with the South American republics, and that we should join the pan-American union, Mr. Mackenzie King said, as reported at page 2540 of Hansard of 1940:

I have no hesitation in saying that I believe it would be embarrassing to the United States and to the South American republics as well as to ourselves, and would create misunderstanding in other countries, were Canada to seek to become a member of the pan-American union.

On page 2541 the following appears:

Mr. Adamson: Any attempt to join the pan-American union now would be construed by our enemies as weakness on our part and disintegration of the British empire. Any alteration in our constitutional status at the present time would be so regarded by them.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Mackenzie King: I think it would be deliberately so construed.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, deliberately so.

And they were experts on external affairs at the time.

Mr. Mackenzie King said also, at page 2540:

For that reason I feel that it is not desirable that we in Canada should discuss publicly at this time the advisability of treaties of the kind mentioned, however strongly we may feel with respect to the wisdom of them.

We could not have treaties, but eleven days afterwards the Ogdensburg agreement was reached between President Roosevelt and Mr. Mackenzie King. But there was no treaty with the United States. It would have caused prejudice to Canada to sign a treaty with the United States and to enter into the pan-American union—very bad.

On page 2540 of Hansard Mr. Mackenzie King made a pronouncement with regard to a headline in the afternoon papers. This is the headline:

Denies Canada arming Japan against Britain, Premier declares government acting to curb arms export.

This is what Mr. Mackenzie King said:

Then followed the statement on which the heading was based. What I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to is this. That particular statement has a significance here in Canada, but that statement is cabled to all parts of the world, and I have to ask myself what effect that question and answer is going to have in the United Kingdom in her present embarrassing relations with the orient. What effect is that question and the answer given going to have in Japan,—

What effect was his answer going to have in Japan? I continue:

—where at the present time, as we all know, there are many persons who are supercritical in the matter of trade and political relations between different parts of the world and that particular country. But above all, I ask, what effect is that particular question and the answer going to have when cabled to Germany,—

What effect was Mr. King's answer going to have in Germany? We were at war with Germany. He continued:

—and it is broadcast throughout Germany that the Prime Minister of Canada has had to deny that Canada was arming Japan against Britain?

Well, we had to listen to that. There is more to it. This is an answer to what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, namely, that we had no minister of external affairs at the time that Mr. Mackenzie King was prime minister and secretary of state for external affairs. Here is a quotation from Hansard of April 20, 1943, at page 2365. It referred to a parliamentary assistant. He appointed a parliamentary assistant to himself as president of the privy council, but not to himself as Prime Minister or to himself as Secretary of State for External Affairs. The appointee was acting only as parliamentary assistant in one of the three capacities of Mr. Mackenzie King, namely that of president of the privy council. Then he went on:

> Reference has been made to myself and the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. No one in this world would be more pleased than I if tomorrow I could have a separate minister of external affairs who could assume responsibility for all the work of that department without my being obliged to keep myself familiar with it. That is impossible. With the war situation what it is, over four-fifths of the business of the Prime Minister today is related immediately to external affairs.

Four-fifths of his time was taken up by external affairs.

> The communications that come in hour by hour on which decisions have promptly to be made or given is part of the business, not merely of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but of the Prime Minister who has to keep fully in touch with these all-important things.

Then, speaking of the two positions of Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, he went on to say:

> But it is no more possible to separate some of these positions that seem to be easy of separation than it is to construct an entirely new arrangement of government.

Then he said:

> The ministers should have more time for consideration of matters of high policy and have that time free away from the House of Commons altogether.

He was paying so much attention to the House of Commons that I remember he refused to prorogue the house at the end of the session, as I suggested to him in 1940, saying that parliament would be called in any case of urgency. The house was adjourned early in December of 1941, and he declared war on five countries when parliament was not sitting. We were officially notified by him a month and a half after it was done.

Proceeding chronologically, in 1944 I asked him this question:

> Was Canada represented at the Cairo and Teheran conferences held last year?

The answer by the then prime minister was no. Then:

> Is Canada bound by decisions taken at such conferences?

And the answer is no. But listen to this:

> But obviously any conclusions relating to the conduct of the war reached by the representatives and heads of governments participating in those conferences will carry very great authority with all members of the United Nations.

He was not invited. He was not consulted. But what was decided by the big ones carried great authority. What was the story of Dunkirk?—incompetence and stupidity were responsible for the death of many. What was the story of Hong Kong? According to the text of a war office statement describing the defence of Hong Kong, it states, on December 7:

> All our demolitions were successful and our troops withdrew according to plan. A readjustment of the line was desirable and this was successfully carried out at dusk.

And then on December 25:

> The military and naval commanders informed the governor no further resistance could be made.

That was intelligence. And one knows about the fall of Singapore. I would refer you, sir, to the report of Lieutenant General Arthur Ernest Percival, commander in Malaya, who blamed the fall of Singapore on British unpreparedness. It is unfortunate, but we had better look after our own affairs than rely upon those incompetent people who have proved it for many years. If Russia at first and the United States afterwards had not come to the rescue of Britain, where would she be today?

Mr. Brooks: Where would you be?

Mr. Pouliot: I would be well, in Canada—just the same as my hon. friend, who is a jingo, and I am sorry for him. And I will tell you something else, that the Prime Minister was full—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pouliot: I mean the late prime minister—was full of the impression—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Pouliot: Don't anticipate—that he was doing something with regard to external affairs, when he was just a listening post. When he landed at Halifax on September 2, 1946, upon returning from Europe he was asked by a reporter if he had discussed the Canadian espionage case with Mr. Molotov, and he answered:

> I did not feel any necessity of going into matters outside Europe when I was inside Europe.

That was the interview given by the prime minister of Canada, who forgot Canada completely when he was going to those conferences in Europe. Then, to scandalize still more my hon. friend from Royal (Mr. Brooks) I shall quote Churchill to him, and what Churchill said about Britain and the British government. On March 12, 1947:

> Churchill fears for Britain a measureless crash.

This from the Ottawa Journal of April 10, 1947. Then, on April 12, 1947, a month after that—

> Decline of British power has been accompanied by the rise and expansion of Soviet Russia.

That is Churchill in the New York Times of April 12, 1947. Then, in the same month, April 23, 1947:

> Churchill tonight criticized the Labour government for stupidity, ineptitude and incompetence.

This from the Associated Press of April 23, 1947. Then, on May 14, 1947:

> Churchill termed Europe a rubble heap, a charnel house, a breeding ground for pestilence and hate.

This from the Canadian Press of May 14, as it appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 15, 1947. Then, on May 16, 1947, at Ayr, Scotland, from the Reuters agency—

> There is no country in the world that is being racketed to pieces in the way we are, and there is no country less capable of surviving such maltreatment.

This is Churchill again in the Ottawa Journal of May 17, 1947.

I hope that is enough. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said that the San Francisco conference was a great and helpful thing. I do not think it was.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: I do not think it was, and for these two obvious reasons: First of all, they decided to adopt public statements, and public discussion on diplomacy, which is all wrong. In the second place, I do not think it was helpful because they granted the right of veto by suggesting that all decisions should be unanimous. Those are two reasons why the new diplomacy has been so unsuccessful during the last years since the close of hostilities.

As Canadians we are interested in making progress. We are interested to have as our representatives at Paris, London, Lake Success or anywhere else, men who interpret the position of Canada not in the interests of the British empire, but in the first place in the interests of Canada. And the part of the British empire that interests us most, with the exception of the West Indies, which should be annexed to Canada before the bankruptcy of Britain takes place, should be India.

The other day the House of Commons gave a generous welcome to Mr. Nehru, the leader of India. The head of Pakistan also came here. In India, Pakistan and Ceylon we have a very populous part of the world. They are near China, and they could do a lot to ensure the peace of the world. When we think of a man like Mr. Nehru coming to the United States and Canada on a friendly visit and trying to make us understand the difficulties of his position, he deserves all possible credit and support we can give him because the light comes from India with its population of 380 million people, also from Pakistan and Ceylon, and later on from China because our best ambassador of peace to China should be Mr. Nehru himself.

I shall not continue at greater length about that. Hon. members who are more familiar with world history may take up the matter where I have left it and express their own opinions. I respect the opinions of all. What makes me rejoice is that, with a few exceptions, the House of Commons is more Canadian than it has ever been during the twenty-five years that I have been a member of parliament. Members are not afraid to speak of Canada now, and we hear fine declarations from all quarters of the house. Of course there are some dark spots but they are the exception. In all parts of the house members seem to be proud of being Canadian, and seem to want to do something as Canadians for their country. That is good news. It is cheerful and encouraging. I remember the time when I fought almost alone for the recognition of Canada, when I fought for the respect of man, for the respect of those who were working in industries as a part of our essential war effort. They were not recognized; both farmers and men working in industry were treated as slackers.

Mr. Ferguson: May I—

Mr. Pouliot: I would ask my hon. friend to sit down. I will not tolerate any interruptions by a black spot from Simcoe.

Mr. Ferguson: We have to tolerate your criticism of previous members of this house.

Mr. Pouliot: My hon. friend should be 150 years old because he is 100 years backward.

Mr. Ferguson: Black spot—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Ferguson: I protest the hon. member's statement about a black spot from Simcoe.

Mr. Pouliot: He is.

Mr. Ferguson: He has got to take it back.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Ferguson: We have listened to this long enough. Black spot from Simcoe! He is one of the blackest spots in the Dominion of Canada. I hope the hon. member will be gentleman enough to withdraw the statement he made.

Mr. Pouliot: I will say red spot.

Mr. Ferguson: Very British, I am glad to say.

Mr. Pouliot: That is all right. Now, Mr. Speaker, the red spot being erased I shall proceed.

Mr. Ferguson: You will never erase it.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not surprised to see the hon. member rising in his seat as he does because he is so backward that he reminds me of the time when my ancestors were fighting against bureaucrats and the servile servants of the crown who were so bigoted that they understood nothing. I am following the tradition of my family in describing the hon. gentleman as he deserves to be, without offence.

Mr. Ferguson: Your family was glad to have the support of my family and this country in times past. You fought under the same flag and were proud to do so in those days.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell the hon. member to shut up. He reminds me of a frog.

Mr. Ferguson: I would expect that from you.

Mr. Pouliot: He reminds me of a frog that tries to be bigger than it really is.

Mr. Ferguson: I would expect that from you, and so does everybody in the House of Commons. We are sick of you.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not afraid of him. I will tell him that his performance is exactly as I described it to my constituents when I spoke to them.

Mr. Ferguson: It always will be.

Mr. Pouliot: The trouble with the House of Commons is that there is a minority of bigoted members who understand nothing, who rise when it is not their time to rise, who are backward, who are imperialists, who are slaves of the empire, and who are glad to lick the boots of the blokes. Here is an example of that.

Mr. Ferguson: Proud of it.

Mr. Pouliot: He is proud of it. He is proud to lick the boots of the blokes who infest the country.

Mr. Ferguson: I am proud to be British, proud to fight for them, and always will be.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: That being said—

Mr. Ferguson: I know it irritates you.

Mr. Pouliot: I was glad to say what I did to that bigoted gentleman who has never understood anything since he has been in the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order. This discussion is all out of order.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you, sir. This leads me to a happy conclusion. I have often told my constituents that what I rejoice about and what I am proud of is that now we have a Canadian government and a Liberal party which are really Canadian instead of being inspired by imperialists such as the hon. member who has just interrupted me. He counts for nothing. I give credit to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that he has realized that, as far as influence is concerned, the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me is a nonentity.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it has been difficult to remain silent during some of this discussion, but the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has no right to describe any member of the house as a nonentity, or as mattering nothing. Every hon. member of the house has been elected by the people of his constituency and represents them here. I think the hon. member will do much better if he remembers that and directs his remarks to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Pouliot: On a question of privilege, I did not say that the hon. member was a nonentity. I said that with regard to his influence he was a nonentity. That is entirely different. I did not speak directly of the hon. member. I spoke of the influence that he has with the government. I know very well that under a previous government he would have been an oracle. A former prime minister would have said: We must appease the hon. gentleman; if he rises there will be a thunderstorm. He has risen and there was no thunderstorm.

What do we hope for? Our hope is that the present government will carry on its Canadian policy, tell the people that they should be proud of Canada, and look after Canadian interests above all others. Then we shall have prosperity and security. How could we expect the meetings at Lake Success or anywhere else to be successful if Canadian representatives carrying on discussions with the other delegates should speak like my hon. friend. If the delegates to those meetings were jumping up on all sides like my hon. friend it would be most unfortunate. There would be no possibility of understanding between them. Everybody would speak to the gallery. I did not speak to the gallery. My hon. friend probably rose to enthuse the ladies in the gallery with his sweet voice.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should direct what he has to say to the subject under discussion, instead of saying the Liberal party is going to remain in power here for the next hundred years, making a purely political speech out of it, and referring directly to me. If he will just devote the ability he undoubtedly has to enlightening the house on the subject under discussion he will be better employed. Unless he does so I shall continue to interrupt him

Mr. Pouliot: I am not going to continue this discussion, Mr. Speaker. There has been a long gap since the ancestors of my hon. friend were in politics, and the gap still exists. I do not want to say anything unpleasant to the hon. gentleman but I will say he represents a tradition. That is the tradition of the imperialists, those who believe the empire comes ahead of Canada. The empire no longer exists; but they are imperialists first and Canadians afterward. I am a Canadian first; that is the difference. I believe a majority of the members of this house are Canadians first. The speech made by my hon. friend would do his party great harm if it were taken seriously. I regret very much that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) rose in defence of his supporter. No doubt it was a matter of loyalty on his part, and to a certain extent I admire him for it, but he does not realize and will never realize what a load the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) is for his party to carry; and I say that of all those who share his views. I regret having to make these statements; it is unfortunate, but such things have to be said sooner or later. Now they have been said it is over, so let us think of a bright future.

I congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on the speech he made yesterday. The interview with the minister in Maclean's magazine a month ago was also very good. He has given us some information which indicates that at the present time Canada is respected by the nations of the world. If at San Francisco there was a distinction between small and large powers, in the North Atlantic pact there is no such distinction. They are all alike; each has the right to say what it wishes. Therefore the North Atlantic pact is a protection for the whole world. It shows the Russians that we can hold the big stick, that we can defend ourselves in case of attack, and that is very good. I hope the minister will use his powers of persuasion to the utmost in trying to reach agreement sooner or later with those who do not support the views expressed by Canada's representatives at Lake Success. That can be done only in secret conversations; but when the various delegates get together and discuss matters of common concern they will be able to arrive at a solution that will be to the benefit of mankind.

Last evening I heard the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) say that prayers should be said for peace. How many people tell their children never to forget when saying their prayers at night, when their arms are on their little beds, to pray that at last peace may reign on earth? Christmas is coming; peace has been promised to men of good will. So I hope that the prayers of children as well as the prayers of men will be well understood by God, and that finally we shall have that peace for which everyone is praying.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, when I saw, a few moments ago, ominous clouds gather on our small community, the House of Commons, I felt I should speak in French, in a language I would like to make as beautiful and as clear as when Corneille, Racine and others spoke it, so that it may act as a ray of resplendent sunshine. But need I really compare this beautiful language to a ray of sunshine, since the words of peace and understanding spoken by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), when he concluded his speech, have dispelled those clouds as if by magic and have given us a striking example of what international co-operation and peace may accomplish.

Mr. Speaker, like all other members, I usually pay a great deal of attention to requests submitted to me by my constituents. Since we are dealing with external affairs, I feel I should put on record a request submitted to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) by the Sacred Heart leagues in my constituency and elsewhere, especially by the league from Donnacona, for the internationalization of the Holy Land.

I shall not quote the whole resolution; I can, however, tell the house that public opinion in my constituency is strongly in favour of the project. On the other hand, I am quite sure that the government will draw the attention of the United Nations to this matter which is of such particular interest at the moment.

I wish to join the previous speakers in congratulating the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I know it is unnecessary, but I do so just the same. Our representative at the United Nations acquits himself so well of his duties that any hon. member who speaks during this most important debate cannot help but compliment the minister, who so fully deserves it. I also wish to pay tribute to the other delegates who accompanied him to Lake Success, and in doing so I am sure that I express the feelings of the house.

At one time, whenever I intended taking part in a debate, my friends used to ask me, "Will you speak of communism?"

When the house adjourned this morning, a friend of mine, who is one of the youngest and most brilliant members of the house, asked me whether I would discuss Spain in this debate. In order to follow the traditional practice and to preserve the good fellowship which should prevail among members of the house, I have decided to ask those who share my opinion to urge the United Nations organization to give kinder and greater consideration to the various requests concerning Spain's admission to the organization, as a party to the Atlantic pact.

Mr. Salazar, who is recognized as the most liberal dictator in existence, recently appealed for the admission of Spain to the United Nations organization. I do not know whether his words will carry enough weight to convince the leaders of the organization.

Here, I wish to refer to something the hon. member for Temiscouata said a while ago when he spoke about the great powers' veto. I would ask the supporters of this right of veto—and I am not now criticizing or censuring anyone in this house—whether or not they feel the right of veto granted to the Big Three is dictatorial in nature, since they are using it to bar Spain from membership in the United Nations, under the pretext that it is now led by dictator Franco.

Can we not think that the word "logic" has lost its meaning? If dictatorial behaviour is countenanced within the United Nations organization why not admit the thought of including a liberal dictator like Franco—or Mr. Salazar?

I fail to see why, within the United Nations or elsewhere, there should be any objection to Spain's admission. Is it simply because Franco is being held in derision and pointed at, because he is a dictator?

Present democracies and the greater part of those who are members of the United Nations certainly have had friendly relations with dictators of the past. A king has been known to seek help from a dictator, to restore order in his country. So it was that, in 1923, King Alfonso XIII called upon Primo de Rivera to become a military dictator and to lead a full-fledged dictatorship.

If you will refer to the Encyclopaedia Britannica you will read about the circumstances surrounding Primo de Rivera's advent as head of the Spanish army, where he was called by a king. How ironical that those very nations which did not protest against Primo de Rivera's leadership should now deny Spain the right and privilege to sit beside other nations of the world in the councils of the United Nations.

Besides, Canada itself, if it did not directly help Franco into power, at least made things somewhat easier for him. In 1937 this very house passed a law which, in effect, prevented Canadian nationals from enlisting in the Spanish republic army to fight Franco. It is chapter 32 of the Statutes of Canada. It may therefore be said that we facilitated Franco's ascent to power. That is why I cannot understand that we should now deny Spain, and Franco, the right to belong to the United Nations organization.

Mr. Speaker, there are other dictators. Our friend Salazar, a dictator, is and always has been a friend of England, especially during the war. Fulgentio Batista of Cuba was a dictator but never incurred the displeasure of the United States. When England and the United States are considering ways and means to make peace with Yugoslavia, and to grant her a loan, does it not seem like a gesture that is—I will not say ridiculous, because it would be too harsh a word—but illogical?

At the present time Tito, even though he is dictator of Yugoslavia and seems to be drawing away from Stalin, nevertheless remains an avowed and earnest communist. Recently he was up to his tricks with England and at a meeting of the executive of the Yugoslav communist party, even went so far as to say:

> The atomic bomb is a new factor with which the forces of capitalism want to destroy the Soviet union and the victorious hopes of the working class. It is their only hope . . .
> We did not quite reach our goal because ever since 1945 production of the atomic bomb was accelerated and improved upon. However, we are not far short of our aims. We need a little more time, however, to reorganize our troops and complete our preparations with arms and munitions. For the time being we will therefore follow a middle-of-the-road policy so as to gain time and to achieve industrial reconstruction within the Soviet union and other countries under its control.

I hate to think that he would use American and British loans to achieve industrial reconstruction within the Soviet union and other countries under its control. Tito continues:

> Then the time will come to launch into the battle for the final extermination of reaction.
> Our first target is Great Britain, even though public opinion ranks it second in importance and considers our forces should rally instead against the United States. We must never forget that Great Britain is very influential on four continents.

There is a man who today receives loans from two great countries which, moreover, officially recognize his government. These two great countries, however, refuse to acknowledge Spain among the nations, as she is entitled to be. It is not because he is a Roman Catholic and that I am too that I speak on behalf of Franco, but from a strategic point of view. I believe Spain could exert a beneficial influence among the nations of the North Atlantic pact. If Spain were afforded a more serious, more adequate, more real and more rational consideration, the world would largely benefit therefrom, because, as I said before in the house, quoting Goethe:

Spain is at the gateway of the Mediterranean sea. The nation holding Constantinople will hold power over the world.

Constantinople is at the gateway of the Mediterranean sea. Mr. Speaker, let us suppose for a moment—although I shall never believe it might come to pass—that the whole of Europe becomes the prey of communism—I do not say of Russia, but of communism. Let us suppose that Spain should remain the only fortress and in my opinion she is now the strongest fortress against communism in Europe and in the world, next to Canada.

Supposing that the remainder of Europe, both coasts of the Mediterranean, for instance, should be occupied by forces under the control of Russia, what would happen, strategically and economically, to the remnant of the great British empire? What will happen if the United States and Canada have to face alone a nation stronger in armaments and manpower, and contend against its ideology? We should not disregard the ever-increasing force of Russia and her ideology.

Because the nations are unwilling to place their discussions upon a reasonable and logical basis, that is the respect of the human being, their negotiations will not bring the desired results and the co-operation which would be necessary for the establishment of world peace will be lacking. It is imperative that the nations should be alive to the situation. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said a few minutes ago, they have the right to choose whatever government they want.

In saying this, I do not neglect Spain which has a government to its liking. Some people declaim very strongly against the Spanish government. Yet, in this world of ours, peoples like individuals have a character of their own; but too often, unfortunately, international associations do not recognize this fact.

Knowing the character of the Spaniards and the human geography of Spain, one has to conclude that that country now has the kind of government which will enable it to regain the economic stability which was denied its people, even by the republic of 1931.

Some people give as their idle pretext for refusing to admit Spain within the United Nations that Franco's government has persecuted and is still persecuting various religious denominations. They are completely wrong. Those that have been persecuted by Franco's government were guilty of political activity as politicians. They were not persecuted because of their religious beliefs, but because they wanted to overthrow Franco, in order to replace his regime by their own clique. Then the Spaniards, who want to live like other people, would first be under a so-called republican rule, and later under communist domination.

I have in my hand an article by a man quite familiar with Spanish affairs, Mr. Richard Pattee, in which he states that those who know the Spanish temperament are aware that at the present time only Franco's dictatorship can keep Spaniards united. I realize that the word "dictatorship" has an unpleasant ring in many ears. Yet those who wince at the sound of it would be prepared to set up another dictatorship, even more rigid, such as that which now exists in Russia, a state dictatorship.

At first, this type of dictatorship is content to nationalize this or that industry. It then goes on to nationalize medicine and, in so doing utterly destroys the true character of the doctor. It then nationalizes steel mills and transports, and so the dictatorship keeps on and grows apace.

Recently, two English bishops or archbishops offered advice to the labour-socialist government of Great Britain. What happened? Two members of the British cabinet, Messrs. Shinwell and Cripps, felt called upon to issue a tart warning to England's church authorities not to meddle with affairs of the nation. Once again and strangely enough that was glaringly illogical. Government spokesmen requested the guardians of the nation's morals not to meddle with politics. Now the very politicians who chided them for defending morals now admit that England is going through a moral crisis, thus justifying the men who sought to help the government.

Mr. Speaker, a fairly long time ago there lived in Europe a man remarkable for his tenacity, his courage and his methodical work. I am not praising him, I am just stating facts and describing this man who had such a pleasant disposition that he was called "Dr. Cranky". That man was Karl Marx, who knew the country's history well enough.

Speaking about Russia, Karl Marx stated:

> Impeding the annexation policy of Russia is an all-important matter. This matter concerns all democracies and especially Great Britain and all the nations of the world must unite to prevent this invasion by Russia.

Karl Marx knew history and was aware that before the advent of communism in Russia, there was a man, Peter the Great, whom communists consider today as the forerunner of communism. Peter the Great said:

> Let us deal with the east, let us look towards the east. The west is a matter of time.

Karl Marx did not know however,—because he died seventeen years too soon,—that another communist would say almost the same thing. That man was Lenin, who was born in 1870. Moreover, students of world history have realized that the annexation policy of the Czars has been overshadowed by the annexation program of the communists. Therefore those who consider Peter the Great as one of the forerunners of communism are not altogether wrong. Moreover, we have the testimonials of those who strongly believe in Peter the Great and who themselves consider him foremost among the forerunners of communism.

I heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs speak yesterday of the Middle East and the Far East. As far as that part of Asia is concerned, I still believe that the aim of Russia as well as of the communists has always been to conquer the east, and once well established in the east, to deal more successfully with the west.

I am asking and I shall keep on asking that the nations recognize Spain's desire to membership in the United Nations, not as a futile right but as an almost sacred right, a right that all the nations of the world will want to recognize if they really fear communism and the dangers which this doctrine holds for world peace. Nowadays it is really no longer a question of communist doctrine since the encroachments of Lenin, Stalin and others. In 1820, there was a movement which spread again in 1823. It was the pan-slavonic movement, which grew around the year 1850. Mr. Speaker, when I say pan-slavonic I do not mean communist, because communism diverted the real purpose of the pan-slavonic movement.

I repeat that so long as the world does not come back to the basic idea of recognizing the sacredness of human beings and human rights, so long as those rights are not fully recognized, any declaration of human rights and privileges made at the United Nations or elsewhere will be devoid of meaning.

In concluding, I wish to say that my remarks imply no criticism, but that they are merely the expression of my own views. I never hesitate to voice my opinion. I know that other members wish to speak this afternoon, and I shall therefore let them take the floor. Before doing so, however, I wish to quote something that was said by Goethe, the old German who has achieved an outstanding place in history. I quote:

> There comes a point where national hatred disappears completely, and where rising as it were above national considerations, men feel the good or ill fortune of a neighbouring people as if it were their own.

Goethe's saying should be pondered by the representatives of the United Nations who are responsible for the re-establishment of world peace. I ask that Spain be admitted to the United Nations because I think her co-operation is necessary in our continued fight against communist Russia's encroachments throughout the world and especially in Europe.

I cannot understand how two nations like the United States and Great Britain can believe that a communist like Tito could, after obtaining a loan from them, turn against communism. We ought to be certain. When a nation is ready to co-operate with the United Nations, account must be taken of the character of its people since the aim is to give her our help, our co-operation and the assurance of a better future, whereby she may continue her march toward progress. That is my wish for Spain.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has been listening very patiently now for almost two whole days to excellent speeches on external affairs. I have no intention of making a speech in the ordinary sense, but I am concerned about two particular questions which I propose to place before him in the hope that when he is summing up at the end of the debate he will say something about them. The first is this. I would ask him to go further than he did yesterday in explaining Canada's policy in the Pacific. For example, there appeared in the press of Tuesday and also of yesterday dispatches from London to the effect that there is to be a conference in Colombo, Ceylon, in the month of January, which will deal with the questions of recognition of the Chinese communist government and of a peace treaty with Japan. One of the dispatches does not indicate whether or not Canada will be attending, but I think the dispatch of yesterday said that it was expected that Canada would be participating in this conference. From now on I hope that the Canadian government will see to it that Canada takes a leading part in Pacific affairs.

I realize that the majority of the people of Canada live on the Atlantic slope. They face Europe. Most of the Canadians who live on the Pacific slope came either from eastern Canada or from Europe, or their parents came from eastern Canada or Europe, so that even on the Pacific slope there is almost as much interest taken in what goes on in Europe as in what goes on across the Pacific. It is readily understood why Canadians follow primarily the events across the Atlantic. But in recent years there have been drastic changes in the Pacific, and Canada is vitally affected by everything that happens around that ocean. I believe that the situation there is a good deal more serious today than it is in Europe. The Secretary of State for External Affairs used words to that effect yesterday, which may be found at page 1837 of Hansard. After dealing with the situation in Europe he said:

> We have made some progress in dealing with these problems. Meanwhile, on the other side of our country scant progress has been made in coping with the great post-war problems of the Pacific area.

I believe that the policy of the United States has been a mistaken one in that that nation has not paid sufficient attention to the Pacific. I hold in my hand a pamphlet of the Behind-the-Headlines series, entitled "American Policy Abroad" by Blair Bolles, the director of the Washington bureau of the American foreign policy association. He calls the American foreign policy a "half-world policy". He says:

> The weakness of American foreign policy has been its concentration on Europe. By this concentration, it has left itself exposed to developments in Asia, where the Soviet union and the communists have enormously increased their power without hindrance.

Then there is another paragraph headed, "The neglect of Asia" in which he says:

> As a result of the conflict with the Soviet union, American foreign policy has become primarily a policy for Europe, and the heart of European policy is Germany. Thus one effect of Russian pressure on the United States has been neglect of other parts of the world, notably the Far East and Latin America. As the Chinese communist armies steadily advanced during the late months of 1948 and the early months of 1949 towards Nanking, the Chinese nationalist capital, the Truman administration kept its attention riveted on Europe and the Atlantic, although the submission of China to a communist government implied extension of Russian influence over a great portion of the globe outside Europe.

And the attitude of the Canadian government has been very much the same, even during this session. Only about a month ago, there appeared in the press dispatches to the effect that there was to be a conference in Singapore attended by high diplomatic and military planners of various nations of the commonwealth. That dispatch, however, did not mention Canada.

On October 17, on the orders of the day, I asked a question which is to be found at page 825 of Hansard as to whether Canada had been invited to attend this conference and, if so, whether she was going to attend. The purpose of the conference was described as being to consider the threat of communism in the Orient, and to discuss the recognition of communist China. In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself answered. In effect his answer was that Canada had had no official information concerning the proposed meeting. He indicated that perhaps it was just a meeting of officials on the spot, and that no invitation had been extended to Canada. I asked then whether or not the government would make inquiries concerning this conference, and would attend if invited. The Prime Minister was rather short in his reply. In effect he brushed aside the question; I thought he did not show very much interest in the conference, and did not seem to realize just how much Canada is concerned with what is happening in the Pacific area.

In his remarks yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs showed a much clearer realization of the importance of this area. At page 1837 of Hansard he pointed out that Canada borders on the Pacific ocean, and would be very foolish to try to isolate herself from the political and economic problems of Asia. Then he went on to explain to the members that one could fly from Vancouver to the Orient within a matter of a day or two, and that now there was no longer any Far East. As he put it,—

> In fact in this air age the Far East is neither far nor east.

I thought this seemed to put the situation very well. Then he went on to say:

> Therefore Canadians must learn to look, as they are of course learning to look, northwest to Asia.

His sense of direction was a little poor when he said "northwest", because if Canada looked northwest to Asia all she would see would be Siberia. I think in looking across the Pacific we must look from Siberia right down to Australia and New Zealand, taking in all the nations across the Pacific. However that may have been what the minister really intended to say.

Might I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, we would wish very much tonight at eight o'clock to take up item No. 24 on the order paper, a resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) referring to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939. I understand my colleague did speak to the leaders of the opposition parties, and that they have expressed no objection. Furthermore I wish to tell the house that the minister is leaving tomorrow for Washington and does not know exactly when he will be back. He would like to have this resolution moved up to a stage where it could be referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization.

Mr. Graydon: May I add this observation to what the minister has said. In the absence of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) the Minister of Agriculture saw me this afternoon, and indicated that the other two groups were agreeable to having this resolution pass through the committee stage, then to have the bill introduced and given first and second readings, on the understanding that the bill will go at once after second reading to the committee on agriculture and colonization for consideration.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is my understanding, that the leaders of the two other parties have agreed to this procedure.

Mr. Coldwell: We understood that, yes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ELIGIBLE AREAS

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, by reducing the area taken out of payment in an eligible area when contiguous to an ineligible area; by reducing the size of an eligible area within an ineligible township and contiguous to one that is eligible; and to bring into payment any half township outside areas already established on a legal township basis but not contiguous thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that I am compelled by circumstances to suggest to the various opposition groups in the house that we be allowed to proceed with this resolution and the bill based upon it in a manner which is not strictly in accordance with the rules. I find it necessary to do so because of the fact that I agreed some little time ago to go to the Royal Winter fair in Toronto tomorrow, and I have just received notice today that one of the ministers of the British government and the secretary of agriculture of the United States are to head a delegation to the FAO conference in Washington. It has been suggested by the government that, in view of these circumstances, I should be in Washington on Monday. Last spring when this measure was spoken to in the previous session I said that when it was introduced into the house it would be submitted to the standing committee on agriculture. I am afraid that if the bill had to remain over until I return from Washington there would not be sufficient time to have it submitted at this session. During this session I have also intimated that the bill would be submitted to the standing committee on agriculture.

In order that it may get before that committee I have discussed with the leaders of the three opposition groups the possibility of our having the bill advanced tonight through the different stages which will make it possible to have it submitted at once to the standing committee on agriculture. It would get before that committee not later than next Monday or Tuesday, whatever might be decided upon by the members of the committee. Therefore I should like to suggest that if the resolution is allowed to proceed into the committee stage I will make a statement on it, and I shall be prepared then to answer any questions in order that all information which hon. members may desire to have at the moment may be given. Then I suggest that the bill be given second reading and be then submitted to the standing committee on agriculture. If that meets with the approval of the house we can proceed in that way and get the bill before the standing committee, after which it will come back to the house and be discussed in full in committee of the whole house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, in view of the unusual procedure and the fact that I had only three copies of the bill at hand before coming into the house, one of which I have given to the acting leader of the official opposition, the other being in the hands of one or other of the other two opposition groups, I think it might be advisable for me to read the bill, which is very short, so that hon. members will at least have in their minds what it provides. It reads as follows:

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Section 7 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, chapter 50 of the statutes of 1939, as enacted by section 3 of chapter 24 of the statutes of 1947-48, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"7. Notwithstanding anything contained in this act

(a) where a rectangular block of sections of land within an eligible township having an area of not less than one-sixth of the township and a side that lies along the boundary of an ineligible area is determined by the board to have an average yield of more than ten bushels of wheat per acre, such block of sections of land shall be ineligible for award;

I might explain that by saying that under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, under the conditions which prevail at the present time, no payment can be made unless there is a block of land six miles square, that is, a legal township, in which the average yield of wheat is eight bushels or less per acre. That is the basis of the present act. Then it goes on to say that, if it is eight bushels or less per acre, from eight down to four the payment is $1.50 an acre, and from four down it is $2.50 an acre, with a minimum payment of $200 from four bushels down and a maximum payment of $500. That in general is the basis of the act as it now stands.

What clause (a) says is that if there is an area within one of these townships of six sections of land, that is, six times 640 acres, that has an average yield of more than ten bushels per acre, then that particular part of the township can be taken out. In other words, where you have an average yield of ten bushels or more in a particular part of a township covering six sections or more and lying alongside an ineligible area and the average yield may be eight bushels or less over the whole township, then that part can be taken out. The next subsection of the bill provides:

(b) where a rectangular block of sections of land within an ineligible township having an area of not less than one-sixth of the township and a side that lies along the boundary of an eligible township is determined by the board to have an average yield of eight bushels of wheat or less per acre, such block of sections of land shall be eligible for award as though it were a complete township;

The first subsection provides that where it is over ten bushels to the acre then six sections or more may be taken out. The next subsection provides that where it is eight bushels or less per acre then six sections or more can be added in. The next subsection reads:

(c) where the board has determined that an area is eligible for award and a rectangular block of sections of land outside such area having an area of not less than one-half a township is determined by the board to have an average yield of eight bushels of wheat or less per acre, such block of sections of land shall be eligible for award as though it were a complete township."

That provision was first asked for by the province of Manitoba, the reason being that that province has never obtained as much by way of payments under this legislation as it has paid in. The act provides that when farmers deliver grain to the elevators in the west one per cent of the value of the grain is taken and put into a fund, and, to the extent that that does not provide enough, money is taken out of the treasury of Canada in order to make the payments. On the whole the result has been that there has been about $3 paid out of the fund for every $1 put in by farmers. That is for the whole area, but in so far as Manitoba is concerned there has not been as much paid out of the fund as has been put in by the farmers. They have discussed whether or not they should be withdrawn from the act, and have decided that it would be best to remain in. From time to time they have suggested that in Manitoba there are areas affected amounting to less than a township—and the same thing prevails in other parts of the west—which are some distance removed from the large block that enters into the general provisions of the legislation, where payments should be made. So they proposed that we should put it on a half-township basis.

We have argued against that as applying to the whole of the area in the three western provinces, saying we would have to divide each township into four divisions and check in each in order to determine whether a half-township was in or out, which would make administration costs much too high. So as an alternative we have proposed what we are suggesting now by way of amendment to the act; that we go anywhere outside a block that has been established on the basis of the complete township and then start a new area by setting up a half-township. That half-township may be all within a legal township of six square miles, or it may be part of any one or more townships. In other words there may be eighteen sections of land some parts of which could be in any one of four townships. That which has a yield of eight bushels or less may be set up as a unit from which we start; and then we proceed as though that were a full township and build up around it by the six-section strips provided for in the other sections, or by taking out in the same way.

In a few words, that is the meaning of this amendment. The second and last section of the bill provides that the act shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of August, 1949. The reason for that is that we announced the introduction of this bill last spring, and it was assumed that it would be passed in time to take care of this year's crop. Payments are not made until December, which is still half a month away, so if this legislation is deemed to have come into effect as of August 1, 1949, it will mean that payments will be made on the basis of the 1949 crop.

In effect those are the terms of the legislation. I do not know just what information hon. members may desire before proceeding further, but if there are any questions, or if any hon. members desire to make statements, perhaps it would be better to have that done now. I can only add that I think I have sufficient information before me to answer in a brief way any questions hon. members may desire to ask, or to give a hurried reply to any statements that may be made with respect to suggested amendments other than those now proposed.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I think hon. members on all sides will welcome the minister's statement and the introduction of this legislation reducing the area that may be declared eligible for payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. However, the bill does not go nearly as far as I would like to see it go. The unit basis for the payment of the bonus, as I understand it, now will be reduced from a township to a half-township. While this will help remove part of the discrimination that has prevailed in the past between farmers who have had crop failures, nevertheless a good deal of discrimination will remain. And while we welcome this legislation, it should be pointed out some farmers will be denied the bonus, a bonus they would have received had this bill not been presented, since one-sixth of an eligible township may be excluded if the average yield is less than ten bushels an acre, whereas previously one-quarter could be excluded if the average yield was more than fourteen bushels an acre.

For the life of me I cannot understand why payments are not made on an individual basis; why this rectangular provision is retained. Crop failures do not often follow the shape of a rectangle. Very often you have crop failures because of the fact that a certain area missed a local rain shower; and local showers usually go in strips. The same thing applies to hail damage. If the provisions are retained with respect to the number of sections outside an eligible township that can be declared eligible, I should like to see the rectangular provision changed so that any section adjoining any other section could obtain the crop failure payments, even though only one corner might adjoin the corner of an eligible section.

From time to time a number of hon. members have seemed to wonder whether legislation like this should be continued. I want to point out that this act is most necessary for the protection and well-being of a million people in western Canada living within the area known as the Palliser triangle. Under this legislation the government has accepted at least a small measure of responsibility for those people; but surely a great deal of responsibility rests upon this government, since it was responsible for the settlement of that area many years ago. I would point out, too, that surveys in that high-risk area show that over the years a great amount of wealth has been produced. For instance, a survey of sixteen municipalities around the city of Swift Current showed that between 1919 and 1941 more than $200 million of wealth was produced. While it is true that government assistance, both provincial and federal, in that area over the same period of years amounted to $25 million, still I think it was a good investment for the people of Canada, since by paying $1 to maintain people in that district the country enjoyed the benefits of production worth $12.50.

As I said before, these people are in a high-risk area. The only way you can farm efficiently there is by farming on a large scale; and in order to do that you must have a large investment in machinery. When these farmers have two or three good crops in a row they invest a large part of their revenue in machinery, so they may farm an economic unit. Consequently after a series of crop failures as recently experienced farmers in that area face dire need.

I think it should be pointed out also that while there have been some improvements since 1939, when this legislation was passed, the liability of the government under the act has been reduced to some extent. The legislation of 1939 contained provision for the payment of $1 per acre to farmers who had yields of between eight and twelve bushels, if the price of wheat fell to less than 80 cents a bushel. For many years now wheat has been above 80 cents a bushel; we hope it will never again go to 80 cents a bushel or lower. Nevertheless, because wheat is at a higher price now than prevailed when this act was introduced the government's responsibility is somewhat lessened.

In addition I should like to point out that under the act the farmers are today contributing more than they did in 1939. The one per cent levy which was placed in that act in 1939 has remained unchanged, but in 1939 wheat was worth 50 cents per bushel while today wheat is worth more than $1.50 at the local elevator. On the basis of the collections from wheat, the revenue from this act is three times as great as it was in 1939. At the same time, while the revenue to the government under this act has been increasing, the farmers' cost of production has increased at an alarming rate. I make the statement that the farmers' cost of production in western Canada is at least twice as high as it was in 1939. I could quote figures to show the increased cost of machinery, oil, lumber, wages and repairs, everything that goes into the farmers' cost of production, but I do not think that is necessary. Anyone who knows anything about farming in that part of Canada will agree that it is a moderate statement to say that farming costs have approximately doubled since that time. The payments to the farmers who are eligible under the act, however, have not been increased.

As I said a moment ago, on the basis of wheat, the collections from farmers have trebled. I can tell the house that the people in the high-risk area of Canada are not asking for handouts. When I talk to them about this act or when they discuss with me their needs for proper crop failure assistance, almost invariably they say this: "We want the payments increased, yes, and we want the benefits paid on an individual basis. We would be quite willing to pay an increased sum into the fund if in time of crop failure we would receive a sum of money sufficient to pay our expenses for one year". Farmers have told me they would not mind if the levy were increased from one per cent to two per cent or even three per cent. Some farmers in that area have actually told me they would not be averse to paying five times the levy they have been paying, if in return for the greater contribution they would receive payments much above the maximum of $2.50 per acre; payments of six dollars an acre on an individual basis.

If the government could see fit, as I think it should, to increase the benefits under this act the farmers within the high-risk area of the Palliser triangle would be happy to make increased contributions to the fund. As the minister stated, in the past one of the obstacles to improving the act has been the fact that the farmers of Manitoba have never obtained as much in benefits from the fund as they have paid into it. I do not blame them for objecting on that basis. I do not think the objection of the farmers of Manitoba should prevent the farmers of southwestern Saskatchewan or southeastern Alberta from securing a proper scheme of crop failure protection. Therefore I suggest to the minister that there should be a zoning arrangement whereby the levies are greater in the high-risk area, the area of frequent crop failure as compared to the levies made in the areas of low risk, the area where crop failure is seldom experienced.

The announcement of the government's intention to bring in this bill was made at the session of parliament last spring. The minister did not find it possible to present the bill at that time and so I am glad to see that this bill will become effective as of August 1, 1949. In my opinion some P. F. A. A. inspectors in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan took advantage of that announcement, and went around during the election stating that if a Liberal government were returned there would be an increase in the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. One inspector who lives not many miles from my home said to me the night before I was taking the train for Ottawa, "Well, I suppose when you get there you are going to support the proposed increase to $5 an acre under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act". I cannot say where he got that idea, but I am saying that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act inspectors went around that part of Saskatchewan before the election saying that if the government were returned the payments would be increased.

I can say without fear of contradiction that the farmers are going to be disappointed in this bill since no provision is made for increasing the benefits under the act. I know that the Minister of Agriculture has received many petitions from farmers in that area. I have received petitions from many farmers in my constituency, in particular, a petition signed by approximately 300 people in the area around the towns of Wood Mountain, Fir Mountain, Glentworth, Flintoft, Canopus and Killdeer. In that area and throughout the whole crop failure area of Saskatchewan the farmers, businessmen and local organizations are asking that the payments be increased to at least $5 per acre. They are requesting the government, if the increases cannot be made under the act, at least to declare this a year in which an emergency exists in western Canada and take some money out of the consolidated revenue fund to make increased payments to those farmers who have suffered crop failure.

In the Leader-Post of November 12, I saw an article reporting the proceedings at the Saskatchewan wheat pool convention. That article points out that the delegates from all parts of Saskatchewan, and half of the delegates represented areas in which there were excellent crops, without exception supported a resolution calling on the federal government to pay at least $5 per acre to the farmers who have had crop failures this year. I would plead with the minister and with members on all sides of the house to support an improved Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It is not a good thing for Canada if a million people are suffering because of successive crop failures.

In the present crop failure area there are farmers that have experienced as many as six partial crop failures since 1942. An almost total crop failure this year, after that long series of partial crop failures, has resulted in thousands of farmers being financially destitute. I say that it is the duty of the parliament of Canada to guarantee the million people living within the Palliser triangle a standard of living comparable to that enjoyed by other sections of the nation.

Mr. Charlton: In view of the minister's assurance that this bill is to be sent to the committee on agriculture, I see no reason for taking the time of the house at the moment. I shall reserve further questioning until the bill is sent to that committee.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): After listening to the explanation of the Minister of Agriculture regarding the three proposals contained in the resolution, I may say that I think they are a definite improvement to the act. In view of the fact that this bill is going to be referred to the committee on agriculture, I intend to be brief in my remarks.

First of all, I may say that whilst these three proposals constitute an improvement to the act, they nevertheless do not go quite as far as we should like to see them go. In the first place, we should like the unit to be reduced to a smaller size than a half township; but more especially, we should like to see the minister get away from that rectangular block. I never could understand what the magic is about the rectangle. The minister seems to be exceedingly keen on rectangles. Under section 7 of the act, it used to be in squares. Now he has got it from a square to a rectangle. Why could we not have it in a circle or in a triangle or in any irregular shape? Why does he have to stick to a rectangle alone? I mean, if a piece of land is adjacent to a rectangle, why could it not be included with the rectangle? But unless it is within the confines of the rectangle, it is ruled out. It seems to me to be a peculiar provision.

Then we feel that the amount of the bonus could be increased. I think that the farmers in the drought areas have a fairly just claim in asking that the amount be increased. I realize that the P.F.A.A. is not a solution to drought. It was never meant to be. It is merely for the purpose of providing assistance to farmers who lost crops as a result of drought. But on the other hand, when you remember that this act was brought into force in 1939, at a time when wheat was selling at 70 cents a bushel, there seems to be some justification in asking for an increase at this time when all other costs have risen. I would not be prepared, however, to go as far as did the hon. member for Assiniboia. I think I am in a different position from the one he probably is in. I think he must reside in an area that is totally within the drought area. I reside in a constituency 75 per cent of which is in the drought area and 25 per cent of which is out. I know that the 25 per cent would object strongly to having the levy increased to 5 per cent unless it covered all forms of hazard; that is to say, if the government sought a levy of 5 per cent and made it cover all forms of hazard, then I am satisfied that the farmers all over western Canada would be prepared to have the levy raised to 5 per cent. But they would not be prepared to have a levy of 5 per cent on the basis of the act as it is now constituted; that is, not across western Canada.

Mr. Wright: In the Palliser triangle?

Mr. Quelch: Even in the Palliser triangle. What is the Palliser triangle? It goes to Calgary, and goes down to Drumheller. You have in the Palliser triangle areas of land that average 30 to 35 bushels per acre. It takes in Drumheller, Morrin, Orkney and Rowley. They figure on 35 bushels to the acre. That is in the Palliser triangle. They never had a year when they were eligible under the act for the P.F.A.A. bonus. You could only ask for a 5 per cent levy provided you covered all forms of hazard and on a crop insurance basis rather than on the basis of the P.F.A.A.

I just want to say a few words with regard to the three proposals. Let us take the first one, which amends section 7 (a) of the act. I believe many farmers at first sight might oppose that amendment because, under it, it will now be possible for the government to withdraw from the benefits of the bonus a piece of land when the area is only six sections instead of nine. But on the other hand, I believe the amendment is a good one because it will help to reduce the discrimination that exists at the present time, owing to the way that section is drafted.

I will explain what I mean. At the present time, if there are nine sections in a square, with an average yield of over 14 bushels to the acre, within a township that is eligible that block can be withdrawn from the benefits of the bonus. But what do we find actually happens under that section? Very often we find that there will just be six sections with a yield of perhaps 20 bushels to the acre, and therefore the department cannot take that six sections out, because it must be nine. So to that six sections they add three sections that may have a total crop failure. But the average is still above 14. Therefore, as a result of that section, very often land is taken out of the township which has already been declared eligible and yet has suffered a total crop failure. There are several instances of that having happened. I think the minister will agree that that is a rank form of discrimination against the farmer who has had a crop failure, in view of the fact that he is residing within a township that has been declared eligible.

Under the amendment that area will be reduced to six sections, and therefore should make it easier to get the six sections than the nine. But even under the amendment there still may be discrimination because now it may be possible for them to find three sections with a yield of 20 bushels to the acre, and therefore they will be able to add to it three more sections with a total crop failure and still have an average of 10. I think in that section there should be included a proviso that no land can be taken out of an eligible township that has a yield of less than 8 bushels per acre. That would do away with the discrimination. I think that proviso definitely should be included in that section. I think the minister himself will agree that there is justification for that request. I am only asking for that to be done in a township that has been declared eligible. Once a township has been declared eligible, why should any section of land be withdrawn from the benefits of the act merely in order to make it possible to take some other land out that has a high yield?

As to the second proposal, I am thoroughly in support of it, because the situation at present is really absurd. At the present time you may have a township that is eligible. Then you may have another township alongside it that is ineligible. Yet you may have six sections along the edge of the eligible township that are denied benefits under the act because there are only six sections instead of nine. I think that any land that is adjacent to an eligible block should also be made eligible.

As to the third clause, as I have already pointed out, we are much in favour of having it reduced from a township down to half a township, but we feel that the proviso that it must be in a rectangular block should be modified so that any block of sections of land contiguous to one another equal to half a township could receive the benefits of the act.

[Mr. Quelch.]

There is one question I should like to ask the minister. Is there any understanding or regulation or provision or agreement which prohibits a province from increasing the cultivated acreage of land held by them in the drought area?

Mr. Gardiner: No, there is no provision at all. As the land is broken up in the province, provision is made for payment just the same under that as under the land that is now broken up.

Mr. Quelch: Even on land owned by the province? I am referring to land owned by the province.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 185, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED ON STATEMENT OF MR. PEARSON

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson that certain estimates of the Department of External Affairs be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, during the few moments at my disposal before the house rose at six o'clock I had explained that it was my intention merely to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to deal with two questions when he closed the debate. In the first place I had asked him to go further in his statement on Canadian policy in the Pacific, pointing out the seriousness of the position in that area, and also the lack of interest in Pacific problems shown by the Canadian government.

I had also asked him concerning the proposed British commonwealth conference that is to be held in Colombo, the capital of the new dominion of Ceylon, in the month of January. Apparently the purpose of this conference is to consider the question of granting recognition to the communist regime in China and also the question of a peace treaty with Japan. I do hope that the Canadian government will not hesitate to participate in this conference. I hope further that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will go to the conference himself. Press dispatches which announced it set out that the Right Hon. Ernest Bevin would in all probability represent the United Kingdom. I suggest to the government that it will be of sufficient importance to have our own minister represent Canada. I trust further that Canada will not hesitate to participate in any future conferences concerning Pacific problems. There has been an indifference and a reluctance to participate in these problems of the Pacific, which is not in line with the importance of the questions to every person in Canada.

If I may presume to make a suggestion to the minister, in the Pacific Canada would be very wise to work closely with the other nations of the commonwealth. Of course Australia and New Zealand view these questions in much the same light as we do ourselves, and we now have the further advantage of having the new independent nations of the commonwealth, India, Pakistan and Ceylon, ready and anxious to participate in these conferences. The British commonwealth, having interests in all parts of the world, must always of necessity stand for peace. That is true in the Pacific as it is true in the Atlantic. All these nations which will be meeting in January will have as their main concern not methods of making war in the Pacific but methods of preventing war.

I hope that in the Pacific Canada will not be a camp follower of the United States. These were the words used by the minister yesterday. While co-operating to the utmost with the United States I hope Canada will not let herself be put in the position of a camp follower. There have been actions in the past by this Canadian government, in dealing with Pacific affairs, which indicated that the attitude of the government was not very far removed from that of a camp follower. Just two years ago a British commonwealth conference was held in Canberra, and Canada sent our present minister of defence. But before we took part in that conference the Canadian government had the Canadian minister in Washington go to the department of the Secretary of State of the United States. I hold in my hand a press dispatch of July 28, 1947. The heading is: "Canada Assures U.S. No Jap Treaty 'Bloc' ". It tells of Mr. Hume Wrong, the Canadian ambassador, having gone to Mr. Norman Armour, the assistant secretary of state of the United States, telling him among other things:

> I told Mr. Armour, what I am sure he already knew, that this conference does not and could not mean the formation of a common British front at the peace conference.

Then the present minister of defence, when he went to Canberra, made a speech; and, as he often does, he distributed copies of that speech to hon. members. I hold in my hand a copy of that speech. It was made on August 26, 1947. He took much the same line as had been taken by Mr. Hume Wrong in Washington. He said:

> The conference should be useful in giving us an opportunity to exchange views in a free and non-committal way. I daresay that no one here is in a position, even if he so desired, to commit his government to a course of action until an opportunity had been given to hear the views of other nations with interests in the Pacific.

It is very interesting to read the opinion of the Right Hon. Vincent Massey with regard to the attitude of the Canadian government at that time. As hon. members know, Mr. Massey has been both high commissioner to London and ambassador to the United States. He is our most experienced diplomat. I hold in my hand Mr. Massey's book entitled: "On being Canadian". At page 105 we find these words. He is dealing with Canada and the other nations of the British commonwealth reaching agreement on various questions. He said:

> At all times we should refuse to accept the notion that there is any impropriety in our consulting together on any matter of common concern. When it was reported in the press in 1947 that we had assured the United States government that the forthcoming commonwealth conference on the peace treaty with Japan did not foreshadow the formation of a British "common front," these representations seemed both unnecessary and undignified.

I hope that there will be no such nonsense in connection with the conference at Colombo in January, and that the Canadian government will not feel that it must first go to the United States government and explain that no agreement will be reached at Colombo and therefore that the United States need not worry.

I would ask the minister, when he closes the debate, to state whether Canada is to be represented at this conference at Colombo, and also to tell us whether the government is in favour of a Pacific pact, similar to the North Atlantic treaty. He should tell us, also, where Canada stands in relation to Japan. Is it the belief of the Canadian government that the old imperial regime of Japan should be restored to power, or will the Canadian government insist that in Japan there be set up and maintained a democratic type of government?

Further, will the minister let us know whether the government has any proposals for reopening trade with China. Trade with that country is of vital importance to Canada, not only to Canadians on the Pacific coast but to Canadians from coast to coast. When the Canadian ambassador to China, the Hon. T. C.

Davis, returned a few weeks ago, he made a statement to the press. I have here a clipping from a Vancouver paper dated October 17, just a month ago today, under the heading "Canada-China Trade Could Re-open—Davis". The first paragraph states:

Recognition of communist China by the Canadian government is all that is needed to re-open trade between the two countries, T. C. Davis said here today.

We were told that Mr. Davis would be consulted upon his return and that the House of Commons would be told of the policy the Canadian government intended to adopt. Mr. Davis has now been back a month. Perhaps the minister will be in a position to go further tonight in telling us Canada's attitude toward recognition of communist China. To sum up on this first question, the time has come for Canada to take a leading part in Pacific affairs, just as she is taking in affairs of the Atlantic. I hope that will be the policy of the government.

The second question which concerns me and with which I would ask the minister to deal has to do with what one might call the continental front. Canada has an Atlantic front and a Pacific front; and we also have a continental front—or, in this case, it is in reality an Arctic front. What is the Canadian government's policy concerning the northwest portion of this continent on which we live?—and I emphasize the particular direction I have mentioned. I have in mind particularly Alaska, Yukon, the Mackenzie river basin, northern British Columbia and northern Alberta. It is time the government of Canada had a policy with regard to this area.

The United States is Alaska-conscious. In the last war the Americans had the experience of the Japanese seizing some of the islands which form part of Alaska, particularly the island of Kiska. Had it not been for a ruse on the part of the American navy and American airmen I am told Japan would have seized the next fortified base in the Aleutian chain. Now the Americans are in the position of having a potential enemy a great deal nearer Alaska than the Japanese were. Russia of course is just across Bering strait, only a few miles away from Alaska. During the war thousands of aircraft were flown from the United States to Edmonton, across the Yukon, Alaska and Bering strait to Siberia. Quite properly, the Americans are greatly concerned about Alaska and about the whole northwestern portion of this continent.

Within the last few weeks a measure has come before congress giving the President power to negotiate with Canada for the survey of a railway line from Prince George in central British Columbia, up through the Yukon to connect with the Alaska railway. This has happened while the house has been in session.

[Mr. Green.]

A press dispatch before me from Washington dated October 4 bears the heading "U.S. Senate Committee Backs B.C. Rail Link", and states:

A move to merge the Alaskan railroad with the United States and Canadian railway systems moved another step forward in congress today.

Then it goes on to describe what has been said about that bill. On October 26 President Truman signed the bill, which is described as one authorizing him to undertake an agreement with Canada which might lead to the construction of a 1,400-mile railway to connect Alaska with the American northwest. That, of course, should be of interest to the Canadian government. Certainly it is of the utmost interest to the people of western Canada. We are directly involved in this proposal. Yet our government seems to be holding back, and does not seem to be greatly interested.

Earlier in the session I asked this question:

Have there been any negotiations between the government of Canada and the government of the United States concerning the construction of a railway through Canada to Alaska?

The answer was:

There have been no formal negotiations, but informal discussions took place in September and October, 1942.

Although that question was asked while the United States was in process of passing the bill, apparently the government of Canada had had no discussion for seven years. My second question was:

Have any surveys been made or authorized by the Canadian government in connection with such a railway?

To which the answer was:

Yes, the Canadian government authorized the United States army engineers to make a survey in 1942.

Then about the middle of October we find this dispatch headed "U.S.-Alaska Railway Far Off in Future." The article was written by Mr. Hardy, one of the senior members of the press gallery. The first paragraph of his article states:

Although the United States congress has voted funds to cover the cost of a survey for a railway route which would link the U.S. and Alaska through Canada, government officials here expressed the view—

And he refers to Ottawa—

—that it might be years before such a survey gets underway.

The final paragraph states:

> Officials of the Department of External Affairs said that in any event negotiations in connection with the suggested survey would take "a long period of time."

Judged by government standards that might mean a good many years.

On November 4 when we were discussing the bill to provide a subsidy to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) about this matter. His answer is found as follows at page 1461 of Hansard:

> As to the second question, with regard to the proposal of the United States, I understand that the bill to which my hon. friend referred has been passed by congress. Until representations are made on the official level by the United States government to the Canadian government, it is impossible to consider the question of a survey such as my hon. friend suggests.

Then I asked:

> Would Canada participate in a survey?

The Minister of Transport replied:

> I think the answer would depend on whether or not we are invited to participate. At the moment I am not aware that we have been invited. When we are invited, I presume we shall look at the position then.

It hardly befits a grown-up nation, such as Canada now is, to be so coy about suggestions of this kind. I submit that the Canadian government should have views on this matter, and should be in a position to disclose them to the Canadian parliament, and in that way to the Canadian people. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said that the St. Lawrence waterway should be developed. He rapped the United States over the knuckles for being so slow about making a move with regard to the St. Lawrence waterway. Perhaps we could help them to make up their minds if we offered to co-operate in connection with the railway to Alaska, which would not only benefit Alaska but would also be of great benefit to Canada. I do not doubt that they are just as anxious for us to make up our minds as to what we propose to do about the northwestern part of the continent as we are to have them make up their minds about the St. Lawrence waterway. I suggest there is great need now for a clear-cut Canadian policy for the Pacific northwestern area. I ask the minister to explain to us this evening the stand which the Canadian government takes on this question as well as the question which I dealt with earlier in my remarks.

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to commend the minister for the comprehensive review of current events in all parts of the world that he has presented to the house. Comments from all sides of the house were so favourable that I think the conclusion is quite obvious that I can very well dispense with adding anything further. I am fully aware that the house is anxious to conclude this debate tonight, and I assure you that I will cut my remarks down to the minimum and not delay the house unduly.

It has been my privilege to represent Canada at the fourth session of the general assembly of the United Nations. Therefore, I was particularly interested this afternoon and yesterday when hon. members who had had that experience in the past gave their impressions of the organization. I was particularly impressed this morning with the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) when he said that he had been struck by the great prestige of Canada at the United Nations. I think that is the first impression anybody receives who goes to the United Nations, because it is paramount, and it is always very gratifying to a Canadian upon reaching the scene. I suppose there are many reasons for the high prestige that our country enjoys. No doubt a great deal of the credit goes to the minister himself because of his personal ability, with which most hon. members of the house are familiar. When you couple with that his many years of experience in the diplomatic field, and his very pleasant and engaging personality, then you pretty well have the reason why he enjoys so enviable a position at Lake Success, and thereby reflects credit upon Canada as a whole.

It was a tribute to his country when he was elected chairman of the political committee, the most important committee of that organization, but it was also a tribute to the man himself, because after all hon. members will realize that any man who assumes the responsibility of chairmanship of such a committee must have personal attributes to carry out that responsibility. The minister combines both the qualities necessary for leadership of the Canadian delegation and the required ability and experience to perform his duties as chairman of the political committee. Everybody is agreed in saying that he is doing a splendid job.

I also want to mention briefly that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is bringing honour to his country at Lake Success. We all know that he can speak very forcibly, and with complete honesty and frankness. I should also like to mention to the house Canada's permanent delegate at the United Nations, General McNaughton. I believe he is doing a splendid job in New York for Canada. I do not think that any more conscientious delegate could be found. As we all know, he is an arduous worker, and possibly one of the most active members among the delegations. I should also like to mention that on the second day after I reached Lake Success I heard echoes of the reputation of St. Laurent and Ilsley still ringing in the corridors and the committee rooms.

Lastly, I want to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North when he said this morning that a great deal of the credit goes to the officials of the Department of External Affairs. Most of them are young, hard-working men. As a matter of fact, by the standards of other delegations they are rather underpaid, but they are not just doing a job. They are pursuing a cause, and they are completely devoted to their task. There is no question that a great deal of the credit should go to these hard-working and able men. The fortunate position that Canada finds itself in also contributes to that prestige because, as has been mentioned, Canada is expected to and does approach all questions from an objective angle.

After all, we in Canada have no special axe to grind with anybody. In the past we have had delegations who have worked most strenuously and earnestly to try to further the aims of the United Nations. They have established themselves in the minds of the members of all delegations as being most sincere. In other words, they are known as people who do their homework before they go into the committee rooms.

For all these reasons, it is most gratifying to any Canadian to see the high place that our great country enjoys in the deliberations of this world organization. I would be remiss in my duty if I did not pass on to all hon. members of the House of Commons the gratitude of the various delegations that was expressed to me as a Canadian delegate when the name of a distinguished servant of this House of Commons was submitted for nomination this year. I refer to our Auditor General, Mr. Watson Sellar. As hon. members know, he has been chairman of the board of auditors of the United Nations ever since the organization was formed, and from all accounts he has done a marvellous job. He has contributed in large measure to the streamlining of the organization, and has made it more efficient and less costly. When his term expired this year everyone seemed very anxious that he should continue at his job, and begged that his name be allowed to stand again. Rarely have I heard so much praise for the work of an official; and this too, I think, has contributed to the high place Canada occupies in that forum.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) yesterday, when they gave their impressions of various conferences they had attended. Perhaps it is because my experience is still fresh and new, but I must admit I was most favourably impressed with the possibility that the United Nations organization might maintain peace in the world, not so much as we see that organization today but rather as we may hope to see it in a few years. Of course, unlike the hon. member for Peel, I was not at San Francisco when the United Nations was born, so I am spared the feeling of more or less frustration which he seemed to experience yesterday.

In our consideration of the United Nations I think it most important to remember that it is a permanent organization. I believe we should always avoid thinking of it as an experiment. We have built this organization, which is now only being completed. As a matter of fact we now have under construction a building to house the United Nations, and there is nothing temporary about the structure now rising in Manhattan, which will cost some $65 million. I hope it will help people consider the United Nations as something permanent.

We have experienced a great many crises of ideologies since the end of the war, and we have seen many movements toward national independence in various parts of the world. If we permit ourselves to think of the organization in terms of one aspect of its work only, or if we attempt to judge it on an immediate as opposed to a long-range view, that could be almost fatal to the organization.

At this stage I think it appropriate to recall briefly the basic premises at San Francisco, as I understand them. I believe the founders of the United Nations agreed that peace could be maintained only by a universal organization based upon a universally accepted charter. They rejected anything less or anything short of that; and they included all major forces at work in all parts of the world. The view held in some quarters that the founders of the United Nations might have contemplated that it would abolish all differences of interest and ideology is, I submit, a fallacy. I do not believe the founders of the United Nations ever contemplated that this organization would end differences of interest or ideology. They never contemplated that the great powers would always act together in unity and brotherhood. No doubt they hoped and wished for that, but it was not necessarily one of the premises upon which the organization was founded. They did reject the concept that differences could be settled only on the battlefield, and agreed to keep those differences, ideological or otherwise, within peaceful bounds. That, I believe, is the aim and object of the United Nations. So far, I submit, the organization has done that to a marked degree. It is true that it has not succeeded in abolishing the fear of war, but I submit that it certainly has lessened that fear. It has also removed obstacles on the road to a peaceful world.

It was my privilege to represent Canada on the second and fifth committees. I do not wish to take time to explain everything the fifth committee did, but it is the committee that considers financial and administrative matters. Dealing with figures may sound rather dull, but there were certain compensating features. Since most resolutions involving the expenditure of money had to be referred to that committee, we dealt with most of the resolutions that came up for consideration in the other committees. To a newcomer like myself, that provided an opportunity of obtaining a more or less general picture of all the activities of the organization.

Too many people think of the United Nations in terms of the general assembly alone. I know I fell into that error at one time. But after all the general assembly is like our parliament here. When the session is prorogued, the work of parliament goes on. So it is at the United Nations; from the general assembly branch out all the commissions that carry out the policy that has been laid down. So I would recommend that all hon. members read the budget of the United Nations, in order to get a general picture of the activities of that organization. As I said, matters of policy are laid down by the general assembly; then commissions of inquiry are sent to various parts of the world to help nations that have problems and do not know how to solve them. These commissions find the source of the trouble and advise how it may be overcome.

Then there are what I consider to be the most successful of all, the political commissions of conciliation that are to be found in all the troubled parts of the world. They are sent out to try to bring a conflict to an end, or to offer solutions, or to prevent conflicts from arising, and in spite of certain failures I believe they have been very successful so far. The world has every reason to be gratified at the success so far.

We listened to an interesting speech delivered by the member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie), who told us of his experience in China. He emphasized the humanitarian efforts of the United Nations. This gives the members of the house an idea of the efforts of the United Nations in China, and the story of those efforts could be duplicated in many other countries if time permitted.

When we are considering the achievements of the United Nations, I should like to mention two or three. The resolving of the crisis with regard to Berlin has probably gone by with too little notice. Everyone will recall the tension that existed in the world when the four great powers reached a deadlock last year. I remember quite well the feeling of impending disaster which permeated the world. The newspapers were full of gloom. The question was brought before the security council in September of last year. At that time many people feared this question would break the United Nations. Conciliating forces were set in motion, however, and a committee of currency experts set out to break the deadlock by introducing a single currency into Berlin. This did not bring immediate results, but it certainly eased the tension. It reduced the threat of war and gave us the time to set other factors in motion. This resulted in the resumption of negotiations by the great powers after seventeen months of complete stalemate. I believe that the results achieved in this instance alone should make us grateful to the United Nations Organization.

I need not recall the Palestine question to which the minister referred. I believe everyone is quite familiar with it. The creation of a state in Palestine was probably one of the epic events of history, which was achieved without a major war. Then there is the example of Kashmir where a United Nations commission has known great success. Four hundred million people were involved, and they were spared the worst disaster of all, religious warfare.

In Indonesia the United Nations played a decisive part in the effort to secure a peaceful settlement of that dispute, and to secure a peaceful transition to national independence for 70 million Indonesians. More people live in those countries than in all of Europe. This gives one an idea of the importance of these efforts of the United Nations. We must remember that these achievements were accomplished without the aid of any military forces whatever, because the United Nations does not possess any military forces as yet. It was merely the moral influence of the organization that asserted itself in the various parts of the world.

Is it unreasonable, Mr. Speaker, to believe that if the moral influence of this organization were allowed to assert itself for a few years more it could continue to help the world secure peace? In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say it is apparent that the United Nations Organization will serve us only to the extent that we put our faith in it and remain with it through thick and thin.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, up to this moment the debate has been enjoyable, but for anyone who has been listening for the slightest hint of the way out of the world's difficulties, the whole thing has been disappointing. One cannot help recalling the three lines from Tennyson's "In Memoriam" in which he speaks of,

> An infant crying in the night:
> An infant crying for the light:
> And with no language but a cry.

I have not heard a suggestion of any proposal that would have the slightest chance of helping us out of the difficulties which confront us nationally and internationally. I am not in any way disparaging the fine speech the minister gave or the beautiful, sonorous and eloquent remarks of those who participated in keeping the debate on a high standard—but they did little besides that.

There seems to be a general agreement as to what ought to be achieved. Everyone talks about the necessity for having economic co-operation, and the impossibility of solving the world's problems unless we solve the economic problem. No one seems to be ready to venture a guess, however, as to how we might accomplish that thing everyone believes we ought to achieve. This is the general impression I have gathered after listening rather attentively to what has been said.

There are indications that the minister feels earnest enough about the international situation to begin to talk plainly to the people who surround us, including the United States. That is an indication of a sound attitude. I hope the minister will be earnest enough to face a number of unhappy facts which underlie the present lamentable international state of affairs. Unless we do face these unhappy facts it is impossible for us to understand how we got into the position in which we find ourselves or to form any idea as to how to get out of it. These unhappy facts and unsightly truths serve as infection or poisonous irritants that continually fester in the wounds of the world, rendering healing almost impossible.

Let us deal with our perplexities. I do not think the main one is Russia. I believe that our main perplexity is that up to now the Anglo-Saxon race has not shown the elementary common sense to know how to distribute the goods it can produce. That fact underlay world war I and world war II, and that fact is driving us with irresistible force to world war III. One of the most dismaying aspects of all is that one finds it almost impossible to get most people to listen to anyone who may offer a solution.

How did we get into the position in which we are? May I give a sort of historical outline of the onset and development of the disease from which we suffer? In the first place, it must be recognized, and I believe is recognized by everyone in the house, that the nations of the world fall into two main classes, the "have" nations and the "have-not" nations. Between these two classes there is a vast gulf. The requirements of the have nations are altogether different from the requirements of the have-not nations. These have-not nations are in a position in which they must employ all their resources to a maximum. Think of such nations as Greece, Turkey and many others. They usually have difficulty in producing economically. The cards are stacked against them when they undertake to manufacture almost anything you can name. They may have one or two specialties, but nations cannot live on specialties, like the production of currants, raisins or sugar, alone.

These nations have real trouble surrounding them. They must produce as many of their needs as possible. They must trade for many of the necessities of life. They must therefore have adequate markets and adequate potential suppliers of each of the kinds of goods, raw or processed, which they require. This is purely a platitude that everyone recognizes in theory, but no one seems to recognize it when it comes to drafting treaties or to plotting practical world policies.

Then again these have-not nations must protect their home economies as they trade. This is another thing which one would think almost anyone would recognize, but somehow people seem to fail to recognize it when it comes to planning a course for the world to follow during the coming years.

The more fortunate nations have striven to trade for power and profit, not only just the needs of life, the things I have mentioned. The more power and wealth any given nation was able to get, the greater advantage it had in producing goods, in gaining markets and in gaining sources of supply. Because of this fact, any have-not nation in open competition—with non-discrimination flowering in its beauty—with "have" nations which have had time enough to develop themselves to a position of power and wealth—any such have-not nation is faced with an almost insuperable obstacle, a fact to which I have found little attention given.

Britain expanded industrially from 1845 to 1875. Then she began to taper off down to 1913. This is a fact that I did not always know, but it is a fact which made a tremendous difference in my thinking when I came to know it. Britain's trading policy was based largely upon two main principles. The first one was the gold standard, and the second one was free trade. She rendered the gold standard possible because she did a great deal of foreign lending. I do not propose to elaborate on that statement; it is not here fitting. Free trade worked for Great Britain because Britain was always able to accept goods in payment of any debt owing to her. On the basis of these two main principles she built up a sort of internationalism. This fact in the achievement of Britain has a tremendous influence on the thinking of our people today and so has a vast influence over the problems with which the minister has to cope when he goes down to meet our neighbour nation.

By 1913 Britain had found that powerful competition was developing from Germany, Belgium, Holland, France and various other countries. These nations, all being more or less have-not nations relatively, and finding it necessary to trade in order to get the raw materials they needed, competed really vitally with Britain. The time came when there were not enough markets in the world to supply the needs of all these nations. When the world reached the point at which Britain could no longer find enough markets for her goods to enable her to sell all of her production and get all her needs in respect of raw materials and foodstuffs, then Britain was facing danger. World war I broke out within one year of that time.

I suppose one would not be too unkind if one said that, fundamentally, world war I was the result of commercial rivalry between Britain and Germany. After world war I, I found that there seemed to be little discussion of the implications of that fact. People gradually got to the point where they did not hesitate to say that fact was what caused the war, but they did not do any thinking about what ought to be done because of it.

Several important changes in the world's economy took place as a result of world war I. Everyone knows that Great Britain no longer was the world's creditor nation after world war I, and that the United States became the world's great creditor nation. But the United States refused to accept goods in payment for debt. This was a matter of enormous importance in its impact on the world's affairs. It is one thing to buy machinery, for example—in the case of Argentina, we will say—from a nation like Britain and to contract a debt with a nation like Britain, when we know that Britain will accept any goods we produce at a reasonable price in payment of the debt. But it is an entirely different matter to contract a debt with a nation like the United States which is quite as likely to refuse to accept any goods we might produce and offer in payment of the debt. Hence the fact that the United States became the world's great creditor nation, and refused to accept goods in payment of debt, resulted in an epoch-making dislocation in the world. From that dislocation the world did not recover even until world war II, and it is further still from recovery at the present time. Anyone who does not keep that fact constantly in mind, in facing the external affairs of this or any other country today, is overlooking one of the most vital aspects of the whole set of circumstances surrounding the problem.

Then during world war I, and especially right afterwards, there entered other potent factors that modified vastly the whole international set-up. In the first place there came into use huge machines, tremendous amounts of power, and technological skills never known before. For example, the United States learned how to make dyes and chemicals which she had not known how to make before. That had a cogent influence on the whole world's position, little as it might seem that such would be the case. From these three elements there resulted unprecedented production from natural resources, and a substantial increase of resources.

People began to learn how to make one thing out of another: fountain pens and combs, for example, out of skim milk. That increased the world's resources. Technological skills were playing a compelling part. Then there was the imminence of unemployment caused by the displacing of men by machines and power. You could not have all these elements entering into the world economic body without causing some sort of malady. What sort of malady would you expect? What sort of anti-body would you give the patient to offset the ill effects of these disturbing factors?

As a result of these three new forces, or new factors, there developed a widespread shortage of purchasing power in the hands of consumers, not only within any nation but among the nations. From this time forward nations were struggling for trade, not only for the things which had activated them in their struggle for trade in former times, but for two new reasons: Firstly, to export their unemployment and dump it on their neighbour's doorstep, that is, to give their own people jobs at the expense of the people having jobs in other countries; and secondly, to put purchasing power into their people's hands. There had not been very much need of doing that before world war I. But these two reasons for trade had a profound effect on international affairs. The situation was becoming more dangerous day by day, and every new machine that came into use, every new means of using power, every new technological skill aggravated the situation.

Then came world war II. The world was a very sick world before world war II. Somehow or other thinking people have assumed that all they needed to do was to fight that horrible conflict and the world would come out a well world. I see no reason why anyone should make such a stupendous blunder in thinking, but such a stupendous blunder seems to be common.

As a result of world war II there were machines of a still vaster quality, power in even greater abundance, technological skills all undreamed of in proportion and variety until Dr. Charles A. A. Stine, in 1942, if I remember correctly, could tell a conference of chemists in Great Falls that since 1940 the world had discovered whole new continents of material; that we had between ten and a hundred times as much resources today as we had in 1940. This is a fact which is not given sufficiently careful consideration in assessing the situation confronting us and the world.

As everyone knows, the United States was greatly strengthened during the conflict of world war II. But every other nation except Canada was greatly weakened. Britain was seriously weakened. Somehow or other the American people, and somehow or other many Canadian people, seemed to think that Great Britain should be able to stand right up and go romping back to where she was before 1914. Many people seem to think that if anyone expresses concern with the welfare of Britain he must be an imperialist, not a Canadian, and so on and so forth, not stopping to realize that the welfare of Canada vitally depends on the welfare of Great Britain and her ability to buy our goods.

At the close of world war II, after the world had been carefully conditioned, especially the American part of it, there was an attempt to impose internationalism upon the world. This attempt was made by the United States through the United Nations organization and the Bretton Woods agreement. I do not propose to go into details concerning either of these, but I will back up either or both of these two statements to the limit against anyone in the house or outside the house if we can get in committee where I can have the right to give evidence to prove my point. There was a definite attempt through San Francisco and the world organization to impose internationalism on the world. The attempt was made at the instigation of the United States fundamentally and primarily. I do not wish to find any particular fault with international organizations, but I pointed out very definitely on the floor of the house in the spring of 1945 before San Francisco just exactly what was in the wind; and exactly what I said was going to come to pass did come to pass.

An attempt was made to bind all nations to the gold standard and unconditionally to the most favoured nation clause through two documents or two treaties. The gold standard was to be established by the Bretton Woods agreement and the unconditional most favoured nation clause through the international trade organization; but they did not call the unconditional most favoured nation clause by that unsavoury name. They called it by the euphemistic title of non-discrimination. The re-establishment of these two principles—the gold standard and the unconditional most favoured nation clause, in a world where the United States, as the chief creditor nation and the strongest nation of the world, refused to accept goods in payment for the goods which she sold—put every other nation except Russia in worse than an international and economic strait-jacket so that conditions were more difficult for every other nation than they had been in the whole history of the world.

Then another exceedingly important matter that must never be overlooked is this: Wherever we turn, whenever we listen to an hon. member speaking on the floor of the house or to any statement that someone like our good Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) makes when he returns from Washington or leaves Washington and wants to say something really clever, everywhere we turn we find those historical causes affecting the thinking of the people who are talking. Some of the most absurd things have been said during the last two months by prominent United States officials. Perhaps I shall examine this matter at some future time. I hardly think tonight is the appropriate time.

As a result of the way Great Britain developed, with the peculiar set of circumstances which accompanied her development, certain misconceptions have become fixed in the thinking of Anglo-Saxons. What are some of these? First the value of free trade. People have had the idea that because free trade worked for Britain then it must work anywhere and everywhere. Thus you find people rising and talking about free trade with the sort of religious fervour that one would hardly expect to be attached to anything except the Divine. Great Britain grew great under free trade. That is so. But what were the particular circumstances in which Britain found herself? May I name a few? Britain was a manufacturing nation primarily and fundamentally, with a very large population. Canada is not primarily and fundamentally a manufacturing nation; neither was the United States until recent times. Why should they expect free trade to work for them because it worked for Britain? Again, Britain had foreign investments, and was in a position to reap the rewards of foreign investments. She could receive any kind of raw material coming from any nation in which she had foreign investments. That is no sign that Canada could make foreign investments, let us say in the Argentine, and find them profitable. That is no reason why Canada should necessarily be able to accept goods which the Argentine may offer to pay for the interest on her foreign investments.

Again, Britain had a great carrying trade. Her people went down to the sea in ships in great numbers. Again, Britain was the world's banker. And she neglected her primary producers. All hon. members I believe have read about the corn laws and the great struggles which went on when the primary producers of Britain were trying to get themselves into a position in which they would not be sorely threatened by a tremendous amount of primary production coming from abroad because of a free trade policy. Canada has not the same attitude to her primary producers, and neither has the United States. Britain had an extensive empire from which she derived inexpensive raw material. She disregarded the welfare of her labourers in a way which the United States does not dare do—and which Great Britain does not dare do today. She paid them badly and she exercised rigid discipline over them, with the result that she could keep down labour costs. All these things entered into determining whether or not Britain could find it profitable to engage in free trade. Then she had great skills, attained through generations of traditional "know-how," as we call it today. Therefore she could afford to bring in all kinds of things from the outside. She could produce any manufactured article as cheaply as any other nation in the world could produce it, and therefore she had no fear of manufactured articles competing with her own in her own markets as she has today, if she is facing open competition with the United States. There was no other nation on the face of the earth which could afford to admit all imports duty-free, as Britain could, and this was because of these many different reasons I have mentioned.

Hon. members who have given some thought to the rise of Germany until the time of world war I, and the spectacular rise of Germany within a few years under Hitler, will remember that she sought to bring about, in her surroundings, circumstances which were similar to those which had been around Britain during the days of Britain's rise to power.

Certainly the United States, the present world creditor, cannot afford to import goods of every kind from all parts of the world, and she knows it. She therefore takes care of the matter by erecting tariff restrictions and import restrictions of many kinds.

So much for the first great misconception which has come into the thinking of the Anglo-Saxon world as a result of traditional information handed down, based upon the great period of development of Britain between 1845 and 1875. But we must not approach the problems of today with the same conception of free trade that Britain had in 1880, although many of us do.

There is another misconception, namely the necessity for a gold backing for money. When the British went off the gold standard about 1931 I am sure many of them thought that quite probably the planet would slip right off its axis. They were terribly upset —but they got along all right. There is no need for gold backing for money, and we all know that now. We do not hear any more than three or four persons in the house suggesting the need for gold behind our money. We know better today.

Another misconception is that state-created money, created debt-free, is unsound. That misconception afflicts virtually every member of the House of Commons today. It is a complete misconception. Because of it we are handicapped painfully and seriously in our day when we attempt to deal with the problem of distribution.

Another misconception we have inherited is as to the unsoundness of economic self-sufficiency—sometimes called economic nationalism. There are many people who think we can afford to let our textile industry go by the board, for instance, in order to be able to sell automobiles. But that is not sound economic thinking. A nation is much better off when it can produce most or even all it needs.

All of these misconceptions help us to see how it is we have got into the peculiar tangle of difficulties both material and mental which almost hamstring us today.

What is the solution? Doubtless the minister knows what I am going to say. However, I am going to say what I think needs to be said. I am going to go further, and say that unless those things I shall say within the next ten minutes are realized here we shall have plenty more difficulties.

I wonder if the minister is willing to give careful consideration to the opinion of certain respectable thinkers concerning the problem which besets us and the measures which are advisable to solve them—at least in part. May I bring to his attention a very important document, to my mind one of the very greatest documents in our possession in the world today. It is called "The United States in the World Economy". The information contained on the flyleaf states:

> The United States Department of Commerce; Jesse H. Jones, secretary; Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, O. P. Hopkins, acting director.
> The United States in the World Economy; the international transactions of the United States during the interwar period. Prepared in the international economics and statistics unit by Hal B. Lary and associates, with a foreword by Wayne C. Taylor, under secretary of commerce.

That sounds rather respectable, does it not? Then it states that it is published in the United States of America by the government printing office at Washington, in 1943, and reprinted by His Majesty's stationery office in London in 1944.

May I read the first two paragraphs of the foreword which, by the way, contains the recommendations and conclusions of the committee. If the minister has not read them, then I commend them to his most careful attention. It states:

> The United States in the world economy represents the culmination of more than twenty years of research by the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce on the balance-of-payments and international-investment position of the United States. The bureau's first statement in this field appeared in 1923 and was followed by annual bulletins and numerous other studies until publication of international trade and financial statistics was suspended for security reasons.
> This study offers a comprehensive and authoritative analysis of the international transactions of the United States from the end of world war I to the beginning of world war II. Because of the endless ramifications of the subject and the innumerable refinements of statistical data that might be made, a study of this type is never finished. Publication at this time is prompted by the timeliness of the analysis.

It looks as though there should be something quite worthy of consideration in this booklet. It has a tremendous bearing on the external relations of every nation on the face of the earth, including Russia. And I would not be surprised if Russia knows more about what is in this document than most of us do.

May I read six short excerpts from the foreword which indicates the kind of thing this committee thinks is necessary to cope with the problem confronting us. At page vi it states:

> The functioning of the American economy as a whole presents some of the most baffling problems. On the solution of these problems, through maintenance of a high and reasonably stable level of economic activity in the United States, the interests of this country and of other countries are most clearly and indisputably united.

This serves to indicate that the chief problem we face is the economy of the United States, not Russia. It continues:

> A world economic structure organized on the basis of equal treatment and with large scope for free enterprise cannot be maintained in the face of such reductions in the supply of dollars as have occurred in our international transactions in the past.

During the Bretton Woods debate and during the United Nations debate we constantly had it stressed for us that we had to have an expanding economy. I can still hear those sonorous words. Yet an expanding economy, according to this committee, is quite impossible unless there are certain guaranteed conditions within the economy of the United States and in a lesser degree in Canada. Strangely enough little attention is paid to that committee! I quote again from the same page:

> Unless dollars are made available with greater regularity than in the past, it would be both unjust and unwise to demand the removal of restraints and controls largely designed to protect the internal economies of other countries against external shock and pressure.

Notwithstanding the solemn words of that document officially handed to the United States administration in 1943, the United States jammed Bretton Woods upon their own country and upon the world, Canada included, and attempted to jam upon us the Geneva and Havana trade agreements and the ITO, directly contrary to the recommendation of this committee.

Where can these extra dollars which are mentioned come from? Can they be raised by taxation? I submit that any attempt on the part of the United States so to raise the funds necessary to accomplish the objectives which are suggested in these three recommendations would be utterly suicidal. The only possible means whereby the United States can obtain the dollars is by dollars being created debt free by the state, much as they did with greenbacks in Lincoln's day. The minute a person mentions that, all the wise men from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) right on down smile superciliously. I am not saying they have that smile now.

Mr. St. Laurent: We still have.

Mr. Blackmore: The important thing is that, if this is the only possible means, then the person who smiles superciliously about this suggestion is one of the greatest enemies of his country as well as of other countries of the world. That is talking very plainly, but it says exactly what I mean, and I think the future will bear me out. I hope we do not experiment until we have to learn by bitter experience in the future.

I should like to turn now to page 5 of the foreword and read three more excerpts.

> The conclusion that emerges most emphatically from the survey is the fundamental importance of maintaining conditions conducive to a more stable and ample flow of dollars in our transactions with other countries.

Where are the dollars going to come from? Dollars in sufficient numbers to accomplish the objectives simply cannot be raised by taxation. The nation simply could not stand it. Again may I read:

> The most essential of these conditions lies not in the field of foreign economic policy as such but in the attainment of a more fully and more smoothly operating domestic economy—the major determinant of the volume and course of our purchases of foreign goods and services.

I do not propose to discuss that because I have not the time, but there is much food for thought there.

> In addition, a more adequate supply of dollars should entail both a freer flow of imports and a renewed and sounder participation of American capital in international investment.

The astonishing thing is that no attention seems to be paid to this matter of dollars. We all talk about how we have not got United States dollars. Great Britain cannot get Canadian dollars, but we do not seem able to think of any way to let them have Canadian dollars. We seem to think we ought to be able to take their goods, that they should be able to sell them to us for dollars. I do not think that is what is in the minds of the people who made these recommendations.

The question will be raised: where is the money coming from? I have indicated where it would come from. The other day I read into the record something which I am going to read once more. May I suggest for the sake of the minister that he tell his department to work on the real solution of the problem, and that he read a little book called "Economic Tribulation" by Vincent C. Vickers, published in 1939. He not only needs to read it; he should also sleep with it until it becomes a part of him. Let me tell him that as far as I can see, and I believe it can be supported completely, the only possible solution to the difficulty confronting us lies in the suggestion contained in that little book. If ever any people were in economic tribulation, we surely are, nationally and internationally.

May I read the statement which I put on the record the other day? It was made by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank, and a very important official in British financial affairs. In his report to the shareholders of his bank, as recorded in the Times of January 30, 1936, he uses words which ought to be very comforting to everybody concerned, including the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister. These words are:

> Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers without reference to the central bank's holding of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.
> We learned that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess, though deflation has still a touch of virtue about it in the minds of many people. Nevertheless it is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused.

If he did not give the answer to the question that arises in our minds, in the light of the recommendations of this United States committee, then it will require a great deal of careful explanation to prove that he does not.

I think it would be inadvisable for me to occupy any more time. There are a good many other things I should like to say but probably there will be other opportunities.

May I say in closing, however, that I agree with the minister that there is hope. A good many hon. members who have taken part in the debate have expressed hope. I agree with them, but we cannot have things work out well unless we use the right methods to get them to work out well. I do not think it will be fitting for us to stand by and wait for the divine powers to do it for us. The divine powers have blessed us with brains and we are expected to use them.

If the world were unable to produce abundantly it would be a different thing, but the world is able to produce abundantly all the goods that all the people of the world can use. The only thing that is wrong is that we do not use the right method of distribution. Distribution is a man-made mechanism and by man can be changed. We can produce abundance. We have abundant resources in the world. We have machines of undreamed-of efficiency and capacity. We have skills developing minute by minute so rapidly that we hardly dare allow them to be known among men. We have power developed so rapidly that we are bewildered. We have gasoline, electricity, coal, gas and now the atomic bomb. I do not suppose there is a member of the house who dares face the possibilities of what would happen if we began to use atomic power to the fullest degree in industrial production—what it would do in the way of producing abundantly and turning men out of employment. But it is there; it is an evidence of the productive capacity of the world.

There is no need for socialism. There is no need for a taxation structure that discourages production. There is no need for it at all. I have not time to go into it here but I will when the time comes. There is no need to destroy incentive by taxation or by production costs such as railway freight rates, and so on, and by too few markets. There is no need for all these things. There is no need to sacrifice Canada's sovereignty. So many people seem to believe that if we can only get rid of our sovereignty we shall be all right. What would have happened to us if we had lacked our sovereignty when the Minister of Finance found it necessary to impose the austerity program upon the United States? We would have been in a very cold world if we had lacked our sovereignty to enable us to take that measure. Well, there are plenty of other problems we shall require our sovereignty in order to solve. The British commonwealth works together wonderfully well with complete sovereignty in all parts of the empire. In world war II, after the imperial conference of 1926 and the Statute of Westminster, which made us autonomous, the commonwealth worked just as well as it had worked in world war I. What virtue can there be in lack of sovereignty?

I suggest to the minister—and before suggesting it I urge that he obtain an absolutely authentic treatise on the principles of social credit—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Here we are again with all the silly laughs. People who, to save their lives, cannot tell you what to do about the problems of the world can ha-ha like a lot of cackling hens at the mention of something which might contain the solution. Until we change our attitude toward these new things there is not the hope for us that there should be. I suggest to the minister that he and his department become entirely proficient in the theory of state-created money and how to use it to solve the problems, national and international, that surround us today.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The debate I am now closing has been, as I think all hon. members will agree, illuminating, constructive and helpful, and also conducted on a very high level of non-partisanship. During the debate some generous things have been said about the department over which I have the honour to preside at present, and about myself. So far as I am concerned, though I am a comparatively new member of the house, I am very fortunate in the friends that I have here, and I thank them for what they were good enough to say about my work.

I am fortunate also in the fact that the external policy of Canada, in its principles and objectives, to the extent that any policy can be in a parliamentary system of government is non-partisan in character; and of course I am the beneficiary of that happy circumstance. I think it makes my job, at least so far as parliament is concerned, much easier than that of any of my colleagues.

As far as the department is concerned I should like to echo the good things which have been said about it. I agree also with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) when he remarked that we should not get too complacent, that, if we have accomplished anything, we should cultivate the healing virtue of humility. I agree also that in the growth of our international activities through the department we should not make the mistake, as the hon. member for Peel put it, of trying to keep up with the "international Joneses". I can assure him, if assurance is needed, that we do not do that; in our department we merely try to keep up with our international responsibilities. That, I think, is as far as the Department of External Affairs should ever want to go. In that sense we have expanded in recent years. The hon. member for Peel referred to our "mushroom growth". That is true, in the sense that we have grown quickly. We now have thirty-three diplomatic missions in other countries; but I would point out that there are more than forty diplomatic missions in this country, so I do not think we have expanded beyond our responsibilities. The hon. member for Peel also suggested that we must not run wild on expenses, and I quite agree. We are trying to run our department on a business-like basis, and at the present time are making changes in our organization that we hope will make it more efficient, more businesslike, and of greater service to the people of our country. If we ever had any temptation to run wild on expenses, the appearance of our representatives before the committee on external affairs would always be a salutary check in that regard, to say nothing about our own Department of Finance and the treasury board.

In addition to the question of growth the hon. member for Peel also mentioned the question of recruitment, the type of people we are getting in the department. Well, we have tried to recruit our officers from all groups in Canada. It may be that at the present time we have not as many representatives of certain occupations as we should have, but I would point out to him, and to other hon. members, that we take young men into our department after competitive examinations. Whether they come from agricultural colleges or arts colleges or any other kind of colleges, we do not mind. We do not examine into their background in that sense. We have been fortunate, I think, in the type of men we have been able to secure, and I should like to pay tribute to them. Of course in the development of a young service it takes time for the young men to reach the top positions, so it is true that at the present time some of our missions are headed not by career men but by men we have brought in from outside, very often at considerable sacrifice to themselves.

In what I thought was a very constructive speech this morning the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) expressed the hope that we would recognize our career men by giving them top posts in the service. We do that. Of our present missions, sixteen are headed by career men who have risen through the ranks in the Department of External Affairs and four by men who have joined our department from other branches of the public service. It may be of some interest to hon. members if, as an example of our desire to recruit our officers from all parts of Canada, I say that of the twenty-four most senior posts in our service, ten are filled by men whose mother tongue is French. We try to build up our service not only as representative but as bilingual.

During the course of his remarks the hon. member for Peel mentioned the representation of other parties on Canadian delegations at international conferences. He has himself been a very effective representative of Canada at more than one such conference. I agree that we should do what we can to keep our foreign policy as much as possible on a non-partisan basis; but under a parliamentary system of responsible government, in our actual representation at international conferences it is not easy to reconcile that kind of government with the inclusion of representatives from opposition parties. The difficulty, of course, is that full membership on delegations by representatives of other parties might limit their complete freedom of action, by placing them in a position where they would have to share responsibility for decisions taken. I am not sure, however, that we cannot accomplish the purpose we have in mind by attaching representatives of other parties to our Canadian delegations, on suitable occasions, as parliamentary advisers. We have done that in the past, and it has worked out quite well. Possibly in the future it may be well to try it again.

Insofar as the growth of our external service is concerned, and some reference has been made to that by various speakers, I should like to mention that during the last year the number of people in our department at home and abroad has increased only from 1,213 to 1,248. We are doing our best to keep our numbers and our expenses within limits.

During this debate the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) as well as other members have mentioned the desirability of providing the people of Canada with all possible information as to our external policy—what we are doing and why we are doing it. I agree with them entirely as to the importance of this responsibility. In a democracy foreign policy must be based on intelligent public opinion. Public opinion will not be intelligent unless it is informed. It will not be informed if the government does not take the people into its confidence in this field to the greatest possible extent.

I noted in his statement—I hope I am not doing him an injustice—a feeling that we were not doing as much as we should in this regard. To support that feeling the hon. member made reference to an article by a prominent newspaperman which was critical of the information activities of this department. I agree that not very long ago it may well have been that the information activities of our department and our facilities for informing the people of Canada on external affairs were not as extensive as they should have been. I would however inform the house, Mr. Speaker, that it was not very long ago that we wound up the Canadian information service and initiated the establishment of an information division in the Department of External Affairs. It was inadequate for the job it was supposed to do, not in quality but certainly in quantity. We cut down to the very bone, so we were not able to do all the things we would have liked to have done. We are building up on that foundation and have reached a point, I think, where we are doing a better job than we were a few years ago.

I would not plead guilty—I am not suggesting any charge has been levelled—to the charge that we have defaulted in this obligation to keep the people informed as to what the government is doing in the field of external affairs. I have in my hand a report of the documents that are issued by the department in an effort to inform those who are interested in what we are doing. The annual report of the Department of External Affairs is now a comprehensive document. The annual report of the United Nations' activities is also a comprehensive and useful document outlining government policy. In addition to that the department has commenced the publication of a monthly bulletin on external affairs which includes articles, memoranda and other information explaining the policy of the government in this field. I have no doubt some hon. members have had an opportunity of reading that bulletin. In the recent issues we have attempted to explain not only what we have been doing but why we have done it.

That is one thing, but it is quite another thing, Mr. Speaker, to indulge in what I may call house-top diplomacy. There is a danger in prematurely making public the difficult, delicate and confidential negotiations between our government and other governments. I believe a good example of how that sort of thing should be conducted can be found in the negotiations leading up to the signing of the Atlantic pact. Long before that important pact was signed the government took various steps, through public statements of one kind or another, to inform the people of this country of the purposes and principles of government policy in respect to this matter. This was done while the discussions were under way in Washington. As I see it, however, it was neither necessary nor desirable to keep the public informed on the day-to-day details of those negotiations. There has to be a certain flexibility in these matters, and that flexibility would be lost if the press knew every detail of the negotiations every day.

Quite often one has to take a position in the morning which may have to be abandoned the next day. As I have said before, it is difficult to abandon a headline, and anything that is made public in the morning becomes a headline in the afternoon. The type of diplomacy, if I may put it this way, of publicity for the principles and objectives, publicity for the policies in broad outline without making public the confidential details of the negotiations, seems to me to be best designed to reconcile the efficient conduct of diplomatic business with the desirability, indeed the necessity of the people knowing what is happening when it is happening. I hope that in the future the Department of External Affairs will be able to discharge that responsibility to the public and to parliament.

There have been a good many questions raised in this debate, Mr. Speaker, and it is my duty to do my best to answer them. If I may, I shall answer them more or less in the order in which they were submitted. An extremely important matter was touched upon by the member for Peel and the leader of the opposition in their references to the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes in this country. It was suggested that possibly the industries of this country were not being given the same facilities, the same information or the same assistance by the government in regard to atomic energy as the industries in the United States. That is an understandable preoccupation, but I can set it at rest because I am in a position to state that there is no agreement or understanding between the Canadian and United States governments which limits the information available to Canadian industry to any greater extent than it is limited in the case of United States' industry.

It is true that we do consult with the United States and United Kingdom governments on the release of information, and discuss with them the maximum extent to which information can be made available in the three countries consistent with joint security. The necessity for secrecy which was mentioned in the statement made the other day by the president of the research council, Dr. Mackenzie, to which reference was made by the member for Peel, arises of course from the fact that the material of atomic energy is the same whether it is used for peaceful or warlike purposes. Naturally, that factor has to be taken into account by all governments in their release of information to industrial concerns, but the secrecy requirements in this regard are the same in all three countries. While it is true that the United States has turned over to private industry the operation of certain of its atomic energy plants which are operated on a commercial scale, the information gained from the operation of these plants is no more widely disseminated to industry in the United States than it is to industry in Canada. The Canadian government has already called industry together to point out the commercial uses of radioisotopes that are now available from Chalk River. It has offered to train men from industry in the use of such isotopes and for a period of one year has offered to supply radioisotopes to industry without cost. Several Canadian industrial firms are already taking advantage of this offer.

During the debate a good deal of attention has been devoted to questions which concern the Far East and the Pacific. We have had some interesting statements devoted to that part of the world. I was particularly interested in listening to the statement of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie), with whom I was once associated in UNRRA activities. I can assure those members who have expressed some concern at our alleged lack of interest in Pacific problems as compared with our absorbing interest in north Atlantic and European problems—and I am thinking more particularly of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green)—that there is on the part of the government no such lack of interest in the Pacific.

In his remarks the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and, I think, another member as well, referred to certain talks that the press had reported as having recently been held in Canberra. They both expressed some interest in the fact that Canada had not been represented at those talks.

Mr. Green: I mentioned Singapore.

Mr. Pearson: There was one reference to recent talks in Canberra. The Singapore talks took place some months ago. The Canberra talks to which the hon. member made reference took place only a few days ago. The reason we were not at those talks is, of course, that we were not invited to them. That statement is not as drastic as it may sound because our information is that the talks were informal ones arranged in Canberra by the Australian minister for external affairs with the New Zealand deputy minister of external affairs and an under secretary from the United Kingdom foreign office in charge of Far Eastern affairs who happened to be in Canberra at that time. No formal conference of any kind as far as we know took place.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra also asked the government whether they proposed to take part in the conference of commonwealth external affairs ministers which has been called to meet in Colombo, Ceylon, in January. I had already intended to speak on this matter because it was only today that it was agreed among the governments concerned that publicity could be given to it. I am in a position to tell the house that we have received from the prime minister of Ceylon an invitation to attend the conference in question.

It will be recalled that about a year ago, in the report of the meeting of prime ministers in London, reference was made to the desirability of having meetings of commonwealth ministers of external affairs from time to time when the situation seemed to warrant such meetings. The government of Ceylon has called this meeting, and the government of Canada is, of course, happy to accept the invitation to participate in it; it is particularly happy because of the fact that the meeting will be held in the newest of the independent nations that make up our commonwealth. We are particularly glad that this meeting will take place in an Asian dominion and that in that sense it will reflect the importance of the new Asiatic members of the commonwealth.

The government will be represented by a minister. It has been suggested that that minister should be the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But that particular minister has been away a good deal in the last two or three months; and although there is nothing he would like better than to spend the month of January amidst the balmy breezes of Colombo, I am not quite certain at this time who will be the representative of the government. I may not be allowed to go.

The conference in question, as I understand it, will deal with external affairs of general interest to the commonwealth and will not confine its activities to Pacific or Far Eastern questions. Nevertheless, a Canadian representative at this meeting will be willing and anxious to participate in that part of the agenda because we appreciate the importance of Pacific questions, especially at this time.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said that the puzzled and confusing Chinese picture should be unveiled. It may be that we shall be in a slightly better position to unveil that picture after the conversations that we shall be having in Colombo. I can assure him, Mr. Speaker, although I do not think the assurance is necessary, that it is a puzzled and confusing picture, and it is difficult indeed to unveil it at the present moment so that any recognizable features appear. In my statement yesterday I attempted to underline some of the principles that governed our policy in regard to that part of the world, and I do not know that I can go much further at this time than I went yesterday. I should like to mention one thing, though, because reference was made to it in this debate. I can assure the house that no pressure of any kind from any quarter has been brought to bear on the Canadian government to recognize or not to recognize the communist government of China.

Reference has been made to the possibility of a Pacific pact to parallel the Atlantic pact, and I was asked if I could express the policy of the government in this respect. I can only say, as I believe has been said already, that it is not possible to draw an exact parallel between the two situations. The countries of the north Atlantic were ready for a security pact. All the countries concerned, with the possible exception of one—and reference has been made to that this afternoon—were all anxious to join such a pact and there was no difference of opinion in regard to the principles of such a pact. But that is certainly not the situation in the Pacific at the present time. Those countries which are at least as concerned as we are in Pacific matters—and I am thinking of Australia, India and the United States—have all stated, through their responsible representatives, that it would be premature at this time to attempt to negotiate a Pacific pact. That being the case, I think we would be making a mistake if we tried to press ahead with this matter at this moment.

Questions were also asked as to our policy in regard to Japanese political developments and trade with China. With regard to the former, as I said yesterday, I think that the governments concerned should press ahead with the Japanese peace pact and that all of us, individually and collectively, should do all that we can to strengthen the building up in Japan of a democratic government that will be a centre of peace and stability in that area. But there are times when I feel—and I have attempted to express this opinion before—that we should be careful to recall that it was not so long ago when the menace from Japan seemed almost as terrible as the menace from other quarters in the Far East seems at the present time. And we should not lose sight of what might be an ultimate danger because of the immediate danger that is ahead of us. Therefore when we are encouraging the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Japan let us make sure that we are helping to build up a democratic peace-loving Japan.

As far as trade with China is concerned, Mr. Speaker, there is no argument on that score. Nothing can be more important to Canada than building up trade with the Far East, including China; but one essential element in the development of trade with the areas over which the writ of the communist government now runs is to establish some kind of contact with that government. So naturally the promotion of trade is part of the problem of our relationship with the communist government in China, and the two cannot be separated.

In some of the statements that have been made in this debate, Mr. Speaker, reference has been made to the European situation and certain questions have been asked of me in that regard. Some of these speeches have filled the gaps in my own statement of yesterday morning, and have added, I think, very materially to the information of the house with respect to European problems. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said that in my statement it would have been helpful if I had said more about the situation in western Germany and western Europe. I agree it would have been helpful if I could have said more. Although I spoke for quite a long time, I admit, Mr. Speaker—and in fact I stated at the beginning—that there were serious omissions in my statement. I did not say very much about western Germany or indeed about western Europe. I did say, however, and I should like to repeat it, that we welcome the establishment of a federal democratic government in western Germany. We hope that it will soon be able to extend its jurisdiction over a united Germany. The development that has taken place already has a bearing, of course, on the German peace conference. It looks now as if the possibility of holding a peace conference for the whole of Germany is more remote than it was a year ago. This is of course due to the split in Germany itself, and the difficulties at the present time of establishing a modus vivendi with the Russians which would make possible the healing of that division. Meanwhile we have the western federal state of Germany which has become a going concern. We are recognizing that development by planning to establish very shortly a mission to represent Canada at the capital of the state, which is Bonn. We will for that purpose be appointing, as head of our mission to Bonn, the official who is now the head of our military mission in Berlin. This change in the situation in Germany will make it possible to reduce the mission in Berlin to the status of one or two officers.

Reference was made also by certain speakers to the position in regard to the German and Austrian peace treaties. I have mentioned the German peace treaty. So far as the Austrian peace treaty is concerned it looked a few weeks ago as if substantial progress had been made and that an Austrian peace treaty might soon be worked out by the four great powers. But there are still difficulties in the way, and these difficulties seem to revolve around the impossibility of the U.S.S.R. on the one hand and the other three states on the other hand getting together over the difficult question of reparations.

A more important point, I think, was mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon, and was touched on by other hon. members in other statements, when I was asked to clear up the question of our commitments under the North Atlantic pact. I stated in my remarks yesterday that we did have such commitments, and I repeat that statement now. However, it was pointed out this afternoon that my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in a statement in this house the other day had said that we had no commitments under the North Atlantic treaty. There might, therefore, seem to be some contradiction in these two statements; but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no such contradiction. When the Minister of National Defence was speaking in the debate to which reference has been made it was quite clear, at least to my mind after reading his statement, that he was referring to the military aid commitments which result from the implementation of the treaty. That seems to me to be clear from a reading of the paragraph in question. If I am in order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat what the Minister of National Defence said at that time. He said, as reported at page 1698 of Hansard:

> It is perfectly clear that we have no commitments whatever under the North Atlantic treaty. The organization under the treaty has just been set up. The regional groups have been organized and the appropriate officers and representatives of the various governments concerned are considering what should be the various strategical plans and requirements.
> This is expressly dealt with in paragraph 12 of the statement I gave, in which I said:
> "It is still too early to spell out the consequences of the pact in terms of men and dollars."

What I was referring to when I said we had commitments was the political commitment which we undertook in signing this pact and that commitment, of course, stands and is accepted not only by the government but I think by all hon. members. That political commitment is to come to the help of any member of the alliance if that member is the victim of aggression. We accept that commitment. It is a commitment for the defence of Canada, by coming to the help of our partners in the alliance if those partners should be attacked. That is a political commitment which we undertake. How that commitment shall be worked out, though, is another matter.

Yesterday when the hon. member for Peel was speaking he mentioned the fact that no details had been given the house or the country in regard to that particular commitment. But I would point out to him and to the house, Mr. Speaker, that it took us nearly a year to work out the political commitment which I have mentioned, and we have only just begun to work out the plans which constitute a military commitment under the treaty. We have signed the treaty; we have laid the basis of the organizations required under the treaty. There remains to be worked out the contributions which each government shall make in carrying out these political pledges, these contributions to be effective once the aggression has taken place and is recognized as such by the members of the alliance, including Canada. This development of the treaty has just begun, and it will take some time to work it out. Therefore it will not be possible to know exactly what are our military undertakings and our military commitments until that development is completed. I think that if it is clearly understood, Mr. Speaker, that I was talking about the ultimate political commitment in the treaty and the Minister of National Defence was talking about the military undertakings which we may have to take in order to discharge our political commitment, it will be clear that there is no contradiction in the two statements.

Many references, Mr. Speaker, were made during the debate to the United Nations and our policy in regard to the United Nations. I would merely like to repeat in that regard that our adherence to this organization remains the cornerstone of our external policy.

We are having difficult times at Lake Success. It is not easy to make the United Nations the effective organization for peace we all hoped it would be. One evidence of these difficulties is that we have had to work out regional arrangements not outside of, but supplementary to the United Nations. Nevertheless I would like to emphasize again that these regional arrangements, whether they be political such as the North Atlantic pact or whether they are financial, along the lines of the talks we have had to have with our friends from the United Kingdom and the United States, or of whatever nature they may be—these regional arrangements remain secondary and supplementary to our adherence to our world organization which we hope will some day make all such limited arrangements unnecessary.

That is not possible today. The reason is, of course, as I need hardly repeat, the split in the world between west and east, which reflects itself in practically every undertaking of the United Nations. So long as that split remains it is absurd to think, and we would be only deceiving ourselves if we did think, that the United Nations as a universal organization can discharge the function of preserving peace which it was set up to discharge and which some day we hope it will discharge. But before that can be done we have to bridge the gap between the communist east and the democratic west. Though that problem at the present time seems almost insuperable, we must keep working toward its solution.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said that the best hope for that solution was by somehow getting to the people of the communist countries. If we could pierce the iron curtain and get to the hearts and souls of the people behind it I am sure, just as he was sure, that we would find they are as peace-loving as the rest of us. If we could sweep away that mistrust and hatred that has been caused by the tyrannical masters of the Russian people, if we could sweep that away and get our own message across to those people, then that split would be healed and we would have a world organization which would be universal indeed; which would do the job it was designed to do at San Francisco, and which some day it will do.

Reference has also been made in this debate by more than one speaker to the prestige Canada now has in the councils of the world. I think it is true that we have such prestige. If we do have it, then it is due to the exertions, to the intelligence and to the sacrifices of the Canadian people. It is upon this that our prestige has been built; especially on the achievements and sacrifices of the Canadian people in time of war. Those of us who have particular jobs to do which take us into the world of international affairs can add a little to or detract a little from that prestige. But it has a deeper foundation than the work of any individual, of any government or of any party; the foundation of our prestige is in the character, the hearts and the achievements of our Canadian people. And that is why, Mr. Speaker, I am so encouraged by the debate we have had in the last two days on external affairs. I believe in this debate we have had a fine reflection of the feelings of the people, and their constructive approach to these questions of external affairs.

It has been made abundantly clear in the debate that the objectives we have in mind are shared by all of us. We have the same objective. We are all striving to get to the same goal—at times probably by different routes—and that goal is the establishment in this world by international action of conditions in which every man, every woman and every child in any country of the world can live out his life in stability and security and peace.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO PERMIT COMMITTEE TO SIT WHILE HOUSE IS SITTING

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane) moved:

That the special committee on external affairs be empowered to sit while the house is sitting.

Mr. Graydon: May I take the opportunity when this motion is being put to inquire from the chairman of the committee on external affairs when he expects the committee to sit tomorrow?

Mr. Bradette: I do not believe it will be possible for it to sit tomorrow, in view of previous engagements made by several members. But I expect the first sitting will be next Tuesday morning.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will go into committee of supply and take up the estimates of national defence, secretary of state, veterans affairs and justice.

Mr. Graydon: Is it the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be here next week?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid it will be impossible for me to be here next week, because of my duties at Lake Success. I regret that it is not possible to hold a meeting of the committee on external affairs tomorrow.

Mr. Graydon: It can be held.

Mr. Pearson: I would be very glad to attend a meeting tomorrow, or to attend a meeting on Saturday.

Mr. Graydon: I changed my arrangements so as to be here tomorrow, because I expected there would be at least two meetings of the committee tomorrow. I would like to see the decision reversed, if it can be done without inconvenience to others. We should have the minister here and, since he can be here tomorrow, surely there is no reason why we cannot hold a couple of good meetings of the committee.

Mr. Coldwell: I would join in that with the hon. member for Peel. When the announcement was made by the Chairman that the committee was not going to meet tomorrow I thought that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had been called away. However, if he is to be here tomorrow every effort should be made to call the committee together some time tomorrow, even if it is late in the day. If it is difficult to get notice of the committee in the morning, we should try to meet some time in the day.

Mr. St. Laurent: Would it be possible for the chairman of the committee to set an hour which could be taken as notice of the meeting?

Mr. Bradette: Eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. Graydon: Eleven-thirty.

Mr. Bradette: Very well, eleven-thirty.

Mr. Graydon: We should have two sittings of the committee tomorrow.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 18, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY—JULY 1, 1949, TO AUGUST 31, 1949

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I now lay on the table a summary of orders in council for the period from July 1 to August 31, 1949. As was agreed on October 19, when the last summary of orders in council was tabled, this summary does not include the treasury board minutes.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 186, for the relief of Rene Walsh.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 187, for the relief of Sara Tepper Prupas.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 188, for the relief of Joseph Wilfred Melanson.—Mr. Winkler.

PRINCESS MARGARET

REPORTED INVITATION TO VISIT CANADA DURING COMING YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister, notice of which I have sent to him, following a suggestion I made during the debate on external affairs. I refer to a press report that an invitation has been extended by the Canadian government to Princess Margaret to visit Canada during the coming year. Has an invitation been extended, and, if so, has it been accepted? If no invitation has been extended, will the government consider extending such an invitation? According to press reports, Buckingham palace says it is interested in the suggestion.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should be surprised if the report in the press were exact. There is no foundation for the rumours which have been circulating as to a visit to Canada and the United States in the near future by Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret. On November 14 we were informed that this rumour was causing some embarrassment in London, and that it would be appreciated if steps were taken here in Ottawa to deny it. No invitation has been extended to Their Majesties or to any of the members of the royal family at this time.

Mr. Graydon: Would the Prime Minister mind answering the last part of my question—whether the government will consider extending such an invitation?

Mr. St. Laurent: The matter has not yet been considered by the government.

HOUSING

INCREASED RENTALS—LIABILITY OF TENANTS TO FURTHER INCREASES ON DECEMBER 15

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, but in his absence perhaps one of his assistants may be able to answer it or, if not, an answer could be given later. Are tenants who have had their rents increased by maximum rental decisions made since the minister made his announcement on November 3 liable to further increases on or after December 15?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I shall take this question as notice and endeavour to give an answer on Monday.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RAILWAY LINE TO ALASKA—QUESTION AS TO U.S. PROPOSAL FOR SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Last evening I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs overlooked replying to my question as to Canada's policy with respect to the northwestern portion of this continent. If he will remember, I referred to the United States proposal that a survey be made for a railway line to Alaska. Is the minister in a position to explain briefly the policy of the government in this regard?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sorry; I did overlook answering that question last night. I assure the hon. member it was not a deliberate omission on my part. I am in a position to say to him that the government is of course interested in any transportation development in the northwest which will bring that part of our country in closer contact with Alaska, not only for strategic reasons but for development reasons as well. The government has already surveyed the possibility of extending the railway line from British Columbia to Alaska. The difficulties in that connection of course are obvious. They are largely financial. I would remind the hon. gentleman that during the war the United States military authorities made a survey for a light military railway which would cover the same territory, and I believe the estimated cost was about $112 million. At this time a standard gauge railway would cost probably well over $200 million. Existing transportation facilities are not overtaxed—that is, sea-rail and road-rail—so there would undoubtedly be a substantial deficit for many years, running possibly to $50 million per year.

It is true that a bill has been passed by congress providing for a survey and authorizing the President of the United States to get in touch with the Canadian government with a view to making that survey. It is also true, I understand, that no appropriation has been passed for this purpose, which means it may be difficult for the United States government to take the action recommended in the bill. If and when that action is taken, and the United States government approaches the Canadian government about this survey, the government will naturally be glad to discuss the matter.

TRADE WITH BRITAIN

EGGS AND BACON—PRESS REPORTS AS TO REDUCED PURCHASES FROM CANADA IN 1950

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It arises out of a press dispatch appearing in this morning's Ottawa Citizen. Is it correct, as stated in the press dispatch, that Britain will not purchase Canadian eggs in 1950 and that the bacon contract will be reduced from 160 million pounds to 140 million pounds?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No contracts for eggs or bacon have yet been placed for 1950. The matters are still under negotiation, and no official answer can be given at this time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

General services—

239. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $227,150.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, when the committee was last dealing with these estimates it had not reached the point where the items were being discussed in detail. I propose, therefore, to deal with the broad problem presented by the estimates rather than with any individual items. In doing so, I am simply following the course adopted by the minister and those who followed him in the discussion.

The importance of these estimates has been emphasized since we last met to discuss the problems of defence. In the debate which has taken place on external affairs, the unanimity of the members of this house with regard to the necessity of Canada being associated with the other free nations in every way necessary for the purpose of combining their strength to assure peace in the years ahead was recognized. The very fact that we are called upon to consider estimates for an expenditure of $383 million for defence is conclusive evidence that there is no thought in the mind of the government or of anyone else that a mere expression of the desire of people for peace, or mere association in a common purpose, will in itself, bring that peace which is the highest desire of every human being. For this reason we must examine these estimates in the light of the position which Canada has taken as a member of the north Atlantic community of nations, and the commitment which that implies.

These estimates must be considered not merely in terms of the amounts appropriated, and their being spent in the best way, but also as part of the important problem of our playing our part in saving civilization itself.

When the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was introducing these estimates he said: "Members will have it in mind that today is Remembrance day." These estimates first came up for consideration on November 11. It seems to me particularly fitting that the estimates of the Department of National Defence should come up on Remembrance day. Each year on November 11 we are called upon to remember the many men who died in the free lands of the world because they had not been prepared for the defence of their country when war broke out, and also because they had not understood what the exact situation was. If there is one message above all others which should come to us from those whose memory we commemorate on November 11, it is that there is no substitute for a precise examination of the facts, and that no pleasant statements as to what we have achieved can be a substitute for the reality of that measure of combined strength which is the one hope for peace in the years ahead.

This does not mean the figures before us may be inadequate. It may well be that they are too high, having regard to the agreements we have made with other nations, and to the fact that our commitment, which has been clearly stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), is to contribute our share in the best way we can, having regard to our strength and our facilities.

The Minister of National Defence went on to say, "We learned again that eternal vigilance is the price of freedom." I think no one will question that statement. Eternal vigilance, however, is not merely keeping one's eye open to see what the other man is doing. Eternal vigilance implies also a constant supervision and a constant examination of our own ability to assume whatever role may be imposed upon us by the commitments that we as a democratic nation have freely undertaken. Our objective is peace. I am certain that no member of the politburo in Russia, which constitutes the small, compact dictatorship over the communist masses of the world, has any doubt that the supreme and only objective of the nations of the Atlantic community is peace. Any suggestion on their part that the North Atlantic security pact is an aggressive association of the western nations is of course hypocrisy, pretence, and an attempt to convince their own people that there is some reason for the tremendous military preparations going on within their own borders.

Our objective is peace, and we have been told that the large sums we are called upon to approve in this committee are the price that we must pay for preserving peace. But dollars will not preserve peace; it is what the dollars buy. We shall only play our part in the common cause, as the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the other nations will only play theirs, if the money that is spent—whether it be dollars, pounds, francs, lire, or any other currency—is effectively used for the purpose of preparing within each country that organization which can most effectively take its part in this great international team which has its mind only on the continuing peace of the world.

Those ceremonies which took place last week should indeed strengthen our conviction as to the importance of an association of this kind, backed by a well-trained organization for that purpose within each country. That also was the great lesson that came to us from the other wars. I use the word "wars", because both the first world war and the second world war could have been avoided if those nations which believed in peace and believed in the right of every nation to determine its own course had combined their strength, had stood together and had said to Germany or to any other possible aggressor: Let there be no doubt that we mean to preserve our freedom. Undoubtedly the leaders of Germany moved in 1914, as they moved in 1939, because they had come to the conclusion that the free nations were neither ready nor willing to defend themselves with all they had. Germany paid the penalty for that mistake, as did the rest of the world at the same time.

If there is one thought that should be uppermost in our minds as we examine these estimates and what these estimates imply, and what lies behind the dollars and the words therein set out, it is that war could have been prevented in 1914 and in 1939. The job of all of us is to do what we can within our sphere of responsibility to keep that lesson in our minds and before our people, and to make sure that never in our lifetime shall it be forgotten.

It is with this thought in mind that I should like to consider not only the estimates that are before us but the statement that was prepared and presented to the house on November 11. This document, which can in fact be called a white paper, covering "Canada's defence program" for 1949 and 1950, purports to give "Information on defence". That is the opening heading, under part I on page 5, and it is the stated purpose of the whole document. I should like to examine some of the things that are said in this white paper because I intend to repeat my appeal to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and to the members of this committee for the setting up of a standing committee on national defence which can obtain the information that is not now available to us and will not be available to us even if we sit in committee of the whole to consider these estimates from now until next May.

The reason I say that is this. Under the rules of procedure, no machinery is provided by which we can obtain the information that would give these estimates and this explanation any real meaning to most members of the committee and to the thirteen and a half million people of Canada whose future so largely depends upon what they really mean.

On the first page of the report, but the fifth page of the document, I find these words:

> Defence is no longer the concern of the soldier alone. It is the concern of each individual.

May I repeat that these are the words given to us by the Department of National Defence. Defence is above all the concern of each member of this committee. We shall not be doing our duty unless we make sure that a procedure has been adopted which makes it possible to discuss the subject of defence with real knowledge of our objectives, of the plans that are being made, of the adequacy of what we are doing, and of what can be done to avoid any waste of money and to make the most effective use of the huge sums which are being allotted for this purpose.

I would refer to these words which appear on page 6:

Canada has a great stake in international security and stability.

Every Canadian has a great stake in international security and stability. There is not a mother or a father in Canada with young children today who does not look at these children and wonder whether in the years ahead they are to be called upon to take part in world tragedies which have been shared by two generations of Canadians. Within this house are many veterans of two world wars. These men, who have seen the ghastly destruction of war, have seen their friends, their brothers, those they knew best of all, blown to oblivion by the ghastly instruments of war, are the ones above all others in this country who are conscious of the need of doing everything within the realm of human possibility to prevent the recurrence of a supreme tragedy of that kind.

May I repeat that Canada as a nation not only has a stake in security and stability, but mothers and fathers—indeed everyone—no matter what their age may be today, look at the papers and at the disturbing headlines, and can only interpret the news they read in terms of the possibility not only of war but of the conceivable end of our civilization as we know it, if the combined sanity and the combined strength of the free nations are not fully associated in the most effective way for the preservation of the peace that was bought by the blood and the agony of the youth of Canada and of other nations who won such a decisive victory in 1945. It is in this frame of mind and from this point of view that I urge hon. members to examine these estimates, and not to take any statement for granted, not to be prepared to pass from this subject until they know, and really know, what is being done with this enormous sum of money.

As has been pointed out, it is no longer the job of the soldier alone, and it is not enough to be told that the military experts tell us this or that. This is the job of every Canadian, and we are the representatives here of the people of Canada.

[Mr. Drew.]

Let us pass to the stated defence objectives which appear on page 11. In paragraph 17 we find this statement:

In 1948 Canada's defence aims and objectives were set out as being:

(1) to provide the force estimated to be necessary to defend Canada against any sudden direct attack that could be or is likely to be directed against it in the near future.

This is our first objective. Before we pass on these estimates it is our duty to know how close we are to that objective. How far have we gone in providing the force estimated to be necessary to defend Canada against any sudden direct attack that could be or is likely to be directed against us in the near future? How many infantry battalions are there in the active forces with their complete complement of weapons and equipment? Unless you know that, you have no idea at all of how ready the infantry are to take their part. How many artillery units have their complete complement of machines, of range-finding instruments, of controlled devices, of all the technical instruments that go with that service under the present establishment, which will be suited for the employment of that unit in active combat? How many hon. members know that? If they do not know, they cannot pass on these estimates with any appearance of reality in relation to the stated objective for which the money is being allotted.

How many of our armoured units have the machines of war and the equipment and all the control and communication devices that are required by an establishment for 1950—not 1945? If you do not know, you cannot pass on these estimates with any real knowledge of what they imply. How many of our engineering units have the establishment required for 1950 and the years beyond? How many of our signal units, how many of our army service corps units, how many of the other units of the infantry have their establishment and could move into positions to meet the first test set down? I think many hon. members guess the answer, and if they do, it is all the more reason why right now, today, the government should say that a standing committee will be set up where the military experts may be examined and where industrial experts and those who are associated with the nonpermanent units as well, the reserve units, could be brought here to express their opinions; because I would remind hon. members that many of the greatest developments in effective mechanism for defence came not from the military experts but from those who could not be included within that rather limited group.

We need only to recall that in the first world war the decisive weapon was the tank, and that it was not the result of the advice of the experts. The experts all said it could not be used, and blocked it. There was a young minister named Churchill who used a device which perhaps may not conform strictly to parliamentary practices. Hon. members will recall that he succeeded in having the tanks developed by including an estimate for land units of the naval force. It was under that appropriation the tanks were developed and were ready for the first attack in 1916. In the second world war the great test as to whether there could be an invasion of Europe was the possibility of establishing beachheads at places where there were no natural ports. There again a civilian named Churchill had put forward the idea of what came to be known as Operation Mulberry. Of course he had had a fairly extended experience in military affairs; but he certainly was not one of those who would be included within the group known as technical military experts.

Hon. members can think of many suggestions which have ultimately taken form and which came originally from the drafting boards of industry, suggestions which came from the ideas of amateur soldiers thinking in unconventional terms. Now, for years after the end of the war—or what we are pleased to call the end of the war—the time has come to bring some of those unconventional brains before a committee to see what ideas have emerged from the thinking of the people of this country as to the way in which, with the greatest economy and effectiveness, they can play their part in the task lying before us in this field. I suggest that unless we have such a committee we are simply giving a blank cheque, without accepting, and insisting upon accepting, the responsibility which is ours in connection with one of the most important duties of this parliament acting as a collective body.

We are told in this same document that the only kind of war which could involve Canada would be a war with communism. At the present time that is the only foreseeable war. At page 11 the white paper goes on to say that the best way to achieve victory in any war is to defeat the enemy in his own land, and that the right place to defend Canada and what Canadians believe in is as far away from Canada as possible.

This is the statement of the Department of National Defence as to their concept of our national military role. I ask hon. members to consider just how ready our present defence forces are to fit in with that role. Whether it is the right role or whether it is not, it is the role placed before us as the stated role of our forces. And only to the extent that our forces fit into that picture is this money being properly spent. I cannot see any shading of the meaning in these words at all.

If our objective is to play our part within the terms now put before us, then the test as to the appropriate expenditure of every cent of money must be this: How close does this expenditure come to producing the results which are put before us in the statement of the Department of National Defence?

At page 12 there is a statement with which I am sure every hon. member will agree:

> Our defence policy assumes that our armed forces will be used in association with those of friendly powers.

That of course was what the Secretary of State for External Affairs was emphasizing yesterday. It goes on to say:

> The defence of Canada and the defence of western Europe are ultimately one operation.

It is necessary, if we consider how well the money is being spent, that we have at least an estimate of what types of units, what types of equipment, and what particular emphasis on a particular service, will best fit our defence forces to that requirement. The report goes on to say:

> The development of these three phases must proceed at a pace which will neither be so slow as to leave us unprepared at any point, nor so hasty as to overburden the economy with the production of war materials much of which would become obsolete.

I believe everyone will agree with this—certainly with the latter part of it. But let us examine the first part of it, where it states that we must not be so slow as to be unprepared at any point. On this 18th day of November, 1949, are we prepared at any single point to meet the requirements stated by the Department of National Defence? Any hon. member who, through his association with military units in this country, knows something of what the situation really is, can give the answer, and he knows it is one which is not satisfactory in relation to the enormous figure before us.

The report refers to our being unprepared "at any point". All right; let us take this point in the history of Canada. On November 18, 1949, how ready are we, not only with any branch of the service but with any unit of any branch of the service, to take the stated part that has been placed before us? Every member who is passing on these estimates should know the answer, or should have the assurance that he will know the answer when we consider the estimates in detail. I make that qualification for this reason, as I pointed out in an earlier debate: that the expenditure of money is effective only to the extent that it is made with a knowledge of the facts and the real purposes for which the money is being spent.

We must know exactly what the position really is—and not just accept the statement that we are spending so much money, and that our men and women in the services are well trained, and have a high morale. We know all that. It is because we have young men and women of demonstrated ability, it is because we have young men and women of whom we are proud, young men and women capable of undertaking any task placed before them, that we should insist upon knowing what is really being done to prepare them—and this is the only reason they are in uniform—for the defence of this country and the maintenance of the collective freedom of our civilization.

On page 12 we find this subheading, "Immediate defence of Canada". It is stated that while there is little likelihood of any direct attack, our services should be planned —and I quote:

> —to meet an attack upon the scale that would be likely to be made at any given time as part of a war involving the north Atlantic treaty powers.

To meet an attack at any given time—that is the test we must apply today. We know that we are not ready in all respects, and we can expect that. But we must know to what extent. We must know where the emphasis should be placed. We must know where the job needs to be pressed most vigorously. We must know what real readiness there is at any given time to deal with this matter.

Then it goes on to say that for this particular type of attack we should have jet interceptors and anti-aircraft guns backed by a relatively small but highly trained, efficient and mobile force of ground troops. I think that Canada must devote its attention so far as ground troops are concerned to developing a small but highly trained, efficient and mobile force of ground troops. It is this type of force that will meet the possibility of the kind of attack on our own soil which is contemplated by the survey of the Department of National Defence. It is this kind of force that would be suited to joint operations on land with the other powers which, because of geographical position and larger populations, would be called upon to provide the main body of the land forces.

No matter what the position is today, what will it be next year; what will it be in 1951 and 1952, if we say that we have a small and compact land force capable of doing the job for which it is intended and for which we are allocating the money? That is the question. It was to this that I referred a few minutes ago.

At this particular time we cannot greatly change the allocation of money, whether we should wish to do so or not. Because of the interruption of the last session for certain important public purposes, the business of the house was not completed, and we are now dealing with estimates which ordinarily would have been dealt with many months ago. We know that in practice most of this money has been spent or already committed. For this reason we cannot change greatly the amounts that will be spent in this current year. But this is the time for us to make sure that the mechanism is provided which will permit us not only to review what is being done now and the picture behind it, but also to consider the estimates next spring with the kind of knowledge that we should have before passing upon future expenditures on this scale.

It is for this reason that my remarks are directed again to the importance of having a standing committee in which details could be examined which simply cannot be effectively dealt with in committee of the whole. On page 13 reference is made to the nucleus theory which has been adopted in regard to the reserve or nonpermanent units. On that page I find these words:

> Canada's peacetime forces, besides being prepared for home defence, must contain the organization and administrative nucleus of the larger forces which an emergency would eventually require.

I think everyone will agree with that. But how much do we know of the extent to which the organization of those peacetime forces are suitable for the projected needs of 1950, of 1955, of 1960? How far have those forces departed from the organization of 1949? One of the greatest difficulties after every war—and history shows this—is to shape the thinking of the Department of National Defence—this applies to every country—away from the experiences of the last war. It has never been different. Men are inclined to interpret the needs of the future in terms of their war experience. Usually it is only by bringing fresh and unconventional minds to an examination of the task that there is a break from the conditions applicable to the war that was fought some time previously.

In the military exercises between the two world wars the units were fighting over and over again in peacetime exercises the battles that had taken place between 1914 and 1918. Many of the exercises being carried on today are carried on as though they were incidents in the war of 1939-1945. The needs of these forces, the organization of the forces, the expenditure of money on the forces, are things that should be examined by this committee and recommendations made. It is not going to be a small task. It is going to be an important and continuing task, and that is why there should be a standing committee which will study continuously this extremely important subject.

On going through this report I find that constantly emphasis is placed upon the readiness of the forces to meet the various tasks that are placed before them. On page 16 I find a statement which seems to me to be symptomatic. It is in these words:

> Canada was able to put her defences on a post-war basis more rapidly than most other countries.

Do we know whether or not that is correct? I am not suggesting that we are being deliberately misled by anyone, but do we know exactly what our position is today? If any hon. member does know exactly, then I am sure he is in a more favourable position than most hon. members of this house and most of those now serving in uniform in different parts of Canada.

I find these words on page 18:

> The adequacy or inadequacy of defence expenditures depends on the appreciation of the international situation.

That is the guiding factor in everything we do; everything must fit into the pattern of what is best suited in relation to an appreciation of the international situation.

We are told about the high cost of war equipment, and a few examples are given. Everyone knows that war equipment is extremely expensive, and undoubtedly the few figures given do indicate how costly this program is.

On page 20 I find this statement:

> In unification and co-ordination Canada has been making continued progress and our place in the forefront of this field has been shown by the way in which steps taken first in Canada have subsequently been taken in other countries.

Let us be extremely proud of what we are doing as Canadians, but unification in itself is not an end; it is only a means to an end. Unification is effective only to the extent that the forces unified constitute an effective force to meet the stated requirements of our defence program. I submit that this statement is meaningless unless we know what is being unified, in terms of our real military requirements at this moment. It is not difficult to unify simply from the point of view of structural organization. The unification which presents the problem is the unification of forces in an effective form for a defined purpose; and I am convinced that we have not before us information that would give that statement any meaning to us at this time. It is repeated in another way on page 21:

> The test of Canada's system of organizing defence lies in the fact that unification has proceeded farther and duplication of function has been more thoroughly eliminated than in any other western country.

That is a fairly broad statement, and when we read it I think we must examine the situation as it has been exposed in at least one service, by the Mainguy report, which dealt under very limited powers with the situation in the navy. When we speak of organization, one statement in the Mainguy report should be remembered, not merely for the purpose of criticism but in order to realize how necessary it is that we go behind general statements of that kind. On page 50 of the Mainguy report we find these words:

> . . . several important administrative departments were treated as though they were temporarily refuges for temporary misfits, rather than as fields of endeavour for the best available experts.

This statement hardly suggests the high degree of skill in administrative organization implied in the statement to which I have referred. After all, these are not my words; they are the words of a commission appointed by the Minister of National Defence. They come under the heading "Headquarters staff", that portion of the organization which becomes an integral part of any co-ordinated direction of our defence forces. It is a serious indictment of those responsible for administration, if the statement is correct; and after all, it was put forward in a report which has been generally commended as a fair and accurate interpretation of what was found. I repeat it: "Several important administrative departments were treated as though they were temporarily refuges for temporary misfits, rather than as fields of endeavour for the best available experts." All these departments are under one minister. If there is anything in the Mainguy report which imposes upon us a responsibility for securing wider knowledge in regard to the land and air forces, it is this statement, if it is to be accepted as accurately representing what was found. A headquarters staff that is a temporary refuge for temporary misfits, no matter how small may be the percentage of temporary misfits, is not the kind of staff which will produce effective co-ordination and unification, regardless of what the documents may appear to produce.

I suggest that this in itself is good reason for a thorough investigation of this subject. But, Mr. Chairman, if there were one thing above all others that would suggest the need for study by this committee now, not several months from now, it is the fact we have been told that a comprehensive and long national defence bill, which will bring about sweeping changes, is to be placed before this house. At page 22 of this report I read:

> Its enactment would mean that Canadian defence matters would be dealt with for the first time entirely by the Canadian parliament . . .

I emphasize those words, "would be dealt with entirely by the Canadian parliament." It would be the first time. Defence matters have not been dealt with by the Canadian parliament, with knowledge of the defence problems, for many years, because the information has not been available. There is nothing in the act itself which assures that result. The only thing that will assure it is the setting up of a standing committee of this house which can examine these matters and this bill. I hope there will be no suggestion of this bill being dealt with in the remaining time available this session, because its implications are far too important and the effect of the changes much too far-reaching to be dealt with before we have an opportunity to examine experts as we cannot examine them in this house.

Words are often used to conceal information rather than to give it. I do not think any Canadian reading this document has any more information about the real state of our defence forces than he had before it was presented on November 11. What does any statement of the cost of national defence equipment mean unless it is related to a knowledge of how many of these items we are buying, and their effectiveness, and the opinion of industrial as well as military experts as to their availability and the productive power of this country in particular lines? We need this information in order to form an opinion as to where the emphasis should be laid in providing equipment of the kind.

We have come a very long way, Mr. Chairman, since the days just before the last war broke upon the world. If hon. members do not believe I have used words of the utmost moderation in referring to the enormous expenditures upon which we are asked to pass, may I remind them of what was said in this country only a short time ago. On a number of occasions we have been told that there was not an appreciation of the needs for defence preparation until this government took office. May I use this illustration, not for the purpose of dealing with that statement, but just to indicate how great the change has been, and why it is so necessary that we examine this subject with great care.

August 18, 1935, was almost exactly four years before the outbreak of the last war, and yet, on that date, we find the man who was to be prime minister of this country during the war years criticizing in most vigorous terms the increases which had been provided for the Department of National Defence. In fact in that speech he said that these expenditures were being made with the idea of setting up a dictatorship, and that nothing else could justify the expenditure of such enormous sums. Let us see what was provided in that year. The total main estimates for the Department of National Defence in 1935 were $11,252,001.17. There were supplementary estimates of $1,796,000, making a total of $13,048,001.17. The estimates for aviation were separate, because they included civilian aviation as well. In 1935 the main estimates for aviation were $3 million and the supplementary estimates were $1,302,900, making a total for aviation of $4,302,900. The total for defence purposes, including civil aviation and the flying clubs, was $17,350,901.17.

The fact that that expenditure could be regarded so recently as a huge expenditure intended only for the purpose of setting up a dictatorship—those were the words—makes it apparent that we should examine with great care the extent to which every cent of the present estimates is being spent. It should not be done with any such suggestion as was made in 1935—and quite improperly made, I think—but simply in recognition of the tremendous change that has taken place in everyone's thinking between 1935 and today, when we are confronted with estimates of $383 million and realize there are other expenditures as well for certain associated civilian departments which do work for the Department of National Defence. This huge sum must be examined carefully. I repeat there is only one way in which it can be done effectively, and that is by a standing committee.

We have been told by the Minister of National Defence that the setting up of a standing committee on national defence has never been the practice under our parliamentary system. Many things are being done that were never done before. Certainly until a few weeks ago there was never a standing committee on atomic energy. Since atomic energy is part of the problem we are discussing today, I cannot imagine a single reason why there should be a standing committee on that subject and not a standing committee on national defence. The military authorities would be the only ones concerned with doing anything with atomic energy from the military point of view. If we need a standing committee for that limited feature of our development in this country, surely we need a standing committee to deal with the broader organization which would employ whatever military use might be made of that particular source of power.

We have been told also by the Minister of National Defence that the fact that there are committees in the United States to deal with these subjects has no bearing on this matter. We have been told that it is not the right way to deal with a subject of this kind. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of the house will permit me to read into the record a statement, which I believe is well thought out, concerning the importance of committees. It was contained in an article which appeared in Maclean's magazine on March 1, 1943. It was under the heading, "What's wrong with parliament?" I should like to read only that portion which deals with the use of committees, because I believe the statement is a clear one; it refers to the matters which are now before us and to the suggestions we are making. It reads as follows:

> One reason why parliament has not functioned better is that 245 members cannot get down to close grips with a subject. Also there is not enough time for the whole house to deal with everything. Hence the practice of referring specific matters to committees for study and report should be extended.
> On a good committee the party lines disappear. One member's experience is that on ten committees in three years there was never a vote on party lines. In committees the atmosphere of the arena is changed for that of the workshop.
> To be effective a committee must be small, not more than fifteen. Its members should be selected because of their interest in the subject rather than solely because of other considerations such as province, race or religion. Committees should be set up early in the session and bring in their reports early, before the last-minute rush.
> The committee on war expenditures has done exceedingly useful work, but it has been suggested that it has been handicapped by lack of technical assistance. A committee of this character should have attached to it one or two full-time people who are competent to prepare the material as is done at both Westminster and Washington. Without such assistance the committee is largely in the hands of the interested department.
> Committees should sit regularly on such matters as manpower and labour, financial and economic questions, reconstruction, external affairs and information, munitions and supplies, agriculture, the navy, the army and the air force.

May I repeat that?

> —the navy, the army and the air force. The United States Senate has forty-seven committees exercising great power. We do not need anything like that number. The close connection of our executive with our legislative branches makes it unnecessary. Fifteen working committees of our house, most of them only meeting through half the session, would do the job. My fifth point, therefore, is:
> 5. Whenever possible a matter of major importance should be referred to a committee of parliament, and where necessary the committee should be provided with adequate research assistance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that is an excellent—

Mr. Isnor: Would the leader of the opposition be good enough to give us the name of the author?

Mr. Drew: Yes. The author was Mr. Brooke Claxton.

Mr. Isnor: I was aware of that.

Mr. Claxton: Everyone in the committee is, too.

Mr. Isnor: It is a good article.

Mr. Drew: The author of it was the present Minister of National Defence, when he was a private member.

Mr. Isnor: It is a very good article.

Mr. Drew: It is an excellent article.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Is that the same magazine that published "The merchants of death" about that time?

Mr. Drew: Yes; it is the same publication. I wish hon. members would reread that article and would examine, in the light of what was said there, some things that have been done in regard to production for our defence requirements.

This article, I say, was written by the present Minister of National Defence, at a time when he was a private member; and he was expressing his opinion as to the success of the use of committees. Hon. members will note that the Minister of National Defence, who now says that a standing committee on national defence is not appropriate under our system, in 1943 specifically referred to a committee on the army, the navy and the air force. His view was clear then. Moreover, may I point out that his experience then, when he was sitting as a private member, does not bear out the suggestion that he now makes, that these committees divide on a political basis. He was referring to his own experience, and he said:

> One member's experience is that on ten committees in three years there was never a vote on party lines.

Then he goes on to say:

> In committees the atmosphere of the arena is changed for that of the workshop.

May I say that I subscribe to every word of that part of the article I have quoted. I do not think that the points I have been trying to make for some weeks could be more cogently and more effectively stated. May I also remind hon. members that this was under the significant heading "What's wrong with parliament?" That question was asked by the present Minister of National Defence; and he attached sufficient importance to the idea of these committees to have that paragraph in special type:

> Whenever possible a matter of major importance should be referred to a committee of parliament, and where necessary the committee should be provided with adequate research assistance.

Hon. members will recall that the Minister of National Defence on more than one occasion has told us that it is not appropriate for us to see what is done in the United States, because our systems are so dissimilar. But in 1943 he thought there was a sufficiently related experience to point out that in the United States matters of this kind had been referred to committees. He said:

> The United States Senate has forty-seven committees exercising great power.

He did not say that was a reason not to consider this procedure. He said:

> We do not need anything like that number.

He referred to a smaller number, but he obviously implied that the machinery available to their members, with experts to assist them, was the kind of machinery he approved. Even at the expense of putting it on the record again, may I read the last paragraph I have quoted—and I hope the minister will not feel that I am presuming when I say that I adopt that statement as one that completely expresses my own opinion on this subject.

Mr. Isnor: Does the hon. member approve the system used in the United States in regard to these committees?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the question is not relevant.

Mr. Isnor: It has an important bearing on the matter, I would say.

Mr. Drew: The question is not relevant, for this reason. The use of committees and the system are two different things. The hon. member who has just spoken is fully aware of the fact that the United States system is one which places committees in an entirely different position because the executive is not chosen from the members of congress. The members of the executive are appointed separately and independently. But as was indicated by the gentleman who wrote this article in 1943, this does not in any way dispose of the fact that, while the system may be different, the procedure by which information is obtained is one which offers useful suggestions to the house.

Mr. Isnor: Then you do not approve the United States system.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to have the record confused by a statement of that kind. I most certainly approve the reference of subjects of this kind to a committee. I believe in the strength of our parliamentary system. I believe that our parliamentary system is a better system than the United States system. I believe our parliamentary system will work only if we have committees that get for members of the House of Commons the kind of information that is available to the members of the United States congress. That is exactly what the author of this article was pointing out back in 1943 under the title: "What's wrong with parliament?" That is definitely what is wrong with parliament. We are asked to deal with a subject of this kind without any mechanism by which we can get the information upon which we can assume our responsibilities; and this article sets out that fact as clearly as I have ever seen it set out. I hope that all hon. members will look it up, because it deals with other subjects that might also well be reviewed at a time when we are trying to make parliament more effective in dealing with these subjects.

We cannot greatly change the total required for this present year. We can, however, find out some of the things that are being done now, so that when we meet next year as a continuing House of Commons we may be equipped with information that will make it possible for us to deal with this matter.

With this thought in mind, may I again refer—and this will be my last reference to the article now—to this statement:

> Committees should be set up early in the session and bring in their reports early, before the last-minute rush.

I should like to see that statement underlined in red in Hansard, but I am afraid that Hansard arrangements do not make that possible. But of all the excellent statements in the article I have quoted, none is more important than the one that these committees should be set up, and set up early, and that the committees should bring in their reports before the last-minute rush so that the reports may be examined carefully and the decision of the house made with actual knowledge of the facts.

Let us not pretend that we have any real information upon which to base our decision at this time. Let us not pretend that we know how far our present organization and the present equipment of our defence forces, with regard to weapons and all the other facilities that they require, meet the stated needs of these defence forces as put forward by the Department of National Defence. Let us not pretend that. But recognizing what the situation is, with a full recognition of the importance of this subject, let us insist that there be an assurance now of a standing committee which can examine these facts for our information—if not for change at the present time, then so that we may be ready to deal with the matter next session, to the end that there may be an effective saving of money as well as the most efficient organization of our defence forces that is possible.

I am prepared to make this statement, and I am satisfied that it will be supported in his own mind, no matter what may be done vocally, by every hon. member who has had occasion to be associated with our defence forces spread across this country: an enormous sum is being wasted at the present time. We are told of the number of recruits in our reserve force. Mr. Chairman, that statement is meaningless unless we know how many of these recruits are training. The enlistment roll of the reserve units does not tell the story. What does tell the story is the attendance at parades, the number of men who go to the camps provided for the land forces, and the number of men who take part in the various training exercises provided for the reserve or nonpermanent naval and air forces as well. These are things we should know. How much good does it do to know that there are so many thousand volunteers on the enlistment roll of the artillery units unless you know how many men are attending the parades and how many are going to the camps which finish off that training? How much good does it do to know how many thousands there are on the enlistment rolls of all the infantry units across Canada unless you know the percentage of attendance at parades? How many privates are attending, officers and noncommissioned officers? How many attend camp when it is set up? The same applies to every other branch of the service. These are things we should know, because money is being spent on the assumption that according to the enlistment rolls these men are taking their part. The organization should contemplate the possibility of checking each one of these things, and a committee such as I have suggested is the only device by which it can be carried out.

We simply do not know whether the observation of the Mainguy commission that headquarters had become in some cases a refuge for temporary misfits applies to the other services, but we do know that the naval service is part of the same military organization, and part of the broad plan of unification in the preparation to meet the commitments placed before us yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that while we cannot greatly change the figures that will be required for the current year, we have a duty to examine them beyond what is possible here. In the light of our commitments and our desire to play our part in preserving peace, we have a duty to ask that the views expressed in 1943 by the present Minister of National Defence be acted upon and a standing committee on national defence set up so that hon. members will be in a position to accept their great responsibility in relation to the activities of this department.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): With a great deal of what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said as to the role and objectives of Canada's defence forces of course no fault can be found, because, subject only to one or two rather limited exceptions in his references to the white paper which was distributed on November 11, he had no fault to find. That is a very interesting observation to note. For the first time we put before hon. members in advance of the opening of the discussion of the defence estimates a statement which must be regarded as comprehensive, and then the leader of the opposition, who has had a great deal of experience in public affairs as well as in defence matters, refers to it in his speech with I think only minor qualifications, with regard to the assertion in two paragraphs to which he referred at the end of his remarks.

It is interesting, too, that neither he, the leader of the C.C.F., nor the leader of the Social Credit party criticized the amounts sought this year as being either too large or too small. The leader of the opposition based his criticism on the assertion, which he certainly made a great number of times, "We don't know." I think it is a fair summing up of his entire speech to say that that is the point he made. He used that point to support his argument in favour of the appointment of a standing committee on defence. This suggestion has been made repeatedly by members of the opposition since 1945, with regard to both defence and social security; and just as repeatedly it has been opposed by members of the government, for the reasons which are now well known to hon. members.

I must say I was amused, as I am sure the committee was, by the leader of the opposition's references to my article in Maclean's magazine, written in 1943. I appreciate his commendation of that article and his very kindly remarks about it. Since I have changed my mind after five or six years in this house, I hope that the leader of the opposition, when he has been in the house a little longer, will similarly change his mind, and be prepared to say so, as I have been on previous occasions.

The first reference to this article was made by myself in this house on May 30, 1946, as reported at page 2052 of Hansard, when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was proposing a committee on social security. I referred to the article and said that I had changed my mind. A similar reference was made by me just last month, on October 12, 1949, at page 723 of Hansard. If, therefore, it has recently come to the attention of the leader of the opposition, or if other hon. members have heard it for the first time today, I would point out that it has been before hon. members and has been in Hansard for over three years.

The leader of the opposition said that neither he nor other hon. members knew how many infantry units, artillery units, armoured units, engineering units, signal units, army service corps units, had been brought up to strength, completed their training and were fully equipped. He said that hon. members know the answer. Later he of course said that the answer would be negligible.

Mr. Drew: I think I said "would be unsatisfactory".

Mr. Claxton: Unsatisfactory. Well, I would ask the leader of the opposition and hon. members to be fair in their appreciation of the situation. I think it would be possible for the leader of the opposition to put the same question about the state of recruitment, training and equipment of the units of the forces of this country at any time, or of any country at any time, particularly in a time of reorganization, training and re-equipment after a terrible war.

I venture to say that even with their congressional committee in the United States on service matters, there are very few members of congress or members of the public in that country who would know the answer with regard to the situation there on any one of these matters. I venture to say that that ignorance might extend even to the point of not knowing how many divisions were in a state of preparedness, or if there were any divisions fully manned, fully trained and fully equipped in any final sense of the word.

I am sure the same would be true in the United Kingdom. Just last night I was reading the report of a debate in which defence matters came up, although the debate had reference to the economic position of Britain. There one or more hon. members asked exactly the same type of question as the leader of the opposition has asked, and I am sure that there the same kind of answer must be given—and that is that recruiting, training and equipment are never finished. What we have been aiming to do is to set up an organization that will do the job and be capable of expansion to meet an emergency—and then to get on with it, just as fast as we could, with the amount of money and materials we had or that were made available through the vote of parliament.

I do not think there is any other way of doing it. The state of our defence preparedness must be tested at any time by how we are getting on with the job of recruiting, training, equipping, and providing the organization. In Britain, parliament appropriated £760 million for defence for the fiscal year 1949-50, corresponding to the $383 million we are seeking here. But have they a committee on defence that was told the things the leader of the opposition says he has to have in order to appreciate what is going on? Did they in Britain have any information additional to the information put before this committee and the Canadian people with regard to defence? Did they tackle this job in any way different from the way we are tackling it? Have they ever had a committee on defence? Hon. members know as well as I do that the answer to all those questions is no.

In the debates to which I made reference a private member asserted—and whether he was right or wrong is not for me to say—that they did not have more than three divisions in any state of preparedness—and that would be with reference to army forces totalling something of the magnitude of 400,000 men.

Mr. Drew: May I ask the minister a question? I notice he is quoting a private member of the United Kingdom parliament on the question of the preparedness of the defence forces of the United Kingdom. Does the Minister of National Defence suggest that he has to rely on the statement of a private member to know the state of the defence forces of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Claxton: No, I do not suggest that for a second. I quote this only for the purpose of indicating that it is the kind of view a private member has expressed, based on the information available to him—which, I suggest, corresponds to the kind of view expressed by hon. members of the opposition concerning the same subject. The private member in the United Kingdom was not answered by the minister of defence rising in his place and saying, "I am sorry; your figures are wrong. We have not only two or three; we have five"—or some other figure. He was not given a parliamentary committee to find out what the answer was. He made the assertion, and it was left at that. I am afraid defence is a subject which sometimes must be dealt with in this way.

With regard to the various observations in the white paper to which the leader of the opposition referred, I thank him for the very moderate way in which he dealt with these statements. He referred to paragraph 24, which states:

> The development of these three phases must proceed at a pace which will neither be so slow as to leave us unprepared at any point, nor so hasty as to overburden the economy with the production of war materials much of which would become obsolete. If war is close and inevitable then all nations are doing too little to meet it.

And I add this to the part he read:

> If war is not inevitable, or if it is remote, we may be doing too much.

Obviously the scale of our preparedness and the amount of the appropriation voted by parliament, as well as the amount of defence activity carried on in this or any other country at any time—that is, the proportion of the total national income we spend on defence —must be related to an estimation of the risks as they are seen from time to time. And those risks, of course, are changing.

Then the leader of the opposition referred to paragraph 28:

> While the best available information indicates that there is little likelihood of any direct threat to our national security within the immediate future, the present international position requires that Canada's services should be planned and executed so as to enable us to meet an attack upon the scale that would be likely to be made at any given time as part of a war involving the north Atlantic treaty powers.

In this connection I should like to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) when he tried to construe a statement made by me a year or so ago as indicating that I considered it to be a part of the role of Canada to be able to deal with the forces of the Soviet union single-handed. Of course, no such statement was ever made by me and no such inference could be drawn. Such a statement would not hold water for a second. Indeed it it doubtful whether the forces of any country, other than those of the United States, would be adequate to meet an attack directed by the Soviet union against that country alone. That is the real situation.

What I do say is that any war in which Canada would be involved would be a world war. Since we have associated ourselves with other friendly powers under the North Atlantic treaty, we would have to deal with the situation that was presented in which the Soviet union was directing its attention to our country as part of its total operations everywhere. Without being strategists, hon. members can see that in such a war, and at such time should it occur, which we hope and pray it will not, the Soviet union would have a number of different roles and tasks; consequently we must appreciate what part of its forces might be directed against Canada by way of immediate attack. It is to meet that that I say one of the objectives of the Canadian defence forces is, and I quote from paragraph 23:

> (1) meeting immediate needs for local defence, here and now;
> (2) preparing local defences as needed in the future.

The scale of attack that might be anticipated at the present time or in the foreseeable future is such that, in the view of the officers advising me, we are preparing and equipping forces to deal with the threat as we estimate it from time to time. It may be found that with the full recruitment of our active forces, and the full organization and training of the brigade group, we will have more than we estimate to be necessary to deal with the situation in the foreseeable future. It may be that on reconsideration it will be found that we shall not need for that purpose the brigade group as now planned. But at the present time we are recruiting that brigade group up to its present establishment, giving it as good training as we can, and providing it with equipment as funds are available.

As I have said before, we now have over eighty-nine per cent of the present establishment of the active forces enlisted. Some of those are fully trained, but obviously a considerable proportion are not. When I say fully trained, I mean fully trained to the point considered desirable at this time. It must be remembered that in a modern defence force no man's training ever stops; it goes on continuously until he retires. This is one of the few occupations in which most officers and men must continue to satisfy educational, training and physical requirements and standards virtually up to the time of their final retirement from the service.

As the white paper indicates, we have in the brigade group completed the airborne training of the P.P.C.L.I. I think those who were present at Exercise Eagle were fully satisfied that that is a first-class unit in first-class shape. I have not had any suggestion from anyone that they thought the contrary was the case. That battalion today is sufficiently equipped to meet the test put forward by the leader of the opposition. But it is not the only unit which is sufficient for the task set out. There are other units, and there will be more developed and trained and equipped progressively. As I say, it is a continuous process, and this is an exceedingly important fact to keep in mind.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

Supply—National Defence

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose this morning I was replying to the remarks of the leader of the opposition. In reference to the suggestion that we have a committee on defence, I think I should say only one thing further.

This suggestion has been put forward time and again, and the answer has been given; but from the proposals that have been made by members of the Conservative opposition, and today by the leader of the opposition, it is perfectly obvious that in effect what is wanted is a committee on defence, representative of all groups in the house, which of course would have power to send for witnesses and then, having examined into the situation, make recommendations which would have the effect of determining the size and proportions of the forces and the type and suitability of equipment. I think those words were used by the leader of the opposition this morning. In other words ultimately this parliamentary committee in effect would have to do with the management of our defence forces and their administration and planning, as is the case in some ways in the United States, rather than that being done ultimately, as it is now in Canada, by the cabinet itself, with a responsible minister.

Mr. Drew: If the answer to the request is to be that there can be no committee, I do not want it based upon any misconception of what I said. I thought I had made it abundantly clear that this committee would be similar to other standing committees, and that the most it could do would be to examine the facts and make those facts available to hon. members. I need not interject any further comments in regard to the set-up of the committee, but I want it made abundantly clear that I do not suggest that our ordinary parliamentary system be varied in any way. I am simply suggesting that there be a standing committee which can inquire and report. I recognize, and certainly would never vary my position in that respect, that under our system the government must assume responsibility for the decision finally made.

Mr. Claxton: I am glad to have that explanation, Mr. Chairman, but it does not alter the argument I was making, which was related to the sum total of all the suggestions that have been made in this connection, from which I suggest the conclusion is that the ultimate result would be as I have indicated. That, of course, we believe to be quite foreign to our system. If it does not amount to that now, it would amount to it in time, because it would be the result of that kind of examination, study and consideration.

There are just one or two further points I should like to mention. The only references the leader of the opposition made to the white paper in a critical sense were to paragraphs 65 and 72, where we refer to the progress made in unification and co-ordination. Even there he did not argue against these, but questioned to what extent they were true. Well, I think it must be evident from information available to hon. members with regard to the organization of the department as a single department with a single minister, a single deputy and a single set of appropriations; the organization of the services within a single department and subject to a single minister; the arrangements for interservice co-operation through the three major committees, the chiefs of staff committee, the personnel members committee and the principal supply officers committee; the organization for dealing with major matters of defence administration through the defence council; the integration of the activities of defence research into the work of the department and the co-ordination effected through membership of the chiefs of staff on the defence research board and the membership of the chairman of the defence research board or the chiefs of staff committee; the joining together of some fourteen or fifteen operations of the three services so they are performed by a single service for all three; the elimination of duplication of services in such matters as motor transport, supply and medical services; the keying of all this into the cabinet through the cabinet defence committee, as well as co-ordination with other government departments through such agencies as Canadian Commercial Corporation as the only purchasing agency—in all these respects Canada has made very substantial progress in unification and co-ordination, which we believe justifies the claim that has been made.

The fact is that in most of these respects such progress as has been made in other countries has followed, in point of time, that made here. Further, in the tri-service cadet college plan now in effect we are endeavouring to achieve a co-operative attitude through having cadet officers in all three services train together.

The next point mentioned by the leader of the opposition was the defence bill, which he referred to as a very important measure; and so it is. It is now before the banking and commerce committee in the other place, where good progress is being made. Whether or not it is dealt with by this house this session will depend upon the progress made both in the other place and in this house. How this bill should be dealt with of course will rest with the house, but when it went before the Senate I ventured to suggest that it might be found appropriate to deal with it in a committee, and that course is being followed. I have not discussed the question with my colleagues, but that is my view of the right way to deal with the matter, namely, to refer this measure to a committee, in the way that complicated and technical legislation usually is dealt with.

The hon. gentleman asked some questions and made some comments about the state of the reserve units, saying that it was not the strengths which were important so much as the extent of the training that was being carried on. I have here some figures for the reserve army showing total strengths and effective strengths for the years from 1926-27 to 1938-39. They show that the percentage of personnel training over that period before the second world war was 64·04 per cent. I have also the figures showing the total strength and the effective strengths for the years since the second world war, the four years from 1945 to March 31, 1949. They show the percentage training at 86·4 per cent, a very substantial improvement over anything that was done before the war. And I may add that the figures for the current year, beginning April 1, 1949, which are of course preliminary, show 92·2 per cent are training, which I believe is the highest percentage in the entire period I have here.

If we add to the effective strength of the army reserve the numbers of men now in training with the C.O.T.C., as we certainly may from the point of view of effective preparedness, we have a total of some 40,000 or 41,000 in the army alone. That, I submit, is higher than any year under review except the year immediately before the war, 1938-39. Considering it is only four years after the termination of the second world war, it is a result which is encouraging. Don't think we are complacent about this position. We believe we need more men in the reserve army. As I indicated earlier in my remarks, we would like to see another 10,000 just as soon as we can get them, and we are bending every effort to get them.

This figure of 40,000 or 41,000 men in training in the reserve and C.O.T.C. may be compared with the figures for the United Kingdom as at September 29, 1949. These figures were disclosed in an answer in parliament, and show that the United Kingdom had 79,400, which includes 9,060 women. On a basis proportionate to population, therefore, Canada has twice as many men in the reserve army today as there are in the territorial army of the United Kingdom.

Turning now to the navy and the air force: As of July 31, 1949, there were 2,253 active personnel in the air force reserve and the number has increased since. That is much greater than at any time up to 1939. The figure for the navy is 4,404, and that again is several times greater than the corresponding figure for any year up to the outbreak of the second world war.

There are hon. members who are quite familiar, from their own experience, with the type of training that is being carried on in the reserve forces; the clothing and equipment issued, the pay and allowances, the administration and training staffs and the arrangements at camps and on courses. I am sure that every one of them will support the view which I have heard expressed by reserve army officers and men—I meet the representatives of the reserve army through the defence associations—that the reserve army is an even better outfit than it was before the second world war.

I believe a question was asked by the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) as to the expenditure made on the reserve army. These estimates provide for an expenditure for the current fiscal year of $14,364,739 on the reserve forces and $1,711,111 on the cadet forces. These figures, however, must be read subject to a condition which is well known to hon. members familiar with the subject, and that is that all components of the active forces, from the chiefs of staff down, contribute in some way or other to the work of the reserves. Every part of the navy contributes to the work of the reserve because a large portion of the reserve navy goes to sea in ships that are manned by the active navy, and the cost of operation of which comes out of the vote for the active navy. The same thing applies to the air force auxiliary. To run an auxiliary squadron requires approximately 50 officers and men of the regular force, and requires an expenditure of approximately $600,000 per annum. All the pay and allowances and related expenditures applicable to the full-time officers and men come out of the items allocated to the regular forces. Even the costs of the operation of the auxiliary units come out of the costs of the regular forces to some considerable extent.

Altogether we are spending on the reserve forces directly today considerably more than we were spending on all defence in the years before the war. I do want to emphasize again the importance the reserve forces have in the mind of the government and its advisers. We regard those forces as forming with the active forces part of one navy, one army and one air force, which together constitute a team preparing to be capable of defending Canada if that defence should be needed. I should like to emphasize the fact that, at any given moment, the estimate of potential risk of attack must be taken into consideration in appreciating whether or not our forces are sufficient to do that particular job. Though they may be considered adequate for one particular operation, they must be always considered together with other forces which are in various stages of training, equipping and at different strengths. What we are aiming at is what we are best able to get with the men and money available to do the job at any particular moment.

Mr. Charlton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw to your attention, and through you, sir, to the members of the house, that in the galleries there are one hundred representatives of boys' and girls' agricultural colleges from across Canada, comprising a total membership of approximately 50,000. These boys and girls are all winners in their own provinces, and have been competing at the Royal Winter fair this week for dominion honours in their respective fields.

Mr. Claxton: I hope many of them will join the reserve or active forces.

Mr. Lennard: Will the minister tell us what proportion of the 41,000 men in the reserve army are in the ranks?

Mr. Claxton: I shall have that breakdown for the hon. member in a moment.

Mr. Fraser: What is being done towards making the armouries across the country more suitable for the mechanized units which we have today? Most of the armouries were built for infantry units, and now that we have mechanized units the vehicles in many cases cannot get through the doors. Will the minister say what is being done in that connection?

Mr. Claxton: Where it is possible structurally, the doors are being enlarged so that the vehicles can get through. In other localities it has been possible to take over temporary buildings that were erected in the neighbourhood of the main armoury and use them for vehicles; in some places we have leased buildings just for vehicles; and in a number of places there is no accommodation and the vehicles must remain outside. In those cases of course they are suitably greased to diminish the rate of deterioration owing to the weather. But the fact that we need and have so many vehicles and so much wheeled equipment in the modern active and reserve forces has led to an enormous problem with regard to accommodation. We have increased floor space by 70 per cent for the reserve forces in the last ten years but that, I am afraid, is not nearly enough, and we should continue a considerable program of construction.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Fraser: I just wondered if it would not be possible for the minister's department, in my own city of Peterborough, to see that a suitable garage was put up for those vehicles.

Mr. Claxton: I will look into the matter.

Mr. Fraser: It takes a man quite some time to get them in shape before they can go out into operation, and it would save a great deal of the men's time; and I think it would help a good deal.

Mr. Claxton: To answer the hon. member who asked for a breakdown of officers and other ranks, I may say that I have not here the breakdown related to the same total I gave him, but I have it related to another total which I will now give him. At July 31, 1949, there were in the reserve army 5,554 officers; there were 32,805 other ranks and there were approximately 2,500 members of the C.O.T.C.

Mr. Lennard: How many were privates? I do not want the number of other ranks. I want to know how many were privates.

Mr. Claxton: We would have to get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did I understand the minister to say that, with respect to the forthcoming bill, he was disposed to recommend that it be referred to a committee?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I am going to ask the minister if he will explain to us how he distinguishes so definitely between the reference of that bill to a committee and the creation of a committee to deal with other things that my leader referred to this morning. Before I take my seat I just want to say that, having been struck by the excellence of the argument that the minister, as a private member, had made some six years ago, I looked up the recantations which he has made since; and I am bound to say that the difference between the two seemed to me to be like the difference between a trumpet note which was sounded in 1943 and a rather quavering and uncertain note which he sounds in 1946 and again in 1949. I am not going to take the time of the committee to read them, but I suggest to the minister that he might think this matter over further, and I am going to make this further suggestion. I can quite realize that it may make some extra work for the minister and also that when in power a man thinks differently from the way he thinks as a private member. Nevertheless I think that this is a thing which should not be lightly disregarded, and I am hoping that, when the minister has a chance to think the matter over further, he may come to the conclusion that the same line of argument that is moving him to have a committee in connection with this bill may be carried further.

Mr. Claxton: In reply to the hon. member for Greenwood, may I say that I dealt with this on two previous occasions. It is made plain by the situation in the United Kingdom. In that country there are five committees lettered from A to E. None of the committees has any special function. Important matters of legislation are referred to one or other of the committees by the Speaker almost as a matter of course. With that practice I am in full accord. When a matter such as the defence bill, consisting of 251 sections and replacing some 500 or 600 sections, is before the house, it can most effectively be dealt with before a committee. That is the place where drafting changes and the like can be made. I should be glad indeed to see followed here the practice that is followed there, when that seems to be the suitable course; and that is the course ordinarily followed in the house. But in the United Kingdom and in the other countries of the commonwealth they have not these functional committees, committees with special functions; and when they have had committees on estimates, they have generally dropped them because they found them to be unsatisfactory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I venture to warn the minister against slavish imitation of things British and may I suggest to him also that there may be useful hints which we can obtain by observing things there.

Mr. Claxton: I quite agree. But I think that the British parliamentary system is the best we know.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask the minister a question? I am not going back on what the minister has said or may have said through Maclean's magazine a few years ago, because I am proud of the fact that the minister does not stay stagnant like certain people and certain parties I could mention. He is willing to adapt himself to present conditions. I should like to ask the minister this question. He need not answer it now but I should like to have it answered on the estimates. What was the cost of the Abbotsford airport? What is to be done with it in the future? Why is it not being utilized at the present time, particularly as it is the best airport in western Canada and particularly as, under the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, it may not at any time belong to a certain other power? I should like to know why it is not being utilized. I do not expect the minister to answer that question now.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to look into that matter.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Has the minister made plans for extending the air service on the northwest staging route? In that connection, coming as I do from that great country serviced by the Alaska highway, I think it is only right to make reference here this afternoon to "Exercise Eagle". Some criticism has been offered as to the expense of Exercise Eagle and with regard to holding that great demonstration of air power which was held within my riding at the Peace river bridge on the Alaska highway. Hon. members have today been challenged by the leader of the opposition. They have been asked if they know whether money is being well spent for the Department of National Defence throughout the country. Hon. members have been asked if, from their own experience, they can say that there has been efficiency in the expending of these huge sums of money. Coming as I do from that part of the country, I should like to say that Exercise Eagle was a tremendous spectacle. You will pardon me, Mr. Chairman, if I mention this matter because I am the only member of this committee who was present at Exercise Eagle in the middle of last summer, the summer of 1949. I saw those planes coming in from the south, the transports bearing Canadian paratroopers. Of course it was all a theoretical business of capturing the airport, taking the bridge, cutting off supplies and so forth, a field in which I do not claim to have any expert knowledge.

I saw the transports coming in from the direction of Edmonton sharply at five o'clock in the morning, over the top of the Peace river and over the bridge. I saw 160 young Canadians leap out into the air, hit the silk and come down in the course of that exercise over very tough terrain, over the top of the mighty Peace river bridge itself. Not one of the 160 young men was injured in the fall. With them came their paraphernalia and equipment. Later out of the clouds came the great transports towing gliders. These gliders were cut loose and slid down to a resting place. From the gliders great trucks, tanks, jeeps and other equipment deployed. I must say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to hon. members that it was a spectacular thing and an historic thing for Canada. All these young men who were taking part were largely volunteers who were taking up flying and aviation purely as a work of love. They had volunteered to come out and take part in that great exercise which was called Exercise Eagle. The minister must have taken the name from the Bible because there is a passage in Deuteronomy which reads as follows:

> As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings;

These lines from Holy Writ are appropriate. So also are the verses which follow in the 32nd chapter describing as they do a land of promise such as may be found in the Peace river valley. The minister did a splendid thing in organizing this great exercise for the "young eagles" of the R.C.A.F.

I was present also at Exercise Musk-Ox because it was largely conducted through the top part of Canada and in my riding. I am sure that the military men of this country and of our allies received a great deal of information from that exercise and from Exercise Eagle and from other exercises which are conducted on the Alaska highway in northern British Columbia, the Yukon and Alaska. There they are working out a plan for the security and safety of the hemisphere upon which we live.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate most warmly, as I think most hon. members in all parts of the house do, the remarks of the hon. member for Cariboo. In reply to his question, it will be found at page 201 of the estimates this year that we are planning to spend $9,217,166 on the northwest staging route, and $7,567,283 on the northwest highway system. While these are of great military advantage to Canada, the principal user of both systems at the present time is the United States of America. The American forces, both army and air, use the highway and the staging route extensively. Therefore these constitute a substantial contribution by Canada to joint defence. There is no present intention of enlarging either operation, but we do plan to continue the replacement of temporary structures by permanent structures in accordance with the program that is already commenced.

It is a happy coincidence, Mr. Chairman, that as we are discussing the defence estimates of our country this house should be graced by the presence of one of the great soldiers of the commonwealth, Field Marshal Earl Wavell who, as a soldier, statesman and scholar, has rendered service to his own country, to the commonwealth and to the world.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I should like to comment briefly on some of the statements the minister has made in reply to remarks and criticism from this side of the house. In regard to recruiting he said on Friday last that recruits were coming in at the planned rate. If that be true I can only say that the plan must have changed considerably over the course of the last three years; otherwise there is something wrong with the plan.

When our defence forces were first projected in 1945 we were at that time supposed to begin with a permanent force of 50,000 men in the three services. This was subsequently cut down and we were assured in 1946, as I remember, that these forces would be built up; they would be in being in a short time. During the last three years it still has not been possible to fill up the numbers of the reduced establishment which was decided upon. Therefore if it was planned that they should not be filled up before this time we should have been told about it two or three years ago and not at this time; because we were given to understand then that the numbers in all three services would be filled up just as rapidly as possible. That is what we were always given to understand.

Then there is the matter of civil defence. The minister said that the instituting of civil defence plans or projects of any kind was a matter of timing. Perhaps we can agree with that. It is a matter of timing so far as going after them on a full-scale basis is concerned. However, I do not think that the idea apparently held by the government that there is not going to be any immediate need for civilian defence plans to be put into operation —in other words, they do not envisage a war immediately—should be a reason why practically nothing is done in the matter. It seems to me that a great deal more could be done along the lines which I suggested last Friday than has been done without running the risk which the minister seemed to envisage of the civilians who take part in these plans becoming tired and losing interest in them and the whole organization going to pieces. At that time the minister said that we could improvise a plan with the information which is on hand and put it into effect in a matter of hours. If the minister thinks the matter over I believe he will want to revise that statement. I do not think it would be possible to put a plan of that sort into effect in a matter of hours, no matter how well the plan was worked out. If it is the basic idea of the minister and the department to improvise these civilian defence plans and put them into operation in a matter of hours, then they need to recast their ideas along that line.

In connection with some remarks I made to the effect that in my opinion the military organization of this country was top-heavy and there were far too many officers and men at national defence headquarters and command headquarters and so on across the country, the minister merely had this to say: in the United States and in Great Britain they had similar difficulties. He said at page 1701 of Hansard:

> However, in making comparisons with the forces of other countries, I do not think we are in any respect worse off, with regard to either the overhead or the proportion of civilians.

That is apart altogether from the point I made and which I should like to emphasize. I said that we have such a large proportion of our actual forces in these headquarters' jobs of one sort and another, and in administrative work, that we have practically no fighting forces left. To begin with, the number of fighting units is small, and up to the present they have been very badly under strength, largely because we have such a top-heavy command and administrative organization. To say that other countries have the same difficulties, and that we are no worse off as to the overhead in proportion to civilians, is not the answer. On a proportionate basis I think we are much worse off than either the United States or Great Britain. I know that the proportion of people engaged in these command and headquarters duties is not nearly as great in these other countries in relation to the total number of forces they have.

This morning the minister said there was no more information given in the United States on defence matters than is given here, despite the existence of their defence committee. I do not know on what basis he makes that statement. My personal experience has been that I get a better idea and more detailed information from reading American news magazines and other publications from that country as to the American defence set-up —the number of squadrons of aircraft in operation, and the like—than anyone can get from the questioning which goes on in the House of Commons concerning Canadian forces. Whether it is as a result of their committee, I do not know—I think it is, of course —the fact remains that merely from news sources the amount of information given in the United States is considerably greater than the amount given in this country.

The minister has said a great deal this afternoon about the reserve forces, and the number of men in training in those forces. As was pointed out this morning by the leader of the opposition, the total number of men on the roll and the total number reported as training are misleading pieces of information. The minister has had some experience with reserve force units, and I have been connected with them for many years. We know there are always a considerable number of men who during an entire course of winter training will attend only three or four evenings. However, they are on the roll and are reported as training when they attend. I should like to know on what basis the percentages given by the minister were made up. What does training mean when applied in this way? Does it refer to the man who takes one night's training in a year, or the man who comes three or four nights; or does it mean the man who has attended on at least 80 per cent of training parades and who has gone to camp? Simply to say that 86 per cent of the men have actually been in training since the war does not convey a thing, unless we have this background information. My personal experience has been that the rolls are not made up as meticulously as one might wish.

I have one other point to mention, namely the state of training and equipment of our active force army units. This morning the minister said that the P.P.C.L.I. has equipment and training suitable for present-day fighting, and that they would be sufficient for any task envisaged. Does the minister mean by that that he considers one battalion is sufficient, so far as the army is concerned, to prevent any diversionary raid which we are told in the white paper, and have been told at other times, is the only sort of operation we would have to meet immediately at the beginning of any hostilities which might break out?

If so, let me say that I would disagree profoundly with the minister. I do not think one battalion in the whole of Canada is sufficient for that purpose. I would ask the minister if there are planes available to transport that battalion. Secondly, has the battalion the parachutes required to make landings? Does the minister consider that that one battalion, from its present headquarters, could be transported to any point in Canada at which it might be required rapidly enough to take part in a diversionary raid?

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member has referred to his own remarks about top-heavy administrative staff, and referred to the fact that I had said they were similarly concerned about the same problem in the United States, Great Britain and other countries. I also said we were concerned about the problem here, and that it is one which must be watched and followed up.

I got an interesting suggestion of one way of judging—and it is only one way—just how operational a navy or air force is. The same kind of test does not apply to the army. It is to ascertain the number of hours flying or the number of days at sea for each man on the total strength of the force, including headquarters and administrative personnel.

I am glad to be able to say that as regards the air force we are doing as many hours flying per month per man on total strength as they are in the United States, and considerably more than the Royal Air Force. We have not comparable figures for the navy, but I am informed that the same is true. The extent to which our forces are operational, when judged in terms of hours of flying or days at sea, is at least comparable with those other two countries.

So far as the army is concerned, it is of course inevitable that in a country of Canada's great extent, and with our rather complicated roles, we should have a relatively high overhead. For example the Canadian army maintains the northwest highway, and the Northwest Territories and Yukon signal services.

The geographical nature of the country, and climate, require that the Canadian army in looking after the reserve has to use a larger proportion of personnel on transport, supply and maintenance work, and the like. However, this is a serious problem and one which must be watched continuously.

The hon. member has suggested that we should do a great deal more by way of civil defence. Of course we are going to do a great deal more. But we do not believe it is the right thing to explode in all directions; we believe the right thing is to arrive at a sound plan at the federal level, discuss it at the provincial and work it out at the municipal. That process is moving on. We do not regard it as likely that an emergency will arise within the course of the next few days, weeks or months; so that my remark about being able to do something quickly should be taken only in conjunction with the fact that we do not consider the risk is great that we shall have to do something quickly. But should we have to do it, we shall be able to set up some machinery, because we have done a good deal of the early planning. From now on we are moving through the various stages I have mentioned. I was glad to hear the hon. member seemed to agree at least tentatively with the suggestion I threw out, that it might not be a good thing at this stage to get right down to the block organization.

With regard to recruiting, no one ever said or suggested that our armed forces would be brought up to strength at the stroke of a pen. We have had campaigns in order to arouse interest and they have been successful. We have got recruits at the rate we wanted them in order to keep our training establishments going at capacity. If we were to get recruits faster than that we would have to increase our training establishments which would force us to curtail their activities when we were up to what we considered was the strength we should have at that particular time.

The hon. member referred to the establishment set-up in 1946. Adjustments have been made since then, but the ceiling for the navy, army and air force at which we are now aiming is approximately the same as the establishment set out in 1946. Of that we now have 89 per cent. We are taking some recruits for the navy, but others are being delayed, and unless the present ceilings are increased, similar situations will develop in the army and air force at some period during 1950.

If we were to get a great flood of recruits we would have to meet it as an emergency, set up new training establishments, take men out of the active forces to do the job of training and otherwise interfere with the planned progress that we are aiming at in the building up of our active force and the reserve force. When I refer to the figure of 688 per month which we are now getting as a satisfactory rate of increase for the active forces I mean that with that figure we can keep our training establishments working at capacity. On the present basis we would probably be reducing the number of people we would accept.

The hon. member asked what test was applied to training in the reserve forces. The test of training is applied by the general officer commanding the commands and the area commanders in accordance with instructions from headquarters. The tests are much stricter than they were before the war and they are such as are necessary to enable the unit to qualify for the pay which is based upon and related to the number of men under training. We have in the reserve forces at the present time 1,200 senior officers who are taking command courses. I do not think there is a reserve unit across the country that has not N.C.O. and specialist courses. That training will be extended and developed as different stages are reached, but at the present time it is being carried on on a basis which I am informed is better than what was in effect before the war. I was not in the reserve just before the war, being in it only after the great war. In my discussions with representatives of the various reserve associations they have by and large expressed themselves as being satisfied with regard to the various points I mentioned in my earlier remarks.

I was asked what I meant when I said that the P.P.C.L.I. could deal with the situation. I meant that we calculate that one battalion of the P.P.C.L.I. in the state of training it is and equipped as it is, plus the other units in the state of training and equipped as they are, both active and reserve, would be sufficient to deal with any situation that is likely to arise at once. But of course the position will become more threatening and ominous as time goes on and therefore we shall be required to continue our training and equipping along the lines I have indicated. I did not mean for one second that the P.P.C.L.I. alone could deal with any situation.

With regard to planes to carry our men, we have a sufficient number of transport planes to enable the P.P.C.L.I. and the other airborne troops we have trained to do the job that is considered necessary at the present time. I do not say for one second that the North Stars, Dakotas and the like that we have are ideal planes for the purpose, because they certainly are not. We should like to have something like the United States C-119 Packet, but I understand that they are not in active production at the moment. We do not see that that should come first in the order of priority for the expenditure of United States funds when each plane with the spares and equipment necessary to last a year would cost close to one million dollars. The P.P.C.L.I. have the necessary parachutes.

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston City): Mr. Chairman, since I represent the constituency of Kingston City where I believe there is probably the greatest collection of military personnel in Canada—who include the R.M.C., the staff college, the defence college, the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, headquarters for R.C.E.M.E. and the Prince of Wales' Own Regiment, which is the reserve regiment, along with other services, I think it is proper that I should say a word or two today. After the hon. member for Cariboo has given us such a vivid picture of Exercise Eagle, or our army in the air, I think someone should say a word as far as the army on the ground is concerned.

I was in Kingston a week ago when Remembrance day was celebrated. During the parade I think the active and reserve units demonstrated that they have been efficiently trained by their officers. They showed that without doubt the training of the units in that district is being looked after in the proper manner.

While Exercise Eagle was held in the constituency of Cariboo I want to mention that it was my privilege this summer to attend Exercise Puncher which was held at Petawawa camp under Major General Foulkes. It was my privilege to go there with the sixth brigade headquarters from Kingston. Immediately on arrival at Petawawa camp we were briefed by the officer in charge and then sent out to work from the divisional level right down to the battalion level. The signals corps from Kingston had something over one hundred vehicles and well over two hundred of personnel. They handled headquarters signals from the divisional level down. The officers and men in all formations were assisted by the A.T. staff. They worked for three or four days and were on twenty-four hour duty as though they were actually in action, as many of them had been. It was not only a revival of the training which the average officer and man who had been in action in the recent war had received; but they were also instructed as to modern tactics of warfare. They were also under the guidance of very capable staff throughout the tactical scheme. Today, when the question has been put to us as to whether our money is being well spent on reserve training, I think it only fair to the department and those in charge of the summer camp at Petawawa this year that they should be complimented on their work, their intelligence and their industry in training our reserve forces.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): There are one or two items generally which are troubling me. I am not setting myself up as a critic of the estimates, because in a general way I think the minister is doing a pretty good job, but in listening to the debate today I was struck by some figures that were mentioned. This morning, for instance, the leader of the opposition stated that in 1935 we spent approximately $14 million for defence. In 1948-49 we spent some $252 million, and this year as I understand our estimates are up a little more than fifty per cent. In other words, taking in the supplementary estimates and the like, I suppose we shall spend about $400 million this year.

I want to say at once that I do not know whether such an amount is too much or too little. If war is imminent I suppose it is too little; but what worries me is this. Since coming to Ottawa I have heard the Prime Minister say he does not think war is likely, at least during the life of this parliament. As the defence minister mentioned, Lord Wavell is visiting this city. Just before I came into the house I was reading a statement made by Lord Wavell several days ago, which I imagine must have shaken this parliament. Let me quote just one or two lines:

> . . . Wavell said that he had been in Russia about two years in all, and he felt he knew the Russian people . . . Lord Wavell said he felt the Russians would not start a war of aggression . . .

Then he went on to point out, as hon. members know, that he felt Germany was the threat for the future, rather than Russia. Just before coming into the house I spoke to a young airman who had just returned from taking part in the Berlin airlift, and he was of the same opinion, that perhaps we were worrying too much about Russia and not enough about Germany.

If those are the facts—and I suppose Wavell could be considered an expert—perhaps we are spending too much on defence. As I say, I do not know; but I am concerned about it. Our estimates for defence are up fifty per cent over a year ago, if I understand the position correctly. I picked up a newspaper yesterday; I do not recall which one it was. It had pictures of some jet fighters that Canada was building; but according to the newspaper report those fighters were obsolete even before they came off the assembly line. Is Canada in danger of building a lot of equipment which will be obsolete before we have any use for it? It may not be likely, but there is that possibility. I am sure the minister is keeping such a danger in mind, but I believe parliament must remember that the huge revenues we have had for the last several years may not last forever. Such a heavy defence bill could become a real burden if our revenues dropped substantially. They would be an almost impossible burden. I believe last month Britain cut its defence expenditures drastically. I am not suggesting we do the same thing at this moment, because I do not know the facts, but I believe it is something we should keep in mind.

Our defence estimates are away up this year. I wish the minister would tell us—if he knows—what we are going to do next year. Is there going to be another fifty per cent increase then? These estimates put me in a quandary, I admit quite frankly. I have no recommendations to make, but they do trouble me.

Mr. Claxton: All I can say is that if you want larger active forces or more equipment, then next year the defence estimates will be larger, unless we can take the money out of defence construction or some other item of expenditure; because we are providing what forces we can with the money voted under this appropriation.

With regard to the newspaper assertion that the jet fighters we are building are obsolete, let me deny that at once. I am not an expert in aircraft production, but I am assured that the two types of jet aircraft we are working on in Canada for military purposes—the F-86 being built by Canadair Limited and the XC-100—not only are not obsolete in any sense, but are the very latest. The F-86 is the latest plane of its type, while the XC-100, if it is successful, will be well in advance of similar developments going on in other countries. There is one sense, perhaps, in which the newspaper account may be correct. It is often said that every plane is obsolete as soon as the first one comes off the production line. That is said in this sense, that by that time there are planes on the drawing boards or at various stages of development and production which will supersede the one actually being produced. In that sense it is almost always correct to say that the pioneers, the inventors, the industrial engineers and others are working on something in advance of what we have.

Mr. McLure: I want to ask a question under these estimates concerning the new armoury in Charlottetown. For some little time we have been promised a new building there, and now that this opportunity has presented itself I should like to find out from the minister when that construction will be proceeded with.

Mr. Claxton: I was there myself during the summer and saw the situation. We have moved one of the major units out of the existing armoury into what was called the gun park or the transport park, and that has relieved the congestion in the old armoury. I am also trying to arrange the transfer from the air force of some buildings which can be used by outlying companies of the various units in Prince Edward Island. In time we hope to have a new naval reserve building in Charlottetown. We need new buildings for naval reserve divisions at only three or four places across Canada, and Charlottetown is certainly one of them.

Mr. Isnor: Coming from Halifax I am interested in the item which deals with fire fighting. As the minister will recall, during world war I Halifax suffered an explosion which caused the death of 1,600 persons and the destruction of a great deal of property. Again in world war II we had an explosion which caused damage running into millions of dollars. I would appreciate it if the minister would be good enough to explain this item dealing with fire fighting in order to let the house, and more particularly the people of Halifax who are interested in this matter, know what is proposed in the way of greater fire protection for that section of the country.

Mr. Claxton: Fire fighting during the war and since has been done in different ways in the three services. In the air force it was found necessary to have service personnel attend to fire fighting because of the specially hazardous nature of the job they had to do in connection with crashed and burning aircraft. Similar considerations prevailed in the case of the navy. In order to arrive at a plan that would be reasonably uniform we translated the civilian fire fighters into service personnel, enlisting the civilians wherever they were suitable. In places like Halifax, Esquimalt and so on, we have considerable quantities of equipment and trained personnel which are available to look after fires occurring to service ships or properties. They are also there as a reserve for civilian needs if the civilian fire fighters are not sufficient. At such places, too, the service fire fighting service is backed up by a reserve of the civilian firefighters where necessary; they work closely together.

Mr. Isnor: Is the minister in a position to tell us the numbers in that establishment?

Mr. Claxton: There are 274 in the naval force divided into seven naval bases. The largest number is in Halifax.

Mr. Isnor: How many would there be in Halifax?

Mr. Claxton: Seventy-eight are in Halifax.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister answer the question I asked a moment ago? Has the general staff consulted at all on the statement which Lord Wavell made a few days ago? Will there be any readjustment of defence efforts as a result of it? I do not know whether the minister is in a position to answer those question, but will he comment on the statement?

Mr. Claxton: It is extremely difficult to answer or comment upon the statements that are made about Russia in every part of the world at almost every hour of the day. Yesterday a number of statements were made in this house about Russia. Lord Wavell is a person of great distinction who has had experience in Russia. He is not here in any official capacity but we are very glad to see him. All statements relative to Russia must be considered in the light of all other statements relative to Russia.

Mr. Knowles: According to the details for this item given on page 196, it includes grants for rifle associations. Can the minister say whether, at any time in the past, a portion of that grant has been given to civilian rifle associations? Then, can he say whether such is the case now, and if it is not is consideration being given to including civilian rifle associations within the provision of that portion of the grant?

Mr. Claxton: Those grants are made to the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association and the provincial rifle associations. There are a large number of civilians in those associations as well as men who have retired from the active or reserve forces. They do excellent work. We do not make grants to associations that have no service connections. Those were discontinued a good many years ago. It was found that grants to civilian rifle associations had no service advantage whatever. The men in those associations enjoyed shooting, and no doubt improved the quality of their shooting, but when it came to meeting an emergency it was found that their particular attributes did not eliminate the necessity for military training. They might be great shots, but they still had to be trained as military shots. Consequently, it was not considered by the government of the day or by subsequent governments that there would be any military advantage in making grants to purely civilian associations. As I say, however, all the associations have a large proportion of civilians in them and are definitely affiliated with military associations.

Mr. Knight: Following the question by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) about fire protection, I believe the minister will admit that fire protection, particularly in cities, has become an integral part of national defence. This fact becomes more evident as we take a greater interest in aerial warfare. If we are to be faced with atomic warfare, the matter becomes even more important.

In the civilian field, one sees in the press many references to the loss of lives and property due to deficient, insufficient or unworkable fire equipment. It is often the case that the municipality concerned was unable to afford fire fighting equipment which would have provided the necessary protection. I believe this government should place no obstacle in the way of a municipality purchasing such necessary equipment at the cheapest possible price. I do not know to what extent taxes are imposed upon the purchase of such equipment, but I do know that in reply to a question I addressed to the government on the matter I was informed that there are high tariff duties imposed on fire engines entering this country. I should like to suggest to the minister that he use his influence with the ministers of Finance and National Revenue to remove those impediments to the provision of proper equipment by all municipalities.

Mr. Thatcher: I do not like to be persistent, but there is one point upon which I am not clear, and I hope the minister can clear it up. It has to do with the statement by Lord Wavell. In his preliminary remarks, I believe the minister stated that the only possible enemy would be Russia—at least that is the way I understood his statement. Naturally, our expenditures would likely be made with that in mind. Yesterday Lord

Wavell, I believe the former commander-in-chief of the British armies, stated that in his opinion Germany is probably still the enemy to be feared rather than Russia. I am wondering whether the general staff is studying that statement to see what merit there is in it. We might be spending millions of dollars uselessly if Lord Wavell is correct. Can the minister give us that assurance?

Mr. Claxton: The Department of External Affairs and the intelligence branch of the armed forces are studying all such statements. We can see no reason for asking for less money this year because of anything we have heard.

Mr. Jeffery: I should like to draw to the minister's attention the fact that we have an unusual situation in the city of London. There is a large building for the training of troops in the city of London, which is situated on the main street within two blocks of the centre of the city. There is also a naval barracks situated on one of the other main streets, approximately half a block from the centre of the city. Considerable discussion has taken place amongst the citizens of London about the fact that the government is using this valuable land for military purposes. The matter has been referred to me many times.

Has any consideration been given to removing the armoury and naval barracks from their present positions? I should like to point out to the minister that I would not like to see them moved if they were moved to a spot where the army and navy would not receive an adequate amount of publicity, which I believe is necessary for the raising of the number in our armed forces.

Mr. Claxton: London is one of the places in which we feel that, in time, we should have a new naval reserve division building and that is down on the plan. I do not think it is of as high priority as some others but still it is there; and the observation that the hon. member has made will receive consideration. As to the armoury for the army, I shall be glad indeed to give consideration to the point of view expressed by the hon. member.

Mr. Harkness: I was glad to hear the minister's statement of a few minutes ago in connection with what one perhaps might call the role of the P.P.C.L.I. and also the fact that they have all the parachutes which they require. I should like to make it clear that nothing I may have said in connection with the P.P.C.L.I. in particular was ever intended as any reflection upon them in any way. I have only the highest regard for the P.P.C.L.I., for their state of training, what I have seen of it, their general morale and so forth. As a matter of fact, I am an honorary member of their mess. As I say, my relations with them are most cordial and certainly I am filled with admiration for them.

As to the matter of recruiting, the minister said that nobody ever envisaged that our national defence forces would be filled up and the recruiting required done, as he expressed it, with the stroke of a pen. I should like to remind him that a period of between three and four years cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be looked upon as just the stroke of a pen. This has been quite a long period of time. As far as I can see, the relative numbers in the army at least have been growing extremely slowly. There has not been a great increase, from year to year, during these past three years.

The minister also said, I think at another time, that our active forces were something like 89 per cent of establishment and that the establishment is close to what the original plan was, which, as I have mentioned, was supposed to be some 50,000 men. As I remember, some 25,000 of those 50,000 were put in the army; and as I have understood ever since, that number—the target, we might say, for the army—has been cut down to something in the neighbourhood of approximately 18,000 and still remains there. When the minister mentions 89 per cent, I should like to ask him if that is 89 per cent of 18,000 or 89 per cent of 25,000.

Mr. Claxton: The figures are given at paragraphs 91, and following, of the statement. Perhaps I might put them on Hansard:

91. In 1946 it was announced that the post-war establishment of the three armed services would be 51,100 officers and men. The navy was fixed at 10,000 the army at 25,000 and the air force at 16,100. In preparing the estimates at the beginning of 1947, the target was set at 75 per cent of these figures—a total of 38,325. At that time the strength of the forces was 32,610, which included a number of officers and men enlisted for the duration only. By September 30, 1947, all the forces had been put on a permanent basis.

92. Today the establishments for the three services total 50,359 or about the same as the 100 per cent figure announced in 1946. These establishments are changed from time to time to meet changing needs.

93. As at September 30, 1949, the total strength of the three services was 45,159, representing 89 per cent of the present establishment and well over the target set at the beginning of 1947.

Then I deal with the navy. The hon. member for Calgary East is particularly interested in the army.

95. The Canadian army, active force, with the present establishment of 23,034, has a total strength of 19,931. At the present rate of net increase, it is expected that the army will reach its establishment by September, 1950.

Then in reply to the suggestion that the numbers are not increasing very much, there is this statement:

98. During the twelve months ending September 30, 1949, we took in a total of 12,267 officers and men and released 4,006 by retirements, discharges, etc., leaving a net increase of 8,261. The average net increase was 688 per month.

For a country the size of Canada, I think at this time that is a respectable figure.

As to the situation with regard to the reserves, I have just asked for the position in Calgary itself and find that this year the strength of the reserve forces has increased by 17·1 per cent over last year, reflecting great credit on the units of Calgary.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

250. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $547,497,388, including authority, notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $401,942,006, and commitments for future years of $145,555,382, against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1949-50 will not exceed $339,442,006.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Under this item I think the Minister of National Defence has given the example of unification perhaps to an almost exaggerated extent. Under item 250, which carries the rather extraordinary title of "Demobilization and Reconversion", the immense sum of $339,442,006 is placed under one item. That covers training, organization and administration of the navy, the army and the air force as well as all the various other items of interest, such as the northwest highway system, the northwest staging system, and the search and rescue organization of the air force. But the process by which this unification was arrived at is found in the details set forth at pages 197 to 201. When the minister was speaking on November 11, he made this statement, and I am leaving out the words which do not apply; but they do not change the meaning in any way. As reported at page 1701 of Hansard, he said:

. . . it would be interesting indeed to hear suggestions that . . . the relative proportion as between the three services is not correct . . . but such suggestions have not been made during this discussion, as far as I know.

I propose to deal with that subject now and to make some definite recommendations as to the proportions of the amount of money which is being spent on the various services.

Just to keep the record straight I must call the committee's attention to the fact that earlier, on November 11, I made this statement, as reported at page 1669 of Hansard:

Surely we are not putting the emphasis in the right place in providing reserves and the expansion which is so essential.

Then I went on to say:

I suggest that if we are again to rely upon the expansion of essential forces we have to place emphasis where it is most needed in order to carry out the policy announced by the minister of meeting the enemy as far away from Canada as possible. That is not what is being done under the present policy.

No doubt it is better to discuss that policy under this particular item, but I did just want to refer to what I said on that occasion, because I went to some considerable length, I think, in pointing out that the weakness in our defence forces existed in the weakness of our Royal Canadian Air Force, and the reserves that were being made available as replacements for that particular service. I consider that the lack of R.C.A.F. reserves is the weakest point in our whole defence armour.

I intend now to try and emphasize that point and to show how we should re-allocate the amount of money which is being made available under this item for the training, organization, administration and maintenance of all the three services so that the people of Canada may get better value for the amount of money that is being spent.

Reference has been made to the so-called white paper. This morning the leader of the opposition referred to the objectives which were set for Canada. On page 11 of the white paper, paragraph 19, the following appears, which was read in part by the leader of the opposition:

The only kind of war which would involve Canada would be a war in which communism was seeking to dominate the free nations, in other words, a war in which we would be fighting for the one thing which we value more than life itself, and that is our freedom as a nation and our freedom as people.

On page 12 we find this:

Canada's services should be planned and executed so as to enable us to meet an attack upon the scale that would be likely to be made at any given time as part of a war involving the north Atlantic treaty powers.

Such an attack could only be launched by air or sea.

Farther up the page there is this sentence:

The most likely kind of attack from outside on Canada . . . in the foreseeable future would be in the form of diversionary raids.

Whether the only attack from outside Canada might be in the form of a diversionary raid is open to question. It is purely a matter of opinion, because it is a well-known principle of war that force is concentrated against the vital objective at the right time. The most powerful of all the free nations at the present time is the United States of America. If the U.S.S.R. are ever to achieve victory in the foreseeable future they must strike at the United States. The time that they will decide to strike will be of their choosing. It may be after the war has broken out for some time; it may be after they have lured American and Canadian forces from this continent on some diversionary major operation which is being conducted in Europe; and when defences of this country have been weakened perhaps the forces of the U.S.S.R. would strike at the United States and at Canada. On the other hand, it is quite possible that they might decide to attack their strongest opponent, the strongest country of all the free nations, right at the commencement of operations, at a time that they considered opportune, when for some reason or another, without any open declaration of war, they would decide to commence operations.

It is all very well for this white paper to say, as it does on page 11:

> The best way in which to achieve victory in any war is to defeat the enemy in his own land.

The Russians know that as well as we do. Are we to be the aggressor? I think not. I do not think that there is the slightest chance of this government planning a war—

Mr. Sinnott: Who suggested it?

Mr. Pearkes: I cannot see that there is much likelihood of Canada, in the early stages of a war, being able to reach a decision in the enemy's country. It is very pleasant to say, as the sentence goes on to say:

> The right place to defend Canada and what Canadians believe in is as far away from Canada as possible.

That is a counsel of perfection. Of course we should like to do that. We should like to attack, as far away from Canada as possible, the enemy's forces that are attacking us. But we may not have very much to say about that unless we are going to seize the initiative at once and if the enemy has not taken the first step as an aggressor.

I should like hon. members to consider a map of the world, not the ordinary projection but a global map. If hon. members will look at a global map of the world, particularly the north part, they will see on the other side of the north pole from Canada is the whole republic of Russia. There are two clear-cut approaches across the roof of the world. On our eastern coast, coming from Murmansk over Greenland, and perhaps over Labrador and Newfoundland and on down to the great industrial cities of the eastern United States, is one direct approach. At the other end of our country there is another direct line of approach which is clearly visible to anyone who looks at the global map. One may trace the route from western Siberia, over Alaska and the Yukon and down through northern British Columbia to the great industrial northwestern states. On those two lines of approach there are at the present time a number of undefended air bases in Canadian territory.

Reference has been made to our active force units. Of these we have five, three of which are regular infantry battalions and two reconnaissance battalions. We have been told how one of those infantry battalions has been trained as an airborne unit, and that the others are already receiving instruction in that particular type of operation.

This white paper however lays down that the role of these forces is to repel a raid. They are to be trained in Arctic warfare. I do suggest we should now place some form of active defence on those exposed air bases at Gander and Goose Bay in the east and at Whitehorse in the west, which are just invitations for any raider to come along and drop down at those points. There is no defence there at the present time. Perhaps following up behind there would be a small number of airborne troops in bombers who could land on those undefended airports. Those aircraft could refuel, and be over the great industrial centres in the east and in the west within a comparatively few hours.

Today we are flying heavy transport passenger planes across the Atlantic from Montreal to Scotland. The distance from Siberia to Whitehorse is no greater than that from Canada to Scotland; and in the foreseeable future those distances can be limited to a great extent.

I know the minister will say that Canada is an immense country, and that we have enormous spaces. I know. That makes his problem of defending this huge country an extremely difficult one. But I do suggest to you, sir, that there is only one service which can eliminate time and distance, and that is the air arm. And it is the air arm upon which we should be concentrating today in order to give a defence which is essential, and in order to prevent the possibility of these raids which the minister tells us may come as a diversion in order to carry out the very principle he has enunciated, namely that of meeting the enemy as far away from Canada as possible.

In this white paper he has said the enemy must come by air or by sea. Obviously it must. If it comes by air, and if we are to meet it before it lands its airborne troops, then it is in the air we must meet it. If the enemy is coming by sea, the situation is somewhat different. Mind you, we are told that the one war in which we might possibly become engaged would be a war against communism. We know that the U.S.S.R. have not a strong surface navy, so there is no great likelihood of large armies being borne across the sea.

I maintain it is in the air that we have the only chance of meeting the only enemy we see far from our Canadian homes. We must take advantage of the great mobility inherent to the air arm. It can move over great spaces, and in its movement eliminate both time and space.

When I examine these estimates, when I examine this white paper, and as I listen to the minister today, I realize the emphasis is not being placed on the air force. Time and time again in answer to questions of hon. members the minister has explained how recruiting has been going on in the army. I admit that the majority of questions have been concerning the army. This only emphasizes the point, however, that members of the House of Commons do not appreciate the supreme importance of the air arm in the defence of Canada at the present time.

I would ask the committee to consider these figures, all of which I have taken from various official publications. We are told at page 24 of the white paper that the active army totals 19,931, and that it is hoped by September of next year to increase that number by another 3,000 to bring it up, as the minister has said, to the objective at which they are aiming. Then, as to the regular air force—and, mind you, please do not think that every airman is a pilot; necessarily there must be a large ground organization to maintain even a few aircraft in the air—we find the strength is 16,356; and by December of next year it is hoped another 2,000 will have been enlisted. This means that by the end of next year the air force will number somewhere around 18,000, and the army around 21,000. The emphasis is not placed on the regular air force.

Someone may say, "Well, there is not a great deal of difference between those numbers." But if an attack is made against this country and is made by air, and if we are to meet it far from our Canadian homes, then the first troops to be employed will be those of the air force. The casualties in the first few days in that force will be much greater than those in any other service. If we are to meet the enemy far from our shores we have to meet him in the air.

Let us now look at the reserve army and the auxiliary air force, and the means existing for the replacement of active personnel. As reported on page 1698 of Hansard the minister said that the reserve army had some 39,000, but we are told on page 24 of the white paper that the reserve air force has only 3,086. A total of 39,000 for the army and 3,086 for the air force. I submit that we are not placing the emphasis on the essential arm and that what the minister has allocated in these items is not for the best advantage in carrying out the role enunciated by the government for the defence of this country.

Then I return to the contingents in the universities where we expect to obtain the future leaders. We find that there are some 2,618 cadet officers under training in the army contingents in the universities of Canada, whereas there are only some 699 in the air force contingents. Six hundred and ninety-nine as compared with 2,618. When it comes to replacements for the essential service for the defence of Canada, we are putting emphasis in the wrong place.

Speaking before the Senate committee, as reported in the Gazette of November 15 of this year, the minister said that we were getting new men about as fast as they could be absorbed. Then he went on to say, as he has said today, that they hoped to have another 10,000 for the reserve army. We need 10,000 for the air force far more than we need 10,000 for the reserve army. If the air force is not able to absorb 10,000 men when apparently the army can, then I contend that the whole policy has been definitely wrong. This is not the fault of the individual air force personnel or the individual army personnel. We all know that they are trying to do the best they can within the prescribed limits. National defence policy is made by the government and it is national defence policy that renders the air force incapable of absorbing more men than they are at the present time. This policy must be corrected because it is definitely wrong in view of the problems which have been set out and the objectives which have been indicated in this white paper.

Why is such discrimination shown against the air force? I can only assume that it is that we are slavishly adhering to the old traditional policy which I referred to on November 11 when speaking in this chamber. As I said, this policy has stood us in good stead for the last 150 years during which time the citizen armies of Canada have been able to mobilize and train after the outbreak of a war because the forces of other countries were available to take the first shock and provide the necessary time. In those days we were able to rely on the British regular army. Are we now counting on the air force of the United States? There are air forces of the United States stationed in Greenland and in Alaska. Are we relying entirely upon them to take the first shock and to hold off the enemy who may be threatening us? Are we giving consideration to the time factor which has changed so materially in the last 150 years? Will there be time for a leisurely mobilization of the defence forces of Canada?

I am not considering at the moment the setting up of an expeditionary force to go to the battlefields of Europe. I believe there will be time for that. As I say, apparently our policy is still based upon the traditional practices which have existed in the past, practices which were based on the concept of a Canadian expeditionary force leaving the shores of this country to go and fight and take part in the crowning victories as they have done in the last two wars.

Government policies are revealed in the estimates that are produced. Without going into too great detail and dealing only in millions and hundreds of thousands, the details of these items show that the active army is to be allocated $64,997,000 while the allocation for the air force is $44,814,000. The army reserves are allocated $8,939,000 while the air force auxiliary is allocated only $3,648,000, not half what is being spent on the army. Under university contingent training we find that $1 million is being allocated for the army and $363,000 for the air force. Again I say that emphasis is not being put in the right place.

I have been an infantry soldier most of my life and I have all the pride and tradition of marching men behind me, but I say with that background that where we are spending under these items $1 on the army we ought to be spending $3 on the air force. One dollar on the army and $3 on the air force. I have not had the advantage of discussing this matter with the committee; I have not been able to prepare details of the estimates, but those are the proportions in which the money ought to be spent. That is why I feel in duty bound at this time to oppose the whole policy underlying the maintenance of our forces, because I do not believe the people of Canada are getting the proper amount of protection in return for the money they are providing.

I am not going to criticize small details; I want to attack this policy from the broadest point of view. I ask whether the minister now has the power to change, within the item, the amount of money which has been allotted to the various services. In the old days with which I am familiar the minister was able to transfer amounts from one item to another. But I wonder whether it would be wise to grant the minister that authority, if he does not have it now, because I notice that in the estimates for 1948-49 parliament provided $2,753,192 for air reserves. I presume that in discussing those estimates we felt that was the right proportion to be spent in order to develop the reserves of the Royal Canadian Air Force. But according to page 98 of the annual defence report I find that only $1,067,496 was actually spent on those reserves. Was the rest of that money transferred from the air force to the army? Were not the recruits brought forward? Was the training not made sufficiently attractive?

I speak with the utmost sincerity, because I do believe we are following the wrong practice at the present time. The only explanation I can imagine for the emphasis being placed elsewhere than on the air force is that we are still following the concept of sending an expeditionary force to Europe. It may be that the final decision will be reached there. It was during 1914, and the enemy hoped it would be during 1940, 1941 and 1942. But in those days the strongest of the free nations were France and Great Britain. Today the strongest of the free nations, as I have already said, is the United States. Surely our plans should be based upon the defence of our own country first of all, and I cannot believe that any other nation coming under the North Atlantic pact could consider anything different. I do suggest that the greatest contribution we could make to this North Atlantic pact, the greatest contribution we could make to what was described yesterday as the common pool to which we should contribute by the most suitable and most effective means, would be to ensure that the approaches to the great arsenal of North America were protected.

I have referred to those approaches, from European Russia over Greenland and down the eastern seaboard of this continent, and the western approach from Siberia across Yukon and northern British Columbia to the industrial areas of the Pacific. What greater contribution could we make to the success of the strategy of the United Nations than by providing a great flank guard for the protection of those industrial areas and, if necessary, the movement of American troops to the continent of Europe? In so doing we should be at the same time defending our own country. I feel that our first task must be the protection of our own country; and when at the same time we can be doing a worth-while, essential task, one that must be done under the general strategy, so much the better.

Then, of course, there are the sea approaches to this country, which are vulnerable, particularly the Pacific approaches. On the Pacific coast of Canada we have no purely service air base; we have very few service aircraft. We have nothing like the United States coastguard system for the reporting of aircraft moving across the spaces of the Pacific, and the reporting of weather fronts as they approach. We have no aircraft carrier on the Pacific; the Magnificent is on the Atlantic. I do not know whether it is the policy of the government to provide land-based aircraft to search the ocean approaches of the Pacific, or whether it is the policy to provide an aircraft carrier to guard those approaches. At the present time we have neither aircraft nor carrier; and the cruiser Ontario, formerly stationed in the Pacific, has been turned into a training ship. That was in accordance with the recommendations of the Mainguy report, but she has not been replaced in her operational role.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have endeavoured to show this committee that I do not agree with the distribution of funds under this item. I consider it unsound and a slavish adherence to what I have described as the C.E.F. complex. Had there been a committee of the house, as has been recommended, we might have examined these problems and been able to warn the house and the country before this large amount of money was spent. What I have said today may have very little effect upon the estimates we are now considering, but the estimates for next year must be in course of preparation now; and I hope what I have said will be taken into consideration when next year's estimates are being reviewed.

I want to stress again that our first task is the defence of Canada, particularly our northern approaches and the vast air spaces over those approaches. No greater contribution could be made towards the preservation of peace than for our defences to be concentrated upon these objectives. It would be far better than making any plans for taking part in a victory parade that may be held in Europe.

Then, I come down to a few definite recommendations which really summarize what I have said. We have to have a fighter interceptor air force in being now. There must be adequate reserves provided for replacement and to provide for the expansion of that air force which must be in being now. I entirely agree with the proposals in the minister's statement concerning radar developments. I have referred to that at every session of parliament since I have been here. I have always urged the expansion of radar as our early warning and protective system.

Then there is the question of providing active garrisons for the defence of those essential northern areas. An aircraft carrier should be provided for the Pacific area or, at any rate, ground-based reconnaissance squadrons of aircraft might, if they had an effective range, perform tasks similar to those which might be carried out by carrier-based aircraft.

Lastly, we have to have protection for our great industrial centres. I feel that many of the units of the reserve army would be better engaged in concentrating upon the protection of those industrial centres around which the men live than perhaps in any other role that might be assigned to them. In the time that has been available, I probably have not been able to develop sufficiently the background which led up to these recommendations. I spoke on September 26 and on November 11, and if the minister and hon. members will read those two speeches, they will find the background to these recommendations I have made.

In dealing with this particular item, I say that if we are to provide for the essential defence of this country out of the amount of money that has been allocated, then transfers must be made from non-essential items to the one essential service which I feel must be put first if Canada is to be given any reliable form of defence. The minister has to face this matter with determination, and face it immediately. If necessary there must be not only a ruthless redistribution of these funds; but, if he finds the air force is not capable of absorbing this increased activity, then there must be a ruthless reorganization of the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Claxton: Not only would we have to have a ruthless reallocation of funds as between the navy, army and air force, we would have to have a ruthless redistribution of funds as between the Canadian people, the Canadian government and the armed forces. I can tell my hon. friend just how practical his suggestions are. I would put the cost of bringing about what he has suggested at roughly around $600 million a year for a period of five years, which would be spent entirely on the air force or the air defence portions of the army. I believe it is important for us to be realistic about the problem of national defence and not say that we want this and that when we cannot get this or that because the country cannot afford it. The problems of our national defence are to find out what proportion of the national income we should spend on defence, and then see how that can be divided as between the navy, army, air force and defence research.

Mr. Pearkes: That is exactly what I am asking you to do.

Mr. Claxton: To suggest that we should spend $3 on the air force for $1 on the army this year leads to conclusions that I must point out: My hon. friend has been most helpful in all his remarks and in his attitude. The one thing that makes me answer him as I am doing is that I thought he went too far. I am in complete agreement as to the importance of the air force. What I do not think he did with fairness was to show how much we are already emphasizing that importance ourselves.

In making a comparison of the distribution of the defence dollar as between the army and the air force this year, the hon. member read out the figures appearing at pages 199 and 200 of the estimates concerning the expenditures on active, reserve and officer training but relative only to personnel. The hon. member omitted from that comparison what was necessary in order to see the whole picture, that is found on those pages or the adjacent pages where the amount provided for the army by way of equipment, et cetera, $63,295,349, and for the air force, $107,986,455. The total provisions for the air force and army this year in the proposed estimates of $375 million would be $124,583,872 for the army, and $142,836,365 for the air force. In other words, instead of the emphasis being on the army, as the hon. member stated, we are spending very considerably more on the air force, and that by a considerable amount. Yet, the carrying out of his suggestion, which I cannot think he was making seriously, that we should now spend $3 on the air force for every $1 on the army this year, could be done in one of two ways. We could either do it by multiplying by three the expenditures on the army, which would bring the air force expenditures to $373 milllion, and which would mean an addition to the air force expenditures of $231 million, or more than is being spent on the whole army and the whole navy today. If we were going to do that this year, we could only do it by wiping out the navy and wiping out the army.

The second way we could do it would be by giving the army one-third of the air force expenditures of $142 million. This would reduce the army expenditures by some $53 million and reduce the whole defence appropriation by that sum, or it could be done by a combination of those methods. If we are going to have an appropriation of approximately $375 million, then we certainly cannot spend $3 for $1 for the air force as opposed to the army without wiping out either the army or the navy, or else cutting them all to the bone. That shows how practical this suggestion is. But on the other hand, leaving that aside, with a great part of what the hon. member said I am in complete agreement and I am much obliged to him for his helpful remarks.

As to the importance of the air force in Canada, we have no doubt whatever. Otherwise out of the defence dollar this year we would not be spending 38·8 per cent as opposed to 33·1 per cent on the army whereas in 1948-49 we were spending 37·7 per cent on the army and 32·3 per cent on the air force. In other words, in a single year we have reversed the loading and put it in favour of the air force; that is an indication not of a backward way of thinking but of a forward way of thinking such as the hon. member wants us to adopt.

Mr. Pearkes: It is not forward enough.

Mr. Claxton: He says it is not forward enough. Again, in this connection it is important that we should recognize the need not only for the right emphasis but also for some balance. May I read a passage from a speech by General Bradley. He said:

> When I speak of balance, I don't mean the dividing of funds equally among three services, nor do I mean an equation of so many ships equal so many soldiers equal so many air groups, to create a pattern on a chart. When I speak of balance, I mean effective forces equal to the tasks that modern warfare may thrust upon us. And in striking this balance we must include that which can be reliably contributed by our allies. We can upset this equilibrium by committing ourselves, not strategically, nor numerically, but financially, to plans which on the surface seem proper, but tomorrow tower over us in burdensome upkeep.

There are a good many morals to be drawn from that statement. One is this. Our present plan of equipment for the air force includes purchasing one hundred F-86A's with their necessary arms and equipment, going into production on the XC-100 and doing the other work, which we regard as essential, to maintaining the air force equipment at present levels, improving it, and bringing about modifications in existing equipment, lengthening runways, the construction of buildings for operational purposes, for interceptor stations, for personnel because we have to construct buildings for every group of men we now take on. If you take our present plans and project them into the future, we are going to get a relationship between the air force and the army which will certainly please the hon. gentleman; and that has been the course of defence planning over the last several years. But it is not going to be three to one yet and it is not going to be done without either making important curtailments in other parts of the defence program as it is today or else obtaining substantial additions to the defence appropriations. Again may I say that this work is not done by mirrors; it is only done with money. As I have pointed out, and as the white paper points out, it requires large sums of money.

In this speech, which was to congress, General Bradley goes on to say:

> Budgetwise, you will note that the 1950 funds recommended to the congress provide the following division of our defence dollar for the three services. The army, allotted 33·6 cents of the security dollar, has been steadily rebuilding, while carrying on the occupation duties to which it is assigned. The air force, given 34 cents of the defence dollar, has progressed steadily in size and ability, and the navy, allotted 32·4 cents of the defence dollar, stands second to none in the world.

As hon. members can see, in the United States the authorities happen to have arrived at a division of the defence dollar which is almost equal as between the three services; and General Bradley hastens to add:

> It so happens that approximately one-third of our money has been allotted to each service, but I consider this as only a coincidence, and may not necessarily hold as we continue to evaluate the capabilities of the only aggressor in sight, and future developments in warfare. Certainly any material change in this proportionate division of the defence dollar would be made only after careful and complete consideration and analysis of the roles and missions of all the services.

In other words, speaking in October, he does not indicate any definite plan for changing the allocation of the defence dollar in the United States. Here in Canada we have been changing the emphasis during the last three years, and our change is reflected by our spending on the air force 38·8 per cent out of the defence dollar whereas in the United States the percentage is only 34. Hence, far from our living in the backward looking state to which my hon. friend has referred, we are endeavouring to use the money that is allotted in the way which will best meet the needs of Canada in the order of priorities that are established.

We are not going to meet all the needs, and I hope no member of parliament has any idea that we are. No country of 13 million people with 3½ million square miles of territory can do that in this kind of a world. But we can play our part with our allies, and we mean to play a reasonable, sensible, fair part and to make our contribution much in the way suggested by the hon. gentleman. But we cannot do it all at once, and I am afraid that we cannot do everything of that character without cutting into the existing program for the other services or else having much more substantial sums of money. That is what we are face to face with in this allocation.

However, once again may I say that I am grateful to my hon. friend and I apologize to him for not having referred, before I sat down, to this part of his speech which he made on November 11. I had mislaid my notes; and besides that, sufficient time would not have remained for me to do so.

Mr. Fulford: Is it not true that much of this expensive air equipment, at the rate of present development, would be practically obsolete before it could be delivered?

Mr. Claxton: That is a possibility. But when we get to equipment of the type of anti-aircraft guns, at $600 thousand for each gun—completely equipped and installed of course—then I would say that we, with our defence appropriation, cannot afford many. We have one. We have it for the purposes of training, development and experimentation. No country in the world has many either. But that does not mean that it is not the best weapon there is in the world; probably it is. But it may become obsolete by the further development, perfection and use of rockets and guided missiles. How soon that will come we do not know. If it does come it will render types of anti-aircraft weapons of this kind obsolete in part. Therefore the question asked by the hon. member is a difficult one. It is one that must be related to the particular weapon, to our knowledge of what other countries are doing, and to our resources. Certainly, had we gone into the production of earlier types of aircraft than the F-86 or the XC-100, they would have been out of date before the first order would have been fully delivered. In these two we believe we have something which is up to date and which will take care of our needs for a good many years to come.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, on November 2, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Nanaimo, the Minister of National Defence, after tabling the Mainguy report, promised to give us a full statement and to tell us what steps his department had taken to implement the specific recommendations of the report. Can the minister make the statement now and tell us what steps have been taken?

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman. It would I think be most convenient if I referred to the recommendations of the Mainguy report by their numbers as given in the report. There are some forty recommendations in all, and if I may I shall deal with them in a summary way. 1, Manpower and material stretched too far. That is agreed to and has been acted on already. 2, Necessity for training ships. That was in effect before the report was handed down.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask a supplementary question? How many training ships have we now?

Mr. Claxton: Every ship is a training ship, but we have now specially set aside as training ships seven, including the Ontario.

Mr. Balcer: What is the type of the other ships?

Mr. Claxton: Destroyers and frigates. Then we have recommendation No. 3 with regard to the type of recruiting. I differ with the report in its finding on this. I feel that the recruiting advertising was of a desirable character. It got the men and the rate of releases has not been at all bad. Anyway, there is room for doubt over that and we are carrying into effect the other recommendations with regard to recruiting made by the committee.

Recommendation No. 4, Communal entry. We are willing to consider that but do not believe that it is appropriate to a navy the size of the Canadian navy, when we are up to strength in men, and must be even more selective from now on. Therefore, while this recommendation will be considered, it is not thought to be particularly applicable to meet the needs of the Canadian navy at the present time. 5, New entry training. Recommendation 5 (a) deals with kit shortages. That has been acted upon and corrected. 5 (b) touches on naval traditions. That has been acted upon. 5 (c) deals with improvement of living conditions. That has been acted upon. It is a matter of great regret that the members of the commission of inquiry did not visit H.M.C.S. Cornwallis before they made their report. Had they done so I feel certain that a good many of the recommendations contained in recommendation No. 5 would have been treated by them in the recognition that they were no longer applicable in view of the fact that from May 1, 1949, all new entry training has been done at H.M.C.S. Cornwallis at Annapolis. That is a fine naval establishment. I have seen it. It has good amenities and arrangements, good living conditions, and is in every way suitable for the job. The morale of the place is excellent. I have talked to the officers and men and have found them in good health and spirits. Therefore it is regrettable that the commission did not go there. The reason that they did not was that, at the time the commission was in the maritime provinces and in Halifax, Cornwallis was just getting under way, and there was not much for them to see. However, Admiral Mainguy, a member of the commission, was familiar with the scene there and no doubt reported it to them.

With regard to 5 (d), a booklet on new entries, that is in course of preparation.

Mr. Balcer: What is the average number of new entries at Cornwallis?

Mr. Claxton: The present course is twenty-one weeks, and they take in seventy-four men every two weeks.

[Mr. Claxton.]

The next recommendation is 5 (e), training officers. That is agreed to and has been acted upon. 5 (f) deals with the divisional system. That is corrected and has been acted upon. 5 (g) deals with welfare committees. That is agreed to and has been acted upon. 5 (h) refers to leave for new entries after their training. That has been acted upon. Indeed all of these: 5 (a), 5 (b), 5 (c), 5 (e), 5 (g) and 5 (h) were mostly carried out before the report was handed down.

In recommendation No. 6 the committee suggests that we should lengthen the period of training at Royal Roads. I have always been in favour of that and that will be done. It was to find out whether or not it was in the opinion of the inquiry desirable that I put a question expressly to them. On the training of officers they say: "That practical and theoretical work be more closely integrated than they are at present". We have a committee working on the consideration of that. Then they go on to say:

> That the training at Royal Roads should be followed by experience on Canadian training ships and that if Canadian ships are not available, a partial diversion to American ships should be considered.

We do not agree with the recommendation that there be a diversion to American ships at this stage. We cannot see that there would be any advantage whatever in that at that stage—that is, the stage of undergraduate training of an executive officer—to go to sea. There would be no more advantage in sending him to American ships than to British ships. We see disadvantages in both. We want to have them trained in Canadian ships. That, again, is going to cost a lot of money. However, it will be carried out just as soon as suitable arrangements can be made. With regard to men on advance training in British ships and in American ships, we are all for it, but at the later stage after the officer has been fully qualified as a Canadian under a Canadian training system.

Then the fourth paragraph suggests that Canadian officer entries should begin their practical duties as commanding officers with a background of experience and education not inferior in quality, narrower in experience or shorter in time than the training which has been given British and United States officers.

Of course I am in favour of that. And that was already in effect for all officers training in the Canadian forces of the navy, army and air force, except for two groups, namely executive officers in the navy and engineering officers in the navy, both of whom stopped their tuition at Royal Roads or R.M.C. at the end of two years and went to England for subsequent training. I think it will probably take some time for engineering officers to be trained in Canada because we have not got an equivalent system of training those officers here. Until that is developed we will carry on with the present system. But with regard to executive officers, I would like to see the commission's recommendation implemented at once.

Then, with regard to 6A, training of chiefs and petty officers: This has already been acted upon. It was acted upon before the report was made, and the new course was already in existence.

With regard to No. 7, change to civilian clothes on going ashore: That is something we have always been in favour of, but it is exceedingly difficult in view of the limited accommodation on small ships which largely comprise the Canadian navy. There is no storage accommodation for civilian clothes on the ships. However, that is under consideration.

No. 8, Canadian naval service benevolent trust fund: Here, as I understand it, the recommendation is that the officers and men should have compulsorily deducted from the profits of the canteen and paid into the fund a certain proportion. Officers of the navy regard that as impracticable, canteen profits being at the disposal of the men who make them, and I agree with them.

With regard to No. 9, confidential reports on officers and men: First, with regard to officers; that was already in effect before the report was made. Secondly, with regard to men; that is agreed to, and is being acted upon.

Then, with regard to No. 10, the desirability of having a laundry established at Esquimalt; this is desirable. It is a question of priority in building. Before we have a big laundry it may be desirable to have a barracks block. Whether or not that is so, I do not know. However this is receiving consideration. The need is recognized and it will be acted upon just as soon as funds are available.

Then, No. 11, living conditions in ships: That is in process of being improved. We already have under reconstruction H.M.C.S. Sioux, one of the destroyers. It is being completely reconstructed along the lines of American-type quarters, with separate living and eating quarters. We have also made a great many minor changes in the other ships to improve living conditions. There is a program established under which this is being proceeded with.

With regard to No. 12, barrack and married quarters: We are pressing on with the construction of barracks and married quarters just as fast as we can. This year, as I have indicated before, we have available for construction some $90 million. There is $40 million in the department, and even more than that with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We may not be able to spend all that because of the difficulty of getting the jobs under way. However, we have started on barrack accommodation at Halifax, and barrack accommodation at Esquimalt is high on the list. We are building married quarters as fast as we can get the land and services at Halifax, Dartmouth and Esquimalt.

With regard to No. 13, administration generally: We are in agreement with the report, and are working it out.

With regard to No. 14, the desirability of announcing policy; we agree with it completely, and that has been acted upon.

No. 15, liquor on board ship: The inquiry does not give any formal answer, but they recommend that the question be looked at. We are going to look at the question. It is not an easy one.

No. 16, kit upkeep allowance: The army and air force have plans different from the navy. It has been suggested to the navy that they should place their arrangements on the same basis. That is under consideration.

No. 17, free transportation: that has been provided in part since I came to this office, and we have had it under consideration since. It would involve a very considerable amount of money, and also would require similar treatment for the other forces. However, that is something of which I personally am in favour, and it is under consideration.

No. 18, medical care for dependents: that is done now, not as a matter of right but as a service at isolated centres. We doubt very much whether it could be widely extended in Halifax, Esquimalt or Ottawa because in those centres there are existing hospital, medical and dental services provided through civilian sources. However, in this field we are giving more medical service all the time in the armed forces to more people. This will receive consideration.

With regard to No. 19, dependents' allowance: It is suggested that the allowance be paid in respect of dependents in addition to the wife. We do not regard this as practicable or in accordance with general government policy.

No. 20, pay for good conduct badges: That is under consideration.

No. 21, responsibility allowance: That is also under consideration.

No. 22, welfare committees: The rule was in effect before the report was issued. The report, however, in drawing attention to this very important question will reinforce the orders which have been repeatedly given that welfare committees work, and the naval officers and myself will see to it that they do work.

No. 23, ship's routine: That is completely agreed with and acted upon.

No. 24, officer-man relationships: This is a complicated question. You cannot deal with it by passing rules. But with the general line of the report I think most people familiar with the Canadian scene would be in substantial agreement. We are going to work toward its fulfilment, but that will be a continuing process taking a good deal of time.

No. 25, training in "the humanities": That is already in effect.

No. 26, Canada badges: That will be carried out either in the form of shoulder badges or by some other definitely recognizable indication that the officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy are Canadians. We are now at work in devising the precise form of badge that will be used.

Mr. Balcer: Is the department going to take any particular steps toward the Canadianization of the Canadian navy, or is this the only step in contemplation?

Mr. Claxton: The most important step that could be taken would be to ensure that all the officers in the Canadian navy receive training to qualify them as officers in Canada where they are exposed to Canadian conditions and Canadian environment. And we are going to do that just as rapidly as possible. I think it will be done with regard to all. It is in effect now with regard to all groups except executive officers and engineering officers for the last period of their training, and we will see that it is done for them just as soon as possible. I would point out that at the time the incidents occurred on the naval vessels there were no products of the tri-service plan of education, which is now in effect at Royal Roads and R.M.C., on active service.

Mr. Balcer: At what date was the order issued to recall the Canada badges from use by naval personnel?

Mr. Claxton: I have not that, but I can give the hon. gentleman the date when the order was issued that the maple leaf be not painted on the ships—that was June 15, 1946. When it was drawn to my attention I at once gave orders that it be countermanded. That was done before the committee was set up.

The question of income tax involves matters which have to do with the general rule that all personnel should be charged income tax in respect of pay and on allowances that are similar to pay. Personally I have always felt that this matter should receive consideration and it has been actively considered over a considerable period. The report will accelerate this consideration.

With regard to recreational facilities afloat, there is complete agreement as to the desirability of improving these. There have been considerable improvements and we will continue that process. With regard to recreational facilities ashore, after having seen those at Halifax I believe them to be second to none in the country. Those at Esquimalt need improvement, but a new major building should come second in priority to a new barracks building. However, we should make improvements in the meantime.

With regard to films at sea, this is a matter dealt with by committees of the men. There is an inter-service film committee and a naval film society. More will be done in that field. What happened was that the choice was left to the officers and men on each ship. They pay for the films themselves. We think we should do more in the way of making educational, documentary and similar films available and also making it easier for them to rent current films. This is under consideration.

If I may summarize, twelve of the recommendations were mostly in effect before the report, four have been acted upon, eleven are in process, ten are under consideration and three are not considered presently practical.

Mr. McLure: The minister paid a visit to Charlottetown last summer and I should like to ask him what is the situation with regard to the naval barracks there?

Mr. Claxton: I mentioned this before, but I shall repeat it. We now rent a building from the provincial government but it is not considered to be entirely satisfactory. The provincial government want it back and we would like to build or buy suitable accommodation for the naval reserve division in Charlottetown. I think there are four places across Canada where we shall have to lease or build accommodation for the naval reserve divisions, and that will be done just as soon as priorities permit. There are 21 naval reserve divisions across Caanda, 17 of which have entirely satisfactory accommodation.

Mr. Balcer: Is it intended to have a naval division located at Three Rivers?

Mr. Claxton: That has been considered and it will continue to receive consideration. If there is real assurance of definite support we would have to give that matter sympathetic consideration.

I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, November 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, when we were considering this matter a week ago I had almost finished explaining why I felt it would be in the interests of British Columbia if this gas line could be routed through that province rather than through the United States. I based my argument on the fact that the distance would be shorter; that this gas would become more readily available to the towns and villages in the southern part of British Columbia and the great metropolitan area of Vancouver and New Westminster, and that the increased prosperity which would result from the line going through British Columbia would be reflected in my own constituency on Vancouver island.

At the present time we have developing in British Columbia a situation that is causing some organizations a degree of anxiety, in that employment is not as readily available as it has been in the past or as it is desired it should be; and the construction of a pipe line through the southern portion of the province would provide a great deal of employment for our people. It would provide our mills with a market for their products. It would mean that a number of construction gangs would be operating in that part of the country, which would give employment to the men in the gangs themselves and provide a market for the farmers supplying them with produce.

I do sincerely hope that due consideration will be given these factors. As I said, a serious situation is developing in British Columbia because of the decrease in the jobs available for the very large number of people who have moved to our province in the last two years. Any big construction project that will provide employment will be beneficial, and the net result of bringing and distributing gas to those towns in southern British Columbia will be an increase in the general prosperity of an area which is a long way from the main markets. Now that other markets upon which that part of the country has depended so much in years gone by have been lost, or have decreased, we certainly require other outlets for our goods. Only today in the newspapers we saw that Great Britain is going to purchase her poultry supplies elsewhere. British Columbia is a great poultry area, and of course if the poultrymen could obtain cheap gas for use in their incubators and that sort of thing they would be enabled to raise their product more cheaply and supply it at lower cost.

For all these reasons I hope due consideration will be given the advantages of routing this pipe line through British Columbia rather than through the United States, thus giving the benefits to our own people rather than to the competitors of our dairymen, fruit growers, vegetable producers, and so on.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to enter this debate, even though members from British Columbia should be more interested than any others. However, the other day I noticed a dispatch in the Vancouver Sun which said:

> There was protest again at the filibuster on debate to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company, which hopes to pipe natural gas from Alberta to British Columbia and the northwestern United States.

Then it goes on to say that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) had asked for fair play in this debate. After reading that, after listening to hon. members debate the matter, and after hearing a minister of the crown take part in the discussion, I determined to find out something about it, not only to satisfy my own curiosity but perhaps for the good of my own riding. I thought perhaps there was some difference between the bills which were presented to this house last session and the present bill. So I looked up Hansard for April 29, 1949, and found that the debate was somewhat less than intense. Hansard says, under the heading "Private Bills":

> Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley) moved the second reading of Bill No. 240 to incorporate Westcoast Transmission Company Limited.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

I found also that there were three other bills of the same kind dealt with at the same time and in the same way. So I thought perhaps the bills which had been presented by some of these paragons of reliability we have heard about might be a little different from the one now under discussion. So I looked up the statutes of 1949; and chapter 37, section 6(a) reads:

Within the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia or outside Canada construct—etc.

Evidently, therefore, the other pipe lines are no different from this one. They had been incorporated with the idea of constructing a pipe line outside Canada. I thought, too, that the incorporated companies went to the board of transport commissioners—so mention must have been made in the bill of the fact that the company proposed to build entirely within the dominion of Canada or within the province of British Columbia.

With respect to the Westcoast Transmission Company, I find the following information: Their bill was presented to this house in April, 1949, and the company was duly incorporated. On May 10, they filed an application with the board of transport commissioners pursuant to the Pipe Lines Act. On May 11, they filed a second application to build through Kingsgate, on practically the same route as that proposed by the company in this bill with which we are now dealing. On October 13, 1949, Westcoast filed an application for a new route through Kamloops and the Hope-Princeton highway. On November 15, 1949, the company withdrew its original application to build an all-Canadian route, leaving the application before the board for the route through Kamloops and the Hope-Princeton highway. Whichever company receives a charter, we hope that is the route that will be built.

May I reflect, sir, the feeling expressed by the member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) when he spoke of fair play for this company. As a new member, perhaps I should be careful about what I say because hon. gentlemen who have been here much longer than I know better than I how the business of this house should be conducted. I do not concede that the gentlemen who have been in this house longer than I know more about the spirit of fair play and understanding. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these people should be allowed, as were those who presented bills during the last session, the right to have the bill stand on its own merits before a committee. Then the particulars of this company could be discussed.

May I say that I am getting my information from exactly the same place as other hon. members who have mentioned some of the details regarding this company. The company has not presented one location for its pipe line, but has presented five different locations. They will tell the committee and the board of transport commissioners that those five routes will have to stand on their own merits. It is easy to understand that if a pipe line is built through the United States, as has been mentioned in this house, it is the cheap route from both a construction and a maintenance point of view. As a result, the natural gas which arrives in Vancouver will cost less. The company will say, too, that it has four other lines, each of which will cost more to construct and maintain. Depending upon which of the five routes is chosen, the gas will cost a different price in the lower mainland of British Columbia. That is the way it should be; that is what the other companies are doing and should do.

Anyone living on the west coast must understand the pipe line will cost something like $200 million, and that gas cannot be profitably sent into that part of the country with its small population, without the surplus being exported to the United States. It does not matter who builds that pipe line in British Columbia, the company will have to send the surplus to the United States. As a new member I believe I have the right to say to you, sir, and to the house, "Let us give this company fair play". I do not care who builds a pipe line into British Columbia. In common with my friends on the other side of the house, the hon. member for Yale and the hon. member for Kootenay West, I shall insist that an all-Canadian route be built. We will fight for that and will continue to fight for it, but that has nothing to do with giving the company mentioned in this bill fair play.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on this bill. At the outset may I assure you that before I sit down I shall endeavour as best I can to answer the charges and insinuations which were so freely dispersed in the house by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I am going to try tonight, if I can, to give the house a picture which everyone can understand as to what we are dealing with in this bill.

The natural gas which will go through this pipe line is, at the moment, produced altogether in the province of Alberta. I believe we should understand thoroughly one other fact, and that is that a capital expenditure of $125 million will be necessary. There is only a market in the western area for one pipe line; that is an economic fact which no one with any knowledge of the matter at all can possibly deny. Now it is said, and correctly, that various interests should have an opportunity of bidding, so to speak, for that business because all of us say how much we abhor monopolistic practices. Let us remember, then, there is going to be only one pipe line built.

The next thing is that this pipe line shall be built on Canadian soil. Before I go further, perhaps I should make a personal observation. At one time, I signed one of the bills as a sponsor. I learned a good deal about the thing, and after that I asked to be relieved. The gentleman with whom I was dealing very kindly granted me that permission. I am quite sure I could have done it, but I would not have done it, of course, without their complete acquiescence. What are we dealing with? As I said a moment ago, the gas is produced almost entirely in the province of Alberta. The Pacific Petroleum Company did bring in one or two gas wells a few days ago in the Peace river section which lies within the province of British Columbia. I am anxious, sir, that the house should understand that the market will absorb 200 million or 250 million feet of gas a day, certainly in peak times. This means that in the winter when so many people are using gas, 250 million feet per day is no exaggeration. We are not talking, therefore, about one or two gas wells; we are talking about 1,500 or 2,000 gas wells. That is what will be required to take care of the market on the Pacific coast, that is both the Canadian and United States markets.

We can rule out immediately any idea of building a pipe line to supply only the city of Vancouver. It just is not possible. It would be silly to even contemplate such a venture. Of course, no one will contemplate it, let alone do it. Now then, what is the history of this gas?

Gas was first found underneath the city of Medicine Hat. On the only visit that Kipling made to western Canada, he described Medicine Hat as a city with all hell for a basement. That was about the situation at that time. There was gas there. Private people and private companies were operating and drilling gas wells right in their own yards and producing their own gas because that property, as to what is on the surface or what is underneath the surface, belongs neither to the provincial government nor to any other government.

So the gas was first used in Medicine Hat. There it is produced from the sand. To give you an idea of what that sand is like, may I say that it looks something like a rubber sponge that you might have in your bathtub; but there is no oil in association with it. Then, in 1912, certain people who did not mind a hazard built wells in Bow Island, which is south and west of there, about midway between Medicine Hat and Lethbridge. That gas was piped to the city of Calgary and to the city of Lethbridge; and that also is what is called sweet gas. It comes from a sand similar to that which supplies the city of Medicine Hat. That gas was put into operation in Calgary. A distribution system had to be built, of course, but it was put in there in the year 1912. Supplies ran dangerously short, and about the year 1921, I think it was, the Imperial Oil Company drilled in No. 4 in Turner valley. That gas, as is the oil there, is not produced from a sand. It is produced from a limestone called the Madison limestone. In appearance it looks about as solid a piece of rock as you could get. While you cannot compress a liquid, you can compress gas; and nature compresses it to a state where it is roughly under a pressure of two thousand pounds to the square inch. The later discoveries, all those discoveries in the north and centering on the great and beautiful city of Edmonton, are found in what we call the Devonian limestone which is a later stratification of rock in the earth's surface. We must remember that many things happened long before you, sir,—and I say this with respect—were Speaker of the House of Commons. Nature has been operating for a long time. The Madison limestone, from which we get gas in Calgary at 6,000, 7,000, 10,000 and 12,000 feet, is the same limestone which is exposed away up in the air in those mountains which surround the town of Banff. It is the same strata, but with the tremendous heat generated in the earth sometimes these strata were thrown up high in the air—very high indeed. That is the Madison. They are getting it now, as I say, at a mile—and I think there are 5,280 feet in a mile—from the Devonian, which is a much lower stratification of limestone than is this Madison.

I mention these things for this reason. I wish to say and to lay it down as a basic proposition that gas piped in a pipe line is an entirely different matter from crude oil. Crude oil must go through a refinery before it is good for man for any purpose whatever. On the other hand, gas is power, and power which can be used; the minute you bore a hole through a pipe line containing it that gas can be used for many different purposes, and can be used immediately without preparation.

For example, just outside the city of Calgary we have an ammonia plant that was built by the dominion government. In that ammonia plant, in producing ammonia, which is one of the chief factors for explosives which were used all over Canada and all over the United States during the war, the gas is not used for heating purposes. The ammonia is extracted from that natural gas as it comes into that plant; and it is now being used to produce fertilizer which is today being sold clear down on the gulf coast in the United States. I say this in an endeavour to impress upon this house just what a particularly useful item this product is.

Much has been said about the route of this pipe line. In the notice of one of these lines now before the house, the applicants were extremely frank indeed. Under our law you must give a notice that you are applying for a private bill. This group say that they are going to begin at a point at or near Calgary, go down through the Crowsnest pass to Kingsgate and thence into the United States. My position will finally be, and I will begin with it now, that I am opposed to the incorporation of any company unless in that incorporation which is now being sought in this House of Commons that route shall be set out on Canadian soil. That does not leave tremendous differences between us, because the sponsor of the bill has said that this particular company, the Alberta Natural Gas Company, has five lines to the Pacific coast, ending in Vancouver. Those five lines are marks on a map and nothing else, Mr. Speaker. I could draw ten without any difficulty, and I do not know anything about surveying.

The point I intend to begin with and to end up with is that in this or any other bill we should have and we must have a route showing, broadly speaking, the course which this line will take. The right hon. the minister has said that it lies largely with the province of Alberta as to whether or not the export of gas from that province will be approved. He also told us—and both of these statements are quite correct—that, under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, he must give his permit for gas leaving the Dominion of Canada. He assured us, and I have no doubt that he meant every word he said, that he would see to it that Canadian consumers were taken care of first. This is not the first time since I came to the House of Commons that we have had a new Minister of Trade and Commerce. Much as we respect the right hon. gentleman who occupies the position, I think that perhaps most of us will live long enough to see another—and I hope he also will be a right hon. gentleman—sitting in his place.

The only way to protect this position is to have it in the statute. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, a railway company—and perhaps this is just as important as a railway company—coming to this House of Commons and asking the right to build railways in the Dominion of Canada and giving nothing more in the way of detail? They would be laughed out of the House of Commons. Well, the parallel which I give you is an appropriate and very apt one.

This bill says nothing at all—in its notice the other one did tell the route it was going to take—as to the route it will take. The sponsor may tell me that if they have to they will build it through the Dominion of Canada. I have no doubt that the sponsor meant everything he said, but knowing something about sponsors of private bills in this House of Commons I think that they rather lose their authority once the bill is passed. They are not exactly the board of directors who are controlling the enterprise, whatever it may be.

The minister said that if this filibuster continued he would see to it that the government assigned days for the discussion of this particular bill. If the government want to make this a government bill let them do it. Then we shall all know where we are, because what he said means this: "I say that this bill is going through this house and we shall stop discussion or we shall assign hours to it so that you simply cannot talk about it any more."

Mr. Howe: On a point of order, the hon. gentleman has put words in my mouth. What I said was that hon. members were entitled to say whether this bill would pass or not, and that no small group of people were entitled to deny them that right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I admit that the minister is accurate in repeating what he said. I did not endeavour to repeat it word for word, but with the greatest respect and deference, the minister did by clear and plain inference indicate that this thing was going through the house willy-nilly with respect to those of us who oppose it. I am asked to read what the minister said. Let us both be accurate.

Mr. Knowles: Do it in the same tone of voice, too.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): This is what the minister said, as reported at page 1806 of Hansard:

> I should like also to say a word about what seems obviously to be a filibuster in connection with these bills. The government will not permit any small number of members to prevent this house as a whole from voting on a private bill. If these bills continue to be talked out in the limited time permitted for private bills, the government will ask the house to suspend the rules and provide whatever time is required to finish the discussion and to obtain a vote on such bills.

Perhaps both of us will agree that I have correctly read what was said at that time. Let us carry this a step further. We as a house are entitled to consider private bills. What is the object of any member, particularly those who are not cabinet ministers and who perhaps have neither the opportunity nor the calibre to occupy that position, bringing in a private bill if it is to be treated by the government as a government piece of business? And that is exactly what is going on in the house now. May I add this? It might be thought by someone that I have other interests to serve. I want to correct that by this simple statement. I am prepared to vote for any gas-line bill which in the bill itself, which is the law, provides an acceptable route for the transportation of that gas. Having said that, I think I may be reprieved, or whatever the proper word may be, of the suggestion that I might have any interest in it.

The word "monopoly" is a hateful one. There is no doubt about that. But we do come to places where perhaps that is the only way that things can be done. I think of a number of government enterprises such as the Polymer Corporation in Sarnia, and some of these various things where the government itself has a monopoly. I am not quarreling with that. We may as well be realists in this business and look the facts of life straight in the face. I think something else should be done. When we as members of the House of Commons know that this market is capable of maintaining only one pipe line we should see to it in the bills themselves that there is no opportunity given to corporations, which not in this instance alone but in other instances may be brought here for incorporation by promoters with a view to selling shares to the Canadian people, that in the end result, if they are not the persons chosen to operate the pipe line, will be absolutely worthless.

These changes can be made. They can be made by the sponsors of the bill by a very simple amendment which can be easily brought in. So far as I am concerned I will not vote for any bill which has not got a Canadian route. Why, the position is so absurd.

Remember this, Mr. Speaker: the minute a line containing gas crosses the United States border we have no control over that gas. It is controlled by the people in whose country it lies. One may readily say that if such a situation should arise we will, under the act which the minister controls, revoke the permit, and authority lies in the act for just such action if he cares to exercise it. Well, it is all right to put something down on a piece of paper, and to take another piece of paper and sign something and say that is all off. That in effect, Mr. Speaker, kills the whole enterprise. Let us be realists again. This permission to export and to use elsewhere must continue to exist as long as there is gas to satisfy that situation. But remember, if the gas is cut off by the Americans, or they adopt some other method with respect to it, Vancouver will have been served. Vancouver, being at the tail end of the pipe line, is at the mercy of people over whom we have no practical control. That, I think, is the greatest argument for this line to be on Canadian soil.

Some people may think that in view of the attitude I took on an oil line perhaps I am being inconsistent. I did point out, and I repeat, the very great and distinct difference there is between carrying oil in a pipe line and carrying gas. I give you one illustration. In Calgary we have a plant using natural gas as its main intake product in the making of fertilizer. During the war, I think the right hon. minister will admit—and this is very much in his favour, because he built it—it was very useful. We do not quite know where the allies might have been, had it not been for the ammonia produced in the plant from which at least a very considerable portion of our explosives was made.

Probably I told the house that that plant today is shipping its product of fertilizer, with all the freight rates against it, and selling the major portion of it along the gulf coast of the United States. Let us assume for a moment that this line we are talking about went through the United States—and do not think I am talking a lot of nonsense. I know that is their scheme. I know all about it. Five lines on the map, it is true; but I have known this thing for the last eighteen months. I know where they want to go; they want to go through Kingsgate.

We hear stories about building it along the Canadian border. Did you ever take a look at the mountains they would have to carry it over along there? Even to mention the thing shows how extremely impossible, and even silly, it is. And so I come back to this, that I want to meet the objections everyone has made. I want to be relieved of any charge that I am favouring the Westcoast Transmission Company, I think it is called—or some such name as that.

According to the minister—at least I draw this inference from what he said—his view was: "Let us pass this bill. Is a private bill incorporating a company to be stopped in the House of Commons?" Remember, Mr. Speaker, that this pipe lines bill was passed. Remember that up to that time anybody, any group of us from anywhere in this House of Commons, could go to the Secretary of State and secure incorporation of a pipe line company or any other kind of company.

So in this case parliament saw fit to say, "If you are dealing with pipe lines carrying oil and gas you must get a private bill through parliament." Otherwise anyone could get a bill and then go and make his own arrangements with respect to the land through which the pipe line passed, and so on.

It was a good act; I am all in favour of it. But it came to this parliament—and what for? It was to stop this business of simply getting a certificate from the Secretary of State that you were incorporated and ready to do business. The pipe lines bill was passed in order that this parliament could pass judgment upon it, and say whether or not it was in the interests of the dominion of Canada that such-and-such a charter be granted.

I think that completes everything I have to say, except this: We are told that if this goes through quickly it will go to a committee, and that there in that committee we may ask these people where they are going, what money they have and what the possibilities are of their carrying out the enterprise. It is there that I take straight issue with the sponsor and with the minister. If they will in their statute tell me where they are going, then I shall know how to vote. If they are going to go out of southern Alberta I will vote against it—and I don't care who the company is. But in the north the story is entirely different. There we have those great areas in Alberta and in British Columbia which will be helped —because gas is power. Power is the thing the world needs.

In our oil fields of Alberta today we are producing daily the energy of four Niagara falls. I mention that to give some idea of just what power means. This is oil, turned into gasoline and used for power. Here we have a product going through these lines which at your home, or yours, or yours, or anyone else's, can be tapped. Of course there must be some sort of reduction to bring it to your home, because you would get your gas at ounces of pressure rather than thousands of pounds. But it is there, and it is ready to be used.

And remember this, that it is utterly impossible for anyone to build a gas line without building a road—and a good one at that. Because over that road you must take heavy pipes and all the fittings and heavy equipment. Remember, this will be about a 26-inch pipe—certainly 24-inch, or more—and you can imagine the size of that. You don't hook that on the end of your jeep, and carry it in. You have to have a road to carry it on.

It will mean more for the development of northern Alberta and northern British Columbia than any other factor of which I have yet heard, up to this particular time. And so I am not content with the assurance of anybody that so-and-so will be the situation, when in a few words the sponsor of the bill could put it in the bill. When that is done—perhaps I am hard to satisfy—then I, indeed, will be satisfied.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only two or three minutes—

Mr. Sinclair: That will be new.

Mr. Knowles: Don't spin it out by making interruptions—to answer the well-put but I still feel only plausible argument of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode). The hon. member's plea was that we let this bill pass second reading and go to a committee.

I wish to remind him and hon. members of the house of the fact that on a good many occasions we have found to our sorrow that if there is a measure to which we are opposed and we fail to state that opposition at this stage, or if there is some provision concerning which we want positive assurance and do not get it on second reading we are sunk.

Last year one of the bills which went through the house after some debate was that concerning the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company. I cannot find that anything was even said about the route of that pipe line—not here in the house at any rate. But none of us knew then that it was going to go out of Canada, and down to Superior, Wisconsin. In other words, this is the sort of thing we are up against. Things happen after these companies are incorporated which we do not know about unless we receive the assurance at this stage—and in the bill itself, as my colleague from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) reminds me, and as was suggested by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith).

I want to remind hon. members about another bill during the session of 1948, that concerning the Bell Telephone Company, which asked for certain rather substantial increases in capitalization. From the floor of the house we tried to get at this stage the assurance that there would not be any increase in rates. Appeals were made to us, just like the one the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has made, to let the bill go to committee, to let it have second reading, to be fair to the bill and fair to the company.

Well, the bill went to committee and a sort of half assurance was given in committee that there would not be any increase in rates. But where are we at the present time? The Bell Telephone Company is not only before the board of transport commissioners in a general application for a substantial increase in rates, but today it filed an interim application with respect to a surcharge. If it were in order I would take time out to protest strongly against it; but I note your objection, Mr. Speaker, and you are right, it is not. So I just register my protest. My point is that examples of that kind remind us, and rightly so, of the extreme importance of the second-reading stage of a bill. It is not a stage to be passed over lightly, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has urged. It is at this stage that we must get assurances with respect to points about which we are concerned, and that is exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express briefly my opposition to this bill on the same grounds as I opposed the bill we were discussing the other evening, the bill to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. I am not going to take the time of the house to repeat the arguments I advanced on that occasion. I support the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and oppose this bill on the same grounds.

I want to make it quite clear that we do not make any distinction between these companies. We are opposing this bill because we believe that at least the approximate route of the pipe line should be indicated in the bill. We are opposing the bill on the principle that Canadian natural resources should be used first to serve Canadian interests and Canadian communities. Therefore, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones):

That Bill No. 66 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house further consideration of this bill should be deferred until the house has been assured that the route of any pipe line built by the proposed company will be laid out so as to serve Canadian requirements before any such pipe line leaves Canadian soil.

The house divided on the amendment, (Mr. Herridge) which was negatived on the following division:

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Demobilization and reconversion—

250. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $547,497,388, including authority, notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $401,942,006, and commitments for future years of $145,555,382, against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1949-50 will not exceed $339,442,006.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister one question in connection with the form of these estimates. I remember that in 1945 the estimates were broken down, in much the same way as the estimates of other departments, into quite a large number of items. We had the equipment item for the army as one item, the pay item, and so on. I have been wondering how long it would be before the items in the national defence estimates would again be broken down in that way instead of practically all expenditures being put under the large heading, "demobilization and reconversion".

Mr. Claxton: Certainly, the title "demobilization and reconversion" has been out of date for some time and will be dropped. Consideration will be given by the treasury officials to the point made by the hon. member for Calgary East.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Would the minister give assurance to the house that an adequate portion of the naval training is being carried out in Arctic waters? It just occurred to me that there have been several instances in which different jobs have had to be done in the Arctic, and the Department of Transport has let the contracts out to civilian contractors. Would it not be worth while training for the navy to undertake those jobs rather than let them to outsiders?

Mr. Claxton: I quite agree that the greatest emphasis should be on the operation and training in Arctic waters. During the second world war the role of the Canadian navy, until the closing stages of the war, was largely anti-submarine work, convoy work and protection of coastal waters in the north Atlantic, which is not so different in many ways from the Arctic. Towards the end of the war it became necessary for us to co-operate with forces in the Pacific. We had an aircraft carrier on loan from the British admiralty, the Warrior, which was not suited for use in northern waters. It was designed for use in the more temperate zones. This ship was exchanged for the Magnificent, which is a winterized ship, and since then we have been proceeding with the adaptation of our own vessels for winter use.

Last year the first operation into Hudson bay ever conducted by the Canadian navy was undertaken. The Magnificent went up as far as Hudson strait, and two destroyers moved on into Churchill. We regard that as an essential part of a training operation. In line with that, a contract for a naval icebreaker has been let, which will also be suitable for use as a transport. When it is completed it will enable us to do much more of the job up north.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I gather the icebreaker to which you refer is a shallow draft vessel.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Wright: Has the Department of National Defence any idea of providing a base at Churchill at which naval vessels might effect minor repairs? At present there are no facilities in the port of Churchill for effecting even minor repairs to any vessel, and if Hudson bay is to be used at all by the navy some provision will have to be made for repairing vessels at that port.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid, sir, it would be too costly and uneconomic to provide shore-based facilities for repairing naval or merchant vessels there. Naval vessels can make considerable repairs with their own equipment and skilled personnel.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister tell us what steps have been taken for the protection of those northern airfields, such as Whitehorse, Gander, and Goose? Are there any troops located in the immediate vicinity, and if so what troops are they? How long would it take the nearest forces, which are available and earmarked for the purpose, to move to those airfields if the occasion arose?

Mr. Claxton: At the moment, sir, there are virtually no troops in those locations for the protection of the places mentioned by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). At Whitehorse, there are some engineers and there is, of course, a good landing field. There are some air force personnel there. The exercise which is planned for the early part of February will be related to that problem.

There is a considerable force of air force but there are virtually no ground troops except army service corps and the like at Goose. There are small details of servicing units. There is only a small group of air-force men related to transport at Gander. There is virtually no provision yet made for the ground protection of these places. We hope that will be worked out in time, but it is not there yet.

Mr. Pearkes: How far has the organization of the Canadian Rangers developed in the Yukon and Northwest Territories? Can the minister give us some idea as to how that organization is equipped and how many companies have been formed?

Mr. Claxton: There are a considerable number of companies and new companies are being authorized from time to time. The total authorized strength of the corps is 5,000, all ranks.

Mr. Green: How many have been recruited?

Mr. Claxton: I have not that information. The organization of the corps is proceeding, and it is definitely related to the sort of problem the hon. member mentioned in his earlier question, though the real defence of important military establishments must of course be done by other units.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister say how the Rangers are going to be armed?

Mr. Claxton: With a rifle, a bayonet, a belt and ammunition.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister told the member for Peterborough West that the department was receiving mechanized equipment faster than covered storage could be provided for it. Can the minister state how much equipment is in covered storage and how much is in the open?

Mr. Claxton: There are approximately 20,000 motor vehicles in the armed forces, and of that number there must be approximately 6,000 in open storage at parks and mobilization centres. Then, a considerable portion of the motor vehicles issued to local units, particularly the reserve forces, are stored in the open. There is less than half, but quite a considerable proportion.

Mr. Hatfield: Is this new equipment?

Mr. Claxton: This is largely equipment that was in Canadian hands at the end of the war and was not disposed of because it was kept for issue to the active and reserve forces or in mobilization stores.

Mr. Hatfield: Is none of it new equipment?

Mr. Claxton: Some of it is new, yes. We purchase equipment from time to time, but the only new equipment that would be out in the open would be equipment which is regularly kept in the open such as scrapers, road-making equipment, blowers and that kind of thing.

I can give the hon. member the information he wanted about the Rangers. Nineteen companies have been organized.

Mr. Thomas: Have the frigates in the Canadian navy been equipped with turbine engines? If not, has any consideration been given to doing that?

Mr. Claxton: My information is that no frigates in the Canadian navy were equipped with turbine engines, although the later-type frigates were equipped with higher-speed reciprocating engines. We are not contemplating the equipping of frigates with turbine engines. What we are doing is starting the construction of a new type of anti-submarine vessel, with turbine engines. That will be a high-speed, anti-submarine vessel of considerable power and speed, and of a new type which is being designed in Canada, largely on Canadian plans, but using adaptations of British and United States plans. Our idea is that, in order to cope with the submarines we fear an enemy might have, it would require vessels with greater speed than the frigates would have, even if equipped with turbines, and with quite different characteristics of draught, vibration and equipment.

Mr. Thomas: That is what I wanted to know, Mr. Chairman, because in the latter part of the war we could not catch up to the submarines.

Mr. Harkness: I was perturbed today by a short piece I read in the Financial Post which is dated November 19; apparently they are a little bit ahead of themselves in publication. I should like to ask the minister about it. It reads as follows:

When the Post began probing this situation,—

That is, the expansion of the national film board; the article is headed "Film Board Monopoly Facing Major Test?"

—it found that the Department of National Defence no longer uses the film board on "classified" (i.e. secret) work for security reasons.

As a result, films "classified" for security reasons are being placed by the Department of National Defence with outside commercial organizations.

This is actually now happening.

It is a terrific blow to N. F. B. pride and prestige; shoots the government movie monopoly full of holes so far as this department of government is concerned.

Apparently there is no chance of this policy being reversed until R.C.M.P. authorities "screen" the N.F.B. staff; declare them Okay so far as national security is concerned.

N.F.B. officials openly declare their intention of breaking through this barrier; insist that they must again be given a monopoly of national defence movie business, but there is presently no indication elsewhere in Ottawa that this policy will be changed under present conditions.

That is the end of the quotation. I should like to ask the minister if that is correct, what films are given to the national film board, what films are given to private film organizations, and who are the private film organizations that get these films. If this is indeed the case, it seems to me that it is an extremely serious situation so far as the national film board and staff are concerned.

Mr. Claxton: In accordance with the policy announced in the house some time ago, employees in government departments and agencies handling classified material are examined for security. Earlier this year the national film board was included among those departments in connection with the production and processing of service films containing classified material. That examination for security is still being proceeded with.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the minister has really answered the question, Mr. Chairman. Am I to take it that it is correct that the Department of National Defence refuses, for security reasons, to place certain filming in the hands of the national film board? Is that correct?

Mr. Claxton: That is correct; until the film board, like any other agency, private or public, has had its employees screened for security, we will not place with it classified material for reproduction or processing.

Mr. Harkness: I know that this film board is not in the minister's department, but I should certainly think that whatever minister has that department should forthwith see that these people are properly screened so that that department of government would not be cut off, for security reasons, from making films for the defence forces. It seems to me that that is a most anomalous situation.

Mr. Claxton: I can assure the hon. member that the minister has that matter in hand.

Mr. Drew: What type of film would be made that could raise any question about the affiliations of any member of the film board?

Mr. Claxton: Films that have to do with secret processes, films that have to do with research, new weapons, new training methods and so on, some of which may originate in Canada and some in other countries.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us what has been the cost in the past year of films for the national defence forces? I should also like to know what the cost for advertising has been, and particularly what the cost of advertising has been for the recruiting campaign which has been carried on during the past year.

Mr. Claxton: The cost of recruiting advertising for the last year was: for the navy, $236,246; for the army, $324,573; and for the air force, $282,931. The amount spent on films would partly be included in those figures, because some of the films were used for recruiting purposes. But the services use films now to a great extent in training work. Such films of course do not enter into recruiting expenses at all. The total amount spent on training equipment and films for 1948-49 is $238,737, of which a very small proportion would be for films.

Mr. Harkness: Has the minister the figures broken down to show how much this recruiting advertising works out at per man recruited? It works out in the total, I can see, to about $700,000 or a little better.

Mr. Claxton: It works out at about $65 per man. We have also of course again compared that figure with recruiting expenses in other campaigns and other countries; and I find that it is not out of line.

Mr. Harkness: Does that include the people recruited in the reserve forces?

Mr. Claxton: Just for the active forces.

Mr. Harkness: For the active forces only?

Mr. Claxton: I am glad the hon. member corrected me because at the same time we have recruited a larger number as well for the reserve force. Related to the active force recruits it works out at something like $65 a man. Related to the two, active and reserve, it works out at much less than half that.

Mr. Knight: I was startled by the minister's statement that certain films were not being entrusted to the employees of the national film board but were being entrusted to employees of commercial firms. What screening has been done in regard to these particular commercial firms' employees? If, as appears on the face of it, the minister is prepared to entrust these films to commercial people but is not prepared to entrust them to employees of the national film board, I should like to have some explanation. I may be mistaken in my understanding. It does not seem logical to me.

Mr. Claxton: I do not suggest for a second that it is logical, but apparently it was practical because these film companies who were charged with the job of doing larger processing work had small processing units, or relatively small processing units, that were not engaged in the same type of creative activity as the film board, and therefore it made it easier to screen their particular employees; I am told that the difficulty in connection with the film board, when this was discovered as it was this year, when the question of using agencies for processing films came up, was that with the number of employees concerned with the film board it would take some time to screen them.

Mr. Knight: I am to understand that the employees of these particular commercial firms have been screened in connection with the work they have to do for the Department of National Defence, whereas the employees of the national film board have not been so screened.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: When the matter was up before, I asked the minister who these companies were who are now working on what might be called secret films or films which might require security personnel for their production. Perhaps he forgot to reply and I did not remind him immediately.

Mr. Claxton: Crawley, an Ottawa firm, is one; and another, subject to confirmation, is the Associated Screen News.

Mr. Fleming: I think the remark of the Minister of National Defence on this subject is the most telling kind of indictment of a government agency that we have ever heard from the lips of a government minister or a member for a long time, directed, in this case, to the national film board. It will come as a shock to many Canadians to be told that the Department of National Defence did not find itself in the position to entrust to the national film board the making of films for the purpose of the Department of National Defence because the employees of that government agency could not be entrusted with it on account of doubts as to their trustworthiness on security grounds.

Mr. Claxton: From our point of view—

Mr. Fleming: It is not so many years ago, Mr. Chairman, that there was strong criticism levelled at the national film board because one Freda Linton, a notorious communist, had been a very active and prominent member of the staff of the national film board. I think most of us in this house had hoped that after that unhappy experience steps had been taken by those responsible in the government and in the national film board for directing affairs of the board to see that that type of employee was eliminated from the national film board. We are told tonight by the minister that the Department of National Defence was not prepared to entrust the making of films for the use of the department to the national film board because of lack of screening of employees of that board. I do urge upon the minister—he has indicated it is not his department—and upon the government that no time should be lost in carrying out such an effective screening of the national film board as will qualify that board to make films of the kind sought by the Department of National Defence and do similar duties for the government of Canada as may be required.

Mr. Harkness: When did the Department of National Defence start the policy of not employing the national film board to make these films?

Mr. Claxton: The policy was not started from any specific date. From our point of view it was not a question of doubt, but rather the fact that the screening which was necessary in dealing with processing and productions of this kind had not been completed. It has not yet been completed.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think that answers the question. I presume at one time the department did have films of this nature taken by the national film board, and then at some period it ceased to have this done because of security reasons. What I wanted was the date that they ceased to entrust this work to the national film board.

Mr. Claxton: Subject to correction, the department did not stop entrusting any particular class of work to the national film board. During the war this kind of thing was done to a considerable degree by other agencies, and some of it was done within the department itself. We have not given work of a restricted nature to the national film board because their screening has not been completed.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think that there should be a clarification of the position in regard to the subject, because it is one that goes beyond the national film board. When the minister's attention was drawn to the article in the Financial Post he indicated that the report was correct, that certain specified films are not being entrusted to the national film board because of the fact that they are being screened. We know what that means. It means that they are being screened for possible communists in the organization. That is the reason for the screening. That was announced in this house. The minister has explained to us that this is in keeping with the policy that was announced in the house. The policy in regard to the screening of the departments of government was one that was announced comparatively recently; whereas the statement made by the minister just now is to the effect that these outside agencies were employed for the purpose of making films, and that that practice has not been discontinued. These two statements do not go side by side. They do not hit each other. Either there has been a discontinuance of the use of the national film board for certain specified purposes because of the fact that they are being screened, or there has not. If there has been, then it is proper to ask when that action was taken, and when the activities of the film board in that respect were suspended.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid that the leader of the opposition and the hon. member who spoke before are going beyond the information I now have. My information is that there was no discontinuance, because this job was not done by the film board before; but that when the question came up of its being undertaken by the film board it became necessary from our point of view to have the film board regarded as an agency of the government which must be screened, and that process is still going on.

Mr. Drew: When did it start?

Mr. Claxton: My recollection is that it would be in May, 1949.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps we could get at this matter from another direction. I wonder whether the minister knows who screened these other people, Crawley and the Associated Screen News, and when that was done?

The Chairman: Carried?

Mr. Harkness: No, I want an answer.

Mr. Claxton: I would have to get that information for the hon. member. I was not there myself, I can assure him. I know of only one agency in the government service that does this screening, and that is the R.C.M.P. I cannot say it was the R.C.M.P., because I have not seen their reports. I would assume however that it was they, because it is the only agency I know of that does this sort of thing. These reports would be dealt with by the appropriate officials who, when satisfied, would proceed to place the business. The hon. member may take it that it was the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Harkness: In addition to that, it seems to me the minister or some of his officials must have the date when these others were screened by the R.C.M.P., and when the Department of National Defence was assured that it was all right to have them make these secret films. I think if we got that date it might tie in as being the same date they ceased using the national film board. Will the minister get that information?

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps we had better pass on to the next question while I try to get the information on this one.

Mr. Gillis: This is a matter which in my opinion the minister will have to clarify tonight. We have members of the press in the gallery, and it would appear rather ridiculous if the public were to read in tomorrow's press, particularly after all the emphasis we have been putting on communism in the debate during the last few days on external affairs, that we have a department of government with an appropriation in the estimates of some $2 million that cannot be trusted to do some work for the Department of National Defence.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is in the house, and I believe the national film board comes under his jurisdiction. It is strange that employees who are taken on by the civil service, who have written the examinations and whose character and background have been checked, should be in question. Their honesty and integrity so far as Canada is concerned are checked before they are actually hired.

It is most important that this matter should not be let drop tonight. I should not like the people whom I represent to think that I sat here and passed an estimate for national defence while in a state of mind in which I was wondering what we are going to defend, or who was going to defend what. Is it a fact that we have a huge branch of government entrusted with practically all publicity of a visual nature which goes out throughout the country, and into other countries, but which the Department of National Defence cannot trust to make films for them?

Surely this is within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who is responsible for that department. It it is suspect, he should know something about it. If it is not, then he should clarify the matter tonight in the house so that the press may have a clear picture to give to the people of Canada tomorrow.

I cannot understand how a minister can tell the house that we cannot trust a branch the employees of which must have been carefully screened before they were hired, and still can go out to private agencies in this city. Apparently he knows very little about how they were screened and who vouched for them. Yet he cannot trust his own branch. Surely the matter requires clarification. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply presides over the national film board. I have always had considerable respect for the board, and I suggest he should have something to say tonight about it.

Mr. Quelch: This seems to me an amazing situation. I would ask the minister if it is the intention to give this work to the film board as soon as this screening has been completed, and how long he expects such screening to take.

Mr. Claxton: We would be glad to give the work, such as it is—and it does not amount to much—to any agency that can satisfy the requirements laid down by the government with respect to the screening of its employees. From the review I have made of the file while the debate has been going on, I would suggest there has not been any sharp, hard-and-fast decision of the kind that might be imagined. As we moved from the period of war to the post-war period we naturally had many films, and then we began to produce some new ones. Most of these were not of a restricted or classified nature. Some of them were done by the film board and some by other agencies.

It was only with the announcement of the government's policy with regard to the screening of agencies of the government and employees of the government, and the general tightening of security regulations which took place more than a year ago, and which have gradually been overtaken and overhauled, that such questions as dealing with films which might be classified as confidential—and that does not mean in the top secret class—came up for consideration.

When that arose, the question also arose as to the possibility of dealing with the film board in sections so as to facilitate the speed of screening. Apparently there was some difficulty about that, and there was a good deal of correspondence as to how it should be handled. During such time, and until the screening is completed, there has not been any classified material handled by the film board. That is the position.

I am sure the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will say that the screening is being proceeded with, and as soon as it is completed satisfactorily the film board will deal with films of a restricted nature.

Mr. Fleming: With all due respect, I do not think the statement the minister has just made has helped his previous statement one bit. The fact remains—and it is as bald as any fact can be—that last May, because they were not prepared to entrust the making of these films to the national film board on account of security doubts in reference to the film board, the Department of National Defence discontinued the making of films through that source, and turned to some private concern.

That was six months ago. This is November. How far has the screening process gone? The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is in the house tonight, and it is under his department that the film board falls. In the intervening six months, the minister must have become aware that the Department of National Defence were withdrawing that work from the national film board. Has he taken steps to press forward with the work of reviewing the records in the film board, to make sure that those doubts are removed, and that all security problems have been resolved within the board?

This is a serious matter. I have already referred to the very serious question raised in times past about certain individuals in the board. I mentioned Freda Linton. Surely that is one place where this screening should have started. The minister has indicated that this started six months ago and I think the committee is entitled to know from the minister of reconstruction what progress has been made during that time in screening personnel in the national film board. The committee should be told if after that time it is considered that the national film board is now in position to justify on security grounds the making of films for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Winters: My estimates are not before the committee, but when they are I shall be glad to discuss the affairs of the film board. Certain questions have been asked as to whether steps are being taken to satisfy the Department of National Defence and any other department that deals with the national film board as to its security. I should say that the mere fact that the Department of National Defence asks for a screening does not imply that that department is or is not satisfied with the security which it considers should prevail in the film board.

Mr. Claxton: It is quite automatic.

Mr. Winters: The department is simply asking that the employees be classified. We have asked the R.C.M.P. to press forward. In reply to the specific question as to whether or not we are pressing forward, the answer is yes. We have urged the authorities to press forward as quickly as possible. As hon. members will understand, it is not easy to screen people on a relatively large scale. There is not information in the R.C.M.P. files on everybody; perhaps that is a good thing and perhaps it is not. I am sure the Minister of Justice would have more to say about this subject. But again in reply to the question as to whether we are pressing the matter, the answer is yes.

Mr. Harkness: When I asked the minister a little while ago about screening I thought his answer would refer to the R.C.M.P., but there is another thought in my mind. During the war we had a reasonably good intelligence corps, and I suppose we have a reasonably good one now. I am wondering if it was because of the recommendation of that intelligence corps that it was decided it was better not to have these films made by the national film board.

I know that some people may think that the defence intelligence should not be digging into such matters, but personally I take the reverse point of view. As far as I am concerned, if the Department of National Defence thought that the national film board were not the proper people from the security point of view to make their films I would commend them for their intestinal fortitude in standing up to what is described in the Financial Post article as a virtual monopoly as far as government film business is concerned. What part did the national defence intelligence service play in this?

Mr. Claxton: As the minister of reconstruction said, it was not a case of having found out anything; it was simply a case of having a job undertaken by the R.C.M.P. and pressed forward as quickly as possible. When a report is received from the R.C.M.P. or from the Department of Justice with regard to the security of any person in a "vulnerable" department, it is examined by the department concerned. In the case of the Department of National Defence, the examination in the first instance would be by the intelligence officers. I can assure my hon. friend that they are just as strict and stern about such matters as he would wish them to be. In fact they sometimes advise me in ways which he himself has felt might be a little excessive.

When reports are received from the Department of Justice they are examined by the directors of intelligence of each service, with reference in the case of special instructions and directives in difficult cases to the joint intelligence committee or the joint intelligence board.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I think possibly I should say a few words of explanation. This matter came to my attention when I was Secretary of State for External Affairs. Hon. members will realize that we have a number of exchanges with other governments and there are different classifications of the material we send out and receive. The question arose as to what precautions we were taking to secure secrecy in such matters as might be considered secret or confidential, and there are various classifications. At that time the matter was considered carefully and it is still being considered carefully.

At times there have been what might be considered as leakages, not in connection with external affairs but in connection with our own domestic matters. Sometimes we read in the newspapers speculative stories that come near to what has been discussed in secret cabinet meetings. Then there are leakages of information in the sense that something sometimes becomes public before the agreed time when it was to become public. Because of that and to satisfy ourselves and those from whom we received and to whom we sent material it was felt that we should have a system that we could look upon as being secure.

When we went into the matter we came to the conclusion that this security should extend, not only to the Department of External Affairs and the Prime Minister's office but to the other departments to which documents of these various classifications were sent. It was felt that all those who were to have access to this material should be vouched for by the deputy head of the department.

The statement is made that the screening is done by the R.C.M.P. The R.C.M.P. does not make any decision about any individual. The R.CM.P. obtains a factual report and communicates it to the responsible deputy head of the department where the man is employed. Then the deputy head or the minister of that department must take the responsibility of saying whether or not that civil servant can be entrusted with classified material. That system has been extended to the Department of National Defence as it has to other departments that have access to material thus classified. Until the responsible head of a branch of government is prepared to say that he takes the responsibility for having secret documents entrusted to so-and-so, it is not done; and that process has not been completed with respect to the film board.

Hon. members will realize that we have to be careful. We do not want to do anything unfair relative to any individual. This is not a snooping process to undermine the character of anyone. It is being done in order to place the responsible head of each department in a position where he personally can vouch for all those who have access to the confidential material coming into his department. The R.C.M.P. were very reluctant even to go about securing the information, and it was found necessary to say to them, "Well, you will not have to make the decision. You just get a factual report and submit it to the permanent head of the department concerned. He will make the decision as to whether from that factual report he is satisfied that he can vouch for the person concerned." Not a large number of the personnel of the R.C.M.P. are engaged on that work, because it is rather disagreeable to anyone to have it said that he is being investigated. So it is being proceeded with in a discreet manner that will enable a responsible official of the mounted police to say, "This is all we can find out about this man." Then the responsible head of the department has to say whether that is enough for him to take the responsibility of entrusting that man with classified material. That is being done in connection with all those who in the normal course of the exercise of their functions would have access to confidential material.

Mr. Drew: In view of the remarks of the Prime Minister I think it would be appropriate for us to be told if there are any other departments which at the present time are having outside agencies do the work they ordinarily would do because any branch of those departments is being screened in this way.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know of any other; but I do know that it is not everyone in my own office, as it is not everyone in the Department of External Affairs, to whom confidential material is entrusted. It is to those who have been screened, those for whom the head of the department feels he can take the responsibility of saying that it is not unfair to those who look to us to maintain proper security that the documents be entrusted.

Mr. Claxton: In reply to the leader of the opposition I think it should be made clear, too, that there has been no switch from the film board to the Crawley firm or to Associated Screen News. When the work of post-war organization was being proceeded with it was felt at a certain stage that the film board came within the class of government agencies which should be screened, and that work is being proceeded with. Mind you, the Department of National Defence, the Department of External Affairs and all government agencies concerned with restricted material are screened in this way.

Mr. Drew: I could not help overhearing one hon. member remark that this was making a mountain out of a molehill. It is not. This is a most unusual situation. The Minister of National Defence has just explained that there has been no withdrawal of work on this particular type of film from the national film board but that it is a continuation of work which was being done by two outside firms whose names he has mentioned, who are well known and highly reputable business concerns. If that is the case it is difficult to understand how this situation is related to the screening process which was undertaken a year ago, and which the minister has already given as the reason for the fact that the national film board is not doing this particular task.

Again, it does seem this is the sort of thing on which we should have a perfectly clear understanding. Either this work is not being done by the national film board because the national film board is being screened, or that is not the case. The last explanation given by the minister is simply to the effect that work is still being done which at an earlier date was entrusted to these two outside agencies. I think we should know whether or not some action has been taken in relation to this screening.

Mr. Claxton: Both statements are correct, and they are not irreconcilable. The work is not being done by the national film board because it is being screened, and the work is continuing to be done by outside agencies which have been screened. The amount of work in question is very small indeed, which is probably one reason why the matter did not come to the fore earlier.

Mr. Drew: That is one reason why this is a subject which should be thoroughly discussed while these estimates are before the committee. It will be recalled that one of the recommendations of the Mainguy report was that greater use be made of the national film board for the purpose of films to be used in the naval service. Every hon. member of this committee remembers the ancient Chinese adage that one picture tells a more complete story than a thousand words. That is perhaps even more true in the case of the moving picture than the still picture. Not only from the point of view of entertainment and recreation but from the point of view of instruction the moving picture film is of immense value. If the national film board is not being called in, or this work done by outside agencies has reached any substantial proportions, then I should say very definitely that here is one detail in connection with our national defence preparations which is not being properly carried out. There is no way by which many of the details of instruction can be better brought to the personnel of the army, the navy or the air force than by motion pictures, particularly in the case of parts, equipment and things of that kind and the placing of them together. By means of slow-motion pictures a very clear explanation can be given of all the details.

I do think this should not be left in the vague position it is in at the present time, because it raises another question in the mind of everyone here. If the fact that the national film board is being screened is the reason why it is not being entrusted with the taking of pictures which the minister has stated are not top secret but are at the secret level, then how can he explain the fact that other agencies of government which also are being screened nevertheless are carrying on their normal activities? As far as this committee is aware no other branch of any other department has been withdrawn from its ordinary functions, because of being screened, as is the case with the national film board. Either there must be some special reason in this case, or this whole system of screening may well create difficulties in different departments which had not been anticipated at the time it was announced.

I would point out, as the Prime Minister said, that in his department as in every other department naturally there are certain people who would be particularly designated to carry out certain highly secret or important discussions. It would seem that it would not be a very difficult thing to designate a limited number of employees of the national film board to carry out this particular type of work, in any case where there is some measure of secrecy. I think the explanation just does not hold water, and we should know what the facts really are.

Mr. St. Laurent: I believe the hon. leader of the opposition is under a misapprehension. We are told by our security committee that it will be necessary to have all those employed by the film board who could possibly have access to confidential material screened, before it will be proper to entrust that board with the preparation of classified material. Because it is felt that it would be the proper thing to have all this work or as much of it as possible done by the government agency, this screening is undertaken. It is intended to have the film board certified to be in a position, or have them get into a position, where the classified material can be entrusted to them.

Mr. Wright: This seems to me to raise a serious question, when one department of the government cannot be trusted to do certain work and private firms can be trusted. I should like to know what steps the government has taken to screen those private firms that are doing this secret work. The employees of those companies are not the employees of the government, and the government has no control over them. If this work is of such a nature that the film board cannot be entrusted with it, I should like to know how these private firms can be trusted and what screening of these companies has been done which gives the government the confidence that these firms can carry out the work without any danger to our security.

Mr. Claxton: I can answer that question in a way that will help to make this clear. During the war the national film board had a great deal of work to do in connection with war information. As hon. members know, it produced all sorts of films of an informational character. The type of film that we are talking about here, the restricted or secret film, was handed to other agencies than the film board, not for reasons of security but for reasons of convenience at that stage. That situation still continues. The film board still does the great bulk of the work for all government agencies, including the armed forces, work of a training character, an informational character and publicity character.

With regard to this relatively small restricted class of material, the arrangements which existed during the war are being continued, pending the clearing of the employees of the film board for security.

Mr. Wright: The minister has not yet answered my question as to the method used by the government in screening the employees of the private firms. How do you screen the employees of the private firm?

Mr. St. Laurent: The answer is that the firm takes the responsibility for certifying that secrecy will be observed, whilst in the government department a deputy head takes the responsibility for certifying that so-and-so, whom he knows personally, is well enough known to him that he does not have to be screened. There are others about whom the deputy head has not sufficient knowledge to take the responsibility of certifying to us that he can be entrusted with confidential documents. With respect to those people, we asked to have a report made by an investigator of the R.C.M.P. and submitted to the deputy head. On that report the deputy head can say whether or not he will take the responsibility of vouching for that member of his staff.

Mr. Harkness: If I understand the Prime Minister correctly, his remarks have given us a considerably different picture. The Minister of National Defence told us that the film board people were being screened, and that he would receive information about the employees of the private firms who were also being screened by the R.C.M.P. If I understand the Prime Minister correctly the R.C.M.P. did not do any screening at all; they merely got information about certain people—

Mr. St. Laurent: That is what we call "screening".

Mr. Harkness: Then, that information was turned over to the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Public Works or whoever it may be. It is then up to that minister and his officials to make a decision as to whether or not those people should be entrusted with any secret work. If that is the situation, then so far as I can see the R.C.M.P. must have turned in to the Department of National Defence information in connection with certain persons in the film board, and as a result of that information the defence department people said, "No, we will not have those people do any secret pictures for us." That is the situation as I see it at the moment. Is that correct?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is only partially correct. It is not as a result of having seen reports that were unfavourable; it is due to the fact that enough reports have not been seen to say that the whole board is certified for security purposes. In the story the hon. member read from the Financial Post, you have an example of the fact that there is leakage. It was not intended to publish this, and I do not think it is in the public interest that it should be published and discussed here. It is something that we would have preferred not to see published, but it has leaked out. How, we do not know. Where the newspaperman got his informaion, we do not know. We are inclined to believe he did not get it from the officials of the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Harkness: Would the Prime Minister not agree with me that this is the sort of information that members of parliament should be given, if there exists a department of this government to which another department is not willing to entrust secret work? It seems to me it is a matter which calls for some parliamentary discussion. I can hardly see the Prime Minister's point that matters of this sort should be kept from us, and of course, generally speaking, from the people of Canada.

If it happened to be such a matter as perhaps should not be made public, then I would suggest once more that the committee for which we have been pressing would have been the proper place to give that information.

Mr. Knight: We seem to be getting away from these commercial firms. It would banish some confusion and certainly in my own mind if the minister would say whether, in putting the work in the hands of these commercial firms, there was any other consideration except that of secrecy?

Mr. Claxton: I believe, sir, at the time the work was first put there, it was put there because this was work—

Mr. Knight: I am not speaking of wartime when everyone was very busy.

Mr. Claxton: Since then the work has been put there because we were continuing to follow the patterns established during the war.

Mr. Knowles: A few moments ago the Prime Minister expressed the view that the government would have preferred not to have this matter discussed and publicized in this way, but he admitted it is now out in the full view of the public. It seems to me that the matter becomes worse as the discussion continues. Is the Prime Minister willing to leave it to the press now to say that the government is prepared to accept the word of the heads of private film organizations that there is no danger to security in employing them, but is not prepared to trust its own film board? It boils down to that, as the matter now stands.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, that is not the situation. It is known that these private firms have been doing work of that character for a good many years. There has been no suggestion that absolute secrecy was not being observed. The question arose as to whether the work should not be taken away from them and all be given to the film board. The decision was that that would not be done until the minister responsible for the film board had had reports that satisfied him that for security purposes we could vouch for the film board.

Mr. Pearkes: I think, Mr. Chairman, you will see some of the difficulties which the minister experiences with this policy of unification, because I now want to discuss quite a different subject, that of the air force.

Mr. St. Laurent: Before the hon. member passes on to that subject, may I just add a word. I am saying that I regret that this matter has become public, not because it is embarrassing to the government but because I think it is unfortunate that there should be any impression—and there will be such an impression—that those who are in the employ of the board are under a cloud. I think it is unfortunate that they should be under a cloud. We were endeavouring to proceed in such a manner as to obtain certification without anyone going under a cloud. This premature publicity, before we are in a position to make a positive statement that each one has been examined and that we are prepared to vouch for each one, is unfortunate; it is unfortunate that any cloud should be resting on the group.

Mr. Quelch: Until the Prime Minister made his statement, I thought I understood the situation. The Prime Minister now says that work is given to firms where assurance is given that secrecy will be maintained. In other words, screening is not required. But earlier the Minister of National Defence said that this work is given to firms whose employees have already been screened. Can we say definitely that firms that are doing the work today have screened their employees? The Minister of National Defence said that they had; the Prime Minister says no; that they only required an assurance.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I do not say that they have not been screened; I say that I do not know. I say that, as far as I was concerned, that work was continued because it had been done during the period of the war and no untoward incidents that I know of had happened at that time. I cannot say that every individual employed by those firms has been screened. As far as I know, we were relying on the firm and not upon a decision of our own; whilst with respect to the film board, we will look to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to say to us that he has satisfied himself that we can vouch, to those from whom we get and to whom we supply secret material, that all those having access to it can be trusted.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister said that there is no evidence that they know of any untoward incident—

Mr. St. Laurent: No.

Mr. Knowles: —on the part of employees of the private firms.

Mr. St. Laurent: Nor of the film board.

Mr. Knowles: That is the question I wanted to ask.

Mr. St. Laurent: Nor of the film board.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the Prime Minister through?

Mr. St. Laurent: I apologize for having broken in, but I thought it was only fair to these employees of the film board that I should endeavour to put the situation as right as it can be put at this moment.

Mr. Quelch: Will the Prime Minister say why, all of a sudden, the government has ceased to trust the employees of the film board? He says that nothing has come out, that nothing has been divulged. Why do they suddenly not trust those employees?

Mr. St. Laurent: Up to the present time they have never done any of this confidential work. The question arose as to whether they should not be required to do it instead of our continuing to have it done by the firms which had been doing it. Before coming to that conclusion, we want the minister responsible to say to us that he has satisfied himself that we can vouch, to those who send us confidential material and to whom we supply confidential material, that all the members of the film board can be trusted with confidential material. That investigation has not yet been proceeded with to the extent that our colleague is prepared to take that responsibility to us, and we are therefore not prepared to take it with those with whom we are associated in exchanging this confidential material.

Mr. Pearkes: I am obliged to change the subject, and I think the Prime Minister will agree that we have discussed long enough the one to which our attention has just been directed.

Under section 97 of the white paper, the strengths of the reserve forces are given, and the figure of 3,086 is given for the air force. I was going to ask the minister whether those 3,086 personnel are divided between the ten squadrons of the air force auxiliary and the radar units of the air force auxiliary as shown under section 117.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, plus a certain number of air force reserve called up to receive pay on a full-time basis. This would permit us to consider the figure of 3,086 on precisely the same basis as the corresponding figures for the numbers of naval reserve divisions or for the army reserves effective.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister give a breakdown of that 3,086, as to how many are in those air squadrons, how many are in the radar unit, how many of those are called up from this general reserve and also how many are flying personnel and how many are ground crew?

Mr. Claxton: That is a breakdown into categories that are complex, and I shall have to get the information for the hon. member. The great majority are in the ten squadrons. There are some 250 in the radar unit, and a relatively small proportion are in the reserves that are called up. I can give the hon. gentleman the exact figures and also the division between air and ground crew.

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you. Are those reserves which are called up serving with the auxiliary squadron?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: They are not a separate branch?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: Then when we come to the active air force, the figures given are 16,356. Can the minister give a breakdown of that figure showing how many are flying personnel, how many are ground personnel and how many are administrative personnel not taking part in flying operations?

Mr. Claxton: I have that breakdown. I can give it to the hon. gentleman later.

Mr. Pearkes: I am anxious to get that information because I think it will show, far more clearly than the mere total numbers, the number of flying personnel that we have. That is the point I want to get at.

From what the minister has just told us, the reserve air force is not a reserve at all, except that it is allocated to auxiliary fighter units. What organization is there for replacement of flying personnel in the active units should hostilities break out and operations take place, and should it be necessary—as it would be if there were operations—to replace a large number of the flying personnel?

Mr. Claxton: The first source of replacements—they really would not be replacements, they would be additions to the air force flying personnel—would come from auxiliary units themselves. Then there are a number of classifications of air force reserves, six in number. No great effort has been made to recruit these up to large strengths, because they are all available in the event of an emergency, and no great advantage would be gained in taking on the extra paper work to keep in touch with them. But included among them, of course, are the members who served in the R.C.A.F. or R.A.F. from Canada during the war, in the course of which some 71,000 air crew of Canadian origin were trained. A number of them are still available, and with retraining would be available.

Then in the universities at the present time we have some 679 in training. It is hoped that that number will be increased with the increase of training facilities. This represents a small proportion of what would be needed in the event of war, but we are proceeding with the training as rapidly as possible.

In connection with the figure of 3,086 for the air force auxiliary, I might mention again the figure I gave today from a return in the United Kingdom where the corresponding number, at the 29th of September, was 5,350; so that in proportion our figure is measuring up rather well; but it is still far short of what we would need.

Mr. Pearkes: I think, Mr. Chairman, that from what the minister has said I had ample justification for being concerned as to where the replacements for the active air force flying personnel would come from. It was suggested by the minister just now that the first line would be to deplete—he did not use the word "deplete"—or to draw from the auxiliary squadrons.

Mr. Claxton: "Draw through", I think, would be a better term.

Mr. Pearkes: Draw through the auxiliary squadrons. I presume that would be drawing untrained people because I do not know where they exist now except that they are the ex-R.C.A.F. personnel and ex-R.A.F. personnel who are in Canada. These people are getting on in years, and that is not creating an organization. From what the minister has said I see no organization where he has any men in training coming up as a big reserve of trained men, except those 600 from the universities.

Mr. Claxton: On that again we have doubled within one year the number in the auxiliary and the number in the university or training plans.

Mr. Pearkes: I am glad to hear the word "doubled". I hope that he will double it again very quickly because I think it is the Achilles heel of the defence force.

Mr. Claxton: It is certainly a very important factor, and again it is one which depends on the use of resources. As the hon. member knows, it costs a great deal of money to train air crew, and they are available for an effective service life of limited duration. We are pressing on with another category which I should mention, and which I omitted before, namely, men training for short service commissions; that is, men who are taken on to the air force regular strength, with educational standards generally equivalent to senior matriculation. They are given a period of service of five years. Then they are eligible, if they are selected, for continuation in permanent commissions, but that method of augmenting air crew has been extended during the last two years—

Mr. Pearkes: Where would these men be shown? Under the 16,000?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, under the 16,000.

Mr. Pearkes: So the 16,000 active force includes a lot of people who are temporary.

Mr. Claxton: Who are in training for air crew but are not there temporarily in the sense that it is just for a matter of weeks, but who have joined on for periods of five years in order to provide a larger number of air crew for the period of active flying life. They are part of the active forces.

Mr. Pearkes: They are in reserve outside. They can hardly be considered as replacements. The minister will be able to get me a breakdown of this figure, showing how many are flying personnel and how many are ground crews.

Mr. Claxton: Oh, yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Regarding radar units, which the minister spoke about, can he tell us the policy regarding these radar units? Are they all going to be stationed in the north, or are they all going to be stationed around industrial centres, or are they going to be organized and are they all going to be manned by the R.C.A.F., or will some be manned by the army in co-operation with perhaps anti-aircraft units, and some with the navy? What is going to be the organization? Is there going to be a special corps set up, a radar corps, or what?

Mr. Cruickshank: Send it to Russia. They want to know all these things.

Mr. Claxton: As I said in the house the other night, there is no intention on the part of the department or the government at this time to set up anything of the nature of a radar screen or grid that would effectively cover Canada as Britain or Germany was covered by radar during the war. That is quite beyond the resources of Canada. Even the most effective radar screen is successful only in detecting a certain proportion of the enemy planes. Then there is required a communications network, backed by interceptor planes to bring them down. Canada is so big that it is not susceptible of defence in that way, and it is no part of our present plan to defend it in that way. If we were to set about defending it in that way we would be spending so great a proportion of our national income on static defence that we would not have any money left for any other purpose whatever in the way of defence, and consequently that is not the idea.

What we plan to do is to have a number of radar stations located at various points, which are regarded as useful from the point of view of intercepting any enemy on a likely course, and which are regarded as useful also from the point of view of affording protection to a limited area. At the beginning that area will be very limited; but we hope that means may be forthcoming to extend it. This work will be done by permanent forces, the air force at the more isolated centres, supplemented by air force reserve units such as the first one established at Montreal, which is making very good progress under the really first-class leadership of Squadron Leader Patrick. It was that unit which took part in the Exercise Metropolis, when some two or three hundred members of the regular and auxiliary air forces brought mobile equipment to New York and assisted in the detection and interception of aircraft there.

The radar unit in Montreal we hope will be followed soon by one in Toronto and in other principal centres where we can draw upon officers and men with either air force or radar experience, or having particular interests in that field of work through being engaged in the electronics or electrical industry.

Mr. Lennard: I wish again to make an appeal on behalf of the personnel of the reserve forces and the officers and instructors of the cadet corps across Canada in connection with their pay being subject to income tax. The minister knows this matter has been discussed on other occasions, and he mentioned this afternoon that it was under consideration.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

I am wondering who is holding it up, because it has been under consideration for several years. I feel sure the minister is not, but it must be either the Minister of National Revenue or the head of some other department. This is a grave injustice to these personnel. I know from personal experience, when I had something to do with sea cadets during the war, that while I did not receive pay at that time the amount I was called upon to spend to keep the thing going was far more than anything I would have received in the form of pay. I know that is the position today, and it is a grave injustice being forced upon this personnel who are devoting their time, in addition to their other regular activities, to the defence forces of Canada. There should not be any further delay in considering this matter in favour of those chaps who in some cases are giving all their spare time toward improving the defence forces of this country. Then these additions are made to their incomes, and they are taxed on it. In my opinion this is most unfair.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate what the hon. member has said. What is holding it up is the provision in the Income Tax Act. What is needed is a formula whereby the pay of reserve and cadet officers shall not be considered as income. If the hon. member can invent that he will have solved the problem.

Mr. Cruickshank: I would like to suggest a formula to correct this situation. I agree entirely with what has been said by the hon. member for Wentworth. We heard the other day, from the Minister of Finance, a formula through which we are going to beautify Ottawa. You just take 80 per cent from 60 per cent and add 4 per cent, and find out how old your mother-in-law is, and then 'phone for Einstein—and you have it. I am entirely in accord with what the hon. member has said, and it is high time the Minister of National Revenue, or whoever is responsible, gave us some action in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Harkness: For the benefit of some hon. members who are calling "carried" let me say I have eight more questions jotted down, so they might as well save their breath.

My first question has to do with the navy. Under the heading in the details which deals with equipment and things of that nature there is an item of $26 million. How much of that is for ship construction? The item also includes the purchase of trucks and other types of equipment.

Mr. Claxton: It is broken down as follows:

Signal and wireless stores	$ 2,957,140
Ammunition and bombs	3,730,449
Armament stores	867,514
Mechanical transport	395,000
Operating costs of mechanical transport	153,100
Acquisition and construction of ships (portion payable this year)	6,100,000
Acquisition and construction of aircraft	668,000
Repair and upkeep of ships and aircraft	7,447,934
Naval and aircraft stores	3,909,458
	$26,228,595

Mr. Harkness: Is this $6 million for ship construction and acquisition chiefly for the three new subchasers being built? Would a portion of their cost come under this, or is it for other than that?

Mr. Claxton: These will be first payments on the following:

Minesweepers	$ 700,000
Antisubmarine vessels	1,650,000
Gate vessels	900,000
Tooling and miscellaneous charge	750,000
Icebreaker	1,500,000
Miscellaneous vessels	100,000
Carryover from 1948-49 regarding icebreaker	500,000
	$6,100,000

Mr. Harkness: This afternoon and last Friday we had a general discussion as to the proportion of forces in what I would call actual fighting units as compared with those in command and administrative posts. In that connection, and to get down to something more definite, can the minister tell us how much of the money in these appropriations is for the reserve brigade group (army) and how much is for the operational squadrons of the air force, so far as the air force is concerned?

Mr. Claxton: There is no possibility of making any such breakdown without going through every item of defence expenditures from start to finish, because the expenses of headquarters staffs, R.C.E.M.E. workshops, ordnance corps, ordnance corps stores and so on are not kept in books that relate to the ultimate consumer. The portions of the overhead and the like are not related in that way. There is no way of giving that information from our figures.

Mr. Harkness: If the minister cannot give us a breakdown along that line, could he tell us where the shortages of manpower in respect of the establishments he hopes to have in a reasonably short space of time are to be found? In other words, are those shortages in the army, in the reserve brigade group or at headquarters staff, or are they in the army service corps supply units, or where are they? And, so far as the air force is concerned, are those shortages of manpower in the establishment of operational squadrons or in some of the administrative positions?

Mr. Claxton: They are scattered through. The greatest shortages proportionately are in the occupational groups requiring the highest educational standings, senior matriculation and the like. I think that applies to both the army and the air force. As I say, the navy is up to strength in other ranks personnel. It is divided between various units. As the various units are filled up the opportunity of joining those is not extended to men applying for recruitment; if they want to join the army their choice is limited.

The proportions of the brigade group left to be filled up is made up in part of men who are already in the training stream in the various corps schools and who will be posted to units in the brigade group so that the shortage there should be filled relatively speedily.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand that when the present recruits whom you have taken in and who are now undergoing training are posted out the brigade group will be pretty well up to strength?

Mr. Claxton: To about 70 or 75 per cent, something of that character.

Mr. Harkness: From the details I notice that the vote for the reserve army is approximately $200,000 more this year than it was last year. The minister told us earlier that they hoped to get a considerable increase in the reserve forces and that a considerable increase had already been secured for last year and he hoped it would be increased still further. I am wondering how that considerable increase in the numbers in the reserve army is going to be looked after when there is only an increase of $200,000 in the vote. Did the minister and the department estimate that there would not be much of an increase and therefore did not budget for any more than $200,000 extra?

Mr. Claxton: We hoped for a large increase and the increase has been considerable. If the money available for the reserve forces as set out here is inadequate and there is money available in other votes, it is possible by application to the treasury board to secure an allocation to meet the additional cost. The reserve force vote last year was larger than was required and that is why it is only $200,000 larger this year.

Mr. Harkness: The details on page 198 show the biggest reduction to be in pay and allowances, from $6,300,000 in 1948-49 to $5,701,000 for the current year. That would seem to indicate that the department had estimated that the reserve army would be smaller this year.

Mr. Claxton: It is exactly the reverse. The estimate for 1948-49 was larger than proved to be necessary and therefore it was not necessary to increase the estimate proportionately with the additional numbers and activity that we anticipated. Because we underspent on this item in 1948-49 it was possible and proper to put in the smaller increase which is here, but that is not on account of reduced activity.

Mr. Harkness: I take it that, as far as last year was concerned, the number of people you thought would be in the reserve army and the amount of training you thought would be required was considerably less than had been estimated?

Mr. Claxton: The cost was.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, the recruiting scheme was comparatively less successful than you had budgeted or hoped for last year?

Mr. Claxton: We have been trying to build up the army reserve steadily and have done everything possible to assure that. In consequence of the interest shown we hope we may be able to get an extra 10,000 men. Nevertheless, last year we enlisted 12,000 men in the army reserve.

Mr. Harkness: I thank the minister for the explanation he has given. I thought it peculiar that he was budgeting for a smaller amount for pay and allowances and for the training of these reserve force soldiers. I notice that the item covering personnel supplies and services, which includes food supplies, is up approximately $10 million just for the army. The number in the army is not very much greater comparatively now than it was last year and I was wondering why this item should be so markedly or sharply increased?

Mr. Claxton: The increase is largely due to the increase in the strength of the active army. As I pointed out, each extra man means an extra $2,600. I have the increase broken down into the various details. For one thing, the ration scale was increased, which increased the ration cost as from January, 1949.

Mr. Harkness: The reason given by the minister would not seem to be applicable. This increase is for food, clothing and things of that sort and the total number in the regular forces has increased by only a few thousand. That increased number certainly could not increase the vote from $8 million to $18 million. I think the explanation given by the minister must be wrong and that this increase is not due to the greater amount of food and clothing required.

Mr. Claxton: I can give the hon. member the actual number of the increase which would be multiplied by $2,600, the cost per man. An additional $2,198,000 was required for food. An additional $743,000 is to be paid to the Department of Veterans Affairs for hospital services. The increased requirement for consumable dental stores reflecting using up of stocks from wartime surpluses, increased replacement of obsolescent dental equipment was $64,000. The increased requirement for purchase of cloth for manufacture of undress blue uniforms, purchase of Arctic clothing, bush type summer clothing, airborne stores, was $4,204,000. The increased provision for stoves and refrigerators for C.M.H.C. housing development, provision for Arctic barrack stores, provision for expendable materials, and lumber for ordnance depots, R.C.E.M.E. units and depots, provision for items of barrack and hospital stores, was $2,889,000. They provided the houses but we are to provide the stoves and refrigerators. Then there is an offsetting item reducing those additional items by $150,000, representing a reduction in laundry and dry cleaning. I think that accounts for the difference.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will take up the resolutions concerning the trans-Canada highway. I mention this because some time ago I consulted the leaders of the different parties, who gave me a list of the bills or resolutions they considered important, and this was one of them. So Monday morning at eleven o'clock we shall take up that resolution. The second item will be the second reading of Bill No. 149, respecting bankruptcy. I am told the motion for second reading will not involve much debate, and it is the intention to refer the bill to the committee on banking and commerce immediately second reading is given. Then we shall proceed with Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, which is in the committee stage. If we have time we shall take up Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants. That has been through committee, also.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

General services—

239. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $227,150.

240. Miscellaneous maintenance and adjustments (war of 1914-18), $32,275.

241. Battlefields memorials, $54,605.

Pensions and other benefits—civil pensions—

242. Robert Allen, $193.

243. Walter Pettipas, $516.

244. Florence Walker, $360.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 21, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

PRIZE WINNERS AT TORONTO WINTER FAIR

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The house will be pleased to know that once again an unique distinction has been conferred upon the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar by one of its farm residents, Mr. Albert Kessel, of Valley Centre, who not only won the silver cup for the northwest championship for his grain, but last week was awarded the world championship for his rye at the annual Royal Winter fair in Toronto. I should add that last year, Mr. Kessel won a championship ribbon and first prize for a sheaf of wheat, and a first for oats at the same winter fair.

I might say also that in 1947 Mr. Albert Robbins of Laura, in the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar, won the grand prize for oats and in 1948 a reserve championship for an exhibit of barley at the Royal Winter fair. I am sure all hon. members will join with me in congratulating these Saskatchewan farmers for their successful efforts to improve the products of the Canadian grain growing industry.

WINNER FOR OATS AND BARLEY

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, according to newspaper reports, one of my constituents won the world championship with his exhibits of oats and barley at the Royal Winter fair. The name of the winner is John T. Eliuk, and in winning this award he became the first such double winner in this fair. Incidentally, Mr. Eliuk was the oat king at the Chicago World fair in 1948. This is not the first time that some of my constituents engaged in farming have obtained world recognition of their ability.

It is a pleasure for me to record the congratulations of this house to Mr. Eliuk upon obtaining such a high distinction as winning this double award. The constituency which I have the honour to represent is noted not only for the richest and biggest oil field in Canada, but also for the type of farmers who are given world recognition for their efforts.

Mr. J. L. Gauthier (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, since all these farmers are being mentioned this morning, I believe I should draw the attention of this house to the fact that, although my constituency is one of the richest in minerals in Canada, on Friday Mr. Theophile Dépatie of Hanmer, Ontario, Sudbury district, was crowned potato king of the world.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I do not believe it would be fair to let an occasion such as this pass without joining with the other speakers in their congratulatory messages, and I should like to extend congratulations to the district agriculturist from my home town, Mr. E. H. Buckingham, for the part he played in bringing three firsts to Alberta from the Royal Winter fair at Toronto, and in addition, the high singles in those classes. Mr. Buckingham and some of his associates came east with five young people's teams, and in taking home these three firsts has conferred quite an honour upon my fellow citizens and his associates from the province of Alberta.

Mr. Knowles: The people in my riding are raising Cain over the lifting of rent control.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the name of Mr. Argue be substituted for that of Mr. Herridge in the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO SIT WHILE HOUSE IS SITTING

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords) moved:

That the standing committee on agriculture and colonization be empowered to sit while the house is sitting.

Motion agreed to.

S. S. "NORONIC"

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE ON SEPTEMBER 17—JUDGMENT AND REPORT OF COURT OF INVESTIGATION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): For the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), I wish to give the house a summary of the report of the court of investigation into the loss of the steamship Noronic by fire on September 17 last.

The Minister of Transport informed the house that under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act he had appointed the Hon.

S.S. Noronic

Mr. Justice Kellock, of the Supreme Court of Canada, to act as commissioner and to hold a formal investigation into the loss of that steamship. The commissioner, sitting as a court of investigation, was assisted by Captains H. S. Kane and Robert Mitchell as nautical assessors, and Mr. Neil B. Gebbie as engineer assessor.

Counsel appeared for the Department of Transport; for Canada Steamship Lines Limited, and officers; for the Attorney General of Ontario; for the attorney general of the state of Ohio; and for the Seafarers' International Union. Mr. W. K. Campbell acted as registrar of the court.

The court held hearings in the city of of Toronto on eighteen days in September, October and November, and the final sitting was held at the city of Ottawa on the 21st day of November, 1949.

Many witnesses were called to give evidence, and ample opportunity was given to everyone who had personal knowledge of the circumstances of the disaster to come forward and testify. I think I may say without fear of contradiction that the investigation was searching, impartial and thorough.

The judgment of the court was pronounced this morning in open court as follows:

Court of Investigation
S.S. Noronic

Monday, the 21st day of November, 1949.

The Honourable Mr. Justice
R. L. Kellock, Commissioner

This matter, coming on for hearing before this court at its sittings held at the city of Toronto in the province of Ontario on the 28th, 29th and 30th days of September, the 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st days of October and the 7th day of November, 1949, and judgment having been reserved until this day and the same coming on this day for judgment:

1. This court doth order and adjudge that the certificate of William Taylor, being passenger inland waters' certificate No. 6703, be and the same is hereby suspended until and including the 21st day of November, 1950.

2. And this court doth further order and adjudge that the costs of the Department of Transport of this investigation be taxed upon the scale of the Exchequer Court of Canada and be paid by Canada Steamship Lines Limited.

3. And the court doth not see fit to make any further or other order touching the costs of the said investigation.

R. L. Kellock,
Commissioner.

Hugh S. Kane
Assessor

R. Mitchell
Assessor

Neil B. Gebbie
Assessor

The commissioner's report, concurred in by the assessors, is embodied in a separate document that has been forwarded to me by the commissioner in accordance with the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. I now table a copy of the report, and copies will be available for all members of the house.

The report of the court of investigation is a lengthy document, as befits an investigation of major importance, and should be carefully read by all those who are concerned in preventing a recurrence of such a terrible disaster. I shall not attempt in this statement to review at length the contents of the report, but will endeavour to point out to members of the house some of the more important observations and findings of the court.

In the first part of the report the commissioner reviews the legislation and regulations to which the ship and its owners were subject. He finds that the Noronic was built in 1913 and was constructed without fire-resisting bulkheads. Under the regulations, the ship, as an existing ship, was exempted from compliance with the regulations which came into force in 1939 and which require new ships to be constructed with fire-resisting bulkheads.

The Noronic was equipped with a fire alarm system which was mechanically in good order, with fire-extinguishing equipment consisting of hydrants, hoses, fire extinguishers, pumps, smoke helmets and lamps which had been inspected by the Canadian steamship inspection service on April 23, 1949, and had been approved by the steamship inspector. The commissioner expresses the opinion that the laxity of the inspection in requiring compliance with the regulations could only induce or encourage a similar laxity on the part of the owners and officers of the ship with respect to the vital matter of preparedness for fire.

Pursuant to United States legislation, the provisions of the Canadian regulations were considered by the United States authorities as approximating those in the United States, and a certificate was issued on April 28, 1949, by the inspection office of the United States coastguard admitting the Noronic to the exemptions and benefits provided by United States statutes relating to the inspection of boilers, machinery, hull and equipment. This meant that compliance with Canadian regulations was considered sufficient.

The certificate issued by the Canadian steamship inspection service permitted the ship to carry 600 passengers and 200 crew. At the time of the casualty the ship carried 524 passengers and 171 crew.

There are no regulations applying to Canadian passenger ships on the great lakes with respect to the maintenance of any fire patrol system or as to fire drills for either passengers or crew. However, the commissioner states that, in his opinion, it is implicit in the regulations relating to fire-extinguishing equipment that there shall be provided by the shipowner men trained to use the required apparatus and so organized that the presence of fire on shipboard may be learned at a sufficiently early stage to make the use of the required apparatus in the hands of such men effective in its control. So far as patrolling for detection of an outbreak of fire is concerned, that is a duty which, it was decided as long ago as 1910 by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of the Dominion Fish Company v. Isbester, is incumbent upon the shipowner for the protection of sleeping passengers in the case of a ship lying at dock.

In a ship equipped with neither automatic apparatus for detecting an outbreak of fire on board nor an automatic sprinkler system to extinguish it if it did break out, as was the case with the Noronic, an efficient patrol for the detection of fire at the earliest possible moment would appear to be essential. The fire patrol actually employed on the ship was inadequate for the purpose.

The report deals with the organization, or lack of it, of the officers and crew of the ship to meet a situation such as occurred. Only 15 crew members were required to be on the ship at the time of the fire, the remainder being free to go ashore.

After reviewing the evidence of certain witnesses, the commissioner finds that, in his opinion, no one in a responsible position in connection with the ship, either on the ship or ashore, had applied his mind in any serious way to the handling of a situation such as arose on the outbreak of fire on the night in question, although such an eventuality could not be considered otherwise than as one that might occur at any time. Moreover, complete complacency had descended upon both the ship's officers and the management. The fire which actually occurred found officers and crew without any organization designed to deal with such a situation.

The commissioner further states that, in his opinion, it is clear there was no training of the crew with respect to fire or its detection, or what should be done after detection, apart from what might be picked up by attendance at fire drills. The lack of any effective system of patrolling for the purpose of fire detection and the lack of any system by which, when fire was detected, the information of its presence and location could immediately be sent to some central locality, where personnel trained in methods of dealing with fire were available to be sent to the spot immediately, accounts, in the commissioner's opinion, for the loss of life which ensued.

The commissioner points out that the outbreak of fire on a ship at a time when it has a large number of sleeping passengers on board requires of necessity a pre-arranged plan for arousing and getting them off the ship. The Noronic had no such plan. Any organization which the ship did have was designed to function in other circumstances with a complete crew on board. Accordingly the fire found the ship totally unprepared to deal with the situation. Such efforts as were made to fight the fire were scattered and ineffective, and the heavy loss of life shows clearly the failure of the crew to rouse those sleeping passengers who were unable to escape from the burning ship.

The report states that the evidence established the origin of the fire to have been in a small linen closet located just forward of the women's washroom opening onto the port corridor on "C" deck. The actual cause of the fire was not established, but there was no evidence of the fire having been deliberately set.

The procedure followed in formal investigations of this kind is for the Department of Transport to propound certain questions for the opinion of the court. The report of the commissioner sets out at the end thereof the questions raised and the answers given by the court. Following these questions and answers the commissioner makes some observations on the suspension of the master's certificate and gives reasons for awarding costs. The report concludes with certain recommendations made by the court. I should like to read the more important of the questions and answers which are found on pages 94 to 96 of the report, and which are as follows:

Question 15: When fire was discovered on the S.S. Noronic was all possible and proper action taken to save life, to fight, control, localize, and extinguish the fire? If not, in what way and to what extent was the action taken, if any, defective or inadequate?

Answer: The action taken for the above purposes by the ordinary crew members was no doubt such action as they would be expected to take without direction in such circumstances, no officer of the ship having taken charge of the situation or having attempted to give any general directions, if such was possible at the advanced stage which the fire had reached when the alarm was given.

Question 16: If all possible and proper action was not taken or was not taken soon enough to save life, and fight, control, localize and extinguish the fire, was the master or any other person or persons on the vessel to blame? If so, whom?

Answer: After the alarm had been given the only thing it might have been possible to do, which was not done, was for the master to have taken general charge of the situation and directed in an organized way the arousing of passengers, instead of acting himself as an ordinary sailor in such parts of the ship as he could reach.

S.S. Noronic

Question 17: Were the fire fighting appliances on board the S.S. Noronic adequate? Had they been found satisfactory and in good working order? If so, when and where were they last tested and found satisfactory and in good working order?

Answer: The fire fighting appliances on board appear to have been satisfactory and in good working order. The last departmental inspection was on April 23, 1949. Some of the fire hydrants (probably all the outside ones, but none of those inside), and a few of the fire extinguishers had been used since that time.

Question 18: How many of the crew of the S.S. Noronic were lost or injured? How many are missing?

Answer: There were no losses among the crew.

Question 19: What was the cause of the loss of the S.S. Noronic and the cause of the loss of life?

Answer: The loss of the S.S. Noronic and the loss of life was due to the failure on the part of the owners and the master to have:

(a) a continuous patrol of the ship for the purpose of detecting the presence of fire, such patrol as was in existence being limited to approximately fifteen minutes out of every hour;

(b) in failing to have any organization operative when the ship was in dock with passengers on board by which information as to the outbreak of fire could be promptly dispatched to some point from which men trained in the methods of dealing with fire could be immediately dispatched to the locality;

(c) in failing to contemplate in any real sense the possibility of fire occurring at a dock, and maintaining only fifteen actually on duty out of a crew of one hundred and seventy-one, the others being free to go ashore and who might be, so far as the master or the officer on duty knew, actually on shore;

(d) in failing to have any plan for arousing and getting the passengers off the ship in the event of fire while the ship was at dock;

(e) in failing to train the crew as to the proper steps to be taken on discovery of fire or in fire fighting methods beyond giving them a knowledge of how to operate fire extinguishers and hoses.

Question 20: Was the loss of the S.S. Noronic and the loss of life caused or contributed to by the wrongful act or default of the owners, Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, the master, Captain William Taylor, or any other person or persons?

Answer: The loss of the S.S. Noronic and the loss of life was caused by the wrongful default of the owners and of the master in the respects mentioned in the answers to the last question. While it is true that the owners knew and approved of the organization, or lack of it, designed to deal with the outbreak of fire on the ship while it lay in dock with sleeping passengers on board, the master was not in any way precluded by any instructions from the owners from taking the proper steps himself.

I should like also to read the recommendations which appear at the end of the report:

While anything in the way of recommendation for the future probably arises fairly obviously upon a review of the circumstances covered by this report, it may be of value to gather them together in one place. The following are therefore submitted for consideration in connection with ships carrying more than a minimum of passengers on the major fresh waters:

1. That the provisions as to the fire resisting bulkheads in regulation XVI of the international convention for the safety of life at sea be made applicable to such ships.

[Mr. Howe.]

2. That the provisions of regulation XLIII of the said safety convention, as to the maintenance of an efficient and continuous fire patrol system as well as an automatic fire alarm or fire-detecting system, be made applicable, but such alarm or detecting system should not be restricted to parts of the ship not accessible to the patrol system.

3. That the provisions of regulation XLIV as to muster lists and the assigning of special duties to different members of the crew in connection with the matters therein mentioned, including:

(a) the muster of passengers; (b) the extinction of fire; (c) warning of passengers; (d) assembling of passengers at muster stations; (e) keeping order in the passages and on the stairways and generally controlling the movements of passengers, be applied. This will necessarily require adequate training of the crew in methods of fire fighting, together with the setting up of and maintenance of and effective organization for dispatching men so trained to the seat of fire at the earliest possible moment.

4. That such ships be fitted with a sprinkler system protecting all enclosed parts of the vessel.

5. Muster charts should be prominently displayed in order that each member of the crew may become familiar, not only with his own duties and fire and boat stations, but with those of the crew who are to work with him.

6. That such ships be fitted with a public address system for directing passengers in an emergency, and that the proper officers be trained as to its use.

7. That ships at dock should provide adequate and more than a single means of exit to shore.

8. That passenger ships docking with the intention of remaining for any extended time be required to be connected with the local telephone system so that the aid of the local fire department may be obtained without delay.

I wish to read my colleague's conclusion, as follows:

In conclusion I wish to take this opportunity to thank publicly the commissioner and his assessors for their untiring efforts in this long and arduous investigation, and also all those who assisted the court in the discharge of their duties. The recommendations made by the court will be carefully considered by the department, and I sincerely hope that this investigation, which has been so ably carried out, will be the means of preventing disasters of this kind in the future.

Mr. Green: May I direct a question to the minister? Has the government any intention of bringing in amendments to the shipping legislation, or seeing to it that amendments are made to the shipping regulations? This was a terrible disaster. The report condemns the company very strongly, and points out that certain new regulations are required. As I understand it, the report also points out that the inspection of the dominion inspecting officer was not adequate. I do urge that there is the utmost need for a prompt and thorough revision, primarily of the regulations, but perhaps also of the Canada Shipping Act itself. Has the government in mind taking any such steps?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Transport is indisposed at the present time, and I received the report only this morning. I am sure, however, the government will take into consideration every suggestion made by the commissioners, and I shall be surprised if my colleague does not recommend legislation to the house at an early day.

I believe that is all I can say. I shall take as notice the further remarks of the hon. member, and bring them to the attention of my colleague.

S.S. "CHELOHSIN"

QUESTION AS TO ACCIDENT NEAR ENTRANCE TO VANCOUVER HARBOUR

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, on November 6 the passenger steamship Chelohsin, despite urgent warnings from the radar station at First Narrows bridge, ran ashore on the rocks at Stanley park near the First Narrows entrance to Vancouver harbour. Fortunately there was no loss of life. I understand the regulations do not force a ship to comply with the directions given by such radar stations. Apparently there was no one on the ship to receive the directions. Is there to be an investigation into this accident? None has been announced.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will take the question as notice and give an answer later.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

RESCUE OPERATION BY H.M.C.S. "HAIDA"

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members would wish me to refer here to the successful rescue of eighteen men of the United States air force by the Canadian destroyer Haida. This was the culmination of a search and rescue operation by United States and Canadian forces working together. The job done by Haida and her crew was in line with the splendid record of that fine ship.

I am sure all hon. members will wish to echo the message I sent to the commanding officer: "Well done, Haida; heartiest congratulations."

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure every hon. member would wish the congratulations of the house as a whole to accompany and to support the message sent by the minister on this occasion.

This is one of the most remarkable examples that can be recalled of a combination of different services of different countries in rescue operations. Not only were there Canadian and United States units in the area, but there was a British unit as well; therefore the units of three services were taking some part in these rescue operations.

Royal Canadian Navy

The effective co-operation so indicated, and the fact that air and navy personnel and all those operating with them from the land stations brought the great developments of science to bear in this incredible rescue, is an indication of what can be accomplished by the association of these great forces.

It is to be noted that the aircraft was down in an unknown area, and could not have been seen from a ship, except probably by chance. Air and naval forces combined in a heroic manner, but the ultimate heroism undoubtedly was that of the men in the small whalers from the Haida, and later from the Magnificent, who took a gallant part in making the rescue and transferring medical personnel.

We admire the gallantry of our men and the skill displayed by all who took part in this operation.

RADIO BROADCASTING—CHURCHILL WEATHER REPORTS

Mr. Knight:

1. Was it over a period of time the custom of the C.B.C. to include in its weather reports one upon weather conditions at Churchill?

2. If so, when did such reports on weather at Churchill cease, and for what reason?

3. On whose recommendation was such service discontinued?

Mr. McCann: Prior to September, 1948, five-minute network weather forecasts were broadcast for prairie region on midwest network four times daily, but distribution was limited largely to CBK, Watrous, Saskatchewan, as most of the other stations did not carry these reports. Following inauguration of CBW, Carman, Manitoba, and CBX, Lacombe, Alberta, in September, 1948, prairie reports were broken down on a provincial basis, each CBC transmitter giving full coverage of respective provinces plus adjacent weather areas in neighbouring province to provide overlapping service to listeners. Churchill weather region has been reported continuously six times daily on CBW, Carman, Manitoba, since September, 1948. In addition, CBK, Watrous, Saskatchewan includes adjacent Reindeer and Flin Flon weather regions in Saskatchewan forecasts now given five times daily.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE BILLS

On the order:

The Prime Minister—That on Tuesday, the 22nd of November, 1949, if upon the expiration of the time allowed for the consideration of private bills, the house shall not have disposed of motions respecting private bills (other than divorce bills), upon the order paper, and shall not have decided whether or not such bills should be referred to a standing committee, then, notwithstanding standing order 15, the time for consideration of such private bills shall be extended until the regular hour of adjournment of the house on that day, or until such earlier hour when such motions shall have been disposed of, provided that divorce bills shall not be considered during such extended time.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Under standing order 116 this motion cannot be moved at this time without the unanimous consent of the house. The house knows that there are two applications for incorporation of companies among the private bills listed on the order paper. These applications have to be dealt with by parliament under the legislation adopted last year with reference to pipe lines. It is immaterial to the government and a matter of indifference whether these applications are adopted or not, but it does seem that there should be an opportunity for the house to express its views on the question whether the charters should be granted.

The bills in question have been before the house on four occasions during the hour reserved for private bills, and on each of those occasions the time allotted proved to be too short to permit of an expression of opinion by the house. It would perhaps be the feeling of hon. members that there should be an opportunity to permit of a decision being made by the house.

As this motion refers to private bills, under standing order 116 it would have to go to the committee on standing orders unless there was unanimous consent to have it dealt with at once. If there is any objection to its being dealt with at once, I would move that the motion be referred to the committee on standing orders.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has anticipated the point of order I was going to raise, but I feel that I should raise a parallel point of order with respect to his suggestion that this motion be referred to the committee on standing orders. Standing order 116 reads:

> Except in cases of urgent and pressing necessity, no motion for the suspension or modification of any standing order applying to private bills or petitions for private bills shall be entertained by the house until after reference is made to the committee on standing orders or to one of the committees charged with the consideration of private bills, and a report made thereon by one of such committees.

As the Prime Minister has pointed out, this makes it quite clear that the motion standing in his name on the order paper today cannot be moved in the house unless there is unanimous consent. If the motion is out of order in its present form under standing order 116, then I do not see how the Prime Minister can, without giving notice, propose his motion to refer the matter to the standing orders committee. It seems to me that the course the Prime Minister should follow is to withdraw this motion and give forty-eight hours' notice of a motion to refer the matter to the standing orders committee. That is the procedure that is followed every year toward the end of the session with respect to divorce bills that have come in late. It was the procedure followed in April of this year with respect to some of the pipe lines bills.

I shall refer only to the point of order, and will not transgress the rules of the house by going into the merits of the question; but it does seem to me that the rules are quite clear, first, that this motion cannot be put because it abrogates standing order 116, and, second, that the Prime Minister is now making a motion to refer a matter to the standing orders committee without having given the required notice of such a proposal.

A ruling upon this point will be found in Beauchesne's third edition, beginning at page 685. Incidentally there is an interesting extract from what Sir Richard Cartwright said in connection with that ruling, as found on page 688, when he pointed out the iniquity of asking for special consideration for any particular private bill.

My only point at this moment is that the rules of the house should certainly be followed, particularly with regard to private bills. As a matter of fact, citation 9 in Beauchesne's third edition makes a particular point of that by saying:

> The practice is more stringent with regard to private bills.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I for one do not feel that unanimous consent should be given to abrogating standing order 116, and likewise I contend that the proposed motion of the Prime Minister is one which calls for forty-eight hours' notice.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since it has already been indicated that there will not be unanimous consent, and since the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his opening remarks recognized the necessity for unanimous consent before the motion can be dealt with, it would seem that it will not be proceeded with at this time.

There is one point I wish particularly to make, because it may facilitate the proceedings. We should discuss the motion without any suggestion that it is other than it really is. Its purpose is to make a special provision with respect to two private bills that have been under consideration, having to do with the pipe lines legislation introduced earlier this year.

This motion raises an important question which goes beyond the point of its regularity or the suggestion that it might be referred to the standing committee on standing orders. Ordinarily, as has already been pointed out, it should not be introduced without notice. There is no occasion for any uncertainty about what is contemplated, because at page 1805 of Hansard of November 15, 1949, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) indicated that the government is interested in seeing that these bills come forward under conditions which are not made to apply tc other business introduced by private members.

In his introductory remarks on the motion the Prime Minister said frankly that there are two applications for private bills in connection with pipe lines, and by referring thereto he indicated that the purpose of the motion relates to these two private bills. He said that the government had no special interest in these bills, but felt there should be an opportunity for the members of the house to pass judgment on them, and that the members should not be deprived of that opportunity by the limitation provided by standing order 15.

It has already been pointed out that if these measures are to be dealt with in this manner it is necessary to demonstrate that there is some urgency. The Prime Minister indicated recognition of that limitation by accepting the fact that unanimous consent is required. He went on to suggest that if such consent was not forthcoming, the motion could be referred to the committee on standing orders.

I think it would be well to consider the implications of what is now proposed. In effect the motion makes these two private bills government measures.

Mr. St. Laurent: Nonsense.

Mr. Drew: It is idle for any member of the government to suggest otherwise. It is only necessary to read the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to see that the government is definitely interested in the outcome of these measures. At page 1806 of Hansard the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> I know nothing about the pipe line company which is asking for incorporation under this bill; but I do know something about the interests that are asking for incorporation under another bill now before the house.

I think he was unduly modest in regard to his knowledge of those associated with the other bill.

Mr. Howe: I ask my hon. friend to withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I said that modesty could not be properly suggested in the case of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but if the suggestion is wrong, I am quite prepared to withdraw it.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member accused me of telling an untruth. I suggest he withdraw his statement.

Mr. Speaker: I did not catch the words, but I am sure if the leader of the opposition accused the minister of telling an untruth, he will withdraw the statement.

Mr. Drew: Surely it is not necessary to engage in a debate. I said I thought the minister was being unduly modest as to one bill. If he was not unduly modest, then the whole house is being asked to deal with these bills with less information than we should have. If the minister knows nothing of the details behind these bills, how can it be suggested that there is any urgency in dealing with them? I cannot imagine a more conclusive argument against dealing with them in this extraordinary manner than the suggestion of the minister that he does not know anything about the people behind one of the bills.

Mr. Howe: I have heard no withdrawal.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of anything that I should withdraw. If it can be suggested what I should withdraw—

Mr. Speaker: We had better have this matter cleared up first. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has requested that the leader of the opposition withdraw any implication that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made an untruthful statement. Is that correct?

Mr. Howe: The statement I made was that I did not know the sponsors of the bill to which I was speaking, and I knew nothing about the particulars of the bill. My hon. friend has said I was much too modest, and that I deliberately made a misstatement about my lack of knowledge. I wish he would withdraw that statement.

An hon. Member: A guilty conscience.

Mr. Drew: I think the time has come to take a position in regard to this over-refinement of the rules. At page 786 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, we find a discussion about a matter that goes a great deal further than the present controversy. The house was discussing a bill in committee, and the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, under whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce served for some time, had this to say:

> My hon. friend goes on to say that this legislation is part of a bargain between the government and certain members of this house. I want to take direct issue with him, and tell him that it was in no part a bargain. There was no bargain whatever of any kind, and when he makes that statement he makes a statement that is incorrect and untrue.
> Mr. Manion: I rise to a point of order. I do not think the Prime Minister has any right to use the word "untrue" in regard to a statement made by any member of this house.
> The Chairman: The hon. member for Fort William raises the point of order that the Prime Minister has declared that the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford is untrue. I rule that the Prime Minister was quite in order in his declaration. . . as there was in it no personal reflection on the honour of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Much stronger words were used on that occasion, and, except under your ruling, sir, I do not propose to withdraw the statement that the minister was unduly modest.

Mr. Howe: Always the slanderer.

Mr. Speaker: With regard to the quotation read by the leader of the opposition, the word "untrue" there referred to a matter of fact; it did not imply dishonesty on the part of anyone. It is unparliamentary to imply dishonesty on the part of a minister or on the part of any hon. member of the house. I think the leader of the opposition will be the first to recognize that, and if he has implied dishonesty I am sure he will withdraw his statement.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I suggest there is no possible interpretation of the words used which implies dishonesty.

Mr. Speaker: I think that is sufficient. The leader of the opposition has definitely stated he has not implied dishonesty.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize this point in relation to what was under discussion. If in fact no information on the matter is available to the members, then we are being asked to deal with something that presumably involves the judgment of the members of this house. The Prime Minister has pointed out that the two bills to which the motion refers relate to applications for charters which would be granted with the approval of this house. I am making my observations at this moment with the idea of facilitating this business, if it is the desire of the government to directly intervene in this matter by resolution or otherwise.

I submit that if, as was implied by the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on November 15, the house is required to exercise no judgment in regard to these bills, then we should not be passing them. That is what he said when he pointed out that all that is necessary is that the house pass on it, and then the Alberta government deals with it. A government agency will be called upon to pass upon the route, and there will have to be permission to export gas, and so on. If the granting of a charter is merely a formality, I suggest the proper course is for the government to introduce an amendment to the Pipe Lines Act which was passed earlier this year, so that a charter may be granted in the ordinary way by the appropriate government agencies. Then these other proceedings which do involve judgment could be brought into play. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this house should not be called upon to pass upon a bill which outlines no route, which gives no detailed information, and which merely says to unnamed persons: "You go ahead and use the judgment of this parliament to carry out such formal matters as you see fit." I believe this business would be expedited by an amendment to the Pipe Lines Act rather than by introducing this motion. For this reason, I would not agree to unanimous consent to deal with this motion and refer the matter to the committee on standing orders.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says that I anticipated his objection. I did expect that he could not allow an occasion such as this to pass without giving us his interpretation of the rules of the house. It was for that reason I suggested that standing order 116 be complied with in this regard.

With respect to the observations of the leader of the opposition, I wish to say most positively that this government, as a government, is quite indifferent to the decision this house makes upon this bill. But as a government it is not indifferent to the house being prevented by obstructionist methods from expressing its opinion in regard thereto. I believe the proper application of the democratic principle is to have a majority and not a minority determine what the House of Commons will do. It was merely for this purpose that this motion was put on the order paper. It was not for the purpose of recommending to the house that it pass the bill. The preamble of the bill recites that it is expedient that a charter be granted. If the members of the house are not convinced it is expedient that a charter be granted, they will refuse to grant a charter. It should be done, however, by a majority and not by a minority.

Mr. Green: Will the Prime Minister free the private members of the government party so that they can vote as they wish?

Mr. St. Laurent: Certainly, every member of the house, whether of the government party or any other party, will vote according to his judgment on whether or not the assertion in the preamble that it is expedient to grant a charter has been established. That is not usually established on second reading, but is usually ascertained in the committee to which the bill is referred.

If hon. members will look at citation 769, in Beauchesne's third edition, they will find that the second reading of a private bill does not involve acceptance of the principle, except to this extent: that if in the committee to which the bill is referred the principle is established, then the bill can be accepted. I would not wish to suggest to any member on this side or on half of the other side of the house how he should vote on these applications. As to the other half of the house, I would not want to suggest to them, either, how they should vote on the applications.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says there would have to be a period of forty-eight hours before referring this to the committee on standing orders. I think not, Mr. Speaker. I think that standing order 116 has to be given a reasonable application. When there is a motion made for that purpose, the rule provides that it will not be considered by the house until after reference is made to the committee on standing orders. I do not believe there have to be two motions with two forty-eight hour periods intervening in order to have the matter considered by the committee on standing orders. I suggest that the proper construction of standing order 116 is that whenever this kind of motion has had the proper notice and comes before the house, it should, in the terms of the rule, be referred to the committee on standing orders.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I may be able to assist the house in coming to a conclusion in this matter. I have had the opportunity of studying standing order 116, which says:

> Except in cases of urgent and pressing necessity, no motion for the suspension or modification of any standing order applying to private bills or petitions for private bills shall be entertained by the house—

Does this motion apply to private bills or petitions for private bills? Does it not rather refer to the procedure in this house? Under standing order 15, the procedure on Tuesdays and Fridays is that private and public bills shall be considered for the first hour between eight and nine o'clock.

During the time I have been in this house, I have never known standing order 116 to be applied other than to a petition for a private bill which has been received after the allotted time for the presentation of such a petition. There has been a motion to refer it to the standing committee for such recommendation as it deems advisable. I have had the opportunity of looking at Bourinot's fourth edition, in which a reference is made to rule 115, which is now 116. I do not intend to give my ruling immediately, but I am bringing this to the attention of the house because I believe it is pertinent to the matter. It would seem from Bourinot's reference that standing order 116 is restricted to those standing orders applying to private bills rather than to a standing order such as 15 which applies to the more general procedure of the house. My point is that standing order 116 has been applied in this house with regard to definite bills and questions affecting bills under part II of the standing orders, and that standing order 116 does not apply to procedure in the house as set forth in standing order 15. I should like the house to take that matter into consideration.

Mr. Knowles: On the point that you have just asked us to consider, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I listened carefully to what you said, and I thought I heard you read standing order 116 in these words: ". . .of any standing order applying to private bills and petitions for private bills."

Mr. Speaker: ". . .or petitions for private bills."

Mr. Knowles: That clears up that point. Standing order 116 refers to suspending or modifying any standing order that applies to private bills or to petitions for private bills. May I call your attention, sir, to the fact that there is another standing order, namely standing order 101, which refers only to petitions for private bills, and it is usually that one which is the basis for referring late divorce bills to the committee on standing orders. But surely that word "or" makes it clear that any motion which seeks to suspend any standing order that applies to private bills is subject to standing order 116.

May I point out here that there is actually a misnomer in the wording of the resolution. The Prime Minister in his motion uses the phrase "the time allowed for the consideration of private bills". Standing order 15 allows consideration on Tuesday evening from eight to nine, not of private bills but of private and public bills, the former having precedence. I submit that the motion deals with something that does not exist at all.

I may say further, Mr. Speaker, that the question whether the motion of the Prime Minister applies to private bills—I refer to the doubt raised in your mind because it deals with general procedure set out in standing order 15—should be set aside by the fact that the Prime Minister's motion relates only to the portion of standing order 15 that applies to private bills. I do not wonder that Your Honour has some difficulty with the matter, because I have searched the Journals for a good many years and I cannot find any record of this kind of motion having been made before in this house.

While I am on my feet, may I say that I take exception, and I think there is a good deal of support for my doing so, to the inference cast by the Prime Minister that I could not miss an opportunity to rise on a point of order. May I tell the Prime Minister, since he has looked up standing order 116, that there is an interesting quotation in the set of citations that comes right under standing order 116. It would do him good to read it. It is citation 818, and it comes from an ancient authority on the practices and the procedures in parliament, namely John Hatsell, an authority back in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century in the United Kingdom. The citation reads:

So far the maxim is certainly true and founded on good sense that as it is always in the power of the majority by their numbers to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapon by which the minority can defend themselves from similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules and proceedings which have been found necessary from time to time and are become the standing orders of the house, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can alone be protected from those irregularities—

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Knowles: All right; I shall gladly read this part a lot louder.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: To continue:

—and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

May I remind the Prime Minister also of an apt quotation from Lord Macaulay's "History of England". I have the book in my room, and I am going to bring it down tomorrow in connection with another debate; but let me quote part of it right now:

As we cannot, without the risk of evils from which the imagination recoils, employ physical force as a check on misgovernment, it is evidently our wisdom to keep all the constitutional checks on misgovernment in the highest state of efficiency, to watch with jealousy the first beginnings of encroachment, and never to suffer irregularities, even when harmless in themselves, to pass unchallenged, lest they acquire the force of precedents.

I make no apology, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister or to anyone else in this house for rising every time I think that some rule of this house is being broken, in order to see to it that this house sticks to the rules that have been laid down.

Mr. Church: I wish to discuss the point of order which has been raised by the hon. gentleman of the C.C.F. party, the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In the first place, I would call to Your Honour's attention the fact that if standing order 15 is interfered with, then the government are allowed to drive a coach and four through every standing order in the rule book. It can only be done by passing a bill. In my opinion the government forget that the private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate. If they are allowed to interfere with the private member in this way, then the private member ceases to function and parliamentary government is at an end and becomes simply the plaything of the administration. Why should the executive, under our standing orders, be allowed to assume that responsibility? If this is twentieth century Liberalism, then I doubt if there are any real Liberals on the government benches.

I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this fact. The other day we had a return made with regard to the export to the United States of millions of kilowatt hours of electric power.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, last Friday night I spoke on one of these bills; and I am asking the Prime Minister that he do me the great honour of reading the speech I then made—which I thought was a contribution to the debate—and that he absolve me from the charge he made a moment ago when he accused me of being an obstructionist.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have had some assistance on the point which I raised. Standing order 116 in part reads as follows:

. . . no motion for the suspension or modification of any standing order applying to private bills or petitions for private bills shall be entertained by the house . . .

And so on. Part II of the standing orders, starting at standing order 92, is headed "Private bills", and under that "Petitions", followed by the words "Deposit of bills and fees; additional charges." Am I correct or incorrect when I say that standing order 116 applies to standing orders starting at standing order 92 and continuing to the end of part II, being standing order 121? Is it limited to those standing orders which apply directly to private bills?

Mr. Coldwell: Is there any reference anywhere to its doing so?

Mr. Speaker: My reading of Bourinot would give me that impression.

Mr. Knowles: What page?

Mr. Speaker: Page 586. I admit that it is not very clear, but I will say further that during the time that I have been in the house I have never known this standing order to apply to standing orders other than those which directly affect private bills. It seems to me that the motion before the house applies to procedure in the house set out by standing order 15, and that standing order 116 applies specifically to the standing orders affecting private bills.

Mr. St. Laurent: If that is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I would move the motion standing in my name.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker has not made a ruling.

Mr. Coldwell: There is no ruling yet.

Mr. Speaker: We have discussed this matter for nearly an hour. I think I have given ample opportunity to all hon. members to discuss it.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, before you make your ruling may I attempt to answer the question you asked as to dividing the standing orders, namely, those preceding 92 and those following 92? They are all standing orders which refer to the same thing, namely, procedure in this house. There can be no difference between the standing orders preceding 92 and the standing orders following 92. Standing order 116 is as clear and as specific a direction for procedure in the house as any standing order preceding it.

If a question has not arisen during your time in the house, Mr. Speaker, as you have said, in which 116 has been invoked, the reason is that this procedure has never been requested in the house before. This is something new, and I suggest, sir, that you take that into consideration before you make your ruling.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the hon. member has just said I think it is material to consider the fact that this has never happened before in the house. While the Prime Minister may say that there is entire freedom for hon. members to vote as they wish, his attitude this morning, and the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is only one person who can decide questions of order, and that is the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is very interesting, sir, to note that citation 748 of Beauchesne at page 281 says:

> It is a recognized principle in the Canadian, as in the English parliament, that ministers of the crown should not initiate or promote private bill legislation.

Having regard to the statement made the other night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I say that there is indeed that promotion here, which demands that we take into consideration the meaning of the words: "except in cases of urgent and pressing necessity." Not one suggestion of urgent or pressing necessity has been advanced by the Prime Minister or any other minister of the crown. All they have said is that parliament should have the right to speak. The rules say that parliament can speak only—and this is stringently applied in the case of private bills—when the rules are applied. The rules are made as stringent as they are because of the fact that private bills should not take precedence over public business.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver East, and other hon. members, have all emphasized the fact that this is the first time the question has arisen in the house within the memory of any of the present members. It seems to me that there is a difference between the orders affecting private bills, other bills, and the public business of the country. Standing order 116 comes within the orders under the heading of part II, "Private bills". Under that in large type appears the following heading: "Petitions, Deposit of Bills and Fees, Additional Charges." Standing order 116 reads in part as follows:

> ". . . no motion for the suspension or modification of any standing order applying to private bills" . . . shall be entertained by the house until after reference is made to the committee on standing orders.

Taking into consideration my experience in the house and the experience of other hon. members, and also referring to page 586 of Bourinot's fourth edition, where reference is made to rule 115, which is now 116, it seems to me that standing order 116 is restrictive to those standing orders definitely applying to private bills rather than to a standing order such as 15, which applies to the more general procedure of the house; and I rule that it is now in order for the Prime Minister to proceed with his motion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, with deference I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

> A question of order having arisen with respect to the applicability of standing order 116 to the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I ruled that the said motion referred to general house procedure under standing order 15, and that standing order 116 was limited in its operative effect to the standing orders specifically by relating to private bills, beginning with standing order 92, and that it is therefore not necessary that the motion be referred to a standing committee.
> From this ruling the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and others appealed. The question is on the Speaker's ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling.

Mr. Cardiff: I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted against your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. St. Laurent moves, seconded by Mr. Fournier (Hull):

That on Tuesday, the 22nd of November, 1949, if, upon the expiration of the time allowed for the consideration of private bills, the house shall not have disposed of the motions respecting private bills (other than divorce bills), upon the order paper, and shall not have decided whether or not such bills should be referred to a standing committee, then, notwithstanding standing order 15, the time for consideration of such private bills shall be extended until the regular hour of adjournment of the house on that day, or until such earlier hour when such motions shall have been disposed of, provided that divorce bills shall not be considered during such extended time.

Mr. Speaker: Before the debate proceeds, may I point out to hon. members that the discussion at this time should not be on the merits of the private bills; it should be confined strictly to the motion before the house.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a good deal more to this motion than a simple suspension of the provisions of a standing order. In view of the introductory remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), it seems to me it is impossible for us to forget in any stage of the discussion that his motion is directed particularly to two pipe line bills. This being so, I suggest it is essential that we carefully examine exactly what it is we are being asked to do.

There are before the house two pipe line bills which have been presented by private members in the ordinary way. They carry out a detail of the broad measure passed earlier this year providing for the incorporation of pipe line companies. I confess at the time the bill creating the general provisions was before the house I had not contemplated the possibility that hon. members would be called upon to pass judgment on a private bill without any knowledge as to what the effect of it would be. If I had been aware that the provision as to incorporation carried with it the suggestion that the house should pass upon bills in connection with which we are given no details upon which to base our judgment, certainly I would have objected to the particular section of the general bill at that time, and to any of the related sections, and would have placed before the house the objections I now have.

I suggest this should be in our mind when we are asked to support the motion because its only purpose is to provide a special opportunity to deal in a special way with these two bills. Nothing has been put before the house to show why they should be placed in such a peculiarly favoured position. The merits or purposes of the bills are not so much in issue now as the procedure that we are asked to support. We are told that the limitation of the opportunity for debate on private bills should not, under our democratic system, deprive hon. members of the opportunity to exercise their right to say whether or not such measures should become law. That argument sounds like one in support of the principles of democracy that we are seeking to preserve; but if the principle is sound, why does it not apply with equal or greater force to public bills and orders that are on the order paper?

After all, public bills and orders deal with equally important matters. They are not related to some limited personal or corporate interest. Public bills and orders relate to the broad welfare of the people. Under our democratic procedure it is not incumbent upon every member of the house to indicate his support of the views set forth in resolutions or bills to be found in the list of public bills and orders; nevertheless they relate to matters which are just as important as or more important to the people of Canada than the two pipe line measures. If the principle is sound that limitation of debate should not be so imposed as to restrict the opportunity of members to exercise their democratic right to express their opinion on any matter properly before the house, then I submit that the argument applies with greater force to public bills and orders than it does to private bills which can be transferred to government business and supported as government bills if that is in fact the desire of the government.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? The question before the house is the motion of the Prime Minister which has to do with extending the hours for considering private bills. When discussion of this motion opened, a number of members who are now in the house were not then in the house. At that time I pointed out that the debate should be on this motion, and not on the bill. I trust that hon. members who speak on this motion will confine their remarks to the principle of the motion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at one o'clock, I had referred to the fact that this motion is one which places before the house the responsibility for determining whether the ordinary procedure should be departed from in relation to two particular bills. While the house naturally accepts without question the ruling that the principle involved in the bills concerned is not debatable, the nature of the bills which call for this motion is a subject for consideration at this time.

The point that I had made just before one o'clock was that the government, in its explanation, suggests that it has no particular concern about the subject matter of these bills, but that it does not think the limitation of time provided by a standing order should make it possible for the members to be deprived of an opportunity of voting on these two particular bills. I had pointed out that the same argument applies to public bills and orders. If it is sound in this case to ask the house to change the standing order to extend the time for this particular purpose, it would be equally proper to make sure the members have an opportunity of expressing their judgment on matters placed before this house by hon. members. I went further, and suggested that if this is to be accepted as a precedent, and all motions of this kind do become precedents by acceptance, then we should consider the fact that public bills and orders are on a higher plane than private bills.

Public bills and orders are introduced on the responsibility of members who have been elected by their representatives to share, not only on behalf of their constituents but collectively on behalf of all the people of Canada, the responsibility of government in Canada. In the other case, the procedure is one under which individuals or corporations present petitions and then have their bills sponsored in the house by those who quite often show little attachment to the subject matter of the bill. Having complied with the provisions by way of petition, the bill then comes forward with someone's name attached to it without much suggestion that that individual is seriously identified with the subject matter of the bill. The fact that that is so is evident in this case, because it has already been explained that one hon. member of this house was to have had his name attached to the bill originally, but that was withdrawn and someone else was found who was willing to have his name attached to it.

I suggest therefore, Mr. Speaker, that a decision to vary the regular procedure for this particular purpose should not be contemplated unless the basic argument that the members should have a democratic right to express their opinion in regard to it and register their position should also apply with equal force to public bills and orders. I suggest that it does create a precedent which should be examined carefully. No other reason has been put before us by the Prime Minister in support of this motion. If action were taken by this parliament to extend the time of debate for a purpose so undefined, I would suggest that it would be equally appropriate to present a similar motion at any time to diminish the time of debate. If that is so, then the standing orders would cease to have very much effect in controlling the debates and the orderly business of the house.

While the Prime Minister pointed out that the subject matter of the bills is not one of direct concern to the government and that the point which is really being raised is the democratic right of the members to express their position on the bills themselves, I would point out that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in his remarks on November 15 certainly left the impression that he, at any rate, was greatly concerned about whether or not a decision was made on these bills. On that occasion he made the statement that a good many uninformed assertions have been made in the house about these bills. It is not to be wondered at, Mr. Speaker, that uninformed statements might be made since we have no information other than the fact that in two cases solicitors are applying for incorporation; that no route is outlined and that, having received incorporation, these companies will attempt to obtain the requisite authority afterwards.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I am not discussing the principle of the bills but the principle with which we are confronted, when I point out that these bills are different from bills incorporating railways, another type of common carrier. It is true that what is carried is different but the railways, as common carriers, present their petitions in a similar manner. But in every case in which a railway presents a petition for a similar incorporation, they must state exactly where they intend to go.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not like to interrupt the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) but it seems to me that he is now discussing the bills; I hope he will not do so at too great a length but will rather discuss the principle of this motion.

Mr. Drew: Without calling for a ruling on the matter, Mr. Speaker, I think I can say that in a few words I can dispose of the point I wish to make, which I think is fundamental to this discussion. In this particular case we are asked to depart from the ordinary standing order so that we may consider a bill which does not tell us where this particular pipe line would be going. The point I am making there is not as to the merits of the bill itself as such, but as to the fact that any argument that this situation can be cured in committee is not correct. In the very discussion on these bills, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) pointed out that he did not have the information he wanted but that the place to obtain it would be in committee. What I am pointing out—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the leader of the opposition not agree with me when I say that that matter should be discussed when the bills are before the house on second reading?

Mr. Drew: It will be recalled, Mr. Speaker, that I have said nothing in debate about the bills. What I am trying to do is to point out that we should be extremely careful about a special motion of this kind because it would permit the abandonment of the ordinary standing orders so that the second reading could be proceeded with without the obtaining of information which the committee would not be empowered to incorporate in the bill in any event.

I have said all I wish to say, so that we shall not proceed to the stage where it will be necessary to make a ruling on this particular point. But for the consideration of hon. members of this house I suggest that we are being asked to support this motion for a reason that brings the bills into consideration. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has stated that hon. members should not be deprived of the right to vote on them. Then he stated that it was the responsibility of the government not to permit obstructionist tactics to delay consideration of these bills. As I recall his remarks, the only argument that really justified this resolution which he put forward was that there should be a democratic right to have the judgment of the house expressed on these bills, and that obstructionist tactics should not be permitted to deprive the members of that right. If that is the argument, surely it is the responsibility of each of us to examine the tactics which are brought in issue by the Prime Minister in saying that this motion is to overcome what are described as obstructionist tactics.

I had not expected to take any part in the debate on these bills, because they were being dealt with by other members who had a particularly close interest in them geographically. But I think that it is now the duty of every hon. member to say whether, by a special resolution of this kind, the standing orders shall be changed so that the obvious desire of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that incorporation be granted—

Mr. Howe: Now, now! When, Mr. Speaker, did I ever say that I desired incorporation to be granted?

Mr. Drew: On November 15, at page 1806 of Hansard, the Minister of Trade and Commerce expressed the hope that the house would proceed to pass these bills in order to get them before the committee so that the ordinary procedure could be followed to carry them beyond that stage.

Mr. Howe: Would the leader of the opposition read that section?

Mr. Drew: I think perhaps it would be just as well if I were to refresh the memory of the house with regard to what the minister said on that occasion, since he questions my statement. At the bottom of page 1805 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

I said that the first requirement under the Pipe Lines Act is that the company shall be incorporated by act of this parliament. I pointed out that the company must next acquire the gas sufficient to justify a pipe line, by contract with producing companies or by other means. I then pointed out that the company must obtain an export licence from the province of Alberta which, through its own legislation, has retained jurisdiction over the export of gas from that province. I then pointed out that the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada must be satisfied with the route of the pipe line and satisfied with all particulars regarding the construction of the pipe line.

I stated that one requirement of the board of transport commissioners would be the assurance that an export licence under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act would be forthcoming. That act is administered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and its function is to make sure that electricity or fluids are not exported until the present and future requirements of Canada are satisfied. It is therefore seen that there are ample safeguards for the public interest of Canada.

A good deal has been said about possible routes of the pipe line. A good many uninformed assertions have been made in the house in that regard. I know nothing about the pipe line company which is asking for incorporation under this bill;—

That is, Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

—but I do know something about the interests that are asking for incorporation under another bill now before the house. I know that that company has surveyed five routes from Alberta to the Pacific coast, and that one of them at least is an all-Canadian route. There is no difference whatever between my opinion and opinions expressed here that Vancouver must not be on the end of the pipe line. Vancouver must be served before any considerable service is taken off for supply to the United States. Under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act that requirement would have to be complied with before any export permit will be given by the department of which I am the minister.

However, I do think that these acts should be studied, and studied very carefully. I should like to know much more about the incorporation asked for in the bill about which I am speaking than I know at the present time. But the place to obtain that information is in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to which this bill will be referred, and before which the sponsors of the bill will appear to make their case for incorporation.

I will say this, however, that since incorporation by act of parliament is a requirement of the Pipe Lines Act, that incorporation should not be refused on trivial grounds. It seems obvious to me that if a responsible group of men, be they Canadians or Americans, properly financed and having the proper background of experience, apply to this parliament for incorporation, they are entitled to incorporate.

I should like also to say a word about what seems obviously to be a filibuster in connection with these bills. The government will not permit any small number of members to prevent this house as a whole from voting on a private bill. If these bills continue to be talked out in the limited time permitted for private bills, the government will ask the house to suspend the rules and provide whatever time is required to finish the discussion and to obtain a vote on such bills.

Then I believe in some part of it there is a reference to one of the parties in this house; and the closing words of the minister are:

Therefore, I hope that these pipe line bills will be examined and if they are properly sponsored I hope that this house will grant the incorporations.

I would have thought that was a fairly complete summary and a fairly definite statement that the minister thought that the bills should be adopted. That is what the words seemed to imply; and it is the right of the minister to say so. But what we are being asked to do here is to abdicate our responsibilities and to follow this particular course. The word "filibuster" and the word "obstruction" have both been used to describe tactics. I happened to notice that at the time this bill came up for debate on the last occasion only four or five members of the house had spoken on it. That seems to be a fairly limited number to describe as a filibuster. There is something much more than that involved here. The right of hon. members to express their opinions on matters of this kind is not one that should be denied by the mere majority of hon. members, following the lead of the government in regard to bills that are presumably private bills and not bills put forward with the responsibility of the government.

We should not be asked to take the position that because the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has informed us that a number of other agencies must exercise their judgment we should exercise none. Yet, that is precisely the position in which we are being placed by the way these bills come before us in this house. The procedure is one that does not invite the co-operation of the minority members of the house. As has been pointed out on a number of occasions, it is not only a legitimate practice, it is in many instances a very necessary practice, for hon. members to avail themselves of the rights they have to prevent what they regard to be an improper course. Every hon. member who thinks that an improper course is being followed has a duty to exercise whatever rights he has under the rules to prevent that course reaching its improper result.

Call the discussion which has taken place a filibuster; call it obstruction; call it what you will, it has only been the presentation of things by individual members of the house —and I might point out individual members of both sides of the house—as the reasons why they do not think that the bill should be dealt with in this particular way. But I was struck very forcibly by the fact that a number of hon. members on both sides of the house indicated that they were quite prepared to support bills which gave them the information that they thought was essential for them to assume their actual responsibility. I do not think it is for the hon. members to abdicate their responsibilities.

I suggested this morning that if the right is not included, if we are not to be given information fully, another course would be to bring in an amendment to the pipe-line bills, which should be brought in this session, treating the incorporation of the companies merely as a formal procedure, imposing no responsibilities on those who grant the charter except to see that the form is complied with. If that were done I am sure hon. members would support such an amendment; but, Mr. Speaker, one of the issues before us in this particular motion is whether parliament, when it passes on something, is going to insist that it have the facts upon which it can base a judgment. I for one do not believe that any hon. member of this house should be asked to pass judgment on something in regard to which he has no essential information. It is for that reason and the other reasons I have explained that I shall oppose this motion.

Mr. Church: Twentieth century Liberalism.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think that by this time we are all aware of the fact that this is a most unusual motion. In addition to the motion being unusual it is quite clear that the reason it is taking time, the reason it is contentious, is to be found in the attitude of of Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), when he spoke a week ago tomorrow night. I do not think anyone would deny the fact that this house has shown itself on many occasions prepared to co-operate with any reasonable suggestion. I am satisfied that if the government had gone about this thing in a reasonable way we might not be taking up the time that this house is having to spend today on this matter; but you cannot threaten a democratic parliament and not have it cost at least time.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that some of us have wondered who helped the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) draft this motion. It is so unusual I wonder whether it came from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As I say, I have gone back and looked over the records of the past. In the noon hour there was not time to go through everything that has happened since 1867 down to the present time; but I went to the library and pulled out the Journals, and in some instances Hansard, of certain years of the past, some of them deliberately but many of them at random. For example, I pulled out both the Journals and Hansard for the year 1872, the year the bill went through respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a private bill, a very important bill in the life of this country, introduced by a private member by the name of Mr. Grant. I pulled out volume after volume across the years, and looked at standing orders that were suspended. In no case did I find a standing order suspended for the purpose of giving more than the allotted time to private bills. Just in case it might have happened in a certain period in the life of parliament I took the years from 1930 to 1935 and pulled out every year, and looked at every standing order that was suspended during that regime, and not once was a standing order suspended for the purpose of giving extra time to the consideration of a private bill.

I may say that standing orders have been suspended frequently, shall I say, in every session of parliament. The kinds that are usually suspended are the standing orders that have to do with the petitions being filed in time. But I repeat, never has there been an instance, so far as I could find out, where extra time has been taken away from public business and given to private bills.

I read with interest over the week end some of the debates respecting these very rules regarding private bills when they were passed back in 1867 and revised in the early seventies. The whole spirit of those debates was that private bills must be subjected to a special stringency not applied to public bills and government measures. Therefore, I emphasize the fact that this is a most unusual precedent that the Prime Minister is bringing before parliament at the present time.

There was an occasion in 1895 when an attempt was made to suspend a certain standing order having to do with private bills, although it was not the particular standing order that we have been considering today. During the course of the discussion on that matter none other than Sir Richard Cartwright, who was quite an outstanding Liberal, had something pretty forceful to say. This was on July 5, 1895. Sir Richard Cartwright said:

> There are a number of important bills that we have no chance of touching. The government do not propose to suspend the rules of the house and let them have a chance, but in favour of this bill they propose to suspend all the rules of this house, because by accepting this motion, you practically decree that our standing orders are of no consequence whatever, that every standing order of this house may be abrogated without notice, a proposition that seems to me to be a monstrous one.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that that position taken by Sir Richard Cartwright, namely, that the house should oppose any effort on the part of the government to give extra time to private bills, at the expense of private members' public bills and at the expense of government legislation, is a monstrous proposition that should not be tolerated in this house.

I call as another witness another Liberal, the present Prime Minister, who had something to say on a similar matter in this house on October 28 of this year. On that occasion, bearing in mind we had not concluded the debate on a motion before the house having to do with federal aid to education, I moved an amendment to a motion the Prime Minister presented to the house, and in my amendment I asked that we have one more private members' Wednesday, and that the order of business be arranged so that on that one more Wednesday we might continue to discuss, not private bills, but a private member's resolution relating to a matter of public policy—and a very important matter.

What did the Prime Minister have to say? He said:

> I do not think it would be a good precedent—

Note that, "good precedent"—

> —to have the house decide that any one of these academic resolutions submitted by hon. members should have precedence over the other. The rights of each member are equal, and when there is an opportunity for those rights to be exercised, it seems to me that they should be exercised according to the provisions of the standing orders.

And then later he said:

> There should not be a day especially set aside for the continuation of the debate on the resolution of the member for Saskatoon.

Well, when we have now the same Prime Minister, who would not agree to this house taking further time to discuss a matter of public policy, moving a motion which gives special consideration to two private bills, I am wondering who these people are who get this special consideration.

That led me to look up the names of some of those who are behind these bills. I find that in one case one of the promoters is none other than a certain John Black Aird. I would like to know if he is the same John Aird who appeared before the committee investigating the Beauharnois power project on July 17, 1931, and was asked a long string of questions, just one or two of which I would like to quote.

> Q. Is it fair to sum up your recollection of your conversation with Mr. Sweezey this way: You met him and asked him how he was getting along: He said he was having a bit of trouble and you said, "Perhaps I can help you out, but I want 50 cents a horse-power or $125,000 if you get the contract?"
> A. That was the first conversation; yes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot see how what the hon. member is reading has reference to the motion before the house.

Mr. Knowles: I just asked the question—a rhetorical question, I confess: Who are the people to whom special consideration is being given, by the terms of the Prime Minister's motion? I know one of those persons is John Black Aird. I would ask the house to recall something in the past about one who appears to be the same person. Just one or two more questions—

Mr. Speaker: There is no evidence before the house to permit the hon. member to conclude that the gentleman referred to in the committee report is the same person as the one by a similar name in the bill.

Mr. Knowles: All right, we will leave that until we reach committee on the bill.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that this motion of the Prime Minister today is the end result of a long series of special benefits that have been accorded to these bills incorporating pipe lines which, frankly, I regard as indecent.

I would remind the house that last April, before the Easter recess, the Minister of Trade and Commerce urged the House of Commons to speed things up to give second reading to the pipe lines bill.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, when these bills were discussed at the last session the Minister of Trade and Commerce was in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Trade and Commerce misunderstood me. I was referring to the general pipe lines bill, which was passed before the Easter recess, and I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce was here then.

Mr. Howe: For part of the discussion only.

Mr. Knowles: He was here at the time when he asked the house to give the bill second reading so that the principle could be endorsed, and so that the bills incorporating companies could be introduced to the Senate. Does he not recall that that did happen?

Mr. Howe: I do not recall it. I was here during the early discussion of the pipe lines bill, but I went to the United Kingdom two weeks before the session ended.

Mr. Knowles: But there is no doubt that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was here for the proceedings to which I referred. Then when we came back after the Easter recess we were informed on the Monday night that parliament would be prorogued or dissolved on Saturday of that week. With respect to the suspension of standing orders, look up the Journals for that week and you will find that it was done with respect to a great many of those bills, except that no extra time was allowed. But other standing orders were set aside one after the other, at the request of the government, to facilitate getting those incorporating bills through.

The whole picture during that period of time at the end of April, just before the election at that, was to me an indecent one, confronted as we were with this desire of the government to get these pipe line companies incorporated.

Now, after all that indecency we had last April, we have this instance of a little delay in the house with respect to the second reading of these bills, at which time the Minister of Trade and Commerce gets up and accuses the house of filibustering. Along with that he accuses this party of being responsible for that filibustering, whereas up to that time only one member of this party, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones), had spoken to those bills, and very briefly at that.

After that charge by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that a filibuster was being carried out we receive this threat that unless the house passes these bills there will be this special kind of motion brought in. Well, apparently the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave the house one more chance on Friday night to see whether the bills would go through. They did not go through, so that now we have this motion.

But I ask hon. members to note that no matter how much the government may try to put forward the niceties of the situation and say that they are still private members' bills, the house should note that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister have brought in this motion to facilitate getting these bills through—and that, by the way, in spite of this quotation from Bourinot —and I am not speaking to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, but just as a matter of argument, where he says at page 581:

> It is a recognized principle in the Canadian, as in the English parliament, that ministers of the crown should not initiate or promote private bill legislation. But ministers sit on private bill committees in the Canadian commons—

And notice this—> —and carefully scrutinize all private and local legislation with a view to guarding the public interest.

And there is a footnote which says:

> In England, the occupants of the treasury bench are exempt from serving on private bill committees.

I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister will tell us that they did not initiate these private bills, and that in the strict sense they are not promoting them. But they certainly are the two persons in this House of Commons who are facilitating getting these bills through.

In the light of these precedents and in the light of the practice that ministers of the crown stay away from these private bills and especially company incorporations where such huge sums of money are involved, they have made a serious breach—both of them—in what they are doing at the present time.

I intend to bring my remarks to a close.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I notice hon. members opposite say "Hear, hear". I hope they will say "Hear, hear" a minute from now. I intend to move an amendment to the motion of the Prime Minister. I move—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to note that my amendment is accepted even before hon. members hear its terms. As has already been pointed out, under standing order 15 an hour is set aside on Tuesday nights for private and public bills, the former having precedence.

Mr. Bradette: We know that.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) does know that. I wish the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) knew it, and I wish the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) knew it. I wish whoever drafted this motion had known it and recognized that fact.

The motion before us proposes to extend the time allotted for the consideration of private bills. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has pointed out, if there is to be any fairness in a proposal to change the rules, such rules should be changed on the basis of equality as between private and public bills. If the time is going to be extended, let it be extended, not just for private bills but for public bills also. As a matter of fact, if there is to be any distinction it ought to be the other way around: there ought to be allowed extra time for public bills rather than extra time for private bills. So if this motion is before us, despite my objection to it this morning, I feel that some attempt should be made to make it a proper motion. For that purpose I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

> That the motion be amended by inserting therein between the word "private" and the word "bills," at each of the three places in the said motion where the phrase "private bills" appears, the words "and public," so that in each case the phrase "private bills" will read "private and public bills."

May I point out, before someone else does, that if this amendment were to carry and if it were ordered that tomorrow evening the hour for private and public bills shall be extended to the three-hour period, if the debate on the private bills consumed the whole of the three-hour period then of course we would not get to public bills. But I admit that that is the way the standing order now stands, that private bills always have precedence over public bills in the hour allotted. However, because of the way the Prime Minister has worded his motion, if we have not finished with private bills at nine o'clock tomorrow night we can continue for the rest of the evening, but with a proviso attached. Thus, if we finish private bills at ten o'clock, do we then take public bills? No, we go on with the business that was in hand at six o'clock.

I submit that somewhere in this picture there should be some element of fairness. My contention is that the attitude shown toward these pipe line bills through the whole piece has been one where the government, led by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has gone just a little bit too far. I submit that this disregard of the primary importance of government legislation and of public bills over private bills has been carried just a little bit too far.

The whole business is amazing to all of us. What we are witnessing in this house in connection with this private bill matter, what we are witnessing in the action of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce in attempting to facilitate the passing of these bills, is indeed as bad as we are saying it is; in fact it is a whole lot worse. I have been startled at the number of things which have been done during this session which are contrary to hundreds of years of British parliamentary practice.

True, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been mixed up in most of them, but that is no reason why the government should continue to make this kind of mistake. I hope the amendment I have moved will be accepted. Even if it is, it will not be satisfactory, but if we are going to change standing order 15 with respect to Tuesday evening at least it will be changed so that the additional time provided will permit consideration, not just of private bills but of private and public bills as provided for by the standing order itself.

Mr. Speaker: Before reading the amendment may I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I noted his remark when he reminded me that he did not approve of my ruling this morning. Perhaps I should have reminded him and other hon. members of the house at that time that standing order 15 is frequently suspended with regard to Monday sittings. Standing order 15 provides for the order of business as follows:

> Monday (private members' day).
> Private bills

That standing order is regularly suspended. I think it has been suspended in every session which I have attended without any reference to the committee on standing orders.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, if the proposed motion is accepted by the house the result will be that tomorrow evening private bills will be considered after nine o'clock rather than being restricted to the hour between eight and nine. I assume that if the government does not achieve its purpose of having these two bills put through tomorrow night it will take further steps to see that they are passed before the end of the session. As has been mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the effect of this move is to put aside government business, the business of the country, in order to allow these private bills to go through.

In fact the government is forcing these two private bills to a vote at a time when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is professing complete indifference as to whether they are passed. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is not quite so naive. He has expressed everything but indifference with regard to the bills. The effect of the government's action will be to benefit two groups of individuals who are applying for incorporation of two natural gas pipe line companies, one company to be known as the Alberta Natural Gas Company and the other as Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

Not only will the effect be to benefit these individuals who have applied for charters—we all know that they are applying on behalf of undisclosed principals—but I understand that one incorporation is in effect being sought by a company known as Northwest Natural Gas Company which is described in the Financial Times of November 18 as a United States corporation which plans to pipe Alberta natural gas south into the states of Washington and Oregon with side lines to southern British Columbia cities, such as Vancouver.

Has the government actually the gall to pick and choose among private bills and to say, "We like this private bill and we want it to go through"? That is what they are doing here. They are picking two private bills and attempting to force them through the house, or in any event to force them to a vote. After the stand taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), everyone knows that it will be a most independent-minded Liberal, such as the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who will stand up and vote against the bills. If this is to be the course followed by the government, then why not change the rules? If they are going to force these measures through, then let them be honest about it, change the rules, and provide that these things can be done legally.

May I point out that the government is attempting to force these bills through despite the fact that there is a most important issue at stake.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is not discussing the principle of the motion before the house or of the amendment. I am not calling upon him to discuss only the amendment, but I ask him to direct his remarks to the principle of the motion.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, here we have a motion introduced by the government for the purpose of setting aside extra time to discuss these bills. I suggest to you that I am entitled to explain why, in my opinion, a certain stand has been taken as to these measures by those who oppose them. It is pertinent to the discussion. The speeches made on these bills have not been made merely for the sake of taking up the time of the house. I made a speech on one of them myself and pointed out why I was opposed to it. I repeat that there is a most important issue at stake, and that is why many of us are so concerned with the motion now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot agree with the hon. member. It is not in order for him to discuss why he is opposed to the bills. He has an opportunity to do that when the bills are before the house for discussion, but he should not do so on the present motion.

Mr. Green: Surely I am entitled to say why I think the discussion on the bills should not be cut off, and why the government should not take the action it is taking today.

An hon. Member: It will give more time.

Mr. Green: The whole point is that I believe the gas pipe lines should serve the Canadian people first before they go into the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow that discussion. I hope the hon. member will not pursue it at this time.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, surely questions of that kind are involved in the present motion. I will not follow that point further except to say that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are now taking the position that we must pass these bills, and that provision must be made at this session in order that the house can express an opinion by a vote on these two measures.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has suggested that any group of men who come here and ask for a charter, provided they are apparently financially able and responsible people, should be given a charter by the house without any further argument. He says: Let them fight it out; let as many companies apply as wish to do so, and then let them fight it out, or let the Alberta government decide. On the 8th of November the Minister of Trade and Commerce said at page 1559 of Hansard:

> And may I say in passing that I am very glad indeed, as a member of this government, that the province of Alberta has relieved this government of the responsibility of making a choice of pipe line companies to do this particular job.

He has made other statements. For example, he has intimated he will see to it that gas is supplied to Vancouver before it goes to the United States. I do not know how he is going to do that if the pipe line is to go through the United States first. I do not believe he is that all-powerful. No arrangement has been made with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is again discussing the bills and not the motion.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I submit I should not be prevented from speaking in this way. The Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have not been restricted, and I suggest I should be entitled to make my case.

Mr. Speaker: I think I have probably given the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra more latitude than I gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I may have given the leader of the opposition a little more latitude, but I think it is his wish, and the wish of hon. members of the house, that at this time the discussion should be on the motion.

Mr. Green: In the face of that ruling, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid it is going to be difficult to discuss the merits of this particular resolution.

An hon. Member: Give it a try.

Mr. Green: I would say in conclusion that we have here an attempt at dictation by the Minister of Trade and Commerce backed up by the Prime Minister. The Minister of Trade and Commerce intervened in the debate on these private bills, and in effect took the stand that the government was behind them. There can be little doubt in the mind of any member of the house that actually the government is behind these measures, and that is particularly clear in view of the action being taken today. This concern to aid pipe line promoters does not compare favourably with the failure to give consideration to such people as the recipients of war veterans' allowance and our senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: The action of the government in bringing this motion forward today shows not only that the ministry is arrogant but also that it is a big-interest government, and I hope the people of Canada will realize that clearly.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, within the limits which your ruling places on the debate, I agree that it will be difficult to debate the matter. No reasons have yet been given either by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) why the rules of the house should be suspended in order to give precedence to two private bills, and I say that puts an additional difficulty in our way. Surely, there must be some peculiar merit in these two bills. There must be some particular urgency. There must be some public interest to be served if we are going to delay the business of this house in order to have a debate on them, and have them carried if possible. That being so, surely we are entitled to hear from those who have now put themselves in the position of promoting these bills.

An hon. Member: Carried.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MacInnis: One of the rubber stamps says "Carried". If that is what he was sent here for, that, of course, is his business and the business of his constituents. If he continues to act in that way, I would not be surprised if he were a bird of one flight.

Mr. McIlraith: He is entitled to an opinion, just as you are.

Mr. MacInnis: During the time I have been in this house, nothing has distressed me so much as what has happened today. We are putting ourselves in the position where—

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, did I understand the hon. gentleman to call me a rubber stamp?

Mr. MacInnis: I did not call anyone a rubber stamp except the one who called "Carried" when I had the floor.

Mr. McIvor: If the hon. member has called me a rubber stamp, he will take it back here or some other place.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver East has assured the house that he did not refer to the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know what the laughter is about, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps it is because of the belligerency of a person who I thought was an apostle of peace.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that nothing that has happened in this house during the time I have been here has so disturbed and distressed me as what has been done here today. As has been already stated, we find that not only the government but two of its most prominent members, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), are putting themselves on record as the promoters of private bills.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member should make that assertion. I am certainly not promoting any private bill, but I am promoting the principle that, when parliament has declared the only way to proceed to get incorporation is by an act of parliament, an opportunity should be afforded for parliament to express its views, in spite of what appear to be concerted efforts to talk the matters out.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I have been here quite a while. I have seen the government of which the Prime Minister was a member often talk bills out. This is the only session of parliament since I came here when private members' bills or resolutions were allowed to go to a vote. The government majority is so large they feel they do not need to care what the people think about what members on the opposition side of the House think. If the Prime Minister is not promoting these bills, he is certainly facilitating their passage through this house.

Mr. McIlraith: Not their passage.

Mr. MacInnis: Let us look at what is happening. Surely, the members of this house have the right to oppose any measure that is brought before the house.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. MacInnis: Any measure that comes into this house—

Mr. McIlraith: That is what is being given to you.

Mr. MacInnis: Any measure that comes into this house according to the rules of the house, that is the point I wish to make. The bills which come before this house are of three types. There are government bills which the government usually carries without much difficulty. There are public bills which are put forward by private members of all parties. Then there are private bills which are first of all promoted by outside interests who have some special private interest to advance. If it so affects the interests of the country that those individuals must come here for a charter, surely it does not automatically follow that they must receive a charter merely upon presentation of a bill.

Mr. St. Laurent: No.

Mr. MacInnis: The Prime Minister says "no". If that is correct, then those who are opposed to what is being asked are entitled to oppose it until they defeat the measure, if they can. If that is not the principle of parliamentary procedure, then I do not know what parliamentary procedure really is. Private bills are in a particular category. The rules and forms of this house have made that abundantly clear.

Let me draw to the attention of this house what an outstanding Liberal said in connection with private bills and the position of members of parliament in regard to them. I am quoting from Hansard, 1883, volume 1, page 37:

> We have adopted a system wholly vicious, a system by which members of the house are expected, not merely to introduce and take the first steps in connection with the passage of private bills, but also to become their advocates and active promoters, and the position which we see is assumed with regard to such bills is one which is quite inconsistent with the true position of members of parliament called upon to pass judgment on them.

If we are to be free members of parliament, we cannot put ourselves in the position where we are supporting private interests outside this house. There is nothing further I wish to say on this subject. As I said, I believe a debate should be allowed on the merit of the bills; for how can anyone say whether the rules should be suspended if there is not some particular reason for doing so? That reason must lie in the merit or demerit of the private bills referred to in the motion.

The motion, as it is based on part 4 of standing order 15, should also apply to public bills unless the government takes the position that these private bills are more important than the half dozen public bills that are on the order paper. If the government takes that position, regardless of what they may say, they are supporting and promoting these bills.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this debate. After listening to a number of speakers, however, I do think, and I think all members must feel, that the whole question has acquired a rather unpleasant odour. I say that as a member of a group who have already stated that they were prepared to support the pipe line bills, that they were not opposing them. On the other hand, when I find that one of the men supporting one of these pipe line bills is one of the same men who were mixed up in the Beauharnois scandal, I think perhaps we may change our opinion in regard to supporting measures of that kind in this house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member will not pursue that subject further at this time.

An hon. Member: That is hot.

Mr. Quelch: I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that the less said on that subject, the better for the government anyway.

Another point that I disliked greatly was when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the other night threatened the members of this house that if they continued their opposition to the bill, action would be taken by the government to facilitate its passage. Right at that time, although we were supporting the bill, I felt like getting up and opposing it, because I do not like any form of intimidation. Now we find the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) bringing in a resolution to carry out the threat of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I have been in the house since 1935, and on many occasions I have seen private measures talked out by members of the Liberal party; and no member of the Liberal party has been better at that than the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank).

I think for a while he must have had the official job of talking out measures brought before this house. Not once did the government step in to facilitate the passage of a bill or measure that was being talked out by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Why do the government now feel it necessary to step in to force a measure through this house; and that is what it really amounts to. Surely that action can only be taken by the government because they are interested in seeing this measure go through. I do not mean that they are interested personally in that they will benefit by it, but they have shown by their action that they are personally interested in seeing that these bills go through the house.

Mr. Church: You might as well abolish parliament.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Like the last speaker, I had not intended to say anything about this matter, but I will add just a word or two. Without much knowledge of the subject, I assume that the division of time as between government business, private bills, and private members' public bills was carefully thought out in times past, that these rules with regard to this division of time were established with care, and stood the test of years. That does not say that they are sacrosanct or that they should not be changed. But like others who have spoken, I think that the circumstances under which we are being asked to change them are, to put the matter mildly, unfortunate. There will certainly be the feeling that has been expressed strongly that if any change in the rules is made now, it is made under circumstances which, as I said a moment ago, are unfortunate, to say the least. It seems to me that it would be infinitely better if we had been able to discuss the matter on its merits; and I am afraid that many people will feel that that is not being done at the present time. I had a phrase running through my mind, and I have sent out to find out a little bit more about it. There is an old phrase, which will be familiar to the lawyers, and which was in use at the time when the strict rules of law which had been so rigid and unyielding were tempered by rules of equity. It became a saying that equity was determined according to the length of the foot of the chancellor. I will read you a short explanation:

> Equity is according to the conscience of him that is chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity . . . one chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot. 'Tis the same thing in the chancellor's conscience.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if this motion goes through, we are going to determine this matter not on the merits of the case but really, as has been suggested, according to the shortness of the temper of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; and I think that would be a most unfortunate thing.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I want to oppose the resolution of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, and place myself on record if only as supporting the amendment that has been suggested. As a matter of fact I would prefer that the resolution even as amended should be defeated. The question in my mind is as to the difference between the position the Prime Minister has taken today and the position he took on October 28. You will recall that on that day he brought in a motion—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not stop the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he referred to a previous debate in this session. He made a short reference to it. When a brief reference is made to a former debate on another subject in the present session it has not been my custom to stop the hon. member making it. I hope that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) is not now going to discuss at any length a debate which took place during the present session.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that reference be made to May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition, at page 316, and I shall read only a sentence or two:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded . . . The rule, however, is not always strictly enforced: peculiar circumstances may seem to justify a member in alluding to a past debate, and the house and the Speaker will judge, in each case, how far the rule may fairly be relaxed.

I think Your Honour was perfectly fair in what you did to me. I hope you will treat others in the same way.

Mr. Speaker: I think I followed that reference when I allowed the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to allude to the debate. I think he went a little further than alluding to the debate, but I did not stop him. I hope the hon. member for York South will not do more than allude to that debate.

Mr. Noseworthy: I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it was not my intention in any way to speak in opposition to your ruling or to contravene the rules of the house. We find it a little bit difficult, however, to carry on this debate without running foul of the rules somewhere. I was pointing out that I am rather at a loss to understand the different attitude that the Prime Minister is taking today from the one he took on a former occasion. Then he was greatly concerned about getting the business of the government through the house. Some of us were asking for the privilege of speaking for two or three hours on the subject of education; but we were assured that so much government business was before the house that we could not go on with that discussion.

The second point raised by the Prime Minister on that occasion was that it would not be fair to permit extra time for the discussion of that particular public bill brought in by a private member, that all these bills should be treated in the same way, and that no preference should be given to any one. It is quite evident from the resolution before us that for some reason or other the government is anxious that more time should be apportioned to the debate on these particular pipe-line bills than the ordinary rules of the house would permit. I simply want to register my protest on the ground that the particular measure which we were discussing on October 28, namely, the question of federal aid to education, was in my humble opinion of just as great a public interest as is either of the bills before us, and for which special time is being provided in this resolution.

The second point on which I wish to register my protest is the extent, as has already been said, to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at least, and today the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), are placing the whole weight of the government behind these bills through the introduction of the resolution which is now before us.

When this question was under debate, as is recorded on page 1806 of Hansard—the quotation has already been placed on Hansard—the Minister of Trade and Commerce ended his speech in this way:

> I hope that this house will grant the incorporations.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is going to quote the sentence I think he had better quote all of the sentence.

Mr. Noseworthy: If the minister wants the entire sentence quoted I shall do so. It reads as follows:

> Therefore, I hope that these pipe-line bills will be examined and if they are properly sponsored—

I presume there is no question of that.

> —I hope that this house will grant the incorporations.

Which would seem to me to indicate that the government was lending its weight, or at least the Minister of Trade and Commerce was lending the weight and influence of his position, to induce hon. members to vote for these particular bills. The danger that I see is that following the precedent which we shall set today by accepting this resolution, any private bill brought in to this house in future which any cabinet minister wishes to promote may have special time given to it as it is proposed to give these bills. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if you are going to give special time in this instance then we should carry that rule through and special time should be given to some of these public bills which government members, and in some instances cabinet ministers, have talked out during this session.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) adds the word "public" to the amendment so that it reads: "Private and public bills." I am opposed to this particular doctrine. I might express my objection in a few minutes. I am opposed to this particular doctrine of interference with the rights of private members by a resolution instead of an amendment to the standing orders. If the motion is not amended private members might just as well go home and allow the cabinet to rule.

This debate today has taken more of the time of the house than has been taken up by the first bill to which objection is taken. I object to anything being done in the house to interfere with the rights, privileges and functions of private members to take part in the debate in accordance with their rights and privileges under the constitution.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): There is one matter which I should like to make abundantly clear. We of the C.C.F. do not like this motion at all. We realize that the government has a big enough majority to carry whatever the government wishes to carry. Though we offer an amendment to the motion, thinking that it might make some slight improvement, whether the government accepts our amendment or not we still retain our fundamental objections to the motion. If the amendment is accepted we shall vote against the motion as amended, and if it is not accepted we shall still vote against the motion.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to labour the matter at all, but I do wish to refer to one fact. The course suggested by the motion amounts to a suspension of the rules. Under standing order 116 a suspension of the rule can only take place in cases of "urgent and pressing necessity".

I have no feelings in regard to the pipe line bill that will go to a committee. But when I find a motion such as this with no explanation as to any pressing emergency or necessity I wonder whether everything is above the surface as it should be. As I look at the situation I would have thought that the Prime Minister—if ever there was a Prime Minister of our country with a knowledge of the law to equal his, I am not aware of the fact—would have laid a foundation, as he led off on this motion, to let the house and the country know what are the matters of "urgent and pressing necessity" that require a complete change in our rules.

Because of the ruling that you made I find myself, sir, in the position of all those who have preceded me, of being unable to discuss this matter as I should like. With the greatest deference I say this. If the onus is on us to show that there is no urgency or pressing necessity for this, the facts of the bill would have to be discussed in order to show it. You, sir, having so ruled, the discussion as a result becomes more or less theoretical. The only justification advanced was by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which apparently is that a filibuster has taken place. I have looked up the meaning of filibuster. Filibuster means this: any one or a group who attempt to prevent legislation by prolonged speaking to consume time. Obstruction, of course, is to block and to hinder. How many spoke on this matter? I think the total number who have spoken, including the minister, was seven or eight hon. members. The total discussion on this subject amounted to some two and a half hours. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with that peculiar affection for parliament and parliamentary procedure that he has always shown, was fearful that parliament was being circumvented.

He gave the House of Commons an hour of grace on November 15. I have read the reports in the British Journals, and I find no case where at any time any minister, much less a prime minister, became an active proponent of a bill introduced by a private member. What is the reason for this solicitude? No one knows. Why the urgency? Would discussion for a few more days have possibly brought other matters to light? The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) was one who took a firm stand; was he an obstructionist? Was any speech delivered by any member of the house on this matter other than a fair and proper discussion and an examination of matters deserving to be examined by parliament?

What are we coming to? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out that there were no precedents for this course in Canada. I ask the Prime Minister when he replies to answer why this rush, why this endeavour to put the matter before a committee and thus deny a legitimate and proper criticism in parliament?

There is more to this than appears upon the surface. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) gave the house an hour of grace. His words were these—and he wants them quoted:

> I should like also to say a word about what seems obviously to be a filibuster in connection with these bills. The government will not permit any small number of members to prevent this house as a whole from voting on a private bill.

Where was this small group of members? Members in all parts of the house spoke, seven in all—

Mr. Howe: If my hon. member will count the speeches on both bills I think he will find they ran to fifteen or sixteen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am referring to the bill to which the minister referred in the words I have quoted. Yes, that is true; there were speeches on the other bill too. Surely this House of Commons is not to be throttled in order to meet the peculiar wishes of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? That is the issue here.

Nothing surprises me any more after what was revealed in the last few days in connection with the combines report.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—"order"—I wait for direction in that connection from Your Honour. Surely I am allowed to refer to that as but another example of playing with parliament by virtue of the fact that the Prime Minister places his weight as Prime Minister, and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, behind this resolution.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member will not pursue the subject of the Combines Investigation Act further at this time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is out of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was discussing it as another example similar to this that occurred within the last few days. In this case parliament refused to follow the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It did not dance to his dictatorial tune. In effect he ordered the house on November 15 in these words, "you have a few more days, and then this government will see to it that your rights shall be denied."

Sir, this morning the Prime Minister spoke with almost contemptuous disregard of the rights of minorities in parliament. We have a government with an overwhelming majority, supported as it must be by its membership—for, after all, every government has power over the membership following it to insist upon obedience.

Is there any member supporting the government who dare stand in the House of Commons and show his independence after the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have thrown themselves wholeheartedly behind this motion? Quintin Hogg in his book on parliament says:

> The rights of minorities and individuals are as indispensable a factor in a democracy as the privileges of an anonymous majority.

I say again that if there was any suggestion of filibustering, then the Prime Minister has his rights in order to prevent such filibustering. He has his rights under the rules. But instead of exercising the rights he possesses under the rules, he decides to change the rules. If there was filibustering the Prime Minister had power to apply closure, as it has been applied in proper cases. Instead of doing that he adopts the backdoor method of introducing an amendment to change the rules for the occasion. Parliamentary rules have stood the test in this country for eighty years, and in the mother of parliaments for two hundred years. It is dangerous to parliamentary government when rules become a monopoly of the Prime Minister and the government to be changed whenever they deem it necessary.

The motion in its present form mutilates parliamentary procedure, and I use those words advisedly. For it places in the hands of the government of this country, supported as it is by an overwhelming majority, the right at any time, at the wish and whim of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—and, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), so often says, I say this in a spirit of kindliness—

Mr. Howe: "In a kindly way"—get it right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to circumvent parliament and parliamentary procedure.

Nothing can stop the government from doing what it will with the rules for it is omnipotent. It is omnipotent because of its overwhelming majority. It is omnipotent because of the control the cabinet has over its followers, in that there are two sanctions that can be applied against independence, one being the threat of dissolution and the other the threat of preferment.

I have not spoken on these pipe line bills. The opposition has a right to demand the preservation of the rules of parliament, and not to have them changed at the will of the government. Parliamentary rules are designed to deny the short-cuts in parliamentary procedure which have taken place on a number of recent occasions.

In my opinion the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) does not meet the situation. Proper debate is not filibuster. Indeed, in an important matter that was before parliament some weeks ago, the question of grants for education to the provinces, was talked out by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He spoke on it, no vote, the debate was adjourned, and private members' days were ended. There was no question of a filibuster by the Prime Minister, but that was the effect of what occurred.

I am not interested either directly or indirectly in any of these applicant companies. I have no views with regard to them although I have heard arguments on both sides. I am concerned with this motion which transcends the fortunes of any company, whether any of the principals in that company were interested in Beauharnois or not. This motion is but another example of an arbitrary attitude of mind on the part of this government. The government seems to develop that arbitrary turn of mind from being led or misled by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Throughout the years this attitude has revealed itself, in this case in interference with the rules of parliament and in other cases by circumvention of parliamentary tradition and procedure.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, many hon. gentlemen have spoken of the government's overwhelming majority, and the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has referred to the many occasions when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had circumvented parliament. I can assure hon. members that if the government has an overwhelming majority it is because of the opinion of the people of Canada about the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On every occasion and on every platform where I appeared during the campaign I never failed to pay tribute to the great service that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had rendered to this country and to assert that although the path might not be easy for trade in the months or years to come there was no man in Canada better fitted to guide Canadian trade during that period than the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The response that was made was such that it enables hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate to jeer at the fact that the government has an overwhelming majority. They forget that that overwhelming majority was sent here by the electors of this nation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With a hidden report.

Business of the House

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) says, "with a hidden report." The hon. member should make a more worthy defence of the position he occupies and not make an insinuation of that kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not an insinuation, it is the truth.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member knows that there was no hidden report and he knows also that if he had been placed in the position in which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was placed his conduct would have been similar to that of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There can be no justification to break the law.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Lake Centre says that he does not think there is much in this amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The government has no objection to the amendment. Hon. members say that this motion is designed to throttle parliament, but that assertion is ridiculous. All that is being done is to ask that there be more time when hon. members can say whatever they have to say about these bills. It is to remove something which would throttle debate upon them; that is the purpose of the motion before the house.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wishes his amendment to pass, I have no objection to it. I do not think that much can be added to what has been said. A certain number of charters for pipe line companies have been granted. I have been told that these charters are regarded as being of considerable value and will be regarded as of greater value if no more are granted. Whether that be so or not, I do not know. I do think that having approved, as we did, of legislation that provides that these incorporations must be by act of parliament, when incorporators apply for an act of parliament they should be given an answer. It is for that reason and that reason only that the motion has been drafted. I do not remember who it was, but I can assure the hon. member who inquired that I drafted the motion myself.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived.

HOUSING

INCREASED RENTALS—COMMUNICATIONS FROM PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): In the absence of the Minister of Finance, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. Have any communications been received from any of the provinces regarding the announcement of rent increases? If so, from which provinces have communications been received, and will copies of that correspondence be supplied?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I shall draw the attention of the minister to the hon. member's question when he returns.

INCREASED RENTALS—LIABILITY OF TENANTS TO FURTHER INCREASES ON DECEMBER 15

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I should like to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) last Friday. It reads as follows:

Are tenants who have had their rents increased by maximum rental decisions made since the minister made his announcement on November 3 liable to further increases on or after December 15?

The answer is yes. The increases announced by the minister on November 3 would apply to the actual amount of the rent in effect on December 15.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Will the parliamentary assistant take up with the minister the possibility of amending the order so as to give some reprieve to those people who have had one increase since November 3, so that any further increase might at least be delayed?

Mr. Sinclair: The only increase which could have been granted since November 3 is a special increase granted as one of the six special classes for which rental increases can be authorized by a decision of the board. There has been no change of policy affecting those increases since November 3 which would make them any different from those which were authorized immediately before November 3.

Mr. Knowles: There may be a difference, but it is still tough on the tenant.

CHINA

QUESTION AS TO RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question of which I have not given him notice. I hope it is one which can be answered without formal notice having been extended. Today's press carries reports to the effect that eight nations of the commonwealth agreed last week to recognize the Moscow-dominated communist government of China. Is the Prime Minister in a position to inform the house whether or not that statement is correct? If it is not correct, will there be an opportunity for the house to debate this question before such recognition is extended?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to make inquiries about that. I must confess I was quite as surprised as the leader of the opposition on hearing such a report over the radio yesterday. No dispatch to that effect has come to my attention. Just as soon as there is any development in that regard, I shall see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs informs the house. So far as I know, the position is as stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he made his address to the house.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES AS TO CHOICE OF ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): On October 3 an order for return was passed for the correspondence that passed between the dominion and provincial governments relative to the location of the trans-Canada highway. Will the minister say whether or not he is at present in a position, in view of the fact that the debate on this subject will now take place, to table the correspondence requested and directed by that return?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the reason for not tabling the correspondence is that the permission of all the provinces has not been forthcoming. If the hon. member wishes to have tabled, up to the date of his motion, the correspondence with the provinces who have registered no objection, I shall be glad to do that this afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. In addition I should like to know whether any provinces directed the minister not to lay on the table of the house their correspondence as to the location of the route. If so, which provinces did so?

Mr. Winters: There were several provinces which requested us not to table the correspondence between their governments and the federal government. This afternoon I shall table the correspondence I am able to table, and the hon. member will then see which provinces have not given their consent.

IMMIGRATION

TRANSFER OF DEPARTMENTAL PERSONNEL FROM OTTAWA TO MONTREAL AND TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources about the transfer of staff in the immigration offices to Montreal and Toronto. I understand that the department pays the cost of moving, but has the department secured houses for these people in Toronto and Montreal? If so, are they Central Mortgage and Housing Company houses?

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to restrict questions unduly, but this question does seem to me to be one which should appear on the order paper.

Mr. Fraser: The staff is being moved before Christmas, which is only a month away. If I put the question on the order paper, I shall not get an answer in time.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that if notice were given the question would appear on the order paper within forty-eight hours and an answer could be given.

Mr. Fraser: I put a question on the order paper on September 27, and I only received an answer the other day. I shall expect the answer to this question after Christmas.

May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are supplying houses to the Department of Mines and Resources for the immigration staff in Montreal and Toronto?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I will take the question as notice.

[Mr. Winters.]

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY—PRICE FIXING AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of the fact that amendments to the Combines Investigation Act may come up shortly, can the Minister of Justice tell me when we may expect a return dealing with the alleged assurances given by the wartime prices and trade board to the milling industry?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): We hope we can get it ready for tomorrow. I may say that the difficulty there is that my hon. friend, in his address, mentioned any assurances that had been given by any wartime prices and trade board officials. To go back through the extremely voluminous files of the wartime prices and trade board and to make sure that the ones which are produced are all that were given is an extremely difficult task. I am afraid that in the end, though we shall try to bring down what my hon. friend wants, we shall have to assure him that it is quite impossible for us to say that what we bring down is all that any official has ever given.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that I shall be quite satisfied if the minister produces assurances from Mr. Donald Gordon and from Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Garson: I thought that was what my hon. friend wanted, but that was not what his address for an order of the house said.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

R.C.A.F.—REMOVAL OF NO. 10 REPAIR DEPOT FROM CALGARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the Department of National Defence adopted a plan to move No. 10 repair depot, R.C.A.F., from Calgary? If so, what are the reasons for this action?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: That also seems to be a question for the order paper.

Mr. Harkness: The minister is ready to answer it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says that the minister is prepared to answer it. I think that at times ministers have answered questions which should have been put on the order paper. Even if ministers are prepared to answer, I must remind hon. members, including the ministers, that only questions which are urgent should be asked or answered on the orders of the day.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct this question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the minister? When will he be in a position to make available for distribution copies of the public accounts? The public accounts were tabled three weeks ago today, and at that time the parliamentary assistant said that they would be available for distribution within a few days. That was on October 31.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): That was the understanding at that time, because they were in the hands of the king's printer. I shall make inquiries and give an answer tomorrow.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to encourage and assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway and to provide for this purpose that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply may enter into agreements with any provinces providing for the payment by Canada to those provinces of contributions in respect of the cost of a trans-Canada highway; with provision also for the employment of temporary engineers, technical officers and other employees for the purpose of the act.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Winters: I have a short statement. I could make it in committee.

Mr. Green: We should like to have it now.

Mr. Coldwell: Make it now.

Mr. Winters: Before I make my statement on this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the notice of motion for the production of papers, in Votes and Proceedings No. 4 of September 20, standing in the name of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I should like to table the correspondence with those provinces which have registered no objection.

This resolution deals with a proposal to provide assistance to provincial governments toward the completion of a trans-Canada highway. This project is one for which there has been a popular demand and an increasing need. It is now timely to bring the project to realization.

Trans-Canada Highway

Since the termination in 1927 of federal assistance under the Highways Act, 1919, aid given by the federal government to provinces for highway construction has amounted to $28,650,000. This aid was extended during the years 1931-1939 for the purpose of relieving unemployment, and was largely spent on portions of a contemplated trans-Canada route.

Most provincial governments would have great difficulty in assuming alone the financial burden of completing a trans-Canada route to adequate standards, in addition to the demand for annual outlays covering capital expenditures and maintenance costs on their over-all highway systems. Under the circumstances, and because such a highway will have some national complexion, assistance from the federal government appears warranted.

When completed, the interprovincial or trans-Canada route of approximately 5,000 miles should assist in the development of trade and of natural resources, as well as our tourist industry.

Though first conceived as a direct link for through highway traffic between Halifax and Vancouver, it is now contemplated that the highway will extend beyond the Canadian mainland, on to Vancouver island, Cape Breton island, and the insular provinces of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. Thus it would become a joint project with a portion of it in each of the ten provinces.

The federal government's concept of the highway is not that of a superhighway for high-speed traffic from coast to coast. It is rather that of a first-class, hard-surfaced road which should follow the shortest practical east-west route across Canada and through each of the provinces, consistent with the needs of the provinces and of Canada as a whole.

The highway, excepting those portions in national parks, when completed would remain, in each of the provinces, the property and responsibility of the province. The federal government's purpose is to encourage and assist the provinces in the construction and completion of the project.

A federal-provincial conference was held in Ottawa on December 14 and 15, 1948, to discuss problems related to a trans-Canada highway. At that time the provinces indicated in a broad, general sense that they favoured the project.

As a preliminary step toward the enactment of enabling legislation a resolution was placed on the order paper during the fifth session of the 20th parliament. However, since all provinces had not formally indicated their desire to proceed with the project by the time parliament was dissolved, the resolution was not proceeded with.

Considerable progress has been made during recent months in analysing provincial estimates of costs, studying procedure for determining completion costs, evaluating past expenditures, discussing technical details with provincial authorities, seeking agreement on matters of policy, and preparing the ground generally for introduction of a bill into the House of Commons and the signing of agreements with the provinces which would follow in due course.

Early in September I forwarded letters to the ministers responsible for highways in each province, seeking agreement on broad questions of policy which might ultimately form the bases of agreements. Replies indicating agreement on principles have been received from nearly all provinces. Concurrence of others in a general way has been indicated verbally. Some technical details remain to be worked out between the federal and provincial governments, and specific routes remain to be defined by formal agreement.

It is at present possible to travel the 4,200 odd miles between Halifax and Vancouver by road on Canadian soil, though not in comfort throughout the length of it. Only some 60 per cent of the total mileage is paved, and much of this paving is of low standard. Legislation will therefore be placed before parliament seeking to enable the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces for sharing the cost of construction of a hard-surfaced, all-Canadian, interprovincial or trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before making any remarks in regard to this may I ask this question? Is the minister prepared to indicate what percentage of the cost the dominion government contemplates assuming?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That information is in the bill. On the resolution stage I do not know how much you, sir, wish us to debate. I think I can tell the house, though, that the federal government contemplates paying fifty per cent of the cost of building the highway.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that information is the key information to any discussion of this subject, because the simple truth is that the decision by the dominion government to assume fifty per cent of the cost means that it is an utter impossibility for a number of the provinces to proceed with the effective construction of a trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Winters: They have not said so.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I happen to know something of the discussions that have taken place from the other point of view. I know that the discussions that have taken place in the past in regard to the trans-Canada highway have been characterized by the absence of any practical approach to this problem, which really meant that, unless a great deal has happened in the past year, they are very far from any understanding of what the problem really is.

The conference that was referred to as having taken place here last December was not a conference which did more than conduct a general discussion of this subject. When we discuss the construction of a trans-Canada highway it is highly desirable that we recognize that the first step toward the successful decision as to the carrying out of a project of this kind is an agreement between the dominion and the provincial governments as to the satisfactory procedure by which the highway will be built and the satisfactory method for determining the route of the highway right across the country and a practical method for financing the cost of the construction of that highway when the other details have been completed.

I wish to make it clear that when I said that the assumption of fifty per cent of the cost will not settle the problem I was making that statement subject to the reservation that it applies only to the extent that the provinces are bound in their financial capacity by the present financial agreements that they have with the dominion government. It is all very well for the minister to smile in regard to that, but the fact that this rather important consideration is ignored in the discussion of these subjects simply indicates a failure to recognize what the basic problem of the provinces really is today in regard to the assumption of any new responsibilities for education, for the construction of highways, or for any other great activity of this kind.

As it stands at the moment, outside of provinces which happen to have found themselves in a particularly favourable position as a result of some unexpected events, the provinces which accepted a certain fixed payment for the term of an agreement in exchange for certain taxing powers have indicated that they are having considerable difficulty already with some of their financial problems. They have indicated that very clearly by the proposals that are being made for financial support of various kinds. For that reason I do suggest that in the discussion of this subject we shall not be satisfied merely to express approval of the construction of a trans-Canada highway, but that there shall be assurance of these practical steps being taken which will really result in the construction of a trans-Canada highway.

In view of the fact that the correspondence has been tabled only this afternoon it is obvious that no hon. member is in a position to express the views that have been set out by the provincial governments in the correspondence. I will not attempt to guess what views have been expressed. Nor have we been informed yet as to which provinces have not expressed approval of the general plans or what objections have been raised. But I should like to review the general situation and what is essential to make the bill effective no matter what provisions it contains.

There is not a single member in this house who by now can fail to have been impressed with the fact that the people of Canada generally are in favour of having a trans-Canada highway which will make it possible for Canadians, or those visiting Canada, to travel by modern standards of comfort from one side of this country to the other. This is something more than mere comfort. Today the various types of vehicles that are available for highway transport are making possible a highly important means of distributing supplies, and are making it more satisfactory for the farmers and other producers to get their products to the markets.

To avail ourselves, however, of the advantages that are made available in this way it is essential that we have highways with surfaces that are suited to that type of vehicle. When the minister speaks of 60 per cent of the trans-Canada highway being paved, I think that a definition of the word "paved" will enter into a discussion of that kind, because I am inclined to think that by what is at present regarded as a modern standard of pavement on any route that could be regarded as a trans-Canada route 20 per cent would be a very high estimate indeed. In fact for a very considerable part of the route I do not know how the minister is able to determine what percentage has been paved because from Winnipeg to Vancouver I had thought there was still a very considerable amount of doubt as to which route was going to be followed. Consequently no estimate within that area could be effective without some determination of which route was to be followed so that such paving as had been done might be regarded as part of this plan or otherwise.

Nor is it only between Winnipeg and Vancouver that there is any doubt as to the route of the highway. There is very considerable doubt about a longer stretch of the highway through Ontario, and I understand also in the province of Quebec and in the maritime provinces as well. Most of the highway construction in Newfoundland will be new construction entirely except that part of the highway that runs northwest from St. John's. All this brings us to the fact that enabling legislation is something put on the statute books which has very little effect until the preliminary steps have been taken to find the key which will unlock this very real problem that is surrounded by so many difficulties.

With the agreement that there should be a highway, there is also very real disagreement in certain parts of the country as to where that highway should go. I know we are not going to settle it here. The one thing we should not attempt to do would be to settle it here, because any disposition to reach decisions in advance would be the very thing which would commit a number of people in the different provinces who hold very strong and sincere views to adhere to those views in advance of a decision being reached.

I think we must recognize first of all that the construction of highways has been under provincial authorities ever since this type of construction has been undertaken. Certain special work has been done from time to time by agencies of the dominion government; but on the whole this work is something that has been entirely under provincial governments. They have their departments of highways skilled in this work, with very considerable experience, and they are in a position to undertake whatever task of this kind may be imposed upon them.

The minister has said he does not think this should be a superhighway. That again is one of those things that must be decided as a matter of over-all policy before any decision made in the house can be effected. It may be that different standards of highway construction will be best suited to different parts of Canada. But that should be part of a generally settled over-all plan embracing the whole of the country, and acceptable to those provincial governments which will be carrying out the work.

Then again there should be a clearly defined procedure as to how the route will be chosen, and that is going to be one of the difficult problems to be faced. It is a problem which will call for the highest degree of co-operation and of recognition of the local views held in regard to the matter. I said the other day, and I repeat, that the minister charged with the responsibility of this legislation has indicated a very real desire to meet the provincial governments in matters of this kind. But may I say, from some experience on the other side of this general problem, that the construction of this great highway will be held back rather than advanced unless there is a real conference between dominion and provincial representatives not only in regard to the construction of the highway but in regard to the manner in which this and similar undertakings by the provinces are to be financed.

It is all very well to say that the dominion government will help the provinces to do this or that. New undertakings by the provinces in any of these important fields involve financial undertakings which at the present time they are not in a position to assume, unless they know where the additional revenue is to come from. For that very reason there is a related problem which should be considered at the same time, and which indicates the need for a very clear understanding of the financial relationship between the different governments.

Take for instance the case of Newfoundland. An offer to assume 50 per cent of the cost of construction of a highway in Newfoundland at the present time is not going to meet their problem, unless there is a clear understanding as to the type of highway involved, how it is to be built and what it is going to cost, because my own expectation would be that the cost of a highway of the type most people have in mind across Newfoundland at the present time would reach a figure that would impose far too severe a burden on the Newfoundland government if it were called upon to pay 50 per cent of the cost of such a highway.

There is another question which should be carefully examined when approaching this problem. Some provinces have already carried forward extensive highway construction which might be embraced in a trans-Canada highway. Certainly a formula will be necessary to determine how that will be regarded in relation to the construction of the whole highway across the country. Are those provinces which already have built sections of hard-surfaced modern highway along routes which can be regarded as trans-Canada routes to be given credit for that construction?

This would have to be known before an estimate could be made of what the cost to any province would be. Then also there are certain provinces which have a very special problem. Undoubtedly British Columbia with its great mountain ranges has a more severe task in the construction of a trans-Canada highway over its provincial route than would be so in respect of those provinces with less formidable natural barriers.

It will be necessary not only to surface the highway but to do a great deal of blasting and ballasting, and to erect protective construction so as to make a highway of the type people have in mind, suitable for heavy and fast traffic through the mountains.

Then there is the decision as to whether in the long stretches through northern Ontario and Quebec the highway should follow existing routes, or should follow some route that would have relationship to the strategic aspects of the highway. Certainly the construction of a highway of this kind will be related to our general strategic plans for the use of our raw materials in the event of the necessity arising of using them for defence purposes. All these things enter into the problem of determining the formula by which the route will be decided, as to how the cost will be divided, and the type of highway that will be suitable over any particular stretch of country.

I would emphasize the point that there may well be stretches of highway which would be adequate to carry ordinary traffic in normal times, but which nevertheless may pass through areas where the possible need of a wide and heavily constructed highway for the carriage of heavy freight would of necessity become part of the consideration in the building of such a highway.

For all these reasons I strongly urge that, instead of carrying on negotiations by letter, the governments should be brought together so that around the table they may examine these problems and decide upon a formula which will really work.

We have been discussing other problems associated with western Canada and every one of us knows that one of the real problems to be dealt with in going ahead with the construction of this highway is the manner in which the route through Alberta and British Columbia is to be determined. There are at least three routes that have most vigorous support, and behind the support for each of those routes are strong arguments that have been presented vigorously. I should imagine we all hope that within the lifetime of many or most of us a modern highway will follow each of those routes, but in the meantime, within the means available, a decision must be made as to one route.

The decision as to the route through Alberta and British Columbia will determine the route from Winnipeg through western Canada. If it is to be by one route, it will follow one course shortly after the highway leaves Winnipeg; if it is to be by another route, it will follow another course. Therefore the setting up of some effective mechanism to make a decision in regard to this particularly important problem is an essential part of any advance that is made in this extremely vital undertaking.

I have said already that this problem is not one which is met only in western Canada. The problem is met in Ontario, in Quebec and in certain parts of the maritime provinces, although the lengths involved are perhaps not as considerable as those involved in western Canada.

This does call for a display of co-operation of very high order. I think it must have impressed the minister, and I know it has impressed others who have read the briefs that have been put forward, that those who have put forward arguments in regard to one route or another have all made it clear that their main concern is to see a trans-Canada highway built. They are advocating a particular route and undoubtedly will continue to press their point of view until a decision is made. My feeling is that the sooner the dominion government and the ten provincial governments can get together and reach agreement as to the formula, the more hope there will be of making these decisions upon which the completion of this great highway must depend. The longer the decision in regard to that formula is deferred, the more appeals to local loyalties will be effective in establishing a strong opinion in regard to one route or the other. In the very nature of activities of that kind certain loyalties to a particular idea become firmly embedded and it is then more difficult to reach a satisfactory decision in regard to a matter of this kind.

There are many hon. members who feel that there is a too frequent reference to the need of a general dominion-provincial conference, but I submit that until there is a general dominion-provincial conference to settle the vital questions of the allocation of responsibilities and of taxing powers in the wider fields, an attempt to reach satisfactory conclusions in regard to some of these problems is simply hopeless. I repeat that unless some decision is reached as to the way in which the provinces are going to have assured sources of revenue other than those which they now have, an offer by the dominion government to assume fifty per cent of the cost of constructing a trans-Canada highway will simply mean that the construction of that highway will be delayed for a long time.

There are some provinces which could not under their existing financial arrangements today assume the additional cost that would be involved in this great undertaking. Therefore, as we deal with this particular problem that all of us want to see solved, I again urge upon the government the necessity of reaching at an early date an understanding with all provincial governments as to how their financial responsibilities in the broad administrative and legislative fields are going to be divided and how they are going to be carried out. Without that, this problem, along with a number of other things, will be delayed for some considerable time no matter how keen the desire of the minister or of any hon. member may be to see them brought to an early result.

Let us not forget that this is an expenditure which will bring great returns to Canada. In addition to the strategic aspect, with which the dominion government is particularly concerned, a satisfactory trans-Canada highway with a good surface across the whole country will facilitate the distribution of products of all kinds as well as provide an opportunity to Canadians to move back and forth. In addition it will make it possible for our friends from the United States to take increasing advantage of the tourist facilities we have and it will afford us an opportunity of receiving from them an increasing number of the dollars which they bring with them.

Throughout all time the existence of modern highways has been one of the evidences of national development. The observations I have made have been made in the hope that effective steps will be taken at an early date to give to this country as suitable transportation on the ground as we have today by rail and air. We should not be satisfied in Canada until we have a highway that makes it possible for us to make use of the most modern means of transportation to go from one side of Canada to the other.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my first word in this debate will be one of approbation of the resolution presented to the house by the minister. The time has long since passed when the federal government should accept some responsibility in the building of a trans-Canada highway. Long years ago the fathers of confederation decided that it was necessary for the future development of Canada that there should be a link from one coast to the other by means of a trans-Canada railroad. We have long needed a trans-Canada highway to link by this new means the people from one coast to the other.

For more than thirty years the automobile has been in popular use. We have seen automotive transportation increase in popularity until today a large part of our freight is carried by trucks travelling on our highways. Increasing numbers of people are using the automobile as a means of transportation and communication. The fathers of confederation realized that the building of a railroad was a national responsibility. I believe the government should realize that the building of a trans-Canada highway is also a national responsibility. We all realize that one of the important problems facing Canada today, as it faces almost every other nation in the world, is that of increasing our earnings of United States dollars. Coupled with that, we must seek every means possible to conserve our supply of United States dollars, and use our American dollars to the best possible national advantage.

We boast, and I think rightly so, that Canada's tourist attractions are the best in the world. We know that every year hundreds of thousands of our friends from the United States visit Canada because of these attractions with the result that the dollars spent by United States tourists in Canada have increased to the point where the amount earned from that source compares favourably with earnings from the export of wheat, newsprint, timber and other commodities. In 1948 United States tourists spent $270 million in Canada. I believe if we had a proper trans-Canada highway the amount of money spent by American tourists would be greatly increased. At the same time there are large sums of money spent by Canadians travelling in the United States. We all know that if we want to make a journey from one point in Canada to another point a long distance removed, invariably the first thing we do is to go south into the United States as quickly as possible so that we may travel on their efficient highway system with speed and comfort. We remain on the United States roads as long as we can, and when we reach a point approximately due south of our Canadian destination we swing north and proceed to our destination from there. Not having an adequate trans-Canada highway, many Canadians are virtually forced to go through the United States and use their highway system.

The same thing is true when United States tourists visit Canada. If they desire to make a long journey from one Canadian point to another, they must go back home and use their own highways because our highways across Canada are almost intolerable. If we can judge from statistics that are made available from time to time, our United States dollar position is worsening. If we do not soon do something along the line of building a trans-Canada highway in order to improve our dollar position with the United States, we are going to have to adopt other measures that will not be nearly as palatable. I should like to point out that in the first eight months of 1949 the number of Canadian automobiles entering the United States for a period of twenty-four hours or less increased by 26 per cent, and the number entering the United States for a period of more than twenty-four hours increased by 69 per cent. Therefore we see a growing demand on the part of Canadians for United States dollars for the purpose of travelling in the United States.

I say again that the building of a trans-Canada highway is important first of all to increase our earnings of United States dollars by means of greater tourist traffic created by United States citizens visiting Canada, and secondly to decrease the necessity for Canadians to travel through the United States to reach an ultimate Canadian destination. Many Canadians now do so merely because there is not a modern trans-Canada highway.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the assistance that the construction of the trans-Canada highway would be, in solving our shortage of American dollars. I had pointed out that the dollar problem was a national problem and, since the trans-Canada highway would help solve that problem, it should be a national undertaking. One is tempted in this debate to state one's own position as to the route which should be followed. But I should like to point out at this time that the house is not going to decide the route of the trans-Canada highway. I think the minister would be wise to take the best engineering advice he can obtain and, in consultation with the provinces, reach an agreement as to the route the trans-Canada highway should follow.

From reading the correspondence between the minister and the government of Saskatchewan, and from statements made by the Saskatchewan minister of highways in the provincial legislature, I learn that it was generally understood at the December conference with the provinces that the trans-Canada highway was to be a four-lane highway and that the federal government's contribution towards building that highway would be much above 50 per cent. When the minister informed the house that the federal contribution would not be greater than 50 per cent, then it followed that we must be satisfied with a two-lane highway. A two-lane highway may be sufficient to meet traffic requirements in many parts of Canada, but wherever traffic is dense a four-lane highway would be required.

In the formula that the minister has proposed, no consideration has been given to the difference in construction costs in various regions. I have in front of me the figures given by the minister of highways of the province of Saskatchewan in a speech he delivered in the Saskatchewan legislature last March outlining the costs of the trans-Canada highway within the different provinces. The minister pointed out that these costs were highly tentative and had arisen from consultation with the other provinces. In any case, I believe that this outline of the expenditures that construction will entail in the various provinces will demonstrate that the cost of building the trans-Canada highway will certainly not be equitable as between provinces.

For instance, the trans-Canada highway within the province of British Columbia will cost $40 million; in Alberta, $13 million; in Saskatchewan, $18 million; in Manitoba, $17 million; in Ontario, $103 million; in Quebec, $27 million; in New Brunswick, $7 million; in Nova Scotia, $36,500,000; in Prince Edward Island, $4,700,000. On the basis of those estimates, I have divided the provincial contribution by the population in the various provinces as of 1948. I find that the per capita costs for the provinces are as follows: Nova Scotia, $28.70; Prince Edward Island, $25.20; British Columbia, $18.50; Ontario, $12; Manitoba, $11.20; Saskatchewan, $10.50; Alberta, $7.60; New Brunswick, $7 and Quebec, $3.50. We have a range of costs as between the various provinces running from a high of $28.70 per capita in Nova Scotia down to $3.50 per capita in the province of Quebec. The taxpayers of Canada are going to build this highway, no matter whether the money is taken from provincial sources or federal sources. In my opinion the only way the burden can be equitably distributed is for the federal government to assume the whole of the cost.

Under this formula by means of which the federal government says it will pay 50 per cent of the cost, no consideration is given to the high cost of construction through the mountains of British Columbia or the high cost of construction in the northern portion of the province of Ontario. This formula gives no consideration to the over-all needs of each province for an adequate highway system within the province. For instance, perhaps the government of Ontario might not desire to spend millions of dollars building a trans-Canada highway through the northern portion of the province, when highways in the more densely populated areas of Ontario might be urgently needed.

Trans-Canada Highway

In the province of Saskatchewan a large part of the trans-Canada highway will be of little service to residents of Saskatchewan as a whole. The expenditure of large sums of money by the province of Saskatchewan towards paving that section of the highway within our province could result in some other area having to go without needed highway service. In the province of Saskatchewan we would experience great difficulty in paving all of the highways. What we are hoping to do is to increase the number of miles of highway that will be graded and gravelled. By this means the farmer can get out of the mud in the summertime, and can travel on snow-free road through most of the winter. If provincial funds are tied up to a large extent in paving a road across the province, it may mean that other parts of the province will not get even a gravel road.

The 50 per cent formula does not take into consideration the total road mileage within each province. For example, the province of Manitoba, according to the Canada Year Book for 1948, has 91,354 miles of road; the province of Ontario has 73,001. There are almost 20,000 more miles of highway in the province of Manitoba than in the province of Ontario. The province of Alberta has 80,525 miles of roads, whereas the province of Quebec has only 40,329 miles. Thus the province of Alberta has twice as many miles of road as the province of Quebec. The province of Saskatchewan has 212,978 miles of road. Our province with 7 per cent of the population of Canada, has 38 per cent of the total road mileage in the country. The province of Saskatchewan has three times as many miles of road as the province of Ontario and five times as many miles of road as the province of Quebec.

When the minister presents to this house and to the provinces a formula for building the trans-Canada highway under which the federal government will pay only 50 per cent of the cost, then he fails to take into account the over-all needs of the various provinces. Some provinces may find it impossible to go ahead with the construction of the trans-Canada highway, except at the expense of other areas within the province. I wish the proposals made by the government today had been made before the general election, because some ministers took the opportunity to misrepresent the position of some of the provinces. For example, the Minister of Agriculture, as quoted by the Leader-Post of June 27, had this to say at Indian Head:

> Refusal of the Saskatchewan C.C.F. government to pay its share of the trans-Canada highway is one of the reasons for delay in finalizing plans for its construction, Agriculture Minister Gardiner told a political meeting here Friday night.

Trans-Canada Highway

He said the dominion government proposed the highway be financed on a 50-50 basis and all provinces from whom replies have been received agreed to pay 50 per cent of the cost in each province.

I should like to quote from a letter written by the minister of highways for Saskatchewan to Hon. James A. MacKinnon, the then minister of mines and resources, on January 14. The letter says in part:

With reference to item eight,—

Which was asking for technical information.

——I am enclosing a copy of the minimum standard agreed upon by the four western provinces. I may state, however, that when this matter was discussed, it was generally understood the federal government would be prepared to accept responsibility for 100 per cent of the construction cost of this road. I note from a press report from Edmonton you are credited with a statement suggesting that your government is considering assistance only to the extent of 50 per cent of the entire cost. . . .

As it is desirable both from the viewpoint of your government and of ours that work on a trans-Canada highway be commenced as early as possible in 1949, I would respectfully ask that the responsibility for construction costs of this route be finalized as early as possible, in order that the necessary provision may be made in our construction program for this coming season.

The minister of highways in Saskatchewan in that letter accused the federal government of backtracking from the position taken at the conference in December. Throughout the whole file of correspondence—that was brought down as an order for return requested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)—between the present minister and the Saskatchewan government, and between the former minister under whose department was placed the matter of a trans-Canada highway, nowhere was there a denial that the federal government had not taken the position in December that it would be prepared to pay 100 per cent of the cost. Certainly, if this government had not led the province to believe that it would be prepared to pay the total cost, it would have denied that statement of the minister of highways in Saskatchewan, particularly when the government was going to the country in a general election within a few weeks.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made the statement that Saskatchewan had not agreed to go ahead with the program on a certain basis and that was one of the reasons why the project had not been undertaken. I want to quote from a letter written on April 7 by the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) to Hon. J. T. Douglas, minister of highways in Saskatchewan. I should like to read the second paragraph, which is as follows:

It seems clear from the helpful attitude you adopted at the conference, and from subsequent correspondence, that you are anxious to proceed at an early date.

[Mr. Argue.]

Hence during the election campaign the Minister of Agriculture, in my opinion, was attempting to mislead the audience to whom he was talking. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply himself, who had to deal with this matter, made the statement in writing that the government of Saskatchewan had indeed adopted a very helpful attitude.

There are other letters in that file, written by the Hon. J. T. Douglas in which he repeatedly asks the federal government to finalize its plans so that the province of Saskatchewan could begin the construction of the Saskatchewan section of the trans-Canada highway within the year 1949.

I have already said that the present formula does not meet the needs of the provinces, that the formula will result in some provinces being called upon to shoulder a very high part of the cost; and the formula does not take into consideration the necessity of large expenditures within the various provinces for a provincial highway system that will meet the needs of the people within those provinces.

I think the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and the government could learn a great deal from the highway program adopted by the United States federal government. We all know that the United States system of highways is the best in the world. As far back as 1912 the federal government of the United States undertook a program of federal grants for the construction of roads throughout the country. Hence when this government decides to pay some money for the construction of a trans-Canada highway it is just thirty-seven years behind the United States in that regard.

In 1916 there was appropriated from the federal treasury in the United States $75 million for the construction of highways over a five-year period. In 1922 there was appropriated another $75 million. In the following years, from 1922 up until the period of the war, the federal government in the United States contributed to the states for building of highways the sum of $1,190 million. Towards the end of the war, in 1944, the federal government in the United States allocated $500 million a year for the next three years to be spent on the building of highways. I want to point out that contributions coming from the federal government of the United States are not paid to the state governments merely for the construction of interstate highways, but that money is paid from the federal treasury in the United States to the various state governments for the construction of feeder highways, secondary and farm-to-market roads, school bus roads and rural mail delivery roads. Part of the construction cost of almost any road of any consequence whatever built in the United States at the present time is paid by the federal government.

The United States government divides its money in this way. It takes the $500 million and it says that two and a half per cent of that sum will be used for administration expenses. Then it takes the balance and divides it into three equal parts. The first part is divided among the states in proportion to their population; the second part is divided among the states according to the area of each; and the third part is divided among the states according to the total road mileage within each one. That formula was adopted by the United States government in 1916 and has never been changed. That formula worked in the United States because, by means of it, they were able to build an excellent highway system throughout all parts of their country.

The state highway system in the United States reaches forty-two of the 48 state capitals. It reaches 182 of the 199 cities with more than 50,000 population. And in addition to the interstate highway, federal contributions are made for the construction of secondary and farm-to-market roads. On top of payments for the construction of these roads a large contribution is made by the federal government in the United States toward the construction of highways within urban areas. If the government of Canada would spend as much per capita on the building of roads as is spent in the United States we would spend in each year $20,250,000 on federal aid to a federal highway system; $13,500,000 on federal aid to the construction of secondary or farm-to-market roads; and $11,250,000 on federal aid for the construction of highways within the large urban centres. The American formula has brought results. Under the Canadian formula if you take the highest possible cost for building a road through the province of Saskatchewan, Saskatchewan will not obtain any more than $1,285,700 a year from this government over a period of seven years.

If we take the state of Montana, immediately south of the province of Saskatchewan, we find that that state is much smaller in area than the province of Saskatchewan. Montana has 300,000 fewer people than the province of Saskatchewan. Yet in the year ended June 30, 1948, the state of Montana obtained $10,586,873 for its highway program from the United States federal government, eight times as much money as the province of Saskatchewan can possibly get from the legislation that is being presented to the house. The state of North Dakota got six times as much as the province of Saskatchewan can hope to get under this legislation within the same period, namely, $7,271.913.

One of the important aspects of the program for road construction in the United States is directed toward making the highway system available to as many farms and rural communities as possible. I should like to quote one short paragraph from a publication of the public roads administration in Washington. It says this in relation to the highway program followed by the state of Texas in co-operation with the United States federal government:

> Texas has been conspicuous for its speed and vigour in building secondary roads. Many of the farmers along the twenty-mile project in Armstrong and Randall counties had the contractor build spurs to their homes and barns. One farmer paid $900 for his driveway, saying: "The road doesn't help you if you can't get to it." The Texas state highway department estimates that its secondary system, when added to the primary highways, will place 74 per cent of all rural homes within two miles of a surfaced road and 62 per cent within one mile.

That is what has been accomplished in the state of Texas through the federal formula used in the United States. Under the formula presented to this house this afternoon by the minister not one dollar of federal moneys will be used for the construction of secondary or farm-to-market roads. Therefore I say that while we welcome any contribution that the government may make toward the building of a trans-Canada highway, the contribution that the government has in mind in this respect falls far short indeed of the amount necessary to build a highway system to adequately serve all parts and all communities of Canada.

I wonder whether the government is seriously interested in proceeding with even paying 50 per cent of the cost of a trans-Canada highway. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made a statement during this session and I wish the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) would find out from him for me what he meant when he made that statement. The statement was in reference to the building of a trans-Canada highway. He said that the magnitude and timing of works on the trans-Canada highway would depend upon the general rate of economic activity in Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether work on the trans-Canada highway is to be tied to the government's theory of cyclical budgeting. I should like to quote what I think is a most important paragraph in the circular sent out by the minister to the various provinces, or at any rate in the letter to the province of Saskatchewan, on September 2 of this year, outlining the federal government's proposal. I wish that paragraph had not appeared. The paragraph reads as follows:

> The federal government's contribution is being made by reason of the national aspect of the project and its participation is, of necessity, contingent upon all provinces entering into agreements with the federal government.

Is the minister going to place in the hands of each province of Canada the right to veto the construction of the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Argue: I have one more question and I shall sit down. I should like to ask the minister whether he is going to place in the hands of Premier Duplessis of Quebec for example the power to veto the construction of the trans-Canada highway. Some provinces may not find it possible to raise their 50 per cent of the construction cost. It may be too great a burden for their provincial treasuries. If some provinces cannot afford to build the road, is the minister going to hold up the federal government's contribution toward the building of the highway within those provinces that wish to undertake its construction?

In conclusion I urge the minister, when he brings in the bill, if he can get his colleagues in the cabinet to agree, to increase the federal contribution much above 50 per cent; and, if not at this session at a later session, bring in a program whereby federal contributions will be made to the provinces in order that feeder roads can be built, so that all Canadians irrespective of the province in which they reside, and irrespective of the region in which they reside, will be within reasonable proximity to a decent highway.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is in many ways, I think, a tragedy that Canada has not yet provided for her people at least one trans-Canada or trans-continental highway. I submit that our failure in this respect casts a serious reflection on our vision. I believe it also reflects on our enterprise and on our leadership, but most of all on our interest in the development of our own country.

The resolution that is now under consideration is, I submit, twenty-five or thirty years too late. In this respect the trans-Canada highway is in much the same position as Canada's utilization of international waters for irrigation purposes. We have neglected to take aggressive action in this regard to secure to future generations in Canada their rightful proportion of those waters by putting it to use, until we are now in a difficult position with respect thereto. I say, sir, that we are also in a parallel position with regard to a national policy for making Canada as nearly self-sufficient as she can be in the essentials of living, and as a result we are lagging along utterly dependent upon other countries for a good many of the things that we ought to be producing for ourselves.

This is a dangerous position to be in at a time like this. The chief cause of all of these conditions is lack of vision, lack of leadership. I do not need to remind hon. members that where there is no vision the people perish. The Liberal party must bear the major responsibility for the fact that Canada has no trans-Canada highway, for that party has been in power for 47 of the 82 years since confederation, and 36 out of the 49 years since the turn of the present century. I do not wish to heap the blame upon the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) because he merely inherited the situation. He is young in the important position he holds, and I congratulate him upon taking the lead in this very important matter so soon after assuming his high office.

However the government cannot escape some responsibility for its failure in the past even though the minister himself does not have to accept full responsibility now. The resolution before us calls for the introduction of a bill which, so far as we can learn, is to contain provisions for agreement between the dominion and the provinces to share the cost of building a trans-Canada highway; in retaining the technical staff to advise the provincial governments, and for inspection and accounting duties.

I see, however, nothing in the resolution to indicate the method to be used in determining the route the highway is to follow through the various areas of this vast country of ours. The resolution is also silent as to the way in which costs are to be shared between the dominion and the provinces. The minister did say in his opening statement that the federal government proposes to pay 50 per cent of the cost. To us that is a great disappointment. It was also most disappointing to hear the minister say that the highway he proposes will have "some national complexion". A timid whisper like that is exactly the opposite of what one would expect from a government with a majority the size of this one. I say it is very difficult for anyone to understand why the government will walk roughshod over the law and standing orders, but will plunge headlong almost with the reckless abandon of the Stampeders football line when it comes to abolishing appeals to the privy council and making amendments to the constitution, and approaches the building of this most important trans-Canada highway with diffident reluctance. That is the only way one can express it.

We criticize the failure of the government to take proper leadership in this most important matter. To begin with, as I have already said, we have drifted along for 25 or 30 years without a route by which our own Canadian people, to say nothing of the tourists, could motor or haul by truck from eastern Canada to the west, or vice versa. All this time we have forced Canadians to spend a good many millions of scarce American dollars in the United States simply because they had no alternative to the use of the highways south of the 49th parallel. I have had to use those highways on many occasions when it has been necessary for me to travel west by automobile. We have lost untold millions of those same scarce American dollars through tourist travel which undoubtedly would have passed over a trans-Canada highway, if one had been in existence.

I am not going to cover the ground already so well covered by the two preceding speakers. In much of what they have said I concur. A number of good suggestions were made by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew), in which I concur. I should like however to say something about financing the road. I said earlier that we were disappointed, keenly disappointed, with the government's announcement that it would share to the extent of only 50 per cent. I believe the trans-Canada highway should be financed entirely by the federal government.

I propose to cite to the house a number of good reasons in support of my claim. Obviously because of the shortage of time I cannot discuss all of them; but there are a number of good reasons why at least the first trans-Canada highway should be financed entirely from the federal treasury.

The first of these reasons is that the trans-Canada highway would be a national asset, because it would be national in scope. It would serve the interests of Canadians as a whole rather than the interests of only those people in one province or the people in a small group of provinces. My second reason is that the governments in the provinces, and of the municipalities in the provinces, are already faced with excessive expenditures for roads and other public works, in some cases away beyond their ability to pay without going further into debt.

At the present time the provinces and municipalities have to construct and maintain practically all the highways and roads, without any financial assistance from the federal government. I submit that in no federal country in the world outside Canada is that true to the extent that it is true in this country. At the present time many of the highways in the provinces which serve the Canadian people as a whole are in the nature of a trans-Canada highway. No part of the cost of either building or maintaining those highways has been borne by the federal treasury.

Just let me give my own province as an example. I refer to Alberta only because I am more familiar with it than with any other province. I feel sure however that what I say about Alberta will hold more or less true with respect to all other provinces in Canada. In the first place according to 1947 figures Alberta had a population of roughly 822,000 people and an area of 255,285 square miles. In the second place, the total miles reserved for roadway amounts to 143,805. This simply means, by ordinary calculation, that five Albertans would have to carry the cost of building and maintaining each mile of highway, if it were possible to do the building all at once.

Mr. Blackmore: That figure includes men, women and children.

Mr. Low: Yes, including babies. This is a heavy burden for any group of people to bear. At present out of the 143,805 miles of potential roadways that will have to be built in time, a grand total of 80,742 miles have been built. In the third place there are in Alberta 76,140 miles of rural, municipal and improved district roads; and of this huge total 42,684 miles are earth roads, 24,790 are graded and 8,666 are gravel.

One gets some idea of the heavy financial burden to be borne by a province like Alberta when it is realized that it is impossible to maintain a mile of gravel highway for less than $1,000 per year, if normal traffic is to be continued. Let that sink in: for less than $1,000 per mile per year it is impossible to maintain a gravel road in passable condition.

In Alberta there have been built 3,258 miles of main gravel highway. It is not difficult therefore for hon. members to measure the kind of maintenance bill this mileage requires every year at $1,000 a mile. And when we remember that a province with not many more than 800,000 people has to lay out over $3 million a year merely to keep up its gravel roads, then I ask the house what chance it has to build hard-surfaced roads with the restricted resources falling within the scope of its own tax revenues. That is a serious question which it seems to me hon. members will have to ask. And on top of that, according to the minister's statement, this government expects them to contribute to the building of the trans-Canada highway to the extent of 50 per cent. What chance have they to do that?

There is another aspect of this matter to be considered. Alberta has built nearly 700 miles of asphalt surfaced roads during the past 12 or 13 years. I should think that the cost per mile today of such roads would be over $25,000 per mile. That represents in itself an expenditure of more than $18 million, all of which has been paid in cash as they went along. But over and above all this the people of Alberta have had to pay the interest on $40 million of bonds which were issued by governments prior to 1935 to pay for roads that were built up to that time. By 1935 those roads had largely disappeared, but the debt had not. We have had to pay the interest on the $40 million every year in spite of the fact that the roads were not there any longer. That is the kind of financing that went on from 1905 when Alberta became a province.

Mr. Blackmore: Under Liberals.

Mr. Low: I should like to point out that in the last provincial election the only suggestion the leader of the Liberal party in Alberta had to make was that if his party was elected they would immediately go out and borrow $100 million to be spent for roads.

Mr. Blackmore: Which would all blow away.

Mr. Low: All this indicates why it would be most unfair and unwise to saddle the provinces with further financial burdens in connection with the trans-Canada highway.

There is a third reason why the federal government should bear the full cost of the trans-Canada highway. I would refer now to the announcements the government has made at different times since 1946 as a means of reassuring the people of this country that they do not expect that a business recession of any serious proportions will hit Canada. They have assured the people that in the foreseeable future there will be no such thing as a depression. They have assured them that they have up their sleeves or somewhere a shelf of projects with which they are going to cushion Canada's economy against a depression.

If the trans-Canada highway is to be built as one unit of that shelf of post-war projects that we have heard so much about and that are to prevent a recession or unemployment in Canada, then quite clearly it is a federal responsibility. I do not think anyone can argue successfully that it is not the responsibility of the federal government to order and administer the financial policy of this country to the end that effective demand is kept at a high enough level to make possible the equitable distribution of our total production. That is a federal responsibility. There is no other way to prevent unemployment and business recession or, what is worse, a depression, than for the government to so order its financial affairs and to so conduct its financial policy that effective demand is kept at a level where the people of the country can buy, if they so desire, the total of our production.

The provinces have no voice in the national financial policy and therefore it becomes the responsibility of the federal government to bring out its shelf of projects and put them into effect. One of the most important of these should be the building of the trans-Canada highway. When the government and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) are considering ways of financing this vast project they should give serious consideration to the use of nationally created credits rather than taxation and borrowing. It would be quite possible to plan the undertaking to be carried out over a period of years in such a way as to make the necessary expenditures coincide with the periodical need for expansion in the Canadian monetary supply. In my judgment the building of the trans-Canada highway offers an ideal project to be financed by national money since it will be not only a national asset but in many respects a self-liquidating national asset which would lend itself to the kind of financing I have suggested. I should like to stress also that the people of Canada should not have to pay for this road two or three times over during this and succeeding generations simply because the government insists upon saddling them with more debt that never will be paid, but carrying interest which must be paid out of taxation.

There is another consideration to be dealt with when considering this question of whether the dominion government should finance the proposed highway rather than add to the burdens of the provinces which are already very heavy. I refer now to the effect which the building of the Alaska highway has had upon provincial economy since its transfer from the United States to the Canadian government. As hon. members know, the southern terminal of the Alaska highway is at Dawson Creek, British Columbia. There is no connection between that point and the highways of the United States except over Alberta roads. From Dawson Creek to the nearest United States port of entry at Coutts, Alberta, is about 820 miles. That means that nearly all the traffic that moves over the Alaska highway must of necessity travel over 820 miles of provincial highways in order to get to the Alaska highway.

During some seasons of the year large convoys of heavy trucks and transports carrying great tonnages of materials and supplies move over Alberta roads. It is only natural that those heavy convoys which are accustomed to travelling on the armour-coated highways of the United States should cut the Alberta roads to pieces; and this they have done. No system of licensing or of gas taxation could possibly bring in sufficient revenues to pay for the damage done to a highway by such heavy traffic, much of which is incidental to the United States army and the United States supply depots in the great northland. Thus far Alberta has had to pay the full cost of maintaining, and repairing, and the rebuilding necessitated by this heavy traffic from the United States, and this has run into hundreds of thousands of dollars every year.

The Alaska highway is important to the United States and Canada. We do not begin to understand how important it is now; but we should be thankful that it has been constructed. I think we should pay tribute to the foresight of our neighbouring country, the United States, for building this highway even at the tremendous cost involved. This highway was turned over to Canada by the United States and Canada is maintaining it. I understand from the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) that they are doing a good job, and for this the government should be commended. However, the full potential of that highway cannot be realized until it is extended to the south and connected up with the great industrial centres of the midwest United States. It will have to go through Alberta before that can happen.

It is clearly the duty and responsibility of the federal government to do three things in order to relieve the province of Alberta of the heavy responsibility it has today in providing feeder roads to the Alaska highway and in order to make the Alaska highway of real value. It is their responsibility to share the cost of maintaining these feeder roads to the Alaska highway so that they may be kept up to standard and make it possible for traffic to move over them at all seasons of the year. Possibly these supply convoys bound for Alaska are going to be tremendously important from a security point of view sooner than anyone expects.

The second thing I think the Canadian government should do, and it is clearly their responsibility, is to negotiate with the United States government with a view to getting that government to share the costs of maintenance of feeder roads to the Alaska highway, and perhaps to share the cost of rebuilding where that becomes necessary as a result of the wear and tear from the heavy convoys travelling over the roads.

The third thing which I think is a federal government responsibility is to construct, or share with the province in the construction of, a more direct route from the southern part of the province of Alberta to the Alaska highway. I am told that surveys already made indicate that it would be possible to save up to seventy-five miles between the port of entry at Coutts, Alberta, and Dawson Creek by surveying and building a cut-off between Whitecourt, west of Edmonton, and Valleyview in the Peace river country. Certainly it is only reasonable to suppose that if a road is to be of military and security value then the most direct route is the most feasible one.

I suggest with all respect these three important things should be followed up by the government of Canada. They are the only ones in a position to negotiate and to arrange for an agreement between ourselves and the United States to the effect I have mentioned. I do not need to deal with the precedent established by the United States. My colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), undoubtedly will go into that to some degree, and will show the contrast between the way we have undertaken the building of an important highway link between eastern Canada and western Canada, and the way the United States has acted over the years. I suggest that feeder roads, or an inter-regional system of highways, ought to be considered also as a part of any trans-Canada highway project.

I should like to say a word about routes before I close. A good deal has been heard, especially during the past year, about what route the proposed trans-Canada highway should follow. I am critical of the government in this respect. I think the situation has been allowed to drift along with no leadership until it has become terribly confused. Nobody seems to know just where to start. I did not hear the interpolation of my hon. friend over there. I would be very happy to have him speak right out so that I can deal with him. There is no question about the fact that much of the existing confusion with respect to a route, and how to select a route, is the result of the lack of leadership on the part of this government that is supposed to initiate such things. There have sprung into existence in Canada trans-Canada highway route associations. I know we have at least three of them in the province of Alberta because there are three main possible routes by which the trans-Canada highway could proceed. Each of these associations has been doing a great deal of advertising and has obtained much publicity. Each of them makes many claims about the advantages of its own route. The Yellowhead association has even gone so far as to sponsor a convoy and send it from the city of Edmonton right through to Vancouver to show the feasibility and advantages of that route.

Alberta finds herself in the position that she cannot make a firm decision as to which route she should designate across her territory because already it is reported that the people of British Columbia have said: We will not consider any other route than the Big Bend highway leading into Calgary. On the east, it is reported that the province of Saskatchewan has said: We will select as the route the one that goes through Regina and ends up at Walsh on the Alberta border. That being the case, Alberta is in the position where, if she made a decision to put the road through over the southern proposed route or the Yellowhead route, it would throw the whole thing into such confusion that nobody would be able to make a decision for a long time.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Nobody would do anything that silly, would they?

Mr. Low: At any rate, thus far Mr. Manning, the head of the Alberta government, has used his head and has waited to see what leadership would come from the federal government.

Mr. Blackmore: He always uses his head.

Mr. Low: He has done so in an attempt not to confuse the matter further. In connection with the whole matter of the route, let me make this suggestion. I think it is high time that the government and the minister began to put first things first. I do not think the resolution before us begins at the beginning at all. I think the first thing that the resolution should call for is the setting up of a joint dominion-provincial highway commission; and that joint dominion-provincial highway commission ought to be charged with the responsibility of conducting a thorough survey and investigation. It should then sit down with all the facts before it, and having the advice of competent engineers it should determine what route the road should follow. When they have determined what route the road should follow then they should attempt to reach whatever agreements are necessary with the province to carry out construction and maintenance of that route. It is the only way in the world that you can bring order out of chaos. Surely hon. members must agree that in a project of this size there must be order.

The second thing it seems to me the commission should do is to investigate standards, which is another most important matter. If the highway is going to be built with Canadian money and effort, then it ought to be built to a standard that is adequate not just for the next four or five years but to a standard that will hold for fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years in the future. I do not believe it would be in keeping with the dignity and standing of a country, which we are told by the government has reached the age of its majority, to have a measly two-lane road running across Canada on which you could travel with only moderate comfort that the minister spoke of today. I do not think that is at all in keeping with our standing. The road we build ought to be up to a standard commensurate with our ability to produce and deliver engineering and other services.

And now to conclude. So far as Alberta is concerned, the government there has suggested that there are three routes, any one of which will be satisfactory. They have also said they are willing to set aside money for the purpose of ensuring that we can have a satisfactory trans-Canada highway at the earliest possible time. At the last session of the legislature of that province they passed a bill providing for the expenditure of $2 million for the purpose of getting a start on the highway. I say they have indicated their good faith, but I am satisfied they will be bitterly disappointed that the federal government has taken the view that all they can share is 50 per cent of the cost. I am satisfied that, when all the evidence is available, this government will see that if they are still unwilling to pay the full cost, the most they should expect the province to put up is 30 or 33 per cent, and the least that the federal government should pay is 66⅔ per cent of the cost.

Finally, I recommend to the government that a joint dominion-provincial highway commission be set up at the earliest possible moment, charged with the responsibility for taking leadership in this whole project. Someone near me suggests it should not be made up of politicians, and I agree. It should be a joint commission of competent engineers, men who know what they are doing in that particular field.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: I have in mind the hon. members who pounded their desk when I said that. They have indicated they do not know what they are doing.

I also suggest for the very serious consideration of this government, when it comes to financing the trans-Canada highway, that they make it part of the shelf of projects designed to cushion the Canadian economy against the onslaught of depression. The only way that can be done is to make use of national credits without interest, which would be expended as it became necessary to expand the monetary supply so that effective demand can be kept at a high level in this country.

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it would appear from all indications that everyone in this house is agreed that Canada should have a transcontinental highway. The building of this highway has now reached the stage of definite plans, and it is interesting to observe that a Liberal government is responsible for this constructive step.

Mr. Thatcher: It is about time.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): What portion of the cost of the trans-Canada highway will be borne by the federal government and under what auspices the construction will take place are matters of negotiation between the dominion and the provinces concerned. What route the construction will follow is a matter of grave concern to all Canadians who are interested in this national undertaking. It is hoped that some time in the not too distant future there will be more than one trans-Canada highway welding together the components of our great nation. At the moment, however, we are immediately concerned with the building of our first national roadway, and my remarks will be directed to a discussion of the location of this highway.

There are members in this house representing the ten provinces affected, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, and it would appear to me that my observations should deal more directly with that part of the trans-Canada highway which passes through the province of Alberta, although the principle involved is equally applicable to the other parts of this Canadian undertaking. Representing as I do the constituency of Edmonton East in the province of Alberta, I have given special attention to the possible routes of this system through the passes of the Rocky mountains, namely the Crowsnest pass, the Kicking Horse pass and the Yellowhead pass. It has been my privilege to personally traverse all three of these divides of our picturesque Canadian Rockies. As a layman, I was particularly impressed with the natural roadway, and the accessibility of good grades through the Yellowhead pass. But I would not feel qualified to give judgment on which route should be chosen. I am equally convinced that those who have undertaken to make a definite decision are not fully qualified, nor have they sufficient facts at their disposal on which to give a sound judgment.

There are three main factors to be considered in deciding where the trans-Canada highway should pass through these mountains, namely, the practicability for civilian use, the accessibility for defence purposes, and the cost of construction. On this basis it is difficult to understand the decision of the provincial government of Alberta proposing that the Kicking Horse pass route should be followed, when all available evidence points to the Yellowhead pass route as being preferable on all three counts.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Now I will tell one.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): I am not suggesting that the recommendation of the provincial government of Alberta should be ignored, but I am definitely stating that there is sufficient evidence against this recommendation to make it imperative for a national highway commission to be established which would weigh carefully the merits or demerits of all three locations. The best engineering brains in this country should be mobilized for the purpose of forming a fact-finding board or trans-Canada highway commission with representatives thereon from the armed services. This commission could consider everything contributory to the construction of a highway such as route, costs, weather conditions and military requirements.

To substantiate my concern over the hasty or ill-considered decision of preferring the Kicking Horse pass, I would call the attention of this house to several factors which should interest all members. There is a stretch of highway west of the Kicking Horse pass known as the Big Bend, on which the annual snowfall has approached nearly sixteen feet in one season. In the pass itself, there are twelve miles in the Kicking Horse canyon through which a twenty-two foot top highway could not be built without a cost approaching $200,000 per mile. The railroad in the gorge would make extensive blasting operations impracticable. On the other hand, the Yellowhead pass does not present such formidable obstructions to either construction or maintenance.

The Yellowhead route will approach and proceed through the mountains and arrive at Vancouver at a lower elevation than any other proposed route. The Kicking Horse pass elevation is 5,337 feet; the Crowsnest elevation is 4,450 feet and the Yellowhead, 3,717 feet. As there is the least snowfall on the Yellowhead route, that is another good reason why this route should be considered for priority of construction. Not only the original construction cost but the cost of maintenance should be given consideration, and I contend that maintenance would be less on the Yellowhead route, owing to lighter snowfall and the ease with which any slides that might occur could be cleared away. The mountain scenery is equally glorious in each of these areas, but tourists today demand highways of 22 to 24 feet, without those turns which reach beyond the point of enjoyment.

I submit that commercially the Yellowhead route west of Winnipeg would serve the greatest number of people living in the prairie provinces. The recent oil developments in the central part of the prairies, as well as the potential resources of the northern part of the prairie provinces and Northwest Territories, are strong reasons why the highway should follow the Yellowhead route. The Yellowhead route is the central route, and would serve by far the largest park areas west of the great lakes. It is as necessary to have good highways as it is good railways. The Yellowhead route passing through four national parks and five provincial parks would be a veritable magnet for the tourist trade.

During the present session the citizens of Canada, and in particular the members of this house, have been made more conscious of the necessity for national defence. With the realization that war is still a possibility, would it not be shortsighted indeed to construct a trans-Canada highway without giving adequate consideration to the availability of this highway for defence purposes? Our great ally and friendly neighbour to the south, the United States of America, has been ever-conscious of the necessity for protecting the back door on the northwestern border. The joint effort in the construction of the Alaska highway is firm evidence of the practical co-operation between Canada and the United States in defence projects. During the last session of congress, a bill was passed anticipating the construction of a railroad by the United States from Prince George to Fairbanks, Alaska, costing approximately $200 million. Just last month the President of the United States signed this bill which authorizes plans for an immediate survey of this proposed railway. At present there is a railroad in the province of British Columbia which could be used as a feeder for the Prince George-Alaska line, but two highways could also be utilized as secondary feeders if the Yellowhead pass were used for the trans-Canada project, which would make the military supply system less vulnerable, either to climatic conditions or to military attack.

In overlooking the Yellowhead pass we question whether sufficient consideration has been given to defence highway supply routes such as (1) south-north route through the interior of British Columbia from the United States border to Prince George and (2) the Alberta highway from Montana to Edmonton which could be linked up with Prince George by the extension of the trans-Canada highway west from Edmonton via the Yellowhead, with a branch to Prince George, British Columbia.

A highway along this route of the Yellowhead pass would serve the two largest ports on the Pacific coast, Vancouver and Prince Rupert, also Skagway via the Alaska highway. The Yellowhead route would join the Alaska highway at Edmonton as well as give direct connection with the Mackenzie highway to Great Slave lake.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I repeat that I am not dogmatically suggesting that the Yellowhead route be chosen. On the contrary, I am definitely suggesting that a fact-finding board or highway commission be set up to secure evidence as to what route is preferable for this great Canadian national undertaking.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): I should like to say a word, Mr. Speaker, in support of the principle of this resolution which may, of course, result at some time in the bringing in to this house of a bill for the establishment of the trans-Canada highway. I do so not having in mind the route either in the maritime provinces or in the western provinces.

I hear a voice, Mr. Speaker, but I see no one.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You had better grow up; then you will see some of them.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I am not particularly interested in the conflict between western members as to the route that it ought to take there. I am interested, however, that there shall be a trans-Canada highway which shall lead from one side of Canada to the other so that the products of our mines, farms and factories may be transported in a manner which may seem advisable to those using trucks, and that our people may be transported by bus, but primarily that this route may be a haven or a paradise for the tourists that enter our country.

One of the largest industries—I think it is the second largest—providing United States dollars to the Dominion of Canada is the tourist industry. For that reason in the province of Ontario I believe I would rather support a move to establish such a route along the north shore of lake Superior. I say that, Mr. Speaker, probably for a selfish reason. That reason is that the constituency which I have the honour to represent has the largest port of entry for tourists in the Dominion of Canada. While I realize that not even by the widest stretch of the imagination can we divert the trans-Canada highway into this part of southern Canada, yet the people who use this highway will, to a large extent, come to that highway through the constituency which I represent.

The development of this tourist paradise along the trans-Canada highway will require the utmost co-operation of the federal and the provincial governments. It will also of course require the co-operation of municipal governments. It seems to me that a tourist coming to this country for the purpose of a holiday or otherwise requires three things: (1) ample quality meals; (2) comfortable beds; (3) an enjoyable time. These objectives, of course, can be accomplished on such a highway, especially in the part to which I refer, along the north shore of lake Superior.

Since the federal government is going to pay a large part of the cost of such a highway, I think it would be entitled to call the tune to some extent. For that purpose it can assist greatly in establishing on this highway the tourist attractions that go with it. To enumerate, may I point out that loans may be provided by the federal government for the establishment of tourist camps or lodges. These should of course be given to worthy individuals. I am not suggesting that loans be granted to everybody. I said that they should be granted to "worthy" individuals; that is, to persons who would be deemed to be most likely to succeed and who are prepared to put in a considerable amount of hard slugging or hard work. The state of Indiana—I am told that it is done by many other states in the United States, but I have knowledge of the state of Indiana —provides such camps within its confines, in which a large tract of land is developed, with parks, with golf courses, snow slides, ski slides, and things of that nature. Usually it has incorporated therein a large or commodious hostel of some type. This is done with state funds.

In the second place, the federal government can assist the provinces in co-ordinating the rules and regulations which will assure the traveller of the fair practices that should be employed by the operators of all tourist accommodation so that the tourist will get the most for his money and, of course, so that a profit will be provided for the operator. High standards of course should be set. I would think that it would be well if such accommodation were classified. Certain standards should be set by the different levels of government in co-operation one with the other. The camp, lodge, hotel or whatever it may be, should be classified and that classification given adequate publicity. The federal government should enter into a program of education of the tourist resort operators from one coast to the other. Any merchant or tradesman on the highway should be provided with adequate information. Inspectors should come along to see that the operator of the establishment is given firsthand knowledge of the standard that is being set by the government officials.

A moment ago I said that the first thing the tourist requires is ample quality meals. At the present time the Department of Agriculture is doing a great deal of valuable work throughout Canada in educating the housewife, the restaurant proprietor and the hotel keeper in the different ways of preparing best quality food. I might point out that in various parts of Canada there are specialties which are indigenous to that part of the country. As a matter of fact, just a few days ago I was discussing the matter with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mott), who is a new member. He told me of an experience which he had had with the mayors of the Dominion of Canada who were in convention in that western city. He said that in their tour across the country they had been fed turkey and peas and chicken and peas everywhere. Of course they got those dishes at home—we all get them if we are not careful. But while out in that part of the country they were provided with samples of the fish products which are so bountiful in that region, with the result that he was besieged for many weeks afterwards with requests for different products that were being produced from the fisheries of British Columbia.

The different provinces of the maritimes, through research and education, might discover special ways of using the potato or the fish products which they have down there. We of course think of Quebec and pea soup as synonymous. With education and publicity I am sure that the tourist as he approached the province of Quebec would be looking forward to a delicious bowl of that famous soup. Ontario might—I might point out that the interjection at my elbow was that Ontario might specialize in the hot dog. I do not think it is really a dish which is peculiar to the province of Ontario. I do think that in Ontario we have fine products. For instance, our blueberries are the finest in Canada. With a little research by scientists and dietitians they could provide a specialty course for the tourists in our country. I have already mentioned the west coast. The prairies of course have the wheat products.

In addition to the specialty food dishes for our tourists I am going to suggest that there be an adequate supply of maps which could be displayed on the walls of the establishments along this highway. I have found that all tourists are tremendously interested in maps, especially of the locality in which they find themselves. These maps could also be used as place mats at the different establishments. Perhaps the recipe of the favourite dish in that locality could be typed or printed on the map and taken by the tourist as a souvenir.

I have already pointed out that the second requirement of a tourist establishment is comfortable beds. This could be regulated by government directive, by the regulations that are provided by the provincial and federal governments co-operating with each other. As I have pointed out, a certificate could be issued to the establishment and publicity given not only in the establishment itself but in the different trade journals and advertising.

The third essential for a tourist is an enjoyable time. I would think that anyone going across Ontario and coming through Windsor would have an enjoyable time. Outdoor activities could be augmented by establishing in many of these places handicraft activities. I believe that the Canadian Handicraft Guild will be most active and anxious to assist the operators of such establishments in providing the means whereby tourists may have activity when the weather is not suitable for outdoor exercise. That is done in many places in the United States. When an inn or a hotel is established, a handicraft guild or a handicraft shop is established, and on a cold or rainy day they are very active places and provide an outlet in which the tourist may make something for himself, probably under expert supervision, which he can take home and use as a memento in the years to come.

If the federal, provincial and municipal authorities do co-operate, and I am sure they will, if given the opportunity, to provide these tourist havens across Canada, the number of motorcars which pass through the port of Windsor, which is in my constituency, will greatly increase.

Mr. Isnor: Is this highway to go through the hon. member's constituency?

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I would prefer that they divert the highway through the city of Windsor, but I am really not asking for it at the moment. I said "at the moment"; it might be that a little later I would ask for it. However the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) has brought up the point. I think it might be well if the provincial government were to proceed at once with the building of a four-lane highway. Perhaps I should not use the word "building", because they already have the plans. However, they might well proceed with the building, for which they have the plans, of a four-lane highway from Windsor, to connect with the trans-Canada highway. Not only would it provide easy access to the trans-Canada highway, but it would bring in many more American dollars so badly needed in this country.

In 1949 alone, from January to August 1,295,549 motorcars passed through the port of Windsor. When one considers that in each motorcar there are several passengers, and that each tourist spends a considerable sum of American dollars, it must be agreed that this is a great contribution to our national economy. For these reasons I most heartily support the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I notice in reading the files tabled by the minister today of correspondence with the premiers of the different provinces, that they do not appear to be complete. I wonder if this is correct; are they or are they not complete?

Mr. Winters: I understand the hon. member is referring to the date of the last correspondence.

Mr. Higgins: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Winters: The correspondence is up to the date of the notice of motion for production of papers moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Higgins: I presume the minister will file any remaining correspondence.

Mr. Winters: If that is the wish of hon. members, I should be glad to do it.

Mr. Green: Could it be done tomorrow?

Mr. Winters: I think it may be done tomorrow—and done of course on the same basis, that it will be filed only with respect to those provinces which have given their permission.

Mr. Higgins: I mention this because from the date it appears that there is further correspondence.

I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that the idea of a trans-Canada highway has general support. The only differences we may have in the matter—those of us who have differences—are with respect to the contributions that have to be made. I shall refer to that aspect of the matter later.

The chief reason I see for the trans-Canada highway—one which I think is probably accepted generally by all—is the development of trade and industry, and particularly that industry known as the tourist traffic. The other important phase is the necessity for a good system of highways for purposes of defence.

That feature has probably been stressed in the house before, and perhaps there is no need of my mentioning it again. We all recall however the famous autobahn of Germany and the purpose of it. We know of its value to that country during the last world war. I do not suggest that we should have an autobahn, but I do feel that throughout Canada we should have highroads which if necessary can be used for defence purposes.

Another important reason, one to which the minister referred in his opening remarks, I believe, is the value of road-building in taking care of unemployment. In my opinion that is one of the important features in the program. Perhaps it is not of such importance to the other provinces as it is to Newfoundland, because unemployment is a problem we are now facing. I believe road-building has been termed a shelf project; whatever it is, it would be of immense value to us in this connection.

As has been stated so often, in Newfoundland we have immense tourist possibilities but no roads. With an area of 42,000 square miles we have less roads both in number and in quality than has Prince Edward Island with an area of only 2,000 square miles—and that is only on the island alone irrespective of Labrador. One can easily see why your poorest cousin needs and looks forward to a system of roads. The value of the tourist industry cannot be stressed too greatly, because with the opening up of highroads and the resultant opening of the country, not only will citizens from the wealthier sections of Canada come to us as often as possible, but also we will have a tremendous influx of American visitors as well. From that point of view I feel that no matter who pays for these roads, whether it is the wealthy provinces, the poorer provinces or perhaps even the Americans, it is a good investment, so long as we do not have to pay for them or pay more than we are able.

I am sure this matter has been considered before, but some years ago I noticed that on some of the American highroads specially wide and long strips were being built in places, the purpose being to take care of emergency plane landings. It might be well to keep in mind that in the proposed highroad provision could be made at no great extra cost for an extra twenty feet in width and a long straight-away of a mile or so which would serve as a first-class emergency landing field, at which planes could land and from which they could take off. It might be even an attraction to tourists. This is offered only as a suggestion as we go along.

I do not need to repeat the strategic value of the island to the rest of the continent. But with the bases in Newfoundland it seems ridiculous to find that there is no road connection between them. We have a big American base at St. John's, with an airport at Torbay, which was used to a great extent during the war as a base for the spotting of submarines by aircraft. Then, we have the naval base at Argentia. St. John's and Argentia are connected; but may I remind the house that they are connected chiefly by American money being spent in their construction. Americans built and maintained that military road to give them speedy transportation between St. John's and their naval base at Argentia.

From there on however there is a great hiatus. The great airport at Gander is an important part in the scheme of defence of Canada; but there is no road connection with Gander and the rest of the country. Going farther west we come to Ernest Harmon air base at Stephenville. This is an American air base. There is no road connection with it and the other bases. So, apart altogether from the advantage of roads in the ordinary scheme of things, it seems to me apparent that in the defence scheme of the dominion and the United States all these bases should be connected by roads.

I do not think there is any contradiction to this. I do not believe it would be taken in good grace in this parliament or by the people of Canada, but I am quite certain the United States will build these roads if we do not. As a nation, surely we do not consider we are in the position where the United States should come in and build our roads. But that is what will happen unless these United States bases are connected up properly in the not too distant future. Somebody is going to do the job and I think that somebody should be Canada. This should all be part of the trans-Canada system.

The difficulty faced by the other provinces in deciding where the road is to run does not exist with us. We know perfectly well where it is going to run because we have no alternative. It will run from St. John's to Port aux Basques. Apparently this route has received the blessings of the powers that be.

But there is one thing I want to be certain about. When the highway is completed to Port aux Basques I want the minister to implement the undertaking contained in section 32 of the terms of union that a proper car ferry will be provided. This may be thought to be asking for "all this and heaven too", but I am suggesting that provision should be made now so that a proper ferry will be available if and when the highway is built.

I have looked over the correspondence in this connection which was tabled. This correspondence sets out the standard of road that will be built. The details accompanied a letter to the premier of Newfoundland dated September 2, 1949. I take it that these standards will form part of the bill that is to follow and therefore it is proper to discuss them now. Apparently the government plans only a two-lane highway. I do not suppose Newfoundland itself would require more than a two-lane highway, but a military road would have to be wider. The intention is that if any province builds a road wider than two-lane the federal government contribution will be 50 per cent of the cost of a two-lane highway rather than 50 per cent of the total cost of the road.

Apparently the right of way is to be 100 feet in width with a 22 or 24 foot pavement. The shoulders are to be 10 feet and the minimum thickness of asphalt is to be three inches. The stone base will be from a nine-inch minimum to 12 inches. There will be a maximum curvature of six degrees and a maximum gradient of six degrees. The sight distances, horizontal and vertical, are to be a minimum of 600 feet. Bridges are to have an overhead clearance of 14 feet with a width of 26 feet for spans of over 30 feet, and curbs of 18 inches.

These are not my own figures. I do not know about these matters myself, but I discussed it with an hon. member who is engaged in the road-building business and who knows something about costs. I described as well as I could the terrain that would be encountered and the nearest approximate cost figure I could get was in the neighbourhood of $100,000 per mile. As I see it, the minimum distance would be 500 miles, which means that the share of the poor province of Newfoundland will be quite steep. I do not know about the wealthy provinces up here, but if we have to find $25 million as our share, it is going to be a little hard.

Then apart from the original cost the province must maintain the highway, and I understand that maintenance costs are fairly high. I hate to be considered begging all the time but I am a little worried about this part of it. We like to play our own part in Newfoundland and I would not advise taking on a job that we cannot handle properly. We do not want to be always coming around asking for more.

Another angle to this road construction business is the assistance that it will give to relieving unemployment. Frankly I do not like the idea of this cost being as high as it will be, but even though it will assist unemployment I cannot see how we are going to find $25 million unless some wizard comes along and pulls it out of a hat. Unemployment has recently been taken care of by the provincial government by the payment of $13.20 for a 48-hour week. Can you imagine in this day and age that in one of our ten provinces a family man is receiving only $13.20 for 48 hours of work. It is easy to see what is going to happen. The family allowance cheques that are being received in Newfoundland will be used for purposes never intended by the act. I am quite worried about that and I am sure all hon. members from the province are in the same state of mind. I probably got a little off the point in this discussion, but I thought I should mention this matter.

From the correspondence the minister had with our premier it would appear that the subject of the resolution has been discussed. This letter was dated September 2, 1949, but I was rather confused by noting a Newfoundland newspaper report dated October 1. This report referred to the visit of the premier of Newfoundland to Ottawa and the discussion he had had with the minister with regard to a highway. There is a headline, "Twenty feet wide road to be built from Port aux Basques to city", and the premier is reported to have said:

> Thanks to the help offered by the federal government, we'll have a paved highway from St. John's to Port aux Basques, with a minimum of a twenty-foot pavement and two-foot shoulders on either side.

Then the premier is reported to have said further:

> I don't guarantee that the paving itself will be completed within our first term of office, but the road itself will be completed and a great deal of its pavement will be laid. In addition there will be many miles of secondary roads constructed.

There seems to be confusion of thought in this matter. This resolution contemplates legislation which will follow a decision by the provinces concerned. If the premier is reported correctly it would seem that he had more or less accepted the proposal. I notice down at the bottom of this same newspaper another article which reads:

> Work in connection with the survey of the western section of the proposed trans-Canada highway is progressing satisfactorily, and a party under T. H. Winter which commenced work at Robinson's on September 5 has now moved to McKay's.

These are places on the west coast.

> It is understood that the work will be pushed forward and as much as possible completed before winter sets in.

I do not know if it means when the minister sets in or winter itself, but there does appear to be some similarity in the thoughts of the minister and the premier. The premier appears to have accepted the fact that it is all over and done with. In his letter to the minister he says:

> Many thanks for your letter of September 2 . . . I may say that we are most eager to be in on the proposition from the very commencement.

The premier may take it as being all right. He may have decided Newfoundland can afford this expenditure, and if he sees his way clear I am not going to knock it, but frankly I do not see it as he does. I am quite worried about it. I would certainly wish to see a highway in Newfoundland in keeping with the rest of Canada. I certainly would wish Newfoundland to be able to pay its proportionate share of the cost of the highway, but I do not see how Newfoundland can do it. The bases in Newfoundland need highroads from the defence angle, but unless there is some other contribution suggested than that of 50 per cent to be paid by the dominion I do not see how the province can provide the balance. I heard the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) say that for some provinces the contribution should be 33 per cent. I am not able to give a figure for Newfoundland. All I can say is that it should be less than any other province of Canada if Newfoundland is to pay its share. I am not able to go into figures, but I should like to see the road constructed. I should like to see it properly built, and I should like to see it built soon. I hope when legislation is being introduced there will be an exception in the case of your poor cousin in the matter of contribution.

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the general policy of federal contribution to the building of highways and assisting the provinces therein. Therefore I am in general sympathy with the proposal before the house. I am particularly glad to give support to a minister from Nova Scotia because of my personal regard for him. I am in favour of it also because for some years I had considerable experience with highway administration and construction, and I have given my support at all times to improving highways starting in 1918, when the province of Nova Scotia had lefthand drive and nothing but sheep and cow trails all over the province. The highways were then looked after by sectional highway statute labour, when a provincial highway board was set up, of which I was a member. There were five members; three of them were supposed to be Liberals and two were associated with the other party. In those days there were only two parties, but there were no politics in our efforts, at least so far as I was concerned.

We laid down certain policies and started a program. I have given my support to highway development from 1918 to the present time. I had the privilege and responsibility of being minister of highways in Nova Scotia for eight years. I had to take up the burden of administering the highways department from those early days. We were able to accomplish a good deal, and according to our revenue and resources, I believe that we accomplished as much towards the construction and maintenance of highways as has been done since. It has been the policy of everybody in the province of Nova Scotia to advance the construction of our highway transportation system. Great progress has been made.

I had the honour of proposing the policy of federal assistance for the construction of highways at the Conservative convention held at Winnipeg, which policy was adopted and put into effect under the Bennett government. Unfortunately it had to be carried out in the days of the depression when it was most difficult to secure funds to advance the programs that we had in hand. Our objective was to give as much employment as possible and to distribute the work as widely as we could. We were able to keep all our villages, towns and cities in the province of Nova Scotia solvent during those days, and no municipality defaulted on its bonds.

The industries of Nova Scotia could not give employment to their old hands. The workmen's compensation board recorded $30 million less in wages per year than they did a few years before. Because we had the responsibility in those days we were blamed by some—and I have heard it in the house many times—for the depression which was continent and world wide. We met the situation the best we could. We undertook to build many sections of the trans-Canada highway. We were not able to build it in a continuous stretch, but in different localities where labour requirements were the greatest. It is a problem today for the present minister, and for the ministers of all the provinces, to lay out the route of the trans-Canada highway so that it will serve their provinces. In those days we laid out the highway in Nova Scotia from the New Brunswick boundary to Cape Breton, through Sydney, and on to Louisbourg, that old fortress of the historic days when the French and the British fought for ascendancy.

It is more important than ever that that route be adopted under the present program because it gives connection with Newfoundland. We laid out one stretch of thirty-three miles running from Sydney. We adopted a 100-foot right of way, and the work was carried on largely by manual labour. We dispensed almost entirely with machinery, which gave more employment, but we were not able to do the work as cheaply as we could have if we had used machinery. We were only able to employ men in relays and provide two or three weeks' work at a time. It was not efficient help, but we did it in order to give employment to the people not only of the rural districts where the highways ran but also of the towns and cities. We established our own camps and supplied the food. Many of the people who came out from the mining towns in those days, where the mines were working one or two days a week, had not eaten a square meal for weeks. Many of them ate heartily, and their stomachs could not retain the food. Those were the conditions under which we carried on, but I believe we got a fair return for the work we did in those days in starting the trans-Canada highway.

A highway of the highest standard was continued to Halifax and to other parts of the province. I do not know what the policy of the government of Nova Scotia is today. I have glanced over the correspondence the minister has tabled, but I do not see any correspondence from the province of Nova Scotia. I am sure the government of Nova Scotia has an advanced policy. I feel greatly handicapped tonight, Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this resolution because there is no correspondence available from the government of Nova Scotia which would indicate their policy. I think it is due to us from Nova Scotia, in fact to all the members of this house, that the complete correspondence be placed in our hands so that we may know the attitude not only of the province of Nova Scotia but of every province in Canada. I am sure that is the wish of all members of the house who desire to assist in working out the best policy possible.

All work undertaken in Cape Breton at that time was not part of the trans-Canada highway. We built the Cabot trail 186 miles largely in the constituency of the member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll). That is a great asset to the province of Nova Scotia today and I believe the whole of Canada. That was carried out by labour during those depressed days. Not only were we able to do our share of the work in Nova Scotia and keep the municipalities solvent, but we were able to pay all our own bills and finance our own undertakings. That was not the case with the western provinces. The four western provinces, with their enormous resources and great revenues of recent years, went through a difficult period at that time resulting in the cancelling of a large portion of their expenditure during those depressed years, but we paid all our commitments.

I am going to read some of the figures I gave to the house on May 20, 1947. The treasury bill debt of the four western provinces was as follows: Manitoba, $24,734,-451.82; Saskatchewan, $80,441,852.44; Alberta, $26,212,000; British Columbia, $34,112,249.99, making a total debt of $165,500,554.25. I presume a considerable portion of those expenditures in those days went toward the building of the trans-Canada highway. The province of Nova Scotia paid every dollar of its share. The federal government has cancelled $55,456,164 of that debt and repaid, out of the proceeds of natural resources, $15,987,500. The province of Nova Scotia contributed to those great natural resources of the west. They got in addition a cash contribution, refunded without interest, of $49,729,979.99; there was also refunded on a thirty-year basis with interest at 2·58 per cent the sum of $44,326,910.19.

Mr. Carroll: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Did the dominion government contribute towards the construction of the road the hon. member mentioned?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I cannot hear the question.

Mr. Carroll: Did the dominion government contribute anything towards the construction of the road the hon. member mentioned, from Sydney, through Bras d'Or lakes district to Halifax?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Yes, the dominion government contributed 50 per cent of all expenditures on the trans-Canada highway. They also contributed a certain amount towards the improvement of other highways, towards the construction of the Cabot trail, towards railway crossing and other work. I am pointing out here that the portion payable by Nova Scotia was paid in full by the province of Nova Scotia, while in the western provinces their portion was largely forgiven. I say to the minister that special consideration should now be given to Nova Scotia for what it paid out in the building of roads in comparison with what was done in western Canada in the days of depression. I believe that equal treatment should be given to the eastern provinces. In laying out this trans-Canada highway, we should adopt a high standard because we are not only building for today, but for the next 100 or 1,000 years.

The province of Nova Scotia needs these highways for transportation purposes. We need these highways, too, to take advantage of the tourist traffic. I believe that Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and to some extent New Brunswick are the most neglected parts of Canada when it comes to the tourist trade. Those sections are blessed with hospitable people, the finest climate, beautiful scenery and warm sea water for bathing. The water in the Northumberland strait is the warmest and safest of any from New York to Newfoundland. This trans-Canada highway should be built with special regard for the needs of that neglected part of Canada in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, so that there would be quick and easy access not only for the people of the United States but for the many thousands of people in central Canada, many of whom today go to the state of Maine and to other places in the United States. They should have the best possible highway in order that they might have access to our great tourist resorts.

I believe the minister should give special consideration to the possibility and advisability of building a short route through the state of Maine. I say that it is a matter which is worthy of serious consideration. I am quite sure that our friends in the United States would lend their co-operation. It would save two or three hundred miles for those who would want to go from central Canada to the maritime provinces and take advantage of our tourist attractions.

I am not going to take up any more time, Mr. Speaker. As I have said, I am in general sympathy with the policy which has been proposed by the minister. There are many features to be worked out. I am confident that the province of Nova Scotia will co-operate with him. Coming as he does from the province of Nova Scotia, he has a special responsibility to see that full consideration is given to the claims of our part of Canada and to what we have done in previous years in developing the highways of Nova Scotia and helping, within our own resources, in relieving unemployment in the days of depression.

In this connection I might point out that today there is, in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and I presume to some extent at least in Prince Edward Island, a demand for employment which is far greater than this government appears to realize. There is unemployment and distress in parts of the maritime provinces today. It is urgently necessary that work be undertaken on this trans-Canada highway project and on other government projects in order to relieve the distress that is becoming greater all the time in that part of Canada.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Somehow or other, Mr. Speaker, whenever I hear a member from the maritime provinces speak, and I reflect on what has happened to those three noble provinces since they entered confederation, I find myself deeply moved. That is so tonight, as a result of listening to the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

I have long favoured the principle of a trans-Canada highway. Even before I entered parliament I wondered how it was that this matter had been neglected by successive Canadian administrations. I still favour a trans-Canada highway system.

I may say that on July 11, 1947, as recorded at page 5460 of Hansard, I raised the question of a trans-Canada highway. I was joined by a number of members, including the then members for Qu'Appelle, Fraser Valley, Weyburn, Swift Current, Macleod, Kootenay West, Kootenay East and Regina City, all supporting the southernmost route of the trans-Canada highway.

As has been mentioned by hon. members who have preceded me, there are three possible routes in western Canada. One of those goes from Brandon to Saskatoon to Edmonton through the Yellowhead pass to Vancouver. Another one goes from Brandon to Medicine Hat, and from Medicine Hat to Calgary through the Kicking Horse pass to Hope to Vancouver.

Mr. Johnston: That is something.

Mr. Blackmore: The other one goes from Brandon to Medicine Hat to Lethbridge through the Crowsnest pass to Hope to Vancouver. This third one is the southernmost route. As I said, the members whose constituencies I mentioned favoured the southernmost route.

I have no desire whatever, Mr. Speaker, to precipitate any unhappiness or discord in the house by advocating any one of these routes. That is not my purpose in rising tonight. Therefore the members who want to start shooting might just hold their fire until they find out whether or not they have something to shoot at.

On April 28, 1949, I rose in the house, as reported at page 2693 of Hansard, and delivered a speech in which I advocated that the federal government adopt a policy under which they would provide for the expenditure of one billion dollars in five yearly instalments for the assistance of the provinces in building and maintaining a system of trans-Canada highways. At that time I also advocated the completion of the southernmost route first, and gave the reasons why I believed that should be done.

Trans-Canada Highway

I now desire to congratulate the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the vision, faith and all-round statesmanship they have displayed in initiating a policy of federal aid for the provinces which is more ambitious and more promising than anything that has hitherto been advocated or suggested in the Dominion of Canada. I believe that their names will go down in history with honour because of this action. I do not believe they have gone nearly far enough, as I shall indicate, but they have made a good start; and because of that they deserve the gratitude of everyone in the Dominion of Canada.

Before I say any more, I believe that I should suggest the principles which ought to underlie expenditures in Canada upon trans-Canada highways. I believe that there should be federal aid for, as I have already indicated, a system somewhat comparable with the inter-regional system in the United States. I believe that the appropriation should be greatly increased beyond what is even dreamed of at the present time, and I believe that Canada is perfectly capable of meeting the commitments under such an increased appropriation. I believe that the dominion should undertake to pay a considerable share of the expenditures during the ten years just past upon highways that, after careful consideration, shall be found to be part of that system. For example, if we are dealing with Nova Scotia and we find that a certain portion of the highways which she has built as a province should be included under the system of trans-Canada highways, then certainly Nova Scotia should, I believe, be reimbursed to the full for the money she has expended in the construction of those highways during the past ten years. That does not need to be all done in one year. It could be done over a period of years, say ten years, greatly to the advantage of the whole of the Dominion of Canada.

I believe that we should broaden the basis of federal support to include not only the construction but the maintenance of highways. As was well developed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the cost of maintenance is excessive. Anyone who has had any experience whatsoever in maintaining provincial highways knows that.

I believe that the next principle is this. We should leave the provinces to determine how and where the money will be spent upon highways that shall have been agreed upon as appropriately constituting parts of the trans-Canada highway system. There are a number of people who seem to think that the provinces are unable to spend the money wisely. All anyone needs to do is to listen to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. All he needs to do is to go into Nova Scotia and see what has been accomplished there with the most meagre financial resources. He will come away with the deepest respect for the people who administer that province and the other provinces of the maritimes. No one can tell me that the provincial governments are not alive and prudent, in a general way at least, in the expenditure of money which comes into their hands. Therefore I say, let the provinces decide where the road is to be built. They will decide. They are interested in the development of Canada just as much as anyone in Ottawa could possibly be.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) gave us an idea concerning what the United States has done for highway construction. Probably there are several things I might say which might be in addition to his excellent contribution. I think the hon. member truly gave us a most instructive, informative and perhaps inspiring address.

In the main the United States efforts began with Woodrow Wilson. He encouraged expenditures from the federal treasury for the construction of so-called "post roads". That was a long time ago. The United States has a bureau of roads which co-operates actively with state highway departments. Entirely adequate sums of money are placed at the disposal of engineering staffs of federal and state agencies for preliminary engineering purposes, and thereby serious mistakes are avoided.

In 1941 congress voted $10 million as aid toward planning for primary highways. In 1943 congress voted $50 million for planning of post-war highway work in all the states. If I may suggest so, the federal government in the United States is doing the thing in a big way, in a correct way and in a sound way. Past expenditures on roads between 1931 and 1942 inclusive in the form of federal aid in the United States amounted to $209,327,417 annually, matching equal gross sums from the forty-eight states. Between 1934 and 1942, 2·9 per cent of the total national revenue was spent on roads; ·8 per cent was spent by federal authorities. If this ratio were continued it is estimated that $2,250 million would be provided for highway construction. Whether or not the United States will follow that ratio is not quite clear. In addition to that, they were spending $750 million for a proposed national inter-regional highway system.

I wish to direct the attention of the house tonight, if I may, to that inter-regional highway system, the like of which I believe we should develop in Canada. In fact I believe it is our duty inasmuch as we are jointly responsible for the defence of this continent. I believe it is our duty to see to it that there is a system of highways in Canada which is comparable with the system in the United States so that the United States people do not need to be worrying constantly over whether or not there are going to be highways up here to enable them to manoeuvre in case of trouble.

How came it about that this national inter-regional highway system was planned? Well, F. D. Roosevelt, on April 14, 1941, set up what was known as a national inter-regional highways committee under Thomas H. MacDonald, commissioner of public roads, to make a survey of the need for a system of express highways throughout the United States. May I suggest that probably the Prime Minister or the minister would do well to do something like that at a very early date in Canada. This committee recommended that the federal government provide $750 million a year to help build 34,000 miles of rural and urban roads to comprise a proposed national inter-regional highway system. On January 12, 1944, President F. D. Roosevelt recommended that congress accept the report of this committee.

The results of this and other United States efforts are shown by figures in a schedule which I should like to have the privilege of putting on Hansard. I am not sure whether I shall have permission to do that, therefore I am going to run over hastily some of the figures which are involved. The schedule I have covers the years from 1919 to 1949 inclusive. In those years the United States government spent per capita the following sums of money: 66 cents in 1919—per capita that is. It works out to a lot of money—and in the following years 94 cents, 95 cents, 71 cents, 52 cents, 61 cents, 61 cents, 70 cents, 61 cents, 68 cents, 69 cents, $1.32. A great increase occurred in 1930. In the following years, $1.19, $2.10, $4.37, $1.15, $3.27, $1.12, $1.08, $1.71, $1.72, $1.10, $1.38, $2.70, $1.88, which brought them up to 1943. During the following years the appropriation dropped down considerably, particularly during the war, to 22 cents and probably nothing in the next year. But again in 1946, immediately the war was over, the appropriation rose to $3.71 per capita, $3.65 and $3.51. There is a contribution which I would suggest that the Canadian authorities keep their eye on and do their best. Let Canada have a Canadian inter-regional highway system comparable with that in the United States.

May I say that western Canada is well along towards such a system already. A great amount of construction has gone on in the three prairie provinces and in British Columbia, notwithstanding the relatively meagre resources at their disposal. For example in Alberta: In the first place, the Yellowhead pass road, in the main consisting of the Alberta provincial highway No. 16, runs from Lloydminster to Jasper Park gate, a distance of 360 miles. From Lloydminster to Edmonton it is gravel surface. From Edmonton to Seba Beach it is bituminous. From Seba Beach to Jasper Park gate it is first-class gravel. Much work and great expenditure have been put forth in respect to this highway.

The Kicking Horse pass highway, Alberta provincial highway No. 1, runs from Walsh to Banff Park gate, a distance of 302 miles. From Walsh to Medicine Hat it is low-type bituminous. From Medicine Hat to Bassano it is gravel road, third class. From Bassano to Gleichen it is new grade under construction. From Gleichen to Strathmore it is new grade and gravel. From Strathmore to Banff Park gate it is bituminous surface. The Crowsnest pass route is Alberta's provincial highways Nos. 1 and 3. From Walsh to Crowsnest via Medicine Hat, Lethbridge and Macleod is a distance of 245 miles. From Walsh to Medicine Hat the road is low-type bituminous. From Medicine Hat to Taber it is first-class earth and gravel. From Taber to Pincher Creek it is bituminous, and from Pincher Creek to Crowsnest it is earth grade and gravel.

From these facts it can be readily seen that Alberta is alive right to her fingertips. If the federal government had been half as much alive as the provincial governments have been during the last fifteen years Canada would not have such deficient roads as we have in many cases at the present time. We do not need to worry about putting money at the disposal of governments that have done so much for roads as Alberta has.

Thus far Canada federally has made little or no systematic contribution towards Canadian highways. I said "systematic". There have been contributions. For example, in 1919 the dominion parliament granted $20 million to assist the provinces in highway construction. It was to be awarded on the basis of $80,000 flat to each province. It was limited to 40 per cent of the cost of construction or improvement. One hon. member, I think it was an hon. member representing Newfoundland, pointed out a moment ago that if that province is expected to pay one-half of the cost of the highway in order to get the dominion government to pay the other half, then that province never could build a highway and never could claim the 50 per cent.

Trans-Canada Highway

The minister has a reputation for good common sense. I believe he can see quite clearly what caused the trouble in 1919. It was that very fact. A number of the provinces simply could not possibly pay the money. How could they pay 60 per cent of the cost of an elaborate system of highways in order to get the dominion government to pay 40 per cent? It seems that the Ottawa government has been afflicted with a lack of common sense for a great many years. A pretty good discussion of this whole subject is to be found in the New Brunswick submission to the Sirois commission at pages 44 and 45.

After about four years or five years of trying to put into operation successfully this policy the dominion government abandoned it.

Now, what are the provinces doing this year? What have they attempted to do? Provincial expenditures for highways for 1949, proposed, amounted to $157 million. I am taking figures from a report which appeared in the Financial Post, according to information at my disposal.

For Manitoba the amount is $7,400,000. Of this $1,400,000 is for reconstruction, aid to municipalities and school districts. There were 160 miles of main highway to be graded; 65 miles surfaced with asphalt and concrete, Winnipeg to the international line at Emerson; Brandon to the international line at Peace Gardens and Brandon to the Saskatchewan border.

Saskatchewan appropriated $7,400,000, according to this report. It states that $2,500,000 of this was spent for maintenance —and it will be noted that maintenance comes at tremendous cost. There were 400 miles of bus-grade roads, 430 miles of gravel surfacing and 105 miles of bitumen-treated gravel. So Saskatchewan is alive to her fingertips. There is a whole lot more than deadwood in the Saskatchewan government. British Columbia appropriated $13 million on construction, reconstruction and paving. It states that 350 miles were to be newly paved, according to the report when it was made.

Hon. members will be interested to know something about Alberta's recent efforts. I have in my hand a government document, called "These are the Facts". These facts appear at pages 34 and 35, where it states a number of facts concerning the last fourteen or fifteen years of road-building in the province:

Main and secondary highways; miles of work done from March, 1936 to March, 1948:

Grading	1,922
Reconditioned grading,	844
Gravel	4,207
Asphalt	1,149
Seal coat	645

[Mr. Blackmore.]

To explain what that means, here is a legend which states:

"Grading" is construction of standard earth grade to highways standards.

"Recondition grading" is done when necessary to bring highway up to standard prior to first course or replacement gravel surfacing.

"Gravelled" miles shown consist of first course and replacement gravel surfacing; it also includes the gravelling of highways where locations have been revised.

"Asphalt" miles include "blotter" and light plant mix surfaced highways, most of which were later rebuilt with a six to nine-inch stabilized gravel base and two-inch hot plant mix surface.

"Seal Coat" miles represent gravel chips and asphalt applied to seal plant mix surface.

May I interrupt at this point to say that we have had a great deal of difficulty in Alberta finding out the kind of road we should have for our terrain and climatic conditions. It cost us a great deal to learn these essential facts.

A comparison of main and secondary highway mileages between March 31, 1936, and March 31, 1948, shows the following:

Type	March 31 1936	March 31 1948	Difference
Graded (earth)	767	221	minus 546
Gravelled	2,152	3,258	plus 1,106
Asphalt	92	645	plus 553
Total miles	3,011	4,124	plus 1,113

That is a lot of road-building. The next table shows a comparison of district and local road mileages as at March 31, 1936, and March 31, 1948, as follows:

Type	March 31, 1936	March 31, 1948	Difference
Ordinary road	40,000	42,749	plus 2,749
Graded (earth)	19,373	25,487	plus 6,114
Gravelled	Nil	7,596	plus 7,596
Total miles	59,373	75,832	plus 16,459

The next table shows the amount of road grants paid to municipal districts:

Amount of road grants paid to municipal districts:

1941-42 Fiscal year	$101,290.95
1944-45 " "	468,944.73
1946-47 " "	523,338.99
1947-48 " "	1,038,207.68

From which it can easily be seen that there has been a regular increase to municipal districts. Then, the bridge-building record is as follows:

	March, 1942	March, 1948
Number steel and concrete bridges	170	216
Number timber bridges	1,885	2,611
Total bridges built	2,055	2,827
Number of bridges repaired	1,509	2,192

Hon. members will be able to see that in this respect Alberta is right up in the forefront. My object in pointing out the efforts put forward by Alberta is, as I said, to show that we do not need any governor or overseer from Ottawa to tell the provinces how to build roads. The people out there know how to build roads, and they do it. All we in Ottawa need to do is to provide them with the financial support, and they will do the rest, and give us a trans-Canada highway system of which we shall be proud, and which will be of great use to us.

Turning again to the matter of the route, I am afraid, from the way many hon. members have been speaking, that we shall argue about the different routes to a point where we shall nullify our efforts. Under no circumstances must that take place. I grant that all three routes advocated by hon. members and throughout the country must be built sooner or later. The Yellowhead route is important for the reasons given by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald). Of course it is. No one questions that at all. The Kicking Horse route is important for reasons which will be given by those who advocate that route. Of course it is. And the southern route is exceedingly important, also.

I am not setting forth the reasons why the southern route should be built first in order to antagonize anyone; I do so only that members of the house and the people of Canada should know why I would support the southern route first. Here are some of the reasons:

In the first place it is the most densely populated route, taking into consideration all the various towns—Winnipeg, Brandon, Regina, Moose Jaw, Lethbridge, Cranbrook, Trail, and all the other places along the route. It is asserted by those who have given the matter much study that there is a denser concentration of population along this route than along any of the others. In the second place, it is the greatest tax-producing area. In the next place its industrial importance is noteworthy. For ordinary farming, this district is outstanding, producing all kinds of farm commodities. In addition to that there is considerable oil development. Lumbering flourishes along that route. Fruit-growing is important, as also are mining, smelting, seed-producing and sugar-producing. There are many parks along the route and a great many other features which appeal to tourists.

It is the most direct route from Winnipeg to Vancouver, and is an all-weather route. It will be argued that there are places along it which in the wintertime are likely to become seriously obstructed by snow. That may be said concerning any road which is to cross Canada and go over the mountains, I do not care which one it is. It is something that has to be faced; that should be borne in mind. The route I suggest is close to the United States border and in case any particular section of it should be blocked by snow for three or fours days it would not be a difficult matter to drop down across the line, go along the United States highway, come up the other side of the snow obstruction and go right on through. That advantage is not to be found in connection with any of the other routes. I am not attempting to disparage any other route; I am simply pointing out the advantages that are worthy of note in connection with this southernmost route. It is more nearly an all-weather route than any that can be found in Canada going west from Winnipeg to Vancouver.

There are forty points of entry into the United States not very far from this proposed southern route. Great numbers of United States tourists will come from the large United States concentrations of population across the line. Anyone knows that if a person crosses the border and gets onto a good highway at once he is more likely to go into the hinterland. These are things that I believe should forcibly be brought to the attention of anyone trying to form a conclusion on this matter. This route is the natural entry to most of our parks. Many more things could be said about it, but probably I have said enough. From the strategic point of view it would be extremely important because it offers the most direct and shortest route from Winnipeg west to Vancouver.

Some will say that the Dominion of Canada cannot afford the money, but that is the sheerest nonsense. It has yet to be shown by anyone in Canada that this country cannot afford to pay as much per capita for roads as is paid in the United States. It will be pointed out that the United States has large concentrations of industry, but Canada will have concentrations of industry if we have sense enough to manage the country in the right way. If we adopt measures which prevent the development of industry, we shall never have industry in Canada.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) pointed out how the national credit could be used for the building of these roads. This is a feasible means of providing the money. It has been used and it is being used today only we do not call it that. It can be used on a large scale by this country and by that means these roads can be built.

I should like to show hon. members how much would have been paid to Alberta as one of our provinces if Canada had been spending as much per capita on roads as has been spent in the United States. These are the amounts that would have been paid to that province in the different years:

Year	Amount
1939	$1,351,920
1940	869,000
1941	1,098,480
1942	2,095,200
1943	1,488,960
1944	179,960
1945	.....
1946	2,979,130
1947	3,000,300
1948	2,969,460
1949	3,048,500
	$19,080,910

All that money was not given to the province of Alberta. That is the way it has worked out for us. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) pointed out what has been spent in Montana and other states along the border. I ask hon. members to compare those expenditures with what has not been spent in Canada. We shall then have an answer for the first two-for-a-nickel politician who comes out from Ottawa to Alberta and sneers about the poor roads in that province and compares them with the fine roads across the line. We shall then have an answer for the shyster newspapers all over the country who do the same kind of thing without having taken the trouble to tell the people of Alberta or Saskatchewan that whereas the United States government is constantly helping the states down there, the Canadian government is doing next to nothing at all to help the provinces up here.

Mr. Byrne: Can the hon. member tell us what the Alberta government collects in the way of licence fees for cars and what is collected by the state of Montana? I do not want the aggregate revenue; I simply want the charge per car.

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member asked a minister of the federal government who had all his experts in front of him a question like that it would take the minister some little time to find the answer. The hon. member would hardly expect the minister to be able to give the answer offhand. The Alberta government is using practically all the money raised from motor vehicle fees and all that sort of thing in paying for the debts accumulated for roads by the provincial governments which preceded it. The money was borrowed and spent on roads and the roads have been lost. The Social Credit government were forced to build roads and then at the same time to take care of the debt that had been accumulated. If I had known, I would have come down here fully prepared to answer the hon. gentleman, but I may bring down all this information at a later time and be able to tell him anything he wants to know.

I do not wish to spend any more time on this matter as I shall probably have more to say later on. To summarize: first of all the dominion government must enter the field of highway construction on a far wider scale than it has ever dreamed of doing. I think the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) put his finger right on the pulse of the situation when he said that if we did not build these roads in Canada somebody else would. If it is not the United States it is likely to be the Russians. We can take our choice. I think that is putting it pretty clearly. We just cannot escape the responsibility which rests upon us. Federally we must enter the field in a far more generous manner than we have ever done in the history of this country, than we have ever dreamed of doing.

I am grateful for what the minister is now proposing and I thank him for it in the interests of all the people of Canada, but this is only a small thing compared with what he ought to be contemplating. This may all sound pretty harsh but I am simply stating the facts. I put the figures on record so that we may know that what Canada has done looks extremely meagre and almost contemptible. As I say, the participation must be on a far greater scale.

Second, we must stop trying to decide what particular highway we are going to build and concentrate on the building of a system of highways, not only to go across Canada and be known as trans-Canada highways but to connect up the urban centres in the country, especially those which are situated in what we might term strategic positions. Speaking as a westerner I submit that all over western Canada there should be a system of highways which could be used in case we are called upon in an emergency to defend ourselves.

We do not need to bother about how the money is going to be spent. I believe the four western provinces have shown themselves sufficiently capable of handling money that comes into their hands to justify our placing implicit trust in them. All we need to do is to supply the money; they will build the highways. When they get done we shall have the system of highways that we have all longed for in Canada.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I undertake to finish before eleven o'clock. I think I know what you have in your mind. I only rise to speak so that I may suggest to the minister who has charge of this matter that under no circumstances should he create a commission with respect to the route of the trans-Canada highway. If he does so he will then be in the difficulty of having all these local geographical positions urged upon him by the members of the commission who of course must come from various parts of the country, and naturally will have the colouring, may I say, of the geographical section from which they come. The problem before us surely is one to be settled by the provinces, and I think that has been the policy of the federal government.

I was greatly interested in an announcement made in Edmonton a short time ago by one who recently occupied the position of minister of mines and resources in this government, and who has now gone to that other place. I assure the minister I do not mean he is dead, but he has gone to that other place. He announced that the matter had been settled some time ago in so far as western Canada was concerned, and that the highway would run via Walsh, Medicine Hat, Calgary, and so on. I greatly sympathize with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) in his endeavour to have the highway built over those swamps extending for 200 miles between Edmonton and Jasper. I have the greatest sympathy with him.

When we speak of a trans-Canada highway being used by tourists, what do tourists come to see? They come to see scenery. The suggestion that any tourist from eastern Canada or the United States should take some highway which avoided Banff and Jasper is on a par with the suggestion that you might as well give your son or your son-in-law the money to visit England for six months and tell him to be sure not to go near London. If he is going to India you may as well tell him to see India, to see Delhi, but under no circumstances should he ever take a look at the Taj Mahal. The matter is just that simple and so utterly ridiculous.

The difficulty is that in the city of Edmonton and the northern part of Alberta members of my party, as well as other hon. members, all ran their election campaigns on one ground, namely, that the highway should not go through Calgary. They adopted that position unanimously. They all knew the situation perfectly well—they had run out of stuff or something of that kind—and the hon. senator certainly knew it at that time when he had charge of the general campaign there. I well remember that a great friend of mine, and a member of my own party, put great advertising splashes in an Edmonton paper saying that if we were elected the highway would go through Edmonton. It cost me several hundred dollars to answer him. They were not elected but I was, and I want to assure him and all the Edmonton people that in spite of the eloquence which was wasted on their desert air—and I use the word quite advisedly—we all knew that the matter had been settled by the Alberta government.

What did we do in Alberta? We were reasonable. We simply joined the governments of Saskatchewan and British Columbia in a most co-operative way and said: You are coming in here and you are coming in there. Certainly we will continue the straight line, which of course we are doing, and thus show the people all the beauties of the Rocky mountains which are not visible on any other route, and I have travelled them all. We are most co-operative. We are doing everything we can to assist the minister, and we will keep on assisting him just as long as he keeps his nose out of our business and lets us tell him where the highway is going. Why shouldn't we? When he is finished who will own it? Are we going to end with a highway in that province owned by somebody else? That is really what the matter is about.

It is a great thing to live in that country; the spaces are so vast. You can start at Winnipeg on any good-sized map and draw a line from Winnipeg through Saskatoon and on to Edmonton. They have an organization there which travelled from Winnipeg to Vancouver by road. They did it to prove it could happen. I must say the basis of their whole equipment was pull-outs and shovels, but they finally got through. I have no idea how long they travelled on the ties of the railroad but they made it in the final analysis.

I said that I would take only a moment or two. Before I sit down may I repeat my advice, if I may use that expression, to the minister. Do not let us have a commission to further confuse the picture. Let him stay in his present position. He has made up his mind that the route is going to be left to the provinces. Thereby he avoids all sorts of difficulties, but even now of course he will have to listen to the eloquence of my very good friends who come from that area which the little town of Leduc has now made known to Canadians, namely, the city of Edmonton.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, before the debate ends I think it is only right that a few words should be said about the practical route. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) put up quite a case but he wrecked it right at the finish. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) also told us that only on the route via Calgary could you see the scenery of the Rocky mountains. I contend that is a statement nobody but a blind man would make. I want to deal with the arguments made by both these members. I do not think it is right to allow them to stand, when they are without foundation, without at least explaining them to some extent.

On motion of Mr. Fair the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will try to conclude the debate on this resolution. Then we will take up Bill No. 149 with respect to bankruptcy. I understand it is to go to the standing committee on banking and commerce. Then we will resume the debate on second reading of Bill No. 144, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act. If any time is left we will take up two small bills having to do with the Department of Justice, Nos. 64 and 65.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 22, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCES TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON NOVEMBER 21

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): On a question of privilege Mr. Speaker, on reading Hansard of November 21 at page 2000, just after I had presented certain views to you in regard to a discussion which took place yesterday on a point of order I find that words are included which I did not hear. If I had heard them, I would have dealt with them immediately.

Following the presentation of a quotation from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Hansard reports the Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Howe) as saying: "Always the slanderer." Since that incident is past, I do not propose to do more than to say that had I heard that statement at the time it was made, I would have taken appropriate action.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday in the course of one of the debates I asked whether or not a Mr. John Aird, associated with a certain bill, was the same John Aird who had been called in the Beauharnois investigation in 1931. At the time I asked my question I had been led to believe that such was the case. I now find that it is not the same man, and I feel that it is my duty to withdraw any inference against the Mr. John Aird associated with the pipe line bill in question.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: When the house assembled at eleven o'clock this morning the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) brought to my attention certain words which, according to Hansard, were used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He did not hear the words; I do not think any other hon. members of the house heard them, and in any event I did not hear them. I recall that there was considerable confusion at the time, and the debate was quite heated. Of course the words are unparliamentary. The leader of the opposition did not ask to have them withdrawn, but in the circumstances—

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the leader of the opposition withdrew his insinuation that I knew something I said I did not know, I am happy to withdraw the words in question.

Mr. Speaker: Then this will close the incident.

QUESTION OF TRANSPORTATION FOR WESTERN MEMBERS AT END OF SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport about arrangements for transportation home for western members at the end of the session. The reason I ask the question, Mr. Speaker, is that many of us have reservations for the 4th and 5th of December. Obviously the house will not finish its business on December 3. We have been informed by both railways that if we cancel our present reservations we shall get no transportation on either railroad until December 26. We should like to stay here until the end of the session—although I think some members of the government might like to see me go home this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: This is important to the western members, Mr. Speaker. Through you, sir, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether arrangements can be made. I presume that the government and the leader of the opposition want their members to remain until the end of the session.

Mr. Sinnott: Ride the rods.

Mr. Cruickshank: That may be all right for some hon. members from Manitoba; the hon. member for Springfield may have had the experience of riding the rods, but I have not.

We asked this question once before and arrangements were made. No member should have to leave before the end of the session. If a member cancels his reservations he has to stay here until December 26, and no one is going to do that. I should like an expression of opinion from the acting minister.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to have the officers of the Department of Transport discuss with the two railways the possibility of putting on additional equipment to take care of transportation for hon. members at the close of the session.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Before you call the order, Mr. Speaker, which was announced last night as the first business for today, I wish to tell the house that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) will not be here this morning. He is not very well. We would, however, ask the house to proceed, in his absence, with the resolution respecting the trans-Canada highway. I understand that the debate was nearly concluded last night, and we wish to have the bill introduced so that hon. members may study it and have a discussion on the second reading, if there is no objection to that course. I have spoken to representatives of the various parties, and they seem to agree.

Mr. Green: May I ask whether a minister will be available who can answer questions when the resolution goes into committee?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The minister has no parliamentary assistant, but the debate yesterday ran part of the afternoon and during the evening. The intention is that the bill be read the first time, and members will then have the details of the bill before them. If we do not adopt that procedure, I do not know just what course we can take. I do not know when the minister will be back.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Perhaps in the meantime the leader of the house will answer the questions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will do my best.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Minister of Public Works another question? Last night the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) undertook to table today further correspondence between the dominion and the provinces concerning the trans-Canada highway. Can the Minister of Public Works make arrangements to have it tabled in the course of the debate this morning?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall get in touch with my colleague's office, Mr. Speaker, and see whether the correspondence is ready. If it is, I will table it.

[Mr. Howe.]

CHINA

QUESTION AS TO RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) asked a question about a meeting of commonwealth high commissioners in London which was said in a newspaper report to be related to the recognition of communist China. Such a meeting took place between the high commissioners in London, as meetings frequently do. At that meeting preliminary views were canvassed regarding the situation in China. The government here was not specially asked to be there. It was a meeting to exchange views in accordance with the practice. Those views were exchanged, but there was no agreement on any common line, and the Canadian attitude would only be made known in consequence of action taken here.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, and the importance of the subject, I may be permitted to express an opinion which I feel is appropriate in relation to what has been said.

The statement which has just been made indicates that there was a meeting of high commissioners last Tuesday, as the report stated. The consequences of recognition of the Moscow-dominated communist government of China are so important that before that action is taken the members of this house should be afforded an opportunity to express their opinions as to the course Canada should follow. This might well be a turning point in the whole history of our relationships in the Pacific and with the nations which find themselves in this same position. In view of the statement which has now been made on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), will the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), before a decision is made, consider giving the house an opportunity to express its opinion on this subject.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That will depend upon the way in which events develop, Mr. Speaker. We should not like to fix a date for the discussion of the matter until we have more factual background to put before the house than we have at the present time. The situation is still that which was expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We regard recognition de facto of a government as something which can be done only if certain conditions appear to exist; and at the present time we are not in a position to say which, if any, of these conditions are satisfactorily established. I do not think we should be accomplishing much that would be useful if we were merely to deal with hypothetical cases. At the time we have this discussion we should be in a position to make a positive statement as to what we regard the situation to be. As soon as we have what appears to us to be sufficient factual background, we shall be glad to make that known to the house; and if at that moment it appears to be the desire of the house to have a discussion about it, we shall be glad to arrange for that discussion.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to precipitate a debate, but I should like to indicate to the Prime Minister why I am raising this question. The occupation of so large a country by a certain type of government, even in what appears to be a civil war, may be an important turning point in the attitude of other nations to one of the big five at San Francisco. I am simply urging that in so important a matter, before Canada is committed to a course from which it cannot turn back, the house should, if possible, have an opportunity to express its opinion.

Mr. St. Laurent: We shall endeavour to do that if it is possible; but I should not like to make any firm commitment, because I do not expect that before the session prorogues there will be sufficient background to justify an attempt to bring before the house the material for a debate, and I should not like to undertake formally that nothing will be done during the recess of parliament if circumstances do develop more rapidly than we expect at the present time.

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES

The house resumed from Monday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to encourage and assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway and to provide for this purpose that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply may enter into agreements with any provinces providing for the payment by Canada to those provinces of contributions in respect of the cost of a trans-Canada highway; with provision also for the employment of temporary engineers, technical officers and other employees for the purposes of the act.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate until I heard some of the speeches last night and arguments on the different routes suggested. The fact that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) raised the question which he did a few moments ago makes it all the more necessary that the trans-Canada highway be constructed at the earliest possible moment.

During past weeks there seems to have been quite a good deal of lobbying done on behalf of some of the other routes, particularly the Crowsnest pass route. I notice that circulars have been distributed, and a number of speeches were made last night in favour of that route. Near the end of the discussion last night in favour of that route, the speech of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) buried the argument he had attempted to make. The hon. member buried his argument in snow, where his highway has been for the past number of years and will continue to be in the future. The hon. member said, as reported at page 2049 of Hansard:

The route that I suggest is close to the United States border and in case any particular section of it should be blocked by snow for three or four days it would not be a difficult matter to drop down across the line, go along the United States highway, come up the other side of the snow obstruction and go right on through. That advantage is not to be found in connection with any of the other routes.

I suggest to the hon. member for Lethbridge that when he made that statement he defeated any argument he might possibly have made during his detailed address, because he forgot to find out where that possible route is to get down south, and, again, where the possible route is to get back to his proposed highway. We understand that that highway would be very hard to build, and that for many months of the year it would be impassable because of snow. Therefore we can give that south highway a knockout blow and come to the Kicking Horse pass, for which the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) put up an argument last night.

The hon. member for Calgary West started out by advising the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that under no circumstances should he agree to a commission on the route of the trans-Canada highway. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is one of the most important matters that should be discussed at the present time, because I do not think that money belonging to the people of Canada will be spent in the wisest way by having things as the hon. member for Calgary West would have them. He said that the highway could go through Calgary. Later he said that the matter had been settled some time ago. He referred to the former minister of trade and commerce, who has now gone to the other place. Later he said, as reported at page 2051 of Hansard:

> I greatly sympathize with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) in his endeavour to have the highway built over those swamps extending for 200 miles between Edmonton and Jasper. I have the greatest sympathy with him.

I now say that there are no swamps there, or none so far as the road is concerned. We have a highway between Jasper and Edmonton. I have travelled over it in my car. I know. Therefore that argument seems to fall to pieces. Then he said, as reported on the same page of Hansard:

> The difficulty is that in the city of Edmonton and the northern part of Alberta members of my party, as well as other hon. members, all ran their election campaigns on one ground, namely, that the highway should not go through Calgary.

I have told my people right along that we should have a national highway commission made up of experts in the building of roads. The commission should include engineers who would know exactly what they were doing, instead of, as some other people have said, two-bit politicians who in many cases do not know the first thing about road building. I am still of the opinion that we should have a highway commission made up not of politicians but of roadbuilding engineers who know their business. I think Canada would get great benefit from that.

A little later, again at page 2051, the hon. member, speaking of a certain organization, said:

> You can start at Winnipeg on any good-sized map and draw a line from Winnipeg through Saskatoon and on to Edmonton. They have an organization there which travelled from Winnipeg to Vancouver by road. They did it to prove it could happen. I must say the basis of their whole equipment was pull-outs and shovels, but they finally got through. I have no idea how long they travelled on the ties of the railroad, but they made it in the final analysis.

Again I think that statement is just as foolish as anybody could make it, because we do know that we have travelled from Winnipeg to Edmonton and Jasper on the highway. I have been over it myself. I know that the road is good. I did not have to travel on ties. I do know also that a caravan of fifty cars travelled from Jasper to Vancouver, leaving Jasper on Wednesday and arriving at Vancouver on Friday. I did not hear about any shovels being used on that trip, either. The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) can give us the information on that, if necessary, and we can find out if there were any shovels used.

The argument put up by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) fades away into thin air. I say again we should have a commission, made up of competent persons, to survey all the proposed routes, a commission which could make use of the best possible information. The Yellowhead route reaches an elevation of 3,717 at the highest point; the Kicking Horse, 5,337, and the Crowsnest pass, 4,450. Snowfall must be one of the drawbacks on any route chosen. As to the Yellowhead, I understand the greatest danger is at Blue river. On the Kicking Horse I believe there is a stretch of approximately 350 miles which is subject to very heavy snow in the winter months. No matter how well a highway is built; if it is under snow slides or heavy snowfall it is of very little use.

Construction costs on the Kicking Horse route would be higher than those on the other routes. I am doubtful whether it would be possible to have a four-lane highway over this route. The Yellowhead would pass mostly through wide valleys and the cost of construction and maintenance would be much less than on the southern route.

I believe a greater percentage of population would be found on the Yellowhead route than on either of the others. There are many purposes for which the highway should be used, and consideration should be given to these before any route is chosen. We have been told in recent days that we must spend hundreds of millions of dollars for defence. The Alaska highway would appear to be one of the great highways which could be used for purposes of protection in the event of attack. A highway through the Yellowhead pass would give access to the Alaska highway. At the present time we have a connecting route from south to north, and this could be used rather than the one suggested by hon. members who favour the southern routes.

Then again, the Yellowhead route would connect with the two ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert. That is an important consideration, too. From the point of view of scenery we would have access to four national parks and five provincial parks. This would certainly be worth while from the point of view of tourist traffic.

An investigation into distances discloses that the Yellowhead pass route from Vancouver to Winnipeg is 1,747 miles, whereas by the Kicking Horse it is only 1,695, or 52 miles less than the route which is much easier to construct.

I do not feel that it is necessary for me to say anything further in this connection. In my view a start should be made. I do not think the government's proposal to pay fifty per cent is at all sufficient. I favour the suggestion made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) that national credit should be used for this project. By doing so the government would get away from much of the difficulty to which we have been objecting in the past.

I repeat that I am not advocating acceptance of the Yellowhead route without first having the decision of competent engineers appointed for the purpose.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, one word before the motion carries. The moment the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) made the request for the tabling of correspondence I sent a note to my colleague's office in which I stated:

> I understand the minister undertook to file this morning correspondence with the provinces. Would you be kind enough to have these documents sent to me in the house immediately so that I may table them.

I received this reply from the minister's office:

> Upon Mr. Higgins' request for the tabling of up-to-date correspondence the minister agreed it would be tabled today. The correspondence is still in process of being prepared, and will be tabled as soon as it can possibly be prepared.

This note is signed by the secretary. I will undertake at some time today, as soon as the documents are prepared, to table them, so that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will have them for the discussion of the bill.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I wonder if the minister would check on the correspondence with Nova Scotia. There is correspondence with that province, but the minister has not yet had authority to make it public. This correspondence is important to us, and it is important to all hon. members that it be made available. I would ask that it be checked up, even to the extent of communicating with Nova Scotia to see if they would not consent to release.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall check the matter with the minister's office. I understood, however, that the correspondence to be tabled would be that to which the provinces had agreed. If they do not agree, I would not wish to commit the minister to the tabling of it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): My request is that a further check be made with Nova Scotia to see if they will not release the correspondence in connection with the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will do that.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I understand the proposal made is that the discussion be deferred, in view of the fact that the minister is unable to be here today. There are, however, certain points which have not yet been covered, and concerning which questions could have been asked at this committee stage, before considering the bill on second reading.

I suggest that on the motion for second reading of the bill the minister should make a statement which would contain, in addition to anything else he may have to say, information as to provisions for maintenance; any information he has in regard to the route to be followed; any information as to other arrangements, if any, beyond the provision of fifty per cent of the cost of construction, and the decisions, if any, which have been made as to payment for past work.

I make this statement now so that it may be communicated to the minister, thus avoiding the necessity of delay later, or the asking of questions on the motion for second reading. An examination of the correspondence demonstrates that no positive decision has been made in this matter. The situation can be fairly well summed up in the letter of September 9 from Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland, who writes briefly that they are desirous of proceeding with this matter and closes by stating:

> This is merely to acknowledge your letter, and to say that we are anxious to be in on any arrangements made at the very outset.

This letter indicates just about how far this matter has actually gone. I urge, therefore, that on the second reading of the bill the minister answer the questions that so far have not been answered.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall draw the attention of the minister to the remarks of the leader of the opposition. I understood that the minister was to make a statement this morning and answer the questions that had been put yesterday. I shall ask him to make that statement on the second reading and give all the information that was asked for in the course of debate.

Mr. Gillis: I judge from the question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland that the correspondence between the department and the province of Nova Scotia is on the secret list. I certainly would like to know what are the views of that province, and I should like to know further what right the premier of that province or anyone else has to designate as secret, correspondence dealing with a matter of national public importance. In the final analysis this is where the decision must remain.

Trans-Canada Highway

The provinces have been dealing with the matter of the trans-Canada highway since the thirties. Large amounts of money have been spent in Nova Scotia, and I think we have a right to know whether the federal government will reimburse that province or whether they consider the relief payments made at that time as part of the financial arrangement. I am prepared to let this resolution go through, because I should like to see the bill; but I want to know what the province has said to this government in connection with the trans-Canada highway, and I shall have a lot to say on the second reading if we have not that information.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Up until now I understood that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wanted to have tabled the correspondence up to date between the dominion and the provinces that have given consent to the tabling. Another request was made by the hon. member for Cumberland, who insisted that we endeavour to get the consent of Nova Scotia to the tabling of the correspondence with that province. I do not know in what position the correspondence with Nova Scotia is at the present time, and I do not know whether it will be tabled.

Replying to the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I have always understood that correspondence between governments was tabled only after the parties concerned had agreed to the tabling. I shall call the attention of the minister to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I would not want to say that if the province does not agree we will table the correspondence. The hon. member has referred to the difficulties of the people of that province with their government, but I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said.

Mr. Gillis: My understanding is that in the case of certain interdepartmental correspondence it is considered to be a courtesy to withhold it. I understand also that the only rule as to secrecy of correspondence applies to that between foreign governments and this government. This is not an interdepartmental matter; this is a matter dealing with public funds to be expended on a national project. A minister of the province may wish to keep his negotiations secret, but I submit that he has no right to do so. There is no law that gives him that right. He is dealing with public funds, and there is no law or rule that this government would be breaking if they tabled that correspondence. The information is necessary if we are to make an intelligent decision.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Will the hon. member agree that if we ask the province once again for permission to table the correspondence, that is about as far as this government can go?

Mr. Gillis: Tell them you are going to table it anyway, even though you do not get permission.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gillis: It is public property.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like to consult the leader of the opposition to see if he would agree that we should table correspondence with a premier of a province without his permission. For my part, I think that would be going too far.

Mr. Drew: I cannot recall a single occasion on which I was asked to consent to the tabling of correspondence where that consent was not given.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps there was not much correspondence.

Mr. Drew: There was extensive correspondence, and a great deal of it found its way into this house. This is a matter of more than casual interest. The point made by the hon. member is an important one. As between national governments, obviously there is a type of correspondence that must be regarded as secret, but as between governments within a federal system there can be no secrecy, because it would all relate to the combined business of government about which the legislative bodies have a right to be informed.

We are dealing here with an attempt to reach a joint agreement in regard to the development of a trans-Canada highway. The discussion which has taken place serves to emphasize the need of getting the dominion and provincial governments together instead of attempting to do this by correspondence, with part of the correspondence being under some limitation as to publication.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I thank the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the leader of the opposition for supporting the view I expressed with regard to this correspondence. I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he says that we cannot deal intelligently with this matter unless we have the correspondence. Unless the government of Nova Scotia is able to justify its stand, I do not think I would be warranted in giving my approval to the legislation now before the committee with regard to a trans-Canada highway. Without that information I cannot intelligently come to a conclusion as to what is desirable or practicable in the interests of Nova Scotia. I again ask the minister to check as quickly as possible to see whether the province of Nova Scotia will not do what seven other provinces have done and release this correspondence so that it will be available to the members of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am quite ready to suggest to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that when he writes to the province of Nova Scotia he send along a copy of the record of the debate on this matter so that there will be no misunderstanding as to what has been said by hon. members who have spoken. We are just at the resolution stage, and I am not familiar with all the facts. As I said a moment ago, when the bill is up for second reading, answers will be made to the questions asked this morning. When we get second reading of the bill and go into committee, members will be able to secure all the information they want. As to the correspondence between the provinces and the federal government, we will once again ask whether permission can be given for its being tabled.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to thank the minister. I am going to ask that second reading of the bill be postponed until we have the correspondence with all the provinces.

Mr. Fraser: When the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is answering the other questions, will he also tell us who will have the final say in regard to contracts for construction of the highway?

An hon. Member: The province.

Mr. Fraser: Some people may say the province, but the federal government is contributing fifty per cent of the cost, according to what the minister stated, and it will likely have some say. I do not know that, but I want to find out. Will the federal government have any say about the awarding of contracts?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will draw the minister's attention to the question, and see if an answer can be given.

Mr. Blackmore: I was not able to hear all that the leader of the opposition asked, and I should like to have the situation clarified, if the minister does not mind. It is well known that at this stage we could ask numerous questions and elicit information we would all like to have. If the minister sees fit, he can give us permission to ask these questions on the first section of the bill when it is going through committee. Did the leader of the opposition ask the minister if he was willing to grant that privilege? If he is, I see no reason why we should not let this stage go by, because we shall be able to get all the information we need when the bill is going through committee if a certain amount of latitude is permitted on section 1.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not see any objection to that procedure. At this time we are considering the resolution and the expediency of introducing a measure. I know that members could ask many questions. Up to the moment they have asked certain questions, which the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will endeavour to answer. I do not see why we should try to curtail any debate or cross-examination of the minister on a project of this magnitude. All latitude should be given to hon. members and, if possible, answers should be made to all questions asked.

Mr. Blackmore: Perhaps I did not make it clear to the minister what I have in mind. Is the minister willing to agree that we should have latitude on section 1 when the bill is going through committee, so that we can then have the whole discussion we would ordinarily have at this stage?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand that when the first section of a bill is called there is usually a general discussion, and I do not see any reason why on this bill we should depart from that procedure.

Mr. Fraser: Have we the minister's assurance that we may do that?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fraser: We want to be certain we have that assurance. We have sat down before, and I want to make sure about that point.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I was taken by surprise this morning when I was asked to see if I could have the resolution put through. I know my good friend from Peterborough West is quite reasonable in everything he does in the house. I think he will say that I am reasonable, and I am ready to suggest to the minister that he should be reasonable in his conduct of the proceedings on this bill.

Mr. Fraser: Very well.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Winters) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 194, to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Bankruptcy Act

BANKRUPTCY ACT

GENERAL REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 149, respecting bankruptcy.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which was prepared about a year ago and introduced in the Senate in the last session of the preceding parliament. It was passed there and then died on our order paper when the house was dissolved. The bill was introduced again in the Senate during the present session, has been passed by that body, and comes to us as a Senate bill.

I have suggested to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of one of the other two parties, one of the lieutenants of the other leader, and one or two other private members of the house who are particularly interested in the measure, that we may make better progress if we give second reading to the bill without too much discussion, and then, on the report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, which will consider the measure, have any debate in which it might be the desire of hon. members to participate. I may say that all those to whom I spoke were agreed that was the proper course.

I think, however, I should say a few words about the bill. The purpose of it is to revise and consolidate the Bankruptcy Act. It is a matter of putting it into somewhat better drafting form, and consolidating various amendments.

The bill arises out of the invocation by this parliament of its jurisdiction under category 21 of section 91 of the British North America Act, which turns over to federal jurisdiction the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency. The first dominion act was passed in 1869, being entitled An Act Respecting Insolvency. It covered voluntary and compulsory bankruptcies, provided for compositions, and applied only to traders.

In 1875 the law was revised and consolidated in a new act, the Insolvent Act of 1875, which was made applicable to the new as well as the original provinces. This act did not work out satisfactorily, and it was repealed in 1880, following which there was, for a period of some forty years, no general bankruptcy law in force throughout the whole of Canada, and the field was left to such legislation as it was competent for the provincial legislatures to provide. In 1919, however, parliament passed the Bankruptcy Act, modelled on the English statute of 1914. Some amendments have since been made in the Bankruptcy Act to remedy defects that have appeared in practice from time to time. The act now in force is chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of 1927 as it has from time to time been amended.

In addition I think special attention should be called to the fact that important amendments were made by chapter 39 of the acts of 1932, which established the position of superintendent of bankruptcy and provided for the licensing of trustees by the minister.

It is for the purpose of revising and consolidating chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of 1927 that the present bill is before us. The main improvements or changes that are being effected by the bill can be listed as follows:

1. The bill provides a system of "summary" administration for small estates, whereby the formalities and expenses are reduced below those considered necessary to safeguard the administration of larger estates.

2. The bill permits a debtor to offer and the creditors to accept a proposal without the debtor going into or being put into bankruptcy. This, in a proper case, is more convenient and cheaper and obviously more desirable for the debtor than the previous situation when the composition had to be preceded by bankruptcy before it could go forward.

3. The bill makes an effort to clarify at least to some extent the vexed question of the priorities to be accorded different classes of claims when distributing the debtor's assets.

4. The bill increases "creditor control" over an estate by vesting directly in the creditors and the inspectors a number of responsibilities and obligations in respect of which they were previously required to resort to the court.

5. The bill is an improvement in respect of drafting and arrangement of sections over the present act, as one would of course expect in the case of any consolidation if it is properly handled.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to oppose the suggestion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), but rather to support it. This is a long, complex, and technical bill. The minister has set out carefully the five major improvements that will result from its adoption, and I am sure every hon. member of the house will agree as to the necessity of the five improvements to which he has referred. The bill, when it is submitted to the standing committee on banking and commerce, will be revised there in such further detail as the members of the committee may consider necessary. Certainly to endeavour to deal with the measure without its being submitted to a committee would be most difficult, if not impossible.

I think mention should also be made of the fact that while on occasions we hear criticism of the other place and its failure to act to the legislative extent of which it is capable, having regard to the ability and experience of its membership, this bill indicates the debt that our country as a whole might owe to the other place if it were given a larger measure of responsibility as a factory for legislation. The bill was considered in the other place by a committee for a period of some three weeks, and the improvements that have resulted in consequence of the work of an able committee of the other place are obvious on even a casual examination of the amendments and suggestions embodied in the bill as it has come to this house. I repeat that I believe what the other place did concerning this complicated legislative subject might well lead the government to place various other statutes, to which I could make reference, before the other place with a view to having them revised, their anomalies removed and the draftsmanship improved.

What has been done in this case underlines the need for an early revision of the statutes as a whole. I realize that work is now being done on that revision, and it cannot be hastened too much. With no revision for a period of twenty years, my hon. friend will agree that the statute law of Canada today is in a position of uncertainty, and often of actual disorder. I think that no greater work could be done, during the period that the hon. gentleman occupies the high position of Minister of Justice, than early completion of the revision of all statutes, and also an early report to parliament by the commission on the revision of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Carroll: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate the support indicated by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), who has a long and distinguished record of service on the bench of this country. If there ever was a time when assistance could be given by the other place, it is now in connection with the work being done by the commission set up for the purpose of revising the Criminal Code. Indeed I suggested on two or three occasions that, having regard to the ability of all members of the legal profession in the House of Commons, they would have been only too happy to have an opportunity to serve on a select committee of the house to deal with recommendations for revision of the Criminal Code. Such a committee would not interfere in any way with the work being done now by the commission, but there could be placed before it such provisions as the legal members of the house from their experience might believe it to be desirable to embody in the Criminal Code.

Before I sit down I want to say one further word. The step that has been taken of submitting the Bankruptcy Act to a committee of the other place will, I hope, be a precedent, so as to enable outstanding members there to make the contribution to the jurisprudence of Canada they are qualified to make and would be only too glad to make if they were given an opportunity to do so as they were in connection with the measure now before us.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): There are two points I should like to raise. Happily this is one occasion on which the length of the debate on second reading can usefully be directly in inverse ratio to the length of the bill.

First of all I should like to deal with the principle of the bill. My understanding of the principle, which presumably will be affirmed when the bill is given second reading, is that the Bankruptcy Act should be revised. The principle is just as broad as that. It is not that the act should be revised with a view to facilitating the five immediate purposes that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) cited. In other words, when the bill goes before the banking and commerce committee, as one member of that committee I should like to feel that there is no limitation on the opportunity of members of that committee to put forward any suggestions they may consider profitable for the revision of the Bankruptcy Act in any particular.

I think this is a matter of importance at this stage, because it would be unfortunate if any ruling should be made in the committee dealing with the Bankruptcy Act as to the nature or extent of the principle of the bill agreed to on second reading. Therefore I ask the Minister of Justice if he will give the assurance that the principle of this bill is that the Bankruptcy Act should be revised, and that it is just as broad as that.

The second point I should like to make is this. It has to do with the task that will confront the standing committee on banking and commerce. I join with my colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the tribute he has paid to the work that has been done on this measure in the other place. Nevertheless I think the banking and commerce committee of this house will have to undertake an independent review of the measure.

It is unfortunate that the measure comes before us at such a late stage in the session. The members of the house are carrying an exceedingly heavy load at the present time; with three meetings a day of the house, and with the heavy volume of work yet to be done, attendance at extended meetings of committees is made difficult. If we are to do justice to this measure and are to conduct the detailed review of it that it seems to me the committee ought to conduct, a great deal of time will be required and a considerable concentration of sittings, the kind of concentration that may keep members in attendance at such committee meetings day in and day out so that the thread of discussion may not be lost. That concentration of sittings will be difficult at this belated stage of the session. I am just mentioning this matter, Mr. Speaker, because frankly at the moment I doubt whether before prorogation there will be time available to make the detailed review of this measure which its importance and complexity warrant and necessitate.

I am sure there will be the utmost disposition on the part of members of the house, regardless of party, to expedite the matter at this time; and in the committee I have no doubt that the members will do all they can to expedite consideration of the bill. I just want to say, though, that I doubt whether there is available in the present session sufficient time within which to make the review of the measure that I think the committee is obliged to undertake.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I rise, Mr. Speaker, merely to emphasize the point made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). This bill is a lengthy one, and in the fifteen days or so that we are likely to be here I do not think it is possible to give to this bill the attention that it requires. It would be just as well for the government to state now that this is one of the measures they are going to leave over until the next session of parliament, unless we are to remain here and to carry on until the next session is called.

The point made by the hon. member for Eglinton I think is this. At this stage of the session there are so many things coming up all at once—and it was never more true than it is today, with about twenty-eight items on the order paper, each one of which is of importance—that almost all members will wish to be in the house during some part of the sittings. It is impossible for hon. members to be at the same time in the house and in committee on an important bill of this kind. As to those who are members of the committee it will not only take the time that they are in the committee but also time when they are outside of it, if they are to give the necessary study to matters relating to the bill. I suggest to the minister that rather than taking up the time of the house the government might well set this matter aside until the next session and refer it to the committee as soon as parliament opens.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to associate myself with the words of the hon. member (Mr. MacInnis) who has just taken his seat. It is my impression that the government has committed a serious blunder this session in endeavouring to bring on too many measures of great importance. I should like to request that the minister hold this bill over until the next session. While he is at it, may I suggest that he ask the government to look around for as many more of these bills as could similarly be held over. We cannot cover all these bills if we are to give to them the attention which a house such as this ought to give to them. I have no desire to hold up the business of the house, but as a member of parliament I feel ashamed of myself when I agree, either by actually acting or by not acting, to allow important measures to pass without receiving the attention which I believe their importance warrants.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): I was going to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) if there is any real hurry about having this act amended. If there is not, I agree with hon. members who have suggested that the bill should be held over until the next session of parliament. In my opinion the Bankruptcy Act is the most important one we have on the statute books of this country, inasmuch as it deals not only with bankruptcy itself but with the regulation of business transactions. Unless the members of the committee to which this bill goes are fairly familiar with the Bankruptcy Act as it is at the present time, it will take them at least a solid month of hard work to do justice to the consolidation of this act.

More than that job will come before this committee. I can see that the committee will have to deal with various amendments and delays will inevitably result.

I am not objecting at all to the second reading of the bill, or to the matter going to a committee. But it would be difficult to have the bill reported back to the house this session after full consideration by the committee to which it is to be referred. I should think there would be little time for the committee to deal effectively and efficiently with a consolidation such as this.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I find myself in agreement, Mr. Speaker, with nearly all the views which have been expressed by those who have taken part in this debate, in spite of the fact that it is the taking of the advice of some of them which results in the criticism of others.

Most of us will agree that the work which the Senate has done on this bill, and which it does on all the measures that are introduced in that body, is of an exemplary character. We are greatly indebted to the Senate for the work which it has done. But we see what happens in a short parliamentary session if we follow the advice of the hon. member for Lake Centre and have a large bill such as the Bankruptcy Act amendment bill introduced in the Senate which has more time to consider these matters than we have, and particularly at the end of the session. Their deliberations resulted in what has happened in the present case, namely, in the bill coming from the Senate to the House of Commons toward the end of the short session. The presentation of the bill in the Senate could hardly have had any other result than that which it has had, because they have given it careful consideration. That has taken time. The bill comes to the House of Commons and is dealt with as soon as a congested order paper will permit. From this house it will go to the banking and commerce committee and be considered by that committee in due course. This result I think was unavoidable because of the introduction of the bill in the Senate. It indicates that with a bill as large as this one proves to be, it may be impossible to get it cleared up in both houses in one short session unless it is introduced first in the House of Commons at a time when hon. members have more time to consider a matter of this kind, so that later consideration may be given to it in the Senate.

Under the present circumstances the government is quite disposed to heed the suggestions that have been made by the hon. members for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) that the passing of the bill be not pressed. We have no thought that it should be pressed. It is our desire that the duties of the house with respect to the bill be properly discharged, and that the bill be sent on to the banking and commerce committee for careful and adequate consideration. If it cannot be carefully and adequately considered there, it will not be reported back but will be reintroduced at the next session of parliament.

In view of the full and careful consideration which the Senate gave to this bill in its committee, where they heard various delegations, and the fact that many of the difficult points in connection with the bill were threshed out and disposed of, I should think, sir, it might be surprising to hon. members how quickly it can be dealt with in the House of Commons committee. Hon. members, particularly those who are lawyers, will agree that what is required in measures of this kind in connection with difficult points that arise is clear thinking. Once that clear thought has been applied to these difficult problems, the disposition of them at some later stage, even by another body, is facilitated. A great deal of thought has been applied to these difficult problems in the Senate. A great deal of clear thought has been indicated by the various delegations which appeared before the committee of that body. I would hope that in view of the careful consideration which has been given to it by the Senate, and the fact that there are no important changes in the law other than those which I have stated—a matter really of four important changes—it might be possible to dispose of the bill in the House of Commons committee in a much shorter time than the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) thinks will be necessary. If it is not possible to dispose of it properly—and for that the committee will assume responsibility—then of course we have no desire to insist that it be passed at this session.

In conclusion I should like to make a comment on a matter which was referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He said there was nothing that could be done in the Department of Justice at the present time that would be of greater benefit to the country than to revise the statutes of Canada, which have not been revised for upwards of twenty years. He also referred to the necessity of revising the Criminal Code, which has not been properly revised for a much longer period than that. I should like to say, as I am sure that he himself upon reflection knows, that we have been seized of the desirability of the course which he urges, and that in the Department of Justice we have had for some time a committee revising and consolidating the Criminal Code, under the chairmanship of Chief Justice Martin of the province of Saskatchewan. We also have a committee considering the revision of the entire body of statutes of Canada, under the chairmanship of the Chief Justice of Canada, and considerable progress has been made. Indeed the bankruptcy bill is one of the steps in that general revision; because we are trying to have the Bankruptcy Act consolidated and revised with a view to its being then included in a new volume of the revised statutes.

I entirely agree with the suggestion that the hon. member for Lake Centre has made—so much so that several months ago we initiated action along the lines that he is now suggesting.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to deal with the point I raised? I asked for some assurance about an understanding as to the scope of the principle of the bill.

Mr. Garson: If I failed to deal with that, it was because I thought the point was so obvious that everyone would agree with it. Of course we are here considering the principle of this bill on second reading—as my hon. friend so succinctly put it, that the act be revised. It is a matter almost of coincidence that in the course of that revision the changes which I am speaking about come in. They come in because they are changes which arise out of the attention which is given to revision. I entirely agree with my hon. friend that because these have been included in the opinion of the draftsman as being the changes which are essential, they by no means exclude any changes which hon. members of the committee may see fit to suggest. I think that covers my hon. friend's point.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO STANDING COMMITTEE TO SIT WHILE HOUSE IS SITTING

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton) moved:

That the standing committee on banking and commerce be empowered to sit while the house is sitting.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INSTITUTION AND CONDUCT OF PROSECUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, November 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to detain the house, I hope only for a few minutes, on one aspect of this situation. During the time that I have had the honour to sit in this house I have tried to use moderate language, and I hope that nothing I shall say today will indicate that I have changed since I was here last. But it does seem to me that in what has happened in connection with this act we have nothing less than a conspiracy against our constitution, and, as I shall try to show later, conspiracies are much more dangerous when they are carried on by men whom we all know and like and who in the ordinary discharge of their duties are quite free from any suggestion of this kind.

I wish to confine myself entirely to one aspect of what has happened in this situation, namely, what is described in the Bill of Rights as a suspension of the execution of the law.

There have been grave and wise criticisms made in this house already on this point, and I do not intend to repeat them. It seems to me, however, that the public has not registered these criticisms as they should have done. So far as I can see, the press has been very lenient; and while I am not in the position of the great Churchill who in one of his speeches said, "My words will carry far,"—and I do not flatter myself that mine will—nevertheless I wish to put in my word, for what it is worth, in the hope that what I regard as a conspiracy against our constitution may not be lightly passed over by the people of this country.

There is great danger that it should be, because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) have been very skilful, may I say, in leading us up blind alleys, and in discussing all other aspects of this situation. We have not, in my opinion, concentrated our minds upon that aspect which to me seems so grave and so serious.

It has already been pointed out by other speakers that what has been done, with one leap of the mind, carries us back to the Stuarts, particularly to the one Stuart who lost his head for suspending the law without parliament. It carries us back also to the declaration of the Bill of Rights, which, we should remind ourselves, is part of the law of this country.

I suppose it is true to say that what this government has done has no precedent since the Stuarts. I have not been able to verify that, but I believe there is little if any precedent in the centuries which have elapsed for what the government has done. It is wise for us to remember the words already used in this chamber by a former Liberal leader, that it does not matter to a free people whether their liberties are invaded by a king or by a cabinet.

I think it would be possible to imagine times so quiet, times so peaceful that subversive ideas could hardly impinge upon our lives at all, and there would seem to be no threatening dangers—times when we might say: Yes, there was a breach of the law, but probably it does not matter much. I can imagine that if anything like this had happened in the tranquil Victorian days of sixty or seventy years ago—though one could hardly imagine that it could happen then—it would have been difficult to stir up very much interest. People might have said: Yes, that was done; but what is the use of worrying about it? We are living in quiet and peaceful days. There is no real danger to our constitution.

But is that the kind of world we live in today? In this house the other evening we had demonstrated to us the ironical situation of one government department telling us that it could not trust another government department, because the personnel of that other government department had not been "screened" to see whether they were clear of subversive ideas. We approved the necessity of doing that. The minister told us quite frankly that the Department of National Defence was not able to entrust some of its secret work, the making of secret films, to the national film board.

It strikes me there is a certain irony in this screening of civil servants to find out whether they have certain views which might lead them to do something subversive, when this government has itself suspended the execution of the law. I can imagine one of these people saying: Why are you trying to find out whether in certain circumstances I might break the law of this country, when the Minister of Justice, the custodian of the law, has broken it; why ask me what I might do in certain circumstances when he has already done it?

Let me broaden that picture a little. It is impossible to live many hours nowadays without hearing criticism of communism, and the dangers we face. We know those dangers are real enough. Some very wise writers have pointed out that communism, which we regard as bad and diabolical, has in it something that people believe in. One well-known writer in this country not long ago pointed out that we, who confront communism, cannot successfully confront it for long unless we have something to answer it. He said that if we have not some answering faith we are confronting the communist "something" with a "nothing". That was said by a well-known journalist in a speech delivered before the St. Andrew's society in Winnipeg a year ago. I refer to Mr. Bruce Hutchison.

What is our "something"? Well, of course we say that it is Christianity and the Christian way of life. We say that glibly, and I wonder if sometimes in an age of doubt it does not sound hollow to us when we say it. I wonder if people feel so confident, and if they feel that that is a complete answer.

But I would remind the house there is one thing we have which is essentially Christian, one thing which is the very cornerstone of our democratic civilization, and that is the rule of law. It is essentially Christian, because under our system all men are equal before the law, just as the Christian says that all men are equal before God.

We have this principle, and I suggest to the house that it is the very cornerstone of our way of life which we are so fond of talking about. Let me read to the house a few words by a great authority, Dicey, in "The Law of the Constitution", ninth edition, page 193—and I would ask ministers to listen to this, because it applies to them especially. What Dicey says is this:

> With us every official, from the prime minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen.

Let me digress to say that that was very different from the condition in some of the European countries. And when Voltaire visited England two hundred years ago his comment was that while the laws were harsh, they were the same for everybody. That was not true in many parts of Europe. I go on:

> The reports abound with cases in which officials have been brought before the courts, and may, in their personal capacity, be liable to punishment, or to the payment of damages, for acts done in their official character but in excess of their lawful authority.

Will anyone tell me by what lawful authority it was that this act was set aside? I would ask the ministers to read that passage and to consider what their personal liability might be. I do not know what it is; but it is stated there that when a minister breaks the law he has a personal liability.

Let me remind hon. members that in respect of the ordinary citizen the law moves automatically, and it calls him to account for what he has done. But, so far as I understand the constitution, the only bodies that can move against ministers when they break the law is, first of all, public opinion—and I shall come to that later—and, second, this House of Commons, which rejoices in the title of the High Court of Parliament.

Yet I suggest that in spite of all, in spite of the wise things that have been said here, the public of this country has not yet registered what has happened. I said a moment ago it is hard to believe that men whom we like and meet happily and who have much good to their credit could do this wrong thing. And it may be that in some curious way they did not quite intend to do what was wrong.

I have said that the rule of law is the very cornerstone of our civilization. Let us be honest about it. When, as I said a moment ago, we talked so glibly about being Christian, let us look in on ourselves and find out how many of the real principles of Christianity we are prepared to back. But one thing we have—the rule of law established by the wisdom of our ancestors. This we have inherited, and to this we should cling. If the rule of law is gone, what have we left? What is the use of "screening" government employees to see whether or not they might under certain circumstances break the law when at the same time the government has broken the law—and without excuse and without any promise of doing any better in the future?

Let me have a word more about this rule of law. It seems to me it is the binder, the cement of our civilization. What is it that enables us to solve problems which often become bitter, which often become acrimonious—labour problems, racial problems, even religious problems at times? What is it that enables us to solve those problems? In spite of the criticisms and sneers that are made against the courts, the fact remains that there is a deep-rooted feeling in our country that there is a rule of law which is the same for one person as for another. Hon. members will recall that if a poor man comes before the courts faced with something serious such as a criminal charge the court will assign counsel to him. Even those who have as little acquaintance with the courts as I have know that judges are particularly tender and solicitous toward those who come into court without lawyers, to defend their own cases. I think it is one of the glories of our law that that is true.

It is well for us to remember what would happen to a judge if in the administration of his office he undertook to disregard or to break the law. My answer is that the Minister of Justice would deal with him harshly, and properly so. But now the custodian of the law has been found doing this, and what is to be done about it? During the debate the Minister of Justice gave various reasons for doing what had been done. I do not propose to examine them, because they were all irrelevant. Not one of them faced the question that the law had been broken. He discussed the reasonableness of this or that, and eventually wound up at a point which I thought was disappointing. I hardly think it is a travesty to say that the only real reason he gave for breaking the law was that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told him to do it. I do not want to be unfair, but that seems to me to be the real answer. Of course I should add that it was all discussed by the cabinet, so they are all head over heels in it; but I think we can give the honours of the day to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

There was one other thing the Minister of Justice said that troubled me more than any of the other things he said, although they all troubled me quite a lot. Eventually he got almost to the point of saying that anyway they had a large majority. It is always comfortable for a government to be able to say that, and this government does have a large majority. Unfortunately he seemed to imply that somehow or other what happened last June was an endorsement of this government action, but it has already been witheringly pointed out that last June the electors were in the unfortunate position of not knowing about this. I shall not say any more about it.

The minister also suggested that as long as the government had the comfortable feeling that there was still a majority with them in the country, they need not worry. Will you consider what that means? It means that when the people elect 262 members to the House of Commons they are just wasting their time; there is no point in our being here at all, because the government will not pay any attention to us. They offer the suggestion that eventually there will be an election and that will settle the matter. What does that mean? It means in effect that we are to have government by plebiscite which will take place every four years, and in the meantime the House of Commons might just as well shut up shop because it is wasting its time. There is no suggestion by any minister I can find anywhere in the debate that this house has any rights.

For one thing I am very sorry. I think 190 members of this house are going to find it difficult to express their views in this matter. We have not heard from any of them yet, and I am still hoping we shall hear from at least one. I thought perhaps if the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) were here he might have a word to say for the law, but as he is not, we cannot help it.

One other cynical remark was made the other day—and I suggest that the government need not be too much surprised that these cynical things are said. This, I may say, was said with approval. It was suggested that the government could not afford to make the report public until they had discredited Mr. McGregor.

Mr. Garson: Why does the hon. member give further publicity to a thing he disapproves?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not understand the question.

Mr. Garson: Why does my hon. friend quote something he disagrees with?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not always just quote the things I agree with. I believe in telling what other people think as well as myself. I do not understand the question.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the Minister of Justice is asking why the hon. member is drawing attention to the fact that the government broke the law when he disagrees with it.

Mr. Howe: No, no.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps the minister will explain later what he means.

I want to come now to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because his part in all this is quite interesting. We could call him the villain of the piece, but if the minister regards that as objectionable, we will call him the hero of the piece.

The minister treated this statute as though it were non-existent; but we need not be surprised at the Minister of Trade and Commerce doing that. We all have great respect for the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he operates in his proper line. We all respect the things he did during the war, and we do not think that all the things he has done since the war are wrong—only a percentage of them.

But let us have no illusions about the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce toward this house. He has made it quite clear. First of all he has said that he did not know what the opposition is for, and in saying that I think he expressed his exact feeling. I do not think he does know what the opposition is for, because the minister does not really believe in his heart that the minority should have that chance to express itself which is the glory of our parliamentary system. The opposition is given a chance again and again. The minister really is a man who likes to live in a world where he can say unto one, "Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh". The minister is an authoritarian. If the minister will not object to my saying it, I would say that he is a fascist, a nice fascist, who by chance has got into a democratic assembly.

Mr. Howe: Now that the hon. member has said it, perhaps he had better withdraw it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall make any withdrawal the minister wishes, because I do not want to say anything that is in the least offensive to him.

Mr. Garson: Say it and withdraw it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, I shall describe the minister as an authoritarian whose mind inclines to a dictatorship form of government. I think the minister clearly indicated that when he said that he did not know what the opposition was for. Indeed I am surprised that the minister questioned what I said, because I thought he would agree with it—not only agree with it, but probably almost boast of it. As I say, we must not complain that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not worried about breaking the law, because I think he regards the cabinet as a body which goes ahead and does pretty well what it likes and then comes here occasionally and tells us what it is doing. We just have to go on with that as well as we can.

It would not matter so much that we have a Minister of Trade and Commerce who does not understand the processes of democracy, but what really does matter, so far as we can see, is that he is leading this government around by the nose. That is the only thing you can take out of this debate; that is the only thing you can take out of the resolution we had yesterday, which came after the pleasant threat the minister made the other night. The minister does not threaten much; he threatens only when he thinks it is necessary to get his way. I suppose we should be grateful to him for threatening us no more than he does.

Coming back to this legislation, it is interesting to note that all those who have taken part in its preparation were just wasting their time. I think the former prime minister had a good deal to do with this legislation, but he was just wasting his time. When it comes to the point, the legislation which has to do with publication is disregarded.

Now let us look for a moment at this section. I can imagine a section so technical and narrow, and dealing with something so trivial, that the government might well have some justification for saying they would disregard it. Let us assume, for example, that the section provided for publication in one way and the minister decided that publication should be carried out in another way. I think we would have said that did not matter much. But what about this section? Is it trivial? Let me just recall to your minds one thing which has been brought to the attention of the house already; I refer to a remark made in this house by the previous prime minister, when he pointed out—and I think with great truth—that the publicity requirement here was one of the very cornerstones of the act. His words, as I remember them, were that publicity can often be more valuable than penalty. How true that is; yet this section, which, I think, should be considered as the very cornerstone of the act, is now disregarded.

Now I come to the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). If anyone had told me that a great lawyer and great jurist—sometimes the two are different—with his experience as Minister of Justice and all the other qualities we like and admire in him, would do this sort of thing, I would have scoffed at it; I would have said, "Don't be silly; go roll your hoop". But what do we find? Not only does the Prime Minister not join in the criticism, but there is no suggestion of an apology for what has been done. I should like to read what he said, indicating his generous attitude toward the Minister of Justice in sharing responsibility with him. I like that attitude; but I should like the Prime Minister to think something about the people of Canada as well as about the Minister of Justice. What consideration was given them when all this was going on? What does the Prime Minister say, at page 1526 of Hansard:

> And I now feel it is only fair to the Minister of Justice that I should inform the house that he had discussed these matters with me, and I had concurred in the line of conduct he was adopting. I should bear, therefore, a portion of the responsibility, if there is responsibility—

That is good; get that.

> —if there is responsibility, for attempting to carry out the implied or expressed undertaking given to Canadian industries.

That was the Prime Minister. These people have been caught red-handed; and when I say "caught" perhaps that is the right word, because it is suggested that if it had not been for Mr. McGregor we might not have known about this even yet. No one can prove that is so, but neither can anyone prove it is not so.

Mr. Garson: That does not stop you from saying it, because it cannot be proved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is said by serious people; and that is not surprising, because when people see the sort of thing that has been done here inevitably it gives rise to certain suspicion. I regret to say that to the Minister of Justice, because I might add here that I never would have believed he would be a party to this sort of thing. As I said, I feel that this has been a great conspiracy against the constitution; and do not let us regard "constitution" as a long, abstract word. I mean this has been a conspiracy against our way of life, against the method we have adopted of living together. When this breach of the law, this suspension of the execution of the law, is carried out without excuse and without apology—I should not say without excuse, but without reason—it gives rise to suspicion.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

So far as I can see, there really has been no attempt to meet the real question. The ministers went up various blind alleys, but they did not deal with the real point. I think I am correct in saying that no serious attempt has been made to answer the accusation of suspension of the execution of the law. That is what I mean when I say that I consider there has been a conspiracy against the law; and the worst of it is that the conspiracy has been carried out by men whom we like and want to trust, men of reputation. One of the few Latin quotations I remember from the many hours I spent studying that language is corruptio optimi pessima, which means that there is nothing so bad as a very good thing when it is corrupted.

So I say this has been a conspiracy against the constitution. I do not think we would have been so much worried if it had been carried on by a lot of men with no reputation, who could have been easily disregarded by the public, who would have carried no weight. What bothers me is that men of high reputation—and deservedly so—come into this house with no apology to offer for doing what Charles I lost his head for.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken longer than I had intended; I am afraid perhaps my feelings have run away with me a little, but I do feel very deeply about this. I do not think it is any joke. I thought many of the things that were said in defence of the government's action were trivial in the extreme. As I have said, I believe we are living in a time of danger. The other day I read a book by one of the greatest living scholars in which the future of parliament was discussed. He felt that it was an open question whether parliament and parliamentary government as we have it could survive for very long. He pointed out that it had given indigestion to nearly all the European countries that had tried to absorb it, and that it is in effect over a very small portion of the earth's surface; and I recall once more what I said about communism and the answer to it.

I cannot hope that my words will carry far, but I express the earnest hope that the press, the pulpit and the universities of this country will not let this matter rest, that leaders of public opinion will so deal with it that no government ever again will dare take similar action. This government has given no assurance, no apology, no promise for the future. I hope what has been done here will become sufficiently registered in the public mind so that the expression of public opinion will be such that no government in future will dare repeat what has been done here.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Macdonnell) in which he re-echoed, perhaps with somewhat greater skill, remarks made previously in this debate. Before resuming my seat I hope I may deal with this matter in a way that my friend will at least regard as serious. If he did not regard my previous effort as serious, it may have been in part because I was constrained to answer, extemporaneously, criticisms which had been made by members of the opposition after the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had succeeded in making, on the motion to go into supply, the statement which from the beginning he thought should be made, coincident with the tabling of the flour report. At that stage members of the opposition entered into the debate, as was their right. That debate required a reply, which it was my task to deliver in the course of some forty minutes. As I then said, it was a difficult thing to do, because several hon. members had spoken; each had presented different arguments, and in forty minutes it was impossible to answer effectively all the arguments they had advanced. Had it not been for the good temper of the house in permitting me some additional time I should not have been able to deal, even inadequately, with the matter of the report itself.

But, sir, I apprehend that I am under no such disability this morning, because on this occasion I am the minister replying to what in substance is a motion of want of confidence in this government, and I am not restricted as to time. Not being so restricted, before I resume my seat I hope to be able to answer my hon. friend's accusations point by point and to convince him, sceptical though he may be, that there will have been a serious attempt to cover all the points which have been raised by various opposition speakers.

In the course of dealing with the way in which this matter has been handled by myself as Minister of Justice, however, I do not want to avoid coming to grips with the real issue presented to the house by the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew); and if I may I should like to deal with that matter first.

We have here, first of all, a motion for the second reading of a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act. One gratifying feature about the proposed amendments to the act is that while members of the opposition have attacked the government on all sorts of other grounds, such as those advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, few if any have criticized government policy as set out in the bill now before the house. Indeed, most of the references in the speeches of members of the opposition would indicate that they are in favour of these amendments. Yet some of them have said they will not support the motion for second reading of this bill but will support the amendment of the leader of the opposition, under which its subject matter would be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for recommendations upon what can only be government policy, and also for criticisms of the actions of the government in this connection. Therefore I should like to come directly to the heart of the controversy concerning the flour report itself.

Everyone is agreed, I think, that the report discloses no offence or alleged offence by the milling companies following decontrol. It is true that, coincident with decontrol, right at the time of decontrol, the flour report alleges that an offence was committed against the act; that was in September, 1947.

On the one hand we have the version contained in the flour report prepared by Mr. McGregor. He has said later that he does not place particular emphasis upon this 1947 decontrol agreement; that while it was the uniform increases in prices which he attributed to that agreement which first caused his suspicion that there had been some sort of agreement contrary to the Combines Investigation Act, nevertheless this alleged agreement was regarded by him only one of a series of agreements.

On the other hand, in connection with that same alleged agreement, in my office on October 22 of this year, in the presence of Mr. McGregor, Mr. Donald Gordon and myself, Mr. K. W. Taylor, the present chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, pointed out that at the approach of decontrol this government was greatly concerned about the large increase in the prices of flour and millfeed that had taken place in the United States, and was as anxious as it could be that in this country we should avoid equally large increases. Therefore, though at that time the government had suspended the price ceiling in that industry, Mr. Taylor was instructed to go to Mr. Short, the flour administrator, and tell him that the government would look with extreme disfavour on any undue increase in the price of flour and millfeed then in the process of decontrol, and that the government desired that increases following decontrol in the prices of those commodities, which every informed person regarded as inevitable, should be kept to an absolute minimum.

With that in view, Mr. Taylor, on the initiative of the government and of no one else, went to Mr. Short and got him to prevail upon his own company, Lake of the Woods Milling Company, to agree to an increase in the price of flour and millfeed substantially below any increase that was under consideration at that time, and of course very much less than the increase which had taken place in the United States and which we were trying to avoid in this country. The suggestion which was conveyed to the industry at that time—

Mr. Diefenbaker: By whom?

Mr. Garson: By Mr. Taylor—was that although the ceiling on flour and millfeed had been suspended, if there were not reasonable co-operation in adhering to the precise prices for both flour and millfeed which had been named by Mr. Taylor, then the government would have to consider restoring the ceiling in order to produce the same result by compulsion, if it could not be secured by the co-operation of the industry.

This request was accepted by the milling industry under protest. My information, coming from people who are competent to express it, is that, as was revealed by the discussions which took place in connection with Mr. Taylor's ultimatum, there was not a firm in the industry at that time which did not intend to increase its prices. Further, my information is to the effect that the increases were not going to be uniform at all, that they all had different ideas as to how much they should get. But not one firm intended to increase its prices by as little as the amounts specified in Mr. Taylor's statement.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that sessional paper No. 53-I, tabled this morning, states at page 3:

> In a file of one of the senior officials of the prices division, I find a note dated June 21, 1943 (copy attached hereto) recording a discussion I had with him dealing with an interview. . . .

And so on. The copy of the document referred to is not attached.

Mr. Garson: I think it was by inadvertence that it was not attached in the office of the Secretary of State. I have a copy here that I will table during the course of my speech. My hon. friend may have this copy.

Mr. Coldwell: Thank you.

Mr. Garson: When the house rose for the one o'clock recess, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out that Mr. K. W. Taylor, the present chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, had, under government instruction, told the milling companies in September, 1947, at the time of decontrol—which companies, as it then appeared, were going to raise their prices for flour and mill feed —that the government would have to consider the reimposition of ceilings if the contemplated increase exceeded $4.05 per barrel for flour and $10 per ton for mill feed. Mr. Taylor's request on that occasion, I think perhaps a better term would be "direction", was accepted by the milling companies under considerable protest. My information from Mr. Taylor is that there was not any firm in the milling industry that at that time had intended to increase its price by as small an amount as that which was suggested by Mr. Taylor on behalf of the government. But after considerable remonstrance, protest and discussion amongst themselves, the industry accepted this increase.

One of the purposes of the government's direction in this connection was the desire that the indicated relationship be maintained between flour and mill feed prices in order to prevent mill feed prices from mounting to the height at which it was then being sold in the United States. This action upon the part of the milling companies in complying with Mr. Taylor's direction has been designated by the flour report for one, and by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in the debate the other day for another, as a breach of the Combines Investigation Act, in spite of the fact that it was the direct result of practically an ultimatum which had been given by the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board to the milling companies through Mr. Short, the flour controller, to the effect that no greater amount than the amount specified would be acceptable to the government, and that if increases in excess of those figures were put into effect the government would have to consider restoring the price ceiling.

I have gone at great length into this matter with Mr. Donald Gordon, the wartime chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, and Mr. Taylor its present chairman on several occasions. Both of these chairmen of the wartime prices and trade board take strong issue with this allegation to which I have referred, as does the government in accepting their views. They contend that any such action as the one which I have indicated taken by industry under the direct domination or direction of the government certainly does not constitute an offence under the Combines Investigation Act. For, sir, if this be an agreement contrary to the Combines Investigation Act, then it would appear that during the whole period of wartime control any firm or company which in concert with other companies in the same industry agreed to sell its products in accordance with the orders from time to time made by the wartime prices and trade board would also have been guilty of an offence under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Gordon says most emphatically that this was not government policy as administered by the wartime prices and trade board, and we agree with him; because we are quite certain that industry generally would not have given that splendid co-operation which it did give, and which made our Canadian price control system the best system of its kind in the whole world, if the businessmen of Canada had thought that in every move they made in that regard they were breaking the Combines Investigation Act or if the wartime prices and trade board took the position that they were contravening that act.

Of no industry would these remarks that I am now making be more true than of the milling industry; for in the milling industry there was in effect, during by far the greater part of war control, a unique profit-control system under which the industry could not make or lose money regardless of the level at which it sold its products. Therefore it had no money incentive to do other than co-operate with the government by selling its products at or reasonably near ceiling prices.

I have dealt at some length, although I think not at too great length, with this price rise in September because it typifies the cleavage of opinion between Mr. McGregor and Mr. Gordon that has been at the bottom of some of the difficulties that the government has had in this connection. The same cleavage of opinion between Mr. McGregor on the one hand and Mr. Gordon and his successor, Mr. Taylor, the present chairman, on the other, as to whether the milling companies' compliance with the government's direction in September, 1947, constituted an agreement illegal under the Combines Investigation Act, extended to the whole period of the wartime price control over the milling industry.

Again in this larger sphere—that is, the sphere of wartime price control—we accept the opinion of Mr. Gordon and Mr. Taylor and we reject Mr. McGregor's opinion. We do so for several reasons. In the first place, we think there is no one in Canada who can speak with greater authority than Mr. Donald Gordon himself with regard to this period of wartime control. He was the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board throughout most of this period, having working under him as many as eighty odd administrators of various industries. Of these eighty odd administrators he was the master integrator of the policies which all of them pursued. Largely through him were their efforts co-ordinated. He was the one man who carried in his own head a great many of the arrangements made and reported to him by the administrators of all the industries under control, many of whom, being given the free hand, which he was bound to give them, exercised their own judgment as to the way in which they controlled their particular industry. Some of them would be meticulous with regard to written instructions or the securing of agreements and orders in council. Others, according to what he tells me, achieved at least as good a result, and sometimes a better result, purely by oral arrangements from beginning to end.

The second reason that we accept his view is this. It is a most extraordinary thing that, although at Mr. McGregor's request, Mr. Gordon recommended Mr. McGregor while he was still combines investigation act commissioner for appointment as the enforcement officer of the wartime prices and trade board working under Mr. Gordon, and in spite of the fact that Mr. McGregor worked in a dual capacity in this connection, he never went near Mr. Gordon from first to last in connection with the preparation of the flour report. He made no attempt to ascertain from Mr. Gordon whether the statements of wartime prices and trade board policy that are so freely interspersed throughout the flour report were in accordance with what the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board himself thought.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question? Would he not think that the then Minister of Justice who had been Minister of Finance would have brought that to the attention of Mr. McGregor?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I think it is hardly proper for me to undertake the rather large responsibility of explaining the mental processes of some other gentleman who preceded me in this office. But I might point out in that connection, as my hon. friend perhaps well knows, that under the Combines Investigation Act the commissioner, with regard to the preparation of his report, has the power to initiate it, to conduct the preliminary investigation, and if he thinks it is warranted, to go on and to take every step right up to the final delivery of his report to the minister without any approval whatever from the minister of the department.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He says that Mr. Ilsley knew.

Mr. Garson: Therefore, it was not necessary for Mr. McGregor to consult the minister. In the strict interpretation of the act it was certainly not the responsibility, and in the strictest sense it might not have been proper for the minister to interfere with the preparation of that report or with the steps which the combines commissioner thought were proper for him to take in connection with the preparation of it.

We are inclined to think that as a consequence of the fact that Mr. McGregor never went near Mr. Gordon in connection with the preparation of the report there are certain references in the report to wartime prices and trade board policy, which it is not the particular function of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act to state, and to which Mr. Gordon takes very strong exception. Of course Mr. Gordon also completely dissents from most of the conclusions of the report.

What does Mr. Gordon himself say with regard to the subsidy and proper control arrangements which prevailed in the milling industry that we are discussing? Before I quote Mr. Gordon perhaps I should say a word or two in introduction. The necessity for the subsidy arose because during the time when there was a price ceiling upon most products in Canada the government, for reasons which it thought proper, and which any wheat farmer can readily explain to the curious, thought it was proper to refrain from putting a ceiling on the price of wheat. Therefore the price of wheat was permitted to rise at that time while the price of flour was still under a ceiling. Of course, if the cost of the millers' raw materials rises and the price of their finished product, flour or millfeed, still remains under a ceiling, the millers are bound to be squeezed against that ceiling. I am informed that the milling companies had no objection to the price of wheat being permitted to rise. Their solution for the problem which that rise created was to let the price of flour rise as well. They said they thought that in the circumstances it was only fair to the farmers that there should be a rise in the price of wheat. I think most hon. members would agree with that view. They said that if there could only be a corresponding rise in the price of the products like flour manufactured from wheat, why, it would be fair all round. But the difficulty, sir, was this. I was going to say it is extremely difficult but it is more accurate to say that it is impossible to maintain a general price ceiling without maintaining a ceiling upon the flour which goes into the staff of life. Therefore the government had to find some way of permitting the price of wheat to rise while at the same time seeing to it that the ceiling was maintained on the price of flour.

At this stage I cannot do better than to quote from the statement of Mr. Donald Gordon which is included in the return that I tabled this morning. He says:

> One of the first major difficulties in the maintenance of a fixed price ceiling—

That is, on flour.

> —was the fact that the price of wheat was not held under a ceiling. A great many discussions took place about the effect of this on the prices of other commodities such as flour, mill-feeds and the products of wheat generally. In the first instance, efforts were made to have the millers "absorb the squeeze" in accordance with the administrative practice which the wartime prices and trade board endeavoured to force as a preliminary step in all such discussions. It was soon apparent, however, that the magnitude of the price rise in wheat made such a course impossible, and as a tentative and temporary arrangement, the "appropriate" price of wheat for all domestic use was fixed by the wartime prices and trade board on the basis of 77⅞ cents on No. 1 Northern wheat, and the treasury undertook to pay the difference through the wheat board in the form of a drawback or subsidy.
> Under date of October 9, 1942, Messrs. McDonald, Currie and Company, a firm of chartered accountants, were at the direction of the government, employed by the wartime prices and trade board to undertake an immediate examination of the financial and operating conditions of the flour milling industry to determine inter alia an appropriate price of wheat in relation to prevailing ceiling prices of flour. In due course their report stated that, "the profit realized on domestic flour under prevailing prices is not sufficient to absorb an increase in the price of wheat over the 'tentative appropriate price' of 77⅞ cents per bushel for No. 1 Northern wheat in store at Fort William or Port Arthur."
> The wartime prices and trade board then formalized the appropriate price at 77⅞ cents.

I ask hon. gentlemen to listen to this:

> In the meantime the milling companies were instructed orally by myself and Mr. K. W. Taylor and by other officials not once but several times that they were expected to sell at or close to ceiling prices so as to insure that the drawback or subsidy payments out of the public treasury be kept at a minimum.

May I interject a few remarks in the course of reading this report? The government had carried on long negotiations. They had hired a firm of chartered accountants to determine that amount which it was thought to be advisable to be appropriated from the public treasury to hold the price of wheat for domestic consumption at 77⅞ cents a bushel. Having gone to all that trouble to determine the cost of the subsidies necessary to maintain a named ceiling price for flour they did not desire to have to pay out tens of millions of dollars in additional subsidies which the federal treasury would have to pay if the milling companies sold their flour at well below that ceiling price.

Mr. Coldwell: Would the minister permit a question? Why is it that there is no memorandum or document supporting that statement to be found in the return—and no minute?

Mr. Garson: I would prefer if my hon. friend would permit me to deal with that as I go along. However I might make casual reference to it at the present time: for the simple reason that it was inherent in this arrangement, and was well known to everyone who participated in it that it was inherent, that if the milling industry provided with this subsidy did not sell their products at very near the ceiling price the government would be involved in very large amounts of money, on top of the subsidy which it was already decided they were going to pay.

I go on with the quotation from Mr. Donald Gordon's statement:

As I have already stated there were a great many discussions not only with the flour administrator and other board officials, the industry and myself, but as well, there were many meetings with the appropriate ministers, other departmental officials and myself on the whole controversial subject of wheat and related prices. In the rush of events, few of these discussions were committed to writing, or if they were I cannot now trace them in the files of the board.

As soon as it became apparent that a drawback or subsidy was essential to maintain the price ceiling on flour and other subsidiary wheat products, it was obvious that millers should not be free to cut prices but should rather maintain existing ceilings in as practicable a manner as market conditions permitted. In due course this understanding was formalized when the "profit control" feature of the subsidy plan was adopted since it then became self-evident that habitual sales below the ceiling could only increase the subsidy. Moreover, by the imposition of this "profit control" clause, all milling profits (i.e. including profits on export business)—

Upon which, I may interject, there was no ceiling. That was the most profitable end of the business, but the government compelled them to pool the profitable export business into its profit-controlled pool in connection with the subsidy to provide wheat at low prices for domestic consumption. Then, to continue with the report it states that all milling profits, including those on export business——were brought into the calculation with the result that no agreement in regard to price could have yielded the millers additional profits.

And that is taking into consideration export as well as domestic profits.

In a file of one of the senior officials of the prices division, I find a note dated June 21, 1943 (copy attached hereto)—

And this is the one about which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked his question a few moments ago—

—and recording a discussion I had with him dealing with an interview between the Minister of Finance, Mr. C. H. G. Short, then honorary chairman of the Canadian National Millers Association and later flour administrator of the wartime prices and trade board, in which the obvious need for an understanding on minimum prices was discussed and Mr. Short was requested to present such an understanding to the millers for their consideration. At that time I assured Mr. Short that an agreement of this kind was not in contravention of the Combines Investigation Act.

And, if I may interject: How does one suppose it would be possible to secure the co-operation of an industry in regard to a wartime prices and trade board arrangement if you were telling them that at the same time they would be contravening the Combines Investigation Act? Mr. Gordon's report continues:

(In parenthesis I should perhaps also explain that the structure of ceiling prices in this industry did not lend itself to the mechanics of formal orders for the reason that different ceilings were applicable to different companies in different districts and to different classes of buyers. The "ceiling" principle froze all prices as they existed on the date specified in the wartime prices and trade board regulations. Therefore, the supervision of the actual ceiling prices in the different districts and to different classes of buyers for each district was left to the flour administrator with the general understanding that formulas for agreements were permissible.)

He goes on now to deal with this immensely complicated matter. I go on with the report:

It should be understood that the flour milling industry was always hostile to the administrative procedure whereby the subsidy was paid through them, claiming, quite properly, that the payment was for the benefit of the wheat farmer and domestic consumer and not for the millers. They accepted the procedure which was worked out at the special request of the Minister of Finance. If they had not co-operated, any other procedure would have been so clumsy that I was afraid it could not have been made to work and a damaging breach of the price ceiling on essential supplies would have resulted. It is necessary to re-emphasize, however, that the subsidy or drawback procedure accepted by the millers meant that they were expected by the board to sell at or reasonably close to ceiling prices at all times, since any price cutting would have been at the expense of the public treasury.

The calculations involved in this particular subsidy were of a most complicated nature and frequent revisions of the arrangement were required. The particulars are fully set forth in the following orders in council:

And then he sets out in the report a list of the various orders in council, which hon. members may see.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the minister put on record the other document, because it is a material part of this matter?

Mr. Garson: No, I do not think so, because I have covered—

Mr. Coldwell: This was to be regarded as confidential by both the administration and—

Mr. Garson: Well, perhaps I had better deal with it. My hon. friend questions it, so perhaps I had better. I hold in my hand that to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has just referred in his interjection. This is a memorandum of a talk which took place with the Minister of Finance, with Mr. Gordon as chairman, and Mr. Short; and to avoid any possible misunderstanding perhaps I should put the whole thing on record.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Garson: This is the memorandum dated June 21, 1943:

Mr. Short, president of the flour millers association for many years, has been talking to the Minister of Finance and the chairman on the subject of flour millers' profits and stabilization of prices, et cetera:

The chairman—

That is, Mr. Gordon—

—agreed:

(1) that the industry is not being subsidized—

That is, at that time; and—

(2) that it is not his desire to ask the industry to reduce prices or to reduce the amount of drawback which it is presently receiving from the treasury.

As a result of the wheat board's action in stabilizing the cost of wheat for flour millers at 77⅜ cents per bushel, basis No. 1 Northern, Fort William, it appears that the flour millers are obtaining cheap wheat at the expense of the treasury.

It is the chairman's desire—

And in this he was stating the government's desire——that the millers should consider seriously refunding to the treasury profits in excess of say 116⅔ per cent of standard profits. By so doing the industry if and when criticized could then say that it was not making excess profits at the expense of the government.

As the present arrangement does not include the W.P.T.B. or the C.P.S.C. it is preferable that any revision should be made through the presently established channels.

Mr. Short is to present the case unofficially to the large millers for their consideration.

I ask you, sir, and through you the hon. members of the house to pay special attention to the next paragraph:

If it is agreed to refund all or a portion of the drawback dependent upon earnings, it is considered that it may be desirable or necessary to place a minimum price on sales of flour in order to prevent any miller from taking undue advantage of the arrangement to reduce domestic flour prices at the expense of the government.

If I may interject for a moment I would say that with a government's ceiling price on flour and with the milling companies' profits under the rigid control that was visualized in this proposed arrangement the milling industry's profits were fixed, and it could not make or lose money no matter at what level its prices were fixed. But what the milling companies could do was to drop their prices lower and lower either to make good fellows of themselves with the consumers or to build up their markets at the expense of the other fellow's market; and the whole of this process could be carried out at the cost of the federal treasury. In peace time if a miller wanted to drop the price of his product in order to get some business away from his competitor he had to pay the shot out of his own pocket. Under a profit control arrangement he could engage in a price war, and finance it at the expense of the federal treasury. Therefore it was to the interest of the treasury that prices should not be cut. One suggestion that was made was that the cutting would be stopped by putting a floor under prices below which they could not go. I refer to that because I intend to come back to it in just a moment. Meanwhile I shall go on with the rest of this statement which reads:

Mr. Sharp of the minister's office is thoroughly conversant with the problem and the chairman has requested Mr. Hart to get in touch with Mr. Sharp to ascertain the background and to develop a suitable formula for application of profit control.

The foregoing is to be treated very confidentially and not made known to either the administration or to the industry at this time.

I asked about that last statement and was told that its significance lay entirely in the circumstances prevailing at that time, that it was desirable at that stage of the conception of a new policy, shall we say, to avoid any misunderstandings through premature disclosures until both sides were able to deal with their own principals.

Mr. Coldwell: But the floor was never established.

Mr. Garson: No, and I am coming to that very point. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says, the floor was not established, and a great deal has been made out of that fact by my hon. friend, by his colleagues, by the flour report and by other critics of the government. It has been argued that if the government had desired to really impose a limitation in this matter they could have done it quite simply by putting in a floor.

But it was not quite as simple as that. There is a tendency for the layman when dealing with technical matters to look at the outside and assume that, after all, the problem is quite easy and that some apparently simple device like a floor price could cure it without much trouble. I am sure that those who were beset by a number of worries and problems in their duties as administrators of the wartime prices and trade board would have been glad to have had a simple device like that if it could have been effective. I pointed out, and quoted Mr. Gordon in doing so, that when this ceiling was put on it was not a flat ceiling that would apply to the sales of flour of a certain grade across the country. The ceiling was such that it had the same effect upon the whole complicated price structure of the different companies in the different zones and for different types of customers, even of the same company, as the eruption of Vesuvius had upon the citizens and buildings of ancient Pompeii. Just as that eruption overtook the buildings and citizens of Pompeii as they stood at a certain point of time so the price ceiling in the milling industry "froze" the whole complex price structure in the milling industry as it stood at a certain point of time.

The result was that the highest price at which Lake of the Woods Milling Company was selling to a certain type of customer in, say, Winnipeg was established as the ceiling price for that type of customer in that zone. If that price were unfortunate from that point on it remained unfortunate. In that way a ceiling was frozen on all prices as they stood in the various freight zones, for the various qualities of flour of the various companies to various classes of customers. The effect was that all anomalies—it requires no imagination to realize that there would be many in a price structure of that sort—were frozen.

In this respect the milling industry was different from some of the other industries in that its price structure was an unusually complex one. On its face this freezing order might seem to be a rather extraordinary, anomalous action, by the government. This was explained to me by Mr. Taylor, the present chairman of wartime prices and trade board, when he said that after a great deal of examination they came to the conclusion that by taking any other action they would create more problems for the bakers and other consumers of flour than they would solve for the millers, and that extraordinary as it may seem this price "freezing" device was the proper one to adopt.

Then a word with regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that the proper thing to do was to put on a floor. Let us take a concrete case. Supposing that in a certain zone for a certain type of flour sold to a certain type of customer—

Mr. Coldwell: I did not suggest that they should have put on a floor, I said that they did not put on a floor.

Mr. Garson: I think there is an implication in my hon. friend's argument that—

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Garson: I want to be fair to my hon. friend and I shall put this to him in the form of a question. Is there not any implication in his argument that the government, if it had wished, could have solved this difficulty at a less cost to the federal treasury for increased subsidies by putting a floor under the price of flour?

Mr. Coldwell: That implication could be taken, but that is not the point I was making. I assume that the government could have protected itself in that way, but it was not done. That was my point.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend admits the implication. Let us now deal with why it was not done. Let us take a concrete case. Supposing, as I said, that Lake of the Woods' price was $6.50 per barrel at the time of the freezing order, and that Robin Hood's price in the same area was $6.10. I suggest that after the freezing order went into effect the only way in which Lake of the Woods Milling Company could get its share of the business in that district would be by running its price down to the $6.10. It was that process of adjustment all through the industry which in a large part explains the fact that there were substantial sales somewhat below the ceiling.

The wartime prices and trade board had to allow that freedom, otherwise business could not have gone on. One of the main objectives of the wartime prices and trade board policy was that in spite of the fact that they were putting on these controls business still had to go on. The purpose of the whole arrangement was to have business go on. That meant that if there were no floor prices in effect, then such adjustments could take place so that the milling companies could continue to do business along with their competitors. But suppose you put in an order that the minimum floor price for that type of wheat was to be 40 cents under the ceiling price. Since the 40 cents would apply to the ceiling price as it was when the price was frozen, you would then produce a new crop of anomalies at the lower level, and in the course of doing so make it impossible for the Lake of the Woods Milling Company to ever get any share of that business because they could not go through their floor which would be 40 cents under their ceiling in order to compete with the Robin Hood floor price.

I am told and I believe—I think it is a reasonable thing for any group of people to believe—that that is one of the main reasons why the floor price device was not adopted. In the absence of some such practical device as a floor price the administrator and the chairman were thrown back upon instructions, exhortations and directions to the milling industry to this general effect: We admit there must be some flexibility under an arrangement of this sort or otherwise business cannot go on, but we tell you quite frankly and give you notice that if you systematically sell beneath the ceiling price by unreasonable margins, and thereby involve the treasury in additional expenditures for subsidies in large sums of money we will step in and take some action, probably by reducing the subsidy or increasing the price of wheat.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) scored many of the points made by the opposition in this debate, at least the ones which I thought were worthy of rebuttal. Reference was made by him for example to the fact that these milling companies sold ships' stores to government departments at fixed prices. He intimated that was a most reprehensible thing, and in itself was a breach of the Combines Investigation Act because it indicated an agreement to fix prices which was contrary to that act.

In relation to my hon. friend's argument I put to the house what seems to me to be a very simple proposition. If the milling companies, in concert if you like, sold flour to the department of munitions and supply, we will say, at the ceiling price, that department would pay the ceiling price and it would cost the treasury nothing by way of extra subsidy. But suppose the milling companies had followed the course, which the hon. member either stated or certainly clearly implied they should have followed, of selling flour to the department of munitions and supply for the ceiling price less $100,000. Then the position would have been simply that the department of munitions and supply would be in $100,000 and the treasury would be out $100,000 for additional subsidy. If you like you can put it in terms of a bookkeeping entry, debit treasury, credit department of munitions and supply, $100,000. The department's righthand pocket would be out $100,000 and its left-hand pocket would be in $100,000. The milling companies would not make or lose a penny because of the nature of the profit control arrangement which the government through the wartime prices and trade board had imposed on them.

But if these ships' stores were sold to other than the Canadian government, then the situation would not be that treasury would be out $100,000 and the department of munitions and supply would be in $100,000. In such a case the treasury would be out $100,000 and the purchaser of the ships' stores be in $100,000; and the result of my hon. friend's suggestion would be that we the taxpayers of Canada through the federal treasury would be subsidizing this purchaser.

Listening to the uncomplimentary remarks in this matter which have been made concerning the government in general and to a certain extent about myself in particular, I must say I think that anyone with any discernment at all, who had placed on his desk a report in respect of which there were widely divergent views amongst the highest levels of the civil service, would make reasonable attempts to reconcile those views. May I say I have put forth great efforts in that direction. I should like to place before the house today some of the materials which I think clarify to some extent the issues arising out of the conflicting views to which I have referred.

In order to comply with the order for return in the name of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, we have had quite a time going back through the old files of the wartime prices and trade board, to try to get the documentary evidence that we have produced. We found there were serious gaps in some of these voluminous files. In order to check against the wartime prices and trade board files, I asked Mr. McGregor to produce to me from his file copies of any and all memoranda which he wrote, prepared or received in his capacity as an official of the wartime prices and trade board, as commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act, or in any other capacity.

The material I received in reply to my request is most illuminating. It shows not only what was the policy of the wartime prices and trade board, but that Mr. McGregor himself, as the person in whose possession these documents were and from whom they came, must have known what it was. I should like to read into the record first of all extracts from Mr. McGregor's evidence as found in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the special committee on prices on February 16, 1948, at page 158.

The first selection I wish to read is upon the point that the government encouraged companies in any given industry to organize and to agree amongst themselves in order to deal more effectively with the wartime prices and trade board for control purposes. The excerpt reads:

> Throughout the war years concerted action on the part of producers and distributors was encouraged rather than discouraged by government agencies, and quite properly.
> Under a direct control system, quicker and more effective action can be secured if the one controlling agency can deal with a single organization representing a whole section of a trade or industry rather than with a multitude of independent units.

These groups played an important and highly useful part in the wartime control of their respective industries; but the last word, the ultimate control, lay not with them but with government.

That statement by Mr. McGregor is quite correct, of course. Agreements as to prices and so on, which in peacetime were contrary to the Combines Investigation Act, became in wartime desirable rather than undesirable instruments of wartime control and integration under the wartime prices and trade board. As we all know, war is essentially a totalitarian business. You integrate your whole economy for the purpose of delivering the greatest possible blow against the enemy. And the wartime prices and trade board approved, rather than disapproved, of companies in the same industry forming committees to work in conjunction with the wartime prices and trade board officials. I should like now to quote from a letter from the secretary of the commission to H. E. Manning, K.C., of Toronto, dated June 20, 1942:

While it is not possible to state definitely whether any such orders do sanction agreements of the whole trade, it is true that in most instances to date they have met with the approval of a representative group of the trade involved. This follows from the fact that the board has adopted the practice of establishing advisory committees from each trade and industry whose contribution is to make suggestions for economies, standardization and simplifications and to discuss and criticize recommendations of the board or of the administrators. Thus, while many of the orders which have introduced restrictions of competitive practices have originated with or had the approval of a large section of the industry or trade concerned—

And may I interject that they could not have had that approval, the restrictions could not have originated with the industry, unless those in the industry had got together to discuss and agree on what they were to originate or approve.

—it could not be said that they are merely giving recognition to agreements within the industry or trade to restrain competition.

Again I quote from Mr. McGregor's testimony before the prices committee, on the point as to whether direct war control had replaced discipline under the Combines Investigation Act, as follows:

During the latter years of the war, activities under the combines act were largely suspended in view of the establishment of direct wartime emergency controls over practically all branches of industry and trade.

As to the effectiveness of these controls, I quote Mr. McGregor again:

While indirect control by price competition can never be expected to be completely effective, neither can a system of direct price control, even in wartime. Wartime price controls in Canada, direct controls, were singularly successful in spite of stupendous difficulties.

I quote that because it is in direct corroboration of the position Mr. Donald Gordon took in Mr. McGregor's presence at the interview in my office on October 22. Then with respect to the wartime prices and trade board administration succeeding the Combines Investigation Act as the appropriate method of wartime control, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) Mr. McGregor told the committee:

The objective of the prices board and the objective of the Combines Investigation Act was the same; to protect the public from improper prices. When the prices board was established it was given such complete powers and such wide powers in the emergency period that it could stop high prices just over night. A directive could be issued as soon as an undesirable condition was found out. Now, we could not take that direct action under the combines act. That is not the appropriate safeguard for a wartime economy.

Then I should like to quote from some of the annual reports of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, with regard to the wartime controls superseding that act. I quote from the report for the year ending March 31, 1942.

Other cases which in the absence of wartime regulations would have been dealt with under the Combines Investigation Act have been dealt with by the appropriate wartime agency.

You will find similar references in the reports for 1943 and 1944. Mr. Donald Gordon told us that one of the reasons why the wartime prices and trade board did not leave behind a trail of orders in council and written directives of one kind and another was that the prime object, to which every other consideration was sacrificed, was more and more production; and that to this end assurances were given—in some cases, where they were demanded, of a formal character but many of which were informal and oral; that anything done by an industry in furtherance of the substance of the wartime prices and trade board legislation would not be subject to prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act.

As far as the milling industry was concerned I suggest that the real test as to whether action by any milling company was in compliance with the objectives of the wartime prices and trade board and therefore privileged under the Combines Investigation Act would be whether it was in substantial furtherance of the substance of the policy of the board. What was the policy of the board? It was to pay a subsidy of a planned amount, which was based upon the investigation made by this firm of chartered accountants. The policy was to fix a ceiling price and, by having the industry sell at or near that price, to make sure the government would not have to pay any subsidy in addition to that which had been fixed after the most careful calculation. Mr. Gordon says, and the government accepts, because it is obvious, that anything done to this end would be privileged under the Combines Investigation Act. As to whether or not Mr. McGregor was aware of this, I quote from a memorandum from Mr. H. D. Anger, solicitor of the board, to Mr. McGregor, dated February 18, 1942, in reply to a letter from Mr. McGregor:

As you say, the Combines Investigation Act only prevents persons from combining to set prices or take other action detrimental to the public. When prices are fixed or specified restriction or standardization is required by or under the authority of this board, the fixation or requirement has statutory effect and the Combines Investigation Act does not apply, as no combine whatsoever has taken place.

Mr. Coldwell: Has the minister Mr. McGregor's letter, to which this is a reply?

Mr. Garson: Yes, and I will table it with the others. I do not want to read too many extracts. There has been a tendency, more by implication than by direct challenge, to suggest that Mr. Gordon was exaggerating, shall I say, as to the necessity for a large number of oral directions and so on. I should like to read from a letter from Mr. W. H. Howard, who was co-ordinator of the pulp and paper products administration, to Mr. Donald Gordon, setting out the conditions in the industry that he had in charge, which letter I think will make very clear the sort of pressure and the kind of conditions and circumstances under which the administration of the wartime prices and trade board had to be carried on. The letter is dated March 3, 1942, and states:

This is the first occasion on which this matter of conflict with the Combines Investigation Act and No. 489 of the Criminal Code has been put forward in such a formal manner although as I have already indicated to you, the question is constantly being raised by the pulp and paper manufacturers generally.

And further:

In this connection, you must bear in mind that what you now want manufacturers to do, by voluntary agreement among themselves and with your administrators, are precisely those things for which they, or others in similar positions, have been prosecuted in the past by Mr. McGregor and his minions.

Then he goes on to say:

I assume that, by process of blanketing by formal rulings, every agreement reached and action taken in respect of concerted elimination of frills, standardization and simplification, the administrators could provide protection to all concerned,—

We could do this all by a great series of agreements, blanketing the whole thing "but", he said:

—this would involve not only a formidable amount of detail work but would slow things down and impair, if not destroy, the present co-operative spirit and general desire to attain your objectives.

It is surely infinitely better, under existing conditions, to arrive at our objectives by voluntary co-operation than to formalize the program by an elaborate series of orders, directions and rulings issued by the administrators and your board.

In any case, I am not certain in my own mind,—

And Mr. Howard is an able lawyer.

—not having found time or inclination to study the intricate legal questions involved, that a series of administrative rulings or orders would provide an absolute barrier against prosecutions at some time in the future.

In any case, the businessmen concerned are not going to assume avoidable risks and there is no reason why they should be expected to when all that is involved is a conflict of authority between departments of government.

Some suggestion has been made that in questioning the willingness of any company to co-operate in this matter, we are questioning their patriotism. No one would question that. But when the government was stepping into a picture and directing these concerns as to what the government wanted them to do, why should they have to run the risk of being prosecuted by some other department of the same government in respect of the very thing that they did under that direction?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who could possibly give Mr. Gordon the power to promise anyone immunity from the law? That is just a question seeking information.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will let me leave the answer of that question until later, I shall be obliged to him; I have a letter right on that very point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Garson: There is further discussion on the same point and two separate letters were written. The first one was by Mr. McGregor who, as you remember, was an enforcement officer of the wartime prices and trade board. He dictated this letter for signature by Mr. Gordon as chairman. Then within two or three months afterwards there was another letter on the same point by Mr. H. D. Anger, the solicitor, also written for Mr. Gordon's signature. I am going back to the same correspondence. Mr. McGregor, in the letter which he drafted—and I think perhaps I had better read it so as not to interpret it in any way—says this:

It seems to me that any significant possibility of difficulties such as you suggest—

That is, such as suggested in the letter that I have just finished reading.

—can best be obviated by enactment of duly authorized administrators' orders directing such action as may be required in respect of standardization, simplification and related matters. Under the machinery now set up, such orders can be handled without delay. Action taken by an industrial or trade group pursuant to such orders would not be subject to prosecution as against the public interest. Provision for their formal authorization would seem to be a reasonable precaution to prevent inadvisable arrangements being made in the name of the board without its knowledge and sanction.

In other words, in this letter for Mr. Gordon to sign, he was taking much the same rather technical position that is taken in the flour report that was tabled the other day.

Mr. Coldwell: Were those orders ever formalized?

Mr. Garson: No. This letter was followed up by another letter from Mr. Gordon in the same sequence, written by Mr. Anger and which I will now read. I will not read it all, but merely the relevant parts of it. This is Mr. Anger's statement of the position and I direct this particularly to my hon. friend for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the date?

Mr. Garson: The date of that letter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Please.

Mr. Garson: The date of it is June 17, 1942. The date of the former letter was April 16, 1942. I direct the attention of my friend, the hon. member for Lake Centre, to this letter because I think it contains the answer to his question as to whether Mr. Gordon could promise any immunity and so on. Of course he could not. But the law could. When a man states the law, he does not promise immunity. It is the law that grants the immunity. This is what Mr. Anger said in his letter:

The regulations have always provided that contravention or failure to observe any regulation or any order is an offence.

That is, any regulation or order under the wartime prices and trade board.

From the foregoing it is seen that it is not only a formal order of the board or of an administrator that must be obeyed, but also any general or specific requirement or instruction of an administrator. It being clear that failure to comply with an order as defined is an offence, it is equally clear that obedience of such an order would be a good defence to any possible action brought under the Combines Investigation Act or the Criminal Code, if there were, in fact, any conflict between such statutes and an order. As has been stated before, however, our legal department and the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act—

That is Mr. McGregor.

—concur in the view that there can be no such conflict, because orders are in the public interest and there is no liability under the above statutes except in respect of acts which are against the public interest or to the detriment of the public, which is the same thing.

Mr. Coldwell: But no order was issued.

Mr. Garson: Or in other words, Mr. Speaker, where you have an arrangement in connection with the whole milling industry arrived at after a long series of negotiations, based upon an exhaustive inquiry by a firm of chartered accountants, formalized in a succession of orders in council, one of the fundamental principles of which is that the government is not prepared to be mulcted —I think that is not an improper term—in the amount of tens of millions of dollars in terms of extra subsidies to milling companies selling down below the price ceiling, surely under these circumstances you have an obligation in the matter of whether they choose or not to call upon the milling companies to comply with that arrangement; and if they do comply with it, who is going to say, in the face of the letters I have quoted, that they are guilty of any kind of infraction of the Combines Investigation Act? When Mr. Taylor, Mr. Gordon or the administrators, as they did many times, directed these concerns to comply with the arrangements which had been entered into after the fullest consideration, they were not granting any immunity. They were disciplining the industry and telling them that they had to comply with the orders of the wartime prices and trade board. But once they did comply with the orders of the wartime prices and trade board, they should not be prosecuted for doing so.

Mr. Coldwell: But there is no evidence of any orders. That is the thing we are puzzled about.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what orders my hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. Coldwell: Orders with respect to legislative or statutory authority.

Mr. Garson: I do not think that he is challenging for a moment the statements of these men. Not having been in Ottawa myself during wartime I cannot personally vouch for these facts but the arrangements in connection with the milling industry were so well known that I do not think that anyone would challenge them. If my hon. friend wants to know what the legislative and statutory authority was, let him examine these orders in council and he will see the subsidy arrangement set out there. If he has any doubts about that I can lend him the report of this firm of chartered accountants, which shows the basis upon which the amount of the ceiling price for flour was established, and how the millions of dollars of subsidies that this would involve was calculated, how the government would have to pay the amount of subsidy that they agreed upon in order to hold flour at that price. The government did not want flour to be sold for less than this ceiling price because that would have involved the payment of more subsidies. If the government had intended that flour was to be sold for less than the ceiling price it would have planned to pay more subsidy in the first place; but having fixed both its subsidies and its ceiling price it was basic from that time on that it wanted the industry to sell at, or as close as it was practically possible, to that ceiling level.

I want to lay before hon. members, some of whom have been so extremely critical of our position, the dilemma that this public service disagreement presented to the government. For the sake of argument let us assume that Mr. McGregor is right in his view. But even if he were, this disagreement as to basic facts would place the Department of Justice in an impossible position in the event of our prosecuting. How could we prosecute such a charge if we proceeded to put in the case based upon the flour report and then were confronted with the evidence of Mr. Gordon and Mr. Taylor who could very easily have been subpoenaed for that purpose, and who in their dealings with the flour industry, according to what they inform me, and I believe them implicitly, had time and time again told the milling companies what their position was under the law.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has been questioning our position. I should like to question his for a minute. He says, or inevitably implies, that the course which the milling companies should have followed was not to have sold at or near the ceiling and thereby protected the treasury, but that they should have engaged in competitive price cutting to drive down the price of flour to whatever level to which free competition would take it. Is that a reasonable statement of my hon. friend's position?

Mr. Coldwell: That is a reasonable statement.

Mr. Garson: If it is a reasonable statement, as my hon. friend admits, I suggest that there could be nothing more contrary to government policy and nothing more advantageous to the millers than this very procedure recommended by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He seems to misunderstand or forget the nature of this arrangement.

Mr. Coldwell: No, I remember very well.

Mr. Garson: The arrangement was that regardless of the price at which they sold their products they could neither make nor lose any money; hence any reasons that they might have had, for example, in peacetime, for reaching an agreement, illegal under the Combines Investigation Act, to make money, simply could not exist under this subsidy arrangement, because they could not make any more money by selling for a higher rather than a lower price. As long as that arrangement obtained the only advantage that they could get was an altogether different one. Not having to foot the bill for any cuts in prices that they would put in effect themselves, they could build up markets at one another's expense, they could make good fellows of themselves with the consumers, entirely at the cost of the public treasury. What my hon. friend and those who take the same position as he does argue is that that is what the millers should have done. Let us look at this proposition for a minute. Let us suppose the companies had followed that course. Suppose they had reduced the price on flour to a much lower level. The consumers would have been quite happy and I suppose my hon. friend would have been happy to see them happy, and the milling companies would have earned his approval by that course of conduct. But in the end, Mr. Speaker, these same happy consumers who got their cheap flour would, in their capacity as taxpayers, have helped to pay the subsidy put up by the federal treasury which made the whole arrangement possible.

That was not done. The milling companies dared not take such a course. They were warned that, if they did, punishment would be visited upon them in the form of a decrease in subsidy or an increase in the price of their wheat. Because they cooperated with the board in not attempting to create good will for themselves with the consumers at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada the flour report says that they should be prosecuted. My hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar argues that we should reward them for doing what the wartime prices and trade board directed them to do by prosecuting them for an offence under the Combines Investigation Act. Well, sir, we do not think that that would be a conscionable attitude for the government to take, and we are not going to take it. We are not going to prosecute the milling companies for doing what they did in accordance with the subsidy and rigid profit control administered through the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what the commissioner recommended, not the member for Rosetown-Biggar. The commissioner recommended that they be proceeded against.

Mr. Garson: I am sorry; I accept the correction. I thought that my hon. friend—

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with the commissioner's recommendation. I am pointing out that I did not recommend it.

Mr. Garson: I see; but my hon. friend agreed with the recommendation. Mr. Speaker, I undertook with the hon. member for Toronto Greenwood to deal with the flour report itself in a way that he would regard as serious. I want to do so with all the candor that I can muster. I want to begin by saying that in some twenty odd years of public life I cannot remember ever having encountered a problem in which the combination of circumstances was more unfortunate, unfortunate at the beginning and as it developed. My position was this. After having taken part in two winter by-election campaigns, one in my present federal constituency and the other one in my own provincial seat in support of my successor, I arrived in Ottawa on January 3, 1949, to take up my duties. Three weeks later parliament was to open. In that interval, in addition to familiarizing myself with the operations of the department, including the penitentiaries administration, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Combines Investigation Act and the other branches of the department, and reading the reports of these branches in order to bring myself up to date, there were in the way of legislation to be attended to the Continuation of the Transitional Measures Act, which had a time limit on it because it had to be introduced before existing measures expired, the bill to amend the Supreme Court Act by abolishing appeals to the privy council, amendments to the Exchequer Court Act, revision and consolidation of the Bankruptcy Act, various amendments to the Criminal Code, and the statute law amendments arising out of the terms of union of Newfoundland and Canada, and also amendments to the Judges Act.

Instead of this report being brought to me in person after I turned up in Ottawa it was delivered to my office in Ottawa while I was still in Winnipeg on December 29. Then on December 31, while I was still in Winnipeg—and may I say quite unavoidably in Winnipeg; there is no way that I could have avoided it—and I was not holidaying, or anything of that kind—on December 31, while I was still absent in Winnipeg, the commissioner sent a memorandum to my office in Ottawa. And the time within which publication had to take place had started to run. I was like the sprinter who had the starting gun fired before he had got out of the dressing room. The race was well on before I got to Ottawa at all.

On December 31, still in my absence, I got this memorandum from Mr. McGregor:

> Your reading of the entire report is now out of the question, but I hope you may have an opportunity to run through the concluding chapter which starts at page 263. A summary, such as we usually release to the press when the report is made public, will be prepared shortly.
> Section 27(5) of the act requires that the report be made public within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister.

This is all put in to me, with time running on.

> It will not be possible to have it printed within the fifteen days, but we hope to have copies from the printing bureau before the end of January. May I have your authority to have 5,000 copies printed in English and 1,000 copies in French. I would like to have a word with you regarding our practice in printing other similar reports.

Thus, by the time I got to Ottawa, five out of the fifteen days had already elapsed before I was able to see the report physically, let alone to have any time, in the press of other duties, to read it. It came to me in the form of a bulky manuscript consisting of about rather less than three hundred pages of loose sheets of carbon copy, in a loose-leaf binder. There were no copies available; that was the only copy that was ever delivered to me of the manuscript. If I wanted to discuss it with anybody I could not do so until I had read the whole report and had mastered it, so that I could present an intelligent summary—although later on, long after the time for publication had elapsed, I was furnished with the first draft of a press report, which was a summary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that?

Mr. Garson: The draft, do you mean?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: January 24, 1949.

Mr. Knowles: Was that the draft which was released to the press on November 7?

Mr. Garson: No, and I am coming to that. It was not. That is the point. My hon. friend, with his usual discernment, has put his finger right on the point. But his colleagues, and I believe he himself, have been arguing that if I were like the other Stuart, Charles Stuart, I should have my head cut off for not getting this report published by January 13, 1949.

And I am going to lay before hon. members information to indicate that it could not possibly have been done in that time. And when January 13 came along, if I wanted to keep my head—because there was nothing I could do after January 13, 1949, to comply with the law regarding publication—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says "hear, hear"; I hope he is referring to the accuracy of my statement rather than the sentiment I expressed.

Mr. Knowles: I referred to your head.

Mr. Coldwell: We would have given you reprieve to April 1.

Mr. Garson: When I came here there was a great accumulation of matters awaiting my attention on my desk. I had been sworn in in November 1948, and it was my duty to attend to these matters. I could not expect anybody else to look after them. I had been away for some considerable time in these by-election campaigns. So I addressed myself to dealing with these matters on the basis of their relative urgency—and many of them were exceedingly urgent—and disposed of them as quickly as possible.

I am not going to suggest that, working at very high pressure in a number of fields for long hours every day, I can at this time remember with any accuracy at all what I did on any day or even any week in January 1949. But I think that it is highly probable that the time for publication under the statute had already expired before I ever got to the point of reading the report at all. And I say that because Mr. McGregor, upon whom I have to rely for these matters, and who is a very competent and methodical man, kept a record of the various steps which show that the first date upon which he and I discussed the matter of publication was January 22, 1949, some nine days after the time limit for publication. And my head was already worthless by that time. The offence of not publishing by January 13, 1949, had been committed.

Mr. Knowles: You thought you might as well have it cut off for a sheep as a lamb.

Mr. Garson: No, I do not agree with my hon. friend's unprincipled suggestion. I am going to outline the reasons which were to me—they may not seem to my hon. friends to be conscientious reasons—but they still seem that way to me, even in retrospect. And it was not because I thought I might as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb.

I would like to say—and I think most hon. members would agree—that I had had nothing whatever to do with this flour report before. I was not in Ottawa when the inquiry was started. I did not know that there was such a thing as a flour report until I came here, and probably until after the time for publishing it had expired. Under those circumstances I do not think it was fair to expect that I would rush away and sign an authorization to publish, without wanting to know what it was that the government was publishing over my signature. And if it had been possible—

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Garson: Yes, all right.

Mr. Knowles: The commissioner's memorandum which the minister read asked for the minister's authority, not to publish it, but just to print it.

Mr. Garson: No, no; it must be published.

Mr. Coldwell: The publishing is automatic.

Mr. Knowles: The law requires the minister to publish it. The only point in the commissioner's memorandum was to get authority to have it printed.

Mr. Garson: No; Hansard will speak for itself. He was referring to section 27 (5) which is the section in question requiring publication.

Mr. Coldwell: But it does not require ministerial authority to publish, does it? Under the statute it must be published within fifteen days.

Mr. Garson: I hope my hon. friend is right, because if it does not require ministerial authority there is no responsibility upon me.

Mr. Coldwell: Except that it was held over until this month.

Mr. Garson: No; well, if my hon. friend will just let me develop my own argument as I go along—

Mr. Coldwell: All right.

Mr. Garson: In respect of a report, of which everyone must have known I had no previous knowledge, if it had been possible for it to have been delivered for me to read, after I had got over the press of this accumulation of duties when I got back to Ottawa, so that I would know what I was doing, I would then be quite willing to accept all the criticism levelled against me.

But here was a matter with which I had nothing to do before; I knew nothing at all about it. I came down here to a heavy accumulation of work, much of it extremely urgent; and in the mass of this material, buried somewhere, was a report and this memorandum of December 31. And when I got to the report which, as I say I am morally certain was after the time for publication had already expired, I felt: Well we could not then comply with the act and I had the feeling that I would like to read the report in order to get some sort of idea as to what it was that I was publishing. Moreover having regard to the fact that I had not been in the government during any period covered by the report, I thought that it was reasonable that I should take it in to some of my colleagues who had been and get their views on it. If hon. members who have been criticizing me have read the report, which I think in some cases is perhaps doubtful, they will have some idea of what a chore it was for a man extremely busy in other respects to read some three hundred pages of carbon copy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no provision for reading it, just a provision for publishing.

Mr. Garson: I know and I could have blindly signed the authority for the publication and let it go at that.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister say whether at any point when he was thinking about this matter in January he saw anything in the law that gave him any authority not to publish it?

Mr. Garson: No. Let us take some particular point of time, let us take January 22 when according to his memorandum the publication was first discussed by the commissioner and myself. I think both hon. members will agree that on that date it was no longer possible to comply with the act.

Mr. Knowles: Your head was gone.

Mr. Garson: My head was gone. I still think I was right, but perhaps I was wrong, when I felt that before I made a move at all I should discuss with my colleagues this report which was produced in wartime. I think the wisdom of that course made itself apparent for reasons which I shall disclose as we go along. That is what I did. Here is some of the vindication for the course that I followed. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked if this was the same report that was tabled and I said it was not.

After I got the report certain changes had been made. May I say as emphatically as I can that they were made without any instigation or suggestion of any kind by me. I did not suggest them; I did not initiate them; I had nothing to do with them. They were made by Mr. McGregor as commissioner.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When?

Mr. Garson: Those that were made on page 36 of the report were made between January 3 and January 7; on January 18 three paragraphs were deleted from the manuscript that had been sent to me; on January 18, 1949, five paragraphs were added and these appear at pages 115 and 116 of the printed report; on February 23, 1949, there was an insertion which appears on page 113 of two additional paragraphs in the brief of the Maple Leaf Milling Company; on February 23, 1949, there was an addition of a paragraph (f) as marked in the copy and as appearing on pages 114 and 115 of the printed report.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask a question which may clarify things. Were these changes made as the result of discussions with and suggestions by the commissioner?

Mr. Garson: These changes were made by the commissioner. In fairness to him I should say that when he made them he told me that it was the practice in these cases to have changes of this character made between the time the report was delivered and the time it was printed. I could understand that, with regard to some of the changes, such as those on page 36 which are more or less word changes.

But one of the changes, as it happened, was a matter of great importance because it inserted in the report a section dealing with this whole subsidy and price control arrangement which is the absolute basis of the controversy between Mr. Gordon and the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. That is the paragraph to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred and which he quoted so triumphantly when he said that it was the answer to the minister's objection, meaning myself. That was added.

The report which is the topic of discussion in this house is not the report that was sent to my office on December 29. Changes had been made, some of them being exceedingly material.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the change on page 36 to which the minister has referred?

Mr. Garson: The words "it can only be concluded" were struck out and the words "there is justification for at least a strong presumption" were substituted. It was a watering down of the deduction.

In the first draft of the report Mr. McGregor had left out a reference to the subsidy and profit control arrangement. As the leader of the opposition correctly surmised, as a result of discussions which I had with him, based in part upon observations that were made to me by my colleagues in cabinet council as to what had taken place during the war period and of which I knew nothing, he inserted that paragraph in the conclusions dealing with the subsidy and profit control arrangement. They will be found where the hon. member indicated at page 114.

I suggest that the report was not complete; there were important omissions from it at the time that it was delivered to my office in my absence. If I had wanted to adopt an uncandid attitude, if I had wanted to mislead the house in any way it would have been possible for me to have put the interpretation upon what had happened that I had not got the report at all on December 29, that the report had come along at some later date, as in fact is the actual case. When the question was asked in the house to be perfectly frank with the house I did not remember when it had come in. But the formal covering letter on my file indicated the date as December 29. I passed on that information because I believed it was absolutely correct, and so it was in the sense that this letter did enclose what purported to be a flour report.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister indicate the date that he would regard for his purposes as being the date on which the report was finally received?

Mr. Garson: I intend to do that as I go along. There were the changes that I spoke of. Other discussions took place at various times during the spring and summer months in connection with the report. Again I want to emphasize that at no time have I ever made the slightest suggestion to Mr. McGregor that he change the report, that he play anything down, that he play anything up, that he add anything to it or that he withdraw. I have not made that suggestion directly and I have taken good care that I did not make it indirectly to be passed on to him through somebody else. By this time I was beginning to have some apprehension about this matter.

Mr. Harkness: Rightly so.

Mr. Garson: While I was most anxious, as I think any hon. member would be if he had been in my shoes, that these divergences of opinion at a high civil service level should be reconciled in some way in a report wherein there would be no disagreement evidenced by two divergent opinions, I did not attempt to suggest to anybody that that should be accomplished in any other way than by the free exercise by Mr. McGregor of the absolute discretion which is vested in him by the statute in respect of this report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did he never suggest publication?

Mr. Garson: Of course he did. I have just finished telling my hon. friend we discussed that on January 22. I may say that, notwithstanding Mr. McGregor's observing that we had already passed the time for publication, the fact that we did not publish at least enabled him to make amendments to the report.

Mr. Coldwell: When was the last amendment?

Mr. Garson: February 23, 1949.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Knowles: While parliament was in session.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Drew: That was after the dental judgment, was it not?

Mr. Garson: No, the dental judgment was on February 28, and we did not hear about it until a few days afterwards.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if that be so, I would just ask the minister this—

Mr. Howe: What is this?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) anything.

Mr. Howe: I happen to be leading the house at the moment. Suppose my hon. friend asks his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was going to, but you interrupted, and apparently interrupted my hon. friend before. The question I want to ask concerns the explanation the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) gave for not publishing the report, namely, the outcome of the dental case in Ontario. Why did he give that explanation when the dental case had been concluded at that time?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will just contain himself, in due course I will trespass upon his attention to bring out that very point. This is by no means a simple matter, and I think that I would make better progress if questions were not quite so frequent.

Mr. Knowles: Or so pointed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You might make a better explanation.

Mr. Garson: I was hopeful until the very end, and perhaps wrongly so, that Mr. McGregor would at least record, in an addendum to the report if not in the report itself, the views of the wartime prices and trade board officials, Mr. Gordon and Mr. Taylor, which were so inconsistent with his own, in order that the report with an addendum of that sort would be a document setting forth completely all of the relevant facts concerning the matter with which it dealt. The final attempt at reconciliation of these viewpoints took the form of a lengthy three hour meeting held in my office on Saturday, October 22, attended by Mr. McGregor, Mr. Gordon and Mr. Taylor. I have been informed within the last few days that subsequent to this meeting Mr. Taylor—and again may I emphasize absolutely on his own responsibility and without the slightest suggestion from myself —went to Mr. McGregor on October 26 and urged that he should at least insert in the report an additional page or two setting forth clearly the considered explanations and the categorical statements to Mr. McGregor by Mr. Gordon, in the meeting of October 22.

I am told Mr. McGregor was reluctant to do this, but he said he would think it over. On Saturday, October 29, Mr. McGregor telephoned Mr. Taylor and said that he was not prepared to make any changes or additions. It was only after this event that it was clear that Mr. McGregor desired to make no further changes, and I tabled the report on Monday, November 7, 1949.

Mr. Coldwell: At the request of my colleague and myself. It was not tabled spontaneously by the minister but at the request of members of the house.

Mr. Garson: I think technically my hon. friend is right, but I hope he will accept my statement that we certainly would have tabled it in any event, because that is the case. My hon. friend is right in saying that his request preceded the tabling, but this is not a case of post hoc ergo propter hoc. At the same time we introduced the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act now before the house.

Let us now go back and cover some of the points raised by previous speakers. Let us deal first of all with the matter of the offence with which I am charged of not seeing that the report was published within fifteen days from the time it was delivered to my office on December 29, 1948. As I have already indicated, this was physically impossible under the circumstances which I have outlined.

Nevertheless the point was raised by other discerning speakers as to why it was not published as soon as possible after January 13. That is a question which deserves the full and serious answer which I shall now try to give it.

As soon as I took the report to cabinet council, I encountered at once, as has already been made apparent in the exchanges which have taken place concerning this matter, strong disagreement not as to policy but about the facts relating to whether the acts done by the milling companies under the direction of the wartime prices and trade board were exempt from prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act. Strong exception was taken to Mr. McGregor's contention in the report that the milling companies had been guilty of an infraction of the Combines Investigation Act during wartime control. Those who professed that view seemed, in my opinion, to have good grounds to know the facts as to what the milling companies had done during this period under the direction of the wartime prices and trade board. They felt that it was most unfair for one department of the government to be recommending prosecution of citizens of the country in respect of what they had done to comply with regulations and requirements of another department.

When I placed the matter before cabinet council I had only one copy of the manuscript, and, although I am not certain, I think I had the press report to which I have referred before, which was not made available until later on, certainly well beyond the publication period. I loaned either of those documents—I am not sure which—to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in order that he could check it with his officials.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. Garson: I could not even give the week, but I would think it would be around the latter part of January or in February. In due course my colleague reported that he had consulted his officials and they had strongly confirmed his own recollection of the facts.

Once this cleavage of opinion became apparent and was established it seemed to us we could have done one of three things. We could have published the manuscript at once as an official report, without comment, though of course that would not have complied with the act because the time for publication had already expired. Moreover, it seemed to us this would not be a proper course because the publication without comment would have implied an endorsation of the report by the government, which would have been quite inconsistent with the view held by some members of the cabinet that as to its facts the report was incomplete and misleading.

This course was particularly unacceptable to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who insisted upon making a statement coincident with the publication of the report repudiating it as far as he personally was concerned. He felt that if he did do this he would appear to the whole business community of Canada, whose co-operation he had sought and received in full measure during the period of war control, as a treacherous double dealer who had led them into a course of conduct only to turn around and betray them. If a statement of that sort had been made obviously it would have made prosecution difficult if not impossible and, incidentally, would have left the combines investigation commission rather under a cloud.

On my part, while I fully appreciated the difficulty of my colleague, I did not feel prepared, in the face of my own responsibilities as Minister of Justice, to have the report publicly condemned in this way until we had made a most careful check to determine whether or not the government should accept it and prosecute on it. I have to confess with some embarrassment now that the facts, which we have checked, proved to my satisfaction at least that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was quite right in the position he took at that time; and if we had followed the course he recommended, of publishing the report and having him make this statement, we would have avoided some of the difficulties that have ensued, though I believe we might have met with others. But with the knowledge I had before me at that time I felt my duty was to support the report of my officials until it was proved to be incomplete. That was what I did; and my colleagues, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce, backed me up in this course. It is regrettable that my action in standing up for this report has proved so embarrassing, but one can only be wise in the light of facts known at a particular point of time. Even in retrospect it still seems to me that it was my duty to support the report, on the information I had at that time, especially when there was no chance then of complying strictly with the requirement as to publication.

The second course we could have followed was to publish the report with a statement—a true statement, if you like—that the government was sceptical about certain aspects of it; that we were going to check those aspects and that in due course, when we had finished our checking and had found out what were the true and complete facts, we would publish them and report to the house. If we had made such a disclaimer, does anyone suppose it would have strengthened the hands of the combines investigation commission or added to its prestige? No matter whether our checking had proved the commissioner in the right, the fact that we had advertised to the world our doubt concerning it and concerning him would have had an adverse effect upon the combines investigation commission.

The third alternative was the course we followed, to delay publication—which had already passed the statutory period of fifteen days—until we could check the facts so that when the report was published the government would be able to state definitely its position in regard to it. Moreover, and I think most hon. members will sympathize with this view, we were naturally most anxious to adopt a course which all members of cabinet would feel they could support; and we agreed that the first requisite was to learn whether the full facts, when ascertained, would support the views held by some members of council, or whether they would support the report, in which event we could publish it and prosecute.

Mr. Knowles: At about what time was that agreement reached by cabinet?

Mr. Garson: Well, I could not pretend to tell my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: February? March?

Mr. Garson: I could not say even roughly. There were several meetings, and I would not be telling the truth if I even attempted to say at which meeting this precise position was reached.

Mr. Knowles: But it was probably while parliament was in session and before the election campaign?

Mr. Garson: I would not say as to that. Well, Mr. Speaker, it took some time to get at those facts, but again I contend there was no lack of diligence on my part. Consistent with the other duties which had to be performed, we brought this matter to a conclusion as soon as possible. We wanted to reconcile the conflicting views of our public servants if that could be done. If it had been possible to handle the matter in any other way I did not want to do what I was finally forced to do, have high-ranking public officials confront each other in a highly controversial way, which could have had an adverse effect upon the morale of a department of government. So we took a good deal of time trying to resolve the matter without resorting to this hazard.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) raised the question of the bearing of the court of appeal judgment in the dental supplies case upon this whole matter. I said I would deal with that question, and I propose to do so now. One of the facts which influenced me in giving priority to other matters than bringing this particular question to a conclusion was that the combines investigation administration had suffered a severe defeat—there is no gainsaying that fact—in the dental supplies case in March, 1948. The case had been withdrawn from the jury by the trial judge on the ground that the crown had not even made out a prima facie case. In course of time, on February 28, 1949, the Ontario court of appeal rendered a unanimous judgment against the crown, which was a body blow to the enforcement of the act in respect of any future reports, including the flour report. In this or in other debates some hon.

members, including the hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and others, have asked why the crown did not appeal this case. The reason was that since the affirmation of the acquittal by the appeal court was unanimous, under the Criminal Code as it stood at that time it was not possible to carry an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a fact that an appeal would be allowed in the event that there was any other judgment of a superior court, such as the minister said the other day there was, under which evidence had been admitted under similar circumstances?

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend is confusing the principle of the dental supplies case with that of the tobacco case. That was the basis of the refusal of leave to appeal in the tobacco case, on application to the Supreme Court of Canada. In the dental supplies case there was at that time—it has since been changed—a provision in the Criminal Code which explicitly stated that where the appeal court affirmed an acquittal unanimously it was not possible to appeal. So we were blocked off from any appeal.

The result was that the dental supplies case was lost; but that was not all. Worst of all the court of appeal, in affirming the acquittal, enunciated what I must contend, notwithstanding the views of the hon. member for Lake Centre, was a somewhat new doctrine of corporate possession, which in cases under other reports, such as the flour report, would make it extremely difficult to use effectively the documents seized in possession of the accused corporation in order to make out a case against it. Until the effect of this judgment had been cured by legislation, our position in respect of the flour report was one of uncertainty not only as regards the facts as to which the public servants were in dispute, but as regards also the law applicable to those facts as well. Had we been challenged to prosecute—and regardless of what may be said, the fact is that I was credibly informed by a most reliable informant that we would be—then to say the least we would be in a most awkward position to accept such a challenge either before or after the date of the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal. Before that judgment of the court of appeal was delivered, the judgment of the trial court was against us; and after the judgment of the court of appeal was delivered, the judgment of the court of appeal itself was unanimously against us and we could not appeal. It is of course the effect of this judgment that we are trying to cure by the amendment now before the house.

We tried to get this amendment prepared in time for presentation to the session last spring; and as I have already stated in another debate, the first draft that the combines investigation commission were able to lay before me was dated April 7, 1949. The matter is of considerably more difficulty than appears on the surface. We considered no less than ten drafts before we brought down the bill which is now before the house. Thus it was quite impossible to get the final draft ready until some time after the beginning of the present session. As matters then stood there was no advantage to the public interest in publishing the report until we could clear up the disputed facts and introduce into the House of Commons this amendment to the Combines Investigation Act in order to neutralize the effect of the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal in this dental supplies case. Accordingly we decided to bring down our amendment to the act, to publish the report and to make the government's statement concerning it at about the same time; and that is what we have done.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker,—and this deals with another question which has been raised—the tabling of the report on the flour-milling industry on November 7, 1949, complies with technical strictness with the requirements of section 27, subsection 5, in that the report which is now before the house was tabled within less than fifteen days from the time I received it from the commissioner in its final form. I did not have it at that interview on October 22; I remember that quite distinctly because Mr. McGregor had a copy there with him and offered to leave it with me; I suggested to him that there was no purpose in his leaving it at that time and he made a quip about it. I want to be perfectly candid with the house. I was under the impression that I had not had it before. To make doubly sure, I telephoned Mr. McGregor today and he later advised my secretary by telephone that he thinks he sent me a printed copy because he has a memo to the effect in his own handwriting on his own file. I did not have time, before the house met this afternoon, to check upon that fact. Certainly I received no formal letter forwarding the printed report to me and certainly the report which I laid on the table of the house was placed there by me within fifteen days after I received it, as one as to which I was sure that there would be no further amendments by Mr. McGregor.

In this whole matter we deny that we recklessly disregarded parliament and the statutory requirement of publication within fifteen days. On the contrary, we took both of these matters into the most careful consideration, not discounting their importance in any way. When I listened this morning to the interpretation which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) put upon our actions, that this was a dastardly conspiracy against the very constitution of our country, I thought that in giving such a judgment as that, he might perhaps have been charitable enough to wait until I had had an opportunity, with sufficient time at my disposal, to give an extended explanation of the position in which we found ourselves. I think that he would agree, in respect of the actions that have been taken honestly, conscientiously and with great concern as to their nature and effect in connection with this matter that, whatever they may be, they do not constitute a dastardly conspiracy to attack the constitution of the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sure the minister wants to be fair. I would ask him not to use the word "dastardly". I did not use the word "dastardly".

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend does not withdraw the word "conspiracy".

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

Mr. Garson: I suggest that most conspiracies are dastardly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You can speak as an expert.

Mr. Garson: Any delay in publication here was not, as has been suggested, any secretive or cynical disregarding of the law or of parliament by two or three ministers. Whatever delay there has been has ensued after it was no longer possible to comply with the provisions of the act. It was a most conscientious balancing by the whole cabinet in several cabinet meetings of these considerations that I have been endeavouring to lay before the members of the house. The truth of the matter is that if Mr. McGregor meant to change his report in the material particulars in which he did change it, he should not have delivered it to my office officially, in my absence, until he had got it into the form in which it was to be when published. What we were concerned with was to get in the report a complete statement of the facts, to clarify the law by the amendment now before the house and to be able, in connection with this particular report, and when publishing it and tabling it, to state what the position of the government was upon it.

This was no routine Combines Investigation Act report at all. The issue here was whether the government, on the first occasion on which this matter has arisen since the cessation of the war, was going to pillory and indict businessmen in the milling industry, under the Combines Investigation Act, for doing what some members of the government believed, and what both chairmen of the wartime prices and trade board believed, that the government had directed them to do under that board. More than that it was a question whether we were going to pillory and indict these men blindly without checking the completeness of Mr. McGregor's statement of the facts which he himself, as it now appears, has partially corrected. Here was an industry in which the government had intervened during the period of wartime control. The government had fixed the ceiling price of its finished products while letting the price of its raw material, wheat, rise.

To offset this, the government proposed a subsidy, based in part upon a rigid control of the milling industries profits. The government insisted that in that connection the industry would have to leave not only its domestic profits in the pool but that it also would have to pool all of its export profits. The government called upon this industry to supply ships' stores and other government departments with its products. For these purposes government through the wartime prices and trade board had exercised continuous supervision and direction of its activities. The objectives to which its actions were directed could not possibly have been achieved without the most ungrudging cooperation and without complete confidence of the industry in the good faith of this government. Therefore it seems to us that as long as the industry had complied with the directions of the wartime prices and trade board it would be an irresponsible and unfair action by the government, without the most careful consideration, to publish a report representing what the industry had done while operating under that board as a systematic series of breaches of another statute, namely, the Combines Investigation Act. This impression would be heightened by the fact that during this time Mr. McGregor remained the Combines Investigation Act commissioner and also acted at the same time as the enforcement officer of the wartime prices and trade board. Those of us who know Mr. McGregor know perfectly well that he would be the last man ever to take advantage of any such dual capacity. But you could not blame people in the business from thinking that some advantage might have been taken of that fact; just as those who impute to us motives in the discharge of this unpleasant responsibility have mentioned a variety of incredible motives. They say—it was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood

(Mr. Macdonnell)—that but for the resignation of Mr. McGregor we would have suppressed the report entirely.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to correct the minister. I said that that was reported, and the government need not be surprised if all kinds of reports were made in view of the action that they took. I did not say it myself. I said it had been said.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend quoted it with disapproval, but quoted it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is correct.

Mr. Garson: Let us look at this suggestion. If we were going to suppress the report entirely why would I go to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), as he quite rightly said that I did, and ask him to withdraw his question concerning the flour report—thereby admitting that such a report existed—until I was in a position to bring down the report and this amending legislation at the same time. True, my estimate as to the time in which it could be brought down was, shall I say, unduly optimistic; but why would I ask him that question at all if we were going to suppress the report? Moreover, sir, the fact that the flour report was in the offing was no secret. Mr. McGregor referred to it in his evidence before the prices committee in 1948 and there were references in the press to this report as far back as the spring of 1948. To suppress it would have been an utter impossibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was not the reference to the investigation, not the report, in February or March of 1948?

Mr. Garson: No, it was a reference to the flour report itself in preparation. As I say, to suppress it would be impossible. But, sir, that was not the point. The point was that before the government published what could very well be regarded as a serious attack upon business confidence in the good faith of the government—and when I say "government" I do not mean just this government, I mean government generally—it was under an obligation in the public interest to know its own position and coincident with that publication announce that position so that no person would be pilloried and indicted in respect of co-operating with the government in wartime controls which owed their success in large measure to that very co-operation.

During this debate it has been asserted that the government is responsible to parliament and that it should in its action take proper cognizance of this point. No person will quarrel with that view—certainly we do not. True, there was some delay. Delay in respect of what? Delay in respect of what turned out to be—I am talking about the statutory delay now in getting it printed in time—a manuscript which was changed five times by the commissioner himself before it became the report that we have before the house at the present time.

Mr. Coldwell: What was the last date on which it was changed?

Mr. Garson: February 23, 1949, which, if I may point out, was a matter of about a month and a half after the date on which my head should have rolled in the sand, because the report was not published.

Mr. Coldwell: And eight months before it was tabled?

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. I have explained the reason for the delay in the intervening period. We have published the report. We have made our statement concerning it at the time that it was always intended that it should be made, coincident with the publication of the report, and at the same time we have placed this amending legislation before parliament. It was on the second reading of this amendment that my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), moved his amendment to the motion for second reading which I suggest is, in its substance, a motion of want of confidence in this government. While it is important, sir, that the government should be responsible to parliament and should respect parliament, parliament should respect the functions of government. One of the most important of these functions is that the government, as long as it remains the government and continues to retain the confidence of the House of Commons, should have the right to make government policy.

Mr. Drew: But not change the law?

Mr. Garson: No. My hon. friend is quite right. When parliament, lacking confidence in the government, interferes with the government's making of government policy, then the only course that the government can follow is to resign.

The bill now before the house represents government policy. The leader of the opposition made what I regarded as an attempt to indicate that it did not represent government policy; but by interjection I think I made it quite clear that the bill now before the house represents the government policy and the whole of government policy in this matter of the Combines Investigation Act amendment now before us.

In respect of this motion for second reading my hon. friend moved:

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that they have power to send for persons, papers and records and that in addition to other recommendations with respect to the subject matter of the bill they shall also have power to report upon the extent to which the effective administration of legislation relating to restrictive trade practices has been, or is being, prejudiced by the action of the government . . .

And so on. The point that I make there is that when it is proposed to send the subject matter of this bill to a committee of parliament it means that a committee of parliament is being directed to make policy for this government. If that is not a motion of want of confidence then, sir, I do not know what it is.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might assist us to understand this extraordinary argument if we were told in what way this differs from the reference of any other matter to any other committee of parliament.

Mr. Garson: Well, I am not suggesting for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that it does differ from sending any other matter to a committee. What I do suggest is that when the government of the day brings down a bill in which is set out government policy in respect of the subject matter of that bill, a motion to send the subject matter of the bill to a committee of parliament in order that a committee of parliament may work out policy in respect to that subject matter it is in substance, if not in form, a motion of want of confidence.

I have detained the house at great length. I have done so, amongst other reasons, in order to convince the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and some of his colleagues, that we were attempting to make a serious answer. He was objecting to the fact that we had not made a serious answer to any of the charges.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): To the point I raised.

Mr. Garson: And I have spoken at some length on that account, attempting to deal, point by point, with those which have been raised.

I should like to close with the suggestion that I think there is nothing the parliamentary committee could bring forth with regard to this matter that we do not already know. The flour report speaks for itself. The memoranda of Mr. Gordon speak for themselves. There has been a very full disclosure of all the relevant facts. I do not think for one moment that the divergence of opinion between high-ranking public servants can be resolved by the committee. That being so the only purpose a reference would accompiish would be to delay the matter. And, sir, for our part we are anxious to get on with the prosecution of the bakeries report, and we would urge that the motion in amendment be voted down.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Cruickshank: I was paired with the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Homuth: I was paired with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes before six o'clock I intend to deal with the defence raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) for his failure, which is shared by the government, to carry out the provisions of section 27 of the Combines Investigation Act. The minister spent well over two hours in a courteous discussion of the issues, and after the two hours had elapsed all one could conclude was that the minister pleaded guilty, with extenuating circumstances. It was fairly obvious,—and as I listened to him I sympathized with him,—that he realized what he had done was unjustifiable, inexcusable and a contravention of principles going back to the Bill of Rights, which declared among other things that no government or executive can suspend the law of the realm in any particular without parliament.

While it was the voice of the Minister of Justice that spoke to the house, the failure of the government to carry out the provisions of the statute was clearly indicated to have been by reason of the directing hand of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). We have had a revised version of explanations given to us, as an addition to a number given previously. It is a strange thing that a new type of explanation should be produced, namely, there were so many revisions of the report of the commissioner of combines and that because of that fact while there was an appearance of failure to live up to the law, in actuality the law was complied with. That is the revised version; that is the last version.

We have had several prior to the latest, and first explanations are often closer to the facts than later ones. On October 29, 1949, Mr. McGregor wrote in part as follows:

> One of the principal remedial measures provided by the Combines Investigation Act is the publication of reports of investigations. The withholding for so many months of publication of a report which the act requires shall be made public as soon as possible after its receipt . . . is one illustration of the tendencies I have in mind.

Would you not have expected the minister to have given the explanation he gave in his reply? That was not his explanation on November 4 in his letter to Mr. McGregor. His explanation on that date was:

> The government decided not to publish the report or act upon it until the doubts raised had been cleared up. Moreover in view of these doubts and of substantial increases in the difficulties of prosecuting created by the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal . . . we felt that if we published the report and were challenged to prosecute upon it, we might not be able to make out a case . . . The government therefore took the responsibility of withholding publication of your report pending the amendment of the Combines Investigation Act . . .

He was challenged in the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as to what justification he had for failing to carry out the law. I had asked the same question not long before, and the minister had replied that he could not give me any further information than he had already given. Finally he answered the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre by saying, in effect, "Well, we got elected, didn't we?"

Mr. Garson: Oh, no. If my hon. friend wants to quote me, let him do it accurately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Pardon?

Mr. Garson: If the hon. member wants to put words in my mouth, let him put the right ones.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked, at page 1524 of Hansard:

> Will the minister tell the house on what authority the government relied when it made the decision to violate the provisions of section 27(5) of the act?

The reply of the minister was:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, it relied upon the fact that any democratic government is answerable to the people of the country for its acts.

Mr. Garson: Has that anything to do with an election?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Pardon?

Mr. Garson: Go ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am going ahead. I trust my hon. friend is not going to offer a revised version of what he said on November 7. He went on:

> I am going to answer my hon. friend's question, if he will give me a chance. It is perfectly clear that if an election were held tomorrow, as there will be an election in due course, we would have to go before the free people of this country and answer for our actions. I have no doubt my hon. friend would get up and anathematize us.

That was a good word. Later he went on:

> And we would have to answer; then the people would decide. As long as that condition exists I do not think we need worry very much.

What a proposition to advance; what a statement for a minister of the crown to make as a reason for breaking the law, that under our democratic system ultimately there will be an election! That is no justification. Indeed, if anyone in this country had known during the ten months' period that the minister had broken the law, as he did, His Majesty's courts could have been applied to in order to protect His Majesty's subjects, under a writ of mandamus, which would direct the minister to live up to the law. He concealed the report, and one explanation is this: we did not agree with the terms of the report. Is there anything in section 27 of the act that gives the government discretion to say they may break the law because they do not agree with the terms of a report; that they may break the law because after consideration, even honest consideration, they feel it should be broken? If that be an excuse for breaking the law, how many people in this country would feel like breaking the income tax law, or any other laws passed by parliament? Expediency, or the desire to prevent argument between high civil servants, afford no excuse in extenuation or otherwise for what has taken place in connection with this report.

No answer was given the question of who gave Mr. Gordon authority to place any body of people in this country above the law. What minister gave that authority? Certainly it could not have been Mr. Ilsley, the then minister of finance, who was in charge of Mr. Gordon's department; for Mr. Ilsley knew that these proceedings and investigations were going on under the combines act. He knew what Mr. McGregor was doing, and there is no suggestion that he told Mr. McGregor he ought not to proceed as he was proceeding. The law provides that any report of the commissioner, other than a preliminary report, shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner states in writing to the minister that he believes the public interest would be better served if this were not done.

My hon. friend says he waited until the facts were investigated. He waited from January to October, to bring together Mr. McGregor and Mr. Gordon, the holders of divergent points of view. Why that long wait? And in nothing that has been said has there been even the suggestion of an apology to parliament for this most serious disregard of the law. There has been no apology either by the minister or by any other member of the government, including the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). How often has the right hon. gentleman, speaking to the Canadian Bar Association, referred to the rule of law with all the power of advocacy of a great counsel. How often has he referred to the rule that assures equality of all under and before the law? Where was that equality between January and November, 1949?

This is not a question of the guilt or innocence of these companies. No government had to punish anyone, or to proceed against anyone on the report of a combines commissioner. When I asked Mr. Ilsley that question in 1948 he replied in effect that the minister when he receives a report is not bound to prosecute. The minister says one reason the government did not publish the report was that they thought the facts were wrong. Well, were the facts wrong in the international cartels report? Some members of the house thought they were, but the report was published. They may say what they will, Mr. Speaker, but no one on the part of the government has yet explained what authority justified the action of the government in saying in effect that: "There is one law for those on the front benches. That is the law of expediency, a law which applies to no one else. We can break the law; we can refuse to carry out those duties we are required to carry out under a mandatory provision."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill No. 119, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Church.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we had a considerable amount of debate in connection with whether the time should be extended at this sitting to consider this bill and another one which calls for the granting of a charter to a pipe line company. A considerable number of reasons were put forward yesterday as to why this should be done. To a plain man like myself, the thing that stands out is that the basic and essential reason why a change in the rules of the house was proposed by the government was a definite desire on their part that these two bills should go through.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Yesterday the house decided to extend the time for private and public bills. That is a decision of the house and it cannot be debated again. The question now is on the amendment of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

Mr. Harkness: I was not questioning the decision of the house, Mr. Speaker. I was merely observing that to one like myself who is not, and does not pretend to be, particularly well versed in the works of Beauchesne, Bourinot, May and the other authorities on parliamentary procedure, in spite of the rather fancy reasons which were put forward as to why that action was taken to change the rules of the house in this particular case, a thing which had not been done within the memory of anyone in the house, as far as I know—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. member that it is not in order to discuss that ruling, and he is discussing the ruling. I would ask him to direct his remarks to the amendment which is now before the house.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, if I was discussing the ruling. I did not think that I was doing so. As a matter of fact, I was addressing my remarks really to the purpose for which this change in rules has been brought in.

Mr. Speaker: That, of course, is not in order. It is not in order for the hon. member to do so.

Mr. Harkness: I bow to Your Honour's ruling, and I will say no more on that particular subject.

To address myself more specifically to this particular bill, during the debate on this bill and the similar one, the idea has been put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and others that it does not really matter how many charters we grant to build pipe lines, that we might as well grant a charter to any company that applies for the right to do so as long as they can prove bona fides and that they can raise the money to do so. I disagree entirely with that idea. I think that we in this parliament have a responsibility in the matter of granting these pipe line charters. If the general Pipe Lines Act under which we are granting these charters had not been drawn up with the express idea that it was necessary for a company who wishes to build a pipe line to apply to this house for a charter, and if that act had not been put through with the provision in it, then it would not be necessary for these pipe line companies to come to this house to secure a charter. But the act is through, and these companies are obliged to come here to secure a charter. I therefore do not think that we can adopt the point of view or the attitude that any group of men who apply for a charter should be granted it as long as they can show financial background for the thing. As a matter of fact, I think we must look upon any application for a charter from the point of view of whether the granting of that charter is going to be in the best interests of the country as a whole, of the particular area in which the gas is produced, and the area which is going to be served by the pipe line which it is projected will be built.

The purpose of this particular bill is the same as that of the other one on the order paper, on which I spoke for some forty minutes two or three weeks ago. I do not want to repeat the arguments which I advanced at that time against the granting of a charter to that particular company. There are, however, a few other matters to which I should like to draw the attention of the house.

Having regard to the granting of a charter to any company, I think one of the most important considerations is the route which is going to be followed. The sponsor of this particular bill, when he moved its adoption, at page 1344 of Hansard, is reported to have said:

> I wish to make it clear that the passing of this bill does not in any way establish routes for the transmission lines for this company. As I say, as far as federal jurisdiction is concerned, under the direction of this parliament it was ordered in the last session that routes must be decided upon by the board of transport commissioners. I think hon. members are also aware that public interest is additionally protected in that the province of Alberta has established most effective control now of its natural resources in the form of oil and natural gas.

Then at page 1345 he is reported to have said:

I should like to inform the house that the bill has nothing to do with routes.

In that connection I should like to put on record what this company had to say in the matter of routes when it first applied for its charter. I have here a small clipping from the Calgary Herald of August 11, 1949, which reads as follows:

Notice of application to the parliament of Canada for a private bill.

Notice is hereby given that an application will be made to the parliament of Canada at the next or the following session thereof for a private bill incorporating a company under the name of Prairie Pipe Lines Limited or in the alternative Prairie Transmission Lines Limited or such other name as parliament may grant for the purpose of acquiring, constructing and operating pipe lines to transport or transmit natural and artificial gas and oil in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia commencing at a point in the general Calgary area in the province of Alberta and thence to a point in the vicinity of Blairmore in the said province and thence to a point in the vicinity of Kingsgate in the province of British Columbia and thence to the United States of America, leaving Canada at a point at or near Kingsgate in the said province of British Columbia and re-entering Canada in the vicinity of Blaine in the state of Washington and proceeding north to Vancouver area in the province of British Columbia, subject to the provisions of the Pipe Lines Act.

Dated at Toronto, Ontario, this 4th day of June, 1949.

J. G. Edison,
Solicitor for the applicants,
907 Victory Building,
Toronto, Ontario.

I should just like to say further that Blaine, which is mentioned there, is straight south of Vancouver. In other words, this company, whose charter is now up for us to pass upon, as far as this house is concerned, in their original application to this parliament outlined the route, and they left no doubt whatever what that route was. The route was to go into the United States really at the nearest point possible to take it into the United States from the Pincher Creek gas field in southern Alberta, thence to travel through the United States, and then they were going to have a branch line up to Vancouver from Blaine immediately south of Vancouver.

It is quite true that the route was not mentioned when the bill actually came before us in the house, but I think a reading of this notice of application which the company made in the first instance is sufficient proof that their purpose and their idea is to build a pipe line which is going to travel through the greater part of its length in the United States of America.

In spite of what the mover said to the effect that the granting of this charter had nothing to do with this route, we have to keep very much in mind the matter of what route the company does propose to build its line over. It seems, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, that the question of route is perhaps the most important consideration so far as the pipe line charter is concerned.

A considerable number of arguments have already been put forward in the house along this line, that a pipe line company should include in its application the route which it is to follow in the same way as a railway company does. With that I agree most completely. I do not think that this parliament should pass any pipe line bill, or grant any charter, unless the route or approximate route is outlined.

Essentially the situation is this. At the last session of parliament a pipe line or a pipe line charter to take gas to the Pacific coast was granted. It is quite true that that charter contained approximately the same words as the one now before us. The route was not outlined. However, when that charter was discussed in the committee at that time—and it is quite true that it was given a cursory examination there—it was late in the session. There was no time to go into the matter in the detail that it should have been gone into. In any event, the projected plans of that company were outlined to the committee. It was definitely established that that company intended to put, and it secured the charter for the purpose of putting, a pipe line from the Peace river country down through the interior of British Columbia to Vancouver, and extending a line from there on to the Pacific coast cities of the United States.

Probably if we had not been in such a rush at that time the considerations which have been brought forward in the debate on this bill and the other pipe line bill would have come out then. Probably no charter would have been granted unless the route had been included in the application of the company. The fact that that was not done is no good reason why it should not be done now and in the future. As I have indicated, this company actually did establish before the committee that their purpose was to build a route entirely within Canada. As far as the company with which we are dealing is concerned, as the notice of application which I have read indicates, their purpose is not to build it in Canada; it is to build the main part of the route within the United States.

I understand the company has indicated that they are prepared to build a line through the southern part of British Columbia entirely within Canada if it is necessary to get the charter. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, in view of their original application, their purpose is to build a line as they have indicated. From what I have been able to gather I do not think they have surveyed any route in the southern part of Canada close to the United States-British Columbia border. I doubt very much whether the building of a pipe line through that area is a practical proposition. I think that it would have to go considerably north of that to get country through which they could go with any degree of ease. In this connection I should like to point out that you cannot build a pipe line without a road. Judging from the two or three summers that I spent in that area of southern British Columbia I do not think any roads exist along the lines that I understand this company have said they would build their line. I do not think it would be a practical proposition for them, or for any other company, to construct roads there, which again is necessary, to enable them to build a pipe line. Therefore it seems to me that this is an application essentially for a pipe line to run its greater length through the United States, and to that there are serious objections.

Discussing this bill or the other bill—I do not know which it was—the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that he was all in favour of a pipe line which ran through Canadian territory and that he would ensure that Canadian interests were served first in granting a permit to any company to export gas and so on along that line. I do not think that an assurance of that kind is sufficient for us who are granting the charter to set aside the considerations I have mentioned and then let the thing slide. After all, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not going to be in his present position forever. It should not be a matter of accepting his assurance that he will see that no permit is granted unless Canadian interests are served first. The general objections to a pipe line, the greater part of whose length runs through the United States from Alberta out to the Pacific coast of Canada or the Pacific coast of the United States, I outlined when I was speaking on the other pipe line bill some time ago, and I do not want to repeat what I said then or go over the matter in detail; but I should like to summarize some of the reasons. The first is that with such a pipe line the minimum number of people will be served in British Columbia and Alberta. That of course is self-evident. If you run a line through only a small section of Alberta, the southern part of it, and a small section of British Columbia so that it crosses to the United States, and then run it back up straight south of Vancouver, it is quite clear that you are going to serve far fewer people than if you ran its entire length on Canadian territory.

Second, it will not result in any development of the northern parts of Alberta and British Columbia. In northern Alberta and in northern British Columbia there are large regions which are sparsely settled and require roads and power.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): And railways.

Mr. Harkness: And railways, somebody said. One of the ways in which those areas can be developed is by building a pipe line there. The construction of a pipe line from the Peace river area in Alberta through the Peace river block in British Columbia, and thence on down to Vancouver, would open up a large track of land which at the present time needs development. It would provide power in that area, and as a result would attract large numbers of settlers.

The very building of the pipe line would cause the construction of roads, one of the great necessities in that area. I think probably it would lead eventually to the construction of a railway, or railways. The third important consideration is that if the main part of the construction were in the United States a great deal of the wages and employment for the construction of the pipe line would be paid to American workmen in American funds. In other words it would mean a great deal less employment in this country and less money in circulation. And after a line is built, of course there must be people to maintain it. Similarly if the greatest length of the pipe line is in the United States the people maintaining it will be Americans. The wages paid will be spent in the United States, and we shall derive no benefit at all.

Another consideration is that no impetus is given to the development of manufacturing industries in this country by the construction of a pipe line, most of the length of which lies in another country. I am given to understand that if the line is built chiefly in Canada it will cause the construction of at least one steel rolling plant and one plant for the manufacture of fittings and various sorts of valves. All of this would increase the amount of employment and the amount of money in circulation here, in addition to which it would save large sums in American exchange.

One other important consideration is that if the pipe line is built entirely in this country until it reaches a point beyond Vancouver, the surplus gas will go on to Seattle, Tacoma, Portland and other points. The cost of the gas would be less in Vancouver and other Canadian points than in American points because they, at the end of the line, would have to pay a greater transportation cost. If the main line is built through the United States the opposite is the result. The cost of the gas would be greater in Vancouver and adjacent points in British Columbia than in American points to the south.

Allied to that is another fact. If the entire cost of transportation is added to the cost of the gas, so far as American consumers are concerned, in this way there is provided a certain amount of protection for Canadian manufacturers. They get their gas at a cheaper rate and therefore can manufacture more cheaply. The most outstanding example of that, one which I mentioned before, is the nitrogen or ammonia plant at Calgary, which is the greatest user of natural gas in that city, using as much as the entire city uses. At the present time it manufactures fertilizers which are sold in the United States. If a gas line could be built there, from the projected main source of supply, the Pincher Creek area, immediately across the border a similar plant could be constructed, just a short distance across the boundary line on the American side. They could manufacture ammonia as cheaply as we can at the plant in Calgary, and perhaps more cheaply. Naturally they would have no duty on their product.

For all these reasons it seems to me that this and the other pipe line bill should not be passed by parliament until we have had written into those bills the routes they are to follow. And if those routes so written in are not all-Canadian routes, then I believe the bills should be turned down.

I would reiterate what was said by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) a few nights ago when he said that so far as he was concerned any bill which contains within it a route which is an all-Canadian route he is prepared to support. I am in exactly the same position. I am prepared to vote to give a charter to any company which shows that it is able to go ahead and construct a pipe line, and which is going to follow an all-Canadian route. They have surveyed it and have given some indication that it can be followed successfully.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, as a representative from the Peace river area of British Columbia I believe I have a right to make some comments at this time. Within the boundaries of that riding are many gas wells, and fair prospects for the development of oil wells. Be it said for one of these companies that it has shown enough confidence in the country to go in there and set up drilling outfits, and to establish great resources of natural gas.

The interest, therefore, of our people is, first, that these resources be used right in the vicinity, in the towns of that neighbourhood—Dawson Creek, Fort St. John and Prince George, all of which are flourishing centres. We live in the north where the winters are long and the weather is cold. We need cheap fuel. Nature has been generous in giving the Peace river country these resources of oil, natural gas and coal.

It seems to me the House of Commons is wasting a great deal of time in the discussion of these bills. I am reminded of the hunter who sold the hide of the bear while the animal was still at large in the woods. Our time here should be spent not in incorporating this or that company for the purpose of establishing pipe lines, but rather to encourage the drilling for oil and gas up in that northern part of British Columbia, so as to create new payrolls, new industries and new resources for the Canadian people.

I hate to say that people would seek a monopoly in Canada, because we know monopolies are not good for a country. We have seen what has happened in connection with our railways. It is only fair that there should be an open field for those capitalists who have the courage to go into these enterprises. I am going to say that, so far as voting in connection with the measure before the house is concerned, I will vote for what will serve my own community first, the province of British Columbia second, and the Dominion of Canada third.

I would hate to be classified as one who has encouraged filibustering. I know the people in Calgary who put their money into the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited. They are splendid fellows with a great deal of courage. They have gone ahead and developed these oil wells. I am sure there are good men back of these other companies; and we need development of that kind, having in mind the best interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the debate on these pipe line bills started some time ago many of us did not know much about them, but so much has been said in the meantime that we have become familiar with them. In addition to what we have heard inside the house, people outside the house have talked to us about this matter. It would appear that the reason hon. members are reluctant to support these bills is related principally to the route to be followed by the pipe lines. I have been told, I admit, by someone at second or third removed, so I cannot guarantee that it expresses the opinion of this particular company—but nevertheless it makes sense—that this company would not mind routing its pipe line through Canadian soil if the other company which was incorporated last year were put in a position where it would have to do likewise.

I do not know how parliament or the government or the board of transport commissioners could deal with that situation, but if that is the position it does seem to me that steps should be taken to meet it. This raises the question of whether or not the overriding Pipe Lines Act is properly drawn in its present form. I sometimes wonder if it would not have been better for the government—rather than pursuing the course it has—to have brought in amendments to that overriding act. That might have been a better way to facilitate the passing of these bills.

I should like to quote a standing order, not as a point of order but just as a matter of argument. Standing order 97 reads:

> No petition praying for the incorporation of a railway company, or of a canal company, or for an extension of the line of any existing or authorized railway or canal, or for the construction of branches thereto, shall be considered by the examiner, or by the committee on standing orders, until there has been filed with the said examiner a map or plan, showing the proposed location of the works, and each county, township, municipality or district through which the proposed railway or canal, or any branch or extension thereof, is to be constructed.

It seems to me that parliament is not being fair if we require from companies seeking to build railroads or canals a map showing their proposed route when at the same time we do not require anything like that from a company proposing to build a pipe line. That applies to the bill now before us as well as to any other pipe line company. Surely there is a close analogy between railways and canals on the one hand, and pipe lines on the other.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) has indicated his support of the principle which some of my colleagues have enunciated, namely, that the line should go through Canadian soil. That is good. I believe the government would do well, in fairness to all companies concerned—if I may put it that way—as well as in fairness to the Canadian people to find some way by which it could be laid down as a basic principle that all our pipe lines should serve Canadian requirements first before being routed out of Canada. That is one of the main issues now before us.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations with regard to this particular matter. I do not think we should be narrow or small in our attitude toward these bills for the construction of pipe lines to traverse our territory. However, consideration should be given to the elements contained in these products. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) referred to ammoniates which are found in these products. Canada is short of this commodity which is so necessary in our agricultural development. If these pipe lines are going to carry into the United States oil and gas which are charged with ammoniates then I feel disposed to oppose this particular bill. We must keep in Canada every pound, gallon or cubic foot of ammoniates which are presently here. Any hon. members who are farmers know that we have an abundance of phosphates while we are very short of ammoniates. Any move which will permit the taking out of this country of ammoniates in the form of gas or oil will in the final analysis be bad business for Canada.

It has been my privilege to investigate the pipe lines in Iraq, Iran and other places in Asia and Europe. I am trying to dream this picture through in an effort to see what might happen here in the next 25 or 50 years should we denude ourselves of this God-given heritage in the form of this element and let it slip through our fingers by way of these pipe lines in order to benefit our friends south of the border.

Thinking of the generations to come, I think that at this stage we should wait until we have more information about what we are doing. Let us know what it is all about. We should not go into this thing blindly. We should consider what Providence has given us in the way of natural resources and analyse the situation and then make up our minds what we ought to do. We should not make snap judgments. I should like to see these bills held over for a little while. We are a young country and we can afford to wait to see just what we are giving away by permitting these products to be transported through a pipe line that will traverse another country. We may be bereaved of this important commodity in the days to come.

I was amazed to hear the hon. member for Calgary East refer to the possibility of railroad lines following the pipe lines. As I say, I saw the pipe lines in Iraq, Iran and other points in Asia and Europe, and no railroad lines followed those pipe lines. No railroad lines will follow these pipe lines. There will be little development. But for the sake of what development there will be let us in the interests of the prestige of this House of Commons not be in too great a hurry to give away the resources we have at the present time. Let us stop, think and consider what the natural resources are which we have at our hands, and what we are going to do with them in the future, not for those of this day and generation but for those of the generations which are to come.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I feel we are all indebted to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for giving us ample time to discuss these two important bills. They are of the greatest importance to the province from which I come, British Columbia. I venture to take a few moments of the time of the house because over a number of years I have had some personal connection with this natural product. I remember leaving the city of Edmonton over forty years ago when I was a youngster and travelling by stage coach to Athabasca landing. At Athabasca landing we got into Hudson bay scows and drifted down the Athabasca river. That is not the means of travel today. People wanting to go to the north country now travel in comfort by railway to Waterways, which used to be called Fort McMurray. In travelling by railway, however, they miss one of the most spectacular sights that can be seen in the northwest, namely, a great spout of flame coming from a gas well which, to my knowledge, was burning in 1909, and according to rumours amongst the Indians and the early inhabitants of that country had been burning for twenty years before that date. It was a most impressive sight. I saw it as a youngster for the first time, but it will remain fresh in my memory as long as I live.

That was my first introduction to the wonderful power of the natural gas which is available in the Northwest Territories and Alberta. I recall vividly visiting Medicine Hat. Towards the end of the last century gas had been discovered at Medicine Hat. Ranchers in that district found it possible to dig a small hole in the ground a few feet deep and find gases coming off which could be lighted by a match. Over these fires they were able to cook their midday and evening meals. They were able to fry their buffalo steaks, their eggs, or whatever it might be, with the natural gas coming up from the sands around Medicine Hat. In the course of the years it has been developed, and in the early years of the present century one could see prosperous industries being developed around Medicine Hat. I recall vividly the bottling works at Redcliff, the potteries in the vicinity of Medicine Hat, and the greenhouses in which vegetables including tomatoes were grown in the early months of the year. That is an indication of what natural gas can do to help Canadian industries.

It was only a few years after that when they started to drill wells. Wells were drilled at Bow River and from there the gas was piped to Calgary. I lived in Calgary at the time. I have cooked and had my house heated by that natural product. As the years went by other gas wells were discovered in the Turner valley. Gas wells were drilled and developed at Viking not far to the east of Edmonton, and in recent years it has been piped from there into Edmonton and down as far as Red Deer. There is in fact a gap of only 100 miles between Calgary and Red Deer where the villages of Alberta are not supplied with natural gas and they do not have the opportunity of heating their homes by that means of providing warmth for their farm houses.

It is so different today. When I was in Red Deer we used to have to travel thirty miles by sleigh up towards Stettler, dig coal out of the river bank and haul it back to the farm at Red Deer in order to be able to keep warm during the winter months. With gas now piped to Red Deer there is no reason why all the homesteads and farms should not be heated by this very clean, efficient and economical means. I see the possibility of that type of power, heat and energy being delivered to the towns of the interior of British Columbia and the great metropolitan area of Vancouver and New Westminster.

So far as I can understand from the bill now before us, the proposal is that this means of providing comfort to countless homes in British Columbia is to be diverted across the border and carried to the states of the northwestern United States. I suggest that, so far as we can see now, there is in the foreseeable future an unlimited quantity of gas in the great oil and gas fields of Alberta, the Peace river block and Pincher creek. I suggest it would be just as economical to pipe that supply from northern Alberta and the Peace river district down through central British Columbia feeding all the towns of the interior and carrying the gas to the city of Vancouver. In the same way that the industries I have described are carried on at Medicine Hat, the bottling plant, the potteries and the greenhouses, there is no reason why all along the central British Columbia route similar industries could not be carried on at innumerable little towns provided they can get this cheap form of heat.

If on the other hand this cheap heat and power is to be diverted and sent across the border, then all these small towns of the northwest states, where they produce fruits and vegetables which compete with fruits and vegetables produced in British Columbia, are apt to flood the Vancouver market with these products to the detriment of the tomato growers, particularly, not only in the interior but on the gulf islands, that archipelago which lies between Vancouver and Vancouver island. There many returned veterans have gone into the production of tomatoes, and they look to Vancouver for a market. They will be deprived of an opportunity of selling their seconds and their dessert grades in that market at this season of the year, because it will be glutted with tomatoes grown in Washington and Oregon. Are we going to give these competitors of our fruit growers an added advantage by diverting Canada's gas to the northwest states, so that they will have an even cheaper type of fuel than they have at the present time? Surely we should first consider our Canadian horticulturists; surely we should take advantage of this opportunity to give our small towns and villages throughout British Columbia this economical heat, before we consider the advantages that will accrue to similar towns in the United States if this pipe line goes in that direction.

I do feel that it is important for many reasons that we should encourage the location of industry in British Columbia towns. It is quite obvious at the moment that the flood of immigrants to British Columbia from other parts of Canada and from the old land is being concentrated in the metropolitan area of Vancouver. Anything we can do to have those newcomers move into the smaller villages, say up the Fraser valley, will benefit the economy of that province. Many small industries could be developed. One of these is pottery, for which clay is available at Clayburn in Sumas valley and which could be developed if the necessary power and heat were provided.

Then I remember vividly what was taking place at this time last year on Vancouver island. Due to an exceptionally bad winter and due to the loss of British markets for our forest products, many thousands of men were out of employment. According to the official returns there is more unemployment in British Columbia today than there was a year ago, and there is no likelihood that those camps will be kept open all winter. So hundreds of men who are accustomed to working in the mills and in the forest camps will find themselves out of employment, and will be looking to this government to provide them with something to do. The government is fond of referring to a number of projects which are being delayed until there is general unemployment, when certain works will be undertaken. It seems to me that if this pipe line could be diverted and made an all-Canadian line, running through British Columbia, it would be of immense value not only in the future but immediately, during this very winter, in providing employment for men who otherwise are going to be out of work.

It is not merely the question of a pipe line. One is apt to think that only involves digging a hole in the ground and laying the pipe. This is not drain pipe; it is big pipe, 24 or 26 inches in diameter. A big construction project is involved, not only in laying the pipe but in surveying, cutting through the forests and developing roads over which heavy transports can carry this pipe, which must be placed at a sufficient depth so it will not be harmed by any frosts which may occur in the mountains.

From time to time we have been considering the possibility of building a trans-Canada highway. We want more than one route across Canada. From the remarks that have been made it is quite obvious that several routes are required through British Columbia; and there is no reason why a road originally built for the construction and maintenance of this pipe line should not be developed by the province into an alternative route which would feed various portions of that province from Alberta to the prairie country. Let us say the trans-Canada highway were to follow what is sometimes called the southern route, going from Calgary and Banff to Golden and Revelstoke, and so on. Might it not be possible that this pipe line, tapping the northern Alberta fields, could be run down the Blue river or the Canoe river, on down to the Thompson and so on, feeding an entirely different part of British Columbia?

For these reasons, and because of my firm belief that this Alberta natural gas can provide heating and cooking facilities for innumerable homesteads, villages and towns throughout the province of British Columbia, and also may be used to start new industries, I feel it is important that this line should be routed through British Columbia. In order to ensure that this is done, these bills should be so amended as to include definite instructions that this is to be an all-Canadian line.

As far as the immediate future is concerned, I feel that something must be done this winter. We must be warned now that there is going to be unemployment in British Columbia; that thousands of people will move to British Columbia this winter from other parts of Canada, perhaps seeking employment, perhaps in order to take advantage of our milder climate.

It has been traditional that the people from the prairie provinces move from there to British Columbia during the wintertime. They will be looking for jobs because they will not bring sufficient capital with them to be able to keep themselves decently during those months, and they will be competing with our own British Columbians for what few jobs there are. Organized labour, the Canadian Legion and the mayors of the various municipalities will be appealing to this government to provide jobs for these people who are out of work.

Here is a grand opportunity whereby a large number of men could be employed, in the immediate future, surveying the various routes, and in blazing down through the forests of British Columbia trails which may eventually be developed into great highways. Then not only will an impetus be given to the industries in these small towns, but hundreds of men will be employed in the maintenance of a pipe line if we will only say that it must take an all-Canadian route. For the life of me I cannot see why this Canadian natural product should be diverted across the border to feed towns in the northwestern states whose very industry is in competition with the industries of British Columbia, and in which there is not the same urgent need for providing jobs that there is today in British Columbia. Surely we should look after our own provinces first of all. Therefore I feel keenly that this bill should not be passed without having the most careful consideration given to it.

As I said when I started, I appreciate the opportunity which the Prime Minister has given to this house to discuss these bills thoroughly. I hope that members who have experience with these parts of the country, and who know something about this great natural product of ours, will be prepared to express their points of view, because I think it is a problem which should be thoroughly discussed and debated. There is no immediate emergency to rush these bills through or to gain a decision. I have tried to give to the house the benefit of what little experience I had. I have some knowledge of that country both in Alberta and in British Columbia. I am in fairly close touch with conditions in my own part of British Columbia, and I urge that the most careful consideration be given before this bill is passed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is—

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), I too wish to thank the government for the opportunity of giving us extended time to debate this bill. I also wish to thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who is not tonight in his seat—at least at the moment he is not—for my entry into this debate at all.

On November 15, when the bill was under discussion, he said, as reported at page 1806 of Hansard:

> I might say the house has granted one franchise for a pipe line for gas in a western direction and a pipe line for gas in an eastern direction. As the situation stands today, the incorporators of each of those two bills have a monopoly, so far as gas moving in either direction is concerned.

I shall refer to that later. It is the rest of the paragraph with which I wish to deal now.

> My hon. friends of the C.C.F. party have a good deal to say about monopolies, and yet we find them very busy filibustering so that the monopoly on the pipe line situation can be maintained.

I was quick to reply to the minister when he made that statement, because up to that moment only one member of this party had spoken to the question, and that member is from the south central part of British Columbia, the part of the country vitally affected by which particular route this pipe line may take.

Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce was so anxious to make a point, a smearing point for the bills that he is supporting, that he had to bring the C.C.F. in as filibustering with a ten-minute speech. In view of the filibuster we had yesterday in order to get this extended debate, I would say that one filibuster deserves another.

As a matter of fact up until the time the Minister of Trade and Commerce made his statement I had given very little thought to these bills. Perhaps I am to be censured for that; but, like so many other private members, particularly those on the opposition side of the house, I have a great many things to attend to. I am not even like most of the ministers—and I say "most" of the ministers—who have only one department. We private members have to keep our eyes on all departments; and there is perhaps only one minister who does that.

Therefore we are very busy people, and if we cannot keep our eye on everything that happens or on all the bills which come before the house, then perhaps we are subject to censure—but at least there is just as good an excuse for us as the excuse the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) made for himself today.

When the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) spoke on one of these bills—I do not know which one it was; it does not matter, because they both deal with the same subject—he decided for me that I should do some little studying of the bills. I have told the hon. member privately that I think he made the best point that has been made in these debates to date, and I want to say the same now. He drew attention to two or three things which in my opinion are vital. He pointed out something, I do not know whether it is correct, but if it is not we should be told. We should be told in terms that will leave no room for doubt. The hon. member said that no matter how many charters were issued there would be only one pipe line built anyway.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Correct.

Mr. MacInnis: If only one pipe line will be built anyway, what is the sense of issuing charters? What value is a charter going to be to these people if a pipe line is not built? Somebody is going to have to be paid for the money spent in presenting the petition to parliament. Somebody will have to be paid for the cost of all the lobbying that has been done around here during the past several weeks. I should like to know who is paying for those things and how they are going to recoup themselves if they do not ultimately build a pipe line. That is something the sponsors of these bills should tell us. That is something the British Columbia members who have so little regard for the welfare of British Columbia that they vote for these bills should tell us. They should make it quite clear to the house just whom they are supporting in this matter, British Columbia or some pipe line promoters. On the fifteenth of November the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as reported on page 1806 of Hansard:

> As the situation stands today, the incorporators of each of those two bills have a monopoly, so far as gas moving in either direction is concerned.

I have asked if there is to be only one pipe line in each direction and if each company is to have the monopoly. If one company is to have the monopoly then there is only one way in which the interests of the people of Canada can be properly protected and that is by the pipe lines being publicly owned.

This country has been a real paradise for charter promoters. I remember when I first went to the west, around 1908 every politician no matter to which party he belonged would not dare to appeal on a public platform unless he had a railway policy. I had formulated a railway policy of my own. It was based on the fact that the workers built the railways but the only use they had for them after they were built was to walk the ties looking for another job, another railway to build. I found that the ties were not spaced properly for easy walking. My policy was a revolutionary one; it proposed that the ties should be spaced so that one could take three at a time. As ties are spaced the distance between two ties is too short and the distance between three too long. It is easy to see that few people accepted my policy because the people that wanted charters did not walk the ties.

Everyone was getting charters. I go back to an even earlier period, and I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to something which is apropos of the situation with which we are now confronted. I should like to quote from page 1272 of Hansard of June 23, 1887. Mr. Scriver was speaking. The house was discussing the rules respecting private bills which would make it necessary that plans of routes be filed before a charter was granted. Mr. Scriver said:

> My limited experience in the railway committee satisfies me that a great deal of time has been lost through the want of such a bill, and that we have chartered a great many companies when we had no plans presented to satisfy the committee that those projects were anything more than paper projects.

Is there anything in the bill we are now debating to show that it is not merely a paper project? We may be told that if there were two or more companies it would be better for the province of Alberta, that they could make a better deal if there were competitors in the field. Surely that is poor reasoning because Alberta has the gas. That province has the thing that these pipe line owners want and they can hold the gas until the pipe line people pay their price if that is the way they want to do things. It is certainly a poor argument to say that Alberta is going to do better if we issue charters to three, four, five or six companies.

Why stop there? Why not issue as many charters as are asked for? I suppose they would go out selling stock and there may still be a few suckers around with a little money.

An hon. Member: Page the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew).

Mr. MacInnis: I am surprised the Minister of Fisheries has been as silent in this matter as he has been. Perhaps he is a very busy man and I really have no quarrel with the Minister of Fisheries. We should have had our lessons in connection with charters. We allowed railroads to be built all over the country and then when they went bankrupt we had to take them over in the interests of the people of Canada. The people of Canada are still paying for the bungling policies that enabled promoters to fleece the people.

I think the time has arrived when we should use Canada's natural resources to build up the wealth of the country. Canada is being denuded of its minerals, lumber and all other natural resources in order to build up the wealth of the United States. It is time we began to use the natural wealth of Canada for our own benefit. What can be done under the provisions of this bill goes far beyond the building of a pipe line. I do not know whether hon. members have read it, but I should like to refer them to section 6 of the bill, which reads:

> The company, subject to the provisions of any general legislation which is enacted by parliament, relating to pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil or any liquid product or by-product thereof, may (a) within the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia or outside Canada—

How can we issue a charter to build pipe lines, or to do any of the other things that are mentioned in this bill, outside Canada? I do not think that parliament has the right to pass a statute for the building of pipe lines outside Canada. Let me read some of the other things that may be constructed:

> —may (a) within the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia or outside Canada construct, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, and hold, develop, operate, maintain, control, lease, mortgage, create liens upon, sell, convey or otherwise dispose of and turn to account any and all interprovincial and/or international pipe lines, for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil including pumping stations, terminals, storage tanks or reservoirs and all works relative thereto for use in connection with the said pipe lines; and buy, or otherwise acquire, sell, distribute or otherwise dispose of gas; and as an adjunct or correlate to pipe lines for gas to have similar powers and facilities for pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of oil and the acquisition and disposal of oil—

And so on. It is presumed apparently that all these things can be done outside Canada as well as within its boundaries if we issue a charter. I know there are sharp legal minds on the opposite side of the house—and there is no sinister connotation associated in my mind with the word "sharp"—and they should tell the house what authority a charter issued by this parliament has once these people go outside Canada. Has this house any authority whatsoever to do what is suggested? With my very slight knowledge of law, and perhaps a little more knowledge of logic, I am wondering whether we are within our rights at all in dealing with this bill. As has been said so often during the debate, and particularly by members of the house from the province of British Columbia, if it is stipulated in the bill that the needs of Canada will be served before any gas goes out of the country—

Mr. Cruickshank: I am sure the hon. member will allow me to correct him as to one statement. He said that if all members from the province of British Columbia had the assurance of an all-Canadian route it would be satisfactory. I think he will agree with me I am the only member from this side of the house who has agreed with him.

Mr. MacInnis: We have had so little co-operation from that side of the house that I overlooked the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), but I am glad to know where he stands. I knew it before but I overlooked it. If we have the assurance that the needs of Canada will be supplied before any of the gas is exported outside the country, we will immediately withdraw our opposition to the bill. To that end, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones):

That Bill No. 119 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house further consideration of this bill should be deferred until the house has been assured that the route of any pipe line built by the proposed company will be laid out so as to serve Canadian requirements before any such pipe line leaves Canadian soil.

Mr. Church: I wish to speak on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have taken no part in this debate although I am a British Columbia member, but I wish to take part now as a result of the challenge hurled by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) a few moments ago.

Mr. Green: You did not have the floor.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I thought some point of order was being raised by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). I submit that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) who was speaking had the floor and should be permitted to continue to speak.

Mr. Speaker: I saw the hon. member for Coast-Capilano before the hon. member for Broadview started to speak. I did call on the hon. member for Coast-Capilano.

Mr. Sinclair: As I was saying, unlike the C.C.F. members of the house, we do not consider it necessary to speak for forty minutes on every issue before the house. Our votes show the way we feel about these matters, and we are prepared to justify them before our constituents. On the matter of the pipe line bills I, like every other British Columbia member no matter what his party may be, feel that these pipe lines should be constructed through British Columbia if possible, for reasons which have been very ably given by members on this side of the house, members of the official opposition and members of the C.C.F. group. We feel that if these pipe lines are built through British Columbia it will give us a Canadian route, and it will be of great advantage to the province of British Columbia and certainly to the city of Vancouver to have the small interior towns of British Columbia have abundant and cheap industrial fuel. We feel that at this time it is most important in British Columbia to have the labour and employment which will arise as a result of the construction and maintenance of these lines in our province.

We are informed, however, and the information comes only from reading the report of proceedings in the Senate Hansard and in the Senate committee, that the cost of a line through British Columbia, with the market it would supply on that route, is so high that such construction is uneconomical. I say that neither the arguments of the members who are opposing these pipe lines nor of those who are supporting them are sufficient to convince any reasoning man as to the merits of the case. The only place where that can be decided is before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines where expert witnesses, engineers both for and against the pipe lines, can be called and give members of parliament actual and not ipse dixit information. For that reason I, as a British Columbia member who yields to none in devotion to my province, say that I will vote for the bills on second reading if only to get them where they can be properly studied in committee. Unless very sound reasons are given in the committee why construction through B.C. is uneconomic I will vote against the bills on their return to the house.

I say I resent the challenges and slurs flung out by the C.C.F. that just because we do not speak on every issue we are not interested in every issue. Somehow or other the business of the house has to be conducted, and I submit that members' votes in themselves are sufficient indication to most people of where they stand. There is one other point. Last spring in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines I was the one who actually conducted the cross-examination of the representatives of the Westcoast Transmission Company which was then proposing to build an all-Canadian route through British Columbia and got their charter because of this route. I have heard with some dismay that this company, which has been referred to as an all-Canadian company, has now, according to two hon. members of the house, filed an application to build a route through the United States exactly similar to the routes which are now under discussion.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Utter nonsense.

Mr. Sinclair: All I can say is that the statement was made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode), and it has not been contradicted.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I contradict it now. It is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Sinclair: I am glad to hear that, but it does not alter my submission. I want to tell you another thing, Mr. Speaker. My opposition to filibustering does not date only from this session. I remember another session, when members of the opposition were filibustering a public bill I was sponsoring, the one on margarine, and at that time there did not seem to be the same indignation against obstruction. I do not want to be held up as obstructing these bills, so I am going to conclude my remarks; but I say they should get second reading and go to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, if only to give the members of this house and the people of Canada knowledge of the facts rather than the opinions of members of parliament, many of whom obviously have very little knowledge of the engineering problems involved.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I rise to support the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones). The amendment asks that this bill be not now read a second time but that further consideration be deferred until the house has been assured that the route of any pipe line built by the proposed company will be so laid out as to serve Canadian requirements before any such pipe line leaves Canadian soil. In my opinion that is a very good resolution.

The other day in this house we were referring to similar proposals, and the only two hon. members from British Columbia who spoke in favour of those were the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) and the member for one of the Vancouver island seats. That member is a graduate of the university of British Columbia, a very likable young gentleman whom I have known for many years. On the other hand the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has expressed strong objection to giving away the natural resources of this country.

We have seen some of the effects of giving away the vast natural heritage in which the people of Canada have taken such pride in years past. It seems that most of those who have spoken in support of this bill have come from Manitoba and Ontario. Ever since I have been a member of this house this principle has been under discussion. I came here in the early twenties, when we were suffering from severe unemployment following the first war. At that time we experienced some of the results of giving away our natural resources; we saw how it affected trade and commerce and industry. We have become largely an industrial nation; but with the unemployment that followed the first war it became more and more necessary for us to conserve and develop our natural resources for our own benefit. This house has declared itself on several occasions on the question of giving away our great resources, such as our forests, in return for mere trifles. That is one reason why within a short time this country may be suffering from a depression. We are sure to run into one very shortly; that is the opinion expressed in a great many financial textbooks, and many leading economists have also sounded that warning. That is the fate which awaits this country unless it wakes up and develops its natural resources for the benefit of all the people.

After all is said and done, who own these natural resources? They were given by Providence for the development of this country. We have great admiration and respect for our neighbour to the south, which has been very friendly and has done a great deal for us in many ways. Still they are our competitors in trade and commerce, in industry and all along the line. Ours is a greatly coveted land, standing right in the gateway between what is called the east and the west. Today we are the centre of the empire and in fact of the entire world. This country is greatly envied by the dictators. They know the natural wealth we have. It is only necessary to read Parkman's history to realize something of the value of those resources. In both an economic way and in an industrial way Parkman has been very kind to the people of this country. He is not only a great historian of the development of Canada; he is an economist first, last and all the time.

When I first came here as a private member of the house we enjoyed certain rights, functions and privileges. Are we to lose all those now? I do not wish to reflect upon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); far from it, because I have been a great admirer of his for many years past. I imagine I have known him as long as any member of the House of Commons, and he is very much respected in our city. Only last year or the year before I suggested to the exhibition directors that they invite him to see something of what is being done there, and I think it was the year before last he was asked to open the winter fair. As it happens I designed that building and opposed the proposal once made that this great fair be moved to Hamilton. As a matter of fact the directors of the exhibition took the position that they did not want the winter fair to compete with the summer fair, and it was decided to move the winter fair to Hamilton.

I am glad that did not happen for the reason I gave, because it is a great asset to the city. Those hon. members who went to that exhibition this week saw something surprising. That is to be continued by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—he may have turned it over now to the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Winters)—in what is known as the great world's national trade fair to be held there next May. That announcement has been made accordingly with regard to the development of that great trade fair which is going to revolutionize the whole world. Exhibits are going to be shown at that trade exhibition next year in 1950. I have the book about it and the notice which is in all the magazines. It is at the back of one of the books which come in to us monthly from the Department of Trade and Commerce, and which has a map on the back of it. It shows the name of that great trade exhibition, with exhibits from all over the world, including the natural resources of Canada. I wish I had the book with me tonight. I just left the last copy in my office a moment ago. But it refers to that great trade exhibition which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has mentioned to the house on several occasions. He has referred to it at some length in the book which he has had published recently.

I now wish to say a few words with regard to this particular Bill No. 119 which is being considered tonight. It deals with many phases of this proposal. It will be noticed that the amendment which has been moved asks that the pipe line to be built by the proposed company be laid out to serve Canadian requirements before any such pipe line leaves Canadian soil. That policy has been a well established one for many years past, and it is a blessing we have had it in this country. It has meant a great deal to our people. At the present time we are a greatly coveted land, so much so that many people want to come out here, even many who know something about what the Indians and Eskimos did away up in the northern part of our country. Explorers went up there among the Indians and Eskimos. They were the pioneers in discovering the great mineral wealth which lies away back in the northern part of Canada, frozen up as it were, and they have shown us how to develop that country. There were Frobisher, Hudson, Fulton, Mackenzie and Fraser. These men made discoveries in this great northland. In the travels they made and the suffering they endured in the depth of winter, in temperatures of 60 degrees and 70 degrees below zero away up in that northland when they were the pioneers, they proved to the people of Canada and to the world the value of this land, and did much to develop that part of the country. I say therefore that we should be careful in giving away the heritage which these men discovered. The matter has been referred to extensively on all sides of the house and by some of the clergy, especially by the clergy of one great church. I have reference to one of the Church of England pastors up there who went as a humble missionary to the Indians and Eskimos, the present Right Rev. Bishop Renison. Every Wednesday on the editorial page of the Globe and Mail have appeared glorious articles which he has written about the northland up there, and he has been assisted largely by some of the clergy of another great church, one of the fine Christian churches up there; I refer to the Roman Catholic church. By what they have done through their bishops and their clergy, they have developed that north country as well. Two years ago they appeared before our committee in the House of Commons which was considering the north country and the lands up there. We had several of them before us at that time, including Cardinal McGuigan, Archbishop Vachon and some others, who showed what could be done in that northland to develop the natural resources of that great country. Many of the great discoverers never realized the blessing they were conferring and what they were doing for the humble generations of workers and for trade and industry in this country when they made their great discoveries, nor did they realize the great development that would take place of the mineral wealth which the country had up there.

A country does not belong to those who inhabit it today. It is an inheritance from the past. It is just a possession for the present. It is a trust for the future. That is what I say about these natural resources. They are trusts for the future. This generation has no right to give them away in the haphazard manner in which we are doing it at the present time. I believe that is a correct doctrine. We know the blessing of employment at the present time; but we know that our own trades and industries will require this work in the future if we should run into a depression. So I say that we should be assured first that the pipe line, before it leaves Canadian soil, is going to be required to be built by this pipe line company in the manner indicated. It will be noted that, to the motion for second reading of the bill, an amendment has been moved. It was dealt with recently in connection with forest development. I was referring in another debate to the export of power, where a former president of the United States, who died after the first war, referred to this matter. President Theodore Roosevelt said:

> The people of our country are threatened by a monopoly more powerful than has ever been seen, as it affects very closely their domestic and industrial life. Our next generation will witness a shortage of those natural resources, petroleum and gas. The price of coal will be such that hydraulic power—

He dealt with that, but I cannot refer to it here. He is referring to the erection of a steam plant and all that kind of thing. He then went on to say:

> The major portion of these powers is not developed and remains the national property. It would be madness to part, without conditions, with one of our greatest resources. If we become guilty of this crime, our children will be bound to pay an annual royalty on a capitalization fixed at the highest price that the trade will stand for. They will see themselves struggling with powerful sweaters entrenched behind the doctrine of discharged rights strengthened by all means of protection that money can buy and the cunning of corporations defended by legal men. These ogres of finance will have succeeded long before then to monopolize those resources so as to be able to dictate to the people the management of their affairs and their ways of existence. Public opinion will be their least worry.

That is the reference he made to it. The late Theodore Roosevelt was a great statesman of that time.

I remember when he came to our city and addressed a meeting in the armouries before the first war closed in 1918. He came and addressed a magnificent meeting there. Colonel Denison, the police magistrate, who had been the defender of the natural resources of the country, introduced him. The late Colonel Denison won the Czar of Russia's prize in 1878 for Canada. He was a great statesman as well. He believed that we should conserve the natural resources of the people of this country for the people of the country. We have no right to part with them or to give them away in the manner indicated.

I do not wish to be unfair. There are other hon. members who would like to speak on this bill. I cannot refer to the text of the bill on second reading, and I do not intend to. I just wish to say this about the pipe line companies. They were placed under the control of the board of transport commissioners. They were given wide powers under the general Pipe Lines Act. I noticed that this bill was taken out of the general act. They will no doubt have to get a permit from the province of Alberta, an export permit I believe it is called. I think that is the phrase used in the statute. I have the statute here but I shall not read it.

The Alberta act requires the permit to be taken out by the company before the gas can leave Alberta. When it does go through Alberta it heads for the Pacific coast. The amendment will provide for that. But before it leaves Canadian soil the pipe line must meet certain requirements laid down in the proposed amendment to the bill. So far as I can see that is a very wise proviso.

We used to be called a nation of property owners. Years ago we were a nation of property owners. Everybody owned some property. It may have been a small mill, a little grocery store, or a small wagon. It may have been a little factory, but we were all property owners. We have been slow to see how we have become a nation not of property owners but of people who do not own a foot of property. In the city from which I come we were looked upon as a nation of property owners. Nearly 75 per cent of the people in that city owned their own homes. Now, everything has been given away. We do not own anything. I doubt whether anybody wants to own anything, because sooner or later taxes of all kinds will take it away. High rents, high railway fares now, nothing for Christmas, everything is going sky high. Departments are multiplying. With the parliamentary assistants, we have pretty nearly a hundred now. I propose that we call a halt to it.

I doubt whether people can buy property. I doubt whether there is any money in the country left to buy property. What I object to in this particular bill is that it is taken out of the general Pipe Lines Act. Without the authority of the committee, or without the authority of anybody, it is taken out of the general Pipe Lines Act which this house placed under the control of the board of transport commissioners. They were given the right to decide it. Now, who is going to decide it? Without consulting the board of transport commissioners they wiped it out with one stroke accordingly. I object to the way in which we are dealing with this matter. I object to the way in which we are giving away the natural resources of the country.

The bill is also faulty in many other ways. This matter was dealt with the other day by two of my colleagues from Calgary. They had something to say about the development of this work. They raised certain objections to it. I have referred to our forests, our lumber interests and many other great interests and have said what it would mean to trade. I referred to the power development and I said that tens of millions of kilowatt hours of power were exported to help industry in the United States. I have no objection. We are competitors for trade, and no doubt it was done by agreement. But I do object when it interferes with trade and industry in this country. It would provide a great deal of employment for our people. We may run into dislocation of business in a few years, and power developments such as these, where millions and millions of kilowatt hours are given away, would be a great help. We are all competitors for trade on the continent of America. There is no doubt about that at all. Therefore I say I am for a policy of Canada for Canadians. I am for a policy to build up our own trade, to build up our own country, to develop this country first, last and all the time before we develop another man's country, especially when we are competitors for the trade of the world. We are living on export trade. That is where we are making our living. Ships are now tied up because they cannot get cargoes. It reminds me of the close of the first great war. In Great Britain for taxes you could buy a man-of-war. I held up pages of the old Post of London, England, which contained a map. One night in the House of Commons when I was sitting over in the seat in which my colleague from Calgary city now sits, I held up pictures of ships which had been sold for taxes. Shipping is now tied up. How are we going to develop the trade and natural resources of this country if we have not shipping? It is the same on the Pacific. Ships are remaining idle because there is no trade for them.

It is the same with the export of power. I have no objection if it is exported on contract or by agreement; far from it. Hundreds of millions of kilowatt hours are given away to develop our competitors' industry across the border. I do object to that. I want to see us have a policy of Canada for Canadians first, last and all the time, not the policy that has been proposed in this house for many years past. Parliament used to deal with public matters; it used to deal with private bills. I say that the rights of private members are being challenged, because this bill should go to the private bills committee. This is not a bill which should go to the committee on banking and commerce, at all.

We used to have a committee on industrial relations. I was a member of it years ago, when the former member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Woodsworth, sat in the house. I came to the house the same day he did—and may I say he was a very fine gentleman. I think his wife lives in my constituency at the present time. They were a fine family, all the way through. I knew the late gentleman very well. I attended Parkdale collegiate, and I think he used to attend. They were from Dixie, Ontario, the place where Tommy Kennedy comes from. That is the Hon. Thomas Kennedy, formerly premier of Ontario. He attended Parkdale collegiate, too. He was a colleague of my hon. friend the present leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew).

I believe in a policy of developing our own industries ourselves for the people of Canada. We ought not to depart from that policy or give it away to our competitors in the manner indicated here. It is my view that this bill should have been considered by the committee on private bills, and that is one of my chief reasons for opposing it. I do say that in these dying days of the session I object to any challenge to the rights and functions and privileges which as private members we used to have, when we first entered the House of Commons.

Do not forget this, that the private member is the connecting link and the only connecting link, between the government and the electors. When he ceases, the functions of parliamentary government are at an end. That is what happens—it is the end. When we are asked to vote away our resources in this way, we are voting to hamstring parliament.

The other day I met an old friend from Fort William (Mr. McIvor) on the elevator in this building and was complimenting him upon his effort in the house, when he had objected to someone suggesting that he was only a rubber stamp. I said he showed spirit which would have served him well in a boxing bout, and I nominated the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who is known as a sport, to act as judge. I thought he would look after our beloved clergyman over there, in that corner, with our men over here in this corner, and the hon. member for Calgary West would be the judge. Perhaps I should not say much more about the hon. member for Fort William, because he is not in his seat tonight. I do say about him however that he is a fine sportsman, and I have known him a long time.

Let me say in conclusion that this bill should have been considered by the committee on private bills. We used to have some rights and privileges in parliament, when I first came here. I doubt very much that anyone now seeks the privilege of becoming a member. What is the use, I ask? We are just wasting our time. We have no power; our functions, rights and privileges have been taken away from us. We are losing our rights; we are losing employment; we are losing industry; we are losing trade and commerce; we are attempting to develop somebody else's property at the expense of the Canadian people.

For those reasons I object to this proposal to hand over our rights, functions and privileges to somebody else. And I will say this to the private members, that many of them come from municipalities. I am glad to see them here. Those men who contest municipal elections are closer to the people than are members of the federal government.

A rule was placed on the Ontario statute books whereby no franchise could be given away in any municipality of Ontario without first having a vote of the people. That was a good and sensible proviso. I doubt if we would ever have owned our own street car systems, or our power and hydro electric developments if that had not been the law of the land in Ontario. Had it not been we would not own the Toronto transportation commission, and would not have any street cars to travel to that magnificent winter fair. In Ontario we do not hand out franchises in a haphazard way.

There is no control over these pipe line routes. I call it a pipe dream act, and that is what it is—just a pipe dream act. It hands out other people's property—and to whom? It hands it out to every Tom, Dick and Harry who wants to have it. Definitely that it not the law in Ontario, where a franchise must first be voted on by the ratepayers in their municipalities. None of the members coming from Ontario could take part in giving away a franchise without first having the vote of the people at municipal elections.

It is the people who own the property and give it away; that is the law in Canada. What law have we? What power have we in the House of Commons to hand over property which I say should belong to the people? After all is said and done, the country does not belong to the House of Commons. It is an inheritance of the past and a possession for the present. It is a trust for the future, and we have no right to hand it away. As President Roosevelt said, we have no right to hand out property to those who come along and ask for it or grab it—and then make a lot of wealth out of it in the way it is proposed to do in these pipe line bills.

We should be very careful before giving away our natural resources in any haphazard manner. Hon. members would not give their own property away in that manner. If they would not do that, then why as members of the House of Commons, with business capacity—and many hon. members, if not all of them, have such capacity—should they give away natural resources?

I remember on one occasion when the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) was standing in the company of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and myself in front of the Sir John A. Macdonald monument. Mr. Boucher, who used to represent the constituency of Carleton, was also there. The hon. member for Temiscouata asked if we saw anything wrong with the monument. I did not—because I am shortsighted, anyway. Then he said, "Look at his glasses; he has a pair of glasses in his right hand". I asked why and the member for Temiscouata said some people said Sir John was shortsighted and I said no, what Sir John was probably looking for was an honest man in the parliament buildings. I said that so far as I knew, they were all honest men in there. He said he was very much amused. After listening to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I began to think that he would have made his fortune as a comedian. There is a great element of truth in what was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier that we have no right to give away the natural heritages of this country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had an east and west and overseas policy in connection with our natural resources, to develop our own country, first, last and always.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. When I spoke a few moments ago the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) challenged the statement I made that the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited which was incorporated last year intended to follow the same route proposed to be followed by the company now seeking incorporation. I have in my hand a copy of the application made by the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to the Board of Transport Commissioners of Canada on May 11, 1949, setting out a new route identical with the one requested by the present bill, that is, through the United States.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) was good enough to see me in the interval and I assured him that if I was wrong in my statement I would take the first public opportunity to apologize to him and to the house. I suggest to him that I still think that he was wrong and I would like an opportunity of looking into it.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have not taken part in this debate although I have felt like doing so many times. Every evening when this matter came up I thought that we would have a vote, but on each occasion someone would talk out the bill and prevent it from being sent to the committee where it would get the study it deserves. I have noticed there are very few hon. members who have spoken who seem to know very much about this.

Mr. Green: It was studied in the Senate.

Mr. Sinclair: We are not guided by the Senate; this is the House of Commons. The hon. member would like to go over there.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I shall apologize only once to the hon. member so I ask him to be careful.

Mr. Mayhew: In talking out this bill hon. members are doing—

An hon. Member: What are you doing?

Mr. Mayhew: What am I doing? One hon. member spoke for over forty minutes and no one called him to order. I am not going to talk it out. I simply want an opportunity to say what I have to say. In talking out these bills hon. members are bringing about one of two results. We are either going to have one company operating a pipe line in Canada under a monopoly or we are going to have no pipe line at all. You can take your choice between the two. In my opinion hon. members who have been following the tactics that have been started are simply obstructing the development of oil in Alberta.

Mr. Drew: This is gas.

Mr. Mayhew: And the getting of that gas to British Columbia. I have great respect for the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) but the other evening he said that we should remember that there is going to be only one pipe line. Then he went on to say that this pipe line should be built on Canadian soil. I think he should be asked to give us his authority for making such a definite statement to the house.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is only market enough for what can be carried by one pipe line. If the minister will read my speech he will find that statement in it.

Mr. Mayhew: There is a great difference of opinion as to where the market is, and that is the reason why I wanted to speak tonight. Several other statements were made by the hon. member for Calgary West and I think he should read his own speech over again. As I say, he said that there was room only for one pipe line from Alberta to British Columbia. A statement such as that shows an entire lack of the size and importance of British Columbia.

That province can be developed if we get the necessary gas, but it will take more than one pipe line to carry that necessary gas. The hon. member said that it would require from 1,500 to 2,000 gas wells to supply the gas. On what size well does he base that statement? Two wells came in recently in British Columbia, one producing about 20,000 cubic feet and another 500,000 cubic feet. Which well would he take as his measurement?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How much do you take out of a well? You cannot take all of it out. I have consulted more engineers about this than the minister ever knew.

Mr. Mayhew: I maintain that it will take more than one pipe line to take care of the needs of British Columbia. Nature has provided routes for two pipe lines from Alberta to British Columbia, one through the Yellowhead pass and the other through the Crowsnest pass. Gas is to be found at the gateways to both of those passes. A great volume of gas is available in the Leduc field and the northern area of Alberta, with some in British Columbia. This could be carried by a pipe line into British Columbia following the route taken by the Canadian National Railways and the Great Northern railway.

Then at the mouth of the Crowsnest pass is the Pincher Creek field which could provide a tremendous supply of gas. The pipe line from there should in my opinion go through the Crowsnest pass to Frank, through Coleman, Fernie, then into Cranbrook and Kimberley, and then down the west side of the interior in order to develop that whole area. Anyone who knows anything about British Columbia knows that it is a province of mountains and valleys. It would be utterly impossible to put a pipe line through in just one direction. In my opinion the proper way is to go south and then north into the Kootenay and Okanagan valleys, the line to go from the south to the north. Then on the other side the proper route to follow would be from the north to the south, having the two meet.

We need all the gas that we can get. However, it should be remembered that the gas belongs to Alberta, although we might question that as the gas was there before the boundary line between British Columbia and Alberta was decided upon. But they are handling it well and are doing a good job of looking after it.

I am sure that when there is a supply sufficient to take care of our needs we shall get it, but we should get it through more than one line. What you are doing tonight is saying that we are going to have a monopoly or we are going to have no gas. I say to you: Let the bill be voted on and go to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines where we can secure the evidence of experts as to what should be done.

Let me tell you this fact about the export of gas and oil. Do not let us forget that today there is a pipe line running from the United States into Montreal and supplying Canada with oil.

Mr. Harkness: That is oil.

Mr. Mayhew: That is oil. You were talking about oil also in this debate.

Mr. Harkness: I was talking about gas.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They are talking about pipe lines.

Mr. Mayhew: They are talking about pipe lines. Gas comes into the Windsor district to take the place of the supply they used to get from the wells in the Chatham area.

Mr. Drew: Where they ran out of it.

Mr. Mayhew: As Canadians we should be supplied first with the gas we need and then, just the same as with anything else, we should export our surplus. If we have a surplus of gas and oil then I say we have every right to export it unless we want to build a fence around ourselves and become isolated from everybody else. That is not the kind of world in which we are living today. I do not think anybody in the house can accuse me of wanting to sell our heritage for a mess of pottage. There are very few in this chamber who have spent more of their time and energy on trying to develop this country than I have. I should like to tell the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) that, when the first oil field was drilled in the province of Alberta, when people thought it was a wild gamble and there was no oil in the Turner valley, some of my money was invested in that project taking a long chance.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West: Tell them that for twenty-six years I lived in the house you built, if you want to get close to me.

Mr. Mayhew: I have had a pretty long association with this matter. I have never made any money out of it, but I have had the satisfaction at least of helping in its development. I do not want to take any more time because I see it is a quarter to eleven, but I hope that we can have a vote tonight so that the bill may go to the committee.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, everybody is quite prepared to have a vote tonight as soon as he himself is finished talking. I have not occupied any of the time of the house on this bill, and I would not be occupying it now if it were not for the fact that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) provoked me into rising at this time. He accused members of the C.C.F. group of talking for forty minutes on every matter that comes up in the house. As I have just pointed out, I have not had anything to say about these measures so far.

Mr. Sinclair: You are now.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Coast-Capilano is responsible for provoking me into entering this debate. I had something to do with the five bills that were passed by the house during the last session, and I think it is immaterial what you say about the rest of these bills in the light of what we did in April of this year. On the 27th of the month the other place handled these five measures and sent them over here. We discussed and gave second reading to them on the evening of the 29th of April without having any information as to who was sponsoring the bills or where the pipe lines were going.

The hon. member for Coast-Capilano stated a few minutes ago that these bills went before a standing committee before they received third reading, and that there was a thorough investigation of them. I want to recall to hon. members who were here just before the house was dissolved at that time that we gave second reading to them on the evening of the 29th and they received third reading on the morning of the 30th, the day the house was dissolved. There was not very much discussion on those measures during that brief interval.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) has just advanced an excellent argument in favour of the amendment. He said that these pipe lines should follow a Canadian route, that Canadian needs should be supplied first, and then we should export our surplus. That is exactly what the amendment says. If those sponsoring these bills can tell the house that they are prepared to carry out the views expressed by the Minister of Fisheries then any objection we may have will be withdrawn.

I rose to point out one thing because nobody else has done so. I do not like to repeat arguments that someone else has made. On April 27, 1949, the other place passed on this problem to us. What I do not like about the business in the first place is that it is back door legislation. It is initiated in the wrong place. If you will recall at that time these bills were introduced, and Bill B8 of the other place, which was Bill 238 of this house, was the master bill. It provided for a capitalization of some $200 million, and for the sale of four million shares at $50 per share. That was the key bill; that was the financial bill. That is the company that is going to own and control whatever auxiliaries are set up afterwards. The other four bills that were passed with this joker did not provide for any capital at all. They were merely stock promotion bills. For example, Bill 240, letter D of the other place, provided for no capital but they are going to sell five million shares, and no par value is stated and no nominal sum per share. The company with the capital will get the smaller companies to front for them, and in the final analysis it will buy the shares of the subsidiary companies. The directors mentioned in the bill providing for $200 million capital will own and control these subsidiary companies by buying up their shares.

That is not new. I presume the hon. member for Coast-Capilano has read Myers' "History of Canadian Wealth". Anyone who has read that book knows that this is the usual front for practically every stock promotion scheme that the country has seen. I do not like to see us not being smarter than that in 1949. Surely we should develop new and better mechanics of fooling the people. So far as I am concerned, I am quite prepared to form as many of these companies as possible because, as the Minister of Fisheries pointed out, in the final analysis Alberta has the right to license any company that may be exporting gas or oil from that province. The more legitimate companies the province of Alberta has coming to it for licences, companies with the necessary capital and facilities to export gas or oil, the better it is for the province. Alberta will be able to differentiate between a company following a United States route and a company following an all-Canadian route. The final say is in the hands of the government of Alberta as to what companies will get that product for export.

Mind you, this bill is exactly the same as the other four I mentioned, which were put through in April of this year. There is no capital; the stock has no par value. They are going to sell a million dollars' worth of shares, but they do not say how much a share will cost. There is nothing like that in the bill. Bill No. 238 of last session was the master bill that takes over these other companies when they are formed, lock, stock and barrel.

I wanted to point that out, because all over this country the history has been the same. Railways were mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). Since this session opened we have seen the government of Canada taking steps to buy up the Temiscouata railway, and to extend another railway in western Canada. This parliament granted franchises to companies that did not have the capital necessary to develop and expand these railways, and after years of inefficiency, after dragging along on a shoe string, performing practically no service, the government has to spend a lot of money to take them over and develop them.

If we are going to do anything along this line the only franchise that should have been granted was the first one, to the company with the capital necessary to go ahead with the project and service the Canadian people. The sentiments expressed by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) would have been more to the point if this company had intended to follow an all-Canadian route. I believe we should export our surpluses, and should not have to depend upon the United States to give us back what they do not need. If this line follows the suggested route there is no doubt the main valve will be in the United States, and we will just get what they do not want. I do not want to talk out these bills, but just to refresh the memory of the Minister of Fisheries, who made an excellent speech for an all-Canadian route, I should like to read the amendment again, because I want to see him vote for it:

That Bill No. 119 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house further consideration of this bill should be deferred until the house has been assured that the route of any pipe line built by the proposed company will be laid out so as to serve Canadian requirements before any such pipe line leaves Canadian soil.

That is all I intend to say, in order that we may have a vote on this immediately.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to have a vote on this immediately. That is the first time I have been able to speak in this house with authority as to what the house is going to do. I intend to discuss first something which I hope may clarify the legal position though some people may say that my remarks will further confuse it. We have all been proceeding on the assumption that the province of Alberta has authority to forbid this gas going from that province. We have taken our cue in that regard from a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); that, in short, was exactly what he said. I am a humble member of my profession, Mr. Speaker, and I have a great deal of timidity in submitting an opinion which may be in any way contrary to that expressed by this eminent lawyer who is our Prime Minister; but in my view that is an incorrect statement of the legal position. I put it on this broad ground; so that everyone may understand, I ask this simple question. Since when did any province of Canada have authority over interprovincial trade? The answer is never. So while the province of Alberta, no doubt with their tongue in their cheek, passed an act dealing with this very matter, I think they know very well that they passed legislation which is quite beyond their jurisdiction.

I give this simple illustration, which is familiar to all. During and after the war there was much discussion in this house about the shipment of cattle from Canada to the United States. Those of us who were here in the last parliament will remember those discussions. Such shipments were then embargoed; but they were not embargoed by the provinces in which the cattle were raised. The embargo was put on by the dominion government under emergency powers this government possessed by virtue of the War Measures Act. But the point remains, and I am sure I am correct in my statement, that the province of Alberta has not the right to say whether or not gas shall be exported from this country. In my judgment that is a matter solely for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who has taken authority—and when I say that I mean he has been given authority by this parliament—to say whether or not these things may be exported from this country. It is my humble opinion that he and only he, not the province of Alberta, may deal with exports from that province or from the dominion.

It being eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow, which is a short day, we shall continue with the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act. Being an optimist I think I can announce that after that we shall take up Nos. 64 and 65, which are two Department of Justice bills. If we have time we will take up Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
