THE SENATE

Thursday, January 4, 1973

OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF TWENTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT

Parliament having been summoned by Proclamation to meet this day for the dispatch of business:

The Senate met at 9.45 a.m.

SPEAKER OF THE SENATE

READING OF COMMISSION APPOINTING HONOURABLE MURIEL McQUEEN FERGUSSON

Hon. Muriel McQueen Fergusson, having taken the Clerk's chair, rose and said: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a Commission under the Great Seal has been issued appointing me Speaker of the Senate.

The said Commission was then read by the Clerk.

The Hon. the Speaker then took the Chair at the foot of the Throne, to which she was conducted by Hon. Paul Martin, P.C., and Hon. Jacques Flynn, P.C., the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod preceding.

Prayers.

COMMUNICATION FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

OTTAWA

January 4, 1973

Madam,

I am commanded to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to open the First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament of Canada on this day, Thursday, the 4th of January, 1973, at 10.30 a.m.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau,
Brigadier General.

Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

25862—1

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Hon. Martial Asselin, P.C.

Hon. Arthur Laing, P.C.

Joan Neiman

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and were seated:

Hon. Martial Asselin, P.C., of La Malbaie, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Jacques Flynn, P.C., and Hon. Josie D. Quart.

Hon. Arthur Laing, P.C., of the City of Vancouver, British Columbia, introduced between Hon. Paul Martin, P.C., and Hon. John Nichol.

Hon. Joan Neiman, of the Township of Caledon, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Paul Martin, P.C., and Hon. Richard J. Stanbury.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that each of the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

At 10.15 a.m. the Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1000)

At 10.30 a.m. the sitting was resumed, and was then adjourned, pending the arrival of the Right Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General.

Right Honourable Gerald Fauteux, P.C., Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated,

The Hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is the desire of the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

Who being come,

The Hon. the Speaker said:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen, according to law; but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock, His Excellency will declare the causes of his calling Parliament.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

COMMUNICATION FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

4 January 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the Main Entrance of the Parliament Buildings at 3.00 p.m. on this day, Thursday the 4th January, 1973, and when it has been signified that all is in readiness, will proceed to the Chamber of the Senate to open formally the First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler

Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Hon. John James Greene, P.C.

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk and were seated:

Hon. John James Greene, P.C., of Niagara Falls, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Paul Martin, P.C., and Hon. F. W. Rowe.

Hon. Joseph Julien Jean-Pierre Côté, P.C., of the City of Longueuil, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Paul Martin, P.C., and Hon. Maurice Bourget, P.C.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that each of the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE LESTER B. PEARSON

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I rise in the Senate to pay my tribute to the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Lester Bowles Pearson, who died Wednesday last, December 27, and whose remains were taken from these Parliament Buildings Sunday, December 31, for burial in the Gatineau hills.

He was known, and will always be known to all of us, I believe, as Mike Pearson. May I say that I had a long association with him. I knew him first as a lecturer in history at the University of Toronto, when I was a student there. I knew him as an official of promise in the Department of External Affairs; as a colleague in the governments of Mackenzie King and Louis St. Laurent and in that over which he himself so ably presided; as Secretary of State for External Affairs, when I was privileged to lead Canada's delegation to the United Nations during the late forties and early fifties; as the man who became decisively Leader of the Liberal Party in 1958; as Leader in Opposition and in Government, when I was his House of Commons seatmate and foreign minister; and as a friend during the last five years, when he was released from the heavy burdens of office.

He led as varied a life out of office as he had in politics and in diplomacy. In retirement he devoted his time to the things that mattered most to him—that is, his commitment to international co-operation and the importance of collective action as the solution to the problems of the world community.

This concern he expressed in a variety of ways. He expressed it as Chairman of the World Bank's Commission on International Aid and Development. Mr. Edward Heath, the British Prime Minister, when he was here on Sunday last attending the funeral, said it was Pearson's genius that guided his colleagues to make so important a report. He expressed it as Chairman of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, where he worked in such fields as arms limitation, force reductions in Europe, and relations with China, as well as the problems of the world in general. He expressed it as Chairman of the International Development Research Centre, which, as Leader of the Government, he helped to establish, and through which he helped to fashion Canada's activities in the developing world, and to develop a Canadian expertise, and the expertise of other countries, in helping others with their problems scientifically. But perhaps most important, honourable senators, he found himself universally accepted as a man of wisdom. He was the friend of many statesmen; a valued adviser.

There are not many of his stature who can take a true measure of the relative importance of contemporary problems, or who can assess the proper role of the individual human being in society. His self-effacement, gaiety, humanity—these were the elements of his character which enabled him to do so much good with such apparent ease.

On the domestic front Mike Pearson was determined to accomplish as much as he had accomplished in diplomacy. As Prime Minister, his qualities enabled him to weather trying times and to pilot the ship of state without serious mishap. His Prime Ministership was served in an exceedingly difficult period. The circumstances in Parliament and in the country, perhaps understandably, were often hostile to the performance of great acts of domestic statesmanship. It was not like the halcyon days of the fifties when Mike Pearson's talents received full rein in an international climate which was favourable to the exercise of his genius. The domestic problems of the sixties were such that as Prime Minister he had to strive with courage and, as those of us in this chamber who were with him know, with great determination in directing our affairs.

And yet, as the years pass, it is more apparent that he achieved great things—accomplishments which were all the more remarkable given the adverse circumstances under which he laboured. The Canada Pension Plan, his work to maintain national unity, and his flag were milestones in our history. As the years go by I am sure the importance of these steps will be appreciated more and more.

Mike Pearson's reading of our problems of national unity came at a time when there was need for the greatest understanding. The B and B policy, the B and B Commission, the flag—all were sensible measures, and yet they were difficult to achieve and they took courage, as we all recognize wherever we sit. The flag would never have been adopted but for his determination, almost his sole determination, and courage during one of the longest debates in the Commons' history.

He served Canada as Prime Minister at a crucial time in our history. He was frequently and bitterly criticized, as men in the avocation that we have chosen must expect to be. But his diplomatic sense, which so many had praised in the foreign minister and often damned in the Prime Minister, served him and his country well. He had practised diplomacy as the art of compromise, and he appreciated the value of that experience in carrying out his duties as Prime Minister.

History has yet to make a final judgment on Lester Pearson, the Prime Minister. But I am confident that the bench of that most exacting court will rule in his favour. Elsewhere, however, Mike Pearson, the diplomatist, ambassador, Under-Secretary and Secretary of State for External Affairs, already has been judged by history, and history has awarded its laurels.

His life was devoted to the search for international co-operation and collective ways of seeking the resolution of international problems. And here is to be found, I believe, what could be his greatest achievement.

From 1930 on he advocated his belief in the obligation of Canada as a sovereign state to act on its commitment to collective security. This was inherent, he argued, in the signature we affixed to the Covenant of the League of Nations.

He was a senior adviser at the founding Conference of the United Nations in San Francisco in 1945 at which the Charter of the world organization was signed. Mike never lost faith, as I well know, in the capacity of the UN to provide for an effective application of collective security in due time.

His close association with NATO, as necessary in the interim, was but an alternate expression of this same deep-seated belief. He has written about these matters in the first volume of his memoirs which appeared only recently.

He had been disillusioned with the failure of Canadian governments in the twenties and thirties to give effect to the covenant of the League. Canada had been sought out as an original member of the League of Nations and he felt, rightly or wrongly, that we were not honouring our commitment. He resisted the reluctance of successive governments before the Second World War to accept responsibilities or share them with others in the League.

His commitment to collective ways of resolving conflict dominated his support for the work of the UN, as did his work in establishing the United Nations Works and Rehabilitation Agency, one of the great monuments and efforts of human beings in the field of international charity, and the Food and Agriculture Organization.

No wonder that at two different periods only the veto of one nation prevented his becoming Secretary-General of the United Nations. How well he would have filled that exacting post!

His unremitting zeal was highlighted in his work for peace around the world, his belief in NATO, his unswerving support for the Canadian position in 1955 which broke the five-year deadlock over the admission of new members to the UN and, above all, his role in resolving the Suez crisis and establishing the Emergency Force in the Middle East, which was to earn him, so deservedly, the Nobel Foundation's Peace Prize. It is fitting, perhaps, to recall at this time that Mike's honours also included First World War military service medals, the Order of Canada, and the rarely conferred Order of Merit, which was conferred on him about a year ago by Her Majesty the Queen personally.

Mike Pearson personified Canada's commitment to uphold the integrity of the international system. His idealism in this regard seemed to promote Canada's interests and those of the world community.

I fully share his commitment. His passing must not be seen as the end of our national involvement in the pursuit of this obligation.

Mike Pearson's life stands as a memorial, not only to him but to Canada. His memorial is his life, and I believe that his productive contributions to the cause of peace and to humanity must serve his country as we continue to emulate his endeavours now that he is no more. His commitment must continue to be the commitment, the continuing commitment, of Canada. That is what he wished above all else, as he told me on the night of December 12, when I saw him last. Let us not disappoint him.

• (1020)

As I close what I have to say, I am reminded of the words of the Paulist Father, John Burke, at another time of national mourning in Canada, and I make his words my own:

> Bear him away gently, oh so gently. He is our loved one; the nation's beloved. When you have arrived at the grave lay him down tenderly, for the sod seldom covered a nobler heart than that of Mike Pearson.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, above all else, Mike Pearson was a genuinely fine and likeable human being. He was humble, humorous, and, even while Prime Minister, easily accessible.

Clever, erudite, and perspicacious—this he was, but also tough and resilient. In short, he was a formidable opponent.

The true realist, he once pointed out, is the man who sees things both as they are and as they could be. This generous and compassionate man was himself a true realist—an optimist, with the mind of a pragmatist and the soul of an idealist.

He saw problems in perspective. His was not a jaundiced view; it was not narrowed by ideological blinkers.

[Translation]

Mike Pearson was a man of good will. He had warmth, serenity and sophistication, and he was a good listener.

His whole life was dedicated to the promotion of peace and understanding—understanding between countries, between nations, between the various groups which make up the population of Canada. He was essentially a man of negotiations and honourable compromise.

[English]

He gave Canada a flag, an Economic Council, a Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, and an auto pact with the United States. He unified the armed forces, and made a major breakthrough on the division of tax funds between federal and provincial governments. These are but a few of his many significant accomplishments.

He was an architect and an enduring champion of NATO, but he was perpetually distressed by what he saw as its tendency to act solely as a military alliance. He would have much preferred to see it devote more attention to social and cultural objectives.

He was a member of the Canadian delegation to the founding conference of the United Nations in 1945, and he served a term as its General Assembly President in 1952-53. His love for the United Nations fitted in well with his philosophy, which strictly distinguished between nationalism and sovereignty, between nation and state. As he saw it, world peace depended on world federation.

His internationalism also made itself manifest after he had concluded his public career in Canada and worked for the World Bank. For the bank he prepared a report on foreign aid to the developing world. That report has been authoritative ever since. Its goals, though they have not yet been achieved, have been accepted by the developed world.

As he saw it, there could be no peace, no security, as long as only a few rich countries had access to the benefits of science and technology. The large majority of the world's population live in deprivation and want. This situation, he pointed out, must ultimately lead to large-scale disaster.

Mike Pearson met the obstacles and removed them as best he knew how. He used discretion, compromise, and gentle persuasion. His style was his own, and although it was not always appreciated by others, it can be said in its defence that it produced results.

Though he was learned, he was no thin-skinned intellectual. He was no tragic hero suffering for the sake of certain pet ideas, struggling to overcome the inevitable inconsistencies of life. He was just plain old Mike, muddling along, buoyant and optimistic, and doing a creditable job of running the country.

He will be remembered with pride and fondness.

To his wife and family, to the party he led with honour and political deftness, and to his close and dear friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, we of the Official Opposition offer our most sincere condolences.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, the fitting words of tribute paid by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate to Mr. Pearson will be echoed by thousands of people across the country, of different political persuasions and from many walks of life. May I add my personal tribute as one who knew him well, but whose relationship had perhaps a different perspective from that of others present in the chamber today.

During Mr. Pearson's term as Prime Minister, my association with him was in my capacity as premier of a provincial government. In the field of federal-provincial relations Mr. Pearson played an important role.

His great skill in diplomacy, which was demonstrated so effectively in the international sphere, was brought to bear frequently in resolving conflicts and differences of opinion which existed between the federal and provincial governments.

His constant good humour and ready wit, his warmth and friendliness, in addition to his obvious wisdom, were assets which enabled him to meet any situation. On occasions when it seemed conflicting viewpoints could not be reconciled, he had the happy ability of bringing harmony to the situation.

It is a matter of genuine regret that Mr. Pearson was denied the opportunity of serving as Secretary General of the United Nations. Few if any men in the field of international diplomacy have possessed his qualifications and ability to serve as he would have served in that capacity.

Mr. Pearson was, by nature, self-effacing. He was a humble man. He did not talk about himself or his achievements. Only after the passage of considerable time will this country realize the full value of all the contributions he made.

• (1030)

Certainly, it is fitting that all of us who knew him and were privileged to work with him should publicly recognize his great contribution. I appreciate this opportunity to add my word of personal tribute to what has already been said.

THE LATE HONOURABLE GEORGE ALEXANDER DREW

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in this sad climate of national mourning for our former Prime Minister the unhappy task falls to me of voicing what, I am sure, is the sorrow of all members of the Senate at the calling away in the dark hours before today's dawn of another great Canadian and distinguished former member of this Parliament, the Honourable George Drew.

The Honourable Mr. Drew was known to many members of the Senate personally. Some served with him, I know, in the House of Commons when he was Leader of the Opposition, and at least one honourable senator was a member of the Ontario Legislature while he was Premier of Ontario. He was a man of many facets. His fine-filed mind made it inevitable that his interests would range over many of the arts as well as the affairs of men. I think we all agree that wherever he applied himself he distinguished himself, and rose to a position of eminence.

He was a great Canadian soldier. He served as a gunnery officer in the First World War, and was wounded. His interest in Canada's defence continued, and he rose to the rank of full colonel.

He was Mayor of Guelph, member of the provincial Legislature and a member of the House of Commons. He held the rare distinction of having served Canada at all three levels of government in positions of importance and eminence.

He became Premier of Ontario in 1943. His government was re-elected in 1945, and again in 1948. At that time it was said of him that he was the only Conservative in this century who had returned to power a Conservative government in three successive elections.

Honourable senators will recall that he became the federal Leader of the Conservative Party in 1948, and was Leader of His Majesty's Official Opposition from 1949 to 1956. He served with great distinction, winning the respect, I am sure, of both those who sat beside him and those who sat opposite him. He was a fighter; a man of high principles—principles to which he held with more tenacity, perhaps, than most of us are inclined to do, and for which he was at times criticized. However, I think in the long run the record will show that George Drew's staunchness to his principles was one of the most distinguishing marks of his greatness.

He was a man of strong convictions and he stood by his convictions. Some might say that on that account he made enemies. I do not think so. He had adversaries, opponents—many of them—but if the time were opportune I could bear witness to more than one occasion when George Drew extended a generous helping hand to more than one of those, who, according to the news media, might have been regarded as his bitterest enemies.

He was a warm man, although he had an innate shyness that prevented him to some extent from showing his warmth. He was not a man who could wear his heart on his sleeve, but I know that to his family and to his friends the warmth of his heart and spirit was always apparent.

After his retirement from the leadership of the Official Opposition he served with great distinction under both Conservative and Liberal governments as Canada's High Commissioner in London. Time will tell, when contemporary memoirs are written, of some of his very important achievements there, particularly in matters concerning the international law of the sea and other delicate matters of high international diplomacy in which he was our representative.

He is gone from us, honourable senators, but I am sure you would wish that on your behalf I extend to his wife and the family he has left behind our appreciation of his great service to Canada, and our sympathy with them in this hour of sorrow.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, the death this morning of the Honourable George Drew not only saddens us but brings home to each and every one of us the finiteness of man. It is almost ironic that his death should follow so closely that of Mike Pearson, for in spite of their political differences, and the different roles they occupied in the public life of our country, they were close and understanding friends.

[Translation]

I can certainly tell the Leader of the Opposition that his party had in George Drew a leader who fully understood the complexities of our federation and who, because of his contributions, is always to be considered as a very great Canadian.

[English]

George Drew was obviously a man greatly interested in the political affairs of his country, his province, and his municipality. He loved Guelph, where he was born, and where his distinguished father-in-law, Edward Johnson, had risen to prominence. He was a mayor and an alderman of the City of Guelph. He became a court official, serving in the role of Master at Osgoode Hall. He became a member of the Ontario Legislature. He was a civil servant, head of the Ontario Securities Commission. He became a member of the Government of the Province of Ontario, and its leader, succeeding the dynamic and charismatic Mitch Hepburn.

George Drew became the Leader of the Progressive Party at what I think would generally be regarded as a difficult period for that party, which has so richly contributed to our national and political life.

It is not a reflection on those who preceded him or on those who have succeeded him, but it is a tragedy, that illness took him almost at the moment of what might have been an important decision by the Canadian people.

Those of us who served in the House of Commons during his eight years of leadership will not forget that he was a man of great knowledge, of both domestic questions and international problems. He was a leader and a speaker of great force and great vigour. Some of the historic debates—the pipeline debate, and all of the incidents connected with, for us, a rather regrettable period—will ever be associated with his leadership in the House of Commons. When Mr. Drew was forced to retire, Mr. St. Laurent, the Prime Minister of that day, expressed what we all felt, that it was sad that illness had brought about his departure, and that illness had made us realize what a fine man he was and what a great loss the nation has suffered. It is true, as I well remember, that we began to know the Leader of the Opposition of that day better in his moment of great adversity than we had known him before.

He became High Commissioner in London and, as Senator Allister Grosart has reminded us, his contributions as High Commissioner were not confined to the importance of that office. He headed the Canadian delegation in Geneva at the conferences on the law of the sea. His contributions, in those two difficult and important conferences, will long be remembered, in spite of the failure of those conferences. No greater demonstration exists, of his fitness for the office of High Commissioner at London, and of the success of the job that he did, than the fact that Mr. Pearson and I decided that he should continue as High Commissioner.

During the time that Mr. Pearson was Prime Minister, George Drew continued for a year and a half as High Commissioner in London. It was only when he asked to retire that he ceased holding that important office.

To Mrs. Drew, to his family, to his friend Senator Grosart, to the Leader of the Opposition and to the Conservative party, we here, and all Canadians, offer our sympathy as we salute this dedicated son of Canada.

THE LATE HARRY S. TRUMAN

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, in the other place not only will tributes be paid to the former Prime Minister and to Mr. Drew, but mention will be made of the passing of a former President of the United States, Harry S. Truman.

Our friendship with the United States has been such, and is such, that we pay more than passing attention to events in that country. Few events in recent days have stirred us as much as the death of that happy warrior, that politician of the politicians, Harry S. Truman, who was born in Missouri in May 1884—88 years ago. He became a senator, never expecting that his contribution could come through any other office.

A great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, on the eve of his fourth term, decided that he would like to have Harry Truman as his vice-presidential running mate. No one could have foreseen at that time, I am sure—including Mr. Truman—that within five months the great political figure Roosevelt would have passed away, and that Harry Truman, a haberdasher from Missouri, would be called upon to preside over the affairs of the most powerful nation in the world. He did; and men who were close to him have passed a judgment on his worth. Mr. Churchill, General Marshall, and Dean Acheson have all referred to him as one of the great Presidents of the United States. His first contact with the great of the world was at Potsdam, where he held his own with Stalin and even with Churchill.

The Government of Canada and the people of Canada extend to Mrs. Truman, to her daughter, and to the people of the United States their heartfelt sympathy on the death of this great President. The government has asked me to represent it tomorrow at the memorial service in Washington.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Harry S. Truman, who became Vice-President of the United States against his will in circumstances which the Leader of the Government has indicated, attained the Presidency because of the death of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Later, in 1948, he was elected in his own right, when all the pundits were predicting a landslide victory for his Republican opponent, Tom Dewey.

In his youth he had not received the preparatory formation which men like Franklin Delano Roosevelt, John Kennedy, Richard Nixon, and others received; yet he held the highest office of the world's most powerful nation at a very crucial period, and he acquitted himself exceptionally well of the heavy responsibilities which faced him. It was not easy to decide to use the A-bomb on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, yet history will most likely judge that he did the right thing in bringing the war to an end.

He was instrumental in the establishment of the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, in launching the Marshall Plan, and in the military intervention in Korea on behalf of the UN.

He was a simple man, but a fighter who would neither shirk his responsibilities nor refuse any challenge. He will be remembered as one of the great American Presidents.

It is most fitting that the only member of the Canadian Government at the time of the presidency of Harry Truman who is still in parliament, the Honourable Paul Martin, should represent our country at the ceremony which will take place tomorrow in Washington, to convey to Mrs. Truman and the family of the late Mr. Truman, and to the people of the United States, the condolences of the Canadian people.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Madam Speaker, I assume that at this stage honourable senators would like to be informed of the proposed schedule of sittings and of our program of work for this and the next week.

When the Senate rises this morning it will be moved that it do stand adjourned until 2.45 this afternoon to await the arrival of His Excellency the Governor General for the Official Opening of this First Session of the new Parliament. Once this formal opening is concluded there will be a motion for the Senate to stand adjourned until eight o'clock in the evening on Tuesday next.

This will give honourable senators the advantage of either reading or hearing the speeches of the political leaders of the other place before the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne begins in this place. It is hoped that the knowledge of the trend of the discussions in the other place will generate a wide interest in this chamber, which will be translated into a general participation by honourable senators.

As honourable senators know, there is a rule in the other place limiting the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne to eight days. There is no such rule in this chamber. Therefore, when we resume our sittings on Tuesday evening next I shall move that the debate in this chamber be limited to a like period of eight days, as that has been the general practice in this house.

On motion of Honourable Senator Martin, seconded by Honourable Senator Langlois, the Senate adjourned until 2.45 p.m.

SECOND SITTING

The Senate met at 2.45 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At three o'clock His Excellency the Governor General having come and being seated upon the Throne,

The Hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is His Excellency the Governor General's pleasure that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The House of Commons being come,

Their Speaker, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges. I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the First Session of the 29th Parliament of Canada, with a special word of greeting to those who are entering for the first time upon their important duties as legislators.

The New Year promises much of special interest to all of you, in common with other Canadians. Her Majesty The Queen and His Royal Highness The Duke of Edinburgh will visit Canada twice. In late June and early July they will take part in celebrations marking the Centenary of the entry of Prince Edward Island into the Canadian Confederation, the Tercentenary of the City of Kingston, founded in 1673 by Le Comte de Frontenac, and the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I speak for Canadians generally when I say how pleased we shall all be to have Her Majesty and His Royal Highness with us for these national celebrations.

In August Canadians will again welcome Her Majesty, not only as their Queen but in her role as Head of the Commonwealth. She and the Duke of Edinburgh will be present in Ottawa for the Meeting of the Heads of Government of the Commonwealth. The Government, which will be host for the first time for these periodic meetings, attaches much importance to the Commonwealth and its common traditions, institutions and language. In this connection I note that not two years have passed since Canada was host to a Conference of l'Agence de Coopération culturelle et technique which brought together representatives of many countries of French expression. These two successive events illustrate the richness of Canada's linguistic duality and the special world associations that we derive from it.

Multilateral Preparatory Talks for the long-awaited Conference on European Security and Co-operation are now under way. Canada has urged that the main conference, to which Canada will be a party, give due weight to the questions of freedom of movement of people, of trade, of information and of technology between East and West.

Separate from the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, but closely connected with it, the second round of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks between the United States and the Soviet Union is now under way, and talks on Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions between the nations of the North Atlantic Alliance and the Warsaw Pact are projected.

As one of the world's great trading nations Canada is sensitive to every development in world trading patterns and world monetary arrangements. The Government is participating actively in the Committee of Twenty established for the reform of the International Monetary System. For three years now the Government has been pressing upon the nations of the enlarged European Common Market the need to be outward-looking and is actively engaged in consultations aimed at strengthening trade and other relationships between Canada and the Common Market. This was a principal subject of discussion when the Prime Minister visited the Prime Minister of Britain last month. The Government has just announced the appointment of an ambassador solely accredited to the European Economic Communities.

As we set about strengthening our long-established economic, cultural and political ties with Europe we do not lose sight of our closest ally and our primary market beyond our borders, the United States. The Government will continue its discussions with the United States to settle certain difficulties that have arisen in our trading arrangements with that country, and to maintain and expand our trading opportunities there.

Access to foreign markets for exporters will receive particular emphasis. A new round of multilateral trade negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade is planned for the fall of 1973. The Government will participate vigorously in these negotiations.

At home, the Government remains fully committed to two pre-eminent goals, national unity and equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

In pursuit of these goals, the Government assigns the highest priority to two policy areas:

—economic policy, to reduce unemployment, contain inflation and strengthen the economy generally

—social policy, to bring about, in consultation with the Provinces, a re-organization of existing social security programs.

In the area of economic policy, the Government has four main objectives:

First, to expand job opportunities at a rate that will bring about as rapid as possible a decline in the numbers of unemployed

Second, to promote stable economic growth at a rate that will sustain rising standards of living for all our citizens and provide for more satisfactory realization of the potential of the economy

Third, to attain reasonable price stability

Fourth, to ensure that all regions of the country benefit from the prosperity brought about by the expanding economy.

To attain its economic objectives, the Government has set in motion a two-part program.

The first part consists of measures to provide more jobs immediately by strengthening and broadening existing programs. These measures have been announced and are already taking effect:

—increased funding for the Local Initiatives Program

—increased funding for on the job training

—a substantial seasonal capital works project to be undertaken in co-operation with the Provinces and municipalities

—special funding to increase direct employment by the Federal Government in labour-intensive projects.

The second part consists of measures that will add to the fundamental strength of the economy, can be acted upon this session and can be expected to have effect with a minimum of delay:

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

—amendments to the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Customs Tariff, reintroducing measures announced earlier

—major revision of the General Adjustment Assistance Plan, to enable industry to take advantage of opportunities for increasing our foreign trade —aid to small businesses through new initiatives to strengthen management and consulting services and to improve access to financing facilities

—extension and improvement of the Industrial Development Bank

—measures to assist in the development of the tourist industry in Canada

—amendments to the Export Development Act, increasing the capital of the Export Development Corporation and raising the financial ceilings for lending, guarantees, export insurance and foreign insurance operations

—assistance to cooperatives and credit unions

—renewed measures to reduce deeply-entrenched regional economic disparities. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion will be decentralized to a greater degree to be in a better position to identify opportunities for economic development —review of research and development incentive programs to improve their effectiveness in promoting innovation in the private sector of the economy, including examination of patenting, licensing and other policies related to technology

—measures to ensure further control by Canadians over their economy by the screening of foreign takeovers of Canadian-owned business; measures respecting the transfer of technology from abroad and access to it by Canadian entrepreneurs; measures to increase Canadian participation in the ownership and control of resource projects; and, in consultation with the Provinces, measures dealing with new direct foreign investment and the sale of land to foreigners

—measures that will restructure the Canada Corporations Act, including a requirement that a majority of directors of federally incorporated companies be Canadians

—the Government will meet with the provincial governments in the five regions of the country, to examine the impact of freight rates on economic development and consumer prices. The railways have agreed to participate in these meetings.

Taken together these measures will contribute to the development and elaboration of a coherent set of industrial policies for Canada.

In the area of social policy, the Government considers that Canada's total social security system—including both federal and provincial elements—must be reconsidered and reorganized, and made more sensitive to the needs of people in different parts of the country.

The Government intends that this reorganization should be based on five principles which, taken together, comprise a statement of the Government's commitment in respect of social security.

First, the social security system must assure to people who cannot work, the aged, the blind and the disabled, a compassionate and equitable guaranteed annual income.

Second, the social security system as it applies to people who can work must contain incentives to work and a greater emphasis on the need to get people who are on social aid back to work.

Third, a fair and just relationship must be maintained between the incomes of people who are working at or near the minimum wage, the guaranteed incomes assured to people who cannot work, and the allowances paid to those who can work but are unemployed.

Fourth, it must be recognized that Provinces may wish to have the structures of social security vary in accordance with the social needs, income standards and the cost of living in different communities.

Finally, it must be accepted that the reconsideration of Canada's social security system must be conducted jointly by the Federal Government and the Provinces. A better social security system can only be realized if a reasonable consensus can be reached between the Governments of Canada and the Provinces. To this end, the Government will invite provincial representatives to a conference of welfare ministers in April.

Certain immediate steps will be taken by the Government, consistent with the principles proposed above. In respect of people who can work but are temporarily unemployed, legislation will be introduced to clarify certain aspects of the Unemployment Insurance Plan and to prevent abuses that have not been overcome by the administrative action already taken.

A fair and equitable regime of family allowances is fundamental to an efficient social security system. A new family income security program will be proposed that will particularly take into account the needs of the lower income families. Legislation will be introduced to improve the economic situation of old age pensioners.

Subject to the appropriate agreement being reached with the Provinces, changes to improve the Canada Pension Plan will be introduced to provide higher pensions for widows, widows with dependent children and the disabled and to make other needed amendments.

In another area of social policy, the field of housing and urban development, the Government proposes the following action, in co-operation with the Provinces:

—assistance in the provision of low-cost housing and other accommodation for senior citizens

—home-ownership assistance to low and moderate income families

—new incentives for housing provided by co-operatives and non-profit corporations —assistance in the rehabilitation of older neighbourhoods

—a land assembly program to assist in the creation of new communities and to check urban sprawl —encouragement to investors to make more money available to meet housing needs

—a warranty system to protect the purchasers of new houses —assistance in the relocation of railway tracks and other facilities

—study of the Government's responsibilities with regard to urban transportation generally.

In response to the increasing importance of fitness for the well-being and health of Canadians and the need for greater opportunities for people to participate in sports activities, it is proposed over the next three fiscal years to more than double the current level of expenditures under the Fitness and Amateur Sport Program. Plans for a greatly expanded and a strengthened program will be announced.

Inflation is a world-wide problem. The Government is determined to contain inflation in Canada to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar in the hands of the Canadian people and to protect Canada's position in world trade. While food prices in Canada have steadied slightly in the last month or so, the Government is concerned about possible future effects of the world-wide trend toward higher food prices and will propose the setting up of a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to make a special study of this problem.

Efficient communications between all parts of the country are essential to the unity and prosperity of Canada. Technological developments can have a pervasive effect on the social and economic well-being of all Canadians. The Government will, in the near future, submit to Parliament proposals for a national communications policy, and for resolving problems arising from the growing interaction between broadcasting and other forms of telecommunication, giving due weight to the interests and concerns of the Provinces.

The Government will introduce legislation establishing a competition policy to preserve and strengthen the market system upon which our economy is based. The new policy will be in harmony with industrial policies in general and foreign investment policy in particular.

World-wide demand for our agricultural products is strong, in particular for our wheat and other grains. The Government will concentrate its attention upon transportation, storage and handling problems to ensure efficient and timely movement and delivery of grain and other agricultural products.

You will be asked to amend the Crop Insurance Act to allow the Government to reimburse the Provinces to a maximum of fifty percent of premiums paid under contracts of insurance, thereby reducing costs of insurance to individual farmers.

The Government supports the principle of an equitable relationship of prices of feed grain to livestock feeders in various areas of Canada. It is the intention of the Government to implement before the next crop year, procedures that will ensure the optimum development of the feed grain and livestock industries within Canada.

Measures to protect the natural environment and to enhance the productivity of Canada's renewable resource industries will be laid before you. In addition to amendments to the Fisheries Development Act, you will be asked to consider an Environmental Contaminants Act and a Canada Wildlife Act.

To preserve the ecological integrity of Canada's coastal and maritime areas, further preparations will be made for the Third United Nations Law of the Sea Conference. The Ministry of State for Science and Technology, in co-operation with the Department of the Environment and other interested departments, will recommend a national program of research and development in the field of Marine Science and Technology.

The Government will continue its efforts through national, bilateral and multilateral measures to overcome the continuing menace posed by aerial hijacking. In particular, you will be asked to amend the Aeronautics Act to provide for strict security measures to be taken at airports, including the search of persons and property.

You will be asked to consider legislation amending the Immigration Act, to curb abuses including the exploitation of the provisions allowing visitors to apply for immigrant status while in Canada. You will also be asked to amend the Immigration Appeal Board Act to provide for the rapid and equitable disposition of outstanding immigration appeals and prevent the recurrence of large-scale appeal backlogs.

The growing complexity of our society calls for increasing co-ordination of federal and provincial government programs. The Prime Minister will propose a meeting in the spring with the provincial First Ministers to plan further steps in the harmonization of goals, policies and programs for the benefit of all Canadians, particularly in fields that bear on the responsibilities of both levels of government.

Federal-provincial meetings at the ministerial level are also projected on a range of urgent matters, including:

—financial and economic policy

—the Report of the Economic Council of Canada

—health care programs

—post-secondary education

—housing

—restrictions upon foreign ownership of land

—income security

—industrial policy.

The Government will propose to the Governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba that they join with it in the convening of a conference on western economic opportunities. Such a conference would be a unique venture in the history of federal-provincial relations in Canada. It could be jointly planned, and held in the West in the course of the summer. Its purpose would be to explore potentials for economic and social development and, specifically, to consider concrete programs for stimulating and broadening the economic and industrial base of western Canada.

Among such concrete programs, the Government would propose for discussion the possible establishment of new regionally-based financial institutions better able to serve the financing needs of business enterprise and industrial development in western Canada.

A second suggestion for joint study would be improvement in the total transportation system, so basic to overcoming the problems of distance: in the region, from other parts of Canada and from ocean ports. The development needs of the northern frontier areas in all four Provinces could also be explored.

The Government recognizes that western Canadians wish to build industrial strength on top of their region's great resource and energy base. As the whole economy continues to grow a greater measure of decentralization of industrial activity will be necessary to achieve this desired regional objective.

The Government believes these and other issues would rank high on an agenda for western development. It would seek as well views and suggestions with regard to the continuing mechanisms for federal-provincial consultations on policies for western expansion, within an overall framework of national growth.

The Government intends to widen the area of service to Canada open to personnel in the Canadian Armed Forces. In addition to maintaining a high degree of military capability as the primary and most essential role of the Forces, new emphasis will be placed on the many areas in which the varied skills and training of this large number of dedicated Canadians can contribute to the achievement of national goals.

You will be asked to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act.

Parliament will be asked to confirm the basic principles of the Government's program for bilingualism in the Public Service.

The Government will continue to work in furtherance of the objectives of the Official Languages Act. Further assistance will be offered to the Provinces to help ensure that to the extent possible:

—Canadians can educate their children in the official language of their choice

—Canadian students can learn, as a second language, the other official language

—Provincial governments can develop an increased capacity to serve their citizens in both official languages, as may be required.

The Government will continue to encourage through its multicultural policy the development of a society in which individuals and groups can develop and express their own cultural identity. An Advisory Council to the Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism will be established.

Measures will be introduced directed at reform of the penal and parole systems to improve prisoner rehabilitation and the protection of the public.

The five-year trial period in which imposition of the death penalty has been limited to cases involving the killing of policemen and prison guards has come to an end. You will be asked to decide, by a free vote and as a matter of urgency, upon the future of the death penalty in the Canadian law enforcement system.

Proposals dealing with conflicts of interest as they may affect Members of Parliament, Ministers of the Crown and Public Servants will be laid before you.

You will be asked to consider an Election Expenses Bill.

The Government will recommend to the House of Commons the broadcasting, by radio and television, of all or a part of its proceedings and the proceedings of its Committees.

You will be asked to consider other legislative proposals.

Members of the House of Commons,

The Government intends to present a budget early in the session. It is timely to provide to Parliament a full report on Canada's financial and economic situation, and to propose fiscal and other measures for the effective management of the economy.

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Parliamentary Librarian to the First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament, 1973.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, last year, when the report of the Librarian was tabled, it was proposed by Senator Fergusson that that report be made an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. I would ask that the report just tabled by the Speaker be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of State Act, chapter S-15, R.S.C., 1970.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

TERMINATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY ON EIGHTH SITTING DAY

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h):

That the proceedings on the order of the day for resuming the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech from the Throne addressed to both Houses of Parliament be concluded on the eighth sitting day on which the order is debated.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: May I ask the mover of the motion or the Leader of the Government if it is expected that we will have some legislation to deal with at the end of these eight days, and if that is the reason for shortening the debate or for imposing some sort of closure?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, at this moment I cannot say what we will be doing at the end of this debate. However, we embarked on the eight-day rule three sessions ago. Certainly there will be a resolution before us at some stage, but I cannot say at which point. This arises out of a proposal which has been already initiated in the other place for the establishment of a joint committee to inquire into food prices. It may be there will be some legislation. However, at this stage I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then there is no definite argument in favour of the motion?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, there is the argument of orderliness and the argument that this has been the practice during the past three years. I think this in itself is a strong argument.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not very convincing, in any event.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I anticipate the continued good humour and zeal which now attends the Leader of the Opposition in the prosecution of his duties.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the legislation abolishing the death penalty in murder cases, except those involving the murder of policemen, lapsed at the end of 1972, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government what will be government policy with respect to the imposition of the death penalty until Parliament has made a decision regarding it?

Hon. Paul Martin: The Solicitor General will be bringing forward a measure to deal with this matter in the other place at the earliest moment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but I am inquiring as to what will happen during the interim—until Parliament makes a decision.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Governor in Council will continue, as in the past, to deal with these questions on the basis of the existing law and in light of an examination of all the facts involved in each particular case.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do I understand your answer to mean that the death penalty will not be imposed, regardless of the law, until Parliament has made a decision?

Hon. Mr. Martin: As I said, it will depend upon an examination by the Governor in Council of the facts in each case.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And not despite the law.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is a vague answer.

HONOURABLE EDGAR E. FOURNIER

RETURN TO CHAMBER AFTER ILLNESS

Hon. Edgar E. Fournier: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. After an absence of 26 months it is with pleasure that I resume my seat in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Fournier: I wish to thank honourable senators and members of the staff who tended to my care during those difficult moments.

On November 25, 1970, while having breakfast in the Parliamentary Restaurant with some members of the house, I was suddenly, and most unexpectedly, struck with a very severe case of paralysis.

At this moment, I wish to thank the Honourable Hugh John Flemming, with whom I had the privilege to sit and who saw fit to escort me to my room. He called the Senate nurse, Miss Lepine, who made the hospital arrangements. My thanks go to Miss Lepine and Constables Hull and Champagne, who gave me my first wheel-chair ride with safety, security and dignity.

My thanks go to all honourable senators for their kind tributes of flowers, cards, visits and telephone calls; to Senator Martin, who took the time to visit me in my room in the hospital; and to Senator Flynn, with whose office I was in constant touch. I also thank many members of the staff and my secretary, Mrs. Lafrenière. I am grateful to Mr. Roger Lalonde, who made sure that my whiskers did not grow beyond the permissible Senate allowance. This is typical of the friendship one can find in the Senate.

I extend special thanks to Senator Croll. I regret very much that I became ill just at the time when the chips were down and the Poverty Committee was going through most unpleasant and difficult moments. Senator Croll was more than a father to me when I was hospitalized. I hope to have the opportunity to say a few words on this matter and thank him more generously in the near future.

To everyone my most sincere thanks. I must not overlook Dr. Preston and his staff at the Ottawa Civic Hospital, who performed a surgical operation to remove a blood clot which was lodged in an artery, and which has left me with permanent brain cell damage. However, I always knew that there was something abnormal with my brain, which has not changed very much.

Last but not least, thanks to the good Lord, for he has the last word and controls our destiny. May I only say that I consider myself privileged, as it could have been much worse.

To further the complications, a stay in Fredericton, which was to be short, lasted six weeks. On October 22, 1971, I had a stroke, known as an acute inferior wall myocardiac infarction, mainly due to an excess of effort, both physical and mental, in trying to recover from the paralysis. I had to start from zero, not being able to even write my own name.

So, honourable senators, while I may not have too many visible marks except difficulty in speaking, I now have to adjust myself to living with some 30 per cent permanent disability in writing, and walking with the assistance of a cane. I have lost 70 pounds by following a very severe diet.

[Translation]

Here in a few words, honourable senators, is the summary of my physical condition and the efforts I have made to fight problems that will always be with me. I accept them all in good heart and I thank Divine Providence that my recovery has surpassed all expectations.

When I compare myself to some of my fellow Canadians who have known the same fate I consider myself well off and I thank the good Lord.

HONOURABLE PAUL MARTIN, P.C.
HONOURABLE EUGENE A. FORSEY

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS UNIVERSITY CHANCELLORS

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to call your attention to two events which occurred recently. They were the installation of the Honourable Paul Martin as Chancellor of Waterloo Lutheran University and of the Honourable Eugene A. Forsey as Chancellor of Trent University.

I am sure that all honourable senators would wish to join me in complimenting the aforementioned universities for their excellent choice in selecting those two gentlemen as their Chancellors. We are all aware that universities are currently facing a difficult problem with regard to decrease in enrolment, depleted revenues, and professional tenure. We are confident that the two honourable senators I have mentioned will fulfil the position of Chancellor at their respective universities with honour and dignity, and we extend congratulations to the universities and their new Chancellors.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I do not think I have any authority under the statutes of Trent University to speak for Senator Forsey. I am sure that he himself will acknowledge with gratitude the intervention made by Senator Haig, and I thank Senator Haig for his references to me.

WELCOME TO SENATORS AFTER ILLNESSES

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we are very glad to see Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) in his seat.

I think this is the second time that I express great pleasure to see him back with us. We are certainly very happy to see that he is in such good health.

I think he came back at this particular time because he is aware that this is a unique opportunity for him to voice constructive criticisms about the government of this country.

[English]

We all welcome the return to the Senate chamber of Senator Edgar Fournier who with great heroism has resisted an illness which took hold of him over a year and a half ago. We are happy to see him in his place today. I am sure that his good health and his return has been hastened by the fact that he wishes to join with his leader in pointing out to the government its many good virtues.

I also express to Senator Harold Connolly our delight in seeing him in this chamber at the opening of Parliament following a serious illness. Senator Connolly attended the opening ceremonies seated in a wheelchair; but his heart and mind are good. We were very pleased to see him.

We welcome also the return of Senator McLean, who with great heroism and fortitude has likewise vanquished an illness which sought to overcome him. He is back in this chamber cheerful and resolute to take part in our proceedings.

LABOUR RELATIONS

WEST COAST PORTS OPERATIONS—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not certain whether the question period is over, but before I put a question to the Leader of the Government I would like to associate myself with the good wishes extended to Senators Fournier, McLean and Connolly.

My question concerns the bill, passed by the Senate on the last day of the last session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament, ordering stevedores on the west coast to return to work. That order was valid until December 31, 1972. I am wondering if that problem has been settled, or if there is any danger of the strike being resumed and the government being forced against its will, as it was then, to pass appropriate legislation.

Hon. Paul Martin: The Leader of the Opposition was kind enough to give me notice, but he did not give it to me in time. Therefore, I will take the question as notice.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved, seconded by Hon. Paul C. Lafond:

> That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:
> To His Excellency the Right Honourable Roland Michener, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.
> May it please Your Excellency:
> We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, in rising to address myself to this motion and to support it, I am particularly pleased, first of all, to be able to express my congratulations and good wishes to the Honourable Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson, our Speaker at this the First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament of Canada.

I am particularly pleased to congratulate Senator Fergusson on her being elevated to this high office as I have had a long association with her in various capacities.

Although I did not know Senator Fergusson during the period when she was a prominent member of the New Brunswick bar, we later met when we were both regents of Mount Allison University in Sackville, New Brunswick. It is particularly appropriate that a graduate of Mount Allison University should be the first woman to become Speaker of either this house or the other place.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: It is a distinction which Senator Fergusson deserves, regardless of her sex, but which, as I say, is particularly appropriate for her as a graduate of Mount Allison University.

In 1875 Mount Allison University became the first university in the British Empire to grant a Bachelor's degree to a woman. In that instance it was a Bachelor of Science degree, and that was followed, seven years later in 1882, by the first Bachelor of Arts degree ever awarded to a woman by any university in Canada. Mount Allison has apparently continued its excellent tradition of featuring the ladies. Of the eight women who are members of this body, three are graduates of Mount Allison University, those being, in addition to Her Honour the Speaker, the Honourable Senator Norrie, and the Honourable Senator Neiman who, as honourable senators are aware, took her oath of office just a few days ago.

May I take this opportunity, Madam Speaker, to wish you a long and successful tenure of office as the presiding officer of this body, particularly at this time when such a wish carries significant overtones and undertones, which I am sure will not escape honourable senators.

Unhappily I must now refer to the death of a most unusual Canadian. The Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson will be appreciated in retrospect by Canadians and by Canadian historians to perhaps a greater extent than he ever was by his Canadian contemporaries during his lifetime. I need not refer to his distinguished career as a sportsman, a teacher, an outstanding public servant, a minister of government, an international statesman, and finally as the Prime Minister of his country. The facts are well known, and have been movingly and eloquently placed on the record here by the government leader, Senator Martin, on Thursday last.

In a very real sense Mr. Pearson is the first Canadian to have achieved the status of a world statesman. It is true that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and, perhaps to a greater extent, Sir Robert Borden and William Lyon Mackenzie King, established and maintained a reputation of distinction outside Canada, but their activities were confined almost entirely to Canada's position in the Commonwealth. Even if he had not been recognized by the award of the Nobel Peace Prize, Mike Pearson's skilful diplomacy, culminating in his brilliant leadership in the United Nations, ranked him as a world figure to a degree that cannot be attributed to any other Canadian in our history.

It is popular for journalists and some others to say that he did not achieve the same distinction as a leader within Canada. Here again, I suspect the record will prove these people wrong. It is true that his leadership was not marked by an ostentatious use of or love of power, nor that showy decisiveness which the press and the public so easily recognize. He had none of the arrogance or obvious self-importance which many people associate with leadership. At the same time, he managed the affairs of this nation under the most trying and difficult circumstances with a skill that is really only understood when one examines his achievements.

If he was not an ostentatiously decisive and strong leader, nevertheless he never lost sight of the goals he set for himself and his administration. What other Canadian Prime Minister in so short a period managed to make so many changes in the Canadian pattern of life—a new flag for Canada, a national pension plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, a guaranteed income for old age pensioners, collective bargaining in the federal Public Service? Added to these were the unification of the armed services, the doubling of Canada's external aid, and the establishment of the foundations for a bilingual Public Service. If this was not strong leadership, it was certainly effective leadership and effective government.

Canada needs more men of this stature, and I am sure that the whole nation, regardless of differing attitudes towards him during his lifetime, mourns his passing, extends sympathy to the members of his family, and takes pride in the achievements of a man who enhanced Canada's name and reputation throughout the world.

For more than nine years, since I have been President of Dalhousie University, there have been in my office the pictures of only two men. One is of the first President of Dalhousie University, the Reverend Thomas H. McCulloch—a not inconsiderable public figure and reformer during the early years of the nineteenth century, and an associate of Joseph Howe in the struggle for responsible government in Nova Scotia—the other is of Lester B. Pearson, given to me before he became leader of the Liberal Party in Canada. Hence my reference to him might have been more personal because of the long-standing friendship which he gave to me, as he did to so many others.

Lester Pearson had the capacity to listen without necessarily being swayed, and then to weigh and consider. This may have been interpreted by some as indecisiveness. It is true that he always saw the other side of any argument he advanced or policy he proposed, but surely this is strength and realism rather than indecisiveness. There are different kinds and styles of leadership, and if his was not always the kind that fits popular fancy I submit it was the kind that was good for Canada, and for this Parliament during a most difficult period.

I have already referred to the moving and eloquent tribute paid to the late Lester B. Pearson by the government leader in the Senate on Thursday last. I owe it to Mr. Pearson and Senator Martin for having been chosen to lead the Canadian delegations to two UNESCO general conferences in Paris. I thank both of them—particularly Senator Martin, who is here with us now—for the confidence that they placed in me, and particularly for the wide scope of authority allowed to me as the leader of the Canadian delegations.

It is an honour to me to come to the Senate under the leadership of Senator Martin. He is a man whom I have always admired greatly. As has been said before and recently, he is a man who has given virtually the whole of his adult life and career to the public service of his country, in varying capacities. Like politicians who have done this, he has had his successes and also his disappointments. But the fine thing about Senator Martin is that his successes have never turned his head, nor have his disappointments ever daunted him. I consider it an honour to serve in the Senate under his leadership.

Honourable senators, the circumstances of our meeting in this First Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament present some surprising contrasts to the situation which obtained when I was summoned to the Senate and took my place in mid-May of 1972, shortly before dissolution. Undoubtedly, we—and particularly those in the other place—face interesting months ahead. It seems to me that the people of Canada expect, and are entitled to expect, Parliament and its members, both here and in the other place, to put the best interests of Canada and its people ahead of all other considerations. I am sure that this will be our aim.

Turning to the Speech which His Excellency addressed to us on Thursday last, I am pleased to note, first of all, the references to Canada's international involvements. On the political side, it is true that Canada may not during the sixties have exercised the same influence on world affairs and in the councils of the nations as we did in the late forties and the fifties. The circumstances are understandable. Canada's unusually strong position following the end of World War II probably could not be sustained by a country of only 20 million people, but I submit that Canada still has important and highly significant roles to play in the world of international politics, and I welcome the declared interest of our government in stating that it intends to pursue Canada's role with vigour in this area.

In so far as Canada's participation as one of the great trading nations of the world is concerned, I am sure that we are all glad that Canada plays its part in such outstanding international organizations as those dealing with the international monetary system, so important to every trading nation and particularly to a trading nation like our own, living as the neighbour to the the most powerful nation in the free world and perhaps in the whole world today. I am pleased that the Government of Canada now has adopted such a concerned attitude towards the European Common Market. We shall all await with interest the discussions that take place to determine, during the months and years ahead, exactly how this will affect Canada, and how Canada can manage its position in relation to the European Common Market to its own best interests and, hopefully, to the mutual advantage of all those concerned.

Nevertheless, whenever we start discussing Canada's involvement with other nations, we always come to a consideration of Canada's relationship with the United States of America. Here of course there are many complex problems. We boast about the friendly relationships between our two countries. At the same time, a good deal of suspicion of American domination of our economy, and sometimes of our culture, is bound to be foremost in the minds of Canadians.

Of course, to persons from my part of Canada, the action, or the proposed action, of the Government of the United States, in imposing a 6.6 per cent ad valorem duty on Michelin tires made in Nova Scotia, is a matter of great concern. I hope that the government of this country will discuss vigorously with our American friends the rationale of this move and the necessity for its continuance, because it may be very important indeed to an industry providing a livelihood to a great many people and a real stimulus to the economy of the province from which I come.

[Hon. Mr. Hicks.]

May I suggest that we should deal with the United States in an atmosphere of friendliness, but also in an atmosphere of firmness. We should never forget, in our dealings with the United States, that she needs many of our products and many of our resources—our water resources, our electric power, our gas and oil resources, to mention but a few—and the United States should not be allowed, in the long or even the medium term of time, to have access to those resources on her own terms while at the same time discriminating unfairly against any aspect of the Canadian economy, and particularly discriminating against secondary industry in Canada.

I hope, therefore, that the references in His Excellency's Speech really do presage vigorous action, informed and firm negotiations, on the part of the Government of Canada in dealing with our great neighbour to the south.

Most of the Speech, however, deals with domestic problems and it seems to me that the key to His Excellency's Speech this year is to be found in the paragraph which reads:

> At home, the Government remains fully committed to two pre-eminent goals, national unity and equality of opportunity for all Canadians.
> In pursuit of these goals, the Government assigns the highest priority to two policy areas:
> —economic policy, to reduce unemployment, contain inflation and strengthen the economy generally
> —social policy, to bring about, in consultation with the Provinces, a re-organization of existing social security programs.

National unity is, of course, of concern to every Canadian, to every member of this Parliament, both in the other place and here. That must be so, because surely if this Parliament does not stand for one nation indivisible, how can we expect the nation to stand? Here I feel constrained to say that I am concerned about the lack of assistance which in this country is given to the idea and image of national unity by the press and the media generally.

I remember very well what a friend of mine, a distinguished professor at the University of Toronto, said at the time of the last visit of the Queen to the City of Quebec. You may remember, honourable senators, it had been rumoured that nasty incidents would take place. In fact no such incidents took place, except those which some press members deliberately tried to stir up in order to make their own stories. At that time my friend, the Toronto professor, said, "It almost seems that the press and other media of this country have a death wish for the nation."

I am one of those who believe, with every fibre of their being, in the freedom of the press and the freedom of expression. I do not think that there is much point in censorship by law, because it is very difficult to enforce and almost always does more harm than good. But I do think that the freedom of the press and freedom of the mass media must be coupled with a correlative sense of responsibility. While I would defend the right of individual newspapers to take any view they like—even to taking and expounding views which might be divisive in the country, in so far as they do not transgress the laws of sedition and treason—I do think a special case can be made for an organization like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is supported by the taxpayers of this country through the Parliament of Canada. When such a large proportion of its revenues comes from the taxpayers, it seems to me that we ought to be able to expect a higher standard of reporting and interviewing of our prominent public figures from that body. Moreover, we ought to be able to expect at least this agency to attempt to promote the unity of Canada rather than to underline all the divisive elements which are bound to crop up in such a diverse society as we have in Canada today.

It seems to me that to some extent the one who pays the piper should be entitled to call the tune. Therefore, while the largest measure of freedom to speak in a disruptive manner about our country and our nation, even to denigrate our flag and our national anthem and Canadian life generally, ought to be allowed to private agencies, I do not think that the people of Canada, through their national Parliament, should support an agency which places a disproportionate emphasis on disruptive reporting as often as, I regret to say, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation does.

I also wish that the quality of their reporting and interviewing was better. To give two examples: only a few nights ago after the opening of Parliament a group of reporters or interviewers on that great national network interviewed the Leader of the New Democratic Party. It seemed a shame to me that the leader of any political party in Canada should have to go through an interview by such people, not because they were hard on him, but because they knew so little about the issues on which they were challenging him. Perhaps it is a matter of some satisfaction that the politician came out on top, showing himself to be so much more able in the area of discussion than were any of those who were interviewing him. Nevertheless, at the same time it seemed that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ought to have been able to put together a better team than that to deal with such an able and intelligent person as David Lewis, the Leader of the New Democratic Party of Canada.

Some time within the last year or two I saw an interview of the present Prime Minister of Canada in which the interviewer was trying to make some point vis-à-vis Mr. Trudeau, which depended upon a system of government such as obtains in the United States. Mr. Trudeau tried to explain to the interviewer the difference between the congressional system of government in the United States and the system of representative parliamentary democracy which we have in Canada. The interviewer had no idea of the distinction between the two systems, and perhaps he did not want to learn, because if he had appreciated the distinction he would have realized that the point he was trying to make against the Prime Minister had no validity whatsoever.

In my opinion, when the Prime Minister of Canada goes on a national network, particularly the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, he is entitled to have people who are well informed to discuss the issues of the day with him. If he has been criticized for giving lectures on constitutional law to reporters and radio interviewers, then all I can say is that there is ample evidence that it was necessary for someone to give them those lessons, though the lessons ought to have been given to them previously by someone other than the Prime Minister of Canada.

Admittedly, it is a long time since I saw that program and I could be wrong in saying it was on the CBC. It might have been carried by the Canadian Television network, the CTV, and not the CBC. If that is the case, I would say that there is not as much blame to be attached to the CTV, because I do not think that this Parliament has the right to require the same kind of standards from the CTV as it does from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The media do not like to be criticized. Indeed, it was suggested to me that I should be careful in referring to them at all. Someone even used the expression, "They will crucify you." Well, in the first instance I do not see that there is much point in trying to crucify a member of this august chamber, and, in the second place, I want to make it very clear that, when members of the press accuse leading political figures of arrogance and other attributes of that nature, they should realize that no one can be more arrogant than a member of the press who holds himself beyond criticism. I hope that these comments which I have made will be regarded as a constructive rather than destructive accusation.

I come now to the section of the Address which has to do with economic policy in Canada. Indeed, the economic policy and social policy aspects are closely linked, but, if I may deal with one or two of those having to do with economic policy, the Speech goes on to say:

> In the area of economic policy, the Government has four main objectives.

It then lists those objectives and I shall not read them to you.

Among the remedies that are proposed are further amendments to the Income Tax Act. These, I think, are of the greatest importance. Indeed, I am concerned about the present Income Tax Act and its operation. We all know that the Royal Commission on Taxation, chaired by Kenneth Carter, was appointed in September, 1962, a long time ago now, by the Diefenbaker government. The Honourable Edgar Benson, under Prime Minister Trudeau, tabled his White Paper on Tax Reform on November 7, 1969, not so long ago, but almost three years after the Carter Commission had reported. The present act is, I believe, a direct result of that white paper.

I find the act most difficult to understand, and, what worries me even more, a good many of my chartered accountant friends tell me that the act is difficult to understand.

Much has been written on the act during the past year, but it seems to me that it will be many months, if not years, before a clear understanding is possible concerning the many diverse interpretations being placed on the various complex sections of this act.

In addition to being burdened—be he an individual, a small businessman or a large businessman— with the multiplicity of forms, the taxpayer now finds himself in the position that because the act is so complicated, he can no longer understand it and will have to seek professional advice in order to file his returns properly. It is of little comfort to go to the department for an explanation, because they are the tax gatherers.

An example of one provision in the new act which is frustrating the small businessman is the small business deduction, which, presumably, was designed as an incentive to small businesses. The small business deduction reduces the rate of tax from 50 per cent to 25 per cent on the first $50,000 of active business income, under section 125 of the act. However, if the small business invests its surplus funds in what are known as ineligible investments, then, to the extent that its funds have been invested in such ineligible investments, the deduction is not allowed to the business and the tax rate therefore goes back up to 50 per cent. In my opinion the average small businessman will not be encouraged, because of this, to retain the profits of his business for future expansion, but will be tempted to draw them out and spend them because there is no incentive for him to leave these profits in the business.

Honourable senators, there are some other nicely worded sections also, such as section 188 and section 189 concerning the exemption from tax if these profits are to be put into investments that are allied to the type of business that is operated, or into short term deposits, but, in fact, this is rarely done. All the new act does is encourage people to pay out their profits so that the government can get the maximum tax—a laudable object in itself that governments cannot ignore, but there are other considerations that ought to be taken into account.

In the December issue of Current Affairs, a publication of the Canada Trust, there is an article on this very same subject under the heading "Wanted—Bookkeepers Galore." In the great days of England it was said she was a nation of shopkeepers. Now, I am not downgrading bookkeepers in any way when I say this, but I do not want us to become a nation of bookkeepers. I hope that the amendments referred to so far as income tax is concerned may in as brief a time as possible effect some simplication in a piece of legislation which seems to all who have attempted to understand it so far to be incredibly complex—a paradise, perhaps, for the bureaucrat, but not at all a paradise for the small businessman and the individual taxpayer in Canada. I attach great importance to this, and I think the fate of this Parliament and, indeed, the fate of this government, could be involved in the public reaction to the new Income Tax Act.

Turning from this point, honourable senators, but still referring to small business, I am glad to see that references are made to the provision of managerial and consulting services for small businesses, and I hope that this will entail more than the mere provision of the bookkeepers that may be needed as a result of the new income tax legislation.

I am more happy about the operation of the DREE program—the Department of Regional Economic Expansion—than many of those who have written about it so far and many of those who talked about it during the recent election campaign. This is an imaginative program designed to tackle one of the basic problems in Canada, and it seems to me to be inevitable that it should take some time to operate satisfactorily, and to operate in such a way that there would follow a proper balance as between the various parts and regions of Canada and their ability to avail themselves of the operation of the DREE program. I do not think we should be unduly apologetic about the false starts that may have been made, or about the uneven development that may have occurred, as a result of the activities of this department to date. But in my view we ought continually to re-examine it, and make constructive changes where necessary. I think we should look to the future with confidence, placing further reliance on this department to help out in providing a more nearly equal opportunity for Canadians in all parts of the country.

Honourable senators, I think the sections of the Speech from the Throne referring to research and development programs are very important. We must remember that this country among all the developed countries of the world finds itself in the situation where a major proportion of its research and development money comes from government agencies. This is perhaps not unnatural when we realize how many of our industries are "branch plants" and have research budgets elsewhere, largely in the United States, and spend very little of their research funds in Canada. Therefore it has been traditionally necessary for the Government of Canada and for the governments of the provinces to spend more of their resources in research and development and incentive programs than has been the case in most of the other developed countries in the world.

I shall watch with interest, as I am sure all of us will, for any programs which may be developed which will provide incentive for private citizens, investors and corporations other than government agencies, to undertake a larger proportion of the useful work which can be done in the area of research and development.

Finally, with reference to the economic policy section of the Speech from the Throne, I note with interest that a proposal is made to amend the Canada Corporations Act whereby a majority of Canadian directors will be required. Already some members of the press have said this is mere tokenism, that in the interests of the company Canadian directors will look only to good business practice. I feel they should. I think it is important that the Canadian business community continue to provide men to occupy positions on boards of companies incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act who can pull their weight and exert their influence. It is not always, and indeed it is not often, that the interests of a particular corporation are counter to national interests. However, I think it is reassuring for us to know that corporations which are largely controlled and owned abroad are, nevertheless, governed or directed by persons whose interests are in Canada, and who are themselves Canadians. I think this is a forward step and one from which we should not shy away. Many other countries have done this long ago. Generally, I think it has made foreign capital in those countries more acceptable to the citizens of the countries concerned.

Dealing with the section regarding social policy, the Speech enunciates five policies basic to the government's commitment in this area. Unemployment, with its alleviation, constitutes the largest and most discussed factor underlying the five points. No one wishes to make light of the plight of the unemployed. However, I think it does not hurt to remind ourselves that their plight is certainly much more favourable than was the situation in the 1930s. I am sure all of us are glad that government measures, while they may not be perfect, and while they may permit certain abuses, have made forever impossible the situation which existed during those dark years following the stock market crash in 1929, from which this country did not fully recover until the years of World War II.

The government has been criticized, as one would expect, for the level of unemployment in this country; and no one can take satisfaction from the unemployment figures which averaged around 6 per cent during a large portion of the 1960s. The government also has been criticized for the level of control or lack of control of assistance to the unemployed. The Prime Minister has often referred to his goal of achieving a just society. In striving for this just society the government may have erred on the side of mercy by developing a compassionate society. Even so, this is to be preferred to the situation which existed in the 1930s, even if there are some abuses. I am glad the government recognizes the need to review and reappraise the unemployment insurance system as well as other related social and welfare measures.

Let me say a word regarding the employment situation in Canada over the decade of the 1960s. Here I shall place on record figures which I have derived from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce Commercial Letter of September/October, 1972, which contains an article entitled The Canadian Economy, 1972-73. The table is as follows:

Population of Canada	18,583	21,568	16.1
Total civilian labour force	6,615	8,631	30.5
Employment	6,225	8,079	29.8
Unemployment rate (%) (Annual Average)	5.9%	6.4%

All figures, except percentages, in thousands.

The figures to which I wish to call your attention in this table have to do, first of all, with Canada's population growth from 1962 to 1971, which was, approximately, from 18.5 million to 21.5 million, an increase of 16.1 per cent. The trend into 1972, I read in the newspaper today, by the way, is approximately at the same rate of growth. The total Canadian labour force during the same period increased by over two million but, since this was from 6.6 million to 8.6 million, it was an increase of 30.5 percentage points, nearly twice the increase in the labour force as compared to the increase in our total population. The employment increase was from 6,225,000 in 1962 to 8,079,000 in 1971. These are yearly averages, for an increase of 29.8 per cent. In other words, of that large increase in the labour force, nearly twice the rate of general population growth, all but 0.7 per cent was absorbed into employment, a not inconsiderable record, even though during this period of abnormal growth our unemployment rate increased from an annual average of 5.9 per cent for the 1962 year to 6.4 per cent for the 1971 year.

In moving this motion in February 1972 in this place, Senator Buckwold referred to a statement which had been made by the Executive Vice-President and General Manager of the Bank of Montreal, which I think is worth repeating:

> We have a labour force growing at almost twice the rate of any other industrialized nation. During the present decade, in fact, it has been calculated that more people in absolute numbers, not percentages, will enter the work force in Canada than in the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and The Netherlands combined.

That is a group of countries whose population is more than five times that of Canada, but we will be adding to our work force, according to this prognostication, in the 1970s more persons than the total of those countries. It seems to me that this is a highly significant fact and that while none of us can take comfort from our unemployment figures, we should take pride in the rapid growth in the economy and of the labour force of this country, and in our ability to absorb nearly all the increase into the labour force. Surely as soon as there is the slightest levelling off in this population growth the unemployment figures in Canada ought to be much better. In the meantime, however, it seems to me that we should be as generous as possible in making available a decent living, a respectable and honourable living to those people who are unfortunate enough to be caught in the rolls of the unemployed at this time. It is not much consolation for an unemployed person to be told that the figures have dropped from 6 per cent to 3 per cent if he is included in the 3 per cent. I am sure we are all anxious that all measures should be adopted to improve the situation by means of the short-term methods which have been referred to in the Speech from the Throne and by the longer-term incentives which seem to be to be even more important.

Other specific proposals on which I should like to comment briefly have to do with the social policy of the country.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Will he give us the benefit of his wisdom with respect to inflation and will he agree with the Prime Minister that six months ago it was licked?

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I do not believe that is a question that requires an answer, honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Do you agree with the Prime Minister's statement that inflation was licked in this country six months ago? That is a question.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Are you asking me whether the Prime Minister said it or not?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am asking you whether you agree with the Prime Minister, who said six months ago that inflation in this country had been licked. Do you agree with that, or do you not? What is the answer?

Hon. Mr. Hicks: No, I cannot agree with that statement at the present time. If it did appear that way six months ago, there has been evidence since then that it had not been licked.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: He was wrong.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I do not hold that the Prime Minister is infallible, any more than I regard myself or the Honourable Senator O'Leary as infallible.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You are quite right, but I am asking you about the Prime Minister, whether you agree with him and you said you do not.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I do not agree that inflation has been licked, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Good.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: However, it is only fair to say that I was not referring to inflation at all, but to unemployment.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I asked you if you would give us the benefit of your wisdom with respect to it. You had been referring to unemployment and giving some very crazy figures.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I was giving figures with respect to unemployment which I think are irrefutable, without minimizing the difficulties of the unemployment situation.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Some of us are going to sleep over here.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I was trying to point out, honourable senators, that we ought not to lose sight of the very considerable accomplishments in the employment increase in Canada, deplorable as it may be that they have not quite, and I emphasize not quite, kept up with the increases in the numbers of the work force. They have, nevertheless, increased at a rate not exceeded by any other developed country in the world.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the answer.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Inflation is a different matter entirely and, with the leave of my honourable friend, I do not propose to deal with inflation this evening.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You had better not; you will be in trouble if you do.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I think anyone who has tried to deal with it in the whole of the Western World has been in trouble.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: It is higher in Canada than anywhere else and you know it.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: It has been extremely difficult to do so. Is my honourable friend suggesting that we should have a controlled economy? This is the only kind of economy that I know of that deals with inflation successfully. If that must be done and we control prices and everything that contributes to the cycle of inflation, then we have to control people's lives and a great many other things. I think my honourable friend knows that better than I.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I know it and I agree with you.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I have one other reference to the specific proposals that have been made to improve our social policy in this country, particularly the suggestion that there should be encouragement to investors to make money available to meet housing needs. I will be interested to see how the government proposes to implement this suggestion. Indeed, it is my view that one of the changes in the Income Tax Act to which I referred a while ago had exactly the opposite effect, in isolating different categories of a taxpayer's income and making it impossible to set off a loss, particularly a loss by depreciation suffered in respect to one source of income against other income. Of course, a great discouragement to the investment of money in housing was put into our laws. It will be interesting to see how the government proposes to remedy the situation. I agree that it needs to be remedied, and it will be in the interests of the nation as a whole if steps can be taken to bring about the desired result.

I am interested also in the suggestions concerning the physical fitness and health of Canadians. It seems to me that in this area Canada has lagged among the developed countries of the world. I am talking not only of the winning of Olympic medals and placing in international competitions. Even that is of importance to some nations and individuals. However, in my opinion it is important that a vigorous people, as Canadians are reputed to be, should remain vigorous, active and healthy. We have been late among developed nations—perhaps as a result of our division of responsibility between the federal and provincial governments—in providing government assistance for programs of physical fitness and health. An excellent start has now been made by the Canadian government under both political parties, and I am glad to see that further consideration will be given this matter.

Finally, I am interested in the suggestions contained in the Speech concerning Canada's environmental and ecological policy. It is popular these days to talk about the environment and about ecological matters, and it is important that Parliament should take advantage of the climate of public opinion in favour of improving the environment, even though it might involve some expense on the part of taxpayers and citizens of Canada. Advantage should be taken to "go while the going is good."

Reference was made specifically to the importance of marine science and technology. Here I propose to include the only plug contained in my remarks.

During the past year, there was completed at Dalhousie University, my own university in Nova Scotia, a truly magnificent research facility which we call our Life Sciences Centre. It houses the Department of Biology, strongly oriented toward marine biology problems, as is fitting for a university located by the sea, and it houses the Dalhousie Institute of Oceanography, which works hand in glove with the Bedford Institute of Oceanography, the federal agency on the Atlantic coast. There are joint appointments among scientists in both institutions, and teaching and research are being undertaken on a fully co-operative basis between the two institutions. The centre houses, in addition, our Department of Experimental Psychology, which also concerns itself with life problems, a great many of which are marine oriented.

The whole facility, costing $19 million, was provided from federal and provincial government funds, the federal support coming from the National Research Council and the Atlantic Development Board.

We are already getting under way with programs in the important area of marine science and technology, and I hope that we shall be able to play our part in any enhanced program at the federal government level. This area of research and inquiry is becoming of increasing importance to the support of life, including human life, and indeed to the survival of mankind.

My next point has to do with federal-provincial conférences. As our society becomes more complex and our federal-provincial problems become more difficult, the necessity for constant and continuing consultation between federal and provincial governments becomes greater. I am pleased to see that there is an impressive lineup of such meetings scheduled for the months and years ahead. Those meetings were listed in the Throne Speech.

It is important for the federal government to give strong leadership at these conferences. The rights of provinces are important, and are regarded as such by all provinces, perhaps more so by some than others. However, there are many problems in Canada which can not be solved by provincial action alone. Under our Constitution they can properly be dealt with only if there is a fair measure of give and take, of understanding, and agreement to share responsibility and to co-operate in implementing programs which are in the best interests of all Canadians.

At a later date I hope to speak extensively on the question of federal-provincial relations in support of post-secondary education. As honourable senators know, arrangements adopted in the fall of 1966 were extended for two years and will now expire in 1974, after which time new agreements will have to be reached between the federal and provincial governments. At a later date I shall make the point that Canada's universities should have a unifying influence on the country, and should be supported on that basis on a national level.

I am also pleased to see that conferences along these lines are scheduled to deal with such important matters as the report of the Economic Council of Canada, health care programs, housing, restrictions upon foreign ownership of land, income security and industrial policy.

My final reference is to that section in the Speech which referred to the Canadian Armed Forces. The following passage intrigued me:

> The Government intends to widen the area of service to Canada open to personnel in the Canadian Armed Forces. In addition to maintaining a high degree of military capability as the primary and most essential role of the Forces, new emphasis will be placed on the many areas in which the varied skills and training of this large number of dedicated Canadians can contribute to the achievement of national goals.

I regard that as a splendid idea, and I hope that when we discuss the measures to be implemented we shall not be too hidebound by traditional attitudes. It seems to me that in times of peace we have a great body of well-trained and well-supported Canadian citizens who, in addition to maintaining a state of preparedness to defend this country in time of war, could serve many other useful purposes, augmenting the civilian forces of our country and contributing to the improvement of our standard of living and the quality of life in Canada.

These then, honourable senators, are some of the points made and policy declarations enunciated in His Excellency's Speech which seem to me to be of particular significance—indeed of particular importance. Others have remarked that the Throne Speech opening this session is a less philosophical and more pragmatic document than this Parliament has been accustomed to during recent sessions.

In my remarks I have also tried to deal somewhat more pragmatically and less philosophically with a number of specific items in the Speech. However, the Speech surely does underline the most important philosophical and national goals of the government—to preserve national unity and achieve equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

During the recent election campaign, the Prime Minister used the phrase, "The land is strong." Since the election, he has said that he overestimated the strength of the land because the election campaign brought to light some evidences that the goal of national unity had not been achieved to the extent that the Prime Minister thought it had, and certainly there is ample evidence that much more needs to be done before we can achieve the goal of equality and opportunity for all Canadians.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, I submit that this land of ours is strong, despite the tensions that exist within our society, and despite the necessity of taking stock of our present situation and striving even harder to achieve our national goals. This land is strong—very strong in many respects. We are strong in natural resources, our economy is strong, and the strength and the potential of the Canadian people must never be underrated. I have recently read a report prepared for the White House Conference on the Industrial World Ahead, entitled The United States Economy in 1990. The forecasts are truly astonishing, and I think it is safe to say that most economists and businessmen feel that the growth potential of Canadian business and the Canadian economy during the next two decades may even exceed that of the United States. The article in the Bank of Commerce letter to which I referred earlier is confident and, for a bank, even optimistic about our immediate prospects in the year ahead. This is only one of many similar forecasts by economists and businessmen.

Let us then make the fullest use of our resources, both human and material, and continue to strive toward the twin goals of national unity and equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

The people of Canada are entitled to expect this from their national government and their national Parliament, and we ought not to allow any other considerations, here or in the other place, to deter us from giving a good account of ourselves to the nation and to its people whom we serve.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, faced with the honour of seconding the motion on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I feel quite incapable of attempting to make a learned and thorough analysis of it. It would also be that much more difficult after the speech of that wise and experienced political leader whose academic excellence ennobles this chamber, Senator Hicks.

Madam Speaker, I can now only reiterate the most sincere and cordial congratulations I had the opportunity of expressing to you on your accession to the highest office in the Senate. All your colleagues, as myself, were not only happy but delighted that the speakership should have been offered to you and that you should have accepted it. From the time when I first came to the Senate, I noticed that more than anyone else you were a model of devotion and competence in the performance of your duties as senator. I hope that you will remain with us for a long time to come that all senators, present and future, might continue to benefit from that example, to find support in your wisdom and to depend on your cordial friendship.

To our new colleagues I extend our most sincere welcome. Like Senator Flynn I would have liked to see the ranks of his team increased to a greater extent, but quality makes up for quantity.

Several of us got to know Senator Asselin in the other place or during meetings of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. He is a tough and uncompromising fighter. However, when required, he knows how to compromise and he does so loyally.

Senator Laing is an old trooper whose experience will be valuable to us. He first sought election 35 years ago, and succeeded for the first time 24 years ago. His experience led him to the legislative assembly of his province and also to the other place where he made his mark in whatever department he was called upon to head. Moreover, like Senator van Roggen, he has personal knowledge of the great Canadian Northwest and its inhabitants and until our Constitution provides otherwise, I wish to see in them the spokesmen for that very important, although very remote segment of our population.

Senators Greene and Côté are practically political twins having been elected at the same time to the House of Commons, admitted at the same time to the Privy Council and called at the same time to the Senate. While I did not consult their health records, I should not be surprised if they had been admitted to hospital at the same time. Let us therefore assure them that they will receive here only tender loving care, since we do not want to be deprived of the benefit of their judgment, of their eloquence and of the profound humanity they displayed in the other place.

Senator Neiman, whose youth and fine presence are gratifying for us, has proved herself in law and politics, but it is mainly as a mother of a young family that I wish to welcome her in this chamber. Let her not feel intimidated if her entry here takes place with a flight of Privy Councillors.

And if these last words were to be translated or interpreted as "a flight of Privy Councillors," let me assure honourable senators that I use it in its strictly aeronautical sense.

The Speech from the Throne at the opening of a new Parliament is a bit like the opening sermon of an Easter retreat in the old days. When the preacher was a Capuchine, then the seven capital sins were reviewed; however, if he was a Dominican, he would speak of the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost and the attendant virtues. But, already, it has been suggested that this document was rather Jesuistic and that everyone found in it what he was looking for—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The Jesuits spoke mainly of death.

Hon. Mr. Lafond: —everyone found in it what he was looking for: the Opposition in each of its parliamentary sects, the provinces, and perhaps, even a number of pontiffs, smaller and greater, of the written and spoken media. The surprise of the latter, however, cannot be but of a short duration because, since they have arrogated the role of the only constant and resolute opposition to any government, they do not feel that they can any longer exist or work out of an almost permanent negativism.

It has been suggested that, in this Speech from the Throne, the government has retreated from its position in the recent election campaign. There may be a little bit of truth in this. The Prime Minister himself bowed to the lesson the electorate taught him. However, the government was not pulling back from naught, but from well-established positions, for a comeback more in accordance with the wishes of the population and with the program having been developed and implemented in the light of the Liberal philosophy.

One should not believe that since the Liberal government has suffered a setback in popularity, the truth monopoly was diverted towards the other parties or the provincial governments.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A party should not remain in the same place either.

Hon. Mr. Lafond: The Liberal government is still in office, its support among the population, as in the other place, being still greater than that of any other party. Indeed, it intends, to a greater extent, to provide for more consultation with the provinces and more co-ordination among the programs issuing from all levels of government, but this while thoroughly respecting the nature of our federal state, and those who will fight that goal should watch out for themselves.

As I said, the government stepped back in order to better rally. Whichever party was given responsibility for governing, I believe that over this period of 1972-73, the government itself at all levels had to get closer to the citizen. I think that in recent years developed the idea that the state could put people into operation, whereas it is people who put the state into operation.

[English]

As a third assistant coach in the latest exercise in democracy, following the result the thought grew upon me that it would not hurt any of us to go back to basics in political action. To that end I undertook to read again the memoirs of the Earl of Woolton. Early in his career, many years before he became the Bobby Orr of political organization, Frederick Marquis, as he was then known, was about to join a vast commercial enterprise, and on the morrow of World War I, in 1919, he set out for the United States to acquaint himself with the operation in that country of commercial and industrial management.

Reflecting some time later on what he had learned, he put down on paper what he himself described as a piece of doggerel:

> It is not in devising a system that the fearful dangers lurk:
> It is not in devising a system but in making the system work;
> For the working out of the system is not in the hands of the great,
> But rests on the shoulders of little clerks like Mary and Jane and Kate.

Forty years later, at the writing of his memoirs, he added this comment:

> There is a lesson that contemporary politicians can learn from that.

Is that not extremely valid still? It is not the ministers, nor the mandarins within two miles of this building, who will make any of the many systems they devise work. It is not they who will even make Canada work, but it is Bill and Marcel and Edith and Georgette who will make them work.

Let any government, Grit or Tory, this year or next, keep that in mind.

[Translation]

Senator Hicks, who comes from the east, and myself from the centre, see with much satisfaction the new overtures offered by the government to the citizens of the west. I find bewildering that any federal government would have neglected to afford the occidental region of our country all the attention and care it can rightly expect. But perhaps that attention was sufficiently sustained and explicit. For us from central Canada, or for the people of the east, it is sometimes very difficult to understand this feeling of isolation, or remoteness, experienced by the people west of us. I am much relieved therefore in seeing these new efforts to try to remedy this.

I find satisfaction also in the paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne which deal with the agricultural sector announcing the firm intention of the government to remedy without delay the two major ills which plague the agricultural industry since our sales of grain abroad have reached the peak of 1970-1971.

First, there is the problem of transport, storing and handling of grains, an area where some uneasiness developed in 1972; last weekend there was even the resurfacing threat of a strike in Vancouver harbour.

Secondly, the cost of distributing feed grain for cattle producers. Heaven knows how farm associations, provincial governments and federal members of Parliament of all political affiliations, of the province of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces have made representations on the subject in the past two years.

I am clearly under the impression that these questions could have been dealt with sooner and I hope there will be no further delay. I also anticipate the appropriate role that our Standing Committee on Agriculture will play in this regard.

The Speech from the Throne also said:

> Parliament will be asked to confirm the basic principles of the Government's program for bilingualism in the Public Service.

And in the next paragraph:

> The Government will continue to work in furtherance of the objectives of the Official Languages Act.

Then come details about those measures.

As is so well indicated by the use of two separate paragraphs in the text of the speech, bilingualism in the Public Service is not the whole thing but only a component of cultural bilingualism and the language policy in this country and a component which is not of universal application geographically or otherwise as it would seem some trouble-making newspapermen and headline writers of the English-speaking press have successfully led people to believe.

This program conceived and unveiled fifty years too late was unfortunately, one must admit, announced, put forward and implemented up to now with disheartening clumsiness.

Since the outset and up to last December 14 the main concern was, sometimes in the midst of panic to allay the fears, warranted or not, rather than to make an honest effort to dispel them.

[English]

May I digress here a moment to join our colleagues who have already paid tribute to the memory of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, a great Canadian, a great Prime Minister, and a great "doer" during his short tenure as Prime Minister. I was fortunate in having ready access to him, particularly in the last twelve months preceding his retirement, and I had the utmost respect for him. History may well single him out mostly for having initiated and pushed relentlessly, and with the deepest sincerity, policies recognizing the bilingual and multicultural nature of our country. But Mr. Pearson, like many of us, was perhaps prone to turn a phrase which did not always circumscribe precisely his full intention. Such to my mind was the expression: "No one will suffer . . ."

"Suffering" is a completely subjective expression. What was bound to happen did happen as every one interpreted it his own way whether they were involved or not.

I have always believed and I still do that any policy of this kind had disadvantages and problems which might well be called "suffering" if we are not prepared to show the required good faith and good will. This is a subject which I am familiar with since I have been a bilingual federal public servant myself, immediately before and after World War II.

It is expensive to become bilingual and to remain so at any age. It is costly in terms of money, time, effort and frustration. My compatriots know something about this because they have been paying for it for more than a century.

Essentially, what is aimed at by the bilingual policy in the Public Service, besides providing services in both languages and creating opportunities for unilingual francophone public servants, is that the anglophone element involved in the Public Service, especially in the national capital region, share, to a certain extent, this cost in money, energy, time and frustrations of which I just spoke.

If we are to believe the local newspapers and the spokesmen for many groups of public servants over the past years, there is willingness to share the cost of bilingualism in terms of money—at any rate, it is paid by the government—but not the cost in energy, inconvenience and frustration.

If we were to stop there, this would clearly be inadequate, not to say disastrous.

However, I cannot believe that the majority of our English-speaking citizens of this area have exhausted these features typical of their race: broad-mindedness and generosity. I trust that it will soon be realized that the uneasiness which afflicts us now will only be relieved by a common contribution of co-operation and good will.

This applies also to French-speaking public servants, leaders and journalists. The Commissioner of Official Languages stated in his report for 1970-71 and I quote:

> If dialogue and trust are needed to help French-speaking public servants develop their potential, these qualities are required no less to help their English-speaking colleagues adapt to linguistic reform. Perhaps it is inevitable that in Ottawa, particularly, the climate surrounding bilingualism should be far from serene: after all, in this administrative capital, bilingualism is no distant matter of theory, it concerns jobs and careers right now. But by working in at least informal harmony, Members of Parliament (from Ottawa and elsewhere), staff associations, the Public Service Commission, the Secretary of State's Department, the Treasury Board and the Commissioner of Official Languages ought to be able to relieve a good deal of the anxiety raised, very often needlessly, by decisions and even rumours on this subject.

I agree, but up to December 14 last, nothing of the kind had occurred.

A few words about the part played by politicians in that matter in recent years. I am now referring not to all but to several candidates and members who generally speak more often and louder in all parties on both sides of the river and who for purely electoral purposes have done their best to fan fears rather than allay or dispel them. As the light at the other end of the tunnel which must not be allowed to go out, the bilingual question was constantly to give rise to bitter controversies. Elected or defeated those people will only have helped to write one of the most abject and contemptible pages of the political history of this area.

I twice mentioned December 14 last. I am of course referring to the policy statement on bilingualism in the Public Service issued on that day by the President of the Treasury Board. Nothing would have prevented such a statement being made four or five years ago; it seems to me utter nonsense that we had to wait so long before it was definitely determined which responsibilities rested with the Secretary of State, the Public Service or the Treasury Board.

[Hon. Mr. Lafond.]

Finally, crying over past events, as I am afraid I have been doing these last few minutes, will not get us anywhere.

There is no question of my going through the details of the new policy statement; we shall probably have the opportunity to do so at some other time.

But the document published four weeks ago by Mr. Drury permits us, for the first time in a while, to be somewhat optimistic. It gives us all the opportunity of a new start that must not be missed; and those who on either side called that statement a "victory" or a "retreat" contribute but very little to the solution of the conflict.

The editor of the Ottawa Journal showed in the December 27 edition of that newspaper much more wisdom than the reporters of the same newspaper when he wrote:

> Some of the knee-jerk criticism of the new policies failed sadly to see both sides of the coin . . . For those in English-speaking Canada who consider the guidelines as mere window-dressing, there are some in Quebec who consider them a retreat from the commitment to greater bilingualism. Language fairness continues to require understanding and compromise from both linguistic communities. Guidelines written in heaven won't succeed without a will to make them work.

And I say: "Come on, Ottawa, let us make them work."

We are told, in the Speech from the Throne, that we will be asked to study a bill on election expenses. You will recall that a similar bill was left pending when the last Parliament was dissolved. It can be expected that the new bill will not differ much from the old.

There is need for such a measure. It may even be said that the need is pressing. Still, even with the best intentions in the world and total concentration, a first draft could not be expected to result in permanent legislation on the subject. To my mind, we will have to start by removing the main obstacles; then, after all political parties have tested the act through experience, its objectives can be refined and carried out further.

Again with regard to the electoral process, let us point out that it was quite satisfactory in spite of the handicap of major holidays, one of which fell during the enumeration period and the other during the revision period. There was considerable improvement in the fact that the results of the military and other votes were announced on general election day.

In spite of all this, however, I should like to see Parliament resume its study of the recommendations of the Representation Commissioner in his report on the methods of drawing up voters' lists as submitted in April 1968. The adoption of a system providing for continuous electoral rolls, a system which he recommends, would do much to shorten election campaigns and reduce expenses. It seems to me this goes hand in hand with legislation intended to reduce election expenses.

We also note that the revision of electoral boundaries which is carried out every ten years is now under way and proceeding very satisfactorily, thanks to the experience acquired in 1966. Inevitably, this exercise can never satisfy everyone, but that is the price we have to pay for proportional representation and I am sure that no greater derogations from that rule than we are now practicing will ever be envisaged.

[English]

Honourable senators, as a last item, I note the government intends to recommend the broadcasting by radio and television of the proceedings of the House of Commons and of its committees. I, of course, do not intend to comment on the wishes and the procedures of the other place, although I should expect the Senate will have a say to the extent that this will apply to joint committees.

I cannot withhold the reflection that this may open an additional field to the culture and practice of what has been described by Clay Whitehead, the director of the White House office of telecommunications policy, as "ideological plug-o-la."

This is a virus which need not be imported into Canada. We have for some time nurtured a strain of our own which needs no hybridization.

It has been well documented in a detailed study of the election coverage by our television networks on the late evening news during the last three weeks of the campaign, by Dean Joseph Scanlon of the Carleton University School of Journalism. Dean Scanlon stated on the CBC program "Commentary":

> Since the election, both Robert Stanfield and Pierre Trudeau have been claiming the right to govern this country. Frankly, they're both wrong. On the basis of CBC and CTV late evening news—for the last three weeks before the election—there is little doubt that the NDP and David Lewis won the election. Lewis . . . got more on camera time than his opponents, better play and, in my opinion, more favourable treatment.

And this did not end by any means with the election itself. I leave it to honourable senators to guess who in living colour and via satellite from London immediately followed Her Majesty the Queen on "The National" on Christmas night.

The CBC must have great faith in the durability of this Parliament and in order to adhere to its guidelines probably plans to give this spot to Mr. Caouette in 1973, and have Messrs. Stanfield and Trudeau share 1974 and 1975.

Today on the national AM radio news at 1 p.m. the leading item I thought was the announcement of the latest unemployment figures. Who was the one national political leader to come on live immediately after the commentary? Again, guess who? It seems to me that if I were in King David's shoes I would be terribly afraid that this was already being overdone, and I would be afraid of what would happen.

The broadcasting of parliamentary debates may be worth the attempt, but it seems to me we should be extremely careful that in so doing we are not fashioning tools that will be used to filter and manipulate in biased fashion the channels of communications between the population itself and its political leaders.

[Translation]

The Speech from the Throne is therefore proving to be an excellent working document. With a few exceptions, the proposals set forth therein have equal priority and I am sure the population will not put up with any parliamentary games prior to the carrying out of the work at hand in its entirety.

It is therefore with great pleasure that I second the motion of Senator Hicks for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

On motion of Honourable Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

NEWFOUNDLAND "WRACKERS"

MAGAZINE ARTICLE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. The January issue of Maclean's magazine carries an article entitled "The Wrackers of Newfoundland," written by one Bartley Higgins. In this connection I am today addressing a letter to the editor of Maclean's magazine, and I should like to have the contents of that letter form part of today's proceedings in the Senate.

The Editor,

Maclean's.

In your January issue, Bartley Higgins in an article entitled "The Wrackers of Newfoundland," states:

"In years gone by, wrackers were out-and-out criminals who lured unsuspecting vessels onto the rocks, where they could be plundered at leisure. The early inhabitants of Cape Bauld and Cape Norman——were noted for their tendency to set inviting false beacons on stormy nights, or when visibility at sea was poor."

These, honourable senators, are the two capes at the extremities of the Strait of Belle Isle on the Newfoundland side.

This statement is untrue. There has never been the slightest evidence that people living in the Strait of Belle Isle ever tried to lure ships ashore by "false beacons," or by any other device. In fact, in Newfoundland's long maritime history—

A history which goes back to the year 1497.

—that charge has only been seriously levelled on one occasion and then it was in reference to a portion of Southern Newfoundland, not Northern. Moreover, there is reason to believe that this allegation was politically motivated. In any case it was never proven.

Higgins concludes his article with this gem: "... experienced ship captains, when they see the rugged, rockbound coast of north Newfoundland and Labrador on the horizon, still treat it with respect. For they know that there are friendly but patient men over there—waiting."

I find it incredible that Maclean's would print such utter rubbish. Stripping abandoned wrecks has been practised in all ages everywhere since man first put to sea. When a ship is wrecked on the coast of Newfoundland it is usually a matter of hours, or, at best days, before the ship and its contents are at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean. Failure to salvage the contents would be outright stupidity.

HMS Raleigh, probably the most modern warship then afloat—

—went ashore in a pea-soup fog only a few yards from a light-house in the Strait of Belle Isle. She was given up by the Admiralty, as Higgins concedes and at that point the local residents had perfect right to salvage whatever they could.

The picture that Higgins gives of Newfoundland fishermen waiting like ghouls or harpies for some unfortunate vessel to become stranded, is a complete lie. The history of Newfoundland is replete with instances where residents risked their lives, as I can personally testify, to prevent ships from going ashore. And when ships have become wrecked, Newfoundland men and women have risked, and, in some cases, given their lives to save crew and passengers.

When the American destroyers Castor and Pollux ran ashore on the South Coast of Newfoundland in a blinding blizzard in the winter of 1942, it was the incredible bravery and ingenuity of the people of Lawn and St. Lawrence that saved 176 men.

All the others were drowned.

Today, in St. Lawrence, there stands a fine modern hospital, put there by the Congress of the United States on the recommendation of President Franklin Roosevelt, to express the gratitude of the American people.

This article is a piece of cheap journalism, but it is consistent with much that has been written about Newfoundland in recent years, usually, but not always, by visiting itinerant journalists and writers who, having enjoyed the hospitality of the Newfoundland people, seize hold of some grotesque or bizarre aspect of our life or culture,—

And every country and every community has that.

—distort it out of proportion, and, where necessary, invent, to produce something to sell.

I regret that Maclean's has unwittingly encouraged this form of journalistic prostitution by publishing the article in question.

Honourable senators, we do not as a rule pay any attention to articles, stories and other items that appear from time to time. We try to shrug them off. However, this article, carried in a national magazine, is so libelous in character that I felt I had no choice, as a citizen of Newfoundland and as a Canadian, to rise in my place to repudiate it.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I take you back to the last day of the last session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament, to September 1, 1972, to be precise. It was quite obvious when we met then that the government had finally decided to dissolve Parliament and go to the people.

I expressed the hope at that time that when we reconvened there would be drastic changes in this and the other place.

It was obvious on September 1 that when we returned the Senate would have refurbished paintings on the walls. I was hoping, however, for something more meaningful. I was hoping for several new faces, especially Conservative faces. I was especially hoping for a change of sides. That has not quite come to pass yet. It is a project we Conservatives have for the late winter or early spring.

Well, the changes in the Senate have not been as dramatic as I had hoped. It is in the other place that we have a situation without precedent in our political history. I will come back to that matter later. First of all, I should like to deal with the situation in this chamber.

There is no doubt about it, Senator Martin is still the Leader of the Government in this chamber, and in that respect I feel I must express to him my most heartfelt sympathy. It will not be any easier to defend this metamorphosed Trudeau government than it was to defend the previous one. Senator Martin, admittedly, has vast experience in adapting to changed circumstances. He has learned to adapt to contradictory policies over the years as well as to leaders with completely different personalities.

There is not doubt about it, as I said before, Senator Martin is flexible—flexible and thick-skinned. One has to be to have served with equal devotion under Mackenzie King, St. Laurent, Pearson, and Pierre Trudeau. Senator Martin owes his survival only to his unquestioning party loyalty.

But Senator Martin can take heart. The horrible task of defending this government, as I read the Throne Speech, has been lightened somewhat. He will not have to tell us about the "Just Society," nor will he have to tell us how "This Land is Strong." That sort of bilge water has been washed away.

The 1968 Liberal program is to be forgotten. As a matter of fact, the Liberals would even like to sweep under the rug the program they proposed in the most recent campaign. The idea now is to sell the Throne Speech. Granted, the sale of intangibles is not easy, but Senator Martin can take consolation in the fact that he will not have to struggle for long. He will soon be relieved of his duties as government leader in this chamber.

Honourable senators, I pause here to congratulate Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson on having been appointed Speaker. She is the first woman to preside over this body, and, in fact, the first lady Speaker in the federal Parliament.

She is a fine choice. Her appointment has met with unanimous approval. From the time she was summoned to the Senate in 1953, Senator Fergusson has demonstrated wisdom, ability, industriousness and a high sense of duty. She has steadfastly championed the causes of the less fortunate in our society and has gained everyone's profound respect for so doing.

Her appointment pleases me in a personal way. I have known Senator Fergusson since 1942, at which time we were both enforcement counsel for the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, she in Saint John, New Brunswick, and I in Quebec City.

I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that from the Official Opposition you will receive nothing but the fullest co-operation. We wish you well. We already know that you can discharge your duties with excellence. I would say here that the best thing you have done in French is to recite the prayers.

Honourable senators, we also have five new members. Four of them are former cabinet ministers. The fifth is not a privy councillor, but I am sure she is just as capable, certainly more charming, and definitely a lot prettier. I am sure that, given the results of the last election, Senators Greene, Côté and Laing probably appreciate being here more than they ever suspected they would.

[Translation]

May I be permitted to give special mention to the accession to this chamber of Senator Martial Asselin. He is the first since 1963 to join the ranks of the Official Opposition. We are grateful to the Prime Minister for having strengthened our group by appointing a man who is still young and energetic and enriched by valuable experience acquired during close to ten years in the House of Commons.

I myself welcome a personal friend and I know I am expressing the sentiments of the Official Opposition when I tell him we are delighted to have him among us. I shall add that I have no doubt the Senate as a whole is very pleased to welcome him to this chamber.

Nevertheless, adding one senator to the Official Opposition group does not correct the unacceptable imbalance between the group of government supporters and the Official Opposition group, which includes two Independents and one Social Credit senator.

Since 1963, the number of senators belonging to the Conservative Party has decreased from 34 to 17. Only 20 senators are not members of the Liberal caucus. The government can depend on the support of three quarters of the Senate. Our system, as conceived, devolves a definite and heavy task on the Opposition, which it cannot accomplish without being in sufficient number.

May I recall that the former government leader in the Senate, the Honourable John J. Connolly, stated on several occasions that the number of senators in the Opposition should never be less than one third.

In any case, the Senate can trust that the Official Opposition, with the means at its disposal, will nevertheless do its utmost to discharge fully its duties.

[English]

Honourable senators, I would now like to congratulate both the mover (Senator Hicks) and the seconder (Senator Lafond) of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Of course, Senator Hicks has brought to this house a lot of experience in public affairs and excellent qualifications as an orator. His contribution to the debate was interesting in many respects, but especially in the strong condemnation he made of the Income Tax Act in urging that it be amended in depth. That part of his speech would have fitted in very well when the so-called tax reform bill was before this house at the end of December, 1971.

Honourable senators will remember that the tax bill was forced down our throats by a majority of government supporters in this house, despite the warnings of many on both sides that numerous provisions of the bill were seriously deficient and would create extensive confusion—the kind of confusion Senator Hicks denounced yesterday. It would be interesting to speculate as to whether Senator Hicks would have made the same speech had he been here then or whether he would have ignored his leader's directive at that time to abstain in order to help towards quicker passage of that legislation by the famous deadline of December 31, 1971.

[Translation]

As for the speech of my friend, Senator Lafond, I can only praise it. As usual, he expressed his thoughts with poise, subtlety and effectiveness. It is always a pleasure to listen to him.

[English]

The results of the October 30 election have produced a situation in the other place which is without precedent in the political history of this country. For all practical purposes, the two major parties are on equal footing. On a purely mathematical basis, the Liberal administration could justify its remaining in office in order to find out whether Parliament was prepared to support it. Nevertheless, the election was unquestionably a major defeat for the Trudeau government. If there was any victor, it was Robert Stanfield and the party I have the honour of leading in this chamber.

True, the support that each of the major parties received across Canada has produced a rather confused picture, which lends itself to various interpretations.

Apart from Quebec, where the Liberal Party retained its historical strength, and apart from New Brunswick where there was a split, each party winning five seats, the remaining eight provinces returned more Conservative members than Liberals to the House of Commons.

The result in Quebec, in my opinion, requires close scrutiny. It cannot simply be taken at face value. The government obtained only 49 per cent of the total vote. This percentage slides down to around 43 per cent, if you exclude the Island of Montreal where most of the English voters reside. The division of the anti-Liberal votes between the Conservatives and the Creditistes has had much to do with the practical success of the Trudeau government in Quebec.

Many objective Quebecers, insightful observers of the political scene, would agree with me that it is regrettable that historical circumstances have permitted the support of the P.C. Party to decrease to the point where it has not been able to elect more than a few members since the election of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1896. With the exception of 1911, when 27 members of the coalition of Nationalists and Conservatives were elected against 37 Liberals; of 1930, when the Conservatives won 24 seats to the Liberals 40; and of 1958 when the Progressive Conservatives won 50 seats and the Liberals 25, my party has not done well in Quebec.

I suggest to you that it is a bad situation for Canada and for Quebec when one of the only two parties capable of forming a government cannot obtain a minimum of support in Quebec, in French Canada. Some say that the Tories are anti-French. To me, that is entirely false. It is just as false as the intended corollary to the effect that the Liberals are the party of the French Canadians.

I entirely reject the recent lamentations of certain Grit militants. The election of October 30 was definitely not a backlash against Quebec. Not a single responsible and knowledgeable editorialist in the province of Quebec has accepted that thesis.

The plain fact is that outside Quebec the issues which dominated the campaign were the problems relating to our economy: inflation, unemployment, taxation, and other matters of the same kind. It was those very same issues which, in Quebec, incited 51 per cent of the electors to vote for parties other than the Liberal Party.

How can we speak of a backlash in Ontario where the Liberals took a beating? Yes, they took a beating, of course, but if there had been a backlash they would not have elected 35 members as compared to 40 members for the Conservatives.

I say to those who insist that the English-speaking provinces voted against Quebec in the last election that they are mindlessly repeating what was said by a few in 1957. On that occasion, and how well I remember it, these same people could not accept the verdict. They were convinced, as they still are, that only the Liberal Party is able to assure national unity in this country.

If we were to believe these narrow-minded Grits—and I hasten to say that they are not too numerous, although they are vociferous—we would have to believe that the survival of Canada depends on a permanent support of their party, not only in Quebec, but everywhere else in Canada.

Well, I don't believe in, and I don't think anybody else here believes in, a one-party system. That would smack of dictatorship.

It intrigued me to read in yesterday's newspapers that the Prime Minister had accused the Tories of trying to divide Canada during the election campaign. When pressed for evidence, the only statement the Prime Minister could come up with in support of his accusation was Mr. Stanfield's description of Jean Marchand as Santa Claus to Quebecers.

Well, the fact is that this statement of Mr. Stanfield's was made in Quebec City itself at the end of the campaign, a few days after Mr. Marchand had announced grants of several million dollars to renovate the Place Royale, the Old Arsenal and other historical places in Quebec. I say this statement by Mr. Stanfield was justified. It was not directed against Quebec nor was it disparaging of Quebecers themselves. The Prime Minister, who a few days before had said that if the electorate wanted candy he would give it to them, is hardly in any position to make a fuss about Mr. Stanfield's statement. A man who has demonstrated such supreme cynicism towards Canadians in general should be more guarded about accusing anyone—especially the Leader of the Conservative Party who has shown himself to be responsible under very difficult circumstances—of fanning the flames of racism.

What is really dangerous for the unity of this country is the very attitude that all those who support the Conservative Party are against Quebec or against French Canadians. That is a barefaced and dangerous lie.

I, for one, have supported the Conservative Party for 20 years, and I am satisfied that I am as good a Canadian as any Liberal. Some Liberals have always been too vain to accept defeat valiantly and manfully. Despite the fact that since 1896 their party has been in office for close to 60 years and the Conservatives only 17, they want to hang on to power as if it was theirs by divine right.

Of course, there are bigots in all parties, but if any party as a whole has been guilty of using racial arguments for electoral purposes, it has been the Liberal Party in Quebec. I make this accusation with no hesitation whatever.

When I was a tender youth, Liberal speakers fulminated through Quebec describing the conscription of 1917 as the Tory conscription, when in fact it was imposed by the Union government. I have heard Liberal speakers refer to my party as the English party, and the accusations made against its leaders during the campaigns of 1953, 1957 and 1958 were the lowest and vilest of their kind, unfit to repeat.

I won't pursue this matter any further. I only wanted to express my disagreement with the thesis of the backlash against Quebec on October 30. I wanted to give voice to my firm belief that the interests of Canada, and that includes the province of Quebec, would be better served if there was adequate representation of Quebec or French Canada in the two major parties, the only parties able to muster a sufficient number of members in the House of Commons to form a government.

I am not greedy. I am not asking for much. I would just like to see us with a safe nucleus of about 15 seats in Quebec. The Liberal Party, at the worst of times in Ontario could always count on returning at least that number.

Let me sum up the meaning of the last election for you. The people of Canada rejected as unacceptable an unfeeling, unimaginative and inefficient administration, mismanagement of the economy, inability to curb inflation, arrogance in imposing fiscal reform which has created only confusion, high unemployment, spiralling taxes, obvious lack of respect for and confidence in private enterprise and private decisions, the downgrading of Parliament, and the pursuit of goals very often contradictory.

These are the reasons why the electorate so soundly thrashed the Liberals in the last election. It was the government's miserable record that lost it so many seats.

The increased support for the Progressive Conservative Party is attributable to a well-designed program presented by a leader who inspires security and stability. This practical, if not mathematical, victory of Mr. Stanfield's is a victory for self-reliance, self-sufficiency and self-respect. It is a victory for the attitude that more government is not the answer to our problems. It is a victory for the principle that change should not be sought merely for change's sake. And it is a victory for Parliament. Parliament will now have restored to it the authority which is rightfully its own.

In any event, whatever interpretation one can place on the election results, it is quite obvious that the public was not satisfied with the government.

The P.M. accepted the blame. He pleaded "guilty as charged" and promised to change his ways, to do better. That was, and nobody will deny it, the essence of his speech when he informed Canadians that he had decided to remain in office.

It is interesting to remember the questions that arose in people's minds at that time. Would Mr. Trudeau remain the independent, somewhat arrogant individual he had always been, and resign, or would he compromise for the sake of keeping power, if not for himself, at least for his party?

I remember when Mr. Trudeau and his good friends, Messrs. Marchand and Pelletier, used to take great pleasure in castigating and ridiculing the Liberal Party. I remember when Mr. Trudeau even belittled Mr. Pearson. How strange it was to see this very same crew in 1965 join the ranks of that very same party they had so mercilessly condemned. Of course, politics, as you know, makes for very strange bedfellows.

I suggested at that time that the Liberal Party was, at least in Quebec, purely an electoral machine, and that it was obvious that these people, without any relevant conviction, were trying to use it to serve their own specific and personal purposes and I asked: Would Messrs. Trudeau, Marchand and Pelletier make more use of the Liberals than the Liberal Party would make of them? Well, it seems the party has kept the upper hand, or at least that is the way the Grits I know feel about it. We'll see.

The Cabinet was shuffled after the election in an attempt to overcome serious shortcomings in the administration. The Cabinet liabilities have been moved out of their disaster areas. The new ministers, or the old ministers heading new departments, did not lose time in making it quite clear that they were not bound by their predecessors' attitudes and programs. They wanted an opportunity to correct the mistakes made prior to the election, mistakes which had been presented as achievements but which the election results revealed for what they were.

Of course, it was imperative for the government, if it wanted to remain in office, to make concessions, especially to the NDP, which holds the balance of power. It is in that perspective that the Speech from the Throne was prepared. This represented a monumental task. That is probably why they did not convene Parliament in December and had to wait until the beginning of this month.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne is quite a document. The one given in the last session of the previous Parliament, in February 1972, was an innovation in style. It tried to formulate an analysis of the philosophy of the government as it applied to the economic and social contexts of the day, a formula which I then described as "rather pretentious."

Honourable senators will remember that the leitmotiv or slogan of that Throne Speech was isolation—isolation created by social injustice, isolation created by geographical background. It was suggested that what the government had to do to straighten the situation out was to introduce legislation that would do away with this grave fault in our society.

In retrospect, I would suggest that the government was the one that suffered most from that isolation, isolation from the people, impossibility to understand the real problems. All it did, with great self-satisfaction, was to expound a rather nebulous philosophy. They must have realized after the election how far apart they had grown from the electorate. The style of the Speech from the Throne which we heard last Thursday was completely new. It tried to recite more concrete goals. Looking at it as a whole, I would say that the Speech from the Throne is an attempt at promising everything to everyone. Despite the praise it received from Messrs. Lewis and Caouette, and the great pleasure of the Prime Minister, his ministers and the Liberal members in the other place, both Messrs. Lewis and Caouette are obviously afraid of another election and neither of them has the fortitude to reiterate in a concrete way at this time the charges they made against the government during the last campaign. It is impossible, I suggest, despite this praise from Messrs. Lewis and Caouette, to determine exactly how the goals set down in this Throne Speech will be attained.

We are told that the government wants to control and correct inflation, that it wishes unemployment to decrease, that it wishes to improve social benefits for those who need them, that it wants the economy to expand. It wants a whole lot of other laudable things to happen. But when the Prime Minister or any member of his Cabinet is asked a specific question, he is unable to give a specific answer. As a clear-cut example, we have been unable to find out whether the 3 per cent income tax increase which was reinstated at the beginning of the year will be abolished. What additional benefits will be offered our senior citizens? To me, it is quite obvious that the government is bluffing. It has no new solutions; it is devoid of any worthwhile ideas. It is waiting and hoping that circumstances will come to its rescue.

Of course, when you are the successor of Mackenzie King, maybe there is a temptation to believe, as he did, that you are indispensable to the welfare of the Canadian people, that you have a divine right to rule, that Providence will smile indulgently as you scrape the bottom of the barrel and use all the tricks imaginable, whether moral or not, in order to cling to power. Any kind of about face is justified, if it will keep you in power. Yesterday you may have been convinced that winter works was not a good idea; today you will announce that you have set aside $500 million to go into winter works. Tomorrow you will explain that the sum really works out to less than $100 million during the present winter. In a few weeks you will announce that there will be practically nothing done until next year, and next year, if God and David Lewis—yes, there is a difference between God and David Lewis—spare you until then, you may change your mind.

You could possibly describe the government's attitude with regard to unemployment insurance in the same way. First, they extend it, turn it into a welfare program, preach the benefits of the leisure society, tell young people to do their own thing, encourage them to milk the very system they are never done criticizing. When the taxpayer gets fed up and almost turns them out of office, they put on a big act, tell him they are going to get tough with loafers and how they are going to crack down on the cheats. Then they tell him how their basic philosophy has not changed and try and tell him they are not playing both ends against the middle. Who can believe such a spate of unscrupulous declarations?

When you look back over the last two months, you realize that the government has been mortally wounded by the results of the election. Since it cannot accept its fate, since it cannot acknowledge for all practical purposes that it has been rebuffed by the electorate and soundly defeated, it is trying to save face and maintain itself in power by all means possible, whether ethical or unethical. Its problem is not to provide an efficient administration and progressive legislation, but to avoid at all costs a vote of non-confidence. Unable to give leadership, it begs the support of a party whose philosophy is completely opposed to its own. It is a pitiful sight and it is a situation which is harmful to the country.

Mr. Stanfield and the Conservative Party were the only ones to make any significant gains in the last election. The Conservatives are on their way up. We are, therefore, in a much better position to offer a progressive, determined and courageous administration. Our platform was not rejected out of hand; it was endorsed. It is what the Grits plagiarized to write the Throne Speech we are discussing. They are following our lead. Why not give the country its true leaders?

A Progressive Conservative government, realizing that only by vigorous economic growth can this country afford and support sound social advancement, would not wage a war of attrition against the private sector. It would set as a primary goal of its economic policies, increased productivity and efficiency by increasing private initiative and the pursuit of legitimate profits. There is nothing unholy about profits. There is nothing inhuman about the free market. We should be striving to restore profitability as the basic criterion against which to judge what should or should not be produced. Sure, education, health, the ecology, social assistance, et cetera are important. Certainly, private enterprise must bear these factors in mind when making decisions. Most assuredly the private sector must have a social conscience. But, that is the whole point, profits are what make the achievement of social and economic goals possible.

A Progressive Conservative government would not be afraid to reduce taxation, especially personal income tax, nor to reduce or cut out completely the federal sales tax on building materials. In fact, a recent study by a couple of economics professors from the University of Toronto has indicated clearly that it is indeed possible to increase employment without aggravating the inflation problem, and that a reduction in federal sales tax would provide a great stimulus to the economy. If we create new jobs by this means, these jobs will not be a drain on the treasury. On the contrary, this approach will lessen the burden of the already oppressed taxpayer.

Honourable senators, as I said a while ago, I am firmly convinced that this government has yet to get over the fact that the electorate snubbed them last October 30. They were left dumbfounded, physically and morally shaken.

They seek less to provide good administration and have Parliament pass progressive and realistic legislation than to avoid being brought down by a vote of non-confidence. Their morale is such that one can hardly imagine how they will ever get over it.

The fact remains, however, that this is a government sprung from the Liberal party, and for them only one thing matters: to hold the power or to win it back if ever they lose it.

And to that end, as I have said before, they think that anything goes. History provides instances similar to the situation in which Mr. Trudeau finds himself.

Was it not Clovis who, in order to keep his crown, yielded to the Bishop of Saint-Rémy who had ordered him burn all that he had worshipped and to worship all that he had burnt?

Or must we recall Henri de Navarre who, to get hold of the French crown and become King Henri IV, abjured Protestantism saying Paris was well worth a mass?

[English]

But why go back so far in history? Mr. Trudeau has only to imitate some of his predecessors. For instance, it was Mackenzie King who, in 1925, his party having won only 99 seats against 116 for the Conservatives, refused to resign and finally succeeded in bargaining with the Progressives to stay in office.

Hon. Mr. Denis: Do not forget to talk also about Mr. Bennett and Mr. Diefenbaker.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am coming to that. The point that is probably of interest to me and to Senator Denis is the fact that to the Liberals principles are not very important when compared with the conservation of power, or the recovery of it. Not so long ago the Liberal Party, the present Leader of the Government in the Senate being its principal spokesman, supported a Social Credit amendment favouring a policy of debt-free money in the hope of unsettling the then Conservative minority government. Is that the point that Senator Denis wanted me to make?

Hon. Mr. Denis: You should elaborate more about Mr. Bennett's and Mr. Diefenbaker's times.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Indicate in which area you wish me to elaborate, and I will be only too happy to oblige.

More recently, when the Pearson government was defeated in a vote on a fiscal bill, it did not resign. The Liberals succeeded—God only knows how, and, hopefully, history will provide the answer—in winning back the support of the Social Credit members on a specific motion of non-confidence. In other words, they succeeded in making the Social Credit members say that they had not intended to defeat the government, but merely its legislation. I wonder just what sort of promises it took to cause them to make that about-face. But it was not the first one, of course.

The Prime Minister recently denied that he had no particular interest in power. He said that he was prepared to leave, but only in circumstances of his own choosing. He wasn't going to be thrown out. At the same time, he alluded to the fact that he was preparing plans to win the political battle facing him by studying the tactics of Napoleon at Austerlitz. That's a very humble attitude on his part, but I doubt that it is very realistic. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that June 1968 was Austerlitz, that October 30 last was the retreat from Moscow, and that Waterloo looms on the horizon.

For those honourable senators who are interested in astronomy or astrology, I should point out that the calendar for 1973 mentions two eclipses of the sun. One was a partial annular eclipse which took place, curiously enough, on January 4, the day of the opening of this Parliament. Taking for granted the temporary support of the NDP, you might be interested to know that a total eclipse of the sun will take place on June 30 next.

By that time, if all is right with the world, this government will have been eclipsed and the people of Canada will be enjoying a Conservative government. At the present time we could certainly do better.

Hon. Paul Martin: Madam Speaker, in taking part in this debate, I join with the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators in extending to you my warmest congratulations on your designation as Speaker of the Senate of Canada. You were selected, I am sure, not because you would be the first woman to occupy that high office, but because you have shown a great capacity for public service since 1953. You have been a devoted and valued member of this house, and we know that in discharging your duties as Speaker you will live up to the highest traditions of the Senate. We take pride in the fact that as first woman Speaker of the Senate you will preside over our deliberations with distinction.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure that all honourable senators shared my pride at the manner in which you performed your duties as Speaker of the Senate during the opening of Parliament on Thursday last.

Madam Speaker, you have had a distinguished career. As Senator Hicks reminded us in the course of his speech last night, you are a graduate of Mount Allison University; prior to entering the Senate you practised as a lawyer; you have had experience in municipal life; and you have been a federal public servant as Director of the Family Allowances Division in New Brunswick. I am happy to say that at that time I happened to be Minister of National Health and Welfare, although your success was not in any way related to that fact. We welcome you as Speaker. We are sure that you will bring honour to the Senate.

I should like to offer Senator Hicks my congratulations on his speech last night. Senator Hicks was at one time Premier of Nova Scotia. The Senate is enriched by the presence in our midst of such a man. I believe that the Senate should endeavour to represent as far as possible the opinions of those in various occupations. Senator Hicks, in his first speech to this house, did his province honour. It was convincing proof of the wisdom of having in our midst, as we have in the person of Senator Manning, someone who was at one time head of a provincial government, as Senator Hicks was also.

[Translation]

The Leader of the Opposition and I wish to assure Senator Lafond that we were proud to listen to his speech last night. As always, he spoke wisely and modestly and made a worthwhile and useful contribution.

• (1500)

[English]

I join with the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming to this chamber five new senators, sworn in the order of their precedence.

[Translation]

Senator Martial Asselin, a lawyer, a man of distinction in the province of Quebec, who has been for some years a member of the House of Commons, a member of the Privy Council, a member of Mr. Diefenbaker's cabinet, is a very talented man. I am sure that the appointment by Mr. Trudeau's government of this member of the Conservative Party will be justified by the contribution he will make to this chamber.

[English]

I was certainly happy to be able to introduce, along with Senator Nichol, an old colleague in Parliament and in government, and an experienced man in the public life of our country, Senator Arthur Laing.

Senator Laing has had a distinguished business career, which was not unrelated to agriculture. He was first elected to the House of Commons in 1949 and, after a period as a member of that house, returned to become leader of his party in the province of British Columbia. After serving as leader of his party in that province and as a redoubtable foe of Mr. Bennett, who was then the leader of the Social Credit Party and Premier of British Columbia, Senator Laing returned to the House of Commons and served as a member of the Pearson ministry, and, indeed, as a valuable member of the Trudeau government.

He served as Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Minister of Public Works and, most recently, Minister of Veterans Affairs. A man of this experience will be of great value to this chamber.

The presence in our midst of a former member of the Pearson and Trudeau governments, Senator John James Greene, brings to us a man with a worthy war record. Senator Greene was first elected to the House of Commons in 1963, and served as Minister of Agriculture and Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. One with this experience brings to our deliberations in the discharge of our responsibilities in this chamber an experience of the greatest value.

[Translation]

The fact that my colleague of another day, the Honourable Jean-Pierre Côté, agreed to come here gives the Senate the choice and the opportunity to benefit from the experience he acquired since his election to the House of Commons in 1963 and as Postmaster General and Minister of National Revenue, a man who, although still young, has experience which will prove very useful to us in our search for solutions to the problems with which we will deal.

[English]

The nomination to the Senate of Senator Joan Neiman brings to us a young woman—and I emphasize that—with a distinguished war record. She is a lawyer who has had experience in the service of a number of voluntary organizations, such as The Elizabeth Fry Society of which she was both a director and legal counsel. She served on the Local Council of Women of Toronto as chairman of the law committee. I could mention her other affiliations. I am sure we will profit greatly from her participation in our work.

Honourable senators, I regret to say that Senator A. Hamilton McDonald, who acted as whip during the past four years, has been seriously ill during the past three months. While he was able to return to this building the other day for a short time, I do not expect that he will be able to discharge his functions for some months to come. Both Senator McDonald and Senator Langlois have assisted me greatly in the past. In Senator McDonald's absence, Senator Langlois and I will have the services and assistance of Senator Molgat, whose selection for this duty will be welcome indeed.

Honourable senators, we are beginning a new session. It seems to me that we should each ask ourselves, in the uncertain situation—if one wishes to characterize the present situation in Parliament in that way—what we can do to strengthen this institution; what we can do to fulfil our respective responsibliities for which we have been called by the Governor-in-Council. I suggest to honourable senators that they examine the opportunity for service open to members of this chamber. I do not feel that there is any other forum to be found in any country of the world, and certainly of the Western World, where there is, for those who serve in a legislative body outside of government itself, the opportunity that is open to each of us in this chamber.

I have said on another occasion and I repeat now—and I am sure both Senator Laing and Senator McIlraith, because of their long service in the other place, will be able to corroborate this—that during my first ten years in the House of Commons, between 1935 and 1945, and particularly the first five years, the government of the day did not take up more than two days in the parliamentary week, with the result that three days were given to private members to introduce resolutions; to provoke public discussion on important questions; or to introduce private non-money bills. That was something that was possessed by the members of the other place up to 25 years ago but which now is denied to them because of the heavy legislative load which the government finds necessary to present to Parliament, thereby absorbing almost the full time of the House of Commons.

We have much time at our disposal. We have all of the power of members in the other place who are not of the executive. If we feel there is an opportunity to initiate public discussion on any issue, that opportunity is open to each and every senator, wherever he sits. The opportunity of introducing bills is open to each and every senator. I feel that if we took advantage of what is open to each and every one of us we could enhance the reputation of this chamber, which already, in my judgment, is much greater than is appreciated by some of the critics who attack so loosely the Senate.

When we consider the kind of appointments that should be made to the Senate, as mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, we might note appointments that have been made in the last weeks have brought into our ranks individuals of parliamentary experience, and experience in government. This is in the interests of the nation. It is something that will enhance the institution of Parliament. Not only that, but the present government, concerned about making this an increasingly valuable legislative body, brought into our membership two years ago important personalities who were not members of the party in power. There was Senator Manning, a Premier of the Province of Alberta for 25 years. While he now supports the Liberal Party, we all recognize the role of Senator Forsey in the political life of Canada in other days. No one examining these and other new senators would fail to appreciate that the Senate is not deserving of some of the captious criticism, irresponsible criticism, unfair criticism, that has been levelled at it by the news media, and even by certain parliamentarians.

I want to add this. Having spent almost my entire life in public service, I do not intend to continue to be a member of a body that I hear characterized in this way unless I think that those charges are untrue. I think those characterizations are baseless. It is for that reason that I am prepared, along with other senators, to do my part in public life through this institution. The moment I cease to be of any value to it—and I should think that would be the view of most—I shall not want to be here.

Today Senator Flynn spoke, understandably, very strongly about the consequences of the last federal election. One of the advantages of being a senator, of course, is that one does not have to think in personal terms about elections. I do not have the same interest in the result that Senator Flynn obviously has in the past one, or perhaps in the next one. I can only say that if the fortunes of the wheel had been a little more generous his way, or his party's way, he would find himself here and I would find myself, or somebody else would find himself opposite. Given the political process, perhaps there might not have been a great deal of difference in the tone he would have maintained from this side, or that I would have assumed from the other side. The fact is that I am here as Leader of the Government, and Senator Flynn is in his place as Leader of the Opposition.

I will say I was a little surprised with the results of the election. I have never been good at prognostication of any kind, particularly political, but I certainly misjudged the last election. However, the fact now is that what we have to do is find the best way for Parliament to accommodate itself to the electoral situation that was presented.

My honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition says the government was rejected, that the Trudeau administration, elected with such a large vote in the election of 1968, was this time repudiated by the Canadian electorate. There is no doubt that the present government was not embraced in the wholehearted way it was in 1968.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: More like strangled.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is no sense in talking about different statistical results, but if there was any rejection I suspect that it was rejection in part, not only of much of what the present government offered but perhaps even more significantly of the party to which the Leader of the Opposition belongs. Not only was that a rejection, but it was a second rejection. That party had been rejected in 1968 and it was again rejected in the election of 1972.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was less rejected, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend says that, but the fact is that it was rejected. As a result we have on our hands what I regard as a serious parliamentary situation. I have seen people in my own party who since the election have talked of the advantages of minority government. I have served in a number of minority governments. I served in a minority government between 1963 and 1965, and between 1965 and 1968. I saw minority government between 1957 and 1958, and between 1962 and 1963. I know something of the history of minority governments in Canada between 1923 and 1925 and 1926. I am sure that anyone who has carefully examined the nature of responsible government systems must conclude that the minority government situation is not the best way to assure the fullest functioning of government. I think that anyone who knows British history will come to that conclusion because of the attestation given by prime ministers who had to preside over minority governments.

The situation that faces us at the moment, which it seems to me is particularly one that the Senate must take into account, is that the people have spoken in an election in a way that would seem not to offer any hope for a change in the immediate future. I personally would find it inconceivable that so soon after an election we should go back to the people. What the situation would be in four, five or six months is another matter. Our responsibility now is to make the parliamentary system work. Therefore, that makes it difficult for anyone to say legitimately to the government of the day that it is seeking to cling on to office. Why? Will anyone deny that after the election, when the government was returned, even if it did not have the largest group, that it would have been proper constitutional practice for it to go to Parliament, and ask Parliament to determine whether or not it had the necessary confidence to carry on as a government?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That was not the view of Mr. St. Laurent in 1957.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will deal with that. There were suggestions made within 24 hours after the election, when it was not clear that the present Liberal government had the largest number of seats. Indeed, Mr. Stanfield went before television and suggested that he was ready to take over because of that fact. It was only after a few days passed that it became clear that the government had a larger number of elected members than any other political party, and the air was cleared without too much further discussion. It seemed to me that it was the clear duty of the present Prime Minister, in the face of this situation, when he had the largest group or even almost the largest group, to go to Parliament and seek a vote of confidence.

That was clear for many reasons. One of them is that in one of the largest provinces, the province from which the Leader of the Opposition here comes, not enough Conservative members were elected to enable the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party to select sufficient numbers to constitute representation in the Cabinet from that province. If the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party had been called upon to form a government, or had been given the opportunity of facing Parliament, among those who would have been in that Cabinet—and rightly so, because of his ability—would have been certainly the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I say that quite sincerely. I fully accept that if that had happened he would have been a member of the government, but he would have been only one of two from Quebec. And so that was a consideration.

In 1957 the situation with regard to Mr. St. Laurent was altogether different. Mr. St. Laurent felt personally that he had been repudiated. I believe that he took an extreme view of his position. He felt that his party had been rejected. I think he took an extreme view of the situation in that regard as well. But he was an older man and he made it clear—because of his age primarily, but there were also other reasons—that he did not propose to carry on, or even to face Parliament.

We had the precedent of 1924 in Britain, and the precedent in Britain also in 1884 in Mr. Gladstone's time, and earlier with Disraeli.

In 1925 we had a situation that was even more exemplary of the constitutional and correct course for the present government. In 1925 Mackenzie King had 15 fewer members elected than Mr. Meighen. Not only that, Mr. King himself had not been elected and he could not take his place in Parliament to argue his case. It was argued in his absence by Mr. Lapointe.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: He was defeated in the house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He asked for a dissolution, which was denied him; but because he had taken that position and his government had been duly constituted, when the election of 1926 took place, although a year before he had been 15 down, he was returned triumphantly. The Liberal Party was successful over the party of Mr. Meighen, and once again he became Prime Minister, and was Prime Minister until 1930. So there is no doubt about the right of the government in this situation, the constitutional right, and the propriety on any other count, to carry on as this government has done.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On a point of order. I would not wish the remark of the Leader of the Government to be understood as refuting an argument that I have made. I made it quite clear, I thought, that on the mathematical basis the government was justified in remaining in office and in seeking the support of Parliament. What I have been criticizing is the way it is trying to get that support.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, I fully agree. The Leader of the Opposition has carefully stated his position. It is conceivable—I do not think it is likely, but it is conceivable—that in the foreseeable future, two or three years from now, he might find it very convenient to be able to say that he took the same position on this matter as I did.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I cannot see so far.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think he might be able to help himself in that situation. With regard to what he has just said—that he objects to the way the present government is seeking to carry forward in order to stay in office—I agree that that is one of the questions that he put, and it is a very proper one. What we have to do is to make the present situation in Parliament work, unless we readily admit and agree that there is a possibility of holding a general election—which there is not.

If that is the case, the government's program having been repudiated in some respects, as well as the Opposition's program, what else is there for Parliament to do but to examine the modified programs that the government is bringing forward?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Our program.

Hon. Mr. Martin: My honourable friend says it is their program. I suppose some of it is their program. The Conservative Party does come forward with ideas.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Once in a while.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If they do have ideas and if Parliament can get a consensus with regard to these proposals, that is exactly what it should do, and that is what the government has implied in the general indications it has given in the Speech from the Throne. It does not mean that the government is saying what it put forward before the election is what must be put forward again. That is not what the government is doing. The government says that it is putting forward what it believes in, together with certain proposals that have been made by other political parties. What is wrong with that? Is that clinging to office? No, it is the only way to reach a consensus in a minority government situation.

That is why I said earlier that our system of responsible government cannot thrive indefinitely in the circumstances of minority government; but to the extent that it must deal with such a situation, it can do no other than seek a consensus in the way that the government has done in the Speech from the Throne. That does not mean that the government must give in on everything. That certainly does not mean that anyone should be under any misapprehension. This government is not going to cling to office for the sake of clinging to office, swallowing everything and anything so long as it is still permitted to occupy the Treasury benches. But we are not going to give up simply because we are defeated on some motion, any more than Mr. Diefenbaker did when he was confronted with a defeat, or any more than Mr. Pearson did in 1968.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Correction. Mr. Diefenbaker resigned the first time he was defeated in the house. He did not cling to office. He did not ask the house to repeat itself.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, on a matter that really did involve policy, what did Sir John A. Macdonald do as early as 1867 and 1873? He kept in office despite a number of defeats. What did Mr. Baldwin do? What did Mr. Gladstone do? What did Mr. Ramsay MacDonald do in 1924? He indicated when the parliamentary session began what the government would regard as a vote of confidence. He said that on each instance in respect of any matter put before Parliament he would indicate whether the government would regard it as a vote of confidence.

Of course Parliament itself, if it does not like that attitude, as Mr. Lewis said yesterday, has in its own hands a method to counteract the attitude that the government takes in this regard. But we must be prepared to seek a consensus, for that is the only way parliamentary government can be carried on in Canada at the present time. We in the Senate should be prepared to recognize that fact, even if it is not observed carefully elsewhere. It is a fact. It is the only way government can be carried on at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I recognize the fact that the government cannot be defeated by the Senate, and that the Senate will have to do the same as it does in normal circumstances. I was speaking of the situation in the other place, not of the situation here.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, I am not referring to the situation here, but I am using this forum to explain what, obviously, is not understood by some in the other place and in some parts of the country. There is a charge that the government is clinging to office, and that it is bringing forward modified plans only for the purpose of survival. That is not the case. It should be understood that that is why I have addressed myself to this aspect of the problem.

I say to the Leader of the Opposition, and I am sure he will appreciate this, that there are some things on which the government is not prepared to seek a consensus prior to establishing its position. There are some things that it cannot allow to be eroded. The Prime Minister has made that clear and the Speech from the Throne makes it clear. In other words, with regard to the Official Languages Act, and with regard to those matters that we have recognized for the last eight years as essential to promote bilingualism and biculturalism, we are not going to give in on matters of principle. I am sure that the government does not stand alone in that. I am sure that that is the position of Mr. Stanfield.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The government has never been challenged on that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am just saying that I am sure that that is the position of the Leader of the Conservative Party in the other place. I am sure that it is the position of the Leader of the Opposition here. But it must be made clear that the decisions we have taken on biculturalism and bilingualism, and the recommendations of the report on bilingualism and biculturalism that we have accepted, are essential goals which, humanely, we must pursue in the Public Service and elsewhere, if we are going to make a contribution to the development of unity in our country.

I accept the position of the Leader of the Conservative Party in this house, and in the other place, and I accept the positions of the two other political party leaders as well. They have made their positions clear, and so has the government.

But what the Prime Minister was complaining about, as I read his words the other day, was not so much the position of individuals in or out of Parliament as an editorial that had appeared in the Vancouver Sun, which opened up the whole question in a way which the Prime Minister did not think was in the national interest. It was an article in the Vancouver Sun of November 3 of last year.

That is one of the positions, then, that we are not prepared to go back on. There are others. These have been outlined by the Prime Minister, and I think that, basically, they will be accepted by most members of Parliament as essential, as the very minimum that can be done, if we are going to preserve unity in this country.

Honourable senators, there are other matters that the Leader of the Opposition has touched on, and there are other matters that could be touched on. He said nothing about recent foreign policy initiatives. I am sure the time will come when we shall discuss them. The government has sought, by administrative measures since the election, to provide for the development of certain policies designed to provide for an expansion of the economy, and to deal with the high cost of living. The government has admitted that apparently its policies in these respects have not been fully accepted, but it has indicated that it is prepared to accept modifications of those policies. It has pointed out that it has already infused considerable additional sums of money in the hope of stimulating the economy and, when the budget comes forward, we will determine whether or not the government's budgetary policies are designed to reduce unemployment and meet other pressing economic problems.

There is the question of our economic relations with the European Economic Community and with the United States. These are all matters that the government has been engaged in. Its position in these various areas will be reflected in the presentation of policies that it will present ultimately.

And so I say, now that we have been presented with this electoral situation, now that Parliament has been seized of its responsibilities as a result of the mandate given to it, it is the duty of both Houses of Parliament to meet these responsibilities. I am sure that all of us, regardless of our political affiliations, both here and in the other place and in the country at large, will meet those responsibilities as Canadians have done before. We need not be ashamed of our parliamentary system; we need not join with others who criticize and seek to compare it with other systems; we need not belittle ourselves or our own country, because whatever may be our economic problems, or whatever may be our concern with our neighbour or with the enlarged European Economic Community, the fact remains that there is no other country in the world that has our opportunity, and because no other country has our opportunity we have no excuse for not doing our utmost.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, this is a very special occasion for women in the Senate, and I wish to offer my most sincere congratulations to Madam Speaker upon her appointment to preside over the deliberations of this chamber. In order to avoid repetition, to some extent, I shall simply echo the complimentary remarks of the previous speakers, and add a few of my own.

Senator Fergusson's valuable participation for many years in the debates and committees of the Senate is an assurance that she has all the necessary qualifications, dignity, charm and savoir-faire to carry on the duties of Speaker of this honourable house.

It was on Human Rights' Day, December 10, that I first heard that Senator Fergusson was to be appointed the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate. My first thoughts were, "How fitting that on this day, Human Rights' Day, Senator Fergusson should be so honoured." We all know that Senator Fergusson has always been a loyal supporter of civil and political rights for all peoples, but in particular for the advancement of the status of women. Therefore, it is but just for the government to have recognized her devotion to the cause of women's rights.

I have always found it a great pleasure to join with my colleagues in words of welcome to new senators. However, it would be like gilding the lily to eulogize further the four senators who have served with distinction in the other place, Senator Asselin, Senator Côté, Senator Greene and Senator Laing, who are well known to most of us; in fact to most Canadians. Their parliamentary "know-how" will be of great value in the proceedings of this chamber. Needless to add, Senator Asselin will be as welcome as the flowers in May to swell the number of our little band of Conservatives.

But it is with pardonable pride that I address a special word of welcome to Senator Joan Neiman, and assure her that from my own experience a woman who is fortunate enough to be appointed to the Senate need have no fear of any prejudice or discrimination against her because of her sex from her male colleagues in the Senate, and it is indeed heartwarming to see women senators welcome another woman senator to increase their numbers.

And as this seems to be the women's hour in the Senate, I shall speak about the women who helped to get us out of this controversy. It might be apropos to refresh our memories as to how and when women were first admitted to the Senate. In fact, every women senator owes a debt of gratitude to five public-spirited Canadian women from Alberta: Mrs. H. M. Edwards, Mrs. Nellie McClung, Mrs. Louise McKinney, Judge Emily Murphy, and the Honourable Irene Parlby.

These five women, after five years of sacrifice and struggle, their pleas rejected by the Canadian Parliament, presented their case to the Supreme Court of Canada—and lost. But undaunted, they carried their case to be heard before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London, England, presenting their argument that Canadian women be considered as persons in the eyes of the law, and as such be eligible for appointment to the Senate of Canada. The vital question was debated, pro and con, as to whether women were persons under the British North America Act of 1867. The case was heard in July 1929. Their Lordships in England found, after convincing arguments and anxious consideration, that the word "persons" includes both men and women. Therefore, from that time on women as persons were eligible to be appointed to the Senate.

It was a great victory for those women, for the decision of the Privy Council in London reversed the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. This struggle started in 1916, and those women battled all obstacles for long years before achieving their goal. I am sure that those five courageous women from Alberta, through whose efforts the doors of the Senate opened to women, must be chuckling with glee from their heavenly abode to see a woman so honoured as our Honourable Speaker, Senator Fergusson.

It is interesting to note what started these five women on the warpath. This was not a case of "cherchez la femme" but "cherchez l'homme," for on July 1, 1916, Judge Emily Murphy's first day on the bench of the Magistrate's Court in Edmonton, Alberta, the defence counsel, Mr. Eardley Jackson, enraged at the stiff sentence meted out to his client by Judge Murphy, shouted in the courtroom:

> Mrs. Murphy, you are not even a person in the eyes of the law and have no right to be holding court. For according to a ruling in 1876, under British Common Law, which states that "Women are persons in pains and penalties but are not persons in matters of rights and privileges," therefore the Office of Magistrate is a privilege and, Judge Murphy, you are on the Bench illegally and your decision cannot be binding.

Now, although her decision was upheld by the Supreme Court of Alberta, thanks to Mr. Jackson, the question arose: "What about the Dominion of Canada Court?" This incident was the match that lit the fire for the campaign to change the British North America Act so that women would be considered as persons in the eyes of the law.

Since 1867, only 14 women have been appointed to the Senate of Canada, and 22 women elected to the House of Commons. There was only one in the last Parliament—Mrs. Grace MacInnis, of the NDP—but there are now five women elected to the other place. Perhaps I should mention that Quebec gave three women Liberals to the house. It will be remembered that the first woman appointed to the Cabinet was the Honourable Ellen Fairclough, then followed the Honourable Judy LaMarsh, and now there is another woman in the Cabinet, Madame Jeanne Sauvé.

But does it not seem strange that in Eastern countries, where women are more respectful and dominated by their men, those same Eastern women who are known for their distinctly soft and feminine charm, now that they have their rights, are storming their parliaments and are being elected in incredibly large numbers?

Many men ask, "Why do women take part in public life with its exposure to envy, intrigue and numerous frustrations?" Well, why not? Do they want women to dodge their responsibilities? For if women are obliged to pay taxes and to obey laws, it is only just that they be given a share in the making of them. And the state, like the home, needs a woman's viewpoint in order to create a well-balanced society. Gone are the days of less than 100 years ago in Canada when the courageous members of Parliament who proposed or voted for women's rights were ridiculed, and when roars of laughter always greeted the presentation of the suffrage bill.

Another question frequently asked is: "What is a woman's role in the Senate?" Well, my answer to that is, "A woman's role in the Senate should be the same as that played by the honourable senators of the so-called stronger sex." However, I admit that women's limited participation to date in public life restricts to a degree their capacity or willingness to enter all debates. But they should be on the alert on all subjects, and ready to express their opinion, especially in committees, on legislation which is of special interest to women and the welfare of the family, and be willing to help women's organizations by supplying information, and by presenting their bills.

And, honourable senators, lobbying for support for bills is one thing women can do to perfection. Believe me, after seeing some of the tactics used by women lobbyists, I am firmly convinced that more women should take up public relations as a career. The men parliamentarians certainly fall for that feminine approach. I have seen it work.

Were I asked to compare the intelligence of the men senators with that of women in the Senate, I would have to resort to a reply Dr. Samuel Johnson made when asked to compare the intelligence of men versus women. He answered, "Which man—which woman?"

Unfortunately, a professional or a business woman is still looked upon as "Exhibit A" by many men. In my opinion, one rule for the success of a woman when dealing with men is that her mind should be like an iceberg—more than half should be kept submerged below the surface, especially after business hours.

I conclude with this little story. As you know, every session groups of students of all ages visit the Senate and the House of Commons to observe at first hand the legislative processes of government. As is customary after such visits, the students are supposed to record their impression in an article for their school paper. Here is an excerpt from a young girl's essay, exactly as she wrote it in all its unconscious humour:

> The Government of Canada sits in the Commons in Ottawa. The ordinary common people are called Members of Parliament and sit in a large green room with the Prime Minister, called the House of Commons. Older people called "Senniters" sit in a lovely red room called "The Sennit." If the "Senniters" do not like what the common members do, they vote "Veto," and the common members have to think of something else so as the "Senniters" won't say "Veto." Very often, all these common bills cause an uproar in the "Sennit" and as most of the "Senniters" are old, they don't like all this noise for they are there for life. There is also a Cabinet in the House of Commons which is filled with Cabinet Ministers who work in ministeries. We must not confuse them with the good holy ministers who work in Churches and believe in God. These common ministers have servants which are called "Dipeety" Ministers and have to make friends with all colours of politickers—blue, green, red and black. Because of this service they are in a union called "Civil Service Association" instead of "politicians." "Current Affairs" like our school paper, also include External Affairs. This department deals with members' wives, ambassadors, parties, wars and relations in foreign countries. As an example, if you have an aunt or uncle, say in Cuba, the Canadian Consul will get her out of the country quickly. This is called diplomacy and is very clever.
> Well, I guess that's all that can be said about Parliament except it raises taxes and makes you obey laws. But if you don't vote for the common members they will lose their jobs, not like the Senniters, or they will be demoted. So please vote for the good-looking ones.

Encore, félicitations Madame le Président.

On motion of Senator Molgat, for Senator Rowe, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Post Office Act, chapter P-14, R.S.C., 1970.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I am glad to note that Senator Côté is looking at me with great interest.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am quite sure he is pleased that this is his last report.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Croll has indicated it was a good thing the report was not mailed.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I mailed a report on Tuesday afternoon of last week from the Toronto Dominion Bank Building in Toronto. It was addressed to the Toronto Star Building, which is six blocks away, and it did not arrive there until Friday.

Hon. Mr. Martin: A member of the House of Commons would have taken the report there himself.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Of course, that was in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The situation is even worse in Quebec.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 16 January 1973, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, it is my pleasant duty first of all to congratulate our distinguished lady colleague on her appointment as Speaker of this house. This step is a matter of gratification on two counts; first, it recognizes Senator Fergusson's outstanding abilities and, secondly, it represents another step forward in removing the historic discrimination against women in Canada. I am pleased to say that Senator Fergusson, along with other senatorial colleagues, attended the same university as I did. It gives us great pleasure that she should be appointed to this important post. In expressing our pleasure over this appointment, I wish to say—I did not have the opportunity of saying this during the final session of the last Parliament—that none of us will forget the outstanding contribution made to the Senate, and to the continuing democratic process, by our esteemed colleague, Senator Deschatelets, during his term of office.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: The honourable senator now sits in front of me.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You were not speaking over his head.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Senator Hicks is not present in the house, but I should like to congratulate him on his excellent speech in opening the debate on Tuesday last. I should like also to extend my congratulations to Senator Lafond. Both honourable senators have had long and happy relationships with my own province of Newfoundland.

Senator Hicks, whom I first knew when he was Premier of Nova Scotia, subsequently became President of Dalhousie University, a university with which my province has had a long and happy connection, since the majority of doctors and lawyers now practising in Newfoundland are graduates of that university.

Senator Lafond, I am happy to say, has also had a distinguished connection with Newfoundland. During World War II he served in many areas, and participated in the Battle of the Atlantic while a member of the Canadian Armed Forces.

May I also welcome the new senators who were sworn in during the past few days. I am sure that all of us feel that the prestige of this historic body has been enhanced by their appointment.

Long before the death of Lester B. Pearson, I had reached the conclusion—a conclusion no doubt shared by many Canadians—that he was probably the greatest living Canadian. It is no derogation of the many other great and distinguished sons and daughters of Canada to say that in all probability Mr. Pearson was not only the greatest Canadian of our time, but was also one of the great world citizens of our time.

Although Newfoundland is only a small and, in some respects, insignificant part of that nation which Mr. Pearson served so well, we have very special reasons for regarding him with gratitude. Mr. Pearson was one of the first Canadians to recognize that Canada could never become a happy and progressive nation so long as there existed minority groups which, because of accident of geography, economics, history, race or other factors, suffered physical or psychological hardships and frustrations.

It is to the enduring credit of the present Prime Minister—I say this without any political bias—that he recognized the necessity for carrying on this work started by Mr. Pearson, although he must have known that such a course of action could result in grave political disadvantage. I will have more to say about that later this afternoon.

Along with other Canadians I was saddened by the passing of another great Canadian, Mr. George Drew. Although I did not have the opportunity to know him intimately, as was the case with Mr. Pearson, I did have the opportunity of enjoying his hospitality while he was High Commissioner in London. Indeed, he went out of his way at that time to show his friendliness and his desire to be of assistance, and I could not help reflecting then that here was a man who had been almost completely misrepresented to the Canadian people outside his native province of Ontario. The fact is, as the Leader of the Government has already implied, it was a quirk of fate that prevented this man from making to Canada as a whole a contribution similar to that which he made in his native province.

I referred a moment ago to the efforts of former Prime Minister Pearson, efforts later intensified by his successor, Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, to preserve and strengthen Canadian unity by removing some of the historic disabilities, especially those racial and geographical in origin, which had occasioned so much discontent in parts of our great nation. It was, I think, inevitable that those efforts, especially the ones relating to that part of Canada which we commonly refer to as French Canada, would result in what our American friends commonly call a backlash. There is no doubt in my mind, although a great many Canadians are a little hesitant to say so, that such a backlash did manifest itself in Canada in recent months. Nor should we be surprised at such a manifestation any more than we should be surprised by the obvious backlash that has occurred in the United States as a result of that nation's efforts to remove discrimination as to race and colour.

We most certainly must be on our guard against the potential results of such a backlash, if carried to the extreme. Let us have no doubts whatsoever about these facts: there has been a feeling of frustration and injustice among a large segment of the Canadian nation resulting from the fact that moral considerations inherent in the agreements that created the Canadian nation, inherent in the Canadian Constitution, have been flagrantly disregarded, and this continues to be a source of discontent in some parts of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not sure I understand what you mean. Are you saying that the present government misinterpreted the Constitution?

Hon. Mr. Rowe: No, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I should like you to make yourself very clear on that point.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I will repeat my comments. There is no doubt that there has been a feeling of frustration and injustice among a large segment of the Canadian nation—and I am not merely thinking of that part of Canada referred to as French Canada—resulting from the fact that moral considerations and implications inherent in the agreement that created the Canadian nation—in other words, in the British North America Act—have been flagrantly disregarded down through the years. While they are not being disregarded so much today, and have not been in recent years, they still continue to be a source of discontent in some parts of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mean discontent in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Order!

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I will elaborate on that—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Who asked for order?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I did.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I asked for order because I feel that when a senator has the floor he should not be repeatedly interrupted, as I feel it interferes with his speech.

• (1420)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would point out that my honourable friend Senator Argue sat in the other place for a long time, but he has not learned the ways of the Senate yet. In the Senate, if an honourable senator does not like being interrupted, he is the one who should complain, not Senator Argue. It is not Senator Argue's role to come to everyone's rescue. I should think that Senator Rowe is well able to look after himself without the help of Senator Argue.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am not disputing that. I just think he is being interrupted too often.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Rowe has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right, and he is the one who ought to object.

The Hon. the Speaker: If he wishes to answer questions he is at liberty to do so, but if he wishes to continue with his speech, then he may do so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right, and without the intervention of Senator Argue.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: I have no objection to answering questions at any time. If I may be permitted to continue, the point I am trying to establish may become clearer. If necessary I can elaborate on it. If it is not clear, I shall be very happy to answer any question the distinguished Senator Flynn, or any other honourable senator, may wish to direct to me.

It was part of the greatness of Mr. Pearson that he saw the possibility that a continuation of this state of affairs I have referred to could result in the disintegration of the Canadian nation, just as he also recognized that unless Canada as a whole adopted measures designed to remove some of the economic inequalities resulting largely from geography and other natural disadvantages, Canada as envisaged by the Fathers of Confederation could not continue to exist in an age when increasing expectations were creating a discontent and a sense of frustration which could only result eventually in rebellion of one kind or another, and consequent disintegration of the nation.

The process of trying to reconcile the diverse needs and aspirations of all segments of Canada must continue, backlash or no backlash, and no matter what administration is in power. The alternative would be national suicide. Does anyone think, for example, that over two million Canadians in Atlantic Canada will be willing to tolerate indefinitely a situation where the cost of living, due to factors completely outside of local control, continues to be higher than it is in Central Canada while wages continue to be lower? To put it more broadly, will those millions of "second-class" citizens, economically speaking, in Eastern Canada and in other parts of the nation be willing to remain passive and fatalistic if there is something they think can and should be done to remove the inequalities?

The Speech from the Throne has been described as a desperate attempt by the present administration to hold on to power. There may be some element of truth in this allegation, and if such is the case this is not necessarily disgraceful or reprehensible; but to assume or imply that it was nothing more than a desperate attempt to hold on to power would be grossly unfair, and indeed dishonest.

The Speech from the Throne, as I understand it, is not an admission that past policies were wrong, that there has been too much welfare, that the silent majority, having expressed their resentment against bilingualism or welfare abuse, must now be placated; it is not an admission that DREE and other programs designed to remove inequality of opportunity were either wrong or were grossly mismanaged. What it does represent is a recognition by the administration, and I believe by others, based on, among other things, the results of the last general election, that the measures taken so far have not been sufficiently productive, and in fact have been inadequate.

I should like to say a word about welfare. There are many Canadians who believe that the backlash I mentioned a moment ago—manifested in the recent election but not manifested only in that election—has been the result of what a good many people consider to be the abuses of welfare, particularly of unemployment insurance. Here again, undoubtedly abuses do exist and resentment is a natural result. But, as is the case with so many other social evils, the answer is not to be found in repressive and punitive measures. Shoplifters have been put in jail from time immemorial, but shoplifting continues and according to some it is on the increase. It is almost a cliché to say that the hanging of pickpockets in England 150 years ago did not eliminate or even reduce pickpocketing.

I was reading only this morning that 150 years ago or more there were 150 reasons for hanging people in one of our mother countries, in England, and those 150 reasons were used to hang people, including even children. No one could argue today, in the light of the test of history, that those hangings did anything to remove the evils they were supposed to remove.

Employers and others, especially those who sleep in their own homes every night, have continued to deplore the fact that it is so difficult to get men to work on construction and other projects, especially in the northlands. They point to the fantastic turnover in personnel. For example, the turnover of personnel engaged on construction and on many other enterprises is high in that great part of Canada, Labrador, which I once represented. Those employers and others, either directly or by implication, put the blame for that on our social welfare measures which, they say, encourage our working population to avoid work opportunities.

I have had some experience in this field of social welfare and I know there is and always has been some element of truth in this belief. My own feeling is that the number of abuses in that regard is probably directly proportionate to the number of dishonest people in our population. But it is not true, and it never has been true, that the great majority, or even a significant majority, of our Canadian people deliberately avoid work.

What about the other factors that have often been ignored? Indeed, they are usually ignored by some of the employers and perhaps by government also. Industry and governments alike are denying the laws of common sense, not to mention the laws of biology, if they expect 5,000 able-bodied men to spend 6 or 8 or 12 months in the wilds of Labrador, cut off from home and family, and not then seek ways and means of spending more time at home with their wives and children. That might have been possible under a system of slave labour, or something akin to slave labour. It is possible today. We know it is possible. It is being done today in some of the countries of the world where there are authoritarian regimes. But we cannot expect informed and relatively intelligent people, our Canadian people, in a free society such as ours claims to be, to tolerate this primitive approach to human needs and problems—this primitive approach which has characterized so much of our work opportunities, especially in basic industries like the fishing , logging and construction activities in the more remote parts of the country.

In the days when the alternative was starvation for himself and his dependants, the average logger was willing to work—and I know whereof I speak—in a state of continuous wetness resulting from rain, drizzle, snow and superhuman exertion, for hour after hour—12, 14, 15 hours a day, day after day, week after week. In the same way, our east coast fishermen were prepared to run the risks inherent in the Bank fishery and other fisheries, when the only alternative was starvation.

The hundreds of widows and orphans still to be found on the south coast of Newfoundland are a living and terrible testimony to this fact, as my colleague Senator Carter knows so well because the great majority of them are to be found in his former riding. They are a testimony to the fact that men did have to engage in occupations where the risk to human life was disproportionately high, and that they did so only to avoid starvation.

So let us not condemn the young man today, who knows the discomforts and dangers involved in some of these activities and who is intelligent enough to appreciate the odds involved in fishing, for example, in a trawler or a dragger off the Grand Banks of Newfoundland in the month of February. Let us not condemn him too much if on occasion he shows some reluctance to take advantage of that particular job opportunity.

Let us not condemn too quickly, either, the married man of 30 years of age who has two or three children and who is a little reluctant to take advantage of a job opportunity when it involves spending nine or ten months in the wilds of Labrador separated from his wife and children by 500 to 1,000 miles.

Perhaps another reason why there is a reluctance on the part of some people to take advantage of job opportunities is the fact that, apart from the dangers and other physical and psychological discomforts and deprivations, our society continues to be unfair and discriminatory, especially in those areas where the type of work has been traditionally regarded as menial, subservient or even degrading. Although I do not need to give examples, the one that comes to mind most quickly is the realm of domestic service.

I should point out that the reluctance of many people to get involved in these work categories is not merely the result of the brainwashing which has been carried on over the years by a class-structured society such as ours has always been—a society which has been guilty of what has been referred to as "occupational snobbery." It is also the result of our practice of paying workers in those categories less than they should have been receiving. Why this should be, I have never been able to fathom. Let us be frank about this. Let us admit that some work is more unpleasant than other work. For example, collecting garbage, while a necessary and a respectable job, does have some unpleasant aspects in the minds of many people. Why then should not those who are called on to do such work and who are willing to do such work be compensated in proportion to the unpleasantness involved? The truth is that many of the so-called abuses that are alleged to characterize our social welfare programs are not the result of governments, whether federal, provincial or municipal, encouraging laziness or irresponsibility, but they are a reflection of more basic evils and defects in our society—a society which has tolerated economic disparities and class discrimination, while at the same time permitting—and I use this as an example—unrestricted advertising primarily by big business, to raise expectations in the minds of individuals which are far beyond the power of the individual to satisfy in normal ways.

Let me go back to this question of backlash. The big danger of a backlash against what are considered to be the abuses of social welfare in the broad sense of the word is that government and society generally may be induced to lessen their efforts to remove or ameliorate the abuses and injustices that still exist. It seems to me that there is a very simple principle that is being ignored or forgotten, and that is that social problems are not decreasing and are not becoming less difficult. On the contrary, they are increasing in kind, they are increasing numerically, and they are increasing above all in complexity, and if this country of ours, Canada, wants to reach a point were it can with justice and truth be described as a civilized society, if we truly want to reach that point, then far greater efforts must be made in the field of social welfare and elsewhere. But, honourable senators, these efforts must be characterized by intelligence and rationality rather than by repression, brutality or medieval concepts of what constitutes justice and morality.

In my maiden speech here last year I argued for a rational approach to the drug problem so that unfortunate addicts of the hard drugs could be treated for what they are, that is, sick persons, requiring the pity, the compassion and help of the rest of the community. I might add that the only reaction in the press to that comment of mine was a statement that "Rowe advocates legalized pot." As I say, I argued that there should be a rational approach to this problem so that the supply of drugs as well as the victims themselves could be removed from the hands of criminals. If we are to have any success in solving this problem, we must get the supply of drugs out of the hands of the criminals and get the thousands of victims—in the United States they number hundreds of thousands—out of the hands of the criminals where we have driven them. Surely we do not need to remind ourselves that the irrational and emotional approach which we took to the problem of alcohol just a generation or so ago resulted in putting the control of alcohol in the hands of the criminal. Then we tried to backtrack and it was too late. Well-meaning people in the United States, through their irrational, emotional approach to the matter, created these great criminal organizations which today threaten the very structure of that great nation. This has been so for the last 20 years. And surely we should not have to remind ourselves that in every single instance this same irrational, emotional and moralistic approach to the problem of prostitution has succeeded only in putting prostitution under the control of the criminal elements in our society.

I pointed out last year, and I repeat it now, that our penal system, in spite of the few reforms we have made, does not rehabilitate but for the most part degrades our fellow human beings to the ranks of animals. It fosters and sharpens any latent criminal capabilities that the unfortunate individuals may have when they are placed in our institutions. I asked then, and I ask now, for further revisions to our Criminal Code, not merely to mollycoddle the criminal elements, as the charge has been made, but rather to pinpoint those activities which are truly antisocial and from which society must be protected. Incidentally, if by mollycoddling, as my critics and the critics of others have alleged, they mean treating prisoners with fairness, dignity and humanity, then I plead guilty.

One of the ironies of our entire penal system is that the amount of rehabilitation resulting from it is almost nonexistent. On the other hand, all the indications are that it fosters and sharpens the proclivities toward criminality and it fosters antisocial and pathological behaviour. Over and over, persons incarcerated for minor offences are released and then have to be reincarcerated for major offences. Recidivism, violence and the shocking and scandalous disproportionate number of suicides and attempted suicides among prison inmates all indicate to me that there is something basically wrong with our system. There must be something wrong with our system.

Honourable senators, Canada prides itself on being a tolerant country. Unfortunately, the facts still indicate racial bias and discrimination. Obviously, we have made some progress. Equally obviously we have nothing to be proud about in this regard. Perhaps I do not need to say this, but I am a Canadian and I love this great country. I am proud to be a citizen of Canada. If I were given my choice of any country, there is no country of which I would rather be a citizen than Canada. I derive no pleasure from saying some of the things which I am saying here today. While we have made some progress in our attempt to remove discrimination, we have nothing to be proud of in this matter. I referred earlier to the significance of Senator Fergusson's appointment as Speaker, but let us not fool ourselves—I know this is a matter for jokes and wisecracking but I am taking it very seriously—in believing that there is anything like equal opportunity for women in this country. Feminine emancipation in theory is a far cry from emancipation in practice. How else can one explain that in the last Parliament there was, if I remember correctly, one woman out of the 265 members of that house. In the average Canadian constituency today, at any level of government, federal, provincial or municipal, but particularly at the federal and provincial levels, assuming that all other things are equal among two candidates, no one can seriously contend that a woman has as good a chance to be elected as a male. This is not entirely due to male chauvinism. Women must share part of the blame for their failure to throw off the psychological inhibitions which make so many of them willing to be party to discrimination and bias against their own sex. In this whole matter of improving the status of women, Canada appears to be lagging behind much of the rest of the world.

I had the pleasure, together with several other senators, of attending the Inter-Parliamentary Conference in Rome in September last. I was happy to be a member and very proud of the contribution made by the Canadian delegation, which was a real contribution, under the leadership of Mr. Aitken, who was formerly a member of the House of Commons. Nevertheless, I was a little ashamed and, I might say, a little chagrined to know that the Canadian delegation was one of the few at that great conference which did not have a single woman member on it. Egypt had several women on its delegations; Bangladesh had three. Other mid-Eastern, African and other countries which we consider part of the undeveloped world, which we are inclined to look down on, had women delegates among their parliamentary representation.

In theory, all racial groups in Canada, regardless of origin, have equal opportunity. In practice we know that this is not so. I repeat, we have come a long way in this regard. At one time, for example, there was a great deal of discrimination in my own province, as well as in other parts of Canada, on the grounds of religion. That discrimination was a very real thing not too many years ago. There is still some of it left but fortunately much of it has disappeared. I do not think the disappearance is due so much to legislation as it is to education. We have to keep in mind constantly that discrimination, whether it is based on race, colour, language, religion, geography, or anything else, is an ugly and pernicious disease. It is a disease and we have to keep that word in mind when we are thinking of discrimination. Like all other diseases it injures more than some expect. In the long run it is a disease which leads to frustration and sometimes to irrational behaviour on the part of those discriminated against.

I was more than interested in the recent terrible incident in New Orleans. The report is that that poor wretch, that unfortunate individual who was guilty of that aberration, is supposed to have shouted, "I want to kill white people; I want to kill white people." He was not alone in that regard. There are today, I would suggest, thousands of people in that country who want to kill white people.

The irony, of course, is that those who practice discrimination eventually pay the cost themselves. The supreme example of that is to be found in the major cities of the United States day and night. Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small.

I do not think that legislation, no matter how enlightened and progressive, can destroy those evils. Legislation is, of course, necessary where abuses exist. Legislation and legislators must lead the way, but what is equally important is a revision of our whole psychological and philosophical approach to the problems of society. As long as a majority of people believe that the answer to drug addiction is putting some teenage boy or girl in jail for smoking marijuana cigarettes, as long as a majority of people in American society, or perhaps in our society, believe that violence can be cured by violence, "Shoot the so-and-so's," as long as a majority of people in society believe that one group has the divine right to impose its system of beliefs, whether political, sexual, religious, or economic, on other individuals or groups, the nation will remain essentially uncivilized, and the ultimate result, given modern conditions and modern development, must be chaos and anarchy. Without dwelling too morbidly on this point, let me say that it is one of the ironies of history that some of the so-called most civilized nations in the world are now approaching the point of utter chaos and anarchy.

We have told ourselves here in Canada, over and over again, that we are a progressive nation and that we will have a great future. As I said a moment ago, as one who is proud to be a citizen of Canada, whose people have lived in this land for over 300 years, as one who recognizes the leadership that Canada has provided from time to time in various fields of human endeavour, I feel compelled to say, and again I derive no pleasure from it, that I do not believe there is any guarantee that Canada will continue to progress. I do not believe that there is any guarantee that Canada will not in fact regress. I believe the danger of regression is greater today, not only in Canada, but in some of the other countries that we closely identify and associate with, than at any time perhaps in the last 100 years. I do not think this is pessimism; I think it is realism and I believe it would be folly for us not to recognize these possibilities.

Finally, on a more positive note, I want to reaffirm my conviction that we do have the resources, and it becomes something of a cliché to say it, the physical and human resources to correct some of the evils of which I have talked and others to which I did not refer, to remove some of the misery, frustration and deprivation which are still the heritage of far too many of our Canadian people. If we do that, not only shall we be making a great civilized nation, our own nation, but we shall be setting an example that other nations of the world will want to follow.

Hon. Rhéal Belisle: Honourable senators, in taking part in this debate, I should like first to thank the mover and the seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and tell them that they did a wonderful job.

In the course of the Throne Speech, the Prime Minister, through the voice of our distinguished Governor General, gave the impression that the government was presenting a cherry pie to all Canadian voters. The mover and the seconder of the Address added to this impression by placing whipped cream on top.

May I say to you, Madam Speaker, how pleased I was on hearing that you had been selected as our first lady Speaker, and I offer you my most sincere felicitations. Not only do we appreciate your appointment, but your eloquence and vast experience will help us to understand better the numerous injustices of which women in this country have been the victims since Canada became a nation. Certainly your appointment to this office of Speaker cannot be construed as an injustice to women.

During 1971 I had the opportunity of speaking in your place in the debate on the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. With your kind permission I should like to read a paragraph from what I said on February 9, 1971:

> To conclude, I would like to say that I consider it an injustice that there should be no women in Canada's Supreme Court, Superior Court, or as county judges in Ontario.
> I deplore the paucity of women among the members of the federal House of Commons. During the eight years I was a member of the Ontario legislature, there were no women among the representatives. I am proud to say that when I accepted the chairmanship of the Board of Governors of the University of Sudbury, three ladies became governors.

Which does not have to be attributed to my weakness for the opposite sex.

> They are doing excellent work. I am proud to see Mrs. Georges Vanier as Chancellor of Ottawa University. I hope that other universities will do as well.
> Mr. Speaker, I often praised the excellent work you are doing among us. Mrs. Deschatelets carries out her duties with great dignity, but I would like to be in the Senate long enough to have the privilege of sitting under the speakership of a female senator.
> There is no field of human endeavour which cannot be enlightened through the beneficial power of women. In this era of technology, where man is threatened to become a slave instead of a master of the machines he has created through a God-given gift, where he could destroy by his carelessness his civilization with the terrible powers he has learned to unleash, it is the women's duty to save him from this peril and to see that our race enjoys a safe and human future.

Your Honour, I have no intention of saying that I am related to any of the former prophets, but permit me to say in all humility that it is more than time that men recognized your unlimited contribution. In one respect this can be called a sexual revolution.

The series of changes which have taken place in the Canadian framework over the past few years are of the same magnitude as those which required a whole century to take shape.

I am pleased to add that it is an honour to follow Senator Rowe who, in delivering a very enlightening address this afternoon, has proven to us that he also is a prophet of the future.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, may I be permitted to say to Senator Hicks that I followed attentively the masterly speech he delivered as he moved that an Address be presented to the Governor General in reply to the Speech from the Throne. His remarks on the mass media were most pertinent.

My dear colleague Senator Paul Lafond, who seconded the motion, displayed great wisdom when he tried to sell us the contents of the speech. He showed almost as much competence as the philosopher Aristotle. That was not a superficial effort on his part for we have known of his abilities for a long time.

Senator Paul Martin also deserves congratulations. He was at his best. Senator Jacques Flynn, my leader, showed great ability in deflating that balloon seemingly full of election air. His remarks about his strong attachment to the Conservative party convinced us that our party would be much stronger in Quebec if we had more men of his talent and energy.

The reinforcement we got through the appointment of five new senators has strenghtened us, not only in the matter of ability, wisdom and experience, but as regards womanly beauty as well.

[English]

Honourable senators, may I say a few words about the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Paul Martin. Through three decades of turmoil and hopes not quite realized, Paul Martin maintained a personal integrity beyond challenge and a loyalty among the rank and file of his party that other aspirant political leaders might well envy. Through years when the terms of office of Liberal governments were marred by scandal in high places, and bungling among senior bureaucrats and ministers, not even bitter critics could seriously question the sincerity of Paul Martin in pursuing the goals he saw necessary to national progress. He may at times have been wrong, but never from arrogance or rashness. I was indeed pleased and honoured to be invited to the installation of the Honourable Paul Martin as Chancellor of Waterloo Lutheran University. If success and achievement in life is a yardstick that will be used by those who write history, I have the belief that some pages will be written in Senator Martin's honour.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Senator Eugene Forsey, who has enhanced this chamber since his appointment and who has made a very large contribution to our academic and social fields of endeavour, has also brought honour and distinction to the Senate by being appointed Chancellor of Trent University. This learned and wise counsel has contributed so immensely to the building of our Canadian mosaic fabric that it is a common thing to offer him felicitations. Suffice it for me to say that I would love to see more men of such high calibre on the Canadian scene.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Belisle: Honourable senators, at the opening ceremony we heard very eloquent tributes paid to the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson by the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition, and others.

However, since it was my privilege to be the provincial member of the riding of Nickel Belt, which was mostly within the federal riding of Mr. Pearson, for eight years, may I be permitted to say, on behalf of those people, that nowhere in Canada will Lester B. Pearson be more sadly mourned than in that region of Ontario. His visits to the constituency were less frequent than those of an ordinary member of Parliament, but he was on a first name basis with a great many of the area residents.

Mike Pearson was like that. He was essentially a friendly man with a dislike for pomp. He talked with kings, emperors and presidents, but never lost the art of a cheerful grin and a conversational word for people along the North Shore. He played on the world stage, but was equally at home during a Saturday night smoker at the Espanola Legion. Pearson was a Canadian who made this country's voice important in world affairs. As External Affairs Minister in the St. Laurent government, he won the Nobel Peace Prize for his work in getting a United Nations peace force, largely composed of Canadians, interposed between Israel and the forces of the Arab nations in 1956.

I had the privilege of visiting Israel as a guest of that distinguished lady Prime Minister, Mrs. Golda Meir, in 1970, and while there I heard many good comments about Mike Pearson. Among the many honours bestowed on Lester B. Pearson during his long and brillant career was the Medallion of Valour awarded him by Israel in recognition of his efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East.

Honourable senators, as it was my privilege to serve under the late Honourable George Drew, may I express, on behalf of the people of the north and all those of Ontario, our sincere regret for the loss of this great architect who planned the success that Ontario has been enjoying for the last thirty years. It was, undoubtedly, his talent, his ingenuity, and his political psychology that enabled his government to lay the foundation for a prosperous and industrious Ontario.

If flowers were to be given as a result of the Throne Speech, I would direct them to those who wrote it. It is much more appealing in nature than the last election slogan of the Liberal party: "The land is strong." It was another sales pitch by a government which was left disheartened and divided by the result of the last federal election.

Liberal leaders and their followers are already beginning to recover from the depressing results of that election. After all the promises that the Speech from the Throne would be specific we were presented with a speech that is nothing of the sort. It covers almost every page in the many volumes of the Revised Statutes of Canada, promising amendments hither and yon, but precisely what amendments, or what specific targets the government is aiming for, members of Parliament will not know until it pleases Mr. Trudeau to tell them. That is, of course, unless they belong to the Liberal-New Democratic Party caucus, in which case they may get advance notice.

It seems to me that this mariage d'occasion between the Liberals and the New Democrats will be a thing for them to regret. Trudeau and Lewis are strange bedfellows. I am convinced that they will be making a fatal mistake if they assume that by such a wedlock it will be easy to increase their majority in 1973. It will not. In politics nothing is more dangerous than misreading the political past. The voters registered a decisive verdict of non-confidence in the arrogant and self-righteous government of the last few years. If the New Democratic Party did increase slightly their very small number at the last election, it was definitely not because of their saying to the people that they were in love with the Liberals.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister is trying to create a new image of absolute candor, revealing only absolute pragmatism. Mr. Trudeau told us before Parliament opened that he intended to keep pretty much the same policies but "sell them better" to the electorate. Same old bird in new feathers.

As I think back, this was a switch from his immediate past election utterances, which seemed very contrite and chastened. The switch may have taken place in caucus or in a cabinet meeting where the ascendant right wing of the party strongly put forward their views, and Trudeau perforce listened, for he can now no longer wield unquestioned power in caucus. He, Marchand, Goyer, and a few others are the persons to blame for near disaster in Liberal ranks in October. Whatever may have been the cause, our enigmatic Prime Minister and the government have undoubtedly adopted the view that they will have to become better salesmen, and that candies and sweetness will not necessarily make up for their poor administration.

When I hear this, and then recall what the people in Canada talked about when I met them during the campaign, I can only believe that Liberals are completely out of tune with the times. The anger displayed by the people I met was not against a government that was doing too much, but rather against a government that stood by cynically while little was being done to curb the cost of living, and next to nothing to assist the elderly and the poor or to curb the rising tide of unemployment.

Honourable senators, the realities of the marketplace must be faced head on, now that Britain has entered the European Common Market. The trouble with a national mineral policy for Canada, which the Trudeau minority government apparently still intends to pursue, is that the "national" still connotes "nationalism," with all that it implies. Thus, Energy, Mines and Resources Minister Donald S. Macdonald in a Toronto address said:

> There is little doubt that the future development potential of the minerals sector of our national economy affords the nation a most significant opportunity to realize a wide range of social, economic and political priorities.

Yet Canada's exports of aluminum, asbestos, lead, and zinc to the United Kingdom, and to the Common Market which Britain joined on January 1, face significant tariff barriers. In fact, the two Canadian aluminum producing companies have had to shift a substantial part of their resources to Europe to meet this situation. This suggests that economic realities, and the marketplace in particular, are still the overriding consideration in the development of Canada's mineral industries.

It is no use issuing a government edict on further processing beyond the prime metal stage, for example, if the market for lead and zinc in the EEC is in the form of ores and concentrates. It is still the buyer who determines what and how much will be shipped. Previously, zinc in the form of pigs, blocks, and slabs, was admitted duty-free to the United Kingdom. Now, with Britain joining the Common Market, it will face a duty of $US1.10 per 100 kilograms, or 4.5 per cent, and a reverse preference in favour of EEC suppliers. Similarly, lead in pigs, blocks, and shots will have to surmount the same external tariff. Italy, France and Belgium all have zinc smelting industries, and this no doubt accounts for the quite restrictive policy adopted by the Community on imports of zinc metal. Because of this, Canada may have to ship more zinc in the form of ores and concentrates. The same thing applies to lead.

Refined copper and alloys will continue to have free access to the British market. Canada's shipments of blister and refined copper to the United Kingdom in 1971 totalled 994 thousand metric tons, to the EEC 56.9 thousand metric tons, and to the United States 107.3 thousand metric tons. The point is that it is futile to talk about national strategy for minerals unless the economic realities of the marketplace are faced head on.

The Common Market offers the largest potential for exports outside the United States, but to benefit from it may require policies directly counter to those espoused by the academic élite.

If you scrutinize and assess the real meaning of most of the phraseology of the Throne Speech, I think you can summarize it by saying that in it Prime Minister Trudeau said, "The lesson of past agony is that without the people we can do nothing; with the people we can do everything."

He has the majority of the voters of Quebec with him, but Mr. Stanfield has the other nine provinces. When I hear my friends the Liberals say that the result of the last election was a backlash of English Canada against French Canadians I am really perplexed. How can it be explained that English-speaking people in Ontario and the rest of Canada, who have for years been Conservative, and who returned to their own Conservative Party because the Trudeau government was a failure, are called anti-French? When La Belle Province of Quebec supported and voted for a Liberal French Prime Minister, could that not be called anti-English? This really puzzles me.

I think my friends in the Liberal Party are running so short of idealism that they have confused themselves by the metric rule and the Imperial yardstick—that is, if a yardstick is used for Ontario it should also apply to Quebec. When there is failure in social and economic spheres, why hide under the cloak of philosophical nationalism?

Our concern should be for a united Canada and for a government that will promote the harmony and welfare of all sections of the country, and all segments of our diverse population. It is not the nice platitudes of the Speech from the Throne but direct and rapid action to alleviate unemployment, to curb inflation, and to improve social and economic conditions that will help to solve our serious problems. In this respect the Liberal government has a dismal record. It will soon be necessary for a new government, specifically Conservative and headed by Mr. Stanfield, to tackle these serious problems in order to assure their solution in the best interests of the total Canadian society, and all the people who have helped to build our great country.

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne I want to avail myself of this very first opportunity to congratulate Her Honour the Speaker.

Madam Speaker, in congratulating you on your appointment to this high office, I should like to add another note, one of congratulation to the advisers to His Excellency for their exquisite judgment and wisdom in selecting a person of such high distinction and, incidentally, may I add, of such tact as yourself. If we have the good fortune here as senators to be able on occasion to demonstrate our confidence in the Chair, I am sure I speak for all when I say that we indeed wish that you occupy that post for a long time in this Parliament.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Now, Madam Speaker, I must divest myself of habits learned in another place, and must not address my remarks to you, but learn to address them to my colleagues in the Senate. I must divest myself of that habit very rapidly, but before I do so, Madam Speaker, may I seek your indulgence? If I carry with me a bad habit from the other place, one which I have had great difficulty in restraining since coming to this place—that is, the ever-present desire to heckle the honourable senators, the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the Senate and the Leader of the Government in the Senate—I hope I shall have the indulgence of honourable senators, and the understanding of my fellow happy warriors of another age in the other place.

Honourable senators, it seems to have been customary—and if it is not customary I want, in any event, to enjoy it—to congratulate the newer arrivals, those five who more recently than I were summoned to this place.

I must first make reference to the new lady senator and welcome her, because of the undoubted contribution I know she will make.

I feel I should also ask for the right to welcome those four happy warriors from the House of Commons who have come here, I hope, to join me in what lies ahead in the Senate of Canada.

In opening these remarks, I am perplexed as to how to approach an Address of this sort here because, when I look at the membership in the Senate, I am reminded that, with the exception of two, all other senators were summoned to the Senate after I was fortunate enough to be elected to the House of Commons, and large numbers of them I have had occasion to greet on their arrival here.

The other two senators, Senator Hayden and Senator Paterson, took their places in the Senate in May of 1940, on that same day that I was fortunate enough to take my place as a newly elected member of the House of Commons. Both they and I have continued in Parliament ever since.

Of course, in addition there are senators in this place now who were elected to the House of Commons before I was. I can see three or four of them around at the moment.

With that background of contact with the senators, but being a very new one myself, I find it rather confusing to know just how to approach this body in regard to the Address. This is further confused by the fact that not long ago for a period of seven or eight years it was my fortune to have the responsibility of dealing with legislation, to the number of about six major bills a year, in the committees of the Senate. That was during the latter part of the 1940s and the early part of the 1950s. I must say that I can speak only with the utmost respect of the competent work done by those Senate committee members, in examining the legislation that I had the responsibility, along with the minister to whom I was parliamentary assistant, to present at that time. I have retained throughout the years, in the subsequent vicissitudes of my parliamentary life, that respect for the work of those men, as I saw them, in examining and improving legislation brought over to this chamber from the other place. I do not wish to commence naming members of those committees, many of whom are now gone from us, but their work certainly deserves recognition.

There was another feature of their work which has not been written about in any of the textbooks I have seen published recently by political scientists. By the way, sometimes it seems to me that they turn out those textbooks rather too quickly and too easily. Neither have I heard this feature spoken of, but it was something I came to appreciate and value very much. It is the salutary effect of the careful, responsible examination and cross-examination of witnesses produced before the committees. I am thinking in terms of public servants who came as witnesses before the committee and who would have the responsibility of administering the legislation then being enacted. They had the task of explaining and answering exactly how they proposed to administer the legislation. This raised on all too many occasions questions that had to be settled in the ministry, and in the department right after the hearing. It undoubtedly improved the quality of that legislation in its effect on those people who would come in direct contact with it. It also undoubtedly improved the quality of achievement of the objectives of the Parliament of the day, and in many instances it removed from the administration of the act what would have been harshness or injustice to individuals directly affected by it.

Therefore, when I speak here today honourable senators will understand me if, with that background, I may appear at times to be a little more presumptive than might be expected of a new member. If that is true, I do so in all humility. That is the way I approach my work.

Honourable senators, I was singularly appreciative of the remarks made here the other day by the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Of course, I congratulate them and I join with those who have congratulated them. In speaking of my appreciation of their remarks, perhaps I should deal with them individually.

The honourable senator from Halifax, Senator Hicks, particularly attracted my attention when he made reference to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The point he made was particularly valid and interesting. Quite frankly, I had not thought of it before, but if any proof were needed of the validity of the point he raised about the quality required of the publicly financed television system, the proof of the validity of the point raised by him was given on the program "Something Else" last evening. I watched that program with intense interest. If any illustration were needed to give complete validity to the point Senator Hicks raised about the CBC, it was contained in that program.

Incidentally, I might add that the quality of performance of Senator Hicks on television, as revealed by the colour television broadcast last evening, was of a very high order indeed. For my part I hope to see a great deal more of him. If he ever departs from this place and from the university he heads he has another occupation waiting for him.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): He is an old pro.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: My long time friend from Hull, Senator Lafond, also raised a point that interested me very much. It was his treatment of the delicate and difficult subject of bilingualism—language training and the like. What interested me particularly about the two senators together in their approach to the Address in reply was that each made his point about national unity. For instance, Senator Hicks' point about the CBC was made in the context of its effect on national unity. Senator Lafond's remarks were made in the context of national unity as well.

When it was first my fortune to take an active part in public life there was in this country a basic preoccupation with the subject of national unity which, in the latter part of the thirties, took the form of a commission and report—the Rowell-Sirois Commission—although that soon got crowded aside by the advent of war. The first election in which I fought as a candidate took place in 1940. As I recall, in the then "new" atmosphere in which I arrived as a member of Parliament, and in which the government of that day had to carry on the prosecution of the war efforts, I was confronted continuously with the requirement to consider in this country the problem of national unity. It can be variously expressed, but for the sake of simplicity I think the term "national unity" is best. National unity was a problem that persisted and received great attention throughout those war years, and it was the skilful handling of it which enabled this country to make, indeed, a war effort of which Canadians can be very proud.

That is what happened in the Nineteenth Parliament, when I was a new member of the House of Commons. Well, the requirement has continued throughout the years, and now that we are entering the Twenty-ninth Parliament and I find myself a new member of this part of the parliamentary process, the Senate of Canada, I find that again we must be preoccupied with the subject of national unity.

Thus it was that I was very happy indeed to see the two honourable senators recognize the problem, and express in their own ways their attitudes on different points as they affect the national unity of this country.

In my opinion it is something that is absolutely vital and basic to the performance of any government of this country, indeed, to the very governing of this country, because if government, any government, does not handle that problem successfully, with judgment and with skill, we will not long continue to have a country to govern—that is, a country in the present context. It may seem rather elementary to say that this is of necessity inherent in a country of this size, with the comparative lack of density of population in vast areas of the country. It may, indeed, sound simplistic to say that it will be a continuing problem in this country, which has drawn its population from peoples of diverse backgrounds who have come to this country to achieve freedom and independence and advantageous economic opportunities for themselves and their families. It may sound simplistic, but I believe it is something that requires repeating, and that we should refresh our memories on that basic fact from time to time and, in doing so, keep ourselves aware in all our efforts of that background of reality that exists, and must exist, in all governmental processes in this country.

Honourable senators, in this Twenty-ninth Parliament the Speech from the Throne is tremendously interesting. It is interesting for several reasons, but it is interesting for one obvious and outstanding, if rather elementary, reason. It sets a new precedent in modern times for the thoroughness with which it lays before Parliament the kind of legislative program with which it will be confronted once the government has been granted the vote of confidence which is, of course, the necessary prerequisite to the right of any government to present its legislation. Notwithstanding some curious motions that were put in the other place two days ago, the vote of confidence is still a necessary prerequisite before a government can present legislation.

It is quite clear that we will have a massive program of legislation with which to concern ourselves during this session of this Parliament, and I look forward to it. At the moment, however, I want to comment briefly on one or two parts of the Speech from the Throne, which deals extensively with the subject of national unity. Let me draw to your attention the concern which is expressed about the regional development programs. This concern was expressed also in the election campaign, and whether by way of attack or support is not at all the point I am trying to make. The point is that there is an extensive concern with the effort to make conditions possible that would keep this country together as an effective operating unit.

At the risk of being a bit repetitious, let me draw your attention, honourable senators, to the part of the Throne Speech which reads:

> The Government will propose to the Governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba that they join with it in the convening of a conference on western economic opportunities. Such a conference would be a unique venture in the history of federal-provincial relations in Canada. It could be jointly planned, and held in the West in the course of the summer. Its purpose would be to explore potentials for economic and social development and, specifically, to consider concrete programs for stimulating and broadening the economic and industrial base of western Canada.

And then it goes on to deal with what the government would propose for discussion, and it develops this theme in the succeeding three or four paragraphs. Surely, this new initiative on the part of the government is something which must be commended, and strongly commended, particularly when one considers the situation of a government which has in the recent election received such little support in terms of numbers from that part of the country. Therefore this bold, new, far-sighted initiative to remove from that area, or at least to seek to remove from that area, the disabilities from which the people there feel they suffer, is one that should commend itself to all parliamentarians whether supporting or opposing the government.

Naturally the success of the conference will depend in large measure on the co-operation of the governments and the premiers of those four provinces, and it is a fact that those four premiers are from parties other than that which forms the federal government at the present time. Therefore, there will undoubtedly be in those provincial legislatures, or at least in those provincial governments, an urge to fight the government here, but let me say that I have sufficient confidence in those four premiers to believe that they will see the importance to the country of the real issue involved. I have no doubt that they will see that it is important to them that they should make the maximum contribution possible so that the conference will result in the most effective solutions to the problems that confront that vast and resource-rich area of the country. I believe they will rise to the occasion.

Another part of the Throne Speech that interests me greatly, honourable senators—I might add that the speech in its entirety is one that I regard as being farsighted, but the following extract interests me particularly:

> Parliament will be asked to confirm the basic principles of the Government's program for bilingualism in the Public Service.
> The Government will continue to work in furtherance of the objectives of the Official Languages Act. Further assistance will be offered to the Provinces to help ensure that to the extent possible:
> —Canadians can educate their children in the official language of their choice
> —Canadian students can learn, as a second language, the other official language
> —Provincial governments can develop an increased capacity to serve their citizens in both official languages, as may be required.
> The Government will continue to encourage through its multicultural policy the development of a society in which individuals and groups can develop and express their own cultural identity. An Advisory Council to the Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism will be established.

That thrust to a measure that has already been brought forward by the government—and here I must say in fairness that basically it received the approval of the Opposition parties so far as policy on bilingualism is concerned—is of vital importance to the future of this country. Any mishandling of it on our part, as I see it, can have very serious consequences for the country.

I, for one, look forward to legislation coming before this house so we can examine it and discuss all of its implications. I am aware, as I am sure other parliamentarians and politicians must be, that there are those among us who say we must not mention the subject of national unity. We must not raise it in debate, or discuss the issue. Indeed, I was shocked to notice that the press and many of our political friends on both sides questioned the Prime Minister's wisdom in raising a matter of such vital importance as bilingualism for discussion by Parliament.

Honourable senators, if we cannot discuss these basic problems which go to the root of our operations in this country, and which deal with the very basis of our national unity, then what is Parliament for, and where should these matters be raised? Perhaps somewhere in a comfortable living room on a pleasant evening? They should be discussed in Parliament. I hope I do not hear from honourable senators in this place, or read in Hansard of the other place, any further criticism regarding raising a subject of this importance for debate or discussion and, perhaps, projected administrative action by the Government of Canada as a result of legislation.

I learned during the war years that in matters of vital urgency, when many desired to carry on with the prosecution of the war, some politicians were impatient with the procedures which were being taken in an effort to preserve the national unity of the country. They were impatient when we sought to discuss the basic issues affecting this country, and they wished to get on with the immediate job which all too often was important but nonetheless much smaller in comparison. I see a tendency in this country at this moment for the same cry to arise. I repudiate and reject such an approach to the problem and I welcome the opportunity which we will have during this session of Parliament to discuss these matters.

The Throne Speech contains many programs for legislation and I will not deal with them at this time other than to say that I hope when we come to deal with them, and particularly in the committee stage, we can give them a thorough examination, and cross-examine the relevant witness to the end that we will produce the best possible legislation, and, after it has been enacted, the best possible administration of that legislation.

Honourable senators, I had the good fortune last October to head, for the Canadian Parliamentary Association, the Canadian delegation to the Eighteenth Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference in Malawi. I will be making a report to the Senate on that matter in the ordinary and traditional way on another occasion, and I do not wish to speak with respect to it now. However, I do wish to raise for your consideration a matter that arose out of my visit to East Africa, my observations there, and some discussions I had on a subsequent trip to South Africa. I believe that I should draw these matters to the attention of this house.

[Hon. Mr. McIlraith.]

While attending the conference in Malawi I had occasion to hear two speeches from His Excellency the Life President, the Honourable Dr. Hastings Banda, and I had occasion to see a film that had been created of his visit to South Africa. I also had an opportunity, which I valued very much, to have a rather thorough discussion with him after the conference was ended. There is a strange sidestory about how that came about, but it was a most interesting and, from my point of view and to my benefit, important interview.

I then went to South Africa where I had an all too short stay. However, I had an opportunity to try to confirm some ideas I had been developing, and find out some facts for myself regarding the problems related to that country which are discussed in this country and in the United States a great deal, and which must concern all parliamentarians everywhere. As a result, I wish to make reference to this subject briefly.

Arising out of the attitude taken by Dr. Banda, the Life President of the Republic of Malawi, and based on some of the ideas I had been developing, I came to the conclusion that the method—that is the method being used by the United Nations, supported fully by us in this country—to bring about a better opportunity for very large numbers of the South African population—better treatment if you like, better educational opportunities, better economic opportunities, better conditions of living, better health standards, removal of discriminatory practices, et cetera—is not the best possible method. The solutions we are advocating are not those that will achieve the results we all desire.

I am quite sure that all parliamentarians here are one in not liking, and having an abhorrence of, many of what are known by them as petty apartheid policies of discrimination. They are offensive to any freedom-loving person. It became quite obvious to me, however, that the suggested remedies will not achieve the desired objective. They are in my opinion less than adequate. They are in the nature of reprimand, and are economically restricting the development of that country. I suggest to you that if better conditions are to be achieved for a population as large as the black population in South Africa it is stupid to talk about restricting the economy of the country, because it is the economy of that country that basically must produce the wealth that will provide these standards. We must therefore seek other and better methods.

May I point out that I tried to obtain accurate statistics as to the growth of the black population in South Africa, and received two conflicting figures. I have not been able to pursue the subject sufficiently to have a figure of which I am absolutely certain. However, one figure widely published is that the black population in South Africa doubled in the ten years between 1960 and 1970. Another is that the black population in South Africa increased by 60 per cent in the decade between 1960 and 1970.

As I say, I have not yet confirmed which figure is accurate. In any event, it is very clear that the growth is rapid indeed. With that rate of growth any economy, to provide adequately for the population, must be a very, very rapidly expanding one. That must be self-evident, and the art will be to achieve correction of these matters of which I complain in a manner which will not restrict that economy. Indeed, some of the steps taken to punish that country by interfering to prevent the construction of a major dam there almost smack of naïvety, because they only prevented the development of a project which would help the population, mainly blacks, in the area concerned. This is only one illustration of the wrongness of the present method being used by those who wish to improve the lot of the black population in South Africa.

Incidentally, some aspects of some of the things being done in that country do not receive adequate recognition in this country. Do not misunderstand me on that; I am not approving in any way the apartheid program, and I take second place to none in abhorring many parts of it. What I am saying, however, is that some of the efforts made in that country by its government to improve conditions do not receive attention and support.

There is an interesting and amazing lack of information here on the extent to which they have assisted industry for the benefit of the blacks, some of it outside the black areas and owned by whites, but some of it inside their areas and under the tight restriction of being owned only by blacks, or persons who will turn it over to blacks as soon as they are available to take it. Some of this belongs to the blacks now, but the remainder will as rapidly as can be accomplished come into their possession, and will not be allowed to be operated otherwise.

Some of the good things are not raised in discussion of this problem and I, honourable senators, have the temerity to hope that our Foreign Affairs Committee, when it is set up and when it completes the work it carried on during the last session, can find the time during this session of Parliament to examine this problem in some depth.

Some useful work was done last year when the problem was examined by a committee of the other place. However, the work covered only one aspect of the problem, and was not sufficiently extensive to base a responsible solution. The committee did not deal adequately with the problem, but rather dismissed what is now being advocated by several leaders of black African countries, namely, the method of contact, debate, and so on.

While at the Malawi Conference I could not help but notice that when discussions on racism were taking place, all too often only racism as practised by whites in South Africa was discussed, but not racism as practised by blacks in Uganda and other countries. Noticeable too was the regrettable absence of South African parliamentarians. I believe that their presence at the conference would have been beneficial. However right or wrong their exclusion from the Commonwealth was—and I do not propose to discuss that point now, or revive a discussion of the action taken in that regard several years ago—the fact of South Africa being out of the Commonwealth means that we have lost an area of contact with fellow parliamentarians in a similar system of government, to our great disadvantage in getting a correction of policies that we regard as unacceptable. Let us not be blind to that fact.

Perhaps we should give some consideration to having groups of senators—I anticipate that members of the other place will be rather closely confined to Ottawa in the next few months or years, or at least until the next general election—meet with groups of fellow legislators from South Africa, in order to better understand each other's viewpoint. It might well be that new initiatives should be taken by Canada at the United Nations to seek a more effective solution to the problem, a more effective remedy, a more effective means of bringing about what we all desire. I hope that we shall find the means and the time to discuss this subject more thoroughly. Such an effort would be well worthwhile.

While in East Africa, I was impressed by the inadequacy of our knowledge, at government level, of those countries. It is not difficult to understand why. Canada has no representative in Malawi, although over 1,000 Canadians work there on one program or another. I believe that situation is about to be corrected. I respectfully suggest that it must be examined. It should not be corrected by enlarging the scope of responsibility of a Canadian representative in another country. Such a representative could not effectively undertake this additional task. Rather, we should appoint a full-time representative, if necessary at a more junior level than that of high commissioner.

I hope that such matters can be examined in depth in an effort to improve the situation, and that we shall be able to play our part in bringing about a larger measure of political freedom, of freedom of opportunity in education, of freedom of opportunity in the economic sense, and a larger measure of freedom in the sense of freedom from suffering consequent on inadequate health care, for the underprivileged section of South Africa's population.

Honourable senators, in conclusion—

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Before the honourable senator leaves this important subject, may I be permitted to ask him a question? I understand that he is going to present a report on the conference. I should like to know whether the one-party system, which exists in the majority of African states, was discussed during the conference. If so, perhaps the honourable senator would be kind enough to report the views expressed on this subject by the African delegates.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: That is a rather extensive subject. It was discussed frequently in private among the delegates, and directly or incidentally in the debates themselves on several occasions. I have in my office a copy of the Constitution of Malawi, which provides for a one-party system. I have also two copies of the Constitution of the one party. It is an interesting document, and I commend it to those honourable senators who might wish to read it. In doing so, they will understand some of the problems involved. However, I hope that none of them will recommend that we accept or copy the system in any respect.

When the system resulted in the election of members from that one party only, Malawi promptly amended the constitution allowing the President to appoint others to the house. A group of five persons was appointed—very able men, incidentally—who collectively are called the opposition. The method of their participation in government, in the technical sense, is fascinating to one accustomed to our own parliamentary system, but their system is quite effective. Regrettably, however, other countries in the immediate neighbourhood of Malawi, who wish to adopt the one-party system, and who are actively setting about achieving it, are doing so for reasons which are more destructive in nature.

I do not wish to detain honourable senators by enlarging on this subject at this time, although I would dearly like to discuss it. I thank honourable senators for hearing me so patiently.

On motion of Senator O'Leary, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 16 at 8 p.m.

Report of the Canada Council, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act, chapter C-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 20 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act, chapter C-8, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Film Board of Canada, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 20(2) of the National Film Act, chapter N-7, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Museums of Canada, including accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 22 of the National Museums Act, chapter N-12, R.S.C., 1970.

TRANSPORTATION

RAILWAY PASSES FOR SENATORS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Being unprepared, I ask the indulgence of the house. My problem will be of interest to all senators and also members of the other place.

Like all senators, I am in possession of a railway pass. Mine is No. 28, issued in 1973 to the Honourable Edgar Fournier, New Brunswick, and reads as follows:

> —is a member of the Senate of Canada and is entitled by law to free transportation, with his baggage, upon all Railway trains in Canada.

Underneath that it says:

> (Chap. R2, R.S.C. 1970)

The pass is attested by "R. Fortier."

I find that my pass is not accepted on some trains, specifically the Rapido. My pass is not accepted on that train unless I have a reservation, and to make a reservation I have to call the station.

In Volume I of the Debates of the Senate for 1969-70, at pages 360-64, honourable senators will note that I discussed this problem at some length, giving all the details. At that time I reported that I had found it necessary to cheat in order to get on the train. However, I cannot cheat any longer because the gates are closed and I cannot get in.

The pass is written in good English and it states exactly what it means.

Furthermore, I have had to pay baggage charges. I had to ship a suitcase weighing 26 pounds by CNR Express, for which they charged me $4.90. I do not mind paying the CNR a few dollars if it will help the economy of the railway; however, getting on the train is a different problem.

I cannot see why I have to repeat something that I said three years ago, but the situation has not changed. I assure honourable senators that there is nothing in my mind which causes me to be reluctant. I intend pursuing this matter further. If necessary, I shall take it up with the President of the CNR. I feel it is a most unfortunate situation, and it should not continue.

If I may, honourable senators, to demonstrate my point, I should like to relate an experience I had just recently. On Saturday afternoon I went to the CN office in Montreal to confirm that the pass would not be accepted, and I was told that my pass would not be accepted unless I had a reservation. Yesterday morning my wife wanted to go from Montreal to our home. We arrived at the CNR ticket office at 7.30, and by 7.34 we were lined up at the wicket. There were four or five wickets open at that time to serve the public and there were approximately 50 people. We lined up at a wicket where there were four other people, a woman and three men. The woman seemed to have some difficulty with her arrangements, and, consequently, the passenger agent took 14 minutes to deal with her. It took the first gentleman eight minutes to make his arrangements and the other two gentlemen a minute and a half each. It then took the passenger agent three minutes to confirm space on the train for my wife.

To make a long story short, honourable senators, there was only a three-minute margin from the time we got through the ticket office and the time the train was to leave. I am wondering how many people were left at the counter waiting to purchase a ticket because the train left at exactly 8 o'clock. I am sure there were many people with reservations to Quebec City on the Rapido who could not reach a wicket in time because of the line-ups.

I believe there is a lack of communication between the operators and the ticket sellers.

I want to assure honourable senators that this matter will be carried further. If there were a Nobel prize to be given for administration, the CNR would qualify with great honour. It is unbelievable the way in which they deal with people, and the amount of money lost as a result. There is no efficiency at the ticket selling end of the operation. There is no reason why there should not be one or two places where people who are ready to board a train can go and pick up a ticket in two or three minutes. As it is now, a person has to make a reservation. The ticket agent has to go behind the counter and put the application into a machine, wait for an answer, and then write a ticket. The new form of ticket which the CNR is using is almost as involved as the new income tax return.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Would Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) allow me a question?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Yes, senator.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: The CNR would not now admit you on a certain train on presentation of your pass; is this new, recent, or does it go back several months?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I rather think it started about a year ago. However, as I already said, it was possible to cheat a little because I just had to tell the ticket collector that I was going only as far as Drummondville or Charny as at that time I was entitled to a distance of 250 miles. However, that has now been changed and even if I am travelling only one mile I have to get a reservation or I don't get on; that is, besides my pass I have to have an advance reservation.

I thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Sarto Fournier: On that point, I would like to have the opinion of other honourable senators from Eastern and Western Canada in order that we may be more fully informed. We have seen only one side of the coin. Maybe the honourable senator is right, maybe he is wrong: maybe he is exaggerating; maybe he is stating the position as it is. I would like to hear from someone from Nova Scotia, Manitoba and other parts of Canada. If the honourable senator is the only one to complain, I do not know what we are to do.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Maybe it is only on the line Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) referred to that there is difficulty. Surely opinions from all over the place would not give you the truth.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): If it is only on that line he should say so; not you but him. He is the one concerned, you are not the one concerned.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: He is telling us his experience on that line.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): We know a lot about his experience. We get sick of it.

[Hon. Mr. Fournier.]

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I will have this matter examined at once.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED APPEAL TO NORTH VIETNAMESE— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the widespread publicity given over the weekend to a joint statement that I understand was issued by two distinguished members of this house and two members of the other place, namely, Senator Carter and Senator Yuzyk, and Ralph Stewart, M.P. and Arnold Peters, M.P. I understand this statement had to do with the situation in Vietnam, and was comprehensive. I am wondering if one of the senators would wish to inform the Senate of the terms of the statement. Perhaps this statement by these distinguished senators, in collaboration with two M.P.s, which has received such widespread publicity, might be made part of our Senate record.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I doubt that it is a question of privilege. I have no objection to this being done, but I doubt if it is a question of privilege. If we are to refer to everything that senators do outside the Senate and have a debate on it, you know very well what will happen.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I realize that technically perhaps this is not a question of privilege. I might have raised the matter by asking leave of the Senate. However, I think the statement is important, and it is to the credit of the Senate that certain senators have taken this initiative. I should have thought honourable senators might be interested in having it as part of our record.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the honourable senator has arranged something with Senator Carter, I have no objection to letting him speak.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You asked for it.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, this was a very brief and simple statement, made by a few of us to the press, stating that a true and lasting peace in Vietnam requires more than the cessation of bombing or a ceasefire on both sides, and that Canada is in a position and should take the lead in putting forth a positive solution from which a real and lasting peace could develop. The statement takes up only two and a half pages of double-spaced typewriting. I would be glad to read it into the record, if I have permission, or to table it and ask that it be appended to Senate Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Since you are ready, we will give you leave.

Hon. Mr. Carter: With your agreement, honourable senators, the statement is as follows:

> It is evident that the resolution against American bombing of North Vietnam, recently passed by Canada's House of Commons, has received considerable public support. As Canadians, interested only in the restoration of a true and lasting peace in that strife-torn land, should we not now ask ourselves whether we have gone far enough? Having involved ourselves publicly to this extent, should we not now go further and also make a parallel and urgent recommendation to the North Vietnamese?

Our emotions cannot help being stirred up by the suffering of all the Vietnamese people, but we must use our heads as well as our hearts and face the facts as they are.

One of the facts we must bear in mind is that as a nation Canada passed no parliamentary protest against North Vietnam last year when, at the time the Americans were in the process of a massive withdrawal of their forces, the North Vietnamese armies suddenly lunged southward with massive tank and artillery attacks on several fronts. Thousands were killed, cities were destroyed and it was this which brought on the resumption of American bombing of the North. There is, therefore, a strong possibility that without a parallel request to North Vietnam, the Canadian protest could serve only to prolong the Paris negotiations and the tragic bloodshed of that unfortunate people.

What we desire is peace—real and lasting peace—for the Vietnamese people as a whole and we must recognize that this objective cannot be accomplished by concentrating solely on one side of their present division.

We believe we are expressing the wishes of the vast majority of Canadians when we say the Canadian government should now, immediately, urge North Vietnam to accept the verdict of a future vote, to be conducted as quickly as possible by the United Nations among the people of South Vietnam to determine whether they wish to remain independent or to be taken over by North Vietnam.

We believe also that the Canadian people would like their government to rally the peace-loving nations of the world to join with Canada in an appeal to North Vietnam to accept the verdict of the majority of the South Vietnamese as expressed in a free and properly supervised vote.

What has happened in Korea is evidence of the importance and timeliness of this suggestion. The long and bloody war in Korea ended in de facto acceptance of the independence of each area—the acceptance of reality.

This initial step is now culminating in moves by the governments of North and South Korea to find a basis of working more closely together to their mutual advantage. If North and South Vietnam will agree to accept each other as they are now, the day can come when they can work together towards a confederation or some other form of working unity.

Fifteen years of fighting and struggle in South Vietnam is an indication that very large numbers of the South Vietnamese want to be independent of the North Vietnam government; but, whatever the situation is, in the name of humanity and for the future of mankind, Canada should appeal to North Vietnam to accept a peaceful solution. The peace-loving nations of the world must exert all the pressure they can for a peaceful and workable solution to this tragic war. Civilization cannot continue to develop unless mankind learns to develop peaceful means of solving its problems.

I would point out that this document is signed by myself, by Senator Yuzyk, by Ralph Stewart, M.P. for Cochrane and by Arnold Peters, M.P. for Timiskaming.

THE SENATE

AMPLIFICATION SYSTEM—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: I wonder if I might rise on a question of privilege, honourable senators, to ask the Leader of the Government if he would have the Clerk of the Senate see what has happened to our sound system. I believe something very serious must have happened to it. When Senator Deschatelets spoke, we at this end of the chamber did not hear one word of what he said. The system is just not good enough. The chamber is almost incommunicado.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: This problem has already been brought to the attention of those responsible for providing the facility.

I am sure that Senator Deschatelets would not mind my observing, however, as I am reminded by those behind me, that, when he was speaking a few moments ago, unlike Senator Molson, he did not speak right into the microphone, although he knows, of course, how to do so. That may have had some bearing on the difficulty in hearing Senator Deschatelets. Nevertheless, there is definitely something wrong with the amplification system, and I hope that the Clerk will be good enough to see that our machinations are brought up to date.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You say "brought up to date," but the situation has gone on for at least two years. I remember that we discussed it in the Internal Economy Committee about two years ago. But apparently nothing has been done.

Hon. Mr. Molson: It is much worse.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, that is true.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Perhaps that is progress.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If we did nothing, it could not improve.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): If I may be permitted to say so, perhaps we are thinking a little too much about machinery. I remember that when I was going to college the Senate chamber, which was the same as it is today, had no sound system and yet everyone could be understood quite clearly. The reason for that was that everyone did his utmost to make himself understood even in the farthest corners. So, obviously, we do not need a complicated sound system, provided everyone makes himself heard, including, of course, the Honourable the Speaker.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 11, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, my first word must be for our new Speaker. Knowing well, Your Honour, that modesty is among your many endearing qualities, I hesitate to add to the eulogies which have been passed upon you during the past week. I will only say, then, that I express my confidence that you will preside over us with grace and dignity and that our trespasses against you will be met with gentle wisdom. I wish you, Madam, all the joy and glad grace that can come to you while you are with us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: And now, honourable senators, with diminished enthusiasm I have to speak a few words about the speech delivered here last week by the Leader of the Government. He indulged again in a wish he has had for some time, that we in the Senate should go in for more investigation, that we become an investigative body, a sort of continuing royal commission on this, that or the other question that comes before the country. I beg to disagree violently with that proposition. The Senate was not set up to be an investigative body; the Senate was set up to give the legislation coming before it what is called a sober, second thought. And if ever there was a time in the history of this country, honourable senators, when this body was called upon to give sober, second thought to the sort of legislation bound to come before us from the other place in its present state, then surely this is the time.

I am not afraid of minority government. In fact, the very first time I had the honour to address this chamber, ten years ago now, I said that I was not afraid of minority government and for very good reason; minority government has formed a great part of the history of the Mother of Parliaments. In the days of Pitt and Fox and Peel and Canning and down to the days of Gladstone, British parliaments governed with minority governments. And even in the days of Mr. Asquith, in our own time, he continued to govern Britain and governed it very well, depending on 85 Irish votes to remain in office.

But what we have in this country now is not minority government in the true sense; it is merely an alliance for survival. You have two parties in the other place violently disagreeing in their philosophy, or professing to do so in days gone by; you have a group with Adam Smith in one hand and Karl Marx in the other.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Which is which?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You have a government seeking to hold on to office with only 32 per cent of the people of Canada behind it and with 68 per cent of the people saying they don't want it. That government now with the help of a socialist group is holding on to office, and presenting us with what they call a Speech from the Throne. I sometimes think the time has come in this country to stop calling these documents Speeches from the Throne. This is not a Speech from the Throne, honourable senators. They have no right to put in the mouth of the Sovereign the sort of nonsense we see in this Speech from the Throne, so-called. This in fact is a speech of conversion; a sort of confession, a sort of "Bless me, Father, for I have sinned." This is what the Prime Minister is saying and oddly enough—or perhaps not oddly at all—the serried ranks of Liberals behind him have been converted at the same time. Never has a conversion been so swift and so full since the reputed action of a Christian Chinese general who baptized a whole army corps with a hose. This is the sort of thing that gives rise to public cynicism; this is the sort of thing that causes the young people of this country to say that they have no faith in Parliament. No party in this country has the right to exercise the functions of government, to hold on desperately to office, when 68 per cent of the people say, "You are unfit to govern." And what are they saying now? They are saying, "Yes, it is true, we are not leading them. We are not leaders; we have become followers. What we are doing is giving the people anything they say they want."

I remember a case of an Irish politician who, at the end of an hour-long speech, said, "Gentlemen, these are my principles; but if you don't like them, I have others." The Prime Minister is worse than that. He had no principles in the first place. He called an election in this country with the fantastic and pitiful cry: "This land is strong." Had the Prime Minister listened to some of the older hands in his cabinet, two of whom sit in this chamber tonight, instead of to some of the younger chaps in the Privy Council who are politically wet behind the ears—had he listened to Senator Laing and Senator McIlraith and less to what Mr. Ivan Head wrote about him in Foreign Affairs—he would not have been going around the country saying "I am having a dialogue with the people."

What arrogance! Participatory democracy did not matter any more. Those people running against him did not matter; they were nobodies. "I am the state," said Louix XIV, and the Prime Minister said the same thing—"I am the state, and I will talk to the people." He discovered he was wrong and now he comes to us with this speech of confession, for that is all it is. If you look at this speech you will find it contains at least six propositions, and there may be more, which were advanced by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition over the past three years in the House of Commons, all of which he rejected. Now he has them included in his Speech from the Throne. What way is this to govern a state?

This is why I say we cannot sit here or run all over the country investigating this, that, and the other thing when legislation spawned by an alliance of that sort is coming before us. This is not a minority government. A minority government can govern as well as, and in some instances better than, a government with too much of a majority. So I repeat, this is not a minority government in the true sense of the word, and the country needs to become aware of this fact. This is an alliance for survival, an alliance in which one party, a socialist party, knows very well that if it went to the country in another election it would face extinction, while the other party, backed by 32 per cent of the people, knows it might be exterminated as well. This is the danger which exists in this country; not the danger of a minority government, but the danger of people struggling to hold office, struggling to hold on to their salaries, their jobs, and their prestige. That is all there is to it.

I say again that the Senate must give special attention to legislation framed in that way and coming before it in that manner. I cannot accept the Leader of the Government's contention that we should forget all about what is going on in the other place, and engage ourselves in royal commissions and the workings of royal commissions.

I have dealt with the Speech from the Throne. However, there are one or two other questions to which I think I should devote a few words. The Speech from the Throne is a deathbed repentance, but you cannot believe them. You cannot believe in their deathbed repentance. True repentance is genuine even on a deathbed.

The Speech from the Throne indicates they are going to take measures to provide more jobs, and that this is already taking effect. While this was being penned, figures were released which indicated that 6.8 per cent of Canada's labour force for the month of December was out of work, and that this is the highest rate for that particular month. More than that; the actual number of Canadians out of work rose in that month to 584,000—60,000 more than in the previous month and 54,000 more than a year ago.

How well I remember how the Leader of the Government in the old days would rise, and in a tremulous voice ask what in the name of God the government was doing about these poor unemployed. Day after day and week after week the ranks of the unemployed increase; day after day and week after week inflation inflicts a grievous injury on the people of this country. Our old age pensioners are suffering, our unemployed are suffering, our middle class people are suffering, and all those on fixed incomes are suffering, from the growth of inflation. What does the government say? "We are watching the situation; we are watching it." They have been watching for the last four years. "We are watching the situation," they say. Well, I hope to God that something will come out of that. But at least let me say this, they have been watching that situation for three months now. It is practically three months since this government held on to office, practically three months since they said they were going to do something about it, and now they say, "Oh, well, so far as unemployment and the growing cost of living is concerned we will refer it to a committee of the Senate and the House of Commons."

I ask my friend Senator Croll, who knows all about committees of the House of Commons and the Senate studying costs, what happens? He was chairman of a committee a few years ago which brought in a report and made recommendations, and what happened? My friend was chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. Senator McGrand was also a member. Surely to God we do not need another committee of the two houses to find out what everybody knows now. Everybody knows now that almost shamelessly this country, with all its resources and its few people, has more unemployed at the present time and more inflation than any civilized industrialized state. It is not any wonder that an eminent American economist, Professor Eckstein, said the other day that Canada's rate of unemployment was unbelievable and shocking, and that no civilized society in this day and age should permit the number of unemployed which we have walking our streets today.

It is all very well for us to sit here in comfort in this house; it is all very well for the members of the Cabinet to sit in comfort in the East Block, but there are tens of thousands of people in this country suffering grievous hardship. There are people in this country who are roofless, who are homeless, and who are hungry, and the government says, "Well, we are watching it, we are watching it." I submit to you, honourable senators, as one who has known hardship in his life, that this is an unacceptable position for Canada, that this should be inflicted on its people after 68 per cent of them said, "We do not want this government, we are rejecting it with all its pomp and works."

Now they talk about coalition, but this is not a coalition; this is not a minority government. This is a few people determined, come hell or high water, to hold on to their jobs, and this is the shamelessness of the whole thing. This is a reflection on our parliamentary system, and all the Prime Minister has been doing for the past few years has been going around the country saying, "I am having a dialogue with the Canadian people." What vanity, what pride, what arrogance, for one man to say, "I am talking to the people. You the Opposition do not matter, the Conservative Party does not matter, the other parties do not matter; only I matter."

That is what this man said and now, humbled and chastened, he comes to us with a confession, with a document which I still cannot bring myself to believe contains any sincerity. If there were any sincerity in that document, then in the past three months this government should have done something for our old age pensioners. Does it take three months to decide that the old age pensions are inadequate? Surely to heaven, any man in public life with the experience of the Prime Minister and his Cabinet should have known that people in this country were suffering, that aged people were suffering, that people were roofless and homeless. He sits and says, "We are watching it. In due course I will make a submission to Parliament."

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Does he think that the government would be acting in a proper, constitutional manner if it brought in legislation before it had received a vote of confidence from the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: So far as I am concerned, I think the hunger of people is more important to us than the Constitution. If the Constitution permits a government to do what this government is doing, then it is certainly better that we amend that Constitution.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Then my honourable friend fails to observe what Mr. Meighen said in 1925 about the right of the government to proceed until it had received a vote of confidence and, knowing what great respect Senator O'Leary has for Mr. Meighen, I find that his statement of a few moments ago is a repudiation of what Mr. Meighen said.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am not repudiating Mr. Meighen. As a matter of fact, you introduced two bills which are before us now. If you had no right to do anything before the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was disposed of, why did you introduce those bills?

In any event, I repeat, it is nonsense that we must always abide by the Constitution regardless of what has taken place in the meantime, and whether people are suffering. I am for the livelihood and happiness of our people. That is the main responsibility of any government. You are holding on to office with, as I said, one third of the people of Canada supporting you, and that is all; 62 per cent of the people said, "Get out." They said what Cromwell said to the Long Parliament: Gentlemen, you have sat here too long; in the name of God, go.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Might I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Where does the honourable senator get this 62 per cent? I have never seen it anywhere.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You have not analyzed it properly; you have to look it up to see.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I have seen 37 per cent and 38 per cent.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You have not analyzed it properly. Do you make any great distinction between 32 per cent and 37 per cent? If only 37 per cent supports them, in God's name let them go anyway.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: How many supported the Conservative Party?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: The Conservative Party was not the government. It was the government on trial; not the Conservative Party. I say again that when only 32 per cent, or 37 per cent if you want it, say, "You go on and govern," that is not enough. That is not parliamentary democracy; it is not democracy at all. Sixty-two per cent, or 60 per cent, of the people said: "Go."

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: What about 1962?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: What about 1962?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: After the election.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I will tell you about 1962. If we did what you are doing now, which we did not, we deserved what we got. I am not standing here as a blind apologist for any party; I do not do that, I leave that to the serried ranks over there and, as I said a moment ago—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A young pupil behind you would like to put a question.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Oh, again? Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Can the honourable senator tell me how many times since 1917 a party has got over 50 per cent of the popular vote?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I do not think they ever got it, but they certainly got over 32 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In 1958 certainly.

• (2050)

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: What does it matter? I am dealing with the present. I am dealing with what is happening today, and what is happening is a disgrace to the parliamentary system, and my honourable friend, Senator Eugene Forsey, knows that damn well. I do not know why in this house he has become an apologist for the party which in days gone by he has denounced as incompetent, or worse.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He is in a different position.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I know. I am now coming to something else.

An Hon. Senator: What about the baby bonus?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am coming to the speech made the other night by my good friend, Senator McIlraith. He is a long-time friend, and a man whose integrity I respect to the utmost. He said that we should not be afraid to discuss national unity in this Parliament. I agree with him. I think that national unity is of such vital importance in the life of this nation that we should be willing to discuss it here at any time. However, I must say that I hope Senator McIlraith was as disturbed as I was—and as I am sure a number of people were—at the speech made the other day in the other place by the Honourable Mr. Marchand.

Mr. Marchand, adopting a bit of a cry-baby attitude, said that he was prepared to leave Parliament if the subject of racism was not discontinued in the province of Quebec. I would suggest that if Mr. Marchand talks like that it would be a good thing in truth for Parliament, and for himself, if he did quit the House of Commons.

Mr. Marchand is a new boy in politics in this country. Apparently he does not know the history of Quebec. I would suggest that he look over the files of Le Canada, which at one time was the official organ of the Liberal Party in Quebec. Mr. Rinfret, sitting in the Cabinet, was its editor—a distinguished and eloquent man.

In that paper, issue after issue, there was racism preached, preached, preached. But more than that, does Mr. Marchand ever read the speeches of Mr. Cardin? Has he ever read the speeches of that great man, Mr. Ernest Lapointe? Let him go and read the speeches given in days past, and then for God's sake don't have the nerve to speak to me or anyone else about racism in Quebec.

I know all about racism in Quebec. In 1925 I had the experience of standing on a Gaspé platform and hearing one of the most distinguished members of the Liberal Party, the Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux, attack me as the candidate of the Protestants and the Jews. This man, able and distinguished and honoured in the Liberal Party, actually used those words in my presence. He said he regretted, knowing me so well in Ottawa, a friend of his, that he should come to Gaspé and find me the candidate of the Protestants and the Jews. Remember, this took place in Quebec again and again and again.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, it did.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Cardin, Lemieux and Rinfret, and even my dear old friend Chubby Power, would not let the sun go down on the wrath of conscription.

I stood on a platform in Chandler in 1925—I am sure my friend Senator Langlois knows this very well—a long time after conscription, and the Liberal Party had lined up in serried ranks about 24 old ladies, and when I rose to speak they sat there with the sticks which had been provided for them and pounded the floor, crying, "Conscription, conscription, conscription." That went on year after year. It reduced Mr. Duplessis to saying that you had to fight the devil with fire. And he was right.

I knew all of those men. Mr. Marchand perhaps does not know. He has a very famous namesake who was Prime Minister of Quebec, a very fine man. There was Marchand, Parent, Godbout, Taschereau, and so on. Those people thrived on racism in the Province of Quebec. That was their stock in trade. That was their standard pattern for the people—racism; attack the white Anglo-Saxon Protestants. It goes on even now. If you listen to the younger generation what do they say? They say, "We are being exploited, we were exploited, by the Anglo-Saxons." And who asked the Anglo-Saxons to come in there? Mr. Duplessis. They did come in on their own.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): May I be permitted to make a comment?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): The honourable senator, as an historian, speaks about Marchand, Parent, Gouin, Taschereau and Godbout. Why did he forget to mention Mercier who, in 1885, became a Liberal Prime Minister of the province of Quebec on account of the Louis Riel affair, when Sir John A. Macdonald, his first leader, was in power here in Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I was going to mention Mr. Mercier because I have read his speeches, and they were not all concerned with the hanging of Louis Riel. If I had been a young man then I am sure I would have wanted to have gone and fought for Louis Riel. We tried him for murder and hanged him for treason.

I know what has happened in Quebec since the hanging of Louis Riel. I know we lost the confidence of Quebec, and we have not been able to regain it. But I think the times are changing. I think the young people of Quebec, the men and women, are beginning to realize that they cannot isolate themselves from the rest of Canada.

I am not a separatist. I was born in the province of Quebec. I went to school there. I made my first Communion there. I know, and feel in my bones, that Quebec will never sever itself from the rest of Canada. But that does not make me forgive, or stop me from condemning, the sort of things that went on in the province of Quebec in all of my days and right up to the present.

The Liberal Party was the father of racism and disunity in Quebec. There is no question about it, and I can prove it to the hilt. Conscription became a blessing for them, because they could use it to vent their racism, and they did. I remember that L'Action Catholique in the city of Quebec damned me as an Anglophone when I was running in Gaspé.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Would the honourable gentleman be kind enough to permit me another comment?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I will try to be as polite as possible.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You had better do your best.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Even if it is not my best, it will be better than yours.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have been insulted beyond what I can be expected to accept. I have been compared with Senator Sarto Fournier.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You may have asked for it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I may have asked for it, but Senator Fournier is going too far.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Perhaps it was because I spoke in English. It may be that my English over-passed what I was thinking.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Your silence is more eloquent than your words.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): In reply to the honourable gentleman, it is my opinion that I was quite fair. If the honourable gentleman knows anything that might disturb or destroy my reputation since the beginning of my political life in 1935, then the honourable gentleman can stand up and—how do they say it in English?—put up or shut up. The honourable gentleman said that French Canadians are the fathers of racism.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, no; the Liberals.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): It comes to about the same thing. In order to make the record correct since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, Louis Riel, Borden, Meighen, and Bennett, I ask: Who in Canada today would be prepared to go back to the regime that those people gave to us. Now the honourable senator says—

• (2100)

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): —the Liberals are the fathers of racism in the province of Quebec, and we have always been victims of racism.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You were elected for years and years. Otherwise, you would not have been able to sit in the House of Commons for one day.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We came to hear Senator O'Leary.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Put up or shut up.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Let us hear a good speech.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I hesitate to join in this fight. Were it with an Irishman, I would not mind.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Honourable Senator O'Leary has the floor, and unless he wishes to permit questions he should be allowed to continue.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am always glad to answer questions. I shall be delighted to answer any questions honourable senators may have.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): He is very graceful.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I am only too glad to answer questions, but I do not think a debate should be started to keep me in my seat. Really, this is ridiculous. I am glad I created some excitement, in any event.

When Mr. Meighen ran his last election in Canada a very respected labour leader in Quebec City said, "Mr. Meighen is elected again. Blood will run again in the streets of Quebec." He was challenged on that, and he has never denied it, and he is one of the most respected men in the history of Canada.

This is what I object to. I object to a man like Mr. Marchand, who is a bit of a political illiterate, really, standing up in the House of Commons of the Parliament of Canada and attacking the Conservative Party for racism in the province of Quebec. How did they vote? They did not vote for us. If we used racism, we certainly did not use it with any success, but because we got the majority of votes in English-speaking Canada they say this was anti-French.

I campaigned in this last election. I visited three ridings, one of which was in the province of Ontario. That riding, I am sure, would be described as White Anglo-Saxon Protestant. In a riding such as that, the first question you ask is: "What are the issues with which the people are concerned?" In reply to this question several things were stated, but not one of these people—and I doubt if there were any French Canadians living in that riding—mentioned bilingualism. Not one.

I went to a riding in one of the Maritime provinces and again I asked the question: "What are the issues which concern your people in this election?" And they cited such things as unemployment, inflation, and so forth. Not once did I hear a word or a complaint about bilingualism. I was glad of this because I had made up my mind not to get involved with that question. I supported the Official Languages Act; I supported it to the hilt. This country needed it, and I always wondered why French Canadians did not do more about it in days gone by.

I sat in the Parliamentary Press Gallery for 20 years. I sat there during the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was a glory for this country and perhaps the most distinguished French Canadian of our time, and I never heard him utter one word in the French language. In fact, when a proposition came before him for bilingual money Sir Wilfrid Laurier rose and said, "Mr. Speaker, I never knew one of my compatriots who did not know a $20 bill in English." That was the position he took.

When Mr. Ernest Lapointe came to the House of Commons he could not speak a word of English, and Mr. Jacques Bureau said to his friend, "Ernest, go to the Parliamentary Library to learn the English language, because in this house we have to communicate," and he did. He became one of the most distinguished speakers in our history.

I object to the Liberal Party going around the province of Quebec saying, "Oh, these Anglophones from Ontario, they are against us; they are against French Canadians; they are against Catholics; they are the Orange Party." Well, I am a Roman Catholic, and I have never had any trouble associating with my friends in the Orange Order. I sometimes think they are wrong, sometimes foolish, but that does not mean that they are not good citizens.

This is the trouble in this country. It is this cursed thing that has been going on in the province of Quebec over the last 40 years—racism, racism naked and unashamed; its chief protagonist the Liberal Party. That is why there was some backlash. Do not make any mistake about it, there were ridings in Canada where the people said, "Now look, we believe in the Official Languages Act, but they are going a little fast and a little far." This did exist; I am not denying it. It certainly was the case in the city of Ottawa, but in the particular riding I speak of a Liberal candidate had a majority of some 2,000, and that was changed to a 5,000 majority for the Conservative candidate who would never dare say a word against the French race.

I ask honourable senators to believe me when I say that I wish to God the Western provinces and the province of Ontario would understand Quebec better. The province of Quebec is a great asset to Canada. Ask our American friends what they think Quebec can do for Canada. Think of the great men who came out of that province. Think of the men who, with sword and crucifix in hand, went into the wilderness and sometimes left their names and their bones in what was then a land of savages.

These people illuminate our history. We should be on our knees thanking God that we have six or seven million French Canadians among us. They add a lot to this country; they are going to add more, and in the name of Heaven let us stop all this damned nonsense about racism.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, we have just heard a wonderful speech by Senator O'Leary. No one here might believe that I agree in good part with what he said, but I cannot see everything the way he does. I should like to discuss his speech, but I feel that it would require a little more preparation. I am sure more experienced senators will also want to speak on some of the theories expounded by Senator O'Leary. However, there are a number of answers, as I see them, in my speech. I speak with sincerity, as did Senator O'Leary. I should like, for the sake of unity, to forget Canada's past, but I shall deal with that later in my speech.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in this first session of the 29th Parliament of Canada I want first to thank our immediate past speaker, Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets, for the excellent work he did during the 28th Parliament and for the moral and intellectual qualities he displayed during that time.

[English]

It was not an easy task to find the right Speaker to succeed Senator Deschatelets, but an able choice was found in Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson. The choice could not have been a better one. I do not think there is a more popular senator among us, and her appointment was a break from our tradition.

[Translation]

It is a great pleasure to see Senator Paul Martin, Leader of the Government, and Senator Jacques Flynn, Leader of the Opposition, in their old jobs. The excellent role they have played all along their long and fruitful public career is an honour for us and a good sign for the present session.

Our new senators have already been welcomed. I join with you in all the nice things that have been said to them and I note that the average age of senators has gone down substantially with the arrival of those new members.

[English]

To me, as to many others here I am sure, Lester B. Pearson was an extraordinary man who, as was recently stated, exercised wisdom, authority without power. While he was our Prime Minister his government managed to pass a legislative program that kept on improving our way of life, and at the same time endeavoured to give Canadians a better concept of mutual understanding, and more identity and more recognition to each of us.

By the end of his term as Prime Minister, our Canadians had a new flag of their own and, as was said so ably by Senator Hicks and other speakers, a national pension program, an assistance plan to funnel welfare money through the provinces, a sort of guaranteed annual income for old age pensioners, and collective bargaining in the federal Public Service. We were also given a unified force for our three armed services, greatly expanded external aid, and the tentative abolition of capital punishment. The foundation was laid for a bilingual Public Service, the first one since Confederation.

Mike, as his intimate friends called him, was primarily a man of peace, a citizen of the world. He was always willing to assist and work for constructive ideas for our world. Although he at one time had been tagged as Canada's colourless man of peace, he justified his existence among all of us as very few had been able to. A dedicated and public-spirited Canadian, he gave Canada a good image, and made lasting friendships for us everywhere. We shall miss him very much.

[Translation]

The Speech from the Throne is, I venture to say, a direct answer to the wishes expressed by the Canadian people.

Projects are laid down in general terms which are meant to take into account, in a realistic way, the present situation. On analysis, they appear nonetheless to be very important and moderate measures, constructive projects which will make possible a stepped-up economic growth, in Canada and abroad, which we now require.

[English]

Canada's sensitiveness to developments in world trade markets and in world monetary affairs is being recognized. The need for closer links with and outward looking towards the European Common Market is clearly outlined in the announcement of active consultations aimed at strengthening trade and other relationships between Canada and the Common Market. May I say how delighted I was recently at the news of the intended appointment of a Canadian ambassador accredited solely to the European Economic Community. There is so much to be accomplished there for Canada.

Our government indicates its desire to make all necessary efforts to settle our market and other trade problems with the United States, and to maintain and expand our trading opportunities with the Americans. Regardless of actual basic problems, American urgency may force a call at any time for a complete lifting of gas and oil import quotas. The United States is also in need of our water, all the energy it can obtain from us, and many of our natural resources. Whatever Canadian assistance will eventually be given our neighbour will provide our Western and Eastern provinces with an important and lasting economic stimulus.

The Speech from the Throne commits the government to a policy of unity and equality of opportunity for Canadians. I cannot help making a reference to some remarks expounded in the last few days about our last election. I strongly disagree with the theory of some on why the vote came out as it did in Quebec and elsewhere. My assessment is that, as Quebecers have done in previous elections, Quebecers voted as they did because the Liberal policies were appealingly in accordance with their needs, wants and hopes. They liked the Liberal candidates more than the candidates offered by the other parties. The Quebec electors relied more on them for the representations of their views in Ottawa. As a matter of fact, in this respect they did not depart much in their voting from past elections, and I find it difficult to comprehend alternate interpretations of the Quebec vote.

I fail to see why Quebec could be blamed for not voting more for other parties when they had tested assurance of continuing unity and equity of opportunities with the Liberals. To have done otherwise would have been illogical and irrational. The federal results in Quebec have nothing to do with manifestations against others. They are not the result of racial flare-ups, as some are now saying.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No one has ever said that.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: They do. That is what is being said and what is being feared.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Mr. Marchand is the only one.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Mr. Marchand?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No one ever said that.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I must say "no," but I believe there are others. So I do not know where we stand. I am not going to take issue with you. I will say only this, that you should read the papers as I do and it may be that you will find out.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a question of voting. Quebecers voted Liberal. They did not vote against the Conservatives; they voted for the Liberals because they have done so for fifty years.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: That what I have said is true can be proven easily by the provincial election.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Federally, I am speaking of.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Yes, but you cannot dispose of the case the way you now do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): They are recognized to vote Liberal.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let Senator Desruisseaux make his speech.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: In any democratic country there is a certain amount of racial criticism with a deep political and electoral overtone. I must say that I had heard outside of Quebec remarks and references on French power in Canada, but to me they were made by the counterpart of the hateful extreme Quebecers saying, without the least qualification, "les maudits anglais."

I have always refused to pay racial attacks, however subtle, any attention; and any serious good Canadian, I am sure, would not care to fan racial differences amongst Canadians in these days.

There was no justification for the politically ambitious to use any such means in the hope of obtaining votes. They now find themselves on the defensive. Of this one must not be surprised. The backlash had to come. But now it is time to forget all about it.

A survey was made, I believe, by the Institute of Public Opinion some three years ago—I think I made reference to it here at that time—which survey said in short that British Columbia was 18 per cent for separatism, the Western provinces were some 11 per cent, and Ontario some 11 to 12 per cent. According to the survey, Quebec was supposed to be about 13 per cent for separatism.

I make no further comment. I simply suggest that we now drop these negative discussions and approaches to our Canadian problem. Nothing can be accomplished by expounding arguments supporting or condemning what was done. There are better, more constructive and more positive materials on which time can more effectively and more profitably be spent presently.

As a lay economist, I subscribe to the four main objectives proposed by the Liberal government: expanding job opportunities as quickly as possible to obviate the unacceptable unemployment; promoting economic growth at a rate that will sustain rising standards of living; attaining price stability, and assuring disparity of our prosperity. These are most agreeable to me, and I believe to most of my fellow Canadians. I like these proposals and I believe not too many serious economists would care to contradict them.

Honourable senators, may I say here that I hope they will receive first priority. They are so important to us at this time.

The government indicated, in the Speech from the Throne, its program to achieve these objectives immediately, by increased funding for the Local Initiatives Program and job training, by substantial seasonal capital works in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, by funding to increase direct employment by the federal government in labour-intensive projects, and to consolidate quickly the fundamental strength of the economy by amending the tax and excise acts.

My views on tax reforms are well known here. They did not and do not differ from the recommendations of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, on which I was privileged to serve for the last few years. The right approach to these revisions in taxation could be highly beneficial for the economy; but because of what was done in this field some months ago I must reserve appreciation and judgment until we receive the necessary clarifications. In any event, we should never allow again revisions that are as confusing and as indecipherable and as misleading as those faced in a rush at the end of the last session, and in many parts against the Senate-approved recommendations made by its Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Tax cuts and relief in taxation should be allowed immediately. We are well aware as to what it would mean to the Canadian economy and to employment.

The aid to small business, the expansion of the Industrial Bank, the increase of the facilities of the Export Development Corporation, and the other announced measures are constructive and commendable. In general, the wide range of beneficial measures, and the open-mindedness of the projects, pleasantly surprised me. I now hope these measures will meet with wholehearted acceptance by our elected representatives. It will help assure a faster growth of our Canadian economy, which in turn will affect employment in Canada.

Honourable senators, the five principles setting forth the government's commitment in respect of social security will lead us to an equitable guaranteed annual income, to incentives to work, to greater emphasis to get people on welfare back to work, to a fair and just relationship in the income of the people, to the recognition of the provincial status in the field of social security, to the reconsideration of Canada's social security system by the federal government and our provinces. These are all measures of major importance to Canadians. They ought, when adopted, to release us from the decennial confusion, the uncertainties, and, yes, the mess we were confronted with. It will become a pleasure to work on most of these measures with a constructive approach and a positive goal.

Honourable senators, I will not at this time give consideration to the proposed social policies. I will only say this, that I find these measures good generally and quite acceptable.

I would just like to note in passing that the Fitness and Amateur Sport Program could not be better timed psychologically. I can still recall the blunt remarks which Prince Philip made a few years ago with respect to the physical fitness of Canadians. He was right, of course, and his remarks served to stir up interest among Canadians at that time in participating in physical fitness programs. Now, since the Olympic Games are going to be coming to Canada in 1976, our program ought to be an all-out general campaign for better fitness of Canadians. Such an investment of energy in the fitness program would be one of the safest and best investments we could make in the future of Canada.

The Olympics comprise the most important and thorough testing of individuals in our world in terms of fitness and amateur sport. The Olympics offer to all a measurement of the ability, the capacity, the strength, the fitness and the will of the participants. No matter where the participants come from, they are all processed, if I may put it that way, through orderly, regional, national and international elimination events before they can arrive at the Olympics.

Thus, it is a great privilege for Canada to have been invited to be the host country for the Olympic Games of 1976. In addition to the honour of being chosen, there is the fact that the Olympics do reap rich economic and psychological rewards upon the host country.

[Translation]

The Olympics are not the exclusive property of one province or of one city, but have national and international implications, with beneficial results which are national, constructive and explicit. That is not, in my opinion, a subject for local politics, low-class demonstrations against the locations chosen for events, petty and short-sighted considerations concerning financial requirements. I do hope our country will meet the situation fittingly and display the proper spirit when negotiating its contribution. People should stop berating Mr. Drapeau. He secured the 1976 Olympic Games for Canada. He deserves to be heartily praised for his present efforts to make them a success all Canada can take pride in. We all owe it to ourselves, as Canadians, to bring him the assistance and support required for implementation of the first-class agencies required in order to organize and put on the games, instead of making joint efforts to destroy him and destroy what he obtained on our behalf.

[English]

The Throne Speech says that:

> The growing complexity of our society calls for increasing co-ordination of federal and provincial government programs.

It may be that this is a departure, long overdue, from the confused and often quarrelsome situation that has existed between the federal and provincial governments for so many years. The proposal to co-ordinate the programs of all levels of government is a major step toward overcoming past difficulties. In other words, we are finally putting our Canadian house in order and are beginning to reach joint decisions on how certain jobs should be handled and accomplished in accordance with the Constitution when there is any question of duplication of powers. This new pattern of relations is most important and will have far-reaching consequences in that it will create far greater unity in Canada vis-à-vis provincial relations.

I note with personal satisfaction that sincere steps have been taken towards harmonizing the goals, policies and programs of both federal and provincial governments, particularly in fields where the responsibilities of both levels of government are mixed. Hopefully, this could be the ray of sunshine that will dispel the fog that has kept us in the dark and in utter confusion in the past.

The special joint conference involving the economic opportunities of our Western provinces is, as it was said in the Speech, "a unique venture" and another first. It offers wonderful historical possibilities for future patterns of federal-provincial relations. Again this would be another welcome departure from past federal-provincial relations.

If the government widens the area of service to Canada open to personnel in the Canadian Armed Forces, as it intends to, in my opinion, this will prove to be a real opportunity for developing self-discipline and expanding the abilities of young Canadians through training and refining their skills. I believe this is the first serious attempt in a long time to get the youth of Canada to improve their fitness and personal discipline.

Looking over the projected programming of the session, as set out in the Throne Speech, I feel I can only give it my concurrence. In my opinion, the program offers Canadians hope for the future, a positive and constructive outlook, and rare opportunities. Just thinking out loud, I wish this Speech could have been made at the opening of the last session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament of Canada in 1972.

With these remarks, honourable senators, I support the motion made for the acceptance of the Throne Speech. Thank you.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my first duty is to follow the precedent of earlier senators who spoke in the debate and express my congratulations to our distinguished Speaker. Owing to the lateness of the hour perhaps I will not wax eloquent. I did note that Oliver Wendell Holmes said that, "Man has his will, but woman has her way," and I would guess that he had anticipated Senator Fergusson being in the Senate Speaker's Chair. There is another popular aphorism which states that "Women need no eulogy. They speak for themselves." I would guess that as Speaker, Your Honour, you will not only be speaking for yourself but you will be speaking for all honourable senators who are here and who are very pleased to have you as Speaker.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I am particularly pleased to welcome the new senators, all of whom bring distinguished records to the Senate. We are looking forward to their contribution and to their leadership. Certainly, many of them are experienced parliamentarians; others are perhaps neophytes like myself, but it is amazing how quickly one learns, as you will probably find out in due course.

I congratulate the mover of the motion, Senator Hicks, who was distinguished as a legislator in Nova Scotia and certainly as a leader in the field of education. His was a most brilliant speech leading off the debate, and it has given us much food for thought. Of course, to Senator Lafond I also add my word of congratulations for his contribution. Our leaders, Senator Flynn and Senator Martin—and I am not at all sure that I have the order of precedence right—are very much honoured by all of us, and we are looking forward with great expectation to the session now beginning.

Although I had not intended to make this part of my remarks, I could not very well sit idly by and listen to Senator O'Leary and what he had to say without in some way responding to his allegations, statements, confessions, claims, and the usual outbursts against the Government of Canada. I do so, of course, as a very humble supporter of Senator O'Leary, whom I have had the privilege of hearing on many occasions and whom I have always respected for his individuality and for his qualities as a great speaker. But I must say, with all due respect to my distinguished colleague, that I was disappointed tonight in Senator O'Leary; I do not think that his contribution tonight is one of his great speeches from which Canada will benefit. I would accuse Senator O'Leary tonight of compounding, if you wish to put it that way, the whole racial feeling which he accused the Honourable Mr. Marchand in the other place of talking about. I am not saying that Mr. Marchand was right, but I will say this to the honourable senator, that to go back and stir up old dead ashes, as he has done, has not, in my opinion, enhanced his reputation as a Canadian interested in Canadian unity, and I say that with all respect for a man who has won the admiration of so many millions of Canadians.

When he got into his diatribe on the government, it was almost unbelievable, castigating it and calling it an alliance for survival. I don't know what he would have said if by some chance, as could easily have been the case, the Prime Minister of Canada had said, "No, I don't want the burdens of office." What would a Conservative government, a Tory government, have done in those circumstances? They would have got into bed with the same partners; they would have catered to them, eased up to them and made deals with them, in the same manner as those whom the honourable senator accuses of sharing in an alliance for power in the other place.

Honourable senators, we are now in a minority government situation, and there is no doubt that when you have a minority government you must have the kind of political alliance that will lead to good government. I should like to remind Senator O'Leary, and perhaps I should include the Leader of the Opposition in this, that it is not just an alliance for survival; that in fact we have a government that is prepared to govern, a government that has been given a mandate with a larger vote than that given to any other party, notwithstanding the fact that it was not a majority. But the fact remains that they have a majority of members, and I think the people of Canada expect them to govern until they can no longer do so. I think the step they have taken is a responsible one, and I refuse to accept the protestations of Senator O'Leary, especially when we see his party, the Progressive Conservatives, panting for power, having what I would call a pathological itch for power to the extent that they just cannot keep themselves from scratching as they move along the political highway. In fact they simply cannot wait to get their hands on power. Indeed, the time may come—but I would not be too sure—

Hon. Mr. Asselin: We have waited a long time.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Well, every now and then you get your turn to swing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You say "every now and then," but you are so used to it that you cannot give it up.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Just keep going and keep hoping! I am sorry my friend Senator Forsey is not here, because I remember when I went to the university of which he was a member of the staff, McGill, we had a wonderful French professor, Dr. Villard. I must say I do not remember much of the language he taught us, but I always remember a reader we had in those days—conversational French was not quite so important—and I shall never forget a story in that reader called La torture de l'espérance. It was a story about the worst torture of all, the torture of hope. It was the story of a prison where the guards thought they would inflict the ultimate torture on an unfortunate prisoner, and so they leave his cell door open. He gets himself out of his cell and much to his surprise he finds the next door open also. So he begins to hope that he will make his escape. He goes on from one point to the next, but all the while the guards are watching him as he builds up his hopes, and of course at the very last moment when he sees freedom within his grasp, and when he sees the light beyond the wall, they pounce on him. I should like to suggest, honourable senators, that that is probably the worst form of torture. I mention it in the hope that my distinguished friends in the Opposition would keep it in mind so that they may not anticipate too much.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It works in reverse, and I can assure my friend that I am not tortured at all.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Perhaps I might also mention that Senator O'Leary and his presentation reminds me somewhat of the story of the minister whose notes for a sermon were found by the deacon. Certain passages were underlined and in the margin was a little note which said, "Argument weak—talk loud and pound on the desk." I have a feeling that that is what we experienced tonight.

There was mention of unemployment; certainly we are concerned about unemployment. I am astounded to hear the learned gentleman talking of unemployment when he knows the record of the government in providing employment and the creation of 200,000 new jobs this year. Let us look at the positive side. I would suggest that the record of the present government in this field is a very good one indeed when compared with the record of the previous Conservative government back in the early sixties when unemployment was a disaster, and the situation was much worse than it is at the present time. I just draw these things to the attention of honourable senators so that they can look at them in perspective rather than just the distorted view that has been given to us so volubly and so vocally by the able senator.

Honourable senators, with your permission I should like tonight to spend a few minutes in dealing with the Throne Speech and particularly with the item in it which was of most interest to Western senators. I am sure that Senator Manning, Senator Cameron and others representing the Western provinces will be talking on this subject.

I am proud that our Prime Minister has recognized that there were errors of omission in the past. There is nothing wrong with that, Senator O'Leary. There is nothing wrong with finding out where you have been wrong. Perhaps that has been the weakness of the Tory Party for the last many generations—they never would admit that they were wrong. I am proud to have a Prime Minister who says, "We made mistakes." He admits it publicly: we did not have a program that in all ways met the needs of Canada. But I can assure you that he still had the majority of votes in Canada. He is prepared now to modify this program. He made a start in Western Canada by doing something which no Prime Minister has ever done before. He came out and supported the Honourable Otto Lang in bringing forward a two-price system, something which every farm organization, every agricultural leader and every citizen of Saskatchewan has been after for 20 or 25 years. His was the government that did it. Then they turned around and spent over $40 million on grain hopper cars, one of the first indications of a real Treasury support for the hard-pressed farmers of the Prairie provinces. You may say that this was not effective, and perhaps it was not. But I can tell you one thing, it brought the member in the other place, the Honourable

Otto Lang, back to Parliament with a majority which was increased from 800 votes to 8,000 votes, and it was against the same Opposition, the same people of the other parties. That is the kind of support that was engendered because he was able to tell the people of the government's program, and this is gradually infiltrating through the Prairie provinces. I would like to suggest that we will see the results of this accumulation of support for a government which cares about farmers as we get into forthcoming federal elections. We were delighted, all western senators, to see that there will be meetings with the governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba asking that they join with the federal government in the convening of a conference on western economic opportunities. Such a conference would be a unique venture in the history of federal-provincial relations. It could be jointly planned and held in the West during the course of the summer. Its purpose would be to explore potentials for economic and social development and specifically to consider concrete programs for stimulating and broadening the economic and industrial base of Western Canada. They go on to say that a second important subject—and I am sure other senators will speak on this—will be improvements in the total transportation system, so basic to overcoming the problems of distance in that region from other parts of Canada and from ocean ports, and the development of our northern frontier. Honourable senators, regardless of your political affiliation, I would think this is a very important step forward.

Many people are unable to recognize why Western Canada is disenchanted. I can only speak of Saskatchewan, and I will leave it to senators from other Western provinces to state their point of view. But, traditionally, Saskatchewan, an agricultural province, has not been a supporter of federal policies, whatever the government. We have the history of a rich area of the country, very rapidly developed, moving into a fairly large population in a short period of time, based on the instability of an agricultural economy. Our farmers, our townspeople, our business people and professionals, had engrained in them a deep-rooted suspicion of the railroads and the freight rates they were charging, of some of the financial institutions for their activities, of the tariff policies of the federal government, and the result has been generally a very strange reaction not only in Saskatchewan but in most of the Prairie provinces. And politically the agricultural base of the Saskatchewan economy has greatly influenced voter support. There has been stability in the provincial field. Generally speaking, provincial governments last a long time. In the province of Saskatchewan there have been only five governments turned out of office in the 67 years of the province's history. The reason is that the voters feel that provincial governments will respond to the needs of the people, but the federal power has never really been accepted by those who live in Saskatchewan. This is indicated by the fact that in 1925 Saskatchewan elected 15 Progressives and one Liberal. In 1935 they elected 16 Liberals—the voters swung around—out of 21 members. In 1945 out of 21 members they elected 18 CCFers. In 1958 they moved almost completely Conservative, thanks to the brilliant leadership of the Honourable John Diefenbaker—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: You can say "Hear, hear" because John Diefenbaker is a great Saskatchewan citizen and a great Canadian. We all recognize that. He has made, perhaps, only one political error in his life. Through some unknown factor, he joined the Tory Party. The fact is that John Diefenbaker was never a Conservative. He was a Progressive, and it may be that as a Progressive Conservative he found his niche. John Diefenbaker won the support and admiration—and still has it—of Western Canadians, Prairie Canadians, because he was a Prairie radical all the way. I suppose one of the problems he had as Prime Minister was the fact that he, too, had this innate or inborn suspicion of Bay Street and eastern interests, and railroads. Later he used to go back to Saskatchewan to hear their point of view before he made a decision. We still to this day are great admirers of this wonderful Canadian leader.

This is the history of Saskatchewan politics and there must be a reason for it. I am proud that the Trudeau administration, as illustrated in the Throne Speech, is prepared to look into the matter in detail with provincial premiers, every one of which is not a supporter of his political party.

Honourable senators, the economic problems are very real indeed. It comes as a surprise to most Canadians to learn that in 1936 Saskatchewan was the third largest province in terms of population in the Dominion of Canada. There was Ontario, there was Quebec, and there was Saskatchewan. The census of 1936 indicated that Saskatchewan had 931,000 people. Here we are, some 37 years later, and Saskatchewan has 926,242 people instead of 931,000. In that period of time the population of Canada doubled. If you look at the statistics, you can see that we are the only province during that period of time which has dropped in population. Even the Maritimes have continued to grow over those years although not as rapidly as some of the other provinces.

Now, there must be a reason for this and, of course, it is obvious. We have had a decline in population until we are in the position of being one of the "have not" provinces, although we are rich in resources, because of our agricultural base. To meet the changing competitive position of the products they produce, and by involving themselves with technological improvements, the farms have grown larger and larger. The units are larger, and we have many less farms. We see a complete change in the agricultural pattern, which has meant fewer people, and smaller towns. Communities have lost their lifeblood, and are disintegrating. The people of Saskatchewan face a major problem if they are to continue to keep pace with the rest of Canada. That is the type of problem which I hope the Prime Minister will discuss with our premier and other Western premiers in an attempt to find a solution.

It is a very serious situation. It is impossible for a decreasing population such as we have—and we hear predictions that in 20 years we might be down to 750,000—for this relatively small population to support the level of services that we have learned to enjoy, such as good universities, good highways, good public services, good administration, good health care, and good hospital care.

These are the things that I am sure we are all very proud that the Government of Canada is finally looking into.

We have a problem with transportation, but the hour is probably too late to discuss freight rates. There are, however, spectacular illustrations of the difficulties faced by Saskatchewan in moving merchandise to and from the market that result from the non-competitive position of being geographically a disaster in so far as freight rates are concerned. We are not able to benefit from water competition; we are not able to benefit to any extent from American road competition; we are not able to benefit to a great degree from highway competition. So, quite frankly, we have always considered ourselves to be in the hands of the railroads. They have co-operated, I am sure, on many occasions, but there is still a long, long way to go. I have information here which I have been able to gather from a variety of briefs from the Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta governments concerning freight rates. I could cite such examples as that of shipping a carload of nails from Hamilton to Vancouver via Saskatoon, where the rate would be cheaper than that for dropping that shipment off in Saskatoon, although Vancouver is a thousand miles farther.

This is the type of problem which bothers us in Saskatchewan and worries the people of the Prairie provinces, who feel that while they are making a significant contribution to the economy and well-being of the country they are short-changed as a result of these barriers which are raised.

We have the problem of the Hudson Bay route of Churchill. You know, you have to live in Western Canada and Saskatchewan to know how important Churchill is to us, yet it is very much neglected by the federal government. New construction is needed there. I should like to quote from a report by Mr. Willis A. Richford, president of the Hudson Bay Route Association:

> The men whose representations must be given great weight because they have the responsibility of operating the Port of Churchill stressed that an extensive program of modern dredging, improvement of Port facilities is an immediate necessity, if the Port is to avoid further deterioration and to meet modern requirements, and to ensure that it has a future.

Do you know, our farmers get 12 cents a bushel extra for their grain if it is shipped through Churchill to Great Britain. In 1970, 23 million bushels of grain was shipped through there. Last year it is listed at a little over 16 million bushels. There should be 25, 30, 40, or 50 million bushels going through that port, and we should have better freight rates getting to it and from it on the railroads. This is the kind of matter that is an irritation to the people of Western Canada.

I could go on and discuss problems of our economic base. We must have a secondary industrial base. There is just no doubt about it, if we are to employ the people who are being raised in the area. Alberta has been blessed by natural resources in the north country, which have given them a shot in the arm, and a base that has meant prosperity and development in that province under the very able leadership of a former premier, Senator Manning.

Saskatchewan, however, is finding it is unable even to process its natural resources. We are, so to speak, just the hewers of wood, and we ship our cattle, rapeseed, and so forth elsewhere.

We have a case right now before the Canadian Transport Commission respecting the freight rate on rapeseed as against that on rapeseed oil or rapeseed meal. You know, it is so discriminatory. The grain can be shipped under special Crowsnest Pass statutory regulations at a very low rate, but if the oil is taken out of that grain and it is processed in Saskatchewan in plants which are already there, and which could expand to provide employment, it becomes noncompetitive because of the higher freight rates on the manufactured product. Again I say to you, honourable senators, these are the problems which concern Western Canada and Saskatchewan.

Perhaps the hour is too late to carry on much further. We are concerned about the lack of federal spending in the province of Saskatchewan. I am about to astound you with a few statistics. This is the spending of the federal Department of Public Works in various provinces. Newfoundland in the year 1971-72, had a per capita federal public works expenditure of $15.22; Nova Scotia, $12.36; New Brunswick, $12.08; Prince Edward Island, $18.32; Quebec, $12.45; Ontario, $21.86; and Manitoba, which does quite well, $15.16. We then come to Saskatchewan, with $4.57 per capita as against, say, Ontario, with $21.86. Is there any wonder that we are concerned when, in fact, federal money expended on public works is not coming into the province of Saskatchewan, not that we want unnecessary projects.

Alberta is not treated that much better. It gets $8.68, which is still almost double that of Saskatchewan. British Columbia gets $9.30; but Saskatchewan, imagine, gets $4.57. That is not unique for this year. If we consider the historic expenditures of the Department of Public Works the problem will become apparent. I say it is a shame that the federal government has seen so little of the need of the province of Saskatchewan for federal expenditures in this regard. We can say the same of military spending.

We have the social problem of Indians, which I will leave for someone else to speak on, but it is a major and significant problem that we in Saskatchewan are facing. We need help with it, because it is something which will be of major concern to all Canadians.

Honourable senators, due to the lateness of the hour I will cut this a little shorter than I had intended. There are many other points that I wished to raise, but which I am sure will be raised by other Western senators. I want to conclude by saying that Saskatchewan has no desire to be the richest part of Canada. We will never be a heavily populated part of the country, but we have clean air, wide vistas, rich resources, and wonderful people—people who are good, hard-working, always optimistic Canadian citizens. In the consultations announced in the Throne Speech on the problems that concern us, we think that the special aspirations and concerns of Saskatchewan and all the Western provinces can be discussed. The problems may not be solved. It will take more than discussion to solve them, but it is to be hoped that steps can be taken to ameliorate them. We are looking forward with confidence to those meetings, in the hope that Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and British Columbia will become stronger and play a more significant part of this Dominion of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of Ordinances, chapters 14, 17 and 22, passed by the Council of the Yukon Territory at its 1972 Second Session, pursuant to section 20(1) of the Yukon Act, chapter Y-2, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-83, dated January 9, 1973, approving same. (English text).

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION—QUESTION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether this is a question or not, but I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he is aware that an error was made in the setting up of the Committee of Selection on January 4. There are eleven names listed. Rule 66(1) states:

> At the commencement of each session a committee of selection consisting of nine senators named by the Senate shall be appointed whose duty it shall be to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees.

I feel there is probably the necessity of a motion or some other action in order to make it proper and in conformity with our rules. The error probably arises out of the assumption that the two leaders are ex officio members of this committee. The rule is that the two leaders are ex officio members of all standing committees, but the Committee of Selection is a special committee, not a standing committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Molson was kind enough to give me notice of this. I am going to ask Senator Langlois, who has been dealing with this matter, to reply. I am sure that if Senator Molson is correct, the Leader of the Opposition and I would be personally grieved if we were not—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Included.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —members of that committee.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I too have had notice of Senator Molson's remarks today, and I have had an opportunity to look into this matter. Apparently it is not a mistake. It has been the practice to have a motion of that kind with the same number of senators to sit on the Committee of Selection. The misunderstanding arises, apparently, from the fact that under rule 67 the Committee of Selection is not listed as a standing committee. However, I am informed by the legal advisers to the Senate that the Committee of Selection is, in fact, a standing committee.

• (1410)

The Leaders of the Opposition and of the Government in this place are entitled to sit as ex officio members on any standing committee. Of course, when the committee sits, these two honourable gentlemen will be listed as members ex officio, and following their name will be an asterisk indicating that they are sitting on the committee as members ex officio. However, that can scarcely be put into a motion. I am informed it is the way this has been done for a number of years, and there is no real infringement of the rules. It might be advisable at some future date for the Rules Committee to investigate the amending of rule 67 to add the name of the Committee of Selection to the list of standing committees.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I am grateful for that explanation. If this committee is in fact a standing committee, undoubtedly rule 67 should be changed, because at the moment the Committee of Selection is not listed as a standing committee. Rule 67 states, "The standing committees shall be as follows," and does not include that committee. I accept without question the legal advice of which we have been informed, and I think this should be regularized as soon as we can do so in order that we do not run into another unimportant difference such as this.

May I, honourable senators, ask leave in this connection to call your attention to the fact that you have just received a revised book of the Rules of the Senate, which has been brought right up to date to January, 1973. It incorporates all the amendments that have been made effective since the last book of rules was published, in 1969. I think it is now in as good form, with the exception of the difference we have just found, as it can be.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: If I may be permitted, I think I should add to my remarks a reference to rule 5(s), where standing committees are defined. It says:

> "standing committee" means a select committee appointed to consider and to report thereon to the Senate matters falling within the duties specifically assigned to it by these rules, and on other matters that may from time to time be referred to it by the Senate.

This definition amply covers the Selection Committee, and it is under this rule that the Selection Committee must be considered as a standing committee, even though it is not listed in rule 67 among the other standing committees.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be given permission to put on the record a slight correction to the number of bushels of grain shipped through Churchill which I quoted in my speech last night. I have been corrected, quite rightly, by the most knowledgeable man on this matter in this chamber, namely, Senator McNamara. The figures I quoted in fact represented wheat shipments. There were additional grains shipped. I quoted 16.3 million bushels of wheat. To that should be added 0.1 million bushels of oats and 8.9 million bushels of barley, making a total shipment through the port of Churchill of 25.3 million bushels of grain, as against the 16.3 million bushels to which I referred.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is that all you want to correct in your speech?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I asked for that. However, if the Leader of the Opposition would like me to continue, I have many more things I would like to say.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not want to push you. I am taking into consideration the wish of the house.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, my first duty, in making my first speech in this session of Parliament, will be to join with those of my colleagues who have preceded me, in congratulating our friend and colleague of many years on her elevation to the presidency of this chamber. I am sure that we are all delighted with the selection. We know that she will preside over the chamber with grace and dignity and fairness, and that in another important area, when we have visitors coming to this country whom the Speaker has a responsibility to entertain, she will receive them with that peculiar grace and dignity which is characteristic of our Speaker.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: May I also join in welcoming those new senators who have come to the chamber since we met last, in the summer, and say I am sure they will have a great deal to contribute to the discussions here. May I also join with others in congratulating the mover of the motion for an Address, Senator Hicks, and the seconder, Senator Lafond, on the excellent contributions they made.

Honourable senators, I am encouraged on seeing that, in the Speech from the Throne, the government has set a number of goals and priorities and has submitted a program of measures which will contribute to the development of a coherent set of industrial policies for Canada. I, frankly, like that Speech from the Throne—even if it may represent some pirating from my friends across the way. After all, this is good politics.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We are independents, you know. Do not forget that.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: It is the kind of Speech from the Throne, it is the kind of agenda, that I would like to have seen three or four months ago.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Three or four years ago.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: What has puzzled me is that in the short time after the election we could come out with this kind of a program, one which I know will meet the needs of thousands of people, and why this could not have been done before. I wish that the Prime Minister and his advisers, whoever they may have been, could have been with me on a number of occasions, in supermarkets, at some farm meetings, and just on the street, to hear the reactions and to hear the talk of people who heard the slogan "This Land is Strong." Some of those reactions were so unparliamentary that one could not put them on the record here. I am sure that if this kind of program had been discussed at that time, they would have been much happier. So much by the way.

I believe all Canadians will agree with the two major goals of the Throne Speech program, namely, national unity and equality of opportunity. I wish to say something about national unity a little later on in this speech. Likewise, everyone will agree with the objectives of an economic policy to reduce unemployment, to contain inflation, to strengthen the economy generally. There will also be general agreement on social policy to bring about, in consultation with the provinces, a reorganization of existing social security programs. It is to be hoped that the practical steps necessary to implement these ideas will be brought into legislation in the near future.

Under the program to attain these economic objectives, emphasis has been placed on measures to provide more jobs now, by strengthening and broadening existing programs. For example, the proposals include increasing the funding for LIP, the Local Initiatives Programs; increased funding for job training; substantial capital works programs to be undertaken in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities; and special funding by the federal government to increase the employment in labour-intensive projects.

Those are all desirable programs, but I would just like to comment on one: LIP. While I think it has been useful in providing a number of jobs in the past two years, nevertheless, it is in the nature of a palliative and does not come to grips with the fundamental problem of a permanent program of jobs for the Canadian work force. It has elements in it that should be continued, in my opinion, but we must have something on a much more permanent basis than that. Many of the projects are in the nature of patchwork programs and some of them are of questionable value. I would have much more hope for the capital works programs developed in co-operation with the provinces, and I hope an organized and sustained program of home building will find a place in this national employment program.

There is no area of the economy that provides more jobs and distributes employment more widely than a program of construction in the house-building industry, and heaven only knows we need to do a great deal in this respect.

While it may be the government's intention to elaborate in some detail on a program for home building, there is no indication of it in the Throne Speech; and that is quite natural because it may be the intention to develop this in more detail when the budgetary measures are brought down. I should like to emphasize, however, that this is one of the most productive as well as the most needed programs in Canada at this time. I feel it would be much more successful in providing a stimulus to the whole economy than some of the local initiatives programs, good as they may be.

Another area of importance is the revision of the General Adjustment Assistance Plan to enable industry to take advantage of opportunities for increasing foreign trade. With Britain's entry into the European Common Market there is a danger that some $700 million worth of Canadian exports may be adversely affected. I do not by any means think we are going to lose all of those exports, but at the same time we are not in as favoured a position as we were prior to Britain's entry into the EEC. On the other hand, if, as we hope, Britain's entry into the EEC provides over the years a larger market and results in an improvement in the economy of the U.K., that will be all to the good so far as the export of Canadian goods is concerned. We should seize upon every opportunity to adjust our thinking to get into this market.

I have no doubt that there is an opportunity for further Canadian exports among the other members of the European Economic Community itself, but we should not be content with looking at only the EEC; we should have the representatives of our Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce as well as private business representatives and industrial organizations explore every possible opportunity throughout the entire world.

Recently, a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians visited Cuba. The Cubans pointed out that Canada enjoyed a substantial balance of trade with Cuba in Canada's favour, but that if Canada could take Cuban sugar rather than South African sugar the Cubans would buy a greal deal more from Canada than they do at the present time. In other words, Cuba is right on our doorstep and there are opportunities for expanding our markets there. Perhaps we should take a hard look at that situation. The same is true with respect to South America, southeastern Europe, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Romania, and Yugoslavia. These countries represent a developing market, and we should miss no opportunity to expand our trading patterns throughout the world.

Another element in this development is aid to small businesses through new initiatives to strengthen management and consultant services and to improve access to financial facilities. This is an area of major importance because if we are to increase the number of jobs in this country, and do it on a permanent basis, we must create a climate in which small business will thrive. If small business is to thrive there must be a concerted attempt to upgrade the quality of management in these businesses, and so far all too few of these people have been able to take advantage of management training programs available at the present time. Relatively few men from small businesses attend the advanced management courses offered by such schools as Western, Queen's, Toronto, Banff and others. At least some three or four years ago the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce undertook to provide a program of training for small businesses by sending teams of people out to conduct a series of lectures in the smaller communities. In my judgment this program has not achieved the purpose for which it was designed, and much more value could have been obtained from a similar expenditure of funds by bringing people together in residential surroundings where they would have the benefit of a concentrated program under top-flight leadership and where they would have ample opportunity for that very important element in any program of education for adults—the opportunity to exchange ideas among themselves.

One of the difficulties the owner or the operator of a small business with, say, from 15 to 50 employees has to face is that because the management is provided by the owner himself it is difficult for him to get away from home. This was the advantage of the former program whereby teams of instructors went into smaller communities. However, the weakness of that program to which I have referred was that too many of the people offering the training were altogether too limited in business management experience and training themselves, and furthermore the courses were of a sporadic nature and did not provide a milieu from which the maximum benefits could be obtained.

So, for this program for providing training and management development for small businesses to succeed, provision should be made to utilize the facilities of existing institutions by making some arrangement whereby the leadership of the small business can get away to take a course which should certainly not be less than two weeks of concentrated effort, and possibly three, with further refresher courses from time to time. The kind of assistance they might require would be the provision of funds to enable them to bring in temporary management while they are away in those cases where other members of the business or other members of the family could not take over, and in my judgment money spent in this fashion would be money well spent.

While on the subject of management development, I should just like to comment that in recent weeks and months there has been a growing chorus of criticism of the way government programs have been administered. Probably the latest and the most spectacular was the administration of the unemployment insurance fund. Here we have an excellent act whose value has been negated in some cases by the wrong kind of administration. I could name numerous other instances both in provincial and federal fields. For example DEVCO in Nova Scotia leaves a good deal to be desired in the way they treat their employees. I will go further and say the reason you hear so much criticism of government today is because of the quality of administration. We have many very good acts which are, in effect, being administered in such a manner as to create injustices and grave inequities. This suggests to me that the training of civil servants at the senior administrative levels leaves a good deal to be desired. It is true that the Public Service today is sending a number of men and women every year to management development programs at Toronto, at Western, at Banff and other places, but the numbers being affected by this kind of training are a mere drop in the bucket. It seems to me that if we are to develop in the Public Service the kind of efficiency that is needed we need to go much further in requiring that people who are in administrative positions from the middle management level and upwards must, as part of their job specifications, and part of their job requirements, be required to have taken management training programs somewhere of first-class standard.

I know the Public Service has a number of courses for public servants and these are confined to in-house representatives. Such programs are only a beginning. They provide a reasonable opportunity for selecting people who should go on to more advanced management training. Do not misunderstand me, I think that the in-house programs being conducted for civil servants are good. They are a step in the right direction, but they are only a beginning.

I want to emphasize that it is very important that people with managerial responsibilities in the Public Service benefit greatly by sitting around the same conference tables with those from the private sector. Such a common experience between public employees and private employees has a good effect on both because they each come to realize that they may be required to do the same kind of job, but under a completely different set of rules and regulations.

I would venture a prediction that if proper management training techniques were applied to all of those people with managerial responsibilities in the Public Service, from the middle management level and up, we could reduce the number of employees in the Public Service by a minimum of 10 per cent. And the savings in this way by upgrading the quality of personnel in the Public Service would more than pay the cost of training many times over, and the public would get a much more efficient service.

One has only to look at the mess in the Canadian Post Office to realize the kind of situation which has been allowed to develop over the years. Let me interject here. I have been negotiating for some time with some immigrants who wanted to come to Canada from Russia, sponsored by a family in this country. I wrote to the Honourable Mr. Andras early in December. He replied to me on December 22. I received his letter, which was urgent, on January 15. It took the minister's letter 24 days to come four blocks. Now, you can say this is an isolated instance, but it is not. It is happening all the time. Today there is a wildcat strike in Toronto, and the Post Office is closed. There is another one somewhere else. I wonder how long it can go on. Fortunately, the postal employees had more sense than their union leaders, when they voted against going on strike recently. I hope they stay with it because I can assure these same postal union leaders that the Canadian public is in no mood to tolerate further strikes in the postal service.

Again, on the question of collective bargaining, the Prime Minister has given as an excuse for not intervening in some of the disputes that we have had with the Post Office, with the airlines, and with the dockworkers and others, that he felt the collective bargaining process should be allowed to run its course. In looking at the long, drawn-out negotiations which have gone on from three or four months to as much as 15 and 18 months, one cannot blame the employees for becoming fed up with the denial of settlement for such long periods of time.

I believe that the Treasury Board is the agency which has the responsibility of conducting the collective bargaining processes with the civil servants, or some of it at any rate. And while I do not want to reflect on any individual, it seems to me that surely there could be a more speedy settlement of disputes in the federal Public Service than has been the case over the last few years. As a matter of fact, I wonder whether or not the Treasury Board is the proper agency to have the responsibility for settling these disputes. Why could this not be transferred to an agency independent of the government entirely? I am sure it would be a relief that the President of the Treasury Board would welcome because he is the man in the middle and, as a result, he has to take abuse from both sides. I would like to see this matter of an independent agency for settling all disputes in the Public Service established at the earliest possible date.

Decentralization of DREE: Another important item in the Speech from the Throne was the measure to reduce regional economic disparities, with the DREE program to be decentralized to better identify opportunities for economic development. I think this is a sound measure for the reason that the closer the administration is to the project being carried out, the more effective the program usually is. The people on the ground have an input to make to the development of such programs that is invaluable. First of all, they know or should know the needs of the community in which the program is being developed. They know or should know the resources of men, materials and equipment which are available to meet those needs. And thirdly, because they are operating under the eyes of the community itself, there is a good chance they will be more concerned than an outside agency with doing the best job possible, because they have to live with the people for whom the program is being developed. Finally in this respect, the need for experienced and trained business managers to administer these programs is self-evident from the very beginning.

Social Policy: The measures suggested to rationalize and modernize our social policies are long overdue. In this respect I would like to compliment the new Minister of National Health and Welfare, Marc Lalonde, on the excellent speech which he made in the House of Commons on Thursday, January 11. It was an excellent speech and put in perspective the whole range of frequently overlapping and unintegrated social programs in Canada. While on the subject of this speech, I would like to say that, as far as I see, the quality of speeches made in this current session of Parliament is better than any that have been made in the House of Commons in the last 10 years and this goes right across the spectrum of the parties there.

Hon. Mr. Martin: With some exceptions.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: With some exceptions, right. Everyone can find exceptions. I say this regardless of party. There have been excellent speeches made by Mr. Diefenbaker, Mr. Wagner, Mr. Reid, Mr. Lalonde, Mr. Firth from the Northwest Territories, and a number of others. They have set a very high standard and we can only hope that the performance in the House of Commons, in dealing with legislation in the weeks and months to come, will be of the same high quality.

Mention was made of providing an equitable guaranteed annual income for the aged, the blind and the disabled. I think that, thanks to the work done by our colleague Senator Croll and his associates on the Poverty Committee some years ago, a good deal of education of the public has gone on since that excellent report was presented. People, today, are coming to recognize that instead of the multiplicity of programs which are often overlapping, which are often inefficient because of gaps between them, and which are confusing when looked at as a package, could be much more efficiently and much more economically administered through the provision of a single guaranteed annual income for those who are unable to work and help themselves. Canadians are prepared to be generous to these people, and the guaranteed annual income could be an effective way of meeting this need first, and in time I think the day will come when we will find that the guaranteed annual income for all will be preferable to the multiplicity of social and welfare programs now on the statute books.

A second very important measure is the one which suggests that the social security system be modified to provide more incentives for people who can work, to get them off social aid and back to work. This is a very important measure and we hope that it will be put into effect at the earliest possible date.

Much has been said in recent months about people who are refusing to take jobs because the difference between what they would be paid and what they would receive from either unemployment insurance or welfare is so little that they are further ahead not to take jobs. In one of last night's Ottawa newspapers there appeared an article to the effect that a street-cleaning firm was offering applicants $3.27 per hour to clear the streets, but nobody wanted to take the job.

The degree to which this well-meant and necessary legislation is being abused is a matter of dispute. The fact remains that surely we can devise measures which will provide sufficient disincentive for people to accept welfare. In other words, people should be encouraged and given incentives to take jobs rather than become dropouts from society, living at the expense of those who are willing to work. As I said earlier, there is a dispute as to what percentage of the people are abusing our social welfare program. But again, good administration would soon plug the gaps in the legislation and make it more effective in meeting the needs which it was designed to meet in the first place.

One of the disheartening facets of life in many a Canadian community in recent years has been the plight of the so-called working poor, those who, because of pride and a sense of their own dignity, continue to work and support their families on incomes that sometimes are less than they can obtain from welfare. One of the difficulties here is that a man may be working at a job which pays the minimum wage. He may have a family of five or six children, whom he has to support on the wage he earns. On the other hand, if this man were to give up his job and go on welfare, he would receive sometimes twice as much as he was earning from his job, because welfare payments are paid on the basis of minimum needs for the basic couple, plus an allowance for children. In reality, this has the effect of distorting the total amount of income coming into the household in any one month.

No one wants to cut down on the amounts paid to those people who, through no fault of their own, may find themselves unemployed. But we have to remember that the intent of the legislation was not to impose a burden on people who are working at the minimum income level, but who are too proud, too independent, and have too much self-esteem to go on welfare.

There are abuses, flagrant abuses, of the social security system. For example, a case which can be duplicated over and over again is that of a husband and wife who are both working. The man may have a good job, but his wife may be employed for three, six, or nine months of the year and then have her work terminated for a period of months. In many such cases, the income of the husband is sufficient to maintain an ordinary family, but time and again, when the wife of such a man has had her work terminated because of its being seasonal or short-term, she will register for unemployment insurance. This is not what unemployment insurance was intended for in the first place.

A justification for their doing this is that they pay into the unemployment insurance fund. But again, because the unemployment insurance fund was not accurately actuarially based, we have had the picture this year of the tremendous deficit in the fund. This is the kind of thing that has to be clarified.

I can think of other instances, where fishermen will go out and in a few weeks earn from $15,000 to $20,000, or as much as $30,000. They then return home because the fishing job is completed, and draw unemployment insurance. I can think of some specialized areas, such as our national parks, where, if one looks at the record, one will find more guides per capita than in any other area in the country, the reason being that guiding is a seasonal occupation, usually confined to the summer months. When the summer months are over, such people can draw unemployment insurance. Nobody wants to deprive them of something which is their right, something which they have paid for. However, our whole unemployment insurance picture has become distorted—so much so, that there is a grave danger that the backlash may result in curtailment of what basically is good legislation. Again we come back to the fact that the weaknesses are mainly in the quality of administration.

As to the measures proposed for housing and urban development, I wish to re-emphasize what I said earlier, namely, that assistance for low-cost housing for senior citizens should be the number one priority. It should be conceived on a much larger scale than anything we have done so far, because the building of houses provides more employment than almost any other industrial occupation. It provides employment in a wide cross section of the community because of the varied needs which go into the provision of housing. Secondly, there should be assistance toward home ownership for those on low or moderate incomes. Again, investment in this kind of development is one which would pay dividends far above any amounts that are paid into it.

There are other measures relating to home building. The first is the assistance in rehabilitation of older neighbourhoods, and, secondly, assistance in the relocation of railway tracks and other facilities. These are important measures, if implemented, and it seems to me that we should be providing substantial sums of money to carry out a sustained program over a period of years for the purposes indicated. There was a time when the cure for older neighbourhoods was to bring in the bulldozers, and bulldoze them out of existence. This entirely ignored human values and the human attachments to neighbourhoods, and it also ignored the fact that it may be much cheaper to rehabilitate and improve the housing and amenities in some of these neighbourhoods than to bulldoze them out of existence and replace them with high-rise apartments.

Related to this is the whole program of land assembly for new communities as a means of controlling the urban sprawl. Here again is an opportunity where the federal, provincial and municipal governments could combine and invest wisely in the acquisition of land to prevent land speculators from escalating the cost of land out of all relationship to its value, and make it one of the prohibitive elements in the cost of providing housing.

The Throne Speech indicated that the expenditures under the physical fitness program would be doubled over the next three years. I consider this a good idea, but in this connection I wish to issue a caveat. It is that not one dollar of the funds for the physical fitness program must be used for assisting the 1976 Olympics in Montreal. I want to go on record at this time as saying that I will oppose in every way I can the expenditure of between $500 million and $600 million for a program which, by no rhyme or reason, can be justified in Canada. The federal government, after getting its fingers burned over the costs involved in Expo, should think twice about falling into another of Mayor Drapeau's grandiloquent traps which would be developed at the expense of Canadian taxpayers as a whole. I want to quote an article by one of Canada's most respected sportwriters, Jim Coleman, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Friday, January 5:

> In the last 48 hours even the most naive newspaper readers must be beginning to realize that Mayor Jean Drapeau and the members of his Olympic Games organizing committee in Montreal are bull-shooters par excellence.
> Those same newspaper readers finally must be ready to acknowledge that the 1976 Summer Olympic Games in Montreal loom as a promotional rip-off. With jaunty Jean and his Merry Men at the controls, the 1976 Summer Olympics may prove to be the biggest sports financial disaster in the history of North America.
> And the sick joke of it is the taxpayers of Canada ultimately are going to be stuck with the bills which may total $500 million.

I do not know what his authority for that figure is, but it is repeated time and time again.

> No columnist desires to bore his readers by writing repetitiously on one theme. However, the 1976 Summer Olympics rip-off has such important implications for every Canadian taxpayer that a sports columnist would be shirking his obligations if he ignored the subject.
> Because the subject is politically explosive, all members of Canada's Parliament carefully are shoving Olympics '76 under one corner of the rug.
> Mayor Drapeau and his Merry Men exposed themselves as bull-shooters—

And this is Mr. Coleman's term, not mine.

> —when they staged their big press conference on Wednesday to explain their $25 million television sell-out to the American Broadcasting Company.
> For the last two weeks, Drapeau's spokesmen have been permitting the Canadian public to absorb the erroneous impression that Montreal's Olympic Committee will get the entire ABC fee of $25 million.
> "Ah, ha!" they said in effect. "See how clever we are. We still have almost four years to get ready for the 1976 Olympics, but already we've collected $25 million."
> Within 24 hours after the Montreal press conference, the members of Drapeau's committee had been backed into a corner. Gerry Snyder, who spends a lot of time tidying up after Mr. Drapeau, acknowledged that Canada's Olympic organizing committee will receive only $7 million of that $25 million.
> Almost simultaneously, a CBC official was predicting that the CBC would be forced to spend $40 million for new equipment to televise the 1976 Summer Olympic Games.
> The taxpayers of Canada pay the cost of operating the CBC.
> So that $25 million television deal with ABC proves to be a pig in a poke. The taxpayers of Canada will be socked for $40 million in equipment purchases, the taxpayers will receive $7 million from ABC, so the taxpayers will suffer a net loss of $33 million.
> Some deal, Mr. Drapeau. The taxpayers of Canada scarcely can wait for your next little surprise.
> Mayor Drapeau and his Merry Men are bull-shooters when they attempt to persuade their fellow Canadians that the staging of the 1976 Summer Olympic Games will bring riches and/or glory to Canada. Already, the West Germans are beginning to have second thoughts about the effects of the last summer's Olympic Games in Munich.

And there are others. Mr. Don Goodwin, head of CBC Sports, in answer to this said that they are not proposing to spend $40 million. He said that the CBC had a lot of equipment and by 1976 would have a lot more. He went on to say this:

> If we could see, for instance, that it was going to cost the CBC $10 million or $15 million over and above the revenue, we would then inform the organizing committee and it could foot the bill; or if it didn't, then perhaps the federal government.

And so you get this story all through the sports columns. I feel this whole situation ought to be looked at more carefully. I say this with regret, because Montreal is a city for which I have the greatest affection. It is a city that adds a distinction to Canada, and it has a quality that I should like more citizens of Canada to see and understand.

Another suggestion which I warmly welcome and will support—and I hope it will be translated into effective legislation—is that new regionally based financial institutions, better able to serve the financing needs of business enterprise and industrial development, be established in Western Canada. This is something that is long overdue. We frequently hear that there is a need for monetary reform, reform of the legislation with respect to banking and credit and, of course, it is a well-known fact that a lot of the monetary reformers have come from Western Canada.

In saying that we need new regionally based financial institutions, it is not to reflect on the soundness of our present banking system. We have a banking system that has a fine record. However, it also has a very conservative track record. In the history of banking experience in Canada, the banks have never moved into a field of need until they were forced to do so.

The banks became exercised a few years ago about the rapid growth of the near banks—the credit unions and the trust companies—which were providing a modified form of banking services and cutting into the profits of the banks. The banks have no reason to complain about their profits over the last few years. As a matter of fact, they have been doing very well. However, the virtue of a regionally-based financial institution, in my judgment at least, lies in the fact that Canadians have not begun to mobilize the financial resources of this country to the extent possible. There is much more money in bank saving deposits than people are aware. If we had regional institutions designed to mobilize these resources of savings—institutions administered by people who know the region and who have the confidence and respect of their fellow citizens—we would have a much more viable and much more locally involved system of meeting the financial needs in the community than we have at the present time.

Honourable senators will recall some years ago applications for charters came before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce from the Bank of Western Canada, the Laurentide Bank, and the Bank of British Columbia. At that time there was tremendous opposition from many of my colleagues to the establishment of these institutions. The Bank of Western Canada did not succeed because the people who were behind it were not motivated to serve the community concerned, but rather they saw in it an opportunity to make huge profits for themselves. As a result, the proposal did not gain the confidence of the people which was necessary to make it a viable institution.

The Bank of British Columbia had a hard time getting started, but it is now well established. It is expanding year by year, and is meeting some of the needs of the province of British Columbia in a most satisfactory way, and returning a substantial profit to the shareholders. I should mention that the Laurentide application was approved, but later withdrawn.

This piece of legislation is long overdue. I have suggested on more than one occasion to the provincial government of Alberta that they should lose no time in applying for a charter for the Bank of Alberta. They already have in existence the nucleus of an excellent banking system through the Treasury Branches. If a Bank of Alberta were established, the Treasury Branches could become branches of it. The experience and knowledge of the communities where the Treasury Branches have functioned satisfactorily for many years would be at the service of the Bank of Alberta making it an immediately viable and successful institution. I should like to commend the government most sincerely on this long overdue provision for a new financial facility.

It is with some trepidation that I venture to discuss the Official Languages Act and bilingualism in the Public Service. It has become a very emotional topic and, apparently, if we can judge by the fevered comments of the Honourable Jean Marchand in the other place on Friday last, the emotionalism has not been settled by the election of October 30. I preface what I am going to say on this emotional and controversial subject by the statement that I am speaking first as a Canadian, a Canadian who has invested a good many years of his life and a good many thousands of dollars, starting as far back as 1939, in developing a program of bilingualism for teachers in the schools of Western Canada. I want to say at this time that any person who suggests that Western Canada is anti-French, or is opposed to bilingualism in the Public Service, does not know what he is talking about, and is equally as culpable—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: —of causing dissension as those, in both Eastern and Western Canada, who are anti-French, anti-English, or anti-bilingualism. The people of Western Canada are not anti-French; they are not anti-bilingualism. What the people of Western Canada have resented—and I think they have had a right to resent it—was the insensitive, clumsy, and incompetent way in which the program of bilingualism in the Public Service was rammed down the people's throats, and the manner in which the objectives of the Official Languages Act were being arbitrarily administered. Again I come back to the element I was talking about in the beginning of this speech when I said there was a tremendous need for an upgrading in the managerial skills of the people in the Public Service.

It has become commonplace to say that the reason the Trudeau government had only seven members out of 68 elected in the four Western provinces was because of an anti-French backlash. I resent this, because it is not true. I will go further and say that the Prime Minister, the Honourable Mr. Marchand, and the Honourable Mr. Pelletier are not doing a service to the furthering of understanding between French and English Canada when they continue to harp on this particular subject. The people of Western Canada have accepted the objectives of the Official Languages Act. The people of Western Canada would be happy to see an explosion in the capacity of anglophones to speak in either language. And, I think, they would be happy too if they found that more people in French Canada, particularly those in the back concessions, displayed a capacity to speak English.

I have often envied the facility with which people from the urban centres of French Canada move from English to French, and vice versa. I have envied the smoothness with which the Prime Minister, Mr. Pelletier, and many others are able to converse fluently and easily in both languages. This is an objective which I am sure every Canadian would like to achieve, but I want to say, as an educator with a long history of experience in dealing with languages, that the method followed was one that was bound to cause irritation, was bound to cause resentment, and was bound to cause a backlash.

An announcement was made not very many weeks ago that the cost of training people in the Public Service to be bilingual was $27,000 per man. I do not know whether this figure is accurate. Whether it is $25,000 or $30,000 is not so important, except it seems to me there is a great waste of money. I believe we spent $54 million on this program last year. I am going to suggest that, while it will be necessary to provide a certain amount of training in the French language and the English language for public servants, we are trying to get results in too much of a hurry; that we would get much more effective results if we took that same amount of money and spent it to subsidize the training of 2,000 or more thoroughly qualified French language teachers and spread them throughout the schools in Canada, from the kindergarten up, so that in every school in this country all the pupils would be required to learn the two languages. They would grow up accepting a knowledge of the two languages as a perfectly normal program, and they would be like their European counterparts, who grow up with a knowledge of not only two languages, but sometimes two, three, and four. It is this long-range program that will pay far better dividends than anything we are trying to do at the present time.

The present program, largely through faulty administration under the Public Service Commission, and through an understandable but unrealistic appreciation of the facts of the situation, has resulted in the creation of uncertainties, antagonisms, and misunderstandings which will take years to overcome.

Let me give you an illustration of what happens in some of our institutions. About two months ago I spent some time at a crown corporation within twenty miles of Ottawa looking through the facilities, under the direction of the manager. This institution does business of about $11 million a year, and employs some 900 people. In going through this very modern plant, dealing with new technology, the manager apologized. He said, "We are a bit confused today because seven of my senior department heads are away on an immersion course in French." This did not surprise me so much, but I asked, as a matter of interest, how old were these men. He said, "From 45 to 55"! Well, anybody who has had anything to do with education knows that a lot of the effort put into teaching French to people at that age is wasted effort. There is a fraction of our population who have an ear for languages, who have a facility to pick up languages, but that fraction is not large. As far as most of these older people are concerned it is not only a disruption of their service, but it is a relatively unproductive investment.

I would certainly agree that if we are to embark on a national program of language teaching designed to make this country a truly bilingual country we will have to think in a time frame of at least 15 to 20 years. But by putting thoroughly qualified teachers of French in English schools, and thoroughly qualified teachers of English in French schools, and making it necessary for all of our students to take the two languages, we would ultimately develop a constituency in which the people coming through that program accept bilingualism as a natural way of life in this country. Then we would have true bilingualism; we would have true national unity in the sense that people can understand each other.

Certain leaders in French Canada have been suggesting that there was an English backlash against French Canada and that this was evidenced by the election. They are confusing two things. They are confusing an acceptance by the Canadian people of the desirability of speaking the two languages on the one hand, and bilingualism in the Public Service as a desirable objective on the other, with a reaction against the way the administration tried to implement this program. In other words, the backlash was against the misconceived administration of the program, and not against either French Canada or bilingualism.

During the election campaign there was what I have called the "silent backlash," not against French Canada, not against bilingualism, but against the way the program was being pushed. I venture to suggest that if the leaders of French Canada—and this goes for the Prime Minister down—were to understand the reaction in English Canada, they would stop talking about the English backlash. The continued reiteration that there is a backlash in English Canada against French Canada is irritating people needlessly, and having a negative effect on the program they and the rest of us are so anxious to see implemented.

Related to this question of national unity and bilingualism is a reference to measures to encourage tourism. I feel the two areas should be related, and I am going to suggest here that one of the most effective things that could be done in the interest of national unity would be to provide a greatly extended program under which Canadians from different parts of Canada could, at the lowest possible cost, be encouraged to visit other parts of Canada. For example, people from the Maritimes who have never seen the West should be encouraged to go right through to the Pacific coast. People from Quebec would find a very warm welcome anywhere in Western Canada. Time and again I have talked to French Canadian groups on their way through Western Canada, and it has been rather disconcerting to have them express surprise at the warmth of the welcome they received. The people of French Canada will be warmly welcomed in Western Canada at any time, and Western Canadians would like to see more of them. Again, while many more Western Canadians visit Quebec than is the case with Quebecers visiting Western Canada, nevertheless, there are Western Canadians who should get into the back concessions of Quebec too and meet the real French Canadians.

In other words, we must make provision for our people to get to know each other better, to understand our problems better, and be able to communicate better. Pushing the bilingual program in the Public Service does relatively little to develop that kind of a program, but it can be facilitated greatly if what I have suggested is incorporated as part of a national program in the Canadian schools and Canadian tourism.

It had been my hope to deal with a very important element in this Throne Speech, but time will not permit my discussing it at this time. However, I propose to get at it in another way and in another debate. I refer to the economics of transportation in Canada.

I have only touched the highlights of some of the measures proposed in the Speech from the Throne—measures which I am sure, if carried through by appropriate legislation, will provide for the people of Canada many of the things they wanted to hear in the election campaign of 1972. If as a result of that election campaign, and as a result of minority government, the people of Canada get these economic and social programs, which have so much meaning to them at the grassroots, the election will have been more than justified, even if it failed to meet the wishes of some of our politicians.

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, the year 1972, a year of many important political events, ended for us on a note of sadness and uncertainty. But the first days of 1973 brought to us, and also to the people of Canada, a first-class stimulant—that stimulant was the Speech from the Throne which in a few hours had the effect of creating a resurgence of confidence and optimism from coast to coast in a country which has been painfully divided since October 30.

Before launching into a short analysis of that document, which meets the major expectations of Canadians, and adding a few considerations on certain matters of particular interest to me, I should like to render tribute to our leader. Besides having been maintained in his office of high responsibility by the Prime Minister, Senator Martin most worthily represented his country and the Canadian Senate abroad during the past months, particularly at the United Nations Conference Trade and Development in Santiago, at the Inter-American Development Bank Conference in Quito, on the occasions of ceremonies celebrating the National Day of Gabon, the inauguration of the Highway of Canadian Unity and Friendship in Niger, as the official guest of President Diori, and, within recent days, the commemorative service in tribute to President Truman in Washington and the ceremony honouring the memory of our former esteemed Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester Pearson, in Boston.

[English]

I would like also to express the very special joy and pride felt by the female members of this house when they learned of the appointment of the Honourable Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson as Speaker of the Senate. This is indeed a well-deserved honour, and we wish to convey to you, Madam Speaker, the assurance of our respectful admiration and of our full co-operation.

To our former Speaker, Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets, we will simply say how much we appreciated his work and how glad we are to see him take his seat with us. To Senator Gil Molgat we wish good luck in his new office and we welcome our new and distinguished colleagues.

The Speech from the Throne which was expected with exceptional curiosity was an agreeable surprise to the whole population. The concrete, flexible and realistic nature of this document, stripped of useless rhetoric, the new orientation it sets forth, its general tone which is markedly less Olympian and more promising than before have raised favourable comments throughout the country.

Showing a more obvious willingness to fight unemployment and to create work incentives, to co-operate with the provinces, and to decentralize programs, the Speech from the Throne announced at least half a dozen joint studies and federal-provincial conferences. Among those conferences the meeting which would enable the government to study with the Prairie provinces western economic development and the establishment of financial institutions and industrial activities that would better fit their needs calls for special attention. If such an initiative could eliminate the alienation felt rightly or wrongly by those provinces, the rest of the country which deplores the psychological and political gap west of Ontario would be most happy.

Even though the achievement of the objectives of the Official Languages Act does not have top priority in the Speech from the Throne, I feel that it is my duty to deal with it because the government intends to continue striving towards it and because, as two great Toronto dailies wrote following the elections, the purpose of the program is always valid as a just and necessary value for the unity of Canada, in view of the fact that French Canadians are still seriously under-represented in the upper echelons of the federal Public Service.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The honourable senator will excuse me for interrupting but we do not hear her very clearly on this side of the Senate. It may be that the document she is holding in her hand covers the microphone; she could perhaps speak up a little.

Hon. Miss Lapointe: Don't I speak loud enough?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Strange, but we hear quite well on this side.

Hon. Miss Lapointe: We know that in our democratic system, power is only loaned to the political man. However, the conditions of the loan are not set arbitrarily and the ministers themselves must interpret the global mandate entrusted to them. They must make the choices and set the priorities. They also must take political steps which, in some regards, are more or less popular, but which are nonetheless dictated by their concern for the good of all.

The assertion and respect of the linguistic and cultural diversity of a people is one of those steps. This stand is liable to meet with some opposition in view of the conservatism and xenophobia that is rampant in any community. As the Honourable Gérard Pelletier stated last September at the Canada-UNESCO Forum in Ottawa, multiculturalism cannot be said to be a popular value, except among the minorities it protects, or in the rather exceptional case where the various groups are in pratically equal numeric proportions.

It is of course possible to increase the popularity of such a policy through an appeal to other known values such as understanding, tolerance, respect for others, broadness of mind, and so forth. But there will always be people who will fear the loss of prestige and exclusiveness that may result for the majority culture which they represent.

During its first term, the government displayed much courage on the issue of bilingualism in the public service, for it was perfectly aware that it was exposing itself to serious danger. It is easy to claim that if the Official Languages Act had been explained better, and if it had been administered with more judgment and consideration, it would not have met with any serious opposition. Given such a far-reaching reform that bore on the very sensitive issue of the majority's vested interests, a reaction was inevitable, regardless of the methods used. Is it possible in just a few years to do away with habits that were established and confirmed for a century without giving rise to hostility and lasting bitterness? A change of mentality must first take place and legislation cannot do it. It takes time and a lot of goodwill to achieve it. Has the program really been pushed too fast? Have older civil servants been discriminated against? Without the mistakes made along the way and without the squabbles which have over-heated feelings the reaction might have been more restrained.

For example, what has not often been said is that French-speaking civil servants have also had to put up with and are still putting up quietly with many inconveniences and frustrations, several of which come from the application of the legislation. For example, when their colleagues are off work for several weeks every year to learn French, who has to do the extra work? Most of the time French-speaking people who did not wait till there was a law to become bilingual but who taught themselves the language the hard way.

In providing new explanations and greater assurances to civil servants, the government took pains to explain that it was not retreating.

However, it is clear that the time limit, which has been pushed back to 1978 from 1975, for the full realization of this policy outlined in 1966 and officially initiated in 1969 represents a real slow-down that the Quebec electorate did not accept easily. In fact, the nine principles defined by the President of the Treasury Board contained many concessions which will naturally benefit English-speaking people and reassure them completely; the statement made by Mr. Claude Edwards, president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada proves it; he said that the development of this new policy meets almost all the requests of this union.

Among those policies, we strongly doubt that ordinary language training over a period of twelve months only is sufficient, in 80 per cent of the cases, to allow a unilingual person to hold satisfactorily a position that has been classified as bilingual. Presently, it is reported that there are a good many of these allegedly bilingual people whose incompetence and conceit, upon their return, only exasperate their truly bilingual colleagues. However, we are willing to trust the Public Service Commission by saying once again the old axiom: patience and time will achieve more than force and rage.

What would indeed be the purpose of drastic measures if they only succeed in throwing ethnic groups at each other's throat, thus altering the major objective which is to make Canada an harmonious and balanced country? Patience however has its limits, and any additional dilatory measure or any softening of the Treasury Board's requirements could well give rise to dissatisfaction and especially to deep disappointment in the French-speaking population.

It is said in the Speech from the Throne that > Further assistance will be offered to the provinces to help ensure that to the extent possible:—Canadian students can learn, as a second language, the other official language—

Many citizens have complained that the provinces are using for other purposes the sums they receive to promote the teaching of the second language. This is a dishonest and shameful tactic which will greatly prejudice national unity. Provincial governments must cease doing so and the federal government must find a way to control more closely the spending of the sums thus granted.

As long as the second language is not better taught to young people in schools—Senator Cameron has just referred to that—we shall unfortunately have to keep on turning into instant bilingual people the unilingual adults who join the Public Service and complain, most of them, of not having properly learned a second language while they were young. Language courses on the spot are presently required, but this is certainly not the most rational or efficient way of becoming bilingual, and it is indeed the most costly.

And now, to a new subject. In the field of social policy, it does seem as if the government has become more flexible and recognizes more readily the need for a review and reorganization of the Canadian social security system as a whole, in order to better fulfill the needs of the various areas.

The first of five principles underlying this reorganization contains the heretofore feared expression "guaranteed annual income." It must have thrilled our distinguished colleague Senator Croll, even though it still only applies to a restricted number of Canadians, the old, the blind and the disabled. Still, this is a very important step toward the achievement of an ideal which, however, can only be reached progressively.

The fourth of these five principles must also be noted. It states:

> Fourth, it must be recognized that Provinces may wish to have the structures of social security vary in accordance with the social needs, income standards and the cost of living in different communities.

Combined with the announcement of a conference for provincial ministers of welfare in April, that position statement quite clearly means that consideration will be given not only to such unqualified views as those of Mr. Castonguay but also to individual feelings. The results of a Gallup poll show indeed that most Canadian voters feel that provincial responsibilities in taxation and social security should be increased. And the highest percentage of those who advocate decentralization is not found in Quebec, as it could be supposed, but in British Columbia—56 per cent in favour, 25 against and 19 undecided.

We are extremely pleased that the new Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Marc Lalonde, is prepared to assume the responsibility of moving on with this important revision and that he has already had discussions with the provincial leader of the reform movement, Mr. Castonguay, who was apparently satisfied with them. Not only does Mr. Lalonde seem most able to put order in the tangled situation of the various social security measures that need to be unified and rationalized, but he seems most prepared to show great flexibility vis-à-vis the provinces and their different ways of looking at the problems. All things considered this could bring about a major breakthrough in a field where frictions have been quite animated in recent years.

Mr. Lalonde has already taken over his department with the expert skill inherent in his profound knowledge of federal-provincial jurisdictions and relations. His will to protect the interests of the average citizen is also part of his concerns and we would like to congratulate him on the position he took recently regarding patent drugs. The Quebec College of Pharmacists actually accused Ottawa of being indirectly responsible for thousands of poisonings by letting go unrestrained the unbridled distribution of patent drugs as well as exaggerated advertising and demanded that their distribution be entrusted to competent people. In reply to those criticisms Mr. Lalonde stated:

> We fully recognize the right of the public to choose its own drugs for mild illnesses. If patent drugs are limited to drugstores only and sold on prescription a box of headache tablets which costs 29 cents at the grocery store could well go up to about $8.29 after the intervention of the doctor and the pharmacist, and this could not in any way stop some individuals from taking excessive and dangerous overdoses. However, we want the products used to that end to be entirely safe.

And that is when he announced the first steps towards the reform of regulations on the manufacturing, advertising and control of such drugs, stating however that their distribution came under provincial jurisdiction.

The Speech from the Throne also announces a free vote on the question of capital punishment. In the Third Commission of the United Nations General Assembly, which deals mainly with human rights and on which I was sitting as late as 1972, capital punishment has been on the agenda for several years. Periodically the Commission measures the progress made in the various countries towards the abolition of this penalty, or at least towards the limitation of the categories of crimes punishable by death, since the Moslam countries, on the basis of the Koran, cannot accept the complete abolition of capital punishment.

Therefore, in the 1968 Report of the United Nations, reviewing new developments from 1961 to 1965, a chapter is devoted to some kind of alternative sanction, because to find a worthwhile substitute is not as simple as one could imagine. In most cases, it is life imprisonment; in some countries, it is hard labour for life, although the expression is misleading and no longer means such hard work as in the past.

Another possibility is the indeterminate sentence, which obliges the offender to take his future in his own hands, since the date of his release depends on his behaviour and on the progress he achieves. But, among others, the Canadian Committee on Corrections is opposed to indeterminate sentences, as well as the Canadian public, and the United Nations which have also studied this problem do not seem interested in this solution either.

In 1968, at the meeting in Geneva of the United Nations Committee of Experts on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders—another question under the responsibility of the Third Commission—the delegates expressed the opinion that inmates whose death sentence has been commuted should be placed on the same footing as other prisoners serving lengthy sentences, i.e., be able to work and at some point be placed in a medium or minimum security institution. In Japan, for example, they are given productive work to do to restore their mental stability and possibly ease their return to society. More and more the degrading effects of long-term imprisonment are recognized and steps taken to minimize those effects.

The non-abolitionists are scared. They fear that a one-time killer is always dangerous. I think that at least in the past year a campaign should have been launched throughout the country to let those people know that many of their fears are groundless. Studies have proven that the imprisoned killers have similar and often lesser rates of criminal assaults than their fellow inmates.

On the other hand, abolitionists are inclined to claim that the life of murderers should be spared but that they should never be set free. Such reasoning is not based on facts either. Rates of recidivism in the case of paroled murderers clearly show that they have the best record of all paroled prisoners.

I agree with the conclusion of the document on capital punishment published under the authority of the Solicitor General and including new Canadian material for 1965-1972.

To those who believe that research and the gathering of objective material would not shake preconceptions and would not permit the debate to make some headway, one can answer that some people are still undecided and that bringing forward concrete and objective facts could help them make up their mind. I share that view, whereas before 1965 I was rather in favour of the death penalty. Since then, in the light of much reading and many testimonies, my opinion has gradually changed. It is therefore true that while debates on the subject are tinged with emotionalism, presentation of facts and figures collected practicaly everywhere in the world can exorcise this emotionalism and bring more realism into the debate.

However, if, as everything seems to indicate, the trial period is renewed for a further period of five years, it will be extremely important, to meet the quite legitimate demand for security on the part of those who are against abolition, to bring forward other measures also mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, aiming at a reform of the penitentiary system and the probation system by way of greater emphasis on the rehabilitation of inmates and—hardly to be underestimated—better protection of the public.

In conclusion, and at a time when the leaders of the four federal parties have just renewed their profession of faith in national unity, I should like to invite you, honourable senators, to ponder on this somewhat paradoxical opinion expressed by parliamentary reporter Anthony Westell. According to him, survival of Canada might call for less, instead of more unity. The results of the election show, he says, that there might well be no real community of interests between the various regions of Canada, and the right attitude to ensure survival of the country might be a more flexible federalism which recognizes the importance of regional priorities and the limits of national unity. In other words, if I have understood his view well, maintaining the physical unity of the country might require less administrative unity.

Another political analyst, from Quebec this time, Dominique Clift, speaks in turn of a rising regional sentiment throughout Canada. Canadian electors, he says, are not prepared to fit themselves into a national mould which would only sharpen their feeling of frustration; they would rather identify themselves with regional and provincial administrative structures which are closer to them and to their needs. That approach, often advocated for Quebecers only, now seems suitable to all or let us say to the majority of Canadians. And the government did not fail to measure the extent of the phenomenon.

Although it would seem that 1972 was the most productive in Canadian history in terms of federal-provincial relations, with approximately 30 meetings at the ministerial or deputy-ministerial level, and no fewer than 300 committees or sub-committees to improve the consultation process, the causes of friction are still many. The decision of the government to put even more lubricant in the federal-provincial machinery is wise both psychologically and politically; in addition to meeting the wishes of the public, it will win greater sympathy from the leaders of the various provincial governments. To those leaders, we would ask only this: that they be honest enough to recognize publicly the enormous contribution of the federal government to their various programs.

The experience in conciliation already launched by Ottawa deserves therefore to be perfected. We are convinced that it will help defuse many criticisms against the government and take away from the most bitter opponents of the federal system their best charger.

I thank you.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I, first of all, concur in the sincere congratulations that have been extended to Her Honour the Speaker, and to those who have recently been called to this house. I congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion we are discussing, the Leader of the Government and Leader of the Opposition, and all who have contributed to this debate.

The founding fathers of this country, when they established this Upper House as part of our parliamentary structure, envisaged that it would provide the necessary element of stability to our parliamentary institutions. The fact that this house is referred to as the chamber of serious second thought implies that element of stability so needed in the legislative processes of a country. There has seldom, if ever, been a time in Canadian history when there was greater need for stability than now.

The situation that prevails in the Parliament of Canada today gives cause for very serious concern. The management of the national affairs of this nation is presently in the hands of a minority government that enjoys the confidence of less than 40 per cent of the electors. I do not share the optimism which some express that a minority government can provide either the efficiency or the stability that is needed in this country, particularly at the present time. Very frequently references are made to the fact that in Europe, and especially in the mother of Parliaments in Great Britain, minority governments have been very successful. I submit that there is a difference we should recognize between, for example, the Parliament of Great Britain and the Parliament of this country. Long centuries of parliamentary experience in Great Britain seem to have produced a degree of parliamentary discipline, and discipline on the part of individual members of Parliament, that we have not yet acquired in Canada.

For example, in the British House of Commons when serious international issues of great importance are being debated there seems to be ready agreement on setting aside a relatively short period of time during which the issue will be discussed, and when it is put to a vote the judgment of the majority seems to be readily accepted. We can hardly say that this is the situation in Canada.

In our House of Commons it seems almost impossible to obtain agreement on limited periods of debate without parties or individuals implying closure or taking violent exception to the decision of government to proceed in a certain way. Until we reach the point of parliamentary maturity where we will impose sufficient self-discipline to overcome these obstacles, in my judgment, minority governments cannot function satisfactorily.

Not only do we presently have a minority government, but a minority government which lacks true national representation in the other place. Over 50 per cent of the minority government's representation is from the province of Quebec. In all of Canada west of Ontario there are only eight representatives on the government side of the House of Commons. It is also worth noting that both of our major parties in Canada are in a similar position. The Conservative Party, with a reasonably strong representation from the Maritimes and Western Canada, has only two members from the province of Quebec. In the case of the government, it has seven members west of Ontario, and not a single representative from the province of Alberta. One shudders to think how the government under these circumstances could act effectively should it be confronted with a serious national crisis, particularly if it should be an issue on which there was a confrontation between one region of Canada and another.

The current situation is made even more serious by the fact that the New Democratic Party, representing less than 18 per cent of the electors of Canada, is in a position to dictate whether or not Parliament will continue, and on what terms. Surely this lends itself to the worst kind of political blackmail possible under our system.

Under these circumstances, many Canadians, and I confess I was one of them, had hoped that there might be some unusual act of statesmanship on the part of both of the major parties to resolve the parliamentary impasse that we face in this country today. Surely it should be possible for the major parties to recognize that there are certain urgent issues facing Canada that are in no sense party issues because they transcend political party boundaries in every respect.

These are issues such as unemployment, inflation, certain reforms in our social security programs, national unity, resources utilization and conservation, and concern with the ecology of Canada. These are not the property of the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party, or any other party; they are the concerns of all Canadian citizens.

It had been my hope that our two major parties, representing jointly over 73 per cent of the electorate, might have bridged this serious period in Canadian history, not by coalition, which in my view is fundamentally unsound, but by putting together an interim union cabinet to carry out specific programs in at least some of these broad areas of the national concern, during the interval of time after which it would be appropriate to go back to the electorate for a new mandate. There have been union governments in other countries, and even in this country there was a form of union government in the days of the First World War. An interim union cabinet would not preclude a party from retaining its party identity in Parliament; I think it should retain that identity. It would not require that they abandon their party positions, which they should retain in order to submit them to the Canadian people when they go back for another mandate. Within the framework of certain major national concerns, however, it would surely be possible for an interim union cabinet to bring to bear the best judgment of the parties representing, as I have said, over 73 per cent of the Canadian people, and provide the country with the measure of stability in government so desperately needed at the present time.

To me this made such good sense that I took the liberty of conveying this idea by correspondence to both the Prime Minister of Canada and the Leader of the Official Opposition in the House of Commons. Regretfully, in each case there was an unwillingness to concede that the country's interests could be served by any arrangement other than their particular party controlling the reins of government. I am still firmly of the conviction that the formation of an interim union cabinet would have been the statesmanlike way to resolve the present impasse in the best interests of this country as a whole.

Since the present government decided against this course I do not fault it for exercising its constitutional right to remain in office and submit its fate to Parliament. I can appreciate the frustration of the Honourable Mr. Stanfield. Perhaps more than any other man in Canada he must appreciate how Moses felt when, after having led his people in the wilderness for years, he was permitted to go up on the heights of Mount Nebo and catch a glimpse of the promised land, only to be told that he could not enter therein. Moses was refused admittance by reason of certain sins he had committed while leading his people in the wilderness. I am content to leave to history whether this will be true in Mr. Stanfield's case.

Having decided to submit its fate to Parliament, the government produced the Speech from the Throne that we are debating in this house today. A stranger to Canadian political life reading the Speech could come to several interesting conclusions. One very logical conclusion would be that the Liberal Party had only now become the Government of Canada. In the Speech from the Throne we find a whole catalogue of desirable things which the government now proposes to do, and this is typical of the Throne Speech of a new government that for the first time has been accorded an opportunity to implement a program that it has long advocated and which the electorate has finally endorsed.

In this case, of course, the circumstances are very different. The Liberal Party has been in office for years; the present government under its present leadership for a full term of four years. The natural question that comes to the minds of Canadians is why were these proposals not implemented when the government had an overwhelming majority in Parliament that enabled it to pass any legislation it felt was needful in the interests of the Canadian people.

The program outlined in the Throne Speech is not the program on which the present government appealed for a renewed mandate. During the election campaign the government's position was that the course that it had pursued in the last four years was a good course, it was the best course for Canada, the country should be very appreciative of what it had done, and the land was strong because of its efforts. The proposals of Opposition parties in the House of Commons, many of which are now embodied in the Throne Speech, were ridiculed and rejected out of hand by the government when it was in a majority position.

The second conclusion a stranger reading the Throne Speech might come to is that October, 1972 was for the Liberal Party a month of discovery. For example, I read paragraphs such as this:

> In the area of social policy, the Government considers that Canada's total social security system—including both federal and provincial elements—must be reconsidered and reorganized, and made more sensitive to the needs of people in different parts of the country.

That, honourable senators, is what the Canadian people and Opposition parties in Parliament have been saying for years.

I read further:

> —it must be recognized that Provinces may wish to have the structures of social security vary in accordance with the social needs, income standards and the cost of living in different communities.

The provincial governments of this country have been saying that as far back as I can remember.

The Speech continues:

> —it must be accepted that the reconsideration of Canada's social security system must be conducted jointly by the Federal Government and the Provinces. A better social security system can only be realized if a reasonable consensus can be reached between the governments of Canada and the Provinces. To this end, the Government will invite provincial representatives to a conference of welfare ministers in April.

• (1600)

Here is another:

> The growing complexity of our society calls for increasing co-ordination of federal and provincial government programs. The Prime Minister will propose a meeting in the spring with the provincial First Ministers to plan further steps in the harmonization of goals, policies and programs for the benefit of all Canadians, particularly in fields that bear on the responsibilities of both levels of government.

And another:

> The Government recognizes that western Canadians wish to build industrial strength on top of their region's great resource and energy base.

Honourable senators, all of those statements are true. But these are the very things provincial governments in this country have been saying for years; and suddenly, in October 1972, the government discovers that these things after all were true.

This savours rather much of deathbed repentance. I do not believe that cynicism is a virtue, but in this case a feeling of cynicism is justified.

Whether these statements which appear in the Throne Speech are worth the paper they are written on will depend on what the government does in actual fact in the weeks and months ahead.

The Speech also contains a number of reiterations. For example:

> The Government is determined to contain inflation in Canada to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar in the hands of the Canadian people and to protect Canada's position in world trade.

Nobody will disagree with that. It is simply a reiteration of something the government has been saying for the past four and a half years, but we still have the problem of inflation.

The Throne Speech states:

> —the Government remains fully committed to two pre-eminent goals, national unity and equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

Nobody will dispute that. But this is merely reiteration of what we have heard over and over again, without any effective steps being taken to meet the problems.

Honourable senators, a discussion of the Throne Speech should not be mere negative criticism. If we are not satisfied with what the government has done or proposes to do, we should address ourselves to what can and should be done.

One of the major problems is the preservation of Canada as a nation. The question of national unity is emphasized in the Throne Speech. It is one of the great problems which remains unsolved in this country today. I was interested in some comments by the Prime Minister since the election. He said he had discovered that some issues affecting Canadian unity which he thought had been settled, were, in fact, not settled at all. He referred particularly to bilingualism.

Bilingualism is important to the unity of Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec and in some other regions. It is foolish, however, to ignore the fact that in some areas bilingualism is a divisive rather than a unifying factor, and we do not strengthen Canadian unity by pretending that such is not the case. Many Canadians resent the frequent insinuation that anyone who speaks about the adverse effects of bilingualism is anti-French Canadian or anti-Quebec, and is guilty of undermining Canadian unity. But the issue of national unity and the preservation of Confederation goes far beyond such matters as bilingualism and the Official Languages Act. It involves the aspirations and concerns and grievances of all the various natural regions of Canada.

I therefore suggest to honourable senators a course of action which is long overdue and which necessitates participation on the part of both the public and the private sector. Surely we have learned, after more than 100 years of experience, that Canada is regional in structure, and that there are distinct differences in aspirations, hopes and viewpoints between the various regions of this far-flung land.

This fact should not surprise us. It is a national characteristic of a country which stretches over many thousands of miles of territory and has a relatively sparse population. Each region of this country has problems and concerns peculiar to that region. Labrador is one. The Maritime provinces is another. The province of Quebec, both urban and rural—and there is a significant difference between urban and rural—is another. The same is true of the province of Ontario, of the Prairie region, and of British Columbia. There is also the Northwest Territories, to which so much attention is being directed at present. I have enumerated seven regions. In addition, we have to deal with problems and concerns which affect the nation as a whole.

If we are to make meaningful progress in developing national unity in the true sense, we must recognize that the people in each region have their own particular aspirations, concerns, and grievances. It is a waste of time to say the people of one particular region should not feel aggrieved about a particular matter, or that the people in another region should forget a particular aspiration. Such talk is completely unrealistic.

Surely the starting point in establishing national unity is to recognize and pinpoint the aspirations, concerns, and grievances of people in the major regions of the entire country. I would like to see developed what might be called a national unity matrix setting out the aspirations, concerns and grievances of each region of Canada and the nation as a whole. When people in a certain region feel aggrieved it is useless merely to say they are wrong and should forget their grievances.

This is a frequent criticism we hear of the West. We are told the West does not appreciate that there is a language problem in Canada. Well, perhaps we do not fully appreciate it in the sense that it is not a problem in the West. It is not a concern to our people in that sense. However, how do you expect a shopkeeper or farmer in Western Canada to react when he picks up a newspaper and reads an article which refers to a special committee having produced a report to the federal Cabinet which said, in part, that Ottawa spent a total of $54 million during the 1966-71 period on French and English courses for government employees, but 92 per cent of the "students" failed to complete their studies? I think this is the type of thing Senator Cameron was referring to. The article goes on to say:

> The task force report singles out the so-called bicultural immersion program as a very costly exercise for the benefit of a small elite corps of high-ranking officials.

How do you expect a farmer in Western Canada with a net income of $3,000 to feel when he reads that his government is spending $55,000 per person to teach some elite group of senior officials a second language at a time in their lives when they cannot do so.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I trust the honourable senator is aware that this report was completely inaccurate.

Hon. Mr. Manning: I accept the honourable senator's statement. I am simply reading a news dispatch. This is what the people of this country read, and one can understand their reaction.

Coming back to the idea of developing a national unity matrix, my submission is that we should pinpoint the concerns, and aspirations, and grievances of the various regions. The government and the private sector should then develop policies and programs to relieve the irritations, lessen the grievances, and provide greater opportunity for the people at the local level to realize their aspirations. Combined with this there should be an educational program to help people in each region better understand the aspirations and concerns of the other areas.

One of the regrets I have after reading the Speech from the Throne is that there is apparently no intention on the part of the government to make a serious attack on the tremendous bureaucracy that has built up over the last few years. Government bureaucracy is a cause of frustration in every region of Canada. It is fine to talk about providing consulting services for the small businessman and better financial facilites. These things are important. However, my experience has been that one of the greatest frustrations of the small businessman, or for that matter of large corporations as well, is the endless amount of government bureaucracy they have to fight before they can exercise their initative and their enterprise in doing something to help themselves and their country.

I will not delay honourable senators longer. I have brought these matters to the attention of this chamber in the hope that as a body honourable senators will exercise their responsibility in helping to provide some measure of stability to the government of this country at a time when it is desperately needed. Perhaps this chamber could also help the private sector realize its inescapable responsibility to devote its time and resources to finding effective answers to the great problems with which we are confronted today.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, before dealing with the Speech from the Throne, I should like, first of all, to extend to our esteemed colleague, the Honourable Muriel Fergusson, my heartiest congratulations on her elevation to the very important post of Speaker of the Senate, and my very best wishes for a long, happy, and successful tenure of office.

[Hon. Mr. Manning.]

Those of us who have had the opportunity of working with you, Madam Speaker, on Senate committees, and of knowing first hand your devotion to the work of the Senate, and the tremendous efforts you have put forth in the service of Canada and of your fellow Canadians, are delighted to see your talents and your great contribution recognized in this way.

I should also like to extend a hearty welcome to all the new senators, and a very special welcome to my friends and former colleagues—Senators McIlraith, Laing, Côté and Greene—who have come to us from the other place. I should like to say to them how pleased I am to see them continue their long and distinguished parliamentary careers in this chamber. They have already proved themselves as parliamentarians, and it is most fortunate both for the Senate and for the nation that we can continue to have the benefit of their wisdom, experience and advice.

I must also record my very deep sorrow at the recent passing of two very dear friends, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson and the Honourable George Drew. I owe a great debt of gratitude to Lester Pearson which cannot be expressed in words. For seventeen years I served with him in the other place, and for the last eight of those years he was my party leader. It is to him that I owe my seat in this chamber.

When I was first elected in 1949, the Honourable George Drew was Leader of the Opposition. Over the years I got to know him very well, and our friendship grew as we got to know each other better.

I should like to associate myself with the tributes that have already been paid to these two outstanding Canadians both in and outside this chamber. They were both great Canadians, and great men in their own right. Canada and the world are the poorer for their passing.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, as well as all those who have preceded me in this debate, on the excellence of their presentations.

This Throne Speech is unique in that it refers to a large number of specific items but, as Senator Hicks pointed out in his very impressive opening speech, all these numerous items can be summed up under the three headings of national unity, economic policy to fight unemployment and inflation, and social measures to improve existing social security programs.

Actually these three things are interrelated and interdependent because we cannot fight unemployment and inflation successfully without a large measure of national unity; on the other hand we cannot expect to achieve any worthwhile level of national unity without a fair measure of equal opportunity for all, coupled with social programs to ensure a decent standard of living for those who, for reasons of age, health, mental and physical handicaps, lack of skills, training and education, are debarred from the labour market.

Good relationships between English- and French-speaking Canadians are all-important. Instead of repeating or adding to what has already been said on this subject, I should like today to draw attention to some other factors that affect national unity.

National unity is something like motherhood. Everybody is for it, but how many are prepared to do what is necessary to achieve it? This is the vital question. National unity will not come about by wishful thinking or merely by talking about it. A lot more than mere lip service is required. It demands a positive effort on the part of all Canadians, regardless of race, colour or religion. It demands an effort that will involve hard work, sacrifice, a willingness to accept a lot of personal adjustments, and possibly painful decisions on the part of each and every one of us. The question is: Are we prepared to pay the price? The stakes are high. The price is trivial in comparison with the goal of a strong and united Canada. A large part of the price is no more than accepting each other on an equal basis, and respecting each other's aims and aspirations. This means giving up our prejudices, our selfish attitudes, facing facts squarely and honestly, and being swayed by the facts instead of by prejudice and emotion.

We in this chamber have a great responsibility to take the lead and set the standards in this respect. The responsibility of the members of the other place is greater even than ours because, being elected, they are closer to the people, and therefore they have more and better opportunities to give this kind of leadership.

In the situation in which we now find ourselves it is more vital than ever to make Parliament work. It is true that Parliament, as the word implies, is a place for talk, but not endless talk just for the sake of talking; not endless repetition merely to use up time and postpone decisions; not talk for the purpose of covering up defects in legislation or disguising the real motives behind it; not talk aimed at confusing the public by distorting the real issues, raising false issues, or creating suspicion in the public mind; not talk merely for political gain or kudos, or talk aimed at embarrassing the government at the expense of the public interest.

Honourable senators, we have all seen a great deal of that kind of talk in Parliament, on both sides of the house and by all parties. In recent years it seems to be on the increase, and the institution of Parliament has gone down in the public esteem. Parliament is a place for talk, yes, but if we really want national unity we must refrain from the kind of talk I have just mentioned, and substitute talk aimed at getting at the truth; talk that will clarify the issues, enlighten the public and, above all, talk that will lead to decisions that will serve the best interests of the nation as a whole.

In this respect, the responsibility of the press is no less than that of Parliament. As Senator Hicks pointed out last Tuesday, too often the electronic media, particularly the CBC, concentrate on and sensationalize the things that tend to divide us, while at the same time ignoring almost completely the things that unite us. To a large extent the press is guilty of the same thing. Opinion is often represented as fact. Statements by individuals are reported as facts without being checked for their authenticity. Rumours and speculation are repeated and elaborated on until they assume the appearance of truth, and even the straight reporting of facts is often one-sided so that the public, faced with contradictory accounts, does not know who or what to believe. Consequently, instead of enlightenment, the press and electronic media too often create confusion in the public mind. History teaches us that sooner on later confusion leads to chaos and the demand for totalitarian control. Totalitarian control means the end of press freedom.

Members of the press and the electronic media are the first to shout shibboleths like "censorship" and "thought control" when anyone suggests their activities should conform to certain standards in keeping with the principles and values on which our society in founded. Of course, in a country like Canada censorship and thought control by government, or any agency of government, is unthinkable, but I suggest to you, honourable senators, that we may nevertheless be subject to a form of censorship and thought control which may be equally dangerous.

It must be conceded that no paper and no broadcasting station can publish all the facts about everything, or even all the items that might be regarded as news. There must be room for selection, and room also for the exercise of independent judgment in making that selection and arranging the order of priority. But even within that framework there are many cases when the facts relating to one side only of a case are reported and the facts relating to the other side of the case are suppressed. Press reporting of the new Unemployment Insurance Act is a case in point. Therefore, whether he realizes it or not, or whether it is done deliberately or unwittingly, the editor, broadcaster, or whoever is responsible for that situation, is exercising a kind of censorship.

The broadcaster who decides to broadcast some news items and not others of equal importance, the programmer who presents some pertinent facts and not others, is also exercising a form of censorship, especially in areas where that particular station has a monopoly. The TV programmer who illustrates a news item with a particular newsreel, instead of another picture which would give a different slant or interpretation, is exercising both censorship and thought control. The programmer who over a period of months features a preponderance of commentators with one particular viewpoint or a preponderance of shows with a particular bias—for example, separatism, anti-Americanism, or the so-called new morality—is also exercising thought control. The same is true of many advertising programs, particularly those with messages that register on the subconscious mind.

Friends of mine who come here from Europe tell me they are astounded at the vitriolic anti-Americanism that is broadcast in Canada. I have received complaints, verbal and written, from reliable people who say that two CBC programs have heavily biased anti-American content. One is the late afternoon TV program entitled "What's New," and the other an early evening radio program entitled "As it Happens." I am told that everything that is wrong with the United States of America is blown up or slanted by a specially selected biased observer, and there is seldom any effective representation of the other side of the case. The announcer's commentary, by choice of words, slanted question, notes of sarcasm and insinuations, also helps to prejudice the presentation. It gives the impression of an attempt to stir up hatred against the United States, its president and administration.

Honourable senators will remember the program "This Week Has Seven Days," in which a small group of men, who later made their political biases publicly known, managed to use that national program as a vehicle for inoculating Canadians with the virus of their own social and political whims. We must not permit the "This Week Has Seven Days" syndrome to be resurrected. It was the flagrant abuses of this program that led to the new Broadcasting Act, which required that a proper balance be maintained in Canadian programming. We need to build a workable world, not let it be torn apart by the negative antics of a minority group.

The price of all freedom is responsibility. If we are ever to achieve any worthwhile measure of national unity, the press and the electronic media must also accept their share of responsibility. For the sake of national unity, they should come together and work out voluntarily an agreed framework of standards, limitations, and guidelines to achieve it.

We cannot expect to accomplish much in the way of national unity unless we work much harder than we have done in the past to bring about greater harmony between industry and government, and especially between labour and management. Honourable senators will recall that the last act of the old Parliament was to legislate an end to the dockworkers' strike in Vancouver. Our Finance Minister, Mr. Turner, has told us that last year over 5,750,000 man-days were lost due to industrial disputes in the five-month period from April to August. This was more than double the number of man-days lost in the whole of the previous year.

This continuous confrontation between employers and employees, each regarding the other as adversaries, and even as enemies, is really a form of class war. Instead of unity it perpetuates division, and this is a tragedy because the welfare of each depends on the other, and the welfare and prosperity of Canada depend on both. Nobody gains from this kind of conflict and in the end everybody loses.

We must not lose sight of the fact that there are in our midst professional agitators who have no interest at all in the welfare of the workers but who for their own reasons seize on every opportunity to create industrial strife, set employer against employee, and thus keep the pot of turmoil boiling. Very often these individuals attain positions of influence in the labour movement by default. The workers themselves, therefore, have a great responsibility to see that this does not happen, and they can discharge that responsibility by full attendance at meetings, by insisting on democratic procedures, and by electing only responsible persons to positions of leadership.

The public sector has suffered from strikes and threats of strikes by postal workers, air traffic controllers, and others. The provinces have been plagued with strikes by teachers, nurses, hospital attendants, hospital technicians, police, firemen and other groups employed in essential services.

It is well known that gains from strikes are usually minimal. Mr. H. J. Clauson, Vice-President of the Steel Company of Canada Limited, has stated that at an average of $4 an hour, in order to break even over a period of two years, an employee for every week on strike would have to get four cents an hour more than he could have got without a strike.

Public opinion polls and other surveys indicate that the general public has become fed up to the teeth with strikes, and is in a mood to prohibit them altogether. It is imperative, therefore, that a working alternative be found and, as a good employer, it is fitting that the federal government should give leadership in this respect. That the government will have an opportunity to do so is indicated by the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which reads as follows:

> You will be asked to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act.

This legislation, which gives public servants a choice of either accepting binding arbitration or of using the strike weapon, obviously has not been working very well. At the time these acts were passed, a large section of the public held the view that giving civil servants the right to strike was a terrible mistake, and some of us who voted for it did so with some misgivings but hoped optimistically that time would prove them wrong.

However, the thirty years of strike-free experience of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the forty years of good British public service employee relations, is ample evidence that there is an effective and workable alternative to the strike weapon. That alternative is known as voluntary binding arbitration with fair comparability with the better parts of the private sector. The word "voluntary" means that the government and the organization representing the public service employees voluntarily agree to accept binding arbitration.

This alternative has been described by Dr. A. W. R. Carruthers as "an idea whose time has come." Dr. Carruthers, former Dean of Law at Western University and now President of Calgary University, is one of the foremost authorities on employee-employer relations and labour legislation in Canada. He was also a member of the national task force on labour relations.

Good employer-employee relations require mutual trust and confidence between employee organizations and employers. This can only be developed from a genuine concern for employee problems plus machinery to facilitate good communications and effective consultations, whereby grievances can be remedied long before they reach crisis proportions.

Both our legislation and the highly successful British public service system are based on the findings of the Priestley Royal Commission of 1953 in the United Kingdom. The British system, however, is superior to ours in several important respects. For example, their concept of fair comparability is fair to the taxpayer and fair to the employee, and to achieve that they use as a yardstick what is called the "good employer" system. In other words, they use as their yardstick the upper segment of the private sector, whereas the Canadian yardstick is the average employer—the average of the worst and the best of the private sector.

The Canadian government has not responded to a request from their employee associations, made some years ago, for the establishment of an "expert commission" to interpret the meaning of "fair comparability" for negotiators. Our federal government has also been much more reluctant than the British to leave the final decision on pay to a single arbitrator.

Furthermore, the Canadian government adopted a much more restrictive consultation system than the wide ranging British system, and consequently federal negotiating authorities have tended towards the negative adversary approach used by the private sector.

Probably the most modern and enlightened legislation of this kind in Canada is entitled "The Civil Service Act, Amendments to Regulations and Negotiation Procedures," passed by the Prince Edward Island Legislature on November 22, 1972. This act, which was arrived at by joint agreement between government and civil service organizations, embodies all the best features of the British system and of the collective bargaining laws of the State of Michigan and New York City.

In revising the two acts referred to in the Throne Speech, the federal government would do well to draft legislation adopting the principles and machinery embodied in the Prince Edward Island Civil Service Act, and to encourage other provincial governments to do the same.

The Throne Speech references to measures for improving social security programs will be generally welcomed, and I should like to express my personal pleasure at the reference to the guaranteed annual income. Time will not permit me to deal with these now, but there will be an opportunity to do so when the legislation is before us. These are all measures that will contribute to national unity. There is, however, one point that I consider essential to unity which seems to have been overlooked. I refer to the distribution of wealth.

Our economy operates within the framework of the free enterprise system, but unfortunately our free enterprise system operates in such a manner that poverty is one of its by-products. So far our social security measures, our various types of income transfers, have not been able to remedy this, and personally I doubt whether the improvements foreshadowed in the Throne Speech will do so either. The trouble seems to lie not so much within the system itself as in the way it operates.

If honourable senators will refer to the income group distribution table on page 15 of the Senate Report on Poverty, they will see that in 1951 the lowest fifth of non-farm families received only 6.1 per cent of the wealth produced in Canada, whereas the highest fifth received 41.1 per cent. In 1967 the corresponding figures were 6.8 per cent and 38.5 per cent. That means that over a period of 15 years, the percentage of total wealth produced received by the highest 20 per cent of our income groups decreased by only 2.6 per cent, and the percentage received by the lowest 20 per cent remained almost stationary, having increased by only seven-tenths of 1 per cent. The same situation obtains in the U.S.A.

It is obvious, therefore, that our social security programs—relatively generous as they may appear—are not doing very much to remedy the gap in income distribution.

This problem is also related to national unity. It must be tackled sooner or later, and the sooner we can come to grips with it the better because both here and in the U.S.A. each succeeding generation is better educated and more sophisticated than the previous one. They are already challenging the systems, values and principles that we have taken for granted. They are interested in the "why" of things and, personally, I think the time will come when such a wide gap in the distribution of wealth will no longer be tolerated.

Nobody seems to know the answer to this problem. Transfer payments over the years have had little or no impact upon it, and with accelerating living standards and living costs it is doubtful whether the guaranteed annual income can be implemented fast enough to correct it.

The present energy crisis in the U.S.A., which experts predict will last at least for 12 years, is a perfect example of what happens when we use up our energy resources at the exponential rate. What we must realize is that we are depleting a lot of minerals and natural raw materials at the same exponential rate, and sooner or later we will be faced with the same kind of crisis with respect to water, iron, copper, mercury and other materials as we now have with energy.

It is obvious, therefore, that industrial countries will be forced sooner or later to curtail the rate of industrial expansion and will have to become much more conservation-minded with regard to raw materials, and will have to place greater emphasis on finding suitable substitutes. When we add to that the measures that must be taken to protect our environment, it can be seen that our private enterprise system will have to make some very drastic readjustments in the not so distant future. Perhaps what is needed is a new philosophy and new sets of principles to replace the worship of the gross national product which has been the governing factor to date. These are all matters of the gravest concern to Canadians, and perhaps the Senate would do well to have them studied either by the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy or some other committee.

Honourable senators, I have restricted my remarks to matters related to national unity. Much more could be said, but I will conclude by expressing my support for the motion before us, and my thanks to you for your very patient hearing.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, when she was asked to comment on her appointment to the high office of Speaker of the Senate, Senator Fergusson said, "I'm just a person." She said that her efforts would be used to render the Senate even more effective and useful, and I would suggest, since the Senate seems to have become the only stable public institution in Canada in recent years, her efforts might prove fruitful indeed.

Our Speaker wants to be the link between Canadian people of all ranks and creeds; in short, the symbol of harmony between Canadians. I think we should add that she is a woman of great talent and charm; in fact, she has been one of the most active and efficient workers in the Senate chamber as well as in many of the numerous Senate committees.

May I say that for us she represents the merit system: the true democracy which allows equal opportunity for both sexes in this land of ours.

[Translation]

I wish to extend to you, Madam Speaker, my warmest congratulations and my wishes of good health.

Honourable senators, I also extend my sincere congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and would like to commend particularly their worthwhile contribution to our proceedings. Their constructive speeches showed a thorough knowledge of the matters dealt with and were delivered with much eloquence and relevancy.

Honourable senators, the beginning of this session is stamped with deep sadness. We deplore the loss of three statesmen who devoted their lives and their great abilities to their country, on battlefields as well as in political life. I will merely add a word about the one whom I knew more closely and who liked to be called "Mike" despite the fact that he deserved our full respect. He was a great-hearted man who had remained humble in spite of the glory and honours bestowed upon him in recognition of his talents and his merits and who like you, Madam Speaker, used to say: "I'm just a person." Not only Canada mourns him, but the entire world has lost an apostle of peace and justice. I thank the leaders of the Senate and the Opposition as well as Senators Grosart and Manning for having so well recalled some of the many achievements of those statesmen at the national and international levels and for having conveyed on our behalf their sympathy to the bereaved.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne which we are asked to approve, includes a series of beneficient provisions for the Canadian people. Judging by newpapers reports and talks throughout the country, those provisions meet general approval; they should also meet the approval of opposition parties if only because they accuse the government of having stolen their platform.

To be fair, we must however note a slight difference as regards the Conservative opposition: once again, the Quebec lieutenant does not agree with his leader. The member for Saint-Hyacinthe condemns the government for stealing a lot from the opposition platform, while his leader claims that the Speech from the Throne is a vague document without any national priority. I submit, however, that though in disagreement they are both wrong.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No concession.

Hon. Mr. Denis: Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition cannot claim that the Speech from the Throne is vague and does not set any priority while this is plainly written in it, and I quote:

[English]

—the Government assigns the highest priority to two policy areas:

—economic policy, to reduce unemployment, contain inflation and strengthen the economy generally

—social policy, to bring about, in consultation with the Provinces, a re-organization of existing social security programs.

[Translation]

To reach these objectives, numerous and concrete measures are announced and they have generally been clearly understood and welcomed by the Canadian people—somewhat less by the Leader of the Opposition. If the speech had included details concerning each of these measures, we would still be reading it, and that would be contrary to practice and custom.

Far from stealing from the opposition platform, we note in the Speech from the Throne that most of the measures advocated are changes, extensions, improvements and applications to existing laws passed by this government if not by a previous Liberal government.

Honourable senators, I shall conclude my remarks with comments published in a special bulletin issued by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce concerning economic growth and consultation with the provinces. I shall quote a few excerpts from this bulletin:

[English]

"The Speech from the Throne is a statement of intentions which merit the serious consideration of Parliament and all Canadians", said John Ellis, President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

". . . However, only by vigorous economic growth can this country afford and support continued sound social advancement."

"This Chamber also is pleased to see that there is a desire for more open consultation with the provinces to develop a consensus on the vital economic and social issues facing the country", Mr. Ellis concluded.

[Translation]

I think that this bulletin summarizes admirably well the part of the Speech from the Throne dealing with national economy and linking its growth with consultation and coordination between the various levels of government.

Honourable senators, as it is production which generates employment, markets are needed for that production to be sold and increased here and abroad if we want unemployment to be reduced.

Positive measures have already been taken for that purpose by the present government at both national and international levels. And a whole series of measures designed to spur, stimulate and develop the economy is added. Enumerating them all would take too long, but may I be allowed to stress a few.

[English]

—measures to provide more jobs immediately by strengthening and broadening existing programs

—increased funding for the Local Initiatives Program

—increased funding for on the job training

—a substantial seasonal capital works project

—measures to enable industry to take advantage of opportunities for increasing our foreign trade

—aid to small businesses through new initiatives

—measures to assist in the development of the tourist industry in Canada

—The Department of Regional Economic Expansion will be decentralized to a greater degree to be in a better position to identify opportunities for economic development

—incentives and assistance for housing and home-ownership

—amendments to the Export Development Act, increasing the capital of the Export Development Corporation and raising the financial ceilings for lending, guarantees, export insurance and foreign insurance operations.

By the way, the Export Development Act was proclaimed in force in 1969, and it established the Export Development Corporation. The growth of the corporation's long term financing has been spectacular to the degree that in 1972 it amounted to $280 million. The outlook for 1973 is for a still greater rate of increase.

Honourable senators, in order to achieve such goals, this government intends to have continuous consultation with provincial governments in order to coordinate all the efforts of those who govern. If you read the Speech from the Throne, you will find that desire for consultation, co-operation and coordination expressed more than a dozen times. This is indeed an invitation to those governments to do likewise.

Should there have been in the past a lack of consultation between public bodies and refusals to compromise and co-operate—for whatever reasons—the federal government was not the only guilty party. I would like to give two examples among many others: the refusal on the part of some provinces to benefit, for a time, from excellent legislation on hospital and health insurance, and that to the detriment of the people in those provinces. Another example: a provincial law requires construction workers to take holidays in the height of summer, thus depriving them of substantial wages and consequently of higher unemployment insurance benefits during the dead season. Without that legislation, more people would work during summer, more houses would be either built or repaired and suppliers of all kinds would surely benefit from it. Anyway you look at it, more than a month of productive work is thus lost, for nobody starts building a house two weeks before the holidays, and there is surely another delay after the return to work. There are many people who indefinitely postpone such projects because of fall or winter weather.

Honourable senators, giving work to people should be everybody's business and so should be providing for health and welfare. Employers and unions should also assume their responsibilities so that our Canadian products may compete on foreign markets, which would increase our production and create employment.

[English]

In answer to a question asked the other day by the honourable Senator O'Leary regarding inflation, it is obvious that nobody likes the high cost of living but I must remind the honourable senator that Canadian prices from 1968 to 1972 have been more stable than those in most other industrialized countries. The average yearly percentage increase from 1968 to 1972 exclusively was: Canada, 3.7 per cent; United States, 4.9 per cent; Japan, 6.1 per cent; France, 5.5 per cent; Germany, 3.4 per cent; Italy, 3.5 per cent and the United Kingdom, 6.5 per cent.

• (1700)

As you will notice, we did not do so badly after all. And may I add that during the same period the salaries of Canadians increased by 55 per cent which compensates in a way for the high cost of living. Also, during the same period of time, sales have increased by 43 per cent and savings are three times higher.

[Translation]

Nobody is delighted by the number of unemployed announced by Statistics Canada, but I wish to point out that more than half these unemployed have one, two or more members of their family working. May I add that, between 1965 and 1970, the number of new jobs created in Canada was higher than the total number of jobs created in Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden and Great Britain altogether.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Denis: The Speech from the Throne calls on all available forces for the understanding and goodwill of governments, unions, management and public service in order that our fellow citizens who are able to work may find a job and those who cannot work may receive adequate assistance. However, very few nations indeed take better care than does Canada of their jobless and handicapped, and it has been years since we last saw beggars on our streets and queues of people waiting for a bowl of soup in front of our charitable institutions. But the government can do more in this area, and it will, through the proposed measures.

Thus, our economy will be more prosperous, and as a result it will be possible to improve the lot of those who are unable to provide for themselves. The government is determined to accept any reasonable compromise in the interest of the people of Canada and calls on all the provinces to do likewise.

In the past, honourable senators, minority governments have achieved some great things. So will the present government, if its work is not hampered by filibusters and useless votes.

On motion of Senator Molgat, for Senator Everett, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 115 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, chapter P-35, R.S.C., 1970.

SCIENCE POLICY

REPORT OF COMMITTEE EXPENSES TABLED

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne, Chairman of the Special Committee on Science Policy, pursuant to Rule 84, tabled a report of the expenses of the Special Committee on Science Policy incurred during the Fourth Session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have a question for Senator Lamontagne. Does this report cover only the Fourth Session or does it cover the period since dissolution of Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: It covers the current fiscal year, providing also expenses until the end of March next year.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: March 1972?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: 1973.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I see. My honourable friend did not use quite the right expression and means from the beginning of the fiscal year to date, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I think we shall have to check from the report which was handed to me about two seconds ago.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We could have left you until next week for the tabling of the report.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Unfortunately, I shall not be here next week because I have to attend a meeting of the Rome Club.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is unfortunate for us.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, January 23, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first of all to add my congratulations to those of every other senator who has spoken on the appointment of Madam Speaker to her position. She is a woman who I know will perform her duties with grace and with dignity, and with the unfailing good humour that she has displayed in all the years that I have known her.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I should also like to express my admiration for the speeches made by the mover, Senator Hicks, and the seconder, Senator Lafond, and to welcome the recently appointed new members to this house. I had hoped, having been here for six years, that in time I might move down from the back benches perhaps a little closer to the seat of power, but if they keep appointing privy councillors at this rate I will never leave this back bench at all.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is where the power lies.

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Everett: Honourable senators, before I proceed with my remarks, I should like to draw to your attention the fact that we are honoured today by the presence in the gallery of the Minister of Financial Institutions, Companies and Cooperatives of the Province of Quebec, Mr. William Tetley.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Everett: We are indeed pleased that Mr. Tetley has chosen to observe our debate even before he has gone to visit the other place. We take precedence. I hope that I will not bore him too much.

Honourable senators, I should like to deal with one area of the Throne Speech, an area for which the government has expressed the highest priority, that is, the area of economic policy. It states that this priority must be to reduce unemployment, to contain inflation, and to strengthen the economy generally.

In the Throne Speech the government states that it has four main objectives—to expand job opportunities as rapidly as possible, to bring our growth rate closer to potential, to attain reasonable price stability, and to assure that all regions benefit from an expanding economy. It is very difficult to quarrel with those objectives; but, in a sense, they are very conflicting objectives. The trick is not really just to express them but to know how to balance them to achieve the best out of each of them.

The first area, and the one which I think the government sees as the most important, is the area of unemployment. According to the last statistics, our seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in Canada was 6.8 per cent. In the Senate Finance Committee Report of roughly a year ago we recommended an interim rate of 4 to 4½ per cent. What the 6.8 per cent then means is apparently a great deal of misery, and the possibility of a loss of potential output.

On the other hand, if you stop to consider it, there have been basic changes in our economy. We now give the unemployed a far higher degree of protection, probably, than any other country in the world. We are all aware of the terms of our unemployment insurance. We have medical security and many different legislative acts to take care of and to reduce the harm of unemployment. In addition to that, we have had a tremendous growth in the service and technological industries, resulting in an increased participation rate particularly of women and young adults.

So today we find the possibility—and the very real possibility—that employment is a great deal more conditional than ever before and that people are moving into the ranks of the unemployed for terms that they would not have considered before, but because of the protections they are offered and because of the conditional quality of their own lives they can do this without serious economic upset to themselves.

So the plain fact is that we cannot just say that 6.8 per cent unemployment is a disaster, not until we know a great deal more about the meaning of this figure. What are its elements? What about the tremendous difference in the size of the regional figures as between, say, Ontario and some of the Maritime provinces? What about the differences in the unemployment rates between adult married men who are heads of families and young adults between the ages of 14 and 19 years?

In short, we have to know whether there is not a better definition of the term "unemployment," and we have to find out anew what constitutes full employment. The dangers of not knowing this, and of not knowing it to a far more precise degree, are that we can take measures to reduce that 6.8 per cent level but, in fact, we may be reducing a regional market that is tight, a particular segment of the figure that is tight, or we may be trying to reduce the total figure below what is, in fact, a full employment figure. The danger is that we could be overheating the economy and could be in danger of causing a serious inflation.

Now, it is true that if everyone is not working we are somewhat below our basic total potential line, but what we have to assess, again, is what is the cost of closing the gap between a full employment, which still leaves a gap, and the absolute potential of no unemployment at all. So until we know more about the basis of these unemployment statistics we are in danger of badly overheating this economy.

I should like to suggest that the problem in Canada today is not unemployment; the problem is inflation. We are enjoying a solid growth rate in Canada. Our excess capacity is being utilized. Demand is high. In some areas shortages are developing and investment is increasing at a very rapid pace. It seems to me that, really, what we should be doing is beginning to dampen our economy; because the demand is there, the growth is taking place, and there is a sufficient demand to ensure that the supply problems will be taken care of. If we go on pressing this economy forward, the net result will be excess demand that no amount of supply will be able to satisfy.

Well, a lot of people say, "No, we are in a dilemma, whether you call it a dilemma of expectation or a dilemma of cost push; we are in a dilemma that cannot be solved by normal demand management methods. What we have to do now is to have wage and price controls. That is the only way in which we are going to resolve our problem." But I think we now have an evidence of how wage and price controls really work. I am speaking of the situation in the United States. They have made their controls work as successfully, probably, as anybody has been able to do so in a free enterprise economy.

What did they do? First of all they put on a freeze and through that freeze they denoted the resolution of the government of the United States to stop inflation as much as they were able to do so. Through the freeze they prevented firms and labour unions from raising their prices and wages before the control period started. Through the freeze they were allowed time to set up the Phase II operation. But the freeze worked, honourable senators, because it was basically a very short-lived operation which was soon replaced by Phase II or mandatory control.

These controls acted to dampen the expectations held by the public that inflation would continue. But they worked because they were initiated as the economy was beginning to come back from a recession, at a time when there was a large unused amount of productive capacity, and at a time when productivity was rising rapidly. Therefore the controls worked at that juncture. But as time went on, they found that they gradually had to relax them, and this is what they have been doing during Phase II. But despite this, serious distortions occurred in the American economy, especially, to cite one instance, in the lumber industry, so that now President Nixon has come to Phase III, or voluntary controls. In so doing he has maintained the backing of the public, business and more importantly, so far, the labour unions.

By moving in this direction he has allowed these distortions to be worked out, and yet he has kept his mandatory machinery intact, and by maintaining it in the food and health industries and to a lesser extent in the construction industry, he has given a strong indication that the machinery will be used if necessary. He has also set a guideline to reduce inflation to 2½ percent annually.

What can we learn from the United States experience? First of all, that rigid controls result in distortions that no economy can live with over a period of time; secondly, as the economy heats up, controls become less and less effective; and thirdly, that controls are no substitute for sound monetary and fiscal policies.

What then would I respectfully recommend that this or any government do at this juncture in economic matters? First of all, in terms of monetary policy I think we ought to steady the growth of money supply now and at a more restrictive rate than at present, even if we risk certain variations in interest and exchange rates. Fiscal policy must conform so that it does not frustrate monetary policy. What that requires is that the government move now to a balanced budget.

As far as wage and price controls are concerned, it is interesting to note that United States experience and action endorses and follows, to a large extent, the Finance Committee Report on Growth, Employment and Price Stability. Rigid controls will not work as the economy expands beyond equilibrium. What really is required in the wage and price control area is a federal-provincial stabilization body that sets targets for growth, unemployment and inflation and takes vigorous action in the manner proposed under the American scheme against egregious increases that are out of line by any reasonable standards.

The other course I suggest is that we make an examination of employment, unemployment, and full employment in Canada. As I said before, we must know what the constituent elements of the figures are and what figures should guide us in setting our economic policy as far as unemployment and inflation are concerned. And most important, what is the definition of full employment?

Taken together, I believe these policies could result in a balance, and the very balance the government says it is seeking. The fact of the matter is they will take time, they will work but they require restraint, both on the part of the government and the Opposition parties. But that restraint is essential if we want a balanced, growing economy.

I make just one more plea beyond that and that is for a greater degree of long-range planning. We have had tremendous growth in Canada in the size of government, in the size of corporations, and in the size of labour unions. This growth has removed much of the uncertainty that surrounds economic life and for that we can be extremely thankful.

Nevertheless, we have not been able to contain the built-in inflationary pressures that this growth in size of these constituent elements of our economy has created. Unless we do that the normal methods of controlling an economy through demand-management policies will fail. So I would make two or three more recommendations: one, that we as legislators increase our vigilance over the growth of government and the amount of resources that it is taking out of the economy; second, that we provide a national and international competition policy for the large firms and for all firms within our economy; third, that we eschew ad hoc solutions to the economic problems that confront us. This, probably more than anything, is at the basic root of the problems that we have with our economy. Something goes wrong, the Opposition calls for an answer, the government provides an answer so that goes onto the statute books and probably remains there as another distortion to the economy. Finally, that we start to plan on the basis of tomorrow's technology, instead of trying to transfer what we have today into a new field. For example, the government has stated in the Throne Speech that it wants to improve the industrial base of Western Canada. Well, this is something I can heartily endorse, but I do not know that I can endorse the concept that we merely move secondary manufacturing, as it is known today, into Western Canada. Rather I would endorse a concept that says there are labour-intensive new technologies and businesses coming along that involve a great deal of technology that could be organized in the West rather than in central Canada. That is what I mean by taking care of the problem on the basis of future planning and future technology.

Honourable senators, I have dealt with one aspect of the Throne Speech and suggested courses that may or may not be acceptable to the government. I think, however, that they are courses that, while hard to follow, in the long run will grant us the kind of economy that is so well expressed in the Speech from the Throne.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Might I ask the honourable senator a question. As I understand your thesis, ultimately you would hope to achieve results in the field of wage and price controls by some sort of federal-provincial co-operation. Now, did you have in mind a body that could exercise sanctions, or were you merely thinking in terms of publicity, such as we suggested in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance?

Hon. Mr. Everett: I do not think, honourable senators, that one should underestimate the effect of an examination of wage and price increases, and the resultant publicity that might come from such an examination. However, I think that such a body should have teeth, and to make them effective there should exist the right to roll back. Bear in mind that I am not talking about a mandatory control system in the sense of a guideline that must be met. I am saying that the guideline should be one of what sort of price performance we can expect overall for the good of the economy. If someone acts in such a manner as to go so far beyond that guideline that he sets a pacesetting increase that others tend to follow, then such a committee or group should have the right to roll that price on wage back.

Hon. Mr. Laird: Would you not have constitutional problems in carrying out a proposition of that kind?

Hon. Mr. Everett: No doubt there would be constitutional problems, but I do not think the difficulty would be as great as some people might think. Studies have been carried out which indicate that under certain clauses of the Constitution we might do it without reference to the provinces. Nevertheless, even if we could not, the problem can most certainly be resolved if that is what the people want. I think we shall find that if we cannot contain inflation, people will want some sort of resolution to follow.

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure at this time to join with those who have preceded me in offering congratulations to Madam Speaker on her appointment to the high office which she now occupies.

Madam Speaker, your appointment has also brought great joy to your colleagues from New Brunswick. It is an honour which is reflected upon the entire province which you have represented in this house with such dignity, ability and devotion during the years you have been a senator.

• (1440)

I also wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, Senator Hicks and Senator Lafond, for the great competence they exerted in discharging their respective tasks.

I am pleased to associate myself with previous speakers in cordially welcoming our new colleagues in this house.

The opening of this new Parliament on January 4 was preceded by an event which plunged the entire Canadian nation into deep mourning. The death of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson not only left a gap in the hearts of all Canadian citizens, it also caused great regret among all the peoples of the earth. Everyone will remember him for these great qualities that made him a great Canadian and a diplomatic genius. The weak will mostly remember him for his highly humanitarian feelings which inclined him naturally towards the underprivileged. Acadians will also remember Mr. Pearson as the man who cared for the needs of minorities. In my own name and on behalf of all those I represent in this house, I offer my deepest sympathies to Mrs. Pearson and to his so sadly bereaved family.

I have just used the word "Acadians." This brings me to remark at this point that I am often asked why we, French Canadians from the Maritimes, insist on calling ourselves "Acadians" rather then "French Canadians." I should like to deal with this matter now.

To use a well-known expression, let us say that Acadians are also French Canadians, but "different" French Canadians. It is important to recall a few historical facts, although the broad outline of the history of Acadia is rather well-known. The first Acadian colony, far back in 1604, was established on the Island of Sainte-Croix in the Bay of Fundy, New Brunswick, near the American border, close to the state of Maine. This first undertaking was a failure, and the following year the colony settled at Port Royal, now Annapolis, Nova Scotia. The first chapter of the history of Acadia covers the period from 1605 to 1713, that is from the arrival of Champlain and de Monts at Port Royal, until the Treaty of Utrecht which, in 1713, transferred the colony of Acadia to England. That was a period of pioneering and independence, but also a period of isolation. This first isolation experienced by the Acadians was a geographical one; they had settled away from their families whom they had left behind, from their motherland, and also from Canada where another French colony was expanding. Acadia first extended to the west and to the east of the Port Royal settlement, over areas now known as Digby county and the Annapolis valley. Later, Port Royal settlers moved out towards the Mines Basin, where their best known hamlet was no doubt Grand Pré. But Acadians did not stop there; they went on towards what they called Népisiguit, today the town of Truro. From Truro, they moved on towards Beaubassin, which is today the town of Amherst, then towards Memramcook, in the south-east section of the province of New Brunswick. Later, other Acadian groups settled on Île Saint-Jean, now Prince Edward Island, and on Cape Breton. It should also be pointed out that the Acadian colony had nothing to do whatsoever with the Canadian colony. They had their own governor and were not always as fortunate as Canada. Therefore, right from the early days of their history the Acadians were subject to influences different from those which affected their French-Canadian brothers in Canada. Those peculiar influences were even more significant following the Treaty of Utrecht which, as I already mentioned, handed the colony of Acadia over to England in 1713. The isolation of the Acadian people which, from the start, made them feel most miserable was to become even greater. Officially separated from France and Quebec from 1713 to 1755, the Acadians in addition to their geographical isolation also went through a period of political and moral solitude. No help could come from France or Canada.

Finally, in 1755, the Acadians reached the third stage of their history, exile. The separation that the Canadians of 1755 were subjected to exceeded anything their ancestors ever had to suffer when they were isolated from France and the other French settlements of America, because exile meant being torn away from their native land, seeing their families broken up and not knowing what the future had in store for them. This separation was the worst of all. This phenomenon of isolation which lasted through different stages for a century and a half was no doubt one of the most determining factors in the formation of an Acadian image.

It is often said that the Acadian is shy, suspicious, introverted—at least until now—but how could it be otherwise? After the exile came integration to foreign lands, the return to France, the great venture in the forests leading back to St. Mary's Bay or the Memramcook Valley. Some 3,000 or 3,500 made it back to France; several perished at sea; a small group was forced back into the bushlands around Chaleur Bay, the Gaspé Peninsula and Quebec City; another group estimated at roughly 200 families found their way back to old Acadia. About 30 families settled down in the Fredericton area on the Saint John river. They had no legal claim to their lands and had to give them up with the arrival of the Loyalists.

Those Acadians, once more driven out, headed north. They settled what is now the region of Madawaska. The remaining ones went on to Memramcook. Several of them stayed there; these families were the ancestors of the Acadians now living in the Moncton, Shediac and Kent areas. Some fifty families elected to push ahead and settled around St. Mary's Bay. Other refugees came directly to this area by boat. They were the ancestors of most Acadians who live at present in that same area.

Earlier, the Acadians who had hidden themselves in the woods close to their lands had decided to try their luck in northern New Brunswick. They were joined by the deported who had managed to come back to Gaspé; they were the ancestors of Acadians who live in the Bathurst area.

All these events took place between 1764 and 1780. But these Acadians who were coming back home had no hope of finding their homes and lands unspoiled. For the next two or three generations, they joined together as best they could, living in the worst state of destitution, having only one purpose in mind, that of being forgotten by living isolated and forsaken. That was perhaps the most pathetic part of the whole Acadian adventure. Indeed, in that century of silence and incubation, between 1780 and 1880, like bees, or like ants which do not even buzz, a new community built its hive, or dug its nest, cleared its land, surrounded itself with dikes, searched the sea for its food. Gradually, they pushed a little further, in order to find better conditions. Then they met new families, old friends, or friends' relatives and they told one another their story. They remembered. For one century of silence, along the shores, or in the midst of woods, Acadians coming back to life have had plenty of time to revive their oral traditions and to live them out. And this little community that had refused to die, was totalling 8,432 people in 1803, according to the notes written by Monseigneur Denaut, the then bishop of Quebec City, after visiting Acadian settlements. And life went on like this, feverishly, but also resolutely, until the day when at last someone dared to officially proclaim the revival of the Acadian people. That was in 1881, on the occasion of the first Acadian congress held in Memramcook, New Brunswick.

From that time on the Acadians began to live as a distinct entity. It is at this congress that, so to speak, they woke up to establish their own identity and their own heritage. I would like to remind this house of two facts which in addition to their historic interest have a special interest for this house.

Among the delegates attending this first Acadian congress in 1881 was a young man by the name of Pascal Poirier. He was the president of the first Commission at this congress whose responsibility was to choose and adopt a national day for the Acadians of the Maritime provinces. Mr. Pascal Poirier was the first Acadian to become a senator and he was a member of this house from 1885 to 1935.

Another fact to be noted: in his speech to the first Acadian congress Mr. Pierre Landry described the total Acadian strength:

> In our province (New Brunswick) we have eight Acadian priests, one Acadian in the House of Commons, professionals, etc.—

This Acadian member of Parliament was named Gilbert Girouard and was member for the county of Kent. I might also add that the county of Kent was the only county to elect an Acadian member to the first Canadian Parliament following Confederation in 1867; his name was Auguste Renaud. But I would like to return to the Acadian congress of 1881. The main question was to give the Acadian people a national day.

There were two different opinions. On the one side were those who wanted a completely separate national day and who advocated Assumption Day on August 15. On the other side were those who wanted to maintain closer relations with the French Canadians in Quebec and who were advocating St. Jean-Baptiste Day, on June 24, which is, as you know, the national day of the French Canadians in Quebec. Following a lively debate on this question, the first Acadian congress, held in 1881, voted for Assumption Day as Acadia's national day.

Honourable senators, after this review of over two centuries, I am back at my initial proposition, namely, that the Acadians are French people who came from France as the French Canadians but whose customs, way of life and history are their very own.

[Hon. Mr. Michaud.]

In 1881, therefore, Acadia took its fate into its own hands. Progress since has been remarkable. The total Acadian population in the Atlantic provinces has increased from 45,000 in 1871 to 215,000 today, despite continual emigration to Quebec, Ontario and the United States. Although exact figures are not available, it is claimed that the total Acadian population, descendants of those first settlers who arrived in Port Royal around 1605 and the following years, is of some 1,250,000. But today as in the past "Acadian" means primarily the French population of the Maritime provinces. That population, in relation to the total population of each of those provinces, is distributed as follows: Nova Scotia: 12 per cent Acadian; Prince Edward Island: 17 per cent Acadian; New Brunswick: 39 per cent Acadian.

New Brunswick has the largest French group and consequently the best organized. The French element is predominant in four counties: Madawaska, Restigouche, Gloucester and Kent; it forms an important part of the population of the counties of Victoria, Northumberland, Westmorland and of the city of Moncton. In Nova Scotia, Acadians form the majority in the county of Richmond, in Cape Breton, and make up an important portion of the population of three other counties: Digby, Yarmouth and Inverness. However, those four counties include only 35 per cent of the population of French descent in Nova Scotia. The rest are drowned in the urban areas of Halifax and Sydney, or isolated in other counties. That is what explains the regrettable losses.

In fact, although there are 88,000 persons of French origin in Nova Scotia, only 51,000 of them speak French. That means a loss of 42 per cent. On Prince Edward Island the Acadians are grouped mostly in the county of Prince, but they are nowhere in the majority. There are 18,000 persons of French origin in that province, but only 10,000 of them speak French; there has been a loss of about 50 per cent. Those losses are sad but not surprising. What should astonish us is that so many Acadians should still speak French in spite of the many and great difficulties they had to overcome. While the French Canadian has always been master in his own house, the Acadian never was. The Acadian people had very modest beginnings. Its resurgence in 1880 was due to a dozen persons. For three quarters of a century now, it has been kept alive by a very small group. The Acadian fashioned his own weapons of survival. Obviously, he had comforting support from Quebec. When he had no clergy, Quebec priests came to the rescue. Quebec orders founded his first convents, his first colleges. Today, the Acadian has his institutions, but he still needs support. With his distinct mentality, the Acadian built a heritage to suit his needs in 1881, heritage which separated him from French Canada. Today, one can wonder whether that heritage has not grown obsolete. His patriotism is becoming more positive, drawing strength from achievements in which he can take pride. Today, the Acadian realizes that even if his background is different, his turn of mind distinctive, his cultural future is linked with that of French Canada. There is a rapprochement which without trying to eliminate the word "Acadian" seeks to establish closer links with French Canada. The Acadians, mainly in New Brunswick, have their schools, their French university, a financial establishment, the Mutuelle l'Assomption, which is to their credit, some well-established co-operatives, a system of credit unions extending to all Acadian parishes, French radio and television stations, French newspapers including the daily L'Évangéline, as well as their own organizations.

The Acadians who did not take part in the negotiations which led to Confederation in 1867 are now looking to the future in a new light. Confident that in the not too distant future they will become first-class citizens, the Acadians want to play the part to which they are entitled in the country where their forefathers were first to set foot more than three hundred years ago. It is their reason for existence.

Honourable senators, before ending my speech in this house on the Acadian fact in our country, I would like to mention two events which show to what extent the Acadians are firmly determined to preserve their identity, their culture and their rights. The first was recounted in every detail in three texts published in L'Evangéline in Moncton, in the November 27, 1972 edition.

First text:

> Fredericton (CP)—The leader of the Parti Québécois declared Friday that French-speaking minorities outside Quebec were "a lost cause". That statement from René Lévesque was made to New Brunswick University students who were asking him about the consequences of Quebec independence for the Acadian people.

Second text:

> "We shall not ask Mr. Levesque's permission". SNA administrative secretary Hector Cormier strongly reacted to the statements of the leader of the Parti Québécois. During a phone interview last night, Mr. Cormier declared: "If Mr. Lévesque could prove that French minorities outside Quebec are a lost cause, it would be an argument in favour of Quebec's independence. It is not the first time he makes such statements.
> The administrative secretary of the Société Nationale des Acadiens grants that there is still much work to be done before the Acadians secure all their rights, but assuming that tolerance and comprehension are displayed on both sides, the citizens of New Brunswick will learn to have regard for language and cultural differences".
> He went on: "Francophony is surely not a lost cause in New Brunswick. On the contrary, French life has been going through a revival in the province these last years and it is not about to stop.

Third text:

> Editorial: "Are the Acadian people a lost cause"?
> Parti Québécois leader René Lévesque just told New Brunswick University students in Fredericton that "The Acadian people are a lost cause". He even suggested that in an independent Québec, "young Acadians could become our preferred immigrants".
> Francophobes of Fredericton and New Brunswick must have been pleased with Mr. Lévesque's remarks. Now we have Quebec's foremost nationalist telling them what they have been suggesting for decades: The Acadians should assimilate and the government should stop wasting public funds on bilingualism.
> At certain periods of our history, we have experienced dark hours when the Acadians appeared on the brink of extinction. There were 45,000 Acadians in 1871. Today they number 215,000 despite emigration to Quebec, Ontario and the United States.
> The social, economic and educational conditions of the Acadians have sharply improved, particularly so during the 60s.
> It has been said that people have a soul. The Acadian people have a soul, a destiny and dreams. If over the past they have not succeeded in destroying the Acadians, it is not a René Lévesque who can order Acadians to fade away and merge with the Quebec people, not even if Quebec should ever become independent.
> The Acadians have settled twice in New Brunswick. We definitely intend to stay there, to grow and to prosper.
> For the Acadians, the future cannot but be full of promises. They are not dying, but full of life and optimism."

There is a second event illustrating the depth of the Acadian fact in this country. It is widely known that Moncton now finds itself in a situation which gives a very bad reputation to the city. This is due to the intransigence of the man who holds the office of mayor of this city. This situation boils down to a blatant abuse of power by this mayor who defies the law of his province and country in obstinately refusing to provide Acadians who make up one third of Moncton's population with the bilingual services they claim from its municipal administration. Acadians, of course, protest with all possible energy against this treatment which they consider unfair. In this they get generous support from many citizens and groups of the English-speaking population of this city, including the media, the newspapers especially, the same officers of the Board of Trade, many members of the area's ministerial association and even some city councillors. And how did the Acadians of Moncton choose to protest against such a revolting attitude? They assembled in full force in front of the city hall and in a public and symbolic ceremony they buried this secular myth called fear.

Honourable senators, such are the Acadians.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before I refer in a few minutes to certain items in the Speech from the Throne, I, too, wish to offer to our Speaker my sincere congratulations and good wishes on her appointment.

Your appointment is a high honour to you, Madam Speaker, and it is an honour you richly deserve. It is a public recognition of what your colleagues well know, that you possess in abundant measure those qualities so necessary in a Speaker—intelligence, knowledge, experience, good judgment, and an essential fairness. These are all qualities which guarantee that you will preside over our deliberations with dignity, grace, and honour.

Honourable senators, while Senator Fergusson's appointment as Speaker is a source of satisfaction to all of us, yet it is even more so, I suspect, to those of us who come from the Atlantic provinces. We are gratified that once again our region has given to Canada yet another distinguished person to fill a high place in the parliamentary life of our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Indeed, it is a matter of pride to us that the Atlantic region has given so many distinguished people to the public life of Canada. Nova Scotia, just a small province, has already given three Prime Ministers to Canada—Sir John Thompson, Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Robert Borden—and I am one of the many who believe that before too long we will have still another distinguished Nova Scotian as Prime Minister of our country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I remind Senator Macdonald that Mr. Bennett was also a Maritimer.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, he came from New Brunswick. I was referring to the three Prime Ministers from Nova Scotia.

I should also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply. Both made excellent speeches; both performed their somewhat difficult tasks in a very commendable manner. I was especially pleased to hear the remarks of Senator Hicks. He and I were members of the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia at one time and I heard him give many fine speeches there. I was glad to hear that he has lost none of his ability to express himself in clear, lucid and eloquent language. I was pleased to note that he plans to speak at a later date on post-secondary education, because when he speaks on that subject he speaks with authority, being the president of one of the great universities of Canada.

Honourable senators, after listening to all the praise and to all the admiration and, indeed, all the glorification which has been heaped upon the Speech from the Throne, I hesitate to indulge in even some mild criticism of it. Yet I feel I should do so, if only to maintain some sense of balance and to show that we do not take the written word about good intentions as being accomplishments deserving of great praise and commendation.

I think it must be remembered that the government that prepared this Speech is the same government that failed to do any of the things during the last four years which it says it now wants to do. Its past record is a dismal one. Its past record is not one which deserves the trust and confidence of the Canadian people in the future.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne itself is an interesting document. It is a long speech. It says much, and yet at the same time tells very little. From its contents it is obvious that a great effort, a very clever effort, has been made to help a discredited government cling to office. It uses a lot of words to cover up the failure of the government to solve the major problems facing Canadians. It is obviously designed and planned to appease as many people as possible who have lost confidence in this government by holding out that something better will be forthcoming once the government has emerged from the state of shock it went into on October 30 last. In my opinion, all the Throne Speech succeeds in doing is to destroy what little credibility the government managed to retain.

Let me bring some parts of that Speech to your attention to show what I mean. The Throne Speech lists four main objectives of the government in the area of economic policy. The first is:

> To expand job opportunities at a rate that will bring about as rapid as possible a decline in the numbers of unemployed.

Honourable senators will note the use of the word "decline." It is apparent that the government no longer has any hope, if it ever had any, that its policies will bring about full employment. It has accepted a defeatist attitude, and all it now hopes for is a decline in the numbers of unemployed. This, in my opinion, is an open and frank admission of the failure of its economic policies in the past, and an admission that it has no hope for the future.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is an open admission, but it is not particularly frank.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In the Speech from the Throne opening the Fourth Session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament in 1972, the government said:

> Unemployment continues to be a matter of intense concern to the Government and will remain a primary focus of attention and action.

It also said this:

> The Government will nevertheless redouble its efforts to make sure that as many jobs as possible are available and that the fullest possible use is made of the skills and initiatives of those who are seeking work.

And yet after all those brave words, this year the government has lowered its sights and has admitted its policies have not worked, and that now it only hopes for a "decline in the numbers of unemployed."

Honourable senators, this is not good enough. In my opinion the right of a person to work is a very fundamental right, and that right to work presupposes that work will be available. Over the years it has, I think, been generally accepted that governmental policies must be shaped and directed to the end that employment, steady employment, is available for those qualified. Again, this means that government policy must provide the training necessary to qualify those seeking employment, which often means retraining them, to meet changing conditions both in industry and other fields of endeavour.

To be fair about it, I know that the government has done good work in the field of training and retraining persons for employment. The tragic fact is, however, that in too many cases there is no employment for these people when the training is completed. I feel that we owe it to all Canadians to make employment available to them so that they can plan their futures with assurance and not be afraid that such plans will be of no value because of unemployment or the fear of it. I do believe—indeed I am firmly convinced—that unemployment is the greatest and most pressing problem facing us today. If it is solved many of the other national problems will automatically be solved, or become of lesser importance.

On the past record I have no confidence in the ability of the present government to bring about full employment. What efforts they have made are commendable but ineffective—too weak and too timid. The Local Incentives Program, for example, has given employment but only very limited employment, sufficient to enable unemployed persons to draw unemployment insurance when LIP jobs are completed. Even in this endeavour the government has been too timid. A grant of a few thousand dollars here, or a few thousand dollars there, is often made for some local endeavour where a large, substantial grant, which would, for example, build a senior citizens' home, would be of lasting and permanent benefit, and would not only provide more and longer employment but also generate even more employment.

Honourable senators, from my remarks you may have concluded that I do not have much confidence in the ability of the present government to so stimulate the economy to provide full employment. If you have come to such conclusion I can only say you are right. I do not have any confidence in the ability of the present government to provide full employment—its record shows it cannot do so—and with about half a million people unemployed at any given time I think I am justified in my lack of confidence.

In another part of the Throne Speech it is stated the government will meet with the provincial governments in the five regions of the country to examine the impact of freight rates on economic development and consumer prices. It is further stated that the railways, very generously I suppose, have agreed to participate in these meetings. The Speech also mentions that the government is proposing that the governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba join with it in convening a conference on western economic opportunities, and one of the suggestions for a joint study is the improvement of the total transportation system. I make no comment on the calling of a conference on western economic opportunities while not having a similar conference on eastern economic opportunities. However, I do think is strange that in the Western provinces a study is suggested on the whole transportation system, while for Canada as a whole only the impact of freight rates on economic development and consumer prices is to be studied.

Indeed, I am surprised that after all these years the government does not have this information. I would expect there are qualified people in the government service who could give them this information, or if the information is not available in any of the departments of the federal government perhaps it is available from the provincial governments. I think the province of Nova Scotia could provide a great deal of information as to the effects of freight rates. Recently I saw a news report of a statement by Premier Regan of Nova Scotia, who is not unfriendly to this government, about freight rates. In a report carried by the Chronicle Herald of Halifax on January 9 he is quoted as calling for a complete overhaul of the Canadian freight policy, and charging that the present system is inadequate in developing any equality of opportunity for provinces such as Nova Scotia.

The report also states:

> Premier Regan said Nova Scotia had to lean heavily on international trade because of the lack of decent opportunity which now existed to allow it to compete in the Canadian market.

And:

> Premier Regan said changes were needed in transportation policy to help the Maritimes as well as the Western Provinces. He said he personally felt Nova Scotia's steel industry was suffering severely because of the present schedule.

Honourable senators, of course the matter of freight rates is of great importance to the Atlantic provinces, but I do believe it would be better to have a study made of the whole subject of transportation in all Canada. However, if the various governments, through a committee or commission set up by them, are to examine the impact of freight rates, with the railways participating, then at least the other services rendered by the railways should be included in the study. For example, it would be interesting to know what is the future or, indeed, the present policy of the railways in regard to passenger service. Do they plan to improve it or to downgrade it further? Why is it that in parts of eastern Nova Scotia a feeling persists that the CNR, the only railway there, discourages passenger travel so as to be able at some date to claim a reduction in service is justified? I do not claim that this is so, but I do know, for example, that the passenger service between the cities of Sydney and Halifax in Nova Scotia is not much as to encourage travel by rail. I will not go into detail at this time. It is sufficient to make my point, I think, when it is realized the best travelling time between these two cities by train is seven hours 25 minutes, and the worst is 11 hours 30 minutes, and the distance by rail is just under 295 miles. In my opinion we are entitled to a better service than this.

Honourable senators, I noted from the Speech that the government is proposing yet another study. It is proposing that a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons study the trend towards higher food costs. This study will be separate from that of the impact of freight rates on consumer prices. I suppose one should be charitable in these matters and at least be thankful the government has at long last realized or been made aware of the ever-increasing cost of food. I am surprised, though I suppose I should not be, that the government does not have available all the information that such a study will provide. Surely at this late date with food prices rising week by week it could be reasonably expected that even this government would be aware of all the factors which could cause such increases and would know whether or not the ever-increasing cost of food was justified. However, since apparently it is only now becoming aware of such increases and has no information as to the causes and has no policies concerning this important matter, then one can only hope a joint committee will formulate a policy for it in the very near future.

Honourable senators, one cannot deal with everything in the Speech but there are but two other items I would like to mention. One is that relating to the armed forces;

there is a very peculiar reference to the armed forces which I do not understand. Perhaps someone who does will explain it before this debate is concluded. I quote the item:

> The Government intends to widen the area of service to Canada open to personnel in the Canadian Armed Forces. In addition to maintaining a high degree of military capability as the primary and most essential role of the Forces, new emphasis will be placed on the many areas in which the varied skills and training of this large number of dedicated Canadians can contribute to the achievement of national goals.

Honourable senators, I ask again, what does this mean? It looks to me as if the government plans to use the armed forces to do work now being done by civilians or that can be done by civilians, and if this be so I can tell them right now they can expect vigorous opposition to their plans; employment is too scarce now without having what is or what might be available taken over by the armed forces.

The Speech also mentions that we will be asked to consider an election expenses bill. This is good. Over the past 15 years there have been seven federal elections alone and they are expensive. I do think the Nova Scotia Elections Act provides a sound precedent regarding election expenses. It sets a limit on what can be spent by a party and by a candidate. It also provides for the payment by the provincial government of a portion of such expenses. I think this is only right and proper. After all, the election expenses, or a fair portion of them, should be borne in the same manner as the expenses now incurred by the chief electoral officer. I hope, in view of all the circumstances, that the bill dealing with election expenses will be before us for consideration in the very near future so that it will be in force when the next election is held.

In my opinion the Speech from the Throne is a pathetic document. It tries to hold out some promise to everyone. It is obviously directed to further the main concern of the present government, and this is to cling to office. It is obviously following once more the idea that what is good for the Liberal Party must be good for Canada. It shows the old intellectual arrogance which has so long been a feature of this government. It tries to be all things to all people. Indeed, after reading it over a few times I thought there must be something else in it, that I must be missing something. Surely, I thought, there must be something in this Speech from the Throne, some kindly reference to home and motherhood. It is not there. And then it came to me that even this government would not have the boldness to speak of the home after loosening our divorce laws; it would not have the boldness to speak of motherhood after loosening the laws relating to abortion.

Honourable senators, believing as I do that the Throne Speech is a document calculated to enable the government to cling to office as a limpet clings to a rock, I find I cannot in good conscience vote for the motion before us.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, in spite of the fact that Her Honour the Speaker must be rather embarrassed by the many compliments and nice words that have been said here during the last few days, as a colleague from New Brunswick I cannot restrain myself from joining the chorus in saying we are very happy indeed to see her presiding over this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I have been associated with the McQueen family in Shediac, New Brunswick and Her Honour the Speaker's late brother was a schoolmate of mine at Rothesay Collegiate. In fact, we roomed together. So, we have been associated for several years. However, I have always felt that Her Honour the Speaker held it against me since the time she came to the Senate, when our late colleague, the Honourable Arthur Beaubien, who was Whip at that time, enlisted my services to help him persuade the then new senator from New Brunswick to join the Divorce Committee. When we approached her with the proposition, she looked at me and said, "You know our church is opposed to divorce. What do you expect me to do?" We made a compromise and persuaded the late Senator Nancy Hodges, who came here at the same time, to join Her Honour on that committee. She spent some years as a member of the Divorce Committee, and gave good counsel and advice. I know her well enough to say that with her ability, conscientiousness, and capacity for hard work, she will preside over this chamber with great acceptation.

As a representative of New Brunswick, I want to say that we are proud of her. The last Speaker from New Brunswick was the Honourable Walter E. Foster, a former premier of that province, who occupied the Chair from 1936 to 1940. I join with my honourable friend from Nova Scotia in saying that we from Eastern provinces are very happy to have one of our colleagues preside over the deliberations of this chamber.

I also wish to welcome all new senators to this chamber. The only thing I can say to them is that I hope that in their tenure of office they have the same happy experience that I have had, and that they enjoy the fellowship and friendship that I have enjoyed over the years I have spent here in the red chamber. I cannot wish them anything more than that.

I add my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion. They made excellent speeches. In fact, all the speeches have been of a high order.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to discuss the Speech from the Throne in my brief remarks this afternoon. However, under the heading of employment, or unemployment, I want to say a few words about a problem we face in the province of New Brunswick, namely, the deplorable state of our great industry, the industry upon which the economy of the province is based, our pulp and paper industry. As you know, 85 per cent of the land area of the province is wooded, and pulp and paper is our chief industry. But we are in deep trouble. The situation in 1970 and 1971 became so serious that the provincial government became alarmed, and appointed a commission with the following terms of reference:

> To assess the current economic condition of the pulp and paper mills operating in New Brunswick with special emphasis on those located in the northern part of the province.

This commission made a thorough inquiry and investigation of every plant in the province of New Brunswick and I have before me its report which is now under consideration by the provincial government. I shall read one or two passages from that report:

> The entire pulp and paper industry in New Brunswick is suffering severely in the current economic environment. Nearly half of the mills reported net losses in 1970 and all report losses in 1971.

I am sorry to say that since this report was published one of these mills has been obliged to go into receivership. We do not want these mills to suspend operations because the employment situation in New Brunswick would suffer seriously as a result. Their costs are too high, and they cannot compete with their competitors in the United States; they cannot compete with their competitors in Scandinavia; and they cannot compete with their competitors in the constituency, which is represented by my friend Senator Lawson, on the West Coast where they seem to be getting along pretty well.

• (1540)

The whole Eastern industry, I might say, is threatened. The report goes on to say this:

> In each of the submissions to this Commission from the companies operating in the province, transportation costs—

And I underline the word "transportation."

> —transportation costs, particularly those of wood to the mills and product to market, were emphasized as being most onerous.

It is transportation of which I wish to speak; the costs of transportation of the products to the market. In the area in which I live on the Miramichi River, there are three pulp and paper plants, employing 2,800 people, with an annual payroll of $15 million. We know what prosperity is when those mills are operating at full production. The evidence is all around us, in both the countryside and the towns. Those industries, however, are threatened today on account of, as I say, the cost of transportation. One of the major costs arises from the fact that they are obliged to use small vessels for shipping their products to market, because the draft of the channel of the Miramichi River will not permit the use of larger vessels. Our friends on the West Coast are able to cut their costs by using large vessels in the transportation of their product to markets.

We have been—I was going to use the word "begging"—appealing to the federal government—and when I say "we" I mean the people of the whole Miramichi district who know of this difficulty under which these mills are labouring—to dredge the channel of that river to a depth of 26 feet in order to permit the use of larger vessels. When I say "we" I also include the mayors and town councils of the towns of Chatham and Newcastle, the labour unions, chambers of commerce, and all groups in the community. They all support that appeal. So far, however, we have not been successful. That is one method by which the federal government can assist these mills to continue their operations.

Another situation developed within the last two weeks. This river has to be used during the winter season, and we have had very heavy ice conditions in it this year. Last week five steamers were held up in the river by the ice and, I am afraid, even as I speak are still confined. Three of them are loaded with cargo ready to go out, and two are inbound. The only icebreaker that can be used in the river, on account of the depth of the water, the Sir Charles Tupper, is in Prince Edward Island freeing a potato steamer at Charlottetown, and word was received from her that she was caught in the ice, and a larger icebreaker was being called in. I understand that the latest information now is that the wind has shifted and she has cleared Prince Edward Island and is on her way up the Miramichi, so I hope it will not be too long before those steamers are released.

Honourable senators will realize how much it costs the shippers when these steamers are held up by conditions such as this. I therefore hope that the government, with all the good promises, will be able to help us out and remove the threat, which we feel is there continuously, that these mills may be forced to close down or suspend their operations.

I cannot resume my seat without saying a word concerning salmon. Honourable senators will recall that last year, on account of the diminishing runs of salmon, commercial fishing was banned on the Miramichi and Saint John Rivers, and the fishermen were to be compensated for their loss of income. Runs of salmon had been declining since 1967, especially those of large adult salmon. However, during 1972, when this ban was imposed, the salmon runs were very much improved. Figures released by the department show an angling catch—just imagine, the anglers were not banned—on the watershed of the Miramichi last year of 31,113 fish, salmon and grilse, which would indicate there was a good run of fish. This has led many fishermen to declare that the ban was not necessary, but others are of the opinion, as the member for our riding, Mr. G. Percy Smith, said in his speech in the House of Commons on January 9 last, that the 1972 improvement in runs reflects the normal five-year cycle; the 1972 run represents a return of salmon hatched in 1967. That run also reflects the effects of the ban on the Port aux Basques fishery which, historically, took many fish destined for New Brunswick rivers.

In the matter of compensation to the fishermen, the formula chosen was an annual payment during the ban, up to five years, of an amount equal to the average of each fisherman's best three consecutive years' income catch in recent years. The Miramichi fishermen chose the years 1965, 1966 and 1967. Negotiations for settlement have been very difficult, and they continued during the summer.

Payments to the set-net fishermen have not been finalized, although to their dismay fishermen have recently received cheques marked "final payment." Mr. Smith, our member, who spent most of last summer endeavouring to reach an agreement which would satisfy the fishermen, stated that while the minister was disposed to be generous in the matter of compensation of settlement "his departmental officers, either at the regional office at Halifax or here in Ottawa, or both, apparently thought that the formula was too generous and have taken it upon themselves to set arbitrary figures for the catch of individual fishermen, mailing them a cheque marked 'final payment.'"

Honourable senators will realize just what that meant to many of these fishermen and, as Mr. Smith says, the whole question is very complicated because these men are small operators, and their income was not large enough to require them to pay income tax. Mr. Smith, therefore, has asked the minister to appoint an appeal board to which these men may appeal the amount that has been paid them by the department. I can assure you, however, that due to this inconsistency there is an unrest and unhappiness among the fishermen because they feel they have not been treated fairly. These men, I know personally, are some of the finest citizens in the land. They are courageous. They are made of good stuff. They are of the calibre that should be given generous treatment. They should receive compensation not only for the loss of their income, but also for the loss of their way of life, which involves much more than dollars and cents.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I am told by my friends in the women's liberation movement that it would be the worst kind of male chauvinism to take offence over the appointment of our lady Speaker. Permit me to say that the previous Speaker in this chamber was a person of wisdom, understanding, patience and great competence, and I am satisfied that our present Speaker possesses those same attributes.

I wish now to make a few brief comments on the Speech from the Throne. I am sorry that the Leader of the Government is not present, because I would like to draw a few things to the attention of the government. However, perhaps he may find an opportunity to read my speech.

One of the complaints heard most in British Columbia after the election was that during the course of the election the government listened to everyone except the voters and the ordinary people. In a few brief moments I propose to discuss some of the concerns of ordinary people which have caused some reaction in the West against the government. I have had occasion to talk to many people, to members of trade unions and others. Their major criticism is that when the government spoke about having a dialogue with the people—which is a pretty good word—they should have had a duologue. A duologue is similar to a dialogue, except that it involves both talking to a person and listening to him. Those with whom I spoke said it was a major failure on the part of the government that it did not listen to or understand their concerns.

There is great concern over inflation, and I am pleased that the Throne Speech listed this subject as a priority. I come into contact with large groups of people and members of organizations who say, "We constantly hear about the concern of senior citizens not being able to deal with the problem of inflation gobbling up all their reserves. Why can't the government simply take whatever it requires off the top of the gross national product and give senior citizens a fair standard of living, a decent standard, that will allow them to live in dignity?" They say, "Everyone expects a return on his investment. Surely an investment in your country of the whole of your working life should entitle you to a reasonable return, which is a decent standard of living in your senior years."

That may be an oversimplification of the matter, but it is widely felt that something should be done very quickly. It does not require a lot of computer action or expertise. Whatever it takes to get the job done, we should do it.

[Hon. Mr. Burchill.]

Another major concern in British Columbia is unemployment. This is a problem all across Canada, but particularly in British Columbia for a couple of additional reasons. Many feel that if they are going to be unemployed they would rather be unemployed under the best circumstances. The weather in the West is not as severe as that in the East, so they go to British Columbia.

It is not only a question of the government's failure to deal adequately with the problem of unemployment, but that many of the things that were done were contributing factors to a state of unemployment, the psychology of unemployment. We hear the constant complaint on hot line programs and throughout British Columbia that many people obtain federal government grants that will keep them in employment for the required minimum number of weeks until they can qualify for unemployment insurance. When that is exhausted, they get another grant, and continue the process.

Many people, throughout the whole of their working lives, have at no time engaged in one day on meaningful employment which resulted in any productivity. It is a case of living out of the government's pocket, either on the right side or the left side.

It was a rather surprising experience for me to have a major employer in British Columbia tell me about a serious problem his company had to face. The company had orders for its product, ready-mixed concrete, and trucks were available to make deliveries. I said it was a simple problem to solve: "You have the product, the customers, and trucks. We have 600 or 700 trade union members who are unemployed. Why not put them on the trucks and live happily ever after?" The reply was that it was not that simple. I was told, "Union members will not work because it involves only two days of work a week, and it prevents them from getting unemployment insurance."

The job was not a low-paid one. The rate offered was $6 an hour, amounting to $50 a day. But the company could not get people to work for $50 a day because it could not compete with unemployment insurance.

I do not consider myself a right-wing reactionary, but it seems to me that if decent-paying jobs are available and there are qualified people available, there should be some means whereby they forfeit their unemployment insurance if they refuse to do the work.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: Surely it is not the role of our society to encourage or promote unemployment. I understand that the government is talking about making changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Changes are necessary. I hope that the government will engage in a dialogue, both talking and listening, with people directly involved, who might assist the government in making the right kinds of changes to close some of these gaps.

I cannot think of anything more shocking, as a sometime representative of a trade union, to have to say, "I'm sorry, our people will not go to work because it is only for two days a week." Surely people should work, whether it is for one, two or three days. Unemployment insurance should be paid only when no work is available. The current philosophy which seems to have taken over across Canada must change and the inducement must be to go to work.

There are many other matters that are causing concern. Some of the things I am mentioning do not necessarily reflect my own views, but are the views of many people as to what really is going on.

I do not wish at this time to become involved in the question of prison reform, and so on. There are dozens of examples which highlight the problem. Back home there was the case of a bank robber of some local renown who successfully robbed a bank of $30,000 or $40,000. He was subsequently apprehended and put in jail. After a few years, he came up for parole, but this was denied him. Why? Because he would not tell where he had hidden the loot. Well, that was reasonable grounds for denying him parole; but, low and behold, a few months later he is on a weekend pass. Then he is on a weekly pass. Then he got a federal government grant of $75 a week, which was subsequently raised to $100 a week. Then he was put in charge of a local poverty initiative fund and given another grant of $3,000 or $4,000.

But alas, this story ends with one more contribution to unemployment. The man left the employment of the government, taking with him the grant of $3,000 or $4,000, the loot from the bank robbery, and also a young lady from the local community. They have gone, never to return. A question I am asked when I go back is, "My God, are you all mad down there?"

What possible inducement is there for people to work—I am talking about people who, in the language of the workers, are on the job slugging their guts out every day to provide a meaningful life for themselves and their families—when they read in every newspaper and hear on every newscast another story of someone getting it for free. And when the grant runs out he goes on unemployment insurance. They hear about the funds being washed out and they ask, "When I'm legitimately unemployed, what will there be for me?"

So, I am pleased that in the Throne Speech they talk about a priority of dealing with unemployment. But, in addition I feel it is most urgent that they know and understand the additional contributing factors—this kind of state of unemployment—and the inducement and encouragement not to do anything about it.

Another contributing factor to unemployment—and again this seems to be centralized to a large degree in British Columbia—is illegal immigration. There are literally thousands of people in British Columbia with no legal immigrant status. Many of them are American draft dodgers who have found their way across the border and into our communities. These are some of the complaints that I hear when I go back. They want to know why these people are in their communities and how they got there. Well, they came in as visitors, and then applied for landed immigrant status. They are not entitled to do that, that is correct, so a deportation order is issued. But then they file a notice of appeal and the deportation order cannot be executed pending the outcome of the appeal. Since there is about a two-year backlog of these appeals, these people are obtaining work permits and they are here even without work permits and taking jobs which should be filled by Canadian workers, with the result that they are aggravating the unemployment problem.

Perhaps they oversimplify it, but some people have made suggestions which may have some merit. They suggest setting up a number of ad hoc committees to deal with this backlog. Perhaps members of this chamber could be chairmen of such committees. These committees could then be provided with a copy of the relevant legislation, have a bus on standby, and those that are here illegally could be ferried back across the border, or from whence they came. This would make it possible for those who want to play by the rules—those who want to become landed immigrants and Canadian citizens, and help build Canada and a future for themselves—to come here and feel welcome. We do not need the others.

I am asked: Why do we have to get lost in this hopeless bureaucracy? Why could we not set up 20, 30, 40 or 50 committees and clear up the backlog of these cases in 90 days? I cannot answer that question because, quite frankly, I cannot think of any reason why we cannot do it. This, again, is a contributing factor to unemployment and the things that flow from it.

These ordinary people who could not be heard by the government are saying other things as well. They are saying such things as: "Isn't it amazing that here we are out in British Columbia and the West, and no one really cared about us. We took away two-thirds of the government's seats in British Columbia, and then they discovered the West. What kind of bounties and goodies would we receive if we took all of their seats away?" And they are really somewhat delighted after the fact with the type of response they are getting as a result of expressing themselves in the only way they could.

Hon. Mr. Argue: If they take them all away they get the Tories.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: There are other problems of major concern in British Columbia. Again dealing with unemployment, a major one is the port of Vancouver. I know this has been a topic of conversation. I recall vividly Senator Argue in this chamber last year talking about port facilities to meet the demands of our exports of wheat, and other things. Many of us are concerned about this and have discussed it. In fairness, I should say that at the moment the federal government is taking some positive action with respect to the port of Vancouver in that they are building additional container facilities. I hope this will make us more competitive in the future, but again the question raised repeatedly is: Why did we have to wait until we lost all or much of the business—millions of tons of freight and thousands of jobs—to the port of Seattle and other ports because no action was taken?

Competition comes not only from other sea ports such as the port of Seattle or Portland, or others up and down the coast. We now find our American brothers appear to be more enlightened in their approach than we are in that there is a major container facility being built in Butte, Montana. For those who may not be familiar with the area of Butte, Montana—and this will be called the port of Butte—there is only one ingredient missing, and that is water. It is in the Rockies, and there is no water within a hundred miles. However, they are establishing a port facility there. It will be a truck port, a container port.

They will have a harbour commission, notwithstanding the fact that there is no water, and it will be a major outlet for containers throughout the whole of the Northwest. Again, more of the container freight which should be going through British Columbia and the port of Vancouver, creating hundreds of jobs, is going to be lost to dry land ports in the west of the United States.

While we are very pleased that something is being done, it is my sincere hope that we will have a crash program for the creation of port facilities to make the ports of British Columbia more competitive.

One major missing ingredient in all of these actions is the involvement of those people who have expert knowledge in the field. The people directly involved, whether port operators, longshoremen, trucking companies, and shippers, should form part of the decision making body. Many of us are getting a little tired of these intellectual experts working things out on paper and showing us how it should be without any input form, or consultation with, the people directly involved. That to me is a very important aspect, and it is my sincere hope that these people will be consulted.

There is one other area of concern that I think needs to be examined briefly, and it is what I choose to call this railroad philosophy in wage rates. I suggest that one of the major contributing factors to the problems in the Post Office across the country today is the endeavouring to impose a national formula across the country for every economic area, regardless of competitive wage rates. This, in my humble opinion, simply will not work. Last year when the federal government decided to integrate some of the private contractors into the government service, and we were forced to examine the wage rates, we found that in Ontario where they were integrated they had to take a cut in wages of 21 cents an hour; in Victoria where they were integrated they had to take a cut of 51 cents an hour; and in Vancouver they had to take a cut of 69 cents an hour. These people left a trade union contract which covered them to go into the government service. Again, there was this railroad philosophy that everything must be equalized all across Canada, regardless of the economic factors prevalent in the various regions. In my view and experience in dealing with these types of labour-management problems, this will not work. Until the government recognizes the fact that you cannot promote national unity by locking them all together regardless of the economic factors involved, we will continue to have problems. I feel it is imperative that we change from that kind of philosophy.

I am pleased about the prospect of a Western conference. All too often when we talk about farmers and agriculture everyone assumes—and I must confess I do this myself—that we are talking about wheat farmers or the Prairie farmers, but there is also concern in British Columbia for the dairy and beef farmers. There is a real concern that they might be lost in the national shuffle, so it is my hope that we involve the people directly and talk about these problems.

We hear talk of Western alienation. I know that in this chamber Senator Molgat and others, including myself, have commented on Western alienation versus Western separation. There is nothing to be served by denying that there is some Western alienation. It is not an anti-Quebec feeling or that type of thing. I know that Senator Manning in his speech referred to this concern about Western alienation, but I think it is more a matter of legitimate grievances that exist in the province of British Columbia, in the Prairie provinces, and in Manitoba, which are not being dealt with directly. It is my experience that failure to deal with these kinds of grievances gives birth to prejudice and envy. There has to be fairness in dealing with the problems in these areas. In addition, there has to be the appearance of fairness and concern.

I think one way to solve the so-called Western alienation, or the so-called anti-Quebec feeling, which I do not share, is to deal with the legitimate grievances that exist in the respective areas, whether in the Maritimes—about which Senator Burchill spoke—the Prairies, or British Columbia.

As a final comment on the Throne Speech, I can only urge the government, if they are sincerely interested in dealing with this so-called Western alienation, if they are sincerely interested in solving the problem, to involve the people who are direct participants and who understand the problem. They must examine and understand what the problems are. If they deal with the grievances fairly, I am satisfied they will find that we in the West will be willing and enthusiastic partners in any kind of constructive program.

On motion of Senator Molgat, for Senator Goldenberg, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 23, at 8 p.m.

THE LATE LYNDON B. JOHNSON

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, a little over two and a half weeks ago we noted with great regret the passing of a former president of the United States, Harry S. Truman; and it is regrettable that tonight we should have to recall the passing of another former president of the United States, Lyndon Baines Johnson.

During a period of great difficulty, following the assassination of President Kennedy, he was called upon to preside over the affairs of our good neighbour.

Both President Truman and President Johnson came to the presidency as a result of the death of the president in whose administration each served as vice-president. In the case of President Truman, it was the death of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt which made him the chief governing officer in the United States. The assassination of President John F. Kennedy was the reason for the assumption to the presidency of Lyndon Johnson.

It is ironic, bearing in mind what the war in Vietnam has meant to the United States, to the world, and to the late President Johnson, that today we are confident that we are close to a ceasefire arrangement in that regrettable conflict.

Because of Vietnam, many will find it difficult to assess properly the record of President Johnson as the head of government in the United States. It is a fact that that conflict evoked great divisions, not only in his own country but throughout the world. It is a fact, as the record will show, that there were great differences of opinion between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, and this arose out of our responsibilities as a member of the truce supervision commission.

But whatever may be the intractable qualities of the war in Vietnam we cannot help note that President Johnson was responsible, perhaps as none of his predecessors were, for a civil rights program, and for programs in the field of education and social welfare, including medicare. These are monuments to his efforts, and it is because we are a friend of the United States, not necessarily dependent on it, and a neighbour that we note the passing of these events in that country. It is because we are a friend that we regret the passing of President Johnson and, as the Prime Minister said this morning, with which the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of other parties in the other place associated themselves, the Government of Canada, the Parliament of Canada, and the people of Canada extend to Mrs. Johnson and her two daughters our warmest sympathy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the architect of America's "Great Society" is dead. He is the man, who, as leader of the American Senate, shepherded through that chamber the first civil rights legislation since reconstruction; the man who, as President of the United States, piloted through Congress even more progressive civil rights legislation; the man who did so much for his country in the area of social welfare and education.

His predecessors dreamt of alleviating poverty, of providing free medical care, of giving everyone a fair chance of equipping himself with an education; and what others had dreamt of doing, this man did.

In the area of international affairs he enjoyed some noteworthy successes, most of which dealt with limitation of the use of nuclear armaments, and that is the irony of this man's presidential career.

I remain convinced that he was a man of peace, but history will most likely picture him as a man of war. All his successes on the domestic front will count for naught. He likely won't be remembered so much for what he did as for what he did not do—he did not bring an end to the Vietnam war. That failure brought on his political demise, and that failure will be written indelibly in the annals of history. He gave the people to understand that he would bring about peace by political rather than by military means, and then he proceeded to wage war. Even at the best of times the task of leading a superpower such as the United States must surely not be easy. Lyndon Johnson happened by at one of the worst times; his contemporaries dealt with him harshly and historians will do likewise, unless they look upon the whole of his life and do so with kindness and understanding.

To his wife, to his family and to the people of the United States I offer on behalf of the official Opposition our heartfelt condolences.

POVERTY

REPORT OF COMMITTEE EXPENSES TABLED

Hon. David Croll, Chairman of the Special Committee on Poverty, pursuant to Rule 84(3), tabled a report of the expenses of the Special Committee on Poverty incurred during the Fourth Session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament.

STANDING COMMITTEES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat presented the first report of the Committee of Selection:

The Committee of Selection, appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees for the present session, makes its first report as follows—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

(For text of report see appendix pp. 116-17.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Molgat moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISRUPTIONS IN MAIL SERVICE—STRIKE OF ELEVATOR TECHNICIANS—QUESTION

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government the following questions:

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

1. (1) In view of the continuing irresponsible disruption of the mail service of this country by postal workers, does the government plan to take disciplinary action against those causing the disruption?

(2) What penalties, if any, are charged against wildcat strikers? Do they lose pay for the days they are off? Are any other disciplinary measures taken such as fines and/or discharge?

(3) When postal or other employees engage in wildcat strikes can they:

(a) draw unemployment insurance, and

(b) if so, under what terms or conditions?

(4) What plans, if any, has the government in mind to bring an end to the chaotic situation in the postal service, such as:

(a) making it a crown corporation, or

(b) turning the service over to a private corporation under contract.

(5) Has the government any plans to remove labour negotiations from the Treasury Board?

(6) Has the government given consideration to setting up an independent, non-governmental bargaining agency for employees in the Public Service?

2. In view of the fact that the strike of the elevator technicians has been in progress for some 22 weeks with no sign of a settlement, and because their disruption of service has already cost hundreds of thousands of dollars plus untold inconvenience to elderly people, does the government contemplate any action to bring this inexcusable disruption of service and business to an early conclusion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Those are good questions.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Senator Cameron was kind enough to give me notice last Friday of his intention to ask these questions. I hope that by tomorrow or the next day we will be in a position to give him an answer.

SCIENCE POLICY

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald Cameron moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(d):

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report on the science policy of the Federal Government with the object of appraising its priorities, its budget and its efficiency in the light of the experience of other industrialized countries and of the requirements of the new scientific age and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:

(a) recent trends in research and development expenditures in Canada as compared with those in other industrialized countries;

(b) research and development activities carried out by the Federal Government in the fields of physical, life and human sciences;

(c) federal assistance to research and development activities carried out by individuals, universities, industry and other groups in the three scientific fields mentioned above; and

(d) the broad principles, the long-term financial requirements and the structural organization of a dynamic and efficient science policy for Canada.

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in preceding sessions be referred to the committee; and

That the committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Aird, Belisle, Blois, Bonnell, Bourget, Cameron, Carter, Desruisseaux, Giguère, Grosart, Haig, Hays, Kinnear, Lamontagne, Lang, McGrand, Nichol, O'Leary, Phillips, Sullivan, Thompson and Yuzyk.

He said: Honourable senators, I move this motion in the absence of Senator Lamontagne, who is out of the country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do I understand that the honourable senator is asking leave to proceed with this tonight?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: It is a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A notice of motion? You said "with leave." If you give notice that the next day you are going to move, that is something else, but I am certainly not going to give leave to deal with such a substantial motion tonight, a motion that I have heard now for the first time.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: This is notice for next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, that is all right.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

MOTION TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That, for the duration of the present session of Parliament, should an emergency arise during any adjournment of the Senate, which would in the opinion of the Honourable the Speaker warrant that the Senate meet prior to the time set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to notify honourable senators at their addresses registered with the Clerk of the Senate, to meet at a time earlier than that set out for such adjournment, and non-receipt by any one or more honourable senators of such call shall not have any effect upon the sufficiency and validity thereof.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I just wish to be sure, Your Honour, that you would consult with the Leader of the Government before exercising this power.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order, honourable senators, surely this was moved under notices of motion. I do not know how under notices of motion the sponsor can ask for leave to put a motion. Motions come under item 9 of the Orders of the Day, and I think this comes in exactly the same category as the previous motion by Senator Cameron. Surely it is not possible under notices of motion to ask for leave to move a motion?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I believe this is the standard motion that has been presented in the past. I have no particular desire to proceed with it tonight, but I think we should deal with it before the end of this week so that the Senate can then proceed with its business as it sees fit for the balance of the session.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The point of my point of order was that if it was to be moved with leave it should have been moved in the proper place on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: It is as notice of motion that I present the motion. It comes under the item of notices of motion.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The reason I raised the point was that Her Honour was putting it as a motion, or at least I thought so, but I do not believe that was the intention.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: The intention is to move under notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are not moving it tonight?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: No.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So you do not need to have leave.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: No, we just wish to place it on the Order Paper.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INVESTMENTS IN SOUTH AFRICA—QUESTION

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government, of which I sent him notice this morning. I dare say he will not be able to produce the answer now, but I should be glad if he will take the matter into consideration and consult his colleagues and such officials as are necessary.

The question is in three parts. First, has the Polymer Corporation fully divested itself of its investments in South Africa? Second, if so, on what date and for what sum? Third, what was the cost price to Polymer of its investments in South Africa?

Hon. Mr. Martin: In reply, I can answer the first part of the question, but I cannot answer the other parts without making some research, and that I will do. I am sorry, but I did not receive notice of the question until I heard it tonight. It is likely my fault. I will answer the question in its three parts as soon as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the government leader a question concerning the business of the house. Since the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne will be concluded on Thursday, is it expected that we will have some legislation either coming from the other house or initiated here next week?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I doubt very much if there will be legislation before us next week. I intend to discuss the business for next week with the Leader of the Opposition some time tomorrow. It may be that we would adjourn and not sit next week, and return on February 6. However, we will be in a better position to determine this after I have discussed the matter with my honourable friend.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 18, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Madam Speaker, I want, at the outset of my remarks to join my colleagues in congratulating you on your election to the high office that you now occupy, and which I hope you will occupy for a long time to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I also join in congratulating the mover of the motion, Senator Hicks, and the seconder, Senator Lafond. I have known Senator Hicks for many years. The first time I met him was when he was a young man in uniform at a dinner at the home of another noted Nova Scotian, J. L. Ilsley. I have watched his career, first as Minister of Education for the Province of Nova Scotia and then as the Premier, and following that as President of Dalhousie University. He has graced all of those positions, as I know he will this chamber, by his presence.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the preceding speeches in this debate. I had not planned to comment on the speeches made until I heard my old friend, Senator O'Leary. I have a very high respect for Senator O'Leary, a very genuine respect. I have known and admired him for many years, and I always enjoy his emotional and fiery outbursts. However, I am sorry to say that this time he added venom to the mixture. He allowed, I am afraid, his partisanship to get the better of his judgment. I am referring to his unwarranted attack on the Honourable Jean Marchand.

Honourable senators, I was born in Quebec and I have lived there all my life. I am proud to be a Quebecer, and I think I know my province. Senator O'Leary too was born in Quebec. He reminded us that he is a native of Gaspé. However, if I remember correctly, he left Quebec more than 60 years ago. It was in 1911 that he first represented the Ottawa Journal in the Parliamentary Press Gallery and began a career of great distinction in journalism. True, he came back to Quebec to contest Gaspé in the election of 1925 against the redoubtable Rodolphe Lemieux, but as a citizen of Ottawa. He was, of course, defeated.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why "of course?"

[Hon. Mr. Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I have presented this background, to show the era of Quebec politics with which Senator O'Leary is very familiar. He cited examples of racist arguments in political campaigns and in the press. He told us that Rodolphe Lemieux, his opponent, charged him with being the candidate of the Protestants and the Jews in Gaspé in 1925. He later told us that he took his first communion in Gaspé, and thus led me to wonder whether this was the reason Lemieux thought he had been chosen by the Jews.

It is true that race and language figured in Quebec politics for a long period of time. I see no purpose in raking up the past, however, unless we want to do mischief. Although a Quebecer, I know something of Canadian political history outside of Quebec. I need only remind Senator O'Leary—and he knows much more about this than I do—of the Manitoba school question, Regulation 17 in Ontario, and of the politically powerful Orange lodges with their motto, which I quote: "One flag, one school, one language." Of course, I am not accusing Senator O'Leary of being a member of the Orange Order. But this is all past history. Canada has changed, and Quebec has changed. You will recall we had a "quiet revolution" in my province in the 1960s for which Jean Marchand, a brilliant labour leader, helped pave the way.

When in the course of those years there developed in Quebec a threat to the unity of Canada, it was the same Marchand who came bravely to the fore and entered federal politics. He did not have to do this. He did it because he is a great Canadian.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He did not try to enter through the Conservative Party, because it would have been much more brave for him to try through the Conservative Party.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I did not say he was as brave as all that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is too easy to use a tool like the Liberal Party to do it.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: "Bravely" is the word.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I understand the honourable senator's feelings, but I adhere to what I have said. Jean Marchand did not have to enter federal politics, but he did it as a good Canadian with great courage.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Did he do that as one of the three wise men?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would have taken more courage to enter through the Conservative Party.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Not courage.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: He had more judgment than that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know that.

Hon. Mr. Denis: There are no three wise men in the Tory Party.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I am not making a political speech.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If you are not, you do not know what a political speech is.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I am trying to be fair to a great Canadian.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Who wasn't trying to be fair?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: With great courage Jean Marchand challenged the forces that would promote the disintegration of Canada, and he is continuing to do so today. For this we owe Jean Marchand not the attack we heard the other day, but the gratitude of Quebec and Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Honourable senators, it had not been my intention to preface my remarks with what I have said, but I felt I was provoked—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Ho, ho.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: —by the attack on the Minister of Transport.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is childish.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Now, having been involved for many years in federal-provincial conferences and negotiations, I am going to confine my remarks to one theme which, as I read it, runs through the Speech from the Throne. It is the theme of co-operative federalism. The government proposes continued and increasing consultation and co-operation with the provinces on policies and programs of national concern. This is as it should be.

There is to be a reorganization of existing social security systems in consultation with the provinces. A seasonal capital works project will be undertaken in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities. Measures will be proposed in consultation with the provinces to deal with new direct investment, and the sale of land to foreigners. Meetings are proposed with the provincial governments in the five regions of the country to examine the impact of freight rates on economic development and consumer prices. The Canada Pension Plan is to be improved by agreement with the provinces. There will be action on housing and urban development in co-operation with the provinces. In the field of communications due weight will be given to the interests and concerns of the provinces.

Federal-provincial meetings are proposed on a wide range of subjects including financial and economic policy, health care programs, post-secondary education, income security and industrial policy. There will be a conference with the governments of the four Western provinces on Western economic opportunities to consider programs for stimulating and broadening the economic and industrial base of Western Canada.

On a broader scale, recognizing that the "growing complexity of our society calls for increasing co-ordination of federal and provincial government programs," the Speech announces that:

> The Prime Minister will propose a meeting in the spring with the provincial first ministers to plan further steps in the harmonization of goals, policies, and programs for the benefit of all Canadians, particularly in fields that bear on the responsibilities of both levels of government.

The dates for this and the other principal meetings have already been set.

[Translation]

This is cooperative federalism. The necessity for—> increasing co-ordination of federal and provincial government programmes—is recognized. I repeat, because it is significant, a meeting is proposed—> to plan further steps in the harmonization of goals, policies and programs for the benefit of all Canadians, particularly in fields that bear on the responsibilities of both levels of government.

[English]

Honourable senators, this co-operative federalism is what any federal system must be if it is to function in the best interests of the citizens. It is, of course, not a new policy but one that has been developing in Canada over the years and more particularly in the recent past. Let me cite some figures. The number of federal-provincial committees, including committees of first ministers and other ministers, and committees of officials, increased from approximately 65 in 1957 to 220 in 1970. In 1971 there were 45 federal-provincial conferences open to participation by all provinces, excluding constitutional review meetings. Between January 1971 and September 1972 bilateral contacts with individual provinces at the ministerial or deputy-ministerial level numbered 315. In the latter period there were also some 20 regional meetings between federal representatives and representatives of groups of provinces.

These figures by no means exhaust all federal-provincial consultations in the relevant periods, but they show that the principle of consultation with the provinces which underlies the Speech from the Throne is not new. It is but a continuation of existing practice. To those who point out that the practice has not eliminated tensions, I suggest that tension is inherent in federalism with its two levels of government and divided jurisdictions. It is in fact healthy; it would be unnatural if there were no tension.

[Translation]

In his recent book entitled Pourquoi le Fédéralisme, Professor Gilles Lalande, of the University of Montreal, quotes Professor Daniel Elazar:

> —every federal system necessarily breeds a permanent tension between the central government and the governments of the federated political entities but this state of tension creates an equilibrium which, although variable, is always beneficent and in fact essential to the vitality of the whole. This, however, is conditional upon the existence of a federalist spirit or attitude on both sides.

[English]

Honourable senators, while I believe in co-operative federalism and am pleased that the government has so strongly reaffirmed its intention to adhere to it, I am not contending that it will solve all our problems. But I do suggest that it is the most practical means to seek solutions. To those who see the only solution in a constitutional redistribution of legislative powers between Canada and the provinces, I say with all respect—and I speak with long experience in constitutional negotiations—that, however they may be redistributed, governmental powers in a federal state operating in our complex society cannot be preserved in water-tight compartments.

It is more than 30 years since the Rowell-Sirois Report on Dominion-Provincial Relations said this very effectively in these words:

> No amount of care in phrasing the division of powers in a federal scheme will prevent difficulty when the division comes to be applied to the variety and complexity of social relationships. The different aspects of life in a society are not insulated from one another in such a way as to make possible a mechanical application of the division of powers. There is nothing in human affairs which corresponds to the neat logical divisions found in the constitution. Therefore, attempts to exercise the powers allotted by the constitution frequently raise questions as to its meaning in relation to particular circumstances.

In the same vein, Professor W. R. Lederman, of the Law Faculty of Queen's University, and an eminent constitutional authority, spoke as follows in his submission to the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada:

> So long as we have a federal system at all, the problems of overlap and interpenetrations I have been illustrating are inevitably with us, socially, logically and philosophically. So long as there is a Federal Parliament and Government with some kind of a list of powers appropriate for a central government over the national territory, and so long as there are Provincial Parliaments and Governments, co-ordinate in status, each with a list of other powers deemed appropriate to them in their respective provincial regions, just so long will federal and provincial legislative responsibilities overlap and interpenetrate in wide measure respecting single broad problem areas, one after the other, as life in our country throws up such problems for attention and solution from time to time.

Following an elaboration of his presentation before the joint committee, Professor Lederman came to this conclusion:

> This brings me to my first priority for constitutional development and reform: better and more systematic co-operative federalism. In my view our federal and provincial governments should concentrate their energies, separately and co-operatively, upon the most urgent social issues of our time, urban development, fair taxation, economic growth and so on. Federal-provincial meetings of ministers, officials and experts should deal with the specifics of these problems and the details of what the legislative solutions for them should be. Detailed federal-provincial agreements should be reached . . . and then each government gets on with the necessary legislation and administration as agreed, in accordance with the federal-provincial master plan.

Honourable senators, this, as I see it, is what the Speech from the Throne envisages. With goodwill on both sides, co-operative federalism can only promote national unity. But it will not do so if it becomes a one-sided proposition. In this connection I quote from the opening statement to the Federal-Provincial Conference of July, 1965, by the Right Honourable L. B. Pearson, whose recent death we all mourn. He said:

> We cannot work together if the federal government attempts to encroach on provincial rights. Equally we cannot work together if provincial policies are directed to the erosion of federal jurisdiction and power. We have to proceed by the methods of cooperative federalism, by consultation and cooperation in all matters of mutual concern. Cooperative federalism is not a doctrine that puts all the restraints on the federal government. It does not mean that the federal government should move only after consulting the Provinces while the Provinces accept no similar obligation on their side. Cooperative federalism does not mean that the burden of agreement rests only on the federal government while the Provinces make demands for the withdrawal of the federal government from established lines of action and responsibility.

It is my hope that the negotiations which are now scheduled will be conducted in the proper spirit by both levels of government.

Honourable senators, I now want to draw your attention to a more recent development in intergovernmental consultation. It was my privilege during the recent parliamentary recess to be selected by the three levels of government in Canada to preside over the Federal-Provincial-Municipal Conference on Urban Affairs, the first national tri-level conference since Confederation, which was held in Toronto on November 20 and 21 of last year. The conference was authorized at a meeting of the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers of the provinces in November 1971, which meeting recognized the principle of national consultation on urban affairs and called for "close cooperation between the federal and provincial governments to bring about an effective co-ordination of their respective programs and policies" in urban affairs.

The arrangements for this unprecedented conference were assigned to a tri-level committee consisting of the federal Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs of Ontario and subsequently the Minister of Municipal Affairs of Nova Scotia, for the provinces, and the President of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, acting for the municipalities. The federal government was represented at the conference by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, accompanied by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Science and Technology, and their advisers. Each province was represented by the Minister of Municipal Affairs or the minister having main responsibility in the area, in some cases accompanied by other provincial ministers and their advisers. The municipal representation consisted of two members of municipal councils per province, representing both urban and rural municipalities, two municipal representatives from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the President of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities in his capacity as Chairman of the Joint Municipal Committee on Intergovernmental Relations, and additional delegates and advisers. The representation of the three levels under their three respective co-chairmen totalled 207.

The agenda of the conference was as follows:

1. A review of the problems and challenges facing all three levels of government in the transition of Canada from a rural to an urban society.

2. The role of the three levels of government in meeting the problems and challenges identified, with particular emphasis on the role of local government.

3. The design of effective machinery for intergovernmental co-operation and consultation in meeting the problems and challenges identified above.

Considering, as the Economic Council of Canada pointed out in its 1967 report, that Canada had the fastest rate of urban growth among the industrially advanced countries for the post-war period as a whole, that about three-quarters of our population now lives in urban areas and it is anticipated that the percentage will rise to 90 per cent by the year 2000, that the problems posed by rapid urbanization already exceed the resources of municipal governments, extend beyond the limits of any given urban centre or region and are common to many areas throughout various provinces across the country—considering all of this, honourable senators, you will understand that the agenda of the conference invited long and frank discussions of major problems now facing Canada and each level of government. I need only mention housing, poverty, transportation, environment, social unrest, planning and lack of financial resources.

Some honourable senators may ask how federal responsibility enters the picture since municipal institutions are assigned by the Constitution to the provinces. The fact is that there is hardly a federal department that does not play a role in cities and towns across the country. Consider the impact on urban development of federal responsibility for transport, whether by road, rail, water or air; for housing, through NHA financing of public and private housing; for water and sewage treatment, through financing of infrastructures; and for land use, through development of federal properties affecting urban core renewal. It is thus clear that a concerted policy to deal with urbanization, within constitutional limitations which must be respected, calls for effective consultation involving the provincial governments, to whom primary responsibility is attached, the municipalities, who are closest to the problems of urbanization, and the federal government, whose responsibility extends to various aspects of urban development.

Accordingly, the conference, as I say, the first of its kind since Confederation, unanimously agreed that:

1. Tri-level consultations may be arranged with any province or group of provinces addressed to matters of essentially regional or provincial concern. Such consultations can be initiated and held as soon as the necessary arrangements are made by the three parties concerned.

2. A further national tri-level conference will be held before the end of 1973 addressed to matters of essentially Canada-wide concern, the time, place and agenda to be determined by the three co-chairmen—that is, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the provincial Minister of Municipal Affairs designated by the annual meeting of provincial ministers of municipal affairs, and the President of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities.

3. There will be no permanent secretariat but the federal, provincial and municipal governments agree to second staff on an ad hoc basis to prepare for the next consultation.

I submit, honourable senators, that the Toronto conference marked an important step forward in the process of inter-governmental consultation and cooperation which is so important for the proper functioning of our federal system. For the first time, representatives of the municipalities as such met around the table with representatives of the federal and provincial governments to consider common problems jointly. To those who expressed disappointment that more tangible and immediate results were not achieved, I must point out that the purpose of the conference was consultation. It could not be decision-making. It was the beginning of a wider form of consultation, a forward step from which I do not believe that we will retreat.

Honourable senators, I conclude by reiterating the main point of my remarks. In a country the size of Canada, divided into five economic regions, and with basic language and cultural differences, the increasingly complex problems of society call for continuous inter-governmental consultation and cooperation. This, in my opinion, is the underlying theme in the Speech from the Throne which we have been debating.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, first of all I wish to extend to Madam Speaker, the Honourable Muriel McQueen Fergusson, my very sincere congratulations on her appointment to the Speaker's Chair. It is, I am sure, a great satisfaction to all of us to see her there. I have known Senator Fergusson ever since I came to the Senate nearly 18 years ago. We have been sitting together in this chamber during that time. I appreciated greatly her assistance and encouragement when I was a new senator and beginning to find my way.

Madam Speaker is the first woman to enjoy this high honour at the federal level in Canada. She is well versed in parliamentary procedure, as we all know, and is highly qualified to occupy this position in every way, being a most gracious, dignified hostess and a favourite among her colleagues here. Her appointment was welcomed, I am sure, by every senator, as well as by her friends elsewhere, and by the various organizations with which she is associated. Indeed, her appointment honours all Canadian women.

The Prime Minister made an excellent choice when he appointed the new Speaker of the Senate. He showed, too, that he has faith in the ability of women to hold responsible positions. Now we have the great pleasure of having a favoured woman in the Speaker's Chair in the Senate. As you know, there are now eight women sitting in this House of Parliament and five women in the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I offer my congratulations. Their speeches were interesting. Senator Hicks is a well-known and admired speaker. It is always a pleasure to listen to him. Senator Lafond commands undivided attention. He is factual and he displays a sense of humour that makes his speeches a pleasure to hear.

At this time I extend a warm welcome to all the new senators who have recently been appointed to the Senate of Canada. It is a particular pleasure to welcome Senator Neiman to increase the number of women in this chamber. I feel we have gained outstanding additions to our numbers in experience and ability. I hope you will all enjoy the tenure of your office. I know you will contribute to the work of the various committees and other duties pertaining to the Senate.

To Senator Deschatelets who presided as Speaker during the last Parliament with such finesse and fairness, I extend best wishes that he will enjoy his leisure from the demanding duties as Speaker.

It is a pleasure to see Senator Martin, Leader of the Government, and Senator Flynn, Leader of the Opposition, again in their seats.

Canada has recently lost one of her outstanding citizens, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, whose name will long be remembered throughout the world with great honour and respect. All Canadians mourn the passing of a man who was one of Canada's most outstanding and well-beloved citizens.

A short time ago, too, we were again saddened to learn that the Honourable George Drew had passed away. Mr. Drew served Canada well while his health allowed. Unfortunately his political career was shortened because of ill health, but he will long be remembered by all who had the pleasure of knowing him.

Honourable senators, the Throne Speech has been well and truly debated by the senators who have spoken previously, but there are a few items on which I wish to comment. I was pleased to hear in the Speech from the Throne that the government is taking a long look at our social policy with a view to improving it. This is long overdue and I look forward to satisfactory results. I would like to see the guaranteed annual income instituted, and I hope it will soon become a fact.

I was disappointed that no mention was made about the establishment of day care centres. These centres have become very necessary in this day and age when we have so many working mothers in our society. Day care centres have been established for some generations in such countries as France. Children need special care during the time when they must necessarily be separated from their working mothers.

I was pleased to hear in the Throne Speech that our Prime Minister, among other welcome measures, intends to make more provision for senior citizens by way of low-priced housing, by raising old age and other pensions, and especially to provide for those who cannot work for various reasons. All in all, the Throne Speech should have been well received by Canadians everywhere.

Honourable senators, it is some time since I have spoken in this chamber about my native province of Prince Edward Island. And since this is a very special year for us, and since perhaps some honourable senators are not very familiar with the Island, I decided this would be an opportune time to tell you something of the history and events which have led to this centennial of Prince Edward Island's entry into Confederation in 1873.

The idea of confederation in Canada was not a new one, for as far back as 1810 an enterprising colonist put forth a confederation scheme but nothing came of it at that time. The name of this person escapes me. Perhaps some more learned senators may recall who it was.

In 1814, a Chief Justice of Quebec, Mr. Justice Sewell, submitted a plan of confederation to the Duke of Kent, Queen Victoria's father, without any response. He repeated this plan in 1822. Many leading citizens supported this movement; among them were William Lyon Mackenzie in 1831, and Bishop Strachan in 1838.

In 1849 a group of people calling themselves the North American League met in Toronto and discussed the confederation of the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

In 1854 the Legislature of Nova Scotia adopted resolutions recommending a closer union of the British North American Colonies, although Nova Scotia was not in favour of a confederation of all the provinces at that time but was in favour of a Maritime union under one government.

These efforts for a union might be termed the genesis of Confederation.

Everyone knows, we hope, that the present Confederation started in Charlottetown on September 1 in the year 1864 at a meeting called by Sir Charles Tupper, then Premier of Nova Scotia, when the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island met with the hope of uniting the three provinces.

While this meeting was going on, a ship arrived from Quebec with six ministers of the Crown, headed by Sir John A. Macdonald who proposed a wider union of all British North America. Discussions were carried on further in Quebec, and Confederation was confirmed on July 1, 1867, by the British government in the British North America Act. The Dominion of Canada included the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. In the Confederation chamber of Prince Edward Island's Provincial Building in Charlottetown a bronze tablet bears the following inscription:

> In the hearts and minds of the delegates who assembled in this room on Sept. 1, 1864, was born the Dominion of Canada—Providence being their guide, they builded better than they knew.

When Confederation became a reality in 1867, a great pressure was brought to bear on stubborn little Prince Edward Island to become a Canadian province. The Colonial Secretary urged the Island to join Canada and suggested that otherwise Prince Edward Island might have to pay its governor's salary.

One would think that threat would have the desired effect, but Island people have always been canny and they waited for a better bargain.

The Canadians then imposed a duty on Island exports, but the Island remained firm in its stand. Later, three members of the Canadian Cabinet came from Ottawa to offer more generous terms, but all to no avail. The Island remained obdurate and would not bend to threats or bribes.

The Island at the time of the first meeting in Charlottetown had closer ties with the United States than with Canada. She was afraid that reciprocal free trade would damage her trade with the United States, and the States was too good a customer to lose. Therefore, the Island was as unresponsive to the suggestion of a close economic relationship with Canada as she was for a closer political union.

By 1871 the Island realized that progress must be acknowledged. An act was passed in two days by the Island government of the day for the construction of a railway line from the east coast to the western area of the Island.

The rail line was to cost more than $5,000 a mile and it was badly needed. The roads were impassable at times in spring, autumn and winter. No journey of any length could be made by land in these seasons. Also, it was considered a railway would aid the economy of the Island, trade would increase, resources could be better developed, and communications between points on the Island, and also with the mainland, would be improved.

The cost of the railway was very great for the population of 80,000 people of Prince Edward Island at that time. There had been no overall contract for the job and the line meandered around every little stream and hill in the country. Even in those days, I am told, some graft crept in. The Island realized it could not stand alone any longer, and the only recourse was to approach the Dominion government with amended terms to join Confederation. Negotiations took place toward this end. The Islanders of the day drove a hard bargain, and finally Ottawa consented to their demands and they were received into the Dominion on very generous terms indeed.

Not long before Confederation, the question of Maritime union occupied the thoughts and considerations of the Islanders. There is a story about the early meetings in the Maritimes that would lead one to believe that, in addition to a Maritime union, there were plans to join up with the New England States. That was where their markets for fish and farm produce were, and that is where their relatives were. There is a strong belief that news of this proposal reached the gentlemen up in this part of the world, and that fear of such a union led those gentlemen down to Charlottetown to pay a call during the meetings.

This story was always resurrected when our manufacturing facilities had to close down because of the early freight rates problem. There are still some older people who believe the Maritimes would have been better off in the United States of America. It is not an easy argument to win.

I would like to remind honourable senators that Maritime union ideas never really die. A Maritime union between the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island was discussed at a meeting in 1862, but nothing came of it. However, from time to time there have been suggestions for renewal of the subject until today it is a live issue, although more of an economic question. The premiers of the three provinces now periodically hold meetings and discussions with such a union in view. All honourable senators know of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, which has been operating for a quarter of a century and which has led up to today's Council of Maritime Premiers.

An agreement establishing the Council of Maritime Premiers was signed in Fredericton on May 25, 1971. After the signing of that agreement, the three legislative assemblies of the Maritime provinces passed a bill giving the Council of Maritime Premiers formal status as the agent of the three provinces. With this legislation, all three provincial governments may now enter into agreements to have specific administrative operations or activities conducted on a regional basis by the Council of Maritime Premiers. To date the council has held seven formal meetings, with the result the three governments have agreed on various projects and undertakings which concern the three provinces.

To those of us who believe in Maritime union it would seem that progress is being made toward that end. Union will not be accomplished in the very near future, but it does seem the only possible answer to many of our individual provincial problems.

Prince Edward Island is small in area, about 1,400,000 acres, and the population is 110,000. The provincial flower is the Lady's Slipper. In the past 25 years there has been more change than in the previous 40 or 50 years, but throughout all the changes Prince Edward Island remains unique. It is, of course, the only island province. We have only three counties in the Island and they are royal—Kings, Queens and Prince.

The Islander, individually, welcomes change and progress. Our people are noted for their hospitality. They love an anniversary and welcome the opportunity to celebrate the biggest one of all this year—their own Confederation Centennial.

I was pleased to see in the Throne Speech that the tourist industry was mentioned, and that measures are to be taken to further the development of tourism. This industry is one of the fastest growing of our Canadian industries, and is a source of quick income to many of our people. Each province has its own attractions and money granted from the federal Treasury for this purpose will be well spent. In Prince Edward Island tourism has risen to be our second largest industry, and we believe soon it will be our biggest income-producing industry.

The Island has a charm all its own that lures the visitor back again and again to spend a vacation in this lovely and hospitable spot. Prince Edward Island has many historical places and points of interest, and the fact that this year we are celebrating our own Centennial of Confederation will no doubt make our people and our visitors more aware of the Island's history and traditions.

In many ways the Island is a rich province, for where else in the world could 110,000 people have $100 million worth of highways? We have real estate in our cities, towns and countryside valued at $450 million; $100 million worth of universities, colleges and schools; and $50 million worth of boats carrying passengers to and from our Island. We have two airports where large planes can land, and good air connections with larger centres. Ten million dollars worth of cars travel our roads.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I be permitted a question, senator? Are there any of Acadian descent left on the Island and, if so, approximately how many?

Hon. Mrs. Inman: I do not recall the figures in the last census, but before that about one-third of the total population was considered to be of Acadian descent.

Prince Edward Island has four national parks and 27 provincial and 48 privately-owned campgrounds. Numerous hotels, motels and tourist homes provide accommodation for those who do not care for camping. We have seven golf courses, four of which are rated as championship courses and among the best in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Choquette should go down there.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: Honourable senators, I would like to mention a few of the many attractive places to vist when on the Island. Woodleigh Replicas at Burlington must not be missed by those who come to visit our Island. Here one can see large-scale replicas of famous castles, cathedrals sixty feet long, fully-furnished Dunvegan Castle, a huge reproduction of the Tower of London with full-scale British Crown Jewels, and many other interesting replicas. There is nothing anywhere in the world comparable to this collection of historic buildings created by Lieutenant-Colonel Johnston and his son.

Green Gables, of course, is a very famous spot, made so by our well-known Island author, Lucy Maude Montgomery. I had the pleasure of personally knowing this lady, and I only wish she could have lived to realize how much fame she has brought her native province. Scattered throughout the province other places to visit are museums, wildlife parks, an Indian village, a pioneer village and floral gardens, to name a few.

We have been first to initiate a number of our present utilities. The first telegraph and telephone cables in America were laid between Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick. The first automobile was invented and built on the Island in 1866 by Reverend Father Belcourt. The first divorce law in Canada was passed in Prince Edward Island in 1834.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is that good?

Hon. Mrs. Inman: There are other firsts: The fox industry, for instance, which brought a goodly measure of prosperity to our province until we got too generous and let others into the secret of raising black and silver foxes.

Here, too, you can eat the finest oysters and lobsters in the world, see some of the finest beaches and swim in the warm and health-giving waters which surround us. Our potatoes are the best to be found, and now tobacco farming is a big industry.

Tourists and Islanders alike find their greatest pleasure and contentment in a countryside that is peaceful and quiet. There are no great forests, only woodlots; no waterfalls, only placid streams; no mountains, just rolling hills patterned with productive farms well tilled and producing fine crops. Perhaps that is why one finds here so many people living into their nineties, and sometimes attaining 100 years of age and over. It may be that if you take life quietly you may get to enjoy a bit more of it.

And now a hundred years have come and gone since 1873—a century of events both happy and unhappy. Besides being the centennial of our entry into Confederation in 1873, this is also heritage year. In celebrating 1873, Prince Edward Island is throwing a year-long party—the biggest party we have ever had.

Most people will remember that a larger political entity set this example a few years ago. In 1964, 100 years from the time Confederation began in Prince Edward Island, we celebrated Confederation. Again in 1967, 100 years after some of the provinces united, we had another party. Now in 1973 we plan the final and greatest of all Confederation celebrations—100 years after Prince Edward Island joined Confederation. The Island, as it is called, is the only province in Canada that is entitled to have three such celebrations.

Prince Edward Islanders are proud of their heritage. We have a mixture of English, French, Scottish and Irish cultures, and because of this we hope to preserve for future generations this heritage. An act was passed by our legislature a couple of years ago to study our history, our historic places and items of interest, our historic sites and architectural designs. This act is called the Prince Edward Island Heritage Foundation Act.

Charlottetown, the capital of the Island, is still a quaint city, with many marks of the early colonial days to be seen. Our Government House was built in 1843, a beautiful old colonial style home set in spacious grounds facing the beautiful harbour. Here will be held many of the social events of the coming Centennial.

The first event of great importance was the visit of Their Excellencies, the Governor General and Mrs. Michener, to open the Centennial celebrations. Outdoor festivities began the evening of the last day of the old year with speeches, a large illuminated birthday cake on the square outside Province House and fireworks, followed by a ball in Confederation Centre.

On New Year's Day, the first Governor General's New Year's Levee held outside of Ottawa took place in our Government House. His Excellency was assisted in receiving by our Lieutenant Governor, the Honourable George MacKay. During the morning Her Excellency, Mrs. Michener, received the ladies of Prince Edward Island in old Province House. Mrs. MacKay, wife of the Lieutenant Governor, received with her. Although the weather could not have been much worse, between 500 and 600 women came to be received by Her Excellency.

There will be many outstanding events during the year. The visit of the Queen in July is eagerly anticipated by everyone.

There will be Community Days throughout 1973, being one special day within each Island community to commemorate the 100th Anniversary of Prince Edward Island's entering Confederation.

Since the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are celebrating their own Centennial this year, they will be participating in ours. The famed Musical Ride will be performed in Charlottetown. There will be a fireman's tournament, car rallies and many other attractions.

We are having a dollar minted from nickel to commemorate our entry into Confederation. The design will depict a replica of Province House, Prince Edward Island's Legislative Building, and will be a fine memento of a most important event in our history.

The Island is growing and developing, and a generation hence will be as different from the province we know today as it is from the Island of the time the Fathers of Confederation held their first meeting. But for all the changes that may come, I am sure that we, and the generations after us, will remain Canadians with our culture, our ideals, and our dreams rooted in our history.

Honourable senators, I hope that as many of you as possible will visit my province, and help us celebrate our Centennial.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators will be relieved to hear that, at this hour of the night particularly, I do not intend, or at all events do not expect, to detain the house for long.

The first thing that I should like to do, naturally, is follow the example of other speakers who have taken part in this debate and extend to Her Honour the Speaker my very warm congratulations.

[Translation]

In my opinion, honourable senators, this is one subject on which we are completely unanimous. We are all very pleased with the appointment of Madam Speaker and all very proud of it. I congratulate not only Madam Speaker herself but also the government which made the appointment and the Senate that benefits from it. Succeeding our beloved former Speaker, the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, is no mean task, but I am confident Madam Speaker will do so with distinction, and in a manner which will do us honour.

[English]

I should like, as a native of the Atlantic provinces, to express my special pleasure that a senator from the Atlantic provinces has been appointed to the Chair of this house, and a very particular pleasure in that Your Honour the Speaker is a graduate of Mount Allison University of which both my father and mother were graduates and for which I have a very special affection—not, of course, equal to that of a graduate of that university itself, but nevertheless a special affection, shall I say, once removed.

I should like also to congratulate the various new senators who have taken their seats. I need hardly dwell on what has already been said so fully and so gracefully by other speakers. I am sure we shall grow to admire them more and more and to appreciate more and more the distinguished contributions which they will be making to our proceedings.

That brings me, of course, to the usual congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. Unfortunately, commitments which I had made some considerable time ago—I think, indeed, long before this Parliament was legally constituted—made it impossible for me to be present for the speeches of the mover and seconder, or indeed for most of the other speeches in this debate. I had to be out of town, and I regret very much that I missed these speeches because having looked at them and over them—I can't say that I have read every word of all of them—I have been immensely impressed by the quality of the speeches.

We sometimes hear suggestions that in this chamber we are rather a second rate lot. I can only say that after reading and hearing a great many debates of the other place, even some of the recent debates, I am convinced that the debates in this chamber are fully equal to those that take place in the other place, and indeed often, and I think in this particular instance, perhaps superior.

There is one advantage in speaking at this stage in the debate. That is that nearly everything that needs to be said has already been said, and said more than adequately. I could single out particular speeches which especially impressed me perhaps, such as that of the Honourable Senator Cameron, which I read with great joy, partly because it touched on a number of subjects I was especially interested in. I should like also, before I get into the main part of what I want to say tonight, to thank the Honourable Senators Haig and Belisle for the very kind remarks they made about my being appointed Chancellor of Trent University. That position, of course, is a purely honorary one—honorific one, should I say. It involves no duties whatsoever except presiding twice a year at convocation.

One friend wrote me in some alarm—flattering alarm—that he hoped this would not prevent me from performing my duties in the Senate. I was able to assure him that it would not do so. I told him that it was an ideal job for an elderly gentleman, in that it involved practically no work at all. The most serious burden which it imposes, I understand, is that of wearing a gown twice a year which weighs four pounds. I don't know that I shall appear in the Senate after that bowed down with the weight of the gown if not with the weight of office, but, if I do, honourable senators will understand why I suddenly appear to have become even more decrepit than before.

I am not going to say very much about the content of the Speech from the Throne, partly for the reason I have already mentioned—that it has already been adequately and admirably discussed—and partly because, while it seems to me an admirable menu set before us, a good deal will depend on the actual dishes when they appear before us, which I presume they will, and I hope with enough time for us to eat them comfortably and digest them adequately. The proof of the pudding will be in the eating, and when the various puddings come back before us I may have something to say on those of them where I feel myself competent to pronounce an opinion, if not of a gourmet or a connoisseur, at least of an ordinary person who thinks he has some capacity to judge a good menu, a good plate, a food dish.

Meanwhile, I propose merely to discuss rather briefly certain matters which were raised the other night by Senator O'Leary. I do so with some regret, because my admiration—my constant and unvarying admiration for Senator O'Leary's gifts as a writer and as an orator—was somewhat tempered the other evening by some of the things he said with which, I must say, I find it very hard to agree. On the other hand, I think he has, perhaps, been rather unfairly blamed, so what I have to say by way of commentary may be rather a mixed bag. Some of it he and his friends may like; some of it they may not like.

I want to express myself, also with a certain degree of moderation and temperateness about this. I hope I shall not allow myself to be carried away into injudicious observations. This will probably be easier for me to do in English than in French. Quite apart from the fact that I am more at home in English, the spirit of the language lends itself more to temperate statements, shall I say, at least in those of almost purely English extraction like myself. The spirit of the language reminds me—and I cannot resist regaling the Senate with this en passant—of an occasion when I attended a congress of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The delegate from Cyprus made a most virulent series of attacks in the most violent language upon everything British—the British Government, the British Trades Union Congress, everything and everybody British. When he had finished a delegate from the British Trades Union Congress rose, buttoned his coat and began a most beautifully English speech: "Mr. President, the delegate from Cyprus has discussed the situation on that island with a certain degree of warmth. I trust I shall not be considered immoderate in my statements if I say that he appears to me on certain matters to have somewhat minimized some facts which appear to me to be relevant. Without expressing myself, I hope, in intemperate language, I venture to say that he has, perhaps, overlooked certain facts which may be important." Then I suddenly thought, for what reason I do not know; "I wonder what they are doing with this in the French translation." I twirled the little button on the apparatus for getting the different languages and to my enormous astonishment heard the most furious, violent, Gallic eloquence, and I looked around and there was the interpreter in the interpreter's booth gnashing his teeth and waving his fists, and saying "Ar-r-r." A frightful row was going on, and I said, "Hello, the chap must have changed his tune." So I turned back to the English language and I heard, "On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I fear that perhaps the delegate from Cyprus has somewhat exaggerated . . ." and I looked around and there was the interpreter again gnashing his teeth, waving his fists and shouting at the top of his lungs. Well, I am not sufficiently proficient in French to be able to emulate that gentleman. I shall, I hope, be able to express myself, if not quite in the same fashion as the English delegate on that occasion, at least with some moderation—

Hon. Mr. Martin: You should have heard the French translation of what you were saying a few moments ago.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: That is a privilege I did not have. This business of being partially deaf prevents me from hearing either the witticisms of the Leader of the Government or those of the Leader of the Opposition. It is great deprivation, one of the many imposed upon me by the advance of years.

The main thrust of what Senator O'Leary had to say the other night had to do with the present situation of a minority government. Senator O'Leary was extremely severe upon both the government and the New Democratic Party for their behaviour in this situation. He called the co-operation, if you want to put it that way, that is taking place between them now—the rather tentative co-operation that is taking place between them—a mere alliance for survival. He implied, as many other critics of both parties have, that it was an utterly unprincipled performance. Attacks have been made on the government in that regard and there have also been attacks made on the New Democratic Party, particularly by the Conservative Party. I could not help wondering, as I listened to these attacks, both by Senator O'Leary and others, what the Conservative Party would have done had it taken office in this same position. My impression is that immediately after the election it indicated that it was perfectly prepared to take office in this position; perfectly prepared to take office and try to work this Parliament; to carry on government in this Parliament. Well, I wonder what it would have done if it had taken office and was not prepared to work in some kind of co-operation with the party that holds the balance of power in the House of Commons. It may be argued that it would not have engaged in quite the same kind of co-operation or quite the same degree of co-operation as is said to exist, or appears to exist, at the moment and for the moment, between the government and the New Democratic Party in the other place. But I do not see how it could have lasted very long as a government unless it had been prepared to do something to secure the support of the New Democratic Party, unless, of course, its sole desire was to ride for a fall, and bring on a fresh election at the earliest possible moment. Perhaps that is still its idea. Perhaps it hopes that it can defeat the present government in the other place, take office and almost immediately suffer defeat itself, and then declare, as it would have some reason to in the circumstances, that, in the phrase of Sir Winston Churchill, "The utility of this Parliament is exhausted," there is no further possibility of carrying on the government, both the two major parties having been rejected by the House of Commons. If it is really riding for a fall—if it is really saying that if it gets the opportunity to form a government it will not try to carry on in this present Parliament but will try to get an election at the earliest possible moment—then I think we ought to know this, because this makes a very important and serious change in the whole position of the government and of Parliament. If it is not proposing to ride for a fall if it secures office in this Parliament, then I do not know quite what the basis is for the kind of criticisms that we heard the other night. Of course, this idea of riding for a fall may be a very attractive one, because a good many people in the Conservative Party, and certainly outside it, are under the impression that if a fresh election took place in the near future it would be a repetition of 1958—that the New Democratic Party would practically disappear from the other place and the Liberal Party would be decimated.

Well, I think that is a very unsafe sort of bet. It could happen, it is quite true. It could happen, but I think it would be most unsafe to count upon it. There is a theory in some quarters that elections are held for the purpose of giving somebody a clear majority; that this is the proper answer to the sum which the electorate is called upon to work out; that the proper answer is there in the back of the book and that if the electorate is so stupid that on the first try it got the answer wrong—it does not give somebody a clear majority—then it should be spanked by a series of elections until it gets the answer right. It should be told, "Look, the proper answer is right there in the back of the book. You silly kid, you haven't got it right. Now go at it again. You did not get it right that time, either; try to get it right this time or we will give you another spanking."

• (2140)

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is what happened in 1962, 1963, and 1965.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am coming to that in a moment.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You are always coming to it in a moment.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Just a minute, I am coming to it, if you will have a little bit of patience. I am sorry to ask so often of others a quality I am deficient in myself, I know. This spanking theory does not always work and this is precisely what I was coming to, the point that Senator Choquette has raised.

In 1962 the electorate did not elect any party with a clear majority, so in 1963 they were invited to start again, and then they got it wrong again. They did not elect any party with a clear majority. In 1965 they were invited to do it again and they got it wrong the third time. That is one way of looking at it.

The other way of looking at it is that the people of this country have the right to vote as they see fit. If a certain number of them want to vote for a third party or a fourth party, they have a perfect right to do so. It is perfectly possible that, being strong-minded or strong-willed people, they will decide to go on doing so. The assumption that the third or fourth parties will disappear, like a bad dream, that they will vanish like a nightmare when one wakens up, is a very unsafe assumption. We have had a multiple party system in this country now since 1921. Sometimes it has not been a very important part of our system, but sometimes it has.

For six-and-a-half of our last fifteen years we have lived under a minority government, and I think it is most unsafe to assume that we shall get back to the dear dead days when "every boy and every gal born into the world alive was either a little Liberal, or else a little Conservative." We may, and we may not. We may be in for a long period of minority government and we may have to learn to live with this; and we may have to realize certain things which are fundamental to parliamentary government but which have become obscured in this country by the fact that for so long we have had a stable two-party system.

Elections are not held for fun, they are held for serious reasons of public policy. The public should not be dragged to the polling booth and drenched with election oratory just because it suits the convenience of a particular political party.

The people have some right to a little degree of peace, a small degree of peace, a little quiet between elections, and they have some right to expect that when they have gone to the trouble and expense of electing a Parliament, that Parliament is going to make a serious effort to transact business; and if it cannot do it under one party it had better have a try to do it under the other party. These are simple facts which I think ought to be borne in mind, and which we may have rubbed into us by the force of circumstances before we are very much older.

I do not particularly look forward to this. I think there are both advantages and disadvantages in minority governments. I shall not at this hour attempt to go into that, but I do say that this is the possibility we may have to face and that we may find that, when we say hard words, which we may be inclined to regret sometimes, about the two minor parties, the moment may come when we shall have to don a white sheet, one or other of us, and say, "Yes, we know we said those things, but, after all, if we are going to get business transacted in this Parliament someone has to have your support, and we had better learn to keep a civil tongue in our heads, to the extent we can, in order to get that support."

Senator O'Leary, of course, in effect brushed all this aside by saying that we did not really have a minority government now. That was a little bit of Humpty-Dumpty-ism. "When I use a word," said Humpty-Dumpty, "it means just what I choose it to mean, neither more nor less". I do not know what you could call this but a minority government.

He was very insistent that the popular vote it got was too small. I challenged him. He told me to go and look up the results and analyze them. I looked them up and I did a bit of analysis. I found that instead of the government having got 32 per cent of the popular vote in the last election, it had got, according to the Canadian Press summary, 38.5 per cent. I might add that the Conservative Party got 35.1 per cent. When I suggested that they had got something like 38 per cent, Senator O'Leary said that the government was on trial; that the Conservatives were not on trial, that it was the government that was on trial.

It was at that point that I think Senator Lamontagne said, "What about 1962?" I looked up 1962 and, lo and behold, in that election, the Conservatives—who were the government, and who, according to Senator O'Leary's view, were therefore on trial—got 37.31 per cent of the popular vote. But they continued in office, as in fact they had a perfect right to do. This government has continued in office, as in fact it had a perfect right to do.

This arises from the very nature of responsible government. Responsible government means government by a Cabinet with a majority in the House of Commons. If we come out of an election with no party with a clear majority, while it is perfectly true that a government, any government, can then say, "We are throwing in the towel, we are not going to try, we do not think the new House of Commons will support us," it is also true that the only ultimate way to find out whether a government with a minority representation from its own members can secure a majority in the House of Commons is to try. Let it come, let it ask the House of Commons; and then, if the House of Commons says, "No, you have not got a majority, we want somebody else," you have got your answer; it is your final answer.

Senator O'Leary said that the electorate had said to this government, "Go, in the name of God, go." Well, I think it could quite as easily be said that it had certainly not said to the Conservative Party, "Come, in the name of God, come." I do not think that it said anything very definite one way or another.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The distance was longer to run.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Just a moment. A certain proportion of the electorate voted for the Liberal Party; a rather smaller proportion voted for the Conservative Party; and a considerable proportion, an appreciable proportion, voted for the other parties. The only way to find out, under a parliamentary system—we are not living in a plebiscitary democracy, where we put a question à la Mussolini or à la De Gaulle, to the electorate; we are living in a parliamentary democracy—the only way we could find out whether the representatives of the people wanted a Liberal government or a Conservative government was to put the question to them in the new House of Commons, and that is what we have done. It is Parliament, in these circumstances, that says "Go" or "Come." It is Parliament. In other circumstances, if you have got a clear majority for one party or the other, of course it is the electorate that says it. But in these circumstances it is Parliament which makes the decision and which gives the final answer to any claim that may be made.

I am not going to say anything about the assertion by Senator O'Leary that I knew well—and he added an expletive which I shall spare the house—that in effect what I was saying was not so. I think I probably know as much about this subject as the average person, possibly a little more. And I think that I could, if I had time and if the Senate had patience, set forth at some considerable length my reasons for believing that the version of parliamentary government which I have just been touching on is the correct version.

I want to add just one thing, about this particular part of Senator O'Leary's remarks. He said that he did not know why I had become in this house an apologist for the party which in days gone I had denounced as incompetent or worse. I could tell him why I am sitting here. I told the house when I first came here why I am sitting here and not with the Conservative Party in which I was brought up, or with the NDP—there are no NDP members here, but as an Independent—to whom I might be expected to adhere, in view of my membership in the CCF when it was the CCF.

I can simply say this: that in the past when I denounced Liberal governments and Liberal policies I did it for what appeared to me to be adequate reasons. They still appear to me to be adequate reasons. I don't take back one jot, one tittle, one iota, one syllable, one comma of what I said about past Liberal governments. I am perfectly ready to admit I may have been wrong, but I have not changed my opinions on this matter.

In the words of my old friend and leader, Arthur Meighen, my opinions on these matters "stand unrevised and unrepentant." But as I told the house when I first came here, I did not come here to fight the war of 1870 or the war of 1914. I think on the great questions confronting this country now, by and large the Liberal government is right. At any moment when I become convinced that it is wrong I am perfectly prepared to get up and denounce it in as strong terms as ever I denounced any government. And the proof of that, or a small indication of it, is that during the last session of this house I got up and attacked the government very strongly on a particular matter where I thought it was wrong, and I am perfectly prepared to do so again. But it will require sufficient cause to make me do it.

I strongly resent any suggestion that I have turned my coat, especially—though this was not suggested by Senator O'Leary, who merely professed himself baffled—especially that I have turned my coat because I have had some inducement to do so. I want to make it perfectly clear that I could have sat in this house as an Independent. That was made plain to me by the Prime Minister himself. And I have had some reason to believe since that various people prominent in the Liberal Party would have been better pleased if I had sat as an Independent. That is a view which I can understand. At any rate, I did not think it would be quite playing the game.

Now, I just want to finish with one very brief comment on the other matter which Senator O'Leary devoted some time to, that is, the question of the attacks in past days in Quebec on the Conservative Party for racism.

I must confess, honourable senators, that I am not very happy about what has been said, in fact, with most of what has been said, either in the other place or here on this question of racism and the alleged English Canadian backlash and so forth in the last election. I am not by any means sure that the various statements made on the subject have been particularly judicious or happy. This may be a prejudiced view.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: But this is the way I feel.

At the same time I must confess that I felt a certain degree of sympathy with what Senator O'Leary said on this subject. Senator Goldenberg has said that he was provoked—he himself was provoked—by what Senator O'Leary had said about the Minister of Transport, Honourable Jean Marchand. I am not altogether surprised by that, although I do not think that really Senator O'Leary was so much attacking Mr. Marchand as suggesting he was rather new, relatively new, to parliamentary life and did not perhaps realize quite all the history of this subject. But I think that Senator O'Leary was himself provoked by the tone of some of the observations that had been made in the other place and I cannot say I altogether blame him. After all, I cannot say with Senator Goldenberg that I was born in Quebec and lived most of my life there, but I did live there for 16 years. I lived there during most of the 1920s and 1930s and I can remember very vividly the kind of attacks that were made in those days on the Conservative Party in the province of Quebec. I think that every word Senator O'Leary said about them was true and, indeed, could have been amplified and extended at some length. I have a very vivid recollection of that, and I must say that for anybody who went through that it was a horrible experience. I can't say that I went through it personally, myself, except that in the early part of those years I was Vice-President of the McGill Conservative Club and had a certain amount of personal interest in the thing that way, and I was, of course, a devoted friend, and at that time follower, of Mr. Meighen.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You have had a colourful career.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Yes. Variegated. Psychedelic, shall we say. But I can remember what went on and I must say that for anybody who went through that experience, as Senator O'Leary did, or, I think, as did most Quebec Conservatives of Senator O'Leary's generation or my generation, and I might add some French Canadian Conservatives from outside Quebec, the things that took place then are impossible to forget and very hard to forgive.

I am rather sorry that Senator O'Leary raked the thing up, but I think in extenuation of what he said this might perhaps be mentioned. And there was one factor that he did not mention and that was that during the time these attacks were taking place—and they were most gross and unprincipled attacks in many cases—that during the time these attacks were taking place, in the rest of the country the leaders of the Liberal Party were talking in lofty and, indeed, one might almost say, ecclesiastical tones about national unity. This was another thing that made it very hard to bear.

But I think the less we say about these things now the better. These should be "old, unhappy, far-off things, and battles long ago." And I am inclined myself to say, perhaps because of the variegated career to which Senator Choquette referred, I am rather inclined myself to say to both the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party on this subject, "Let him among you that is without sin cast the first stone," and also to add, "Go and sin no more."

As for the NDP in this matter, I can only observe that I am not well enough aware of what their Quebec wing, such as it is, may now be doing. I hope it is behaving itself with the immaculate purity which one expects of that party, but I confess to some lingering suspicions that perhaps there have been times when people in the Quebec wing of the NDP have not always been quite as lofty, pure and upright in this matter as they might have been. Perhaps, therefore, the exhortation to the two old parties to consider these things as past, long past now, and to desist from this kind of thing in future, perhaps these exhortations should be addressed also to the NDP. I don't know. They can decide for themselves whether they have been culpable in this matter and, if so, what they propose to do about it.

I think, honourable senators, that that is all I have to say at present. It may seem deplorable that I haven't got something to say about the particular items from the Speech from the Throne, many of which are of tremendous interest to me as well as to everybody else in the country, but I think I should have the opportunity to comment on those in detail when they come before us in detail with the specific proposals which the government has to offer. At present they are couched in somewhat general terms. I find them attractive; I find them agreeable; I find them, I think I can say, truly liberal, with a small "l". I cannot see that there is anything in them that is contrary to liberal principles. If somebody says, "Well, the Liberal principles seem to have taken on, shall we say, an extra vigour since the election," I can only paraphrase the words of Dr. Samuel Johnson, when somebody complained that Dr. Doddridge, I think it was, or some personage who was being hanged, had issued an apologia for his career just before his hanging, which many people thought he was quite incapable of writing, and some people suspected that Johnson himself had written it for him. It is a horrid thought to think that there were those immoral creatures, ghost writers, as long ago as that. Johnson's reply was, "Sir, when a man knows he is to be hanged in 24 hours, it concentrates his mind wonderfully."

Well, perhaps when a government knows that it may be hanged in a fortnight or a month or two months it concentrates its mind wonderfully and perhaps the result of this is that we have now a rather more forthright and, in my judgment, a more liberal Speech from the Throne than we have had in some past years.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 102.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

Tuesday, January 23, 1973.

The Committee of Selection, appointed to nominate Senators to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present Session, makes its First Report, as follows:—

Your Committee has the honour to submit herewith the list of Senators nominated by it to serve on each of the following Standing Committees, namely:

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

The Honourable the Speaker, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Belisle, Cameron, Choquette, Côté, Fournier (De Lanaudière), Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Gouin, Heath, Hicks, Kinnear, Lapointe, McIlraith, O'Leary, Quart and Yuzyk. (16)

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

The Honourable Senators Asselin, Bonnell, Bourque, Duggan, Fournier (Restigouche-Gloucester), Gouin, Greene, Haig, Heath, Isnor, Macdonald, McGrand, Michaud, Neiman, O'Leary and Sullivan. (16)

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

The Honourable the Speaker, the Honourable Senators Heath, Inman, Langlois, Macdonald, Norrie and Welch. (6)

JOINT COMMITTEE ON REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

VIETNAM

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENTS—CANADA'S ROLE IN INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF CONTROL AND SUPERVISION

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs will shortly be making a statement in the other place following the announcement last night by the President of the United States that a cease-fire in Vietnam has been initialled and will solemnly be signed on Saturday.

In view of the importance of this matter, the Leader of the Opposition concurs that the Senate, as one of the Houses of Parliament, should show its responsibility in this matter, one of the most vital in 18 years. All Canadians will share the relief of the government at the historic announcement made last night by President Nixon, from which it would appear that at long last a cease-fire will formally be effective by the end of this week. This could open the way to the peace which we all hope will result.

The question is now, honourable senators, what can the Canadian contribution be to ensure peace in this situation? We have to ask ourselves what we can do and what is the most effective way in which we can assist in bringing about an effective peace. We will also have to consider what additional help we are prepared to offer in the task of rehabilitation and construction of that war-torn divided part of Indo-China, North and South Vietnam.

The government has already indicated its willingness to assist in providing relief and aid. As a matter of fact, in 1966 the then government announced, following an invitation by the late President Johnson, its decision to assist in the development of the Mekong River area, and indicated that at the end of hostilities Canada would be prepared to join other countries in rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts in Vietnam. I do not need to inform honourable senators how widespread the destruction in Vietnam is. We in Canada have had some considerable experience in providing aid to South Vietnam, although we have not yet any experience in providing aid to North Vietnam. We do not yet know what will be asked of us; we do not yet know what will be the extent of the program we might want to enter into in relation to the programs of other countries. We will have to find the answers to these questions having regard to the situation which will undoubtedly develop very shortly.

On November 2, when it looked as though a cease-fire was approaching, the Government of Canada made a proposal which was intended to meet the apparent concern of the parties involved that there should be some form of international presence immediately on the ground from the moment of the cease-fire. The proposal was that for the initial period we would be prepared to place at the disposal of the newly proposed international supervisory body the present Canadian delegation to the existing international commission; and we would be prepared, likewise, to augment it if necessary. We took this position because we were anxious to assist the initialling of the cease-fire agreement without delay. We did not want in any way to be a party to delay.

That is the problem facing us now. The government subsequently stated the conditions and the considerations it would require before it could take a decision on a complete participation in the newly proposed supervisory role and commission. My colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just received the documents embodying the agreement signed by the United States and North Vietnam. He has not yet had an opportunity to study these documents in detail. A first look suggests that the conditions we imposed and which were communicated to the four parties have, to some degree, contributed in the circumstances that led to the initialling of the cease-fire agreement a short time ago.

These documents are complicated. It is not possible to say right now how fully they meet our four conditions, and we realize that an immediate answer will not now be possible. In any event, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is going to Washington tomorrow and he will have an opportunity of discussing this matter with Secretary Rogers.

I may say that the cease-fire agreement is not expected to be signed by all four parties until Saturday of this week. That will be only a few hours before the agreement envisages an international presence on the ground in Indo-China.

So the government is faced with this situation. It can accept with whatever reservations are necessary the role the parties have defined. We are in a position to do this but it would mean committing Canada to full participation before we know with any certainty to what extent the conditions that Canada laid down are to be met. At the other end, we could refuse to participate because we do not yet know the degree to which our conditions are being met. To do this would risk our standing in the way of an end to the fighting, which all of us want.

The government, therefore, is taking the position that these extremes are unacceptable. We have decided that when the cease-fire documents have been accepted by all four parties, and when all four parties have clearly invited Canada to take part, the government will then confirm that Canada is ready to take part initially.

This initial participation will be consistent with the position that the government announced on November 2 last. We will be prepared to serve on the limited basis for an initial period of 60 days. We will be prepared during that period to do what we can to discharge the obligations which would flow from full membership in the new commission. Full and formal reply to the invitation for full membership will, however, have to await a number of things. First, it will have to await a very thorough study and analysis of the agreements and of the full nature of the parties' commitments to the agreements. It will have to await the lessons of our experience in participation in the initial stages.

This is a matter in which we all have a vital interest and one which Parliament will have to discuss. Arrangements are being made in the other place for a debate on this matter and, undoubtedly, that may well be the wish of this house. In any event, I paraphrase and give the substance of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs is now telling the other place. I believe that in a matter of such vital importance this is the proper course for us in our deliberations here to take.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, of course we on this side as well as everyone else in Canada rejoice at the prospect of a cease-fire or truce to start next Saturday, January 27, in Vietnam. The negotiations have been long and arduous. At one time we thought we would have that cease-fire or truce for Christmas. Practically a month has elapsed since then and we have to be cautious in our optimism. Certainly, we must be more cautious than the Leader of the Government. I would say that the statement which he read was well prepared and very typical of him. The style is reminiscent of the late William Lyon Mackenzie King. It covers all the possibilities. He said that we are prepared to refuse, or we are prepared to accept on certain conditions the invitation to play a part in the enforcement of the truce and cease-fire. This is not much of a commitment. But I understand that this is the only thing that can be said at this time. However, I am sure you will agree it is not very forceful.

The Leader of the Government has recalled that we assisted South Vietnam in many ways in, let us say, the arrangement of her economy, by certain projects. Some of these were under way when I was Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and I took some interest in them about 10 years ago—that's a long time ago. But, of course, before we can resume our help towards the restoration and reconstruction of Vietnam, be it South or North, we have first to be assured that peace exists there in fact. I can only rejoice that peace is to be restored to that troubled part of the world as of this Saturday, that a truce is to be agreed to and a cease-fire come into force. I am also pleased that Canada is willing to play its part under conditions as yet to be determined in supervising that truce. Optimism should be the order of the day, but cautiousness should not be thrown to the winds.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question? Is there any limit placed on the duration of our participation in this matter?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Oh yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Sixty days.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No; that refers to the preliminary portion. If we do join the proposed new supervisory body, we have indicated that one of the conditions should be a two-year tenure.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether I understood him to say there will be an opportunity for discussion of this matter in this house? It seems to me it might be highly desirable. I suspect there are a large number of honourable senators who, unlike myself, are extremely well-informed on this subject and might have very valuable contributions to make.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It was proposed that there should be arrangements made for a debate on this matter in the other place, and I would assume that similar arrangements will be made in this house.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government: Has there been any discussion on who will pay the cost of any Canadian participation that takes place?

Hon. Mr. Martin: All those arrangements are contained in a protocol that has been discussed between the four parties who will be called upon to sign the cease-fire arrangement on Saturday. These documents have just come in. It is not possible to give a firm answer now, but we have been told by one of the parties, as of some weeks ago, that we would bear our share of the cost along with other members of the commission, that these costs would be borne by each country.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The Leader of the Government says "our share of the cost." Our share of what cost?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The cost of the operation of the commission.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Has there been any discussion with other people, interested in the peacekeeping operation, regarding sharing the cost?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is not really a peacekeeping operation, in the sense that Cyprus or UNEF was.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course it is.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No. It is a peace-observation group. It is not a military or para-military body. These men will not go as military personnel. They will go about as observers supporting the international supervisory control body.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Surely the Leader of the Government is not suggesting that in future the term "peacekeeping" must have that particular connotation he suggested. Surely this is a peacekeeping operation.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Asselin: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether the same conditions will attach to this Commission as those we already have with regard to the Control Commmission with India and Poland? Will we have the same title, the same observer role?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, basically the conditions will be the same. The ones we have just submitted are precisely those we had suggested to the Geneva Conference in 1954.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Who will be the fourth subscriber to the agreement on Saturday? I understand the document will be signed by South Vietnam, North Vietnam and the United States.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The Viet-Cong, Hanoi, the Government of South Viet Nam and the United States.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What definition is given to Viet-Cong in that treaty or agreement?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Frankly, I could not say without looking at the documents; but I believe we will be in a position to circulate the documents in question as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: You mean here, in the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Martin: In Parliament.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Mr. Molson: The Leader of the Government said that this would in some sense be a military force. I am rather disturbed as to who, in effect, will protect our people that we send there, if we send the number, as was suggested last evening, of some 400 or more. If they are an unarmed group, what form of protection will they benefit from in moving around a territory which is so badly divided, so heavily armed, and so highly booby-trapped. How will our people be protected?

Hon. Mr. Martin: In the way that they have been for the last 18 years. When the International Commission for Supervision and Control was set up in 1954 as a result of the Geneva accords, it was decided that the three countries involved would serve in an objective capacity on the commission. The individuals serving on that commission, while appointed by the respective governments of Canada, Poland and India, have, nevertheless, been there as representatives of the Commission. They sit as civilians in an individual capacity. They were supported by military personnel who were not armed and whose purpose was to assist in reporting on the extent to which there had been an observance of the cease-fire. That is the character of the new organization. It is not a military body, as I said a moment ago, as is the case in Cyprus where the soldiers carry arms, and as in the United Nations Emergency Force where they were armed. That is not this arrangement. It is simply a supervisory body called upon to report on the extent of the observance of the cease-fire agreement and to report on violations.

An Hon. Senator: To whom?

Hon. Mr. Martin: To a body not yet determined. One of our conditions is that there be a body to whom they can report. In the case of the present commission, they report to the chairman of the Geneva conference, the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom. In this case we say that there must be some body to whom they can report. It could be the Security Council, or it could be that an international conference may have to come into being to deal with further problems of the peace.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Could I ask the Leader of the Government if he can tell us how this group of 400 Canadians is supposed to function? Are they all to be kept together in one group, or are they to be split up into smaller groups and scattered around different parts of the country?

Hon. Mr. Martin: As to the number, I have said nothing because there has been no decision on that. One side may take the view that it should be a limited number; the other side may take the view that there should be more personnel involved. That is a determination yet to be made. I do not think I can specifically answer as to the distribution of functions and of personnel.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I do not wish to make this a debate, but if this is merely an operation to observe, why soldiers? Why 400 armed soldiers, if it is merely to observe and report? I could get you 400 good reporters who could do that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Because they are trained for this. Not only have we got experience on this commission in the three Indo-China countries, but we have had experience in the United Nations observation group in Lebanon in 1958; and we have had experience in connection with the United Nations supervisory and truce organization in the Middle East. These soldiers are not there in a military capacity but are trained and organized to do the particular job of observation.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, at the outset of my remarks I feel I have to extend my heartfelt thanks to the Prime Minister of Canada for having chosen me to sit in this house. Such an honour reflects not only on my family but also on the riding of Charlevoix which I had the pleasure of serving for over 11 years.

But such an appointment was also meant in the Prime Minister's mind to increase the Official Opposition representation so as to assure within the Senate the progress and development of a healthy democracy which is essential to the survival of this institution.

As was said the other day by my leader, the Official Opposition will never be able to operate efficiently if it cannot get at least 20 per cent of the members of this house.

• (1430)

[English]

I would like also, honourable senators, to associate myself with all of you in congratulating Madam Speaker on her appointment to this high post. A better choice could not have been made.

I had the honour, Madam Speaker, when we were members of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, to work closely with you. Your great talent and knowledge of the problems of this country brought to that committee a very effective contribution. There is no doubt in my mind that you are highly qualified to discharge your present responsibilities. May I say to you that you have in advance my full co-operation.

[Translation]

Honourable senators who participated in this debate referred to the outstanding work accomplished in this house by the former Speaker of the Senate, Senator Deschatelets. While I did not have the opportunity to serve under Senator Deschatelets, I had the pleasure of knowing him when he was a member in the other place and I always admired his courage, his forthrightness and his integrity. I therefore want to join other senators in saying that although I might be here somewhat too late to benefit by his leadership as Speaker of the Senate, I still want to join my other colleagues in thanking him for his outstanding work as Speaker of this house.

I also want to tell those colleagues who were appointed to the Senate at the same time as I was that ours is perhaps an uncommon responsibility. Four of us who came here are former ministers: Senator Côté, Senator Greene and Senator Laing, with whom I had occasion to cross swords in the other place. I have been told that here we do not have many occasions to do so. However, as a new senator, it is my intention, as it is no doubt that of my colleagues, to speak my thoughts frankly and even though the same climate of confrontation we had in the other place may not prevail here I believe our exchanges will be direct, honest and fruitful for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Don't start off too fast.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: But we were lucky as new senators to have with us Senator Neiman, appointed here at the same time as ourselves. I see that some senators are already looking at us with jealousy because we have brought with us, into this house, charm, graciousness and competence.

I express congratulations to the movers of the Address for their efforts in the defense of a cause which is now challenged.

I listened with great respect to the speech made the other day by Senator Hicks. If Senator Hicks had been here when the appropriation bill was brought before this house, I feel that his comments would have been much stronger, much harsher. Just the same, I want to congratulate him for the frankness with which he expressed himself.

As for Senator Lafond, I must say that I met him for the first time in the Committee on the Constitution, and, although our views differ regarding the constitutional future of Canada, he is in my opinion the watchdog of the rights of the French Canadians living behond that river. I congratulate him for his contribution.

[English]

I wish to thank Senator Martin for the kind and complimentary words of welcome he had for me when he spoke during this debate. I was deeply moved. The good senator is like a fine wine; he gets better with age.

Hon. Mr. Martin: On a point of order. I'm not aging.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It doesn't show.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I listened attentively to his speech. He is more fluent and convincing now than he ever was.

[Translation]

Indeed, the Leader of the Government has not lost any of his great qualities as a parliamentarian which he had when I sat with him in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is a long time ago.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: He has retained his enthusiasm, his ability, his cleverness in not exactly answering questions. However, I would like to tell him that under his leadership, the Senate has found a new impetus and has known a revival.

I am pleased, honourable senators, to serve under the Honourable Jacques Flynn, my leader and personal friend, who has helped me the most to go through difficult times, a man of great humour and shrewdness who knows how to handle himself in debate. Our party is lucky to be led in this house by a man of his caliber. I tell him and my colleagues that our task as members of the Official Opposition is surely to criticize the government policies to improve them, but it must be done in a constructive way solely to serve the best interests of the country.

I am grateful to have been chosen to come to the assistance of my party in the Senate, but I must warn the Leader of the Government that I remain faithful to the principles which have always been mine and which have led me in the past to fight fiercely against the philosophy of the Liberal Party and I do not anticipate the day when that will change.

Honourable senators, the government wants to give the impression that it has recently been converted to reason. They are now advocating the solutions that the Conservative Party was offering during the last electoral campaign. How can we believe in this belated conversion, the purpose of which is only to remain in office?

For four years, I have had the chance of working with the Leader of the Official Opposition, Mr. Stanfield, and of discussing with him the problems that are before the country today, and I am deeply convinced that Mr. Stanfield would be an excellent Prime Minister. This man is understanding, humane, open-minded, capable of dialogue, while at the same time willing to accept compromises, all qualities that are essential, I think, for a man who wants to become Prime Minister, and whose major goal is preserving national unity.

During the last electoral campaign, the Conservative Party submitted a precise, clear-cut program, involving new ideas and practical solutions that would put an end to this social and economic stagnation created by this government.

[English]

Honourable senators, I am one of those who did not know too much about this place before I came. I have realized since my arrival that the country has available to it in this chamber quite an impressive pool of legislative talent. The quality of the debates is superior and the reason, I think, is quite simple. Those who participate are not doing so in order to impress the voters back home. We have men in this chamber who are recognized authorities in their fields, men who enjoy national and international reputations. I look forward to listening to those I have not already heard.

Now it may be presumptuous of me as a junior senator to make this suggestion, but I am determined to do so anyway. If the Senate is to regain the prestige it enjoyed several decades ago, if the Senate is no longer to be ignored, then it will have to take a much more active part in the affairs of the country.

I realize full well that the prime responsibility of this chamber is legislation. We must go over everything that is sent to us from the other place with a legislative microscope. We are to look for deficiencies, we are to look for ways of improving bills before they become the law of the land. This we must do. And to this, we must devote all the time necessary. Nothing else may be permitted to interfere with the proper carrying out of our legislative responsibility.

This having been said, however, I think you will agree with me that our main task is not likely to take up all the time at our disposal. Surely time can be found for initiating legislation. The talent that sits in this chamber cannot be satisfied with merely correcting the mistakes and shortcomings of the other place. Surely the Senate can offer, either by way of legislation or in the form of committee reports, its own solutions to the social and economic ills that beset this country.

I don't have to be reminded that this was done in the past. I don't have to be reminded, for example, of the excellent work of Senator Croll's committee or that of Senator Everett's. Nor does it have to be pointed out to me that these reports were not given serious consideration by the Trudeau government. I know all that. I know how frustrating and insulting it can be to have the fruits of our labour ignored or rejected out of hand.

[Translation]

I should also give as an example the work done by the special joint committee of the Commons and the Senate on the constitutional review. The committee was made up of members of Parliament and senators who travelled all over the country and met everywhere they went experts in all fields, people who expressed new ideas on a new federalism, and, honourable senators, the people of Canada paid a great deal for that committee. It produced an extraordinary report which was tabled in the House of Commons and in the Senate, and since then, practically nothing has been said on the subject by government members, those responsible for making this report available to the House of Commons and the Senate, so that it would be looked fully into and then appropriate recommendations made to the government.

[English]

I don't think we are entitled to give up. Our responsibility is not to a shortsighted government, but to the people of Canada. It is our responsibility to try and make this country a better place to live in. To this end, we must persist in our efforts to find solutions and to have them accepted. The country cannot afford the luxury of having us around, if we are going to sit back and feel sorry for ourselves.

Senator Martin had much the same to say about the Senate when he spoke in this debate. I could not help remembering, however, that it was the same Senator Martin who was government leader in December 1971. It was he who carried out the instructions of the Trudeau government and rammed a 700-page tax reform bill through this chamber in a matter of hours.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Such is not the case. After a study that lasted over three months.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I do not know if the study lasted three months in the Senate but all I know is that the tax bill was approved in two to three days here in this house while we had tried by all means in the other house to amend that legislation. We had made representations to the government to change certain aspects of the bill which we thought were unfair to the Canadian taxpayers but we did not succeed, and the Canadian taxpayers, the Canadian citizens, hoped that the Senate would put through the amendments which we had tried to introduce in the House of Commons. What frustration, honourable senators, when the population found out that such a complex bill had been passed in a few days here in the Senate!

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I do not know if the honourable senator is aware of it, but the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee started examining that bill on February 24, produced a preliminary report and a final report at the end of November, while the House of Commons never did send the bill to a committee of that house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order. Would Senator Molgat allow me to point out to him that, before it was sent here, the bill examined by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee had not been amended by the House of Commons and we had to do everything all over again when the bill came back—which we had failed to do in the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce under the chairmanship of Senator Connolly (Ottawa-West) because Senator Hayden did not want to be there and pass the bill in one day.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I do not want to start debating this, but the Senate recommended many changes to the House of Commons—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Which were not implemented by the government.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Which were not implemented afterwards. I did not want the Senate to look as if it had failed in its duty in that case; it did well with the bill and, without commenting on the other place, perhaps even with more accuracy.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Nothing has been done.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: This answers Senator Molgat. The question I referred to . . .

Hon. Mr. Côté: That was a good bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Côté was in the House of Commons and I am happy to see him defending the government, truly happy.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Does Senator Côté wish to speak?

Hon. Mr. Côté: No.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I take Senator Molgat's word. If the committee made recommendations to the House of Commons and if these were not accepted by the government when the bill was referred to us for consideration, the Senate should have rewritten its amendments and convinced the government to accept them.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would the honourable senator allow me a question? Does the senator not know that approximately ten of the Senate's recommendations have been accepted by the government?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: If that is so, it is not enough and the government leader is aware that the appropriation bill could be further amended in the people's interest, which was not done here, and the citizens are not satisfied with it.

Senator Hicks underlined some deficiencies of this legislation when he moved the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne; I think I will suggest to Senator Martin that he read Senator Hicks' speech; he will find there the answers to my remarks. I was talking about the prestige that the Senate should maintain.

• (1450)

[English]

The Senate was made to look ridiculous on that occasion. The experts sat here as members of this chamber, and were not given the opportunity to really go over the bill. Incidents like that have made cynics of many senators. They have little faith in a government leader who preaches reform and increased participation, as he did when he took the floor to debate the Throne Speech, only to forget all about it when it does not serve his party's interests. Some of his own followers are still ashamed of the way in which the government acted on that occasion.

But, in spite of this lack of sincerity on the part of the government, in spite of its lack of respect for this chamber, we must keep trying. It is an obligation we have to the people who pay our salaries and rely on us to use our knowledge and experience to help in solving the country's problems.

[Translation]

Here, before I go any further, I should like to say something incidentally.

Last night, I listened to Senator Goldenberg and I could not believe that he should have opened his remarks by making an attack, to which I want to take exception, concerning the speech made by Senator O'Leary in this house, and particularly . . .

Hon. Mr. Côté: You are sensitive, senator.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You people are rather callous.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I regret to say, however, referring to an alleged attack made by Senator O'Leary against Minister Marchand who sits in the other place, that I cannot accept Senator Goldenberg's remarks.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You must leave him on his pedestal.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: If I remember well, when Senator O'Leary referred to Minister Marchand, he was not referring to him as a person; he never criticized his credibility or his honesty as a politician.

He simply wanted to draw attention to the atmosphere that resulted or might result from this tendency of members of the government to infer from the results of the last election a kind of war between English and French Canadians. He never wanted to criticize this minister personally, and I would not either, because I have the utmost respect for Minister Marchand, who stood up for ideas, as I and others did in Quebec in the past; he, as myself and others, has always thought that the people from Quebec had a role to play in the House of Commons; he, as myself and others, has tried to do a good job in the House of Commons but, honourable senators, we, in the Conservative Party, have never wept over losses, and God knows that we would not have one tear left had we wept over our losses in Quebec. To be defeated is no reason for seeking arguments to explain that defeat as certain politicians did. This is why I do not agree with Senator Goldenberg's criticism of Senator O'Leary as regards these speeches on national unity and racism, which were delivered in the House of Commons, not only by government members but also by a few Opposition members. Moreover, I would say that this kind of statement, honourable senators, can only divide instead of uniting our country. God knows that in the past we, Conservative members from Quebec, had explained our defeats. Between 1958 and 1962 we did the impossible. In 1958, we were 50 members from Quebec, people who had left well paid positions to come and fight in the House of Commons, in an attempt to convey the message from Quebec; people who had urged the government to recognize bilingualism in the House of Commons as well as in the Public Service; people who had fought a gigantic battle, who, I might say, between 1958 and 1962 had made a breakthrough in the area of bilingualism. What was the reward? The reward was, honourable senators, that in 1962 three quarters of our troops were defeated in Quebec. Yet, we did not come back in 1962 to tell the nation that Quebecers were against us, that our endeavours and our message had been misunderstood. I say so because I believe Senator O'Leary has a great respect for the Honourable Mr. Marchand, as well as for the people from Quebec, since he knows that province very well. I do not want the statement made last night by Senator Goldenberg to pass unnoticed without being corrected.

I do not intend today, honourable senators, to analyze the causes of the Liberal Party's defeat during the recent election campaign. I leave this task to their party experts as well as the task of drawing appropriate conclusions. But, to my mind, the clearest lesson to be learned from its results is that no political man, be he the Prime Minister of Canada, can dissociate himself from the people and their problems. No Prime Minister can allow himself to show the arrogance, the disrespect for Parliament that we have seen these past four years. The Canadian people did not forgive the government its lack of imagination and originality in finding efficient solutions to the problems of unemployment and inflation. One cannot accept that in a country as rich potentially as ours in every field, so many people should go without work, and here I am thinking mostly of the young people whose talents, and energy could be put to greater use in the economic development of our country if only they could get work. To my mind, the Speech from the Throne is an act of contrition on the part of the present government. It contains just about all the Progressive Conservative program. At long last the government tells us that it has found solutions to the rising cost of living, that it now has solutions to fight against unemployment and to improve relations with the provinces. But, honourable senators, with regard to relations with the provinces, for four years now in the other place the Conservative Party and specially myself have urged the government to be more flexible and understanding with the provinces. For four years—and if you read Hansard you can judge by the cabinet statements—the government's answers were all evasive or negative, as were also the attitudes. Never were the relations between the provinces and the federal government as tense as under the present government. Honourable senators will remember the federal-provincial conferences where the provinces, and more particularly the province of Quebec, requested a better distribution of taxation powers, especially in the field of social security. Months and months were lost in discussions between the federal government and the province of Quebec over a family allowance formula that would prove acceptable to both sides; that formula has not yet been found. The government ignores the requests made by the provinces concerning the spending power of the federal government, while the provinces want to participate in the development of that policy with a view to achieving better planning of their priorities in the economic and social fields. The provinces got a negative reply and the Liberal Party was surprised, in the last election campaign, at not receiving the official support of some provincial governments. If we want our country to survive as a federal state, we must endorse a more flexible and open federalism and be prepared to enter into negotiations and arrangements.

Such indeed was the spirit that the Fathers of Confederation wanted for this country.

As long as the federal government will keep considering the provinces as agencies or branches, people across the country will continue to question the present formula of federalism. My wish is that the policy statement found in the Speech from the Throne for better relations with the provinces will materialize as quickly as possible. Unfortunately, nothing at the present time proves that it will. Since the opening of this session, we have had two federal-provincial conferences, one on taxation and one on housing. Considering the reports available on those meetings, I cannot see that the central administration has taken a more flexible attitude towards the provinces than it had for the past four years. We heard the provinces ask for further decentralization of taxation powers, but they got no encouraging reply from the Minister of Finance. The future of federalism, in 1973, should be oriented towards decentralization of federal powers vis-à-vis the provinces and vice versa, particularly for the provinces which absolutely need their exclusive jurisdiction to meet the priorities and objectives of their constituents. Federalism as we know it will survive only on that condition.

Honourable senators, I would not want to follow the example of this government which is considering basing the next election campaign on national unity. As I said earlier, I have been deeply disappointed by the speeches delivered in the other place on this issue. This country will never be united by resorting to racism. It is not because English Canada voted for the Conservative Party and that Quebec voted Liberal that we should think that English Canada is against Quebec and that Quebec declared itself against the rest of the country. As usual the province of Quebec—and my leader said so the other day—mainly voted Liberal because Quebecers did not think the Conservative Party could secure a majority in the English provinces. I will again make a digression and say that Quebecers have been doing themselves a disservice for the last 25 of 30 years by ignoring a major political party. For 25 or 30 years Quebec has always sent a strong majority of Liberal members to the Commons. This of course is due to the fact that, as we all know, the Liberal Party has resorted to all kinds of election tactics and destroyed the image of our party, as explained the other day by my leader.

But I repeat that, for 25 or 30 years and perhaps more, by always electing to the Commons the majority of its members to support the Liberal Party, Quebec did itself a very bad disservice because during 25 or 30 years the Liberal Party, with its majority in Quebec, never did anything about Quebec claims and the rights claimed by some Quebec nationalists. People used to say then: There is no danger; why meet Quebecers' claims since they always vote Liberal? This was very harmful to the Quebec people. Its absence from the Conservative Party for such a long time only made them see one side of the coin. For years and years, Quebecers have stood aloof from this party. I hope that they will realize, come the next election, how the Conservative Party is capable of governing this country and that they will send to the House of Commons French Canadians qualified to participate in the administration of this country. I had the opportunity during the last four years—I refer here to the charge driven by government members against the Conservative Party in connection with the policy on bilingualism; I had the opportunity these last four years of witnessing an evolution, a significant one, I should say, in the right direction in the attitude of Conservative members towards the policy on bilingualism and the leader of our party—I pay a tribute to Mr. Stanfield—has often said that his party was in favour of that policy.

Besides, I cannot see how English-speaking people, be they Liberals, Conservatives or Social Democrats, could have any serious grievance to voice against that policy on bilingualism. The new policy on bilingualism in the Public Service only served to correct an unfair situation my French-speaking compatriots have had to put up with for a century. Fifteen years ago, there were very few French Canadians in senior positions in the Public Service. They were looked upon as second-class citizens and promotion opportunities for them were just about nil. It is extremely unfortunate, I believe that some elements in the English-speaking provinces, due to a narrow-mindedness that I cannot understand, should sincerely question such a policy. If we are to stick together and build this country, the Anglo-Saxon community will have to acknowledge at all government levels, that there are in Canada six million French Canadians who will no longer be ignored.

Honourable senators, in Quebec the wakening signal has been given a few years ago. I am not the only one to have seen it. You just ask anyone, even the Liberal members in this chamber who live in Quebec, they will agree with me.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Ever since the Liberals have been in office.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are too young to know that.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: French Canadians now and in the future will no longer be candidates for second-class jobs in the Public Service, such as garbage collection, floor polishing. We in Quebec now have our experts and skills in all fields. It is up to English Canada to accept our participation in the administration of this country.

As I mentioned in the minority report I signed with Mr. De Bané concerning constitutional changes to be brought about in this country, Quebec nationalism such as it is now is here to stay and many of my colleagues here are aware of the full scope of this assertion. I am not speaking of separatism. I am speaking of nationalism, because there is a difference between separatism and nationalism. If government members want to jeopardize the future of Canada, they need only choose national unity as an electoral platform. They are, in my opinion, taking great risks of further dividing the country and increasing the number of separatists in Quebec, because people there will say: nothing more can be done. If Mr. Marchand, Mr. Pelletier and other French Canadians in the present government say that nothing more can be done in Ottawa, well, we in Quebec are going to aim for independence. This is a dangerous game and we should avoid playing it. As the protector of the rights of the minorities, I feel the Senate should follow this debate very closely in order to avoid divisions in this country.

Honourable senators, I hardly imagine any future for this country, if the legitimate claims of the French Canadians who live within our frontiers are not taken into account. Any constitutional status quo is rejected not only in Quebec but also in the other provinces and especially by the youth of the country as a whole. Our young people are urging us to give them as soon as possible a more modern and flexible federalism; they want a kind of federalism in which the majority of them will find a place and make available their energy and their talents to keep on building this great country. The various cultures of our country account for its greatness. My honourable colleagues who have been abroad can see for themselves that because of this cultural diversity, Canada is not like any other country, for Canada is a country with great prestige.

Honourable senators, we must consider it a priority to suggest to the government urgent changes that are most imperative in the constitutional field. I feel, honourable senators, that this is where the survival of our nation resides.

[English]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, first, I should like to congratulate the government on its selection for the speakership of this house. Senator Fergusson, like myself, has been a member of this chamber for about 20 years. In that time she has displayed qualities of judgment, industry and wisdom designed to characterize the best traditions of this chamber and of its most distinguished members. She has been attentive to her duties in the house and on the numerous onerous committees to which she has been appointed. She has borne the burdens of that arduous work unobstrusively but with effective success. She has been a servant of the Senate and indeed of Parliament. She has been a credit to her sex and her colleagues. We all rejoice that in her the women of Canada have been honoured. She is the first woman to preside over the deliberations of our federal Houses of Parliament, and wherever parliamentary government is practised her selection will draw applause, for she will carry her honour with distinction throughout the parliamentary world. Finally I pay her the supreme accolade—she is a great lady.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, hardly had the reassuring news of the appointment of the Speaker been made, when I was overwhelmed by the announcement of the death of my former leader, colleague and friend, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. I must be frank to say that his death was expected but when it arrived, the swiftness of the event, although perhaps merciful, stunned me, as it stunned all of us. I am sure you will allow me to confess that at that moment I thought at once of lines written by Newman—lines of deep theological significance—descriptive of the passing of a noble soul.

The lines were these:

What is this severance?
This silence pours a solitariness
Into the very essence of my soul;
And the deep rest, so soothing and so sweet
Has something too of sternness and of pain.
For it drives back my thoughts upon their spring
By a strange introversion, and perforce
I now begin to feed upon myself
Because I have not else to feed upon.

All of us are perfectly aware that each of us will have to face this moment before we share the beatific vision we all seek. Our sympathy for the dying man is intense. All alone, he goes to face his Maker. Neither his family, nor his friends, nor his fame, nor the mighty, the powerful, the skilful, the profound—Mr. Pearson knew then—could ease this awesome passage. In the achievements of a great life Mr. Pearson had great collaborators. He worked with people and always acknowledged the help they gave him. But in this great final voyage into the unknown, there could be no collaboration. He went alone, but if any man was ready, it was he, and his life had made him so.

At times like this people seek to console themselves. Men and women wept. Nations mourned. In the world's chancelleries and in the international organizations, heads were bowed. In hamlets, in underdeveloped lands, where his work brought hope and often life, a blessing was invoked upon him. In the communities of this country where his efforts for national conciliation were unrelenting, the profound grief which was generated, united all Canadians at that moment.

Nothing I could say here could add to the lustre of the life he gave for others—and to the end. It could be said of Mr. Pearson that he was a child of his time—that for him on so many occasions the season was right. Of every great man, this is true. But the measure of a man's greatness is in the results he achieves and in the intelligence, the courage and devotion he brings to his work. On the stages both of the nation and of the world, Mr. Pearson failed no one—least of all his countrymen.

As Dr. Moore said in his impressive eulogy, "He walks off into a new dawn playing upon his flute." The tune I think will be merry, for Mr. Pearson was a happy person.

Let this be the epitaph of his noble character: "Everyone he touched was the better for it." And his hope, I think—as the hymn chosen by his family gives it—would be that:

holiness shall whisper
The sweet Amen of peace.

Honourable senators, like the preceding speakers in this debate I should like to congratulate the mover of the motion, Senator Hicks, and the seconder, Senator Lafond. Senator Hicks, who is an old friend of mine and of many of us, spoke with his usual clarity and charm, and was as informative as one would expect of a man who has had such great experience in the public life of our country, particularly with its intellectual side.

I was also delighted to hear Senator Lafond. He too is an old colleague.

May I also add my word of welcome to the new senators—all of whom I am very pleased to see here—some of whom I have had the privilege of serving with as their colleague in government. My hope for them—and perhaps this is the best hope that I could give them—is that their years here will be as happy in this chamber as mine have been. I am sure that is the highest wish that any member of this chamber could express to a woman or man entering for the first time. Their presence gives great promise, as shown by the performance of Senator Asselin here this afternoon. I am particularly pleased that there has been an appointment made to the ranks of the Opposition.

The gracious Speech discloses that the two pre-eminent goals of the government are national unity and equality of opportunity for all Canadians. The country cannot long survive unless it struggles constantly to provide opportunities for its people, opportunities of all kinds, opportunities open to all. As long as major frustrations persist in the field of opportunity, national unity is disaffected. For a country as wealthy and as enlightened as Canada, if we have a real sense of national unity, opportunities for all our citizens are bound to improve. Separation of any one part or region, in my view, would be a disaster, not only for the region; it would also be a blow of prodigious damage to the nation. Canadians, all of us, need each other personally, by province, by region, if we are to realize our true potential.

None of us conscientiously can countenance the infringement of our birthright, whether the threat comes from within or from beyond our borders. We do not seek national uniformity in language, or race, or creed, or ability, or wealth. Understanding, conciliation and reason, applied to our problems continually, will improve the good life of our people. In this we are a microcosm of the world village. But surely our differences are more manageable, more easily reconciled, if we have the will, the desire and the courage to take this course. What other country would any of us choose if we had to start out again today? And where else would any of us advise our children to go but to Canada?

National unity is not just a word or an aspiration or an emotion. It is a concrete goal to be reached by establishing sound institutions, reforming them to meet new problems, cherishing them and using them for the betterment of the lot of all our people.

National unity will never be perfect. In itself it has boundless horizons, and as we reach each new level a higher level looms up to challenge us. Relatively easily we can unite to defend the integrity of our territory or a threat to our freedom, or the danger of control from without. But every disagreement that we have, either on internal or external policy, need not become a crisis.

The idea of national unity is a little like the concept of free trade. Real free trade among nations is chimerical. But freer trade, the freest possible trade, is a reasonable objective. So too with the just society or the great society. Regardless of how we strive, there will always be injustice to be remedied. We work for a more just society or a greater society, or for the most just society possible or the greatest society possible. In these goals there are really no absolutes. All of them will forever remain relative. We must remember that so too is the case with national unity. To achieve it perfectly in a communicating democracy is fanciful. We must establish the basic needs of our life together and work to achieve those needs in their fullness.

Our Constitution is the basic juridical document upon which our unity is founded. And in a federal state like ours, with the consequential division of powers and authorities, a Constitution which in its beginnings may in fact liberate people, later may constrain the constituent parts of the Confederation. To an extent this has happened here in Canada.

Certain powers were allocated to the federal authority and its Parliament. Others, of a local character, were conferred upon the provincial units, and some, by them, were delegated to municipal levels. In wartime, mainly through the use of the War Measures Act, the federal authority assumed great powers. In peace time these powers have been relaxed. Nonetheless, the superior authority, mainly because of its wider taxing power, has been the federal authority. And the federal authority should remain dominant, and have the means to be so, in the national interest.

It is curious, however, that in the post-industrial world which Canada has entered, many of our great problems—and collectively they have become national problems—are, under the Constitution, the responsibility of the provinces and of the municipalities. Some of these fields readily come to mind—urban affairs and housing, hospitals and health, education and schools, the natural resources of the province and the general authority of the province in the field of property and civil rights.

No one will deny that in the past quarter century in each of these fields we have had problems, great problems, some of them approaching crisis proportions. Let me give some examples.

First, since the beginning, education has been the "ark of the covenant" in the provincial jurisdiction. Yet today federal funds have had to feed 50 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education, and have been doing so for some time.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Since how long? I do not want to interrupt the honourable senator, but in order to view this problem in its true perspective, would he not agree that this problem arose with the First World War when the federal government invaded the field of income tax, personal income tax and corporation income tax?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the honourable senator is referring to the Second World War and to the tax rental agreement.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was talking of the First World War.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That was when the income tax came into effect; and of course the federal government was in that field because it had the authority under the Constitution to be there.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but when the federal government has too much money it uses it in fields other than its own.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That has happened consistently.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Very well. Secondly, we have had organizations urging Parliament to restrict the use and flow of foreign investment into our resource industries, and, be it said, for worthy motives. Yet provinces, seeking growth and development in the extractive sector, seek massive investment, whatever its source, for their resource industries.

Thirdly, thirty years ago less than half of our population was rural. Today, after a great surge in population, 75 per cent of our people live in cities and towns. Roads, local land services and housing, constitutionally are local responsibilities. Yet we have CMHC, the Trans-Canada Highway, and like projects, operating on a gigantic national scale, and the needs and demands upon the federal treasury increase in these fields.

Fourthly, hospitals and health facilities were put into section 92 of the BNA Act in 1867, as were charities and eleemosynary institutions. Since 1966 we have had a Canada assistance plan, hospital insurance and medicare, and the federal contributions are 50 per cent of the cost of these programs.

My fifth example is that our rising GNP gives birth to a spiral of rising expectations, rising remuneration, rising costs. There is a clamour for government controls of prices and wages directed at Ottawa. This is a serious national problem, yet the provincial jurisdiction controls property and civil rights.

It is possible to count many more examples of situations in which local needs develop into national problems. Are we therefore to remain in a constitutional straitjacket? Are we to say, "The provinces can tax; let them look after these problems." For obvious reasons this is not realistic. "What then," you may ask, "are our options?"

Is the federal authority to invade the provincial field and take it over? The courts have already ruled against that proposition and there seems to be no demand to change our status from a federal to a unitary state, even though some of our provinces would be more viable as separate national entities than many independent foreign nations.

To meet these emerging conditions which face our nation we seem to have rejected revolution. I hope we have also rejected separatism, but let us not feed the fires which keep it warm. Sometimes we do this.

Constitutional reorganization eludes us probably through our own fault. It did so over the Fulton-Favreau formula. It did so over the Victoria Charter.

The road we have taken is a new road. I guess it is typically Canadian. Its landmarks are consultation and adjustment leading to agreement. The device we have applied is the Federal-Provincial Conference. Perhaps the term "co-operative federalism" has too political a connotation to describe our course. But in fact it is a good phrase. I was most interested to hear Senator Goldenberg last night talking about the Federal-Provincial Conference, and I quite readily admit that there may be some slight repetition of what he said last evening in what I have to say now about the conference. Nevertheless, I think that the importance that the Federal-Provincial Conference is assuming and taking in our society is a factor that we should not underestimate. Indeed, we should try as much as possible to understand it.

Some of the meetings of the Federal-Provincial Conference have been stormy, some dramatic, but on the whole the conference has been constructive.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They have been dull.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It has led us through a maze of political, constitutional, fiscal and taxing inadequacies. It has moderated the federal spending power and enhanced the provincial. Huge transfer payments have been made to the provinces by Ottawa. It has also created social changes through education, through health services, through housing and urban redevelopment, through welfare programs, through programs for the aged and the handicapped. The importance of the conference as a devised piece of quasi-constitution-amending machinery may only be understood by the experts. It has evolved from the tax rental arrangements of wartime, through the "shared cost" programs, to the "well established" programs of today. The results to date have become of great importance to our economy and to our society. The process continues and the problems are both varied and enormous.

Most of the policies established by the conference require parliamentary sanction. The Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1972 is a good recent example of this. The arrangements which it embodies were devised as a result of many meetings at various levels of the federal-provincial organization.

I remember saying once at a CPA meeting at Banff that both federal and provincial members must know not only much about the powers and decisions of Parliament and the legislatures, but today they must also understand the status and thrust of the Federal-Provincial Conference if they would fathom the development of national policy.

Let us agree that the conference is not a new level of government, nor is it perfect. Its members are not directly elected. Certainly the first ministers and other ministers have been put into government by the electorate. But the help of expert staff has been enlisted in every field, economic, social, constitutional, medical, educational and others. Generally the debate is in a public forum, but that forum is neither Parliament nor the legislature. Only the conclusions and the proposals reach the floors of the houses.

The White Paper Federalism for the Future points up the importance of federal-provincial consultation. A study done at Queen's University by the Institute of Intergovernmental Relations there has recommended methods to improve both the liaison and the facilities for the conference. I hope it will not shock the Senate if I say that it is possible to count up to over 450 federal-provincial committees working on various problems at various levels, at various times.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It's a big joke.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is not a joke. It is a fact. Twenty-three of these committees are ministerial, 24 are at the level of the deputy minister, and the balance are at a more junior level, presumably of experts.

As Senator Goldenberg said last night, in 1971 there were 22 meetings of first ministers and other ministers, 23 meetings of deputy ministers, and over 200 meetings at lower levels. Statistics of this kind are boring, but the few I give emphasize the enormous amount of consultation going on.

One of the major concerns now is to put more order and efficiency into the system. Shortly after the war when the first ministers met, the provincial people usually had very small delegations and the topics were not particularly complicated. What financial and other expertise there was seemed to be supplied from the federal level. Now there is not a province without its experts, competent to discuss with experts at any other level the intricacies of public financing and the programs which result therefrom.

For the tabulation of results, it is difficult to find a measuring stick, but there are some available. For example, in 1943, in the middle of the war, after transfer payments, the federal government was spending 85 per cent of the public money, and the remaining 15 per cent was spent by provinces and municipalities. Today the federal authority spends about 35 per cent of the public revenue, and the provinces and municipalities some 65 per cent.

In 1944, 78 per cent of the public revenue was allocated to the federal authority, and 22 per cent to the provincial-municipal authorities. In 1971, more than a quarter of a century later, the federal level of revenue had fallen to 52 per cent and the provincial-municipal level had risen to 48 per cent approximately.

You may ask how it has happened that the provinces have so much more money to spend now than they ever had. Well there are three reasons. First, there were grants-in-aid made by the federal authority in the field of health, welfare and education. These to date have totalled somewhere between $4 and $5 billion. As the programs bacame "well established," the grants became, relatively speaking, absolute grants to the provinces in these respective fields.

Secondly, there have been equalization payments which Ottawa has made, without condition, to seven lower income provinces on the basis of a formula devised by agreement, and these equalization payments to date have amounted to about $1 billion.

Thirdly, the provinces, of course, have borrowed heavily and they have in some cases incurred budgetary deficits somewhere in the order of $2 billion to date.

It is also true to say that even these larger financial resources do not satisfy the needs of the provinces. Doubtless there will be more transfer payments, adjustments in fiscal and monetary policy, tax concessions, and probably new areas of provincial taxation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why probably?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): But the lasting and soundest source of funds for the public sector must, and will, come from solid economic growth in the private sector.

In our free society and our open economy, public expenditure should be directed to the improvement of conditions and climate in which the engines of the private sector can thrive. And the goal is not the enrichment of the few. The goal is the improvement of the opportunities of all the people of the nation. Government tries to establish the climate for the improvement of opportunity by these federal provincial arrangements. That is an intermediate goal only. It is not a goal in itself. The final goal is economic and social, to which the free enterprise system must be committed.

One cannot measure the value to the provinces of these developments, however, solely in terms of dollars. The social effects in education, in health, in welfare, in housing and in other areas, have been very great indeed. There are programs also, mainly federal, to provide grants for regions of slow development.

One of the overriding new problems arises out of an increasing concern about the environment. It may be that the desire for expansion and growth in the economy will be seriously tempered in the future for ecological reasons. It may even be that regions and communities will prefer a slower rate of growth and perhaps a lower per capita income, to preserve the nature of the environment the people know.

Honourable senators, there are many ways of promoting national unity. I want to suggest by these remarks, which really only touch the periphery of the problem, that the Federal-Provincial Conference has played and is continuing to play a very important role. This whole business of federal-provincial activity may be worthy of consideration by one of our committees of the Senate. It may have a greater influence upon the future of the nation than any of us as legislators can now discern. It may lead to other methods to help establish equality of opportunity throughout the nation. It may even result in agreement on constitutional patriation and reform.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I think that everything that can be said in relation to Her Honour the Speaker and the excellence of her appointment as Speaker has already been said. However, it is my pleasure to add my voice to all the others who have extended to you, Madam Speaker, heartiest congratulations, and to express with them my own confidence that you will rule here with dignity, fairness, charm and efficiency. It is an honour for me to be in the Senate with you.

I am also pleased to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on a job very well done. I think the calibre of debate in this chamber is high, and the mover and the seconder have contributed to that high calibre in their presentations.

I want to congratulate Senator Asselin on his contribution today and to express my pleasure at his appointment and the appointment of the other new senators to this chamber. I am sure each of them will make an important contribution. I feel that the Prime Minister was wise in nominating a new senator to sit with the Official Opposition, and I would hope that in future appointments to be made the need for adequate representation in this chamber of the Official Opposition is kept in mind. I might also say there are large elements of this country that are in no way adequately represented in this chamber, farmers and working people, and I can think of others. I hope in the future, as in the past, that the Prime Minister will keep this fact in mind and make appointments accordingly.

• (1600)

In my judgment, it is pretty difficult to play an effective role in the Senate. It is tough. If we do not attend here and make a lot of speeches we are not doing our job. Everyone would say that. If we do come and make speeches there does not seem to be any correlation, in my judgment, between the quality of the speech and the amount of coverage given by the press. If the Senate is misunderstood, as I am sure it is very often, I think a good part of the blame rests in the fact that the media do not cover the deliberations of this chamber in any effective way. Of course, we do not expect that everything we say will reach the press. However, I do think that when an individual has had a lifetime of service in the other place and is appointed to this chamber—I cite as an example Senator McIlraith who gave his maiden speech here a few days ago—his speeches should be worthy of some coverage in national newspapers, and certainly in the local newspapers. It may have been my mistake, but I am sorry to say that I did not see any coverage in the Ottawa press of Senator McIlraith's important speech, or of Senator Lafond's speech, and he too is from this area.

All we can do is to keep trying. Perhaps if we improve our work here we will be given the kind of attention that many of us think we deserve.

I am pleased that committees are being constituted again in this session, as provided for in the Rules, and that we have a Committee on Agriculture. I hope the Agriculture Committee will be able to do effective work during this session.

I wish to say at this point that I was pleased to have been invited by Senator Michaud to go to Kent County this summer and view the agricultural conditions in that area. Senator Michaud made an excellent contribution in this chamber during the last session by bringing forward the problem of an almost disappearing agriculture in that part of Canada. Senator Lafond who is not a farmer to my knowledge, but who has taken an interest in agriculture, was also there, and the three of us were able to view the agricultural conditions in that area. It was depressing to see the state of the farms, and to learn of the low income of the farmers and that to many of those people agriculture appears to be a reprehensible occupation. It seems the ambition of nearly all the young people is to get off the farms as quickly as possible.

Agricultural conditions are improving. The cost of food is high. The prices paid to the agricultural producers in Canada today for beef, pork, wheat and feed grains are quite good. They have been increasing. I feel there is room for improvement, and a need for increased prices.

It seems to me that it should be possible to put together economic units of agricultural production in that part of New Brunswick so that we can increase our production in Canada, and so that many of those people in that part of the country who wish to farm will have the opportunity to do so in the future.

I listened with interest to Senator Connolly's speech, and was able to learn from it, as is always the case when he speaks. He pointed out some of the advantages to Canada of the federal government's taking the leadership in federal-provincial conferences to improve the old age security system, and to provide transfer payments on the basis of an accepted formula which takes into account the economic disparity in various parts of the country.

I have endeavoured to understand the position with regard to the Constitution that is taken by perhaps a majority of the people in the province of Quebec. I think it is absolutely necessary to Canadian unity that the opinions and desires of Quebec be taken into account and that there be as great an accommodation as possible. However, I am from the Prairie provinces and over the years we have not felt, rightly or wrongly, that the Constitution was our number one concern. Perhaps we were worried about the effects of the Constitution. In any event, we feel we are in a disadvantaged area which does not have the industrial growth that comes to some other parts of Canada. I have felt, and I still do, that there is much in common between the economic interests of the people in the province of Quebec and the people in the Prairie provinces. It seems to me that in those two regions and, of course, as well in the Maritimes, the people have relatively smaller incomes. We need to take action to ensure that these regions have more industrialization, and that incomes are increased whereby those people have the opportunity to enjoy a Canadian standard of living.

Having said that, my main contention is that it is time for the federal government to further improve and increase its leadership in the social security field, and to ensure that the people who most need an increase in benefits in fact receive them. There has been a lot of widespread criticism by important people in all political parties in Canada directed against what they have called "welfare bums," people on welfare as compared with those who work for a living. They have said that many people on welfare have refused to work. I want to point out the other side of the coin.

I believe it is a fact that those who live on welfare today do so on very meagre and inadequate income. I am not making a case for an able-bodied person who is physically and mentally able to work, but who exercises his right to refuse a job and just go on welfare. I wish to point out to honourable senators a state of affairs of which I imagine a great number of them are unaware, that the incomes of people on welfare in this country are on the whole shamefully low.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I be permitted to clarify a point, because it is very interesting? Do you include unemployment insurance payments in welfare?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Not in the remarks I am making today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I ask that because your remarks seemed to indicate that you include them.

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, I am not. I feel that there should be an increase in the amount paid to those on welfare generally throughout the country. I have endeavoured to read the debates so as to keep track of the statements made by the leaders and public figures of this country with respect to this problem. I find an exceedingly small number of people who have gone to bat and championed the need for welfare recipients to receive an improved and increased income.

I have in my hand an editorial from the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 19, 1972. I do not wish to read it in full, but I will quote briefly from it:

GAP BETWEEN NDP AND POOR

> The poor, in a sense, are becoming a group of Canadians without a political voice. At its inception the Commonwealth Co-operative Federation was a party of the poor, and into the early years of its successor, the New Democratic Party. The reasons were plain. The CCF was created in the hungry Thirties out of vast, real need; and at a time when governments were little involved with social responsibilities.

And so on.

Another sentence refers to the resolutions passed at the recent provincial conventions of the NDP in Ontario and Manitoba:

> A perusal of the resolutions that might have been passed, however, shows that few of them were directly concerned with poverty.

Further on the editorial continues:

> Yet the real poor—of whom both the Economic Council of Canada and the Senate Committee on Poverty found millions, most of them working—were not a first consideration in Ontario any more than in Manitoba.

The editorial ends with this sentence:

> We would like to see the NDP putting its conscience to work on the truly complex and difficult problems of the really poor.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have given up yourself.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I was not a member of the Senate Committee on Poverty, but I have studied its report. I congratulate Senator Croll and the members of the committee for a most excellent report which, in my judgment, is providing leadership in Canada right now to governments, and is showing the way. I would think that in the days ahead there will evolve policies that will lead, I hope quickly, to the general concept of a guaranteed annual income.

I have also read carefully the statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and wish to quote two sentences:

> We want to develop a reasonable balance between income support available to the aged poor and to the non-aged poor . . . we need to ensure adequate recognition in all cases of the additional needs where there are dependents . . . Supplementation must be structured so as to preserve incentives to work and also so as to recognize that larger family responsibilities involve larger income requirements.

I was able to obtain from the Department of National Health and Welfare a document dated January, 1972, obviously one year old but the latest available, showing the scales of income provided under welfare by provinces for families of various sizes. As I said, these figures are already one year old so, undoubtedly, there have been changes in some provinces. I do not wish to misinform the Senate in any way. There are notes on the following page to the effect that in some of the provinces the figures here do not cover, for example, fuel allowance. These figures, therefore, do not illustrate the total picture but I do think they give an indication in general of the income received by those on welfare. With the consent of the Senate I suggest that this table and the notes given to me by the research division of the Department of National Health and Welfare be included in the body of my speech.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I wish to say that if I mention a province I am not attempting to single out that province because of the political nature of its government. I think the pattern, by and large, is the same in all provinces. Perhaps in Ontario those on welfare receive a little more than those in New Brunswick, shall we say, but one would expect that to be the case. In any event, all the rates in my opinion are abysmally low. I will read from this table the welfare income of a family of two adults and two children, a girl of eight and a boy of 13, in Newfoundland. It is $215 per month, or $70 per month less than the amount of income provided for two adults on old age pension. In other words, a man and his wife with two children receive total welfare payments amounting to $70 per month less than the payments received by a couple on the old age pension. I can go on. The welfare payment for a similar family in Nova Scotia is shown as being $113 less than that provided a couple by the old age pension, but the note indicates that this family would receive additional payments for rent, fuel and so on. The welfare payments for a family of four in New Brunswick amount to $187, or $97 per month less than the payments received by a couple on the old age pension. In Quebec the welfare payments amount to $218 for a family of four, which is $67 per month less than for a couple in receipt of the old age pension. The welfare payments in Ontario amount to $271 for the same family, or $14 per month less than that for two persons in receipt of the old age pension.

• (1620)

I do not think any member of the Senate will stand up and say that old age pensions are high enough. A campaign is on to raise them. It is being participated in by every political party in Canada, and I would think the campaign will be successful. I hope it is successful.

NOTE: Actual allowances granted may be subject to ceilings (see footnotes) and do not necessarily correspond to the budget standards. Municipalities which administer assistance may supplement provincial allowances.

[1]Exclusive of fuel allowance ($15 a month May-Dec. inclusive and $20 Jan.-April inclusive). Includes urban rent.

[2]Exclusive of fuel allowance, which may be paid on basis of actual cost. Includes urban rent.

[3]Exclusive of rent, fuel and utilities which together may not exceed $115. Provincial maximum allowances are set as follows: $75 for women 60-65 years who are single, widowed, deserted, divorced or unemployed; $100 for disabled persons and persons 65 or over; $200 for families.

[4]Exclusive of fuel allowance which may be paid on the basis of actual cost. Amounts specified for the various items of basic need are maximum amounts and the total allowance may not exceed an amount considered to be a reasonable standard in the community.

[5]Includes fuel and rent for Zone III (Montreal); Zones II and I are $5 and $15 less respectively.

[7]Exclusive of fuel and utilities which are paid on the basis of actual cost.

[8]Exclusive of fuel allowance which may be granted according to provincial schedule or on the basis of actual cost. The rent allowance may also be paid on the basis of actual cost.

[9]Amounts for provincial allowances are specified for food and clothing only; other rates are set at community standards. Rates are not specified for municipal allowances.

Are we going to reach the position when a couple eligible for the old age pension receives $350 or $400 a month, as they are able to do in British Columbia, while younger adults, with two children, continue to receive such miserable amounts as those which I have related to honourable senators?

It is my experience as a father that when kids are growing up it takes more money for clothes and food. It may take more for medical and dental care than it does for people who are more mature—for example, those 65 years of age and on old age pensions. It is a crying shame that in a country like ours these very low rates of welfare payments should apply in province after province.

I have friends on welfare. I am not speaking entirely about people with whom I am not in any way acquainted. I know that very often, perhaps usually, the diet of those on welfare is inadequate. The food budget is too small for good health. Where would such people get the money for fresh fruits and vegetables at this time of year under a system which says, "If you have two kids on welfare, we will give you $70 a month less than that which two people on the old age pension receive."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But it is not the same government that says it. If my understanding is correct, welfare payments are made exclusively by the provinces, whereas the old age pension and assistance is provided by the federal government. Therefore, I ask the honourable senator if he would recommend that the federal government takes over the whole of the welfare system, or that the provinces look after it alone?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I want action, and I want to get it increased.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But in which way?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I will endeavour to answer the Leader of the Opposition's question. In my own mind, I am not too concerned whether it is provincial money or federal money, or a combination of both. But the results need to be achieved, because Canadians should live well, even if some are unable to obtain work and are on welfare.

To answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition, I am not an expert but I have done my best, with the facilities available to senators, to gather information. As I understand it, the guaranteed income supplement is paid by the federal government, but if an old age pensioner requires money beyond that, there is an arrangement between the federal and provincial governments whereby that extra amount of money is shared.

As I am able to understand it—and I am positive I am right—welfare payments in Canada today are, by and large, on a fifty-fifty basis. Fifty per cent of the money comes from Ottawa and 50 per cent comes from the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan. It is a hodge-podge today, and needs correcting. It needs improving. The mess was even greater before the Canada Assistance Plan was placed on the statute books.

In my judgment, here is the place for federal leadership, for the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare to bring about a system, underwritten in a major part by the federal government, to improve the income of people on welfare.

As a Liberal senator, I am pleased to campaign for this increase. I know that there are members of the Senate who have been doing this for years, but I would appreciate a greater emphasis on this very important problem by politicians in this country.

There may be more votes in aiming for a larger across-the-board increase in old age pensions. These people may be organized much better than those who are on welfare, but to my mind the test should lie in whether a Canadian is receiving an adequate income. I am concerned about those people on welfare who are receiving an inadequate income. I am as concerned that their incomes be increased, as I am concerned that people in the 65 years of age bracket are living on inadequate incomes and should have an increase.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would you suggest any adjustment of the equalization payments formula to enable the provinces to equalize the welfare payments?

Hon. Mr. Argue: That might well be something that the government will do. I think it is something they are considering. But I am not here to spell out the formula. I am here to show the need, and to say that if there is no better formula, then let us do it on the formula we have now and increase the amount, rather than not do anything at all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You said we have a bad formula.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I come now to another area, in which people are in great need and which requires immediate consideration. I refer to those people receiving the old age pension, old age security, and the guaranteed income supplement, who are living in nursing homes or minimum care institutions. Under our present setup the bulk of their monthly old age pension cheque is taken away from them. When there is an increase in the pension they gain no advantage whatsoever; the provincial government takes the increase, or the home takes it—somebody takes it. All that the pensioner receives is the displeasure—I was going to say "pleasure"—of endorsing the cheque and seeing that the size of the cheque is greater. Although the amount is larger, they receive the same pittance that they received before the increase. It means that for some thousands of old age pensioners their dignity and self-respect have been destroyed. They are condemned to an existence which honestly could be described as torture, cruel and stupid. The circumstances of their lives are a damn shame, brought about by the confiscation of their old age pensions.

Every province in Canada operates senior citizens' homes or care institutions providing board and room and a minimum of nursing care. For many of our elderly citizens they are little more than jails without pay. True enough, the board may be adequate, or nearly so, and the rooms may be comfortable; but immediately an old age pensioner walks into one of those homes the provincial government, under its regulations, confiscates from 83 to 90 per cent of the old age pensioner's cheque, leaving the pensioner with between $15 and $26 a month, depending on how the province calculates it. This amount of 50 to 87 cents a day, is for all his personal needs—often clothes, entertainment, tobacco, bus fare, medicines, or at least patent medicines, gifts, newspapers, an outside meal or a cup of coffee, church donations, and so forth. This amount of 50 to 87 cents a day is termed a comfort allowance. What a misnomer. This is not a comfort allowance; it is a fortune! Anything that this pensioner may feel he or she needs over and above room and board must be provided in 1973 in Canada by the magnificent sum of 50 to 87 cents a day. When the federal government last year increased the guaranteed income supplement from $135 to $150 a month, these pensioners hoped that they too would get an increase in their allowance. No such fortune. The other old age pensioners were getting an extra $15 a month; their $15 was confiscated by their provincial government and went directly into the provincial treasury or into the institutions' budget.

This present arrangement of which I speak is both cruel and stupid in its application, in my opinion. How does it work? Take the example of an independent pensioner, Joe Brown, who for the past few years has been living on his own and taking care of himself on his pension, previously $135 a month and now $150 a month. He suffers a severe heart attack and is hospitalized. While in hospital medicare covers his costs, paying hospital rates from $50 to $100 a day. But Joe Brown continues to receive his pension cheque, as he should. He is in the hospital; he has a few dollars. He can buy somebody a little gift or he might even buy himself a beer if he is so inclined. He has his money—$5 a day, $150 a month—and he is praying for a fast recovery—

An Hon. Senator: Not too fast!

Hon. Mr. Argue: His prayers are answered: he makes a good recovery. He is physically able to get around. He goes downtown; he goes to a show; he plays billiards. He may even enjoy a pipe or a pint. But the recovery is not complete. He is not well enough to care for himself in his own home, so he goes into one of these minimum care homes of which I speak. Now, even though this minimum care costs the state but a small fraction of the cost of medicare, the cheap chisellers rob him of 70 per cent of his pension cheque and leave him a pittance of 50 cents a day. His prestige, his dignity, his self-respect have been destroyed. When he goes to the hospital the government says, "Under medicare we will pay the hospital $50 a day, $100 a day, or whatever the bill is. We will pay. We will send out your old age pension cheque; it is yours." But when this man makes a fairly good recovery, but still needs some care—minimum care—and goes into one of these minimum care homes, he is then placed in this intolerable position. The provincial authorities confiscate such an amount from his cheque as to leave him with as little as 50 cents a day.

There is a further danger now, that any future increase in the federal pension will once again find its way into the provincial treasuries or into the institutions, and the pensioner will receive a torture pittance of 50 cents a day. So, from my place in this chamber, I am asking that the federal minister in charge, in his review of old age security and guaranteed income assistance, take positive steps to guarantee that our senior citizens in care institutions receive, for their own use, at least 50 per cent of the present maximum old age pension; that is, not less than $75 per month.

Now, I could have said that he should have the old age security portion of his cheque unmolested. It is hard to say precisely what he should have, and what would be the better thing to do. But certainly I am suggesting that a person in one of these minimum care institutions should have not less than half of his cheque for his own use. That is asking for something that is very moderate and is something that all of the governments combined should endeavour to meet, and see to it that our elderly citizens receive at least that much. After all, the federal government pays 100 per cent of the old age pension, 50 per cent in general of the cost of medicare, and it matches the moneys paid by the provincial governments for the operation of nursing care homes. Under these circumstances, I feel the federal government should show some backbone and insist that old age pensioners in nursing homes receive at least half of their old age pension cheque for their own use.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why not elsewhere? Why not for those who are not in those institutions?

Hon. Mr. Argue: If they are not in those institutions, they get their whole cheque.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But it costs them something to live.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am glad to have this type of support. I take it I can infer from what the Leader of the Opposition is saying that I am asking for too little.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am in favour of your proposal, but I am suggesting that there are problems. It is not as simple as you suggest.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I do not expect anything is really simple, but I should think that the principle that half of the old age pension cheque should go to the pensioner for his own use—his use over and above the cost of his board and room and minimum nursing care—is a principle that can be defended.

The new government of the province of British Columbia has said that they want their old age pensioners to get $200 a month. They have introduced legislation on the statute books of the Province of British Columbia to bring this about. The Prime Minister of this country said that the federal government would be prepared to take up half of the costs of the amount paid by the Province of British Columbia in excess of the $150 a month, up to $200 a month. I am glad he made that statement. It shows that before too long the old age pension cheques across this country may well reach $200 a month. My belief is that, while it is a welcome improvement in pension cheques for the majority, or at least a large percentage of those who are on the old age pension, neither the Government of British Columbia, or of any other province, nor the Government of Canada should overlook the need of our old age pensioners who are in nursing homes and other places, if the same thing applies, so that these pensioners may also get a reasonable proportion of the pension cheque enjoyed by others.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Is it not correct that in the province of Ontario the daily rate for these homes is set by provincial statute?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I think that is probably right.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: In effect, we have gotten away from what we used to call the almshouse. We have given some stature to these institutions; we, in effect, have given the inmate stature. He is not a charge on the community as such.

Hon. Mr. Argue: He has stature, but no money.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If I may, what the province of Ontario does is pay what they call a minimum. They pay $9.50 or $10, but it may cost $12 or $13.

• (1640)

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: And who pays the balance?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The balance will be paid by another agency of government.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Martin: This is what happens. He has not got anything, so another agency of government may very well pay it or, if he has got it, he pays it himself.

Hon. Mr. Argue: As I understand it the charge varies from one institution to another. It may go from $250 to $300; it may go higher; but, in general, except for an exceedingly high level, the cost over and above $150 is split fifty-fifty between Ottawa and the provinces, and Ottawa, of course, pays all of the first $150, less the small allowance. So, when Ottawa increased, as it did a few months ago, its pension from $135 to $150, I think it was, saying, "Give it to the pensioner," the increase instead went to the province, or to those institutions; and, as I said in my opening remarks, between the provincial treasury and/or the institution itself, they benefited from the increase in the pension—but no benefit for the pensioner.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: Judging by the way the provinces handle any tax concessions made by the federal Parliament, they probably will handle this in the same manner, reduce the taxes here and the taxes then go to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That may be right. That increases the need for us all to do something—and I am sure that Senator Croll and his committee would agree with that. I am sure the Senate has made a contribution to correct the injustice of which I speak.

Hon. Mr. Croll: As far as it goes, Senator Argue's point is excellent and satisfactory, but I thought he was going to make the point—and he may still make it—that the rich province of British Columbia can augment to $200. But what do the rest of the provinces do? That is the vital point.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I would think British Columbia could augment; I would think Saskatchewan could augment it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Oh yes.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I would think that New Brunswick could augment.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no. Senator Smith knows New Brunswick cannot do it.

Hon. Mr. Smith: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am happy about all the help I am getting.

Hon. Mr. Croll: There are only three provinces which could do it. Her Honour the Speaker knows the answer also.

Hon. Mr. Argue: It is very interesting. Everyone is helping me.

Hon. Mr. Croll: British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario are the only provinces which can possibly do it. The rest need help, and they are not getting it.

Hon. Mr. Smith: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: You are paying for them.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, we are paying for them.

Hon. Mr. Argue: With respect, I disagree with Senator Croll, at least to some degree, because in the poorest provinces, as in all provinces, the pensioner was provided an increase of $15 a month. The poorer provinces did not have to take the increase from their pensioners. They would not have been any worse off if they passed it on to them. Instead all provinces wanted to make money, they wanted to increase their revenue, at the expense of the pensioner who was being allowed only 50 cents a day. I do not think even the poorest province should have kept the increase in the pension paid by the federal government and designed to help the pensioners.

The federal government is prepared to pay even more. I would think that with the leadership that the new Minister of National Health and Welfare is giving to this problem we are going to make some progress. I would be highly surprised if that were not so.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You did not read the speech very carefully, Senator Argue, because one of the things he said in this speech was that he agreed there ought to be a variation—the very thing you and I do not agree on.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I read the speech very carefully. I was quite impressed and I believe that I will be proven right yet. I will be amazed if I am not, and if it is not made in the way I think it should be made, I will be making some other comments.

Honourable senators, the Throne Speech debate is very nearly over, and I am sure you will be glad to know that I intend to present a notice of motion to initiate a general debate on this question I have raised. I seek the continued support of the Senate to have this injustice corrected and the incomes to which I have referred increased. It is not easy for the federal government to do all the things that I think it should be doing in the social security field to make it possible that these more indigent people be given an increased income.

[Hon. Mr. Croll.]

The campaign in the other place, as I said, is to increase the old age security pension. The great advocate, Stanley Knowles, who has a reputation for being something of a leader in this, said this:

> If the government wishes to retain its principle of a supplementary amount on top of that basic pension [$150] we will go along with it.

Here is the great champion of the poor. He said that if you make the pension available to all of the rich, then maybe—maybe—if you should want to increase it to the poor, he will go along with it. The Senate is far ahead of this honourable member in the other place. I hope the Senate continues its leadership. I hope our leadership trickles over there and that needed increases in pensions and income for the poor will be forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: I was hoping that the honourable senator would move that Senator Croll's report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. Croll: As a matter of fact, if you read the Speech from the Throne, there is a section in there that adopts it in principle.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We have had enough on the Speech from the Throne; we want to have something in effect.

Hon. Mr. Laird: You will get it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, 42 cents a month. You are generous people!

Hon. Mr. Bourget: What did you do when you were there in the 1960s?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: $46—

Hon. Mr. Bourget: That was one of the reasons why you were defeated.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have a short memory.

Hon. Bernard Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I am very mindful that this is the first time I have had the privilege of speaking in this chamber. I must, therefore, ask your indulgence.

I wish at the outset to say that I consider it a rare privilege to be associated with the distinguished men and women who sit in this house, and I want to thank all honourable senators for their generous welcome. Indeed, my gratitude extends in the same measure to the efficient officers and staff of the Senate itself for their many kindnesses.

To you, Madam Speaker, I extend sincere congratulations. Against the background of your considerable experience, ability and charm, I can only express confidence that your term as Speaker will be marked with the kind of success that is in keeping with the best traditions of this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Graham: At the same time may I offer felicitations to the former Speaker, Senator Deschatelets. He made all newcomers so welcome and so instantly at home, and by his wisdom and example set a standard which we might all hope to emulate.

• (1650)

We are all aware of the heavy responsibilities carried by the respective leaders, Senators Martin and Flynn. I can only pay the greatest tribute to their dedication and, indeed, the skill with which they discharge their duties.

While acknowledging my junior status, I should like to associate myself with those who welcomed the distinguished Privy Councillors and, indeed, my very talented and charming seatmate who so recently joined us in this chamber. I also extend congratulations, of course, to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply, Senators Hicks and Lafond, and to all senators who preceded me in this debate.

The Speech from the Throne, a most important document, is remarkably comprehensive in its scope. This program, a farsighted program which has such a clear sense of direction, has been presented to Parliament by a government headed by one of the most remarkable men of this generation, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I submit that our Prime Minister has made politics and the responsibilities of public life more relevant to more people than any other individual in the history of our country. He has demonstrated great qualities of leadership, strength and courage in his efforts to maintain a united Canada. The Throne Speech reflects his sensitivity to the needs of citizens in all regions, and his determination to provide, in so far as it is possible, equal opportunities for all Canadians.

The central theme of the Throne Speech is the twin concept of national unity and equal opportunity.

Honourable senators, we live in an age of affluence, with the highest standards of living, the highest levels of income, and the most advanced social welfare in our history. Yet at the same time over 20 per cent of Canadians live in unconscionable poverty. The globe itself is frustrated by the face-to-face existence of opulence and famine, and our so-called productive genius seems to be blockaded by our inability to solve the problems of distribution and to share fairly the world's resources and wealth.

In Canada, despite the expenditure of millions of dollars, we have been unable to solve the problems of disparity and inequality, which is perhaps a euphemistic way of saying that we have a problem of much poverty in a rich, developing country, and we ask ourselves why this should be so.

Perhaps our difficulties in this respect can best be explained by the lag between productive capacity and institutional response to rapid change. Perhaps the problem can be explained in terms of a lack of sufficient research into human relations. Perhaps the explanation lies in the fact that our advance in technical communications far exceeds our advance in human communications and our ability to produce adequate answers. Perhaps, I suggest, the primacy of our attention has been focused on the philosophical and the theoretical excellence of policies which in their practical application failed to reach beneficially those they were designed to reach. I am referring to people, to individuals, to human beings.

The real hope in Canada today is that governments at all levels will be able to bring to the problems that beset this country a new sensitivity, new co-operation, a new sense of compassion and understanding that will alleviate and in the end, hopefully, annihilate the serious injustices and inequalities that exist in various regions of the country.

It is in this spirit of understanding and co-operation that I note in the Speech from the Throne the government's emphasis upon its intention to consult extensively with provincial administrations with regard to the implementation of a wide variety of social and economic policies. Let us hope, honourable senators, that we are seeing the beginning of a decline in federal and provincial competition, and that this competition might be replaced by the kind of co-operation which is born of the realization that all governments exist to serve the people and that the people must come first.

I think at the same time we must emphasize the necessity of having a commitment to a strong central government, because without such a commitment it will be impossible to have any kind of commitment to the disadvantaged regions.

We have also noted a desire on the part of the government to tailor individual programs to the individual, specific needs and circumstances of different provinces and different regions. For example, when dealing with social security programs the Speech states that:

> . . . it must be recognized that Provinces may wish to have the structures of social security vary in accordance with the social needs, income standards and the cost of living in different communities.

The Speech contains proposals for federal-provincial consultation on a reorganization of the social security system, housing, freight rates, regional economic problems and other matters.

As a Nova Scotian I find that this strong emphasis upon the desirability of co-operative planning between Ottawa and the provinces holds great hope for progress in finding effective and workable solutions to the complex problems we face. I am convinced that historic problems such as economic disparity from region to region across this country can be successfully overcome only if we recognize that the economies of our various regions are not at all alike.

I think it is obvious to everyone, for instance, that in getting his goods to market the manufacturer in Sydney faces a completely different set of problems from the manufacturer in Toronto or Winnipeg. We should also recognize that a policy which might stimulate growth in one region might actually retard it in another.

Aware as they are of the particular needs and the opportunities which might exist within their own jurisdictions and within their particular regions, provincial governments are in a position to suggest modifications of federal policy which could well make the policy more effective. I suggest that flexibility is the key concept; flexibility based on the realization that economic objectives can be reached in different regions in different ways.

As some of you know, I have been involved with the problems of Nova Scotia for several years. In that period there has been a great deal of study, action and debate on the problems of disparity and development.

• (1700)

To begin an honest assessment of the problems of development, we have to look at the balance sheet of a region's assets and liabilities. These have to be considered with intellectual honesty. It is necessary to understand that this kind of assessment must be a blend of economic, social and political realities.

I do not think we can ignore for one moment that Canada is an economic paradox and that its survival over the years has depended upon economic compromise. Our economy is an unusually difficult one to operate without large regional disparities. The distinction of our generation, I suggest, is that we are becoming more aware of these disparities and, perhaps for the first time, we are attempting to do something about them. Up to this point in history these problems have been faced more with a "band-aid" type of solution, and I believe that these kinds of solution were devised because they were the only ones available. It is easy to criticize the welfare and subsidy type of solution, but it is far more difficult to find the lasting solutions that will provide for long-term inter-regional equity. No one has yet found the answer to regional disparity or regional development. It is even more difficult to find the answers or press the button for an instant solution in periods of slow economic growth such as we have experienced in Canada in recent years.

It is to the credit of governments, both at Ottawa and in Nova Scotia, that certain specific regional approaches have already been taken. The creation of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and the takeover of Sydney steel operations were bold approaches to long-term problems of regional decline. Both senior levels of government recognized and were convinced that ordinary approaches could not meet the challenges presented by the socio-economics of Cape Breton, and that this region would be faced with even greater chaos unless extraordinary measures were taken.

Nobody is going to leave the impression, least of all me, that the problems of steel and coal have been solved or that the long-term diversification of our economic base is almost a reality. But I suggest that we not forget the stark alternatives that faced the steel and coal industries in Nova Scotia in the late 1960s. We were told that steel was finished. By contrast, a multi-million dollar modernization program is under way. Coal was to be phased out. A program for substantial, continuing coal operations has been developed. DEVCO and SYSCO have together embarked on programs calculated to provide in excess of 6,000 jobs in industries that only six short years ago were labelled for total extinction. That, in my judgment, is commendable performance. It is a success achieved through the mutual co-operation of governments, management and labour. I suggest, indeed I hope, that not only the Province of Nova Scotia but other areas of the country will enjoy similar success through the same kind of mutual co-operation in future.

I submit that public participation is necessary to progress in our country. It is going to be necessary for the success of any given region. It is also necessary for people in disadvantaged areas to demonstrate that they themselves are doing the maximum job in developing their own resources, both human and natural. But it is very important for us to be brutally honest at all times in order that expectations of the people are not raised to unreachable levels, and that the problems that retard our development are not swept under the rug. At times I feel we must follow the prayer for sobriety—to accept the things we cannot change, having courage to change the things we can, with the wisdom to know the differnce.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Good old St. Francis Xavier.

Hon. Mr. Graham: The Strait of Canso area in Nova Scotia, which our Leader, Senator Martin, has visited on a number of occasions, today offers some of the most exciting prospects for industrial development in all of Canada. We have there one of the finest year-round, deep water ports in the world. Construction of a multi-user docking facility will put that part of Canada in the major leagues among world shipping and petroleum industries. Negotiations have been proceeding for some time between the government of Nova Scotia and several very large oil companies with a view to locating on the shores of this magnificent waterway. Oil and natural gas discoveries in offshore areas offer new hope that we can develop in Nova Scotia an economic base that will provide greater stability, and allow us to join the "have" provinces, thereby making an even greater contribution to the Canadian nation.

But, honourable senators, all our hopes and all our expectations could well be frustrated unless existing transportation costs and policies undergo sweeping changes. In our region we see a major fallacy in a program of redevelopment that has the tendency to provide major transportation subsidies for exporting raw and semi-finished materials, while at the same time making costs almost prohibitive to ship finished goods into other areas of Canada. This happens at the same time that we in Atlantic Canada are forced to pay the costs of protective tariffs that are designed to strengthen the secondary manufacturing sectors of other regions.

The remoteness of the Atlantic provinces from the central Canadian markets is one of the most troublesome features of the Canadian economy. We have already heard evidence that Westerners feel the same way in respect of their very similar problems.

The normal effect of present transportation costs is to centralize our nation's population and industries in a single area. But from the very beginning in Canada it was never intended that railway transportation should be treated as a matter of simple economic cost. Although the railway system was designed to build and bind together a new nation, its inequitable cost structure has, I suggest, for some decades served more to separate than to join Eastern, Western and Central Canada. I am therefore pleased to learn from the Throne Speech that the Government of Canada will meet with the provincial governments in the five regions of the country to examine the impact of freight rates on economic development and consumer prices.

Honourable senators, I cannot place too much emphasis on the assertion that we desperately need a new transportation policy that will provide the remote, disadvantaged regions with an equal opportunity to fully realize their growth potential.

In striving for national unity and equal opportunity, we must together help to remake society, as Senator Argue suggested, a society in which persons are recognized for their intrinsic dignity. It is impossible for man to become fully civilized until he has the security of the basic needs of humanity: food, clothing and shelter. The erosion and destruction of an individual's dignity brings about a basic dehumanization.

Basically then, in today's society it is not so much the problem of production, but the problem of equitable distribution; it is not the problem of the creation of wealth, but the problem of sharing some of that wealth with the large minority of the poor; it is not so much the problem of what man can do, but the real problem of what happens to man in the process.

I am sure that all honourable senators will welcome those passages in the Throne Speech which deal with social betterment. We are told, and rightly so, that the social security system must ensure to people who cannot work, the aged, the blind and the disabled, a compassionate and equitable guaranteed annual income. There will be proposals for increased pensions, and more attention will be paid to those people in special categories who have the greatest need for more assistance.

The entire section of the Speech dealing with the reorganization of Canada's total social security system has much to recommend it to the Canadian people.

I suggest that no economy is working as well as it should as long as there are people in quest of work and cannot find it. Statistical comparisons and the use of graphs and charts in this most serious problem are no substitute for jobs. The only realistic approach to keep pace with the tremendous increase in our labour force is to have greater growth in the economy, something to which the present government is totally committed.

At the same time, as the Throne Speech confirms, the social security system, as it applies to people who can work, must contain incentives to work, and a greater emphasis must be placed on the need to get people who are on social aid back to work.

Housing is one of the most serious social problems facing Canadians. I am pleased with proposals, as outlined in the Throne Speech and discussed here during the last couple of days between representatives of federal and provincial governments, to improve upon existing legislation. However, I would urge the Government of Canada to give consideration to the possibility of decentralizing some of the procedures of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation so that final decisions, where feasible, might be made on a regional basis. Greater autonomy in various sections of the country would do away with a lot of the so-called red tape which, I suspect, is the cause of unnecessary delays in approving various projects. I am also hopeful that a more realistic approach might be taken in respect of design as it applies to climatic conditions, material and building costs, and the ability to pay, as these factors relate to different regions of the country. But I must emphasize that if we are to have a realistic housing policy that will produce homes for people, this can only come about with an unconditional commitment by government to give housing a more important priority in Canada than it has up to this point.

One of the most perplexing problems that faces any disadvantaged region is that of providing for the education of its constituents. I am sure that Senator Hicks, Senator Rowe and others in this chamber are much better qualified than I am to speak on this important subject. On the one hand, they know it is urgent that they improve the quality of education on a continuing basis. And yet, in areas that are disadvantaged, or where poverty is prevalent, sometimes it is impossible to find the finances that will allow them to improve the level of educational service as it should be improved. May I assure you that I do not equate the cost and quality of education, but at the same time the improvement of quality demands considerable financial investment.

Across this country today there is a tendency, and perhaps rightly so in many instances, for all levels of government to curtail the increasing costs of educational services. We must get the best value for our educational dollar. I have no quarrel with the demands by government that those who are responsible for educational programs be made to account for their expenditures; but at the same time I would urge that governments at all levels make every effort to see that financial assistance is available to the disadvantaged areas in order that they may improve the quality of their educational services.

While it is true that there is some disenchantment with the costs and benefits of education, both on the part of the potential student population and the taxpayers, we must be ever conscious that if the poverty cycle is to be broken, one of the greatest hopes we have lies in a more adequate educational program for the people of disadvantaged areas.

Perhaps we are sometimes overly sensitive in the extremities of our country—at least I believe this to be true in parts of Atlantic Canada—but we are aware that many people in other parts of Canada are sometimes critical of federal aid to develop highway systems and other industrial infrastructures that in the long term ought to improve the economic prospects of our region and thereby improve the economy of the country as a whole. It is important for us to understand that the disadvantaged regions have played important roles in the development of this country.

However, faced with an economic system that is designed by technology and by economic policy to centralize, you will realize that the regions that are not enriched by these policies are still faced with extremely high costs of providing educational and welfare assistance that make it impossible for them to do many of the other things that people expect at this point in history.

While we often hear about the number of people who are drawn to the economic centres of the country, and who sometimes become liabilities in their new communities, I suggest that not enough is heard of the mass of skilled, competent people who greatly add to the prosperity of their adopted regions. Little is heard of the effect of losing these skilled manpower resources that consistently impoverish the disadvantaged regions.

Being a native of Nova Scotia, I think I can say that Nova Scotia has been one of those provinces which have improved many parts of Canada and, indeed, many parts of the world, through their native manpower resources.

It is heartening to know that this Parliament intends to investigate Canadian economic policies and their impact on economic development. I hope that this investigation will be wide-ranging and that it will include not only the impact of freight rates, but also the rationale for these costs, and not only the transportation effect on consumer prices, but that it will attempt to discover all the market manipulations that increase prices in the outer regions of this country.

We will need the total co-operation of all segments of government if we are to overcome both the human and the regional problems of disparity in Canada. This means that we will need major financial assistance and involvement on the part of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Any attempt to limit the resources of this department would be detrimental to evolving a strategy to provide equal economic opportunity to all regions. We also need to find out how our banking and other financial institutions can be more effective in providing sources of capital for economic development in the disadvantaged regions. Perhaps the proposal to redesign the Industrial Development Bank will be part of the answer, but, certainly if there is to be significant progress, there is a role for all financial institutions in all parts of the country.

Honourable senators, in closing I come back to the central theme of the Speech from the Throne, national unity and equal opportunity for all Canadians. I cannot envision more admirable goals and I cannot envisage one being achieved without the other. Let us remember, however, that with the best intentions and efforts in the world we have little hope of finding a permanent solution to the problem of national unity unless we realistically come to grips with the problems of regional disparity. We all know that if Canada has a national identity it is a mosaic of the regional and cultural identities. Because we are such a big country, for many years our communities developed in isolation from each other, separated by endless lakes and by, as someone called them, untamed forests. Regions developed with more distinct characteristics and cultures than you would find in more densely populated nations. In fact, regionalism became very prevalent and people felt that to be a good Canadian it was necessary first to be a good British Columbian, a good Quebecer or a good Nova Scotian. I suggest that the railway, which threaded our regions together, and the highways and airlines which, comparatively speaking, so recently joined the patchwork which is Canada, have not destroyed that essential regional identity.

So it follows that the health of the nation depends upon the health of the regions. Sickness or lethargy, whatever it is and wherever it is, affects each one of us.

It is essential, then, that we attend to the problems of the regions. I say it is essential because, in my judgment, we are at a critical stage, whether our particular concern is with the problems of national unity, regional cultural identity or economic survival.

You know, there is one attribute that all Canadians share, whatever their region: they are, for reasons far greater than narrow chauvinism, people of that region. But a sense of pride in heritage cannot survive in theory alone. The subsidy, or whatever we want to call it, cannot be a way of life, even though it may be intended to sustain a region for a time. We all want to pay our way. Self-sufficiency is imperative if pride of region and, consequently, national identity is to survive.

I suggest, with the greatest respect, that we all have our own unique contribution to make. But if we are to make it we will make it because all Canadians came to understand that the good of the whole is dependent upon the health of all its parts.

Hon. Mary E. Kinnear: Honourable senators, how can one find adequate words of expression in this debate after the beautiful and well prepared speeches we have heard today? I have the temerity to attempt it, and wish to speak on a subject of daily concern to all.

First of all, I would like to pay my compliments to several people. I think it was a wise and splendid choice when the Honourable Muriel McQueen Fergusson was chosen as the Speaker of the Senate for the Twenty-Ninth Parliament of Canada. My heartiest congratulations to her.

Congratulations also to the Leader of the Senate, the Honourable Paul Martin. His ability as a speaker is without parallel and he is a unique parliamentarian. He is as well known in international circles as he is in Canada.

Congratulations to the Leader of the Opposition. He has an important role to play and is admired for his analytical approach to all business before the chamber.

Congratulations also to our former Speaker, the Honourable Jean-Paul Deschatelets, who kept us all in order and whose sense of humour was timely.

To the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I tender my congratulations. Be assured that we appreciated the top quality of your addresses and their admirable presentation.

I also offer my congratulations to all other honourable senators who have spoken in this debate.

• (1730)

I extend a warm welcome to all new senators. They are experienced in the public life of Canada, and they bring to the Senate talent, diplomacy and common sense.

I too mourn the death of Mr. Pearson. He was a great diplomat, both in Canada and throughout the world, and a friend to us all in Parliament.

I propose reading from the Debates of the Senate of January 4, 1973—two paragraphs, the last paragraph at the bottom of page 9, and the first on page 10—as my initiative to speak on pollution. I am following closely the pollution situation in Canada. The paragraphs read as follows:

> Measures to protect the natural environment and to enhance the productivity of Canada's renewable resource industries will be laid before you. In addition to amendments to the Fisheries Development Act, you will be asked to consider an Environmental Contaminants Act and a Canada Wildlife Act.
> To preserve the ecological integrity of Canada's coastal and maritime areas, further preparations will be made for the Third United Nations Law of the Sea Conference. The Ministry of State for Science and Technology, in co-operation with the Department of the Environment and other interested departments, will recommend a national program of research and development in the field of Marine Science and Technology.

Today I intend to continue discussing some of the aspects of pollution. Nearly six years ago, when I made my maiden speech in this chamber, I attempted to point out the mounting problems of pollution, particularly in Southern Ontario. Now the individual is interested, and with everyone doing his bit to control pollution the situation should improve in an orderly manner. As a small example, it is now illegal to have a bonfire. Surely this step will educate us to the great danger of forest fires. Statistics show that most forest fires are started by careless smoking, and by leaving the scene before a bonfire is completely out.

Air quality must be assured. If not, persons suffering from respiratory infections will be adversely affected. In some parts of Southern Ontario it has been necessary to shut down temporarily the offending industry. It is now quite common to have the pollution count along with the weather report. Recently—on January 3, 1973, to be exact—we received a circular from the Minister of the Environment. The release contains tables showing acceptable levels of chemicals in the air. It tells us the condition of the atmosphere, but the average citizen does not know which chemical or combination of chemicals is causing the discomfort. He knows when his eyes smart or sting, when he gets a substance in his eye, or is confronted with an acrid odor.

We in Ottawa are fortunate to suffer very little from this pollution. In areas of heavy industry it is another matter, and the citizen looks to government to correct this condition quickly.

One source of pollution which concerns me very much is that of daily waste and garbage. Honourable senators might think that this is a municipal judgment, and they would be quite right, but in some large centres they are considering hauling trainloads and truckloads to the distant countryside, and this then becomes a provincial matter. If it is burned, the air becomes polluted. This is a national matter. Any way we look at it, it is becoming one of the world's great problems, and I trust it will be dealt with in federal-provincial meetings. Canada is a tremendous land mass, and it will probably be a long time before we encounter difficulty with over population. Now is the time to tackle pollution in all its forms. This is only good housekeeping.

I recognize that the worst air pollution is caused by car exhausts or emissions. Strict rules are demanded by government to have manufacturers develop the necessary equipment to meet the tests required for clean air.

Recently I was in a car that was fitted with a pollution control device. I found that the car used an increased amount of gasoline and slowed down on hills. That is something that I did not like. We need to have sufficient power at all times, especially on hills.

Until there are controls enforced by all levels of government regarding effluents, it will be difficult to maintain clean air and pollution-free waters.

From my observation, and in trying to keep in touch with government and the media, I believe we are beginning to make a considerable impact on the cleanup of our lakes, rivers and streams.

For example, in the summer of 1972 the Canada Centre for Inland Waters at Burlington, Ontario, researched thoroughly the water of Lake Ontario. One conclusion reached was that Lake Ontario was not as polluted as Lake Erie.

I can tell honourable senators that Lake Erie is not as bad as we thought. People have strange ideas about this lovely lake. While travelling to the airport in a limousine a passenger said, "Lake Erie is a dead lake; nothing is alive in it." That was the exact expression. How awful to make a statement of that nature. Fishing is increasing, one of the good signs being the catching of Cohoe salmon. Lake Michigan, an all-American lake, was stocked with Cohoe, which spread along the rivers and lakes, and they are now down to the northeast part of Lake Erie, which is at the junction of the Niagara River.

Among the beneficial effects is the fact that the Cohoe lives on smaller fish such as alewives and smelts. This upgrades the quality by having more marketable fish than the lower grades. During the spring of each year huge quantities of alewives are washed ashore. Municipalities have difficulty in disposing of them, thus leaving many to rot on the shore.

To prove the point of the finding of Cohoe salmon, I have two clippings from the Welland Tribune. In the first one, dated August 3, 1972, the author brings authority with him. He is Richard Loblaw, district fish biologist for the Aylmer district. I quote from the article:

> Frisky cohoe salmon from the American side of Lake Erie are jumping and biting near the sand banks of this community about 15 miles southeast of Chatham.
> The big silver fish, native to the Pacific Ocean, are hitting all kinds of artificial lures, mostly those with a silver finish.

Are those honourable senators who are fishermen interested?

> Richard Loblaw, district fish biologist for the Aylmer district of the ministry of natural resources, said:
> "Who said Lake Erie is dead? If anything it is too much alive."
> Reports in the late 1960's labelled the lake as dead because of excessive growth of algae and abundance of coarse fish.
> "Sure there are bad spots," said Mr. Loblaw. "The Detroit River basin is in bad shape but that doesn't mean the whole lake is the same." Cohoe up to 15 pounds have been caught and most of them have struck in shallow water while trolling.

• (1740)

> Erie, the shallowest of the lakes, has not been frequented by the lamprey, an eel-like predator that attaches itself to large fish and sucks out blood and other body juices.
> "We've only had one lamprey mark on a fish caught and that must be a good sign," said Mr. Loblaw. He said the public may have been misled by reports that Lake Erie was polluted.

Eels, I might say, are a great menace in Lake Ontario. I am pleased that the Cohoe in Lake Erie help get rid of the alewives and I would not mind if the smelts were eaten.

The second one, dated October 20, 1972, has a picture of a man holding a 26 inch seven pound Cohoe salmon caught by R. Turgeon of Welland at Morgan's Point.

Most of you know the water in the lakes and rivers is at a record high level. Tremendous damage and erosion have been experienced along the shores of the Great Lakes. Retaining walls have been washed out and much flooding has occurred. High water helps reduce pollution, but the damage by storms has been very high indeed.

Possibly we are at the end of the high-water cycle. Just a few years ago we had very low water and there was fear of a water shortage. In fact, in several places clouds were seeded to produce rain, with little success. Rain is the element which controls the level of the lakes and rivers. This past year proved it beyond a shadow of a doubt; there has been rain in abundance. We needed sunshine in between showers and received very little. I might add this type of weather is not the best for a fruit growing area such as Niagara, but I think farmers in other parts of Canada had less rain and more sunshine. Probably the year 1972 was not a vintage year for the wine producers, but I am certain a good product will emerge. Over 90 per cent of the wine produced in Canada is from grapes grown in the Niagara area.

I should like now to turn to another form of pollution which occurs in Southern Ontario, oil spills. Oil spills happen all too frequently, but now we are geared to such emergencies, and usually there is a quick cleanup. With the increasing demand for oil, it is obvious we must continue to oversee installation of pipelines with the greatest concentration on skilled, expert workmanship.

There is another kind of spill which causes alarm. I am referring to the chemicals carried in railway tank cars or, for that matter, in tank trucks. The one I am referring to took place recently in the Niagara fruit area about 10 or 12 miles from my home. There was a derailment of tank cars carrying sulphuric acid. This was a serious accident. Several families in the area were evacuated. Immediately there was great concern lest the sulphuric acid should get in the wells. Ditches and roads were blocked off and wells protected. Fortunately, there was no explosion or fire. Several acres of fruit land were turned into a spongy marsh-like area. After a complete survey of conditions, it was decided to strip the topsoil until all the sulphuric acid contamination was gone and then bring in good topsoil suitable for growing fruit. I hope all this can be finished in time for land use this spring. There is an ever-present danger of accidents of this nature because the trains and trucks carry many thousands of tons of explosive materials.

I read a fantastic article in the Globe and Mail of January 16, 1973, of which I have a copy, headed, "Residents of New Brunswick town say they are pollution prisoners." I am only going to refer to two short paragraphs. I find it unbelievable that something like this can take place. This situation in Morrison's Cove, near Chatham, New Brunswick, is a sad story. The industry concerned is Airscrew-Weyroc Canada Limited. I quote:

[Hon. Mrs. Kinnear.]

> Residents of Morrison's Cove complain they are prisoners in their own homes, can't drink the water or breathe the air because of pollution from a particle-board plant.
> Mr. Brown told him—

"Him" being Brian Barnes, environmental officer with the provincial environment department.

> —Morrison's Cove used to be a tranquil place. But now the water is polluted, the air is filled with wood fibre, wood chips and other waste and air compressors add noise pollution around the clock, he said.

That is a dreadful condition. Any industry starting anew and doing that should be taken before a pollution board immediately and stopped.

I quote again from the article:

> Judge Clendenning's decision came in a strictly local case involving sand removal from dunes beside Sandbanks Provincial Park near Picton.

I have read a great deal about this, as I am sure other honourable senators have.

The article continues:

> Agda Rayner, a Toronto secretary who vacations there, accused Lake Ontario Cement Ltd. and Triad Truckways of environmental pollution through noise emissions.

And I quote the judge's ruling:

> The judge ruled that environmental pollution of all types is of pressing national concern and therefore a federal jurisdiction under the British North America Act.

Each person must play a carefully scheduled part to take care of the daily waste, garbage and so forth. Industries must keep the air clean by scientific control of effluents emitted from their stacks. Industrial control of their sewage is a high priority. It is the same for municipalities throughout our nation. Constant offenders must be penalized by a large fine, to make it clear to them that the government means business, and they must also be made to correct immediately the conditions causing the pollution.

I believe we are making noticeable strides in pollution abatement.

On motion of Senator Laing, debate adjourned.

STANDING COMMITTEES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Committee of Selection which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the report was presented yesterday, and I am prepared to move its adoption now.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am opposing its adoption now.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, the purpose of my moving the adoption of the report now is that Senate committees can be organized, hopefully tomorrow, and proceed with their work, or at least establish their schedules of work as soon as possible. We will be receiving some matters from the other place which should be dealt with before too long. We have estimates before us now which should be dealt with.

• (1750)

So I move, seconded by Senator Smith, that the first report of the Committee of Selection be adopted.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think this cannot be moved until there is unanimous consent, and I do not think there is.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not give consent.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: On a point of order, I think the notice was given yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: That is, for today. Therefore I think the motion could be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It could be that you are right; I do not think so.

The Hon. the Speaker: On the motion itself, there is no need to have unanimous consent. I would put the motion now.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, before the motion is adopted, may I ask Senator Molgat a question? He mentioned earlier that the committees would have organization meetings, hopefully tomorrow. If so, may I suggest that the meetings be called consecutively.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Before the motion is put; before it is adopted?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I was going to refer to this after the adoption of the motion, but if it is preferred I will explain now what I have done.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Explain.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I have discussed with the Leader of the Opposition what I am proposing. The idea would be to proceed tomorrow morning at ten o'clock with a meeting of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which has before it the question of parole. Then at 10.30 the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce would meet. At eleven o'clock there would be a meeting of the Committee on National Finance, and at 11.30 a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture.

When I say "hopefully" I have in mind the fact that if the motion is not agreed to those committees cannot meet tomorrow. The Committees Branch has been warned in anticipation that the motion might be passed, but it is clearly understood that they are not to call those meetings until the motion is passed. The preliminary work has been done, and there was agreement from the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree with that, and as far as I am concerned I have no objection to the motion being put. However, I think it would be important for the Senate to know whether the objection made by Senator Croll is valid or not. Her Honour the Speaker has not ruled.

Yesterday a notice of motion was given by Senator Molgat, but we said at that time that there was no leave. I do not know if only one day is required. If that is the case then the argument made by Senator Deschatelets is valid and, of course, the motion can now be put. But if this motion requires two days' notice after having been put on the Orders of the Day, the objection by Senator Croll is valid. That is why I would like that point made clear—not because of the subject matter of the motion, since I am willing to give leave, but because on another occasion I would want to be able to use the argument of Senator Croll, if it is valid.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, on the point of order. I think there is some difficulty here caused by some confusion yesterday. Honourable senators will recall that the Rules Committee recommended, and the Senate adopted, the change in the order of the items in the Order Paper, putting Inquiries and Motions at the bottom of the order in which items are to be called by Her Honour the Speaker.

On two occasions yesterday attempts were made to ask for leave to put motions under the item "Notices of Motions." Objection was taken in both cases, and the objection was sustained.

I definitely recollect that Senator Molgat at that time asked that his motion be taken as notice, and I think Hansard will record that the Senate accepted that. Therefore, I think it can be taken that Senator Molgat did give notice. So the Senate at that time accepted his notice of motion, at the end of the proceedings yesterday. I submit to Your Honour that notice was given.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: And that under Rule 45, this motion qualifies for one day's notice.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It can be moved now.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That is right.

The Hon. the Speaker: In that case, honourable senators, I will put the motion, notice having been given in accordance with Rule 45.

It is moved by Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by Honourable Senator Smith, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make on the implication of this report. As you all realize, the representation on committees of senators on both sides of the house has been complicated by the fact that the rules have been changed, reducing to 20, from 30, the number of senators serving on each committee. Furthermore whereas the representation of the Official Opposition was about one-third on committees until this Parliament—because we were more numerous at the beginning of the former Parliament—it has now been reduced to one-fifth on each committee. That is a fair measure, mathematically speaking, but that has forced us to remove from some committees many members who had been serving for years, and who enjoyed the work of those special committees to which they were attached.

In consequence of this, I would like to make a suggestion. It is too often forgotten by senators that they may attend committee meetings without being committee members, and that the only handicap they suffer when they attend meetings of committees of which they are not members is that they cannot vote. It is very seldom that we vote in committees; it is only on very special occasions. Therefore, I suggest that the notices of the meetings of the committees be sent to all senators—not only to those who are members of the committees, but to all senators—so that all those who are interested in what may be dealt with by a given committee can attend, whether they are members of that committee or not.

If that were done, more senators could attend on occasion. They would be warned in advance. The notices given in our Order Paper very often come too late for senators to know when a committee is meeting and what is to be dealt with.

Furthermore, both sides could judge, by the attendance of non-members, who should be a committee member, and which members appear not to be interested.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I am opposed to the motion. It may have to be adopted on division. As to the report, I think part of it is unduly contrived and balanced in a way that is detrimental to the public. On another occasion, I shall have something to say about that, but for the moment, if the motion is adopted, it will be on division.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I thank those honourable senators who participated in the debate. I am not quite sure what Senator Croll means by "unduly contrived." I can assure you that as to any portion I had to do with, or that anyone I know of had to do with, there was no contriving.

The Senate decided last year to reduce the number of members on standing committees from 30 to 20. And there being a large number of new senators, it was obviously impossible to satisfy all senators on this occasion in so far as the selection of committees was concerned. It is an unfortunate situation which I happen to have inherited, but on which the Senate has made its decision. I think the suggestion made by Senator Flynn regarding notice to all members of the Senate is good. I will check with the Committees Branch to see if it presents any difficulties. I think that reminding all senators that they can attend whatever committees they wish is a wise thing.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by Honourable Senator Smith, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Report adopted, on division.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE TO COMMONS—SENATE MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the Clerks at the Table to inform that House that the Honourable Senators Asselin, Bélisle, Cameron, Choquette, Côté, Fournier (De Lanaudière), Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Gouin, Heath, Hicks, Kinnear, Lapointe, McIlraith, O'Leary, Quart and Yuzyk, have been appointed a Committee to assist the Honourable the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as Members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the said Library.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE TO COMMONS—SENATE MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the Clerks at the Table to inform that House that the Honourable Senators Asselin, Bonnell, Bourque, Duggan, Fournier (Restigouche-Gloucester), Gouin, Greene, Haig, Heath, Isnor, Macdonald, McGrand, Michaud, Neiman, O'Leary and Sullivan, have been appointed a committee to superintend the printing of the Senate during the present Session and to act on behalf of the Senate as Members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE TO COMMONS—SENATE MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the Clerks at the Table to inform that House that the Honourable the Speaker, the Honourable Senators Heath, Inman, Langlois, Macdonald, Norrie and Welch, have been appointed a Committee to direct the management of the Restaurant of Parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as Members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the said Restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

MESSAGE TO COMMONS—SENATE MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the Clerks at the Table to inform that House that the Honourable Senators Flynn, Forsey, Goldenberg, Lafond, Neiman, Rowe, Thompson and Walker, have been appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the Joint Committee of both Houses on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

NOTICE OF MEETINGS

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not sure if this is the proper time but, with leave, I should like to ask Senator Molgat to indicate which committees will meet tomorrow for organizational purposes. Will there be just the four that he mentioned? I take it that with respect to the other committees, organizational meetings will take place on another occasion?

Hon. Mr. Martin: So that they will not be too crowded.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, and to avoid overlapping.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: On that point, honourable senators, the Committees Branch will be sending out notices to all members of the Senate advising that tomorrow morning the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will be meeting at 10 o'clock; the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will be meeting at 10.30; the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will be meeting at 11 o'clock; and the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will be meeting at 11.30. These meetings will be purely organizational, for the purposes of selecting chairmen and determining the course of action from that point on.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Where will the meetings be held?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I believe they will be held in Room 256-S.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISRUPTIONS IN MAIL SERVICES—STRIKE OF ELEVATOR TECHNICIANS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, there are some questions on the Order Paper for tomorrow under Inquiries. They were asked by Senator Cameron yesterday, and as I cannot be here tomorrow I wonder if I could provide the answers now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The questions are:

1. (1) In view of the continuing irresponsible disruption of the mail service of this country by postal workers, does the government plan to take disciplinary action against those causing the disruption?

(2) What penalties, if any, are charged against wildcat strikers? Do they lose pay for the days they are off? Are any other disciplinary measures taken such as fines and/or discharge?

(3) When postal or other employees engage in wildcat strikes can they:

(a) draw unemployment insurance, and

(b) if so, under what terms or conditions?

(4) What plans, if any, has the government in mind to bring an end to the chaotic situation in the postal service, such as:

(a) making it a crown corporation, or

(b) turning the service over to a private corporation under contract.

(5) Has the government any plans to remove labour negotiations from the Treasury Board?

(6) Has the government given consideration to setting up an independent, non-governmental bargaining agency for employees in the Public Service?

2. In view of the fact that the strike of the elevator technicians has been in progress for some 22 weeks with no sign of a settlement, and because their disruption of service has already cost hundreds of thousands of dollars plus untold inconvenience to elderly people, does the government contemplate any action to bring this inexcusable disruption of service and business to an early conclusion?

The answers are as follows:

1. (1) Where the disruption of mail service is caused by employees in violation of the collective agreement, disciplinary action is taken by the employer.

(2) Where unlawful strikes occur, the employees who participate are not paid for their periods of absence from work and disciplinary action is taken by the employer. I would like, however, to distinguish between a lawful strike and an unlawful one, and in this context I should point out that employees of the Postal Operations group have been in a lawful strike position since December 21, 1972.

(3) Employees who engage in wildcat strikes, which I take to mean unlawful strikes, are not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

(4) (a) Detailed studies were conducted leading to Consultants' recommendations that the Post Office be established as a Crown Corporation. These recommendations have been delivered to government for consideration.

(b) The government has no plans to turn the postal service over to a private corporation under contract. As the postal service operates at a deficit there is no attraction to a private corporation to undertake its service especially on a nationwide basis as is required of the Post Office Department. Furthermore, there is no assurance that a private corporation could avoid service problems through work disruption.

(5) Under the Public Service Staff Relations Act the Treasury Board represents the government as employer and, therefore, the responsibility for collective bargaining belongs with Treasury Board. The honourable senator is no doubt aware that the Post Office Department has on this occasion negotiated on behalf of the Treasury Board with the Council of Postal Unions.

(6) No.

2. The construction industry and the manufacture of elevators are operations within the constitutional jurisdiction of the ten provincial authorities. Our concern has been made known to officials of provincial Departments of Labour and mediation meetings have been held in Ontario and are planned in Quebec.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

AUTHORITY TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved pursuant to notice:

That, for the duration of the present session of Parliament, should an emergency arise during any adjournment of the Senate, which would in the opinion of the Honourable the Speaker warrant that the Senate meet prior to the time set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to notify honourable senators at their addresses registered with the Clerk of the Senate, to meet at a time earlier than that set out for such adjournment, and non-receipt by any one or more honourable senators of such call shall not have any effect upon the sufficiency and validity thereof.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, January 25, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat tabled:

Copy of a Report, dated December 29, 1972, from the Hearing Officer (J. W. Swackhamer, Esq.), pursuant to section 8(4)(d) of the Expropriation Act, chapter 16 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970, and Appendix thereto, with respect to the location of an international airport at Pickering, Ontario.

Copies of Communiqué, dated January 23, 1973, issued following the Federal-Provincial Conference on Housing held at Ottawa, January 22-23, 1973.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE EXPENSES TABLED

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, tabled a report, pursuant to Rule 84(3), of the expenses of the committee incurred in connection with the examination of the parole system, during the Fourth Session of the Twenty-eighth Parliament.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON THE PAROLE SYSTEM IN CANADA

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, January 30, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon all aspects of the parole system in Canada, including all manner of releases from correctional institutions prior to termination of sentence;

That the said Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination;

That the Committee, or any subcommittee so authorized by the Committee, may adjourn from place to place inside or outside Canada for the purpose of carrying out the said examination; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the third and fourth sessions of the 28th Parliament be referred to the Committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the honourable senator, if the Senate should adjourn until February 6, can this wait, in view of the fact that you mentioned next Tuesday?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Did Senator Flynn put that question to me?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Since you indicated that you intend to give notice on Tuesday next, can it wait until the following Tuesday, because rumour is that we will adjourn to February 6?

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: My committee does not pay any attention to rumours.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You will come to pay some attention to them.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: They are the most reliable source of information.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March 1973, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 9th January 1973.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, it would be my intention, since this motion has now received leave, to call the committee together to examine supplementary estimates (A) on Tuesday, February 6, at 2 p.m., unless the Senate sits at an earlier date, in which case it would be my intention to call the committee on that earlier date, if it were possible to have the witnesses attend.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As long as it does not conflict with the motion of Senator Goldenberg.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 6, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, rumours notwithstanding, the course of business is not too clear in the immediate next few days.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not new.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: The estimates are presently under consideration in the other place. There is also a bill on unemployment insurance before the other place. Both these measures are of some urgency, but we do not know when the other place will have completed its work. I am sure that it is the desire of honourable senators to be ready to receive this legislation as soon as it is passed by the House of Commons. When the legislation is available we want to be in a position to notify all honourable senators and call the Senate back, possibly next Thursday or Friday. It may not be possible until the following Monday, but in any case I hope we will be able to deal with the legislation as soon as it is received here.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you mean Monday, February 5?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That is right. I do not foresee that we would have any business on Monday or Tuesday of next week. Presumably we could on Thursday or Friday or the following Monday.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

HON. PAUL MARTIN, P.C.

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER—INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I put a question to the interim government leader concerning the absence of the government leader? We are all concerned at his absence today and are proceeding with business while remembering Lamartine's lines:

Un seul être nous manque et tout est dépeuplé.

Where is Senator Martin?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I am pleased to see that Senator Flynn is not only a talented politician, but also a poet. I must inform honourable senators that Senator Martin, the government leader in the Senate, is away on government business. He is travelling on behalf of the government in Africa. He is not there on holiday. He will, we hope, be back Monday or Tuesday, i.e., February 5 or 6. I am sure he will read with great pleasure what my honourable colleague said about him and how much he misses his presence.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Hicks, seconded by Senator Lafond, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Arthur Laing: Honourable senators, I have noticed that all senators who have spoken in this debate have directed their first attention toward our presiding officer, and I am going to make no exception.

In the range of tributes paid you, Madam Speaker, I am reminded of Fulke the bible maker who in 1598 presented a bible to his Queen, Elizabeth I, in which he attributed to her "all princely ornaments not less but even greater than all your noble progenitors."

I have an idea that the Prime Minister, in appointing our presiding officer and conferring this honour upon her, will in the future prove to have done honour also to this institution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Laing: I want to take this opportunity of extending to my fellow senators my gratitude for the uncommon amount of kindliness and assistance given me since I experienced the metamorphosis from the other place. I hope in the time that I might be here to make a contribution to this place and to the policies which I hope the government, and succeeding governments, will adopt in Canada's interest.

I want to compliment the mover and the seconder, and, indeed, all those participants in the debate. I do this not in any mechanical manner, because I consider the standard of debate to have been exceedingly high.

Honourable senators, it would have been my preference to have deferred speaking in this chamber until I had come to know better both you and the rules which exist in this place. However, extremely significant adjustments in the field of energy supply have emerged at exactly the same time as the Government of Canada has indicated its intention of paying special attention to Western Canada and the Canadian North. Western Canada and the Canadian North live by development of their resources. It adds nothing to the ease of governing this nation to find that the chief resources of soil, water, forest, mineral, and sometimes petroleum lie largely west of Winnipeg and in the Canadian Arctic. This characteristic will multiply its evidence in the years immediately ahead, and likewise multiply our profits.

It is a tragedy that those who live by resources are charged with being hewers of wood and drawers of water. There are some today who say that being a hewer of wood and drawer of water is not bad when you are the highest paid people in the country. Generally, however, it can be accepted that a man's prosperity depends upon the land on which he stands. It has been the history of all resource-rich nations that until they develop a consuming population at home, they market resources in primary state. It alarms me that those who extract our minerals are today subjected to ignorant and even vicious attacks as creators of ugly holes in the ground, who, when the ore is exhausted, dismiss their employees to be thrown on the public welfare roles. This kind of talk does enormous disservice to our nation.

Of all our competences, Canadians are the most proficient miners in the world. The mining schools of our universities and of the federal and provincial departments of mines are recognized the world over. In 1972 our production of minerals reached $6.3 billion, or 12 per cent of our gross national product, almost 80 per cent of which was exported. Remarkable new technologies, many developed in Canada, are bringing into production low grade and complex ores. The illimitable intelligence of man is turning hitherto useless rock into metal for the world's needs.

In British Columbia we are recovering copper held in rock at eight pounds per ton. We have one property out there now mining 37,000 tons of ore a day, and several more in the 25,000 to 30,000 ton-a-day range. Instead of uninformed criticism, these engineers and technologists should have special honour set aside for them. Time was when the Canadian railroaders provided the imagination and courage to develop this nation. Their great record of providing the true Canadian character is today supplied by the mine finder, the mining engineer and the metallurgist. Those reputed ugly holes and piles of waste are quite within the possibility of reseeding and replacement.

Mining is moving west. Twenty-five years ago in British Columbia our production was $60 million. In 1972 it was $520 million. In 1972 Alberta for the first time overtook Ontario, with production exceeding $2 billion. Both Saskatchewan and Manitoba are advancing rapidly.

In some cases one man is in charge of machinery that costs a quarter of a million dollars. They say mining is of no value because it employs no men. You might as well argue that to operate an airline is of no value because it requires only a pilot and a crew of seven. The mining industry today uses a wide range of services. Every yellow page in the telephone book is used by the mining companies, and there are tens of thousands of people behind the man who is out there on the machine—this applies to the mining industry just as much as it does to the aviation industry.

Not too long ago I saw a monstrous machine in one of our mines in British Columbia. It cost $257,000, and one man was in charge of it. I looked in the belly of the machine and I found four diesel engines. Two of them were built in Italy and two came from the outskirts of Glasgow, Scotland. This machinery is not built in one plant; it is assembled. Today we are importing into this country about $800 million worth a year of this kind of machinery, which I think today Canadians have the competence to assemble here.

As to the potash mines in Saskatchewan, if they were near salt water there would not be another potash mine operating in the world. But they have to pay $8 a ton freight to salt water. There is a new machine out there with an extensible belt. It was designed by Canadians but built in the United States at a cost of $2½ million. It was put down the shaft and assembled there. That one machine, operated by three men, has a record of 11,500 tons of potash brought to the surface in 24 hours. I think we could build this machine in Canada, and with some assistance from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources we could bring the firms together who are competent to do this within Canada.

Canada today is the world's largest producer of asbestos, zinc, nickel and silver. We are number two for potash, molybdenum, gypsum, uranium and sulphur. Our mines produce more than $300 annually per capita of our population.

Our Western strength is under attack from the environmentalists, and important economists who have coined a phrase, just as simple as their thinking, "leave it in the ground."

The cause of the ecologists is noble and good, but I want to warn them that at present they are in great danger of self-destruction through emotion and excessive language. The first who must "come clean" are the environmentalists themselves. They must compose their thinking between the standards involved in their dreams, a continuation of those comforts and amenities we all enjoy, and the alternative, invasion of all their private rights.

They talk about sweeping tankers off the seas. Do you know that today 52 per cent of all the tonnage afloat is tankers? And that with the new L.N.G. ships now under construction, by 1980 that tonnage will exceed 60 per cent. Verily, indeed, the world in which we now live runs on oil. The "leave it in the ground" school has another counsel to give the Canadian public. They tell us that if massive sums of money of this nature are required to build northern pipelines, and if these sums are acquired outside the country, it will lead us to financial bankruptcy. Honourable senators, I always thought it was the poor nations and not the rich nations that had financial difficulties. Let me say only this: if we cannot finance utilities, which are a sure thing, within our own borders for our own internal growth and for our external markets as well, then the first priority of the nation must be the restructuring of our banking and financial institutions.

The exploding productivity of our western mines is now accompanied by a redoubled effort at exploration in the field of energy sources.

Because of the enormous consumption of energy in the United States, coinciding with the rising tide of nationalism in the OPEC nations, our great neighbour is threatened with industrial dislocations of staggering magnitude. It was only natural that United States users and legislators should look to Canada. Energy and security are indivisible, and land connection and political stability become attractive.

We have American legislators talking again of "continental resources." In 1964 a very reputable American firm of engineers produced what they called a conception of a 900-mile lake of water in our Rocky Mountain trench to provide electric power, urban water supply and irrigation to the entire continent. It was not an insane dream. If one man owned the continent, he would probably establish 900 miles of water at an elevation of 2,400 feet. But one man does not own the continent, and it is our interest to see that he does not. At that time I had been invited to Portland, Oregon, for a resource conference, and I felt required to make some comment. What I said then was this:

> There are no such things as continental resources. This water is ours and it will be our purpose to do with it what we consider to be in our national interest. It will be soon enough to talk of continental resources when United States markets become continental markets; when United States capital becomes continental capital and when United States technology becomes continental technology.

When I quote myself I am reminded of my late, great friend, the Right Honourable Ian Mackenzie, who in the other place on one occasion was quoting interminably from a document, with the inevitable result that someone on the Opposition side got up and said, "From what is the right honourable gentleman quoting?" To which he replied, "I'm quoting myself!" And in respect of this matter I will continue to quote myself in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the best authority.

Hon. Mr. Bourget: It is the B.C. method.

Hon. Mr. Laing: This statement was made by me at that time because I thought then as I think now, that within 50 years fresh, clean water will be the world's greatest attractant for both industry and new population. Canadians should know that at the present time we have 35 per cent of all the fresh, clean water in the world.

No Canadian is a greater admirer of the U.S. nation and its people than I. They remain our nearest, best, our most indispensable friend and ally. The postwar policy from the Marshall Plan down to the present has been a hallmark of generosity and goodwill, the latter occasionally misplaced. My wish now is that our American friends would think of Canada at times other than when their lands are parched and their lights begin to go out. It is less than two years since we were asked to accept a voluntary quota on oil of 395,000 barrels a day. Now we are giving them 750,000 barrels a day, and there is pressure to remove all quotas on Canadian oil.

The potential Canadian energy resource base is very large, and this base extends to all forms of energy. In hydroelectric sources we have enjoyed since 1945 an average growth rate of over 6 per cent. By 1990 it is estimated that 20 per cent of our primary energy will still be supplied by falling water.

We have long known of our coal reserves. Now we know of the presence of not less than 118 billion tons in the three most westerly provinces alone. Yet we have cries going up about the exports of 9 million tons of coal annually. But do you realize that at that rate our exports are good for 13,000 years?

Our reserves of uranium oxide are some 230,000 tons, with an assumed price of $10 per pound. If you extend those figures you will see that there is a value there of $46 billion. Some technological difficulties at the defensive tactics of ecologists may prevent atomic energy from occupying more than 14 per cent of Canada's power field by 1990.

The Canadian Petroleum Association estimates there is a potential for no less than 725 trillion feet of natural gas in Canada. They tell us the Western Canada sedimentary basin contains 270 trillion feet—the same potential is attributed to the Arctic Islands, and a further 150 trillion cubic feet are thought to lie under our Atlantic shores.

I recall the enthusiastic announcement of the late, great C. D. Howe in 1950 that it was evident we now possessed two trillion feet of natural gas under the Western plains, and he hoped this was an augury for a great future. Now having consumed and exported vast quantities across the years to the present where annually we extract two trillion feet, we now have firm reserves of 57 trillion feet.

If we err on the side of the conservative figures I have indicated, it would be in the Arctic islands. In late March last year as a guest of Panarctic Oils, I visited at latitude 80 degrees, over 2,000 miles north of here, a well with an open flow of 180 million cubic feet daily. If that well were in Southern Alberta, it would give us a production value of $16 million. There are comparable wells 900 miles apart. The entire Arctic basin appears to be a great storeroom of gas and, hopefully, oil reserves.

So they say its in the wrong place! Honourable senators, until the railways came to Canada everything in this nation was in the wrong place. Canada's story is the story of the task of getting people and things from hence to thence. That has always been our story and still is. The new vehicles of transport and new techniques lie immediately ahead of us. These great reserves of energy will be marketed. Proposals are afoot for an oil pipeline across our northern territories to carry Prudhoe Bay as well as Canadian oil; in other words, to combine production from Prudhoe Bay with the new considerable finds of oil in our Mackenzie Delta. There will soon be a proposal for a gas pipeline from Prudhoe Bay but also to carry Canadian gas. The oil companies have already spent $40 million on these studies including protection of the environment and our federal government is in the process of spending $16 million more. The Government of Canada should say now that, subject to our conditions, these applications will receive enthusiastic approval of the Government of Canada. The conditions are:

1. Environmental protective provisions must be satisfactory; this is simple, as a pipeline requires for servicing a right-of-way only 100 feet in width.

2. The pipelines crossing Canada must be common carriers.

3. Equity control of such pipelines must be retained in Canadian hands.

So much of Canadian resource industry is presently owned abroad that even some Canadians despair of insisting upon Canadian ownership of facilities involving such immense capital. Honourable senators, they are not aware of the nature of the demand for this energy south of the border. Yes, I admit export is imperative because when we talk of investments of $5 billion, an export component is necessary.

Demand is so intense that even today $140 million of exploration funds from the United States have been advanced to exploration companies on the sole condition that the financing company has first call on 50 per cent of all finds, at a price to be then determined. When our neighbours will put up this kind of risk money for prospective gas there is no question of ample debenture money for a bird in the hand. More importantly, what a tribute these people are paying to the richness of our fields!

We and the Soviet Union together occupy 90 per cent of the Arctic region. The first president of the Russian Academy said 206 years ago, "The might of Russia will rise out of the resources of Siberia." I believe our territories north of the 60th parallel will give us in resource values 50 per cent of all the mineral and petroleum values in the nation.

The Yukon and Northwest Territories comprise 1,500,000 square miles, or almost 40 per cent of the land mass of Canada. A week ago last Sunday I saw on television an ecologist who said we must insist that the Arctic be kept as a playground. If you put a line up the centre of Canada you will find that the Arctic population is made up of one person per 178 square miles. Enormous changes are taking place there. The greatest improvement came from jet plane service as far north as the Arctic Islands. We owe a great debt to the airlines providing these services, two from Western Canada and one from Quebec. Historically workers went north to make a stake and get out. Now families intend to stay and raise their families as northerners with, in the centres, educational and health facilities equal to those in the large centres of Southern Canada. We are engaged in an evolving system of government in the territories. We have commissioners in the Territories answerable to the Minister of Northern Affairs—Commissioner Smith in the Yukon and Commissioner Hodgson in the Northwest Territories. Both are magnificent men rendering great service to Canada—they had to be good men because I appointed them—and they are supported by councils, one wholly elective in the Yukon and the other soon to become wholly elective in the Northwest Territories. When a man works, pays taxes, and intends to raise his family in an area, he wants to have what he calls "government on the ground." Because the North has suddenly become exciting, there is a tendency for departments in Ottawa to inject themselves into northern matters, most of them with no experience. Northern administration from Ottawa should reside in the Department of Northern Affairs entirely and that department should transfer its functions as quickly as possible to the territorial administration and as soon as the local northern administrations can demonstrate competence. Resource development and control must remain in Ottawa because assistances will be required that only the national government can supply.

In the area of oil, the Canadian Petroleum Association tells us that conventional oil reserves are 120 billion barrels, of which they estimate 50 billion will be recovered from the western sedimentary basin, including the Mackenzie Delta, 40 billion from the Arctic islands and some 30 billion in the offshore east. Then we have in excess of 300 billion barrels in the Athabaska Oil Sands of Alberta where in a battle against abrasive, magnificent technology is now bringing sands oil within 25 cents per barrel of conventional well costs.

The fact is that on this continent we have maligned the energy developer and underpriced his product. Our Constitution, probably with more wisdom than was realized at the time, provided for federal export permits of energy. On the other hand, these resource energies and their development rests within the jurisdiction of the provinces where they lie.

The President of the United States has indicated an early statement on the energy situation in his country. It is almost certain that a massive return to the use of coal and steeply accelerated search for new energy sources will be incorporated in the plan.

There is little likelihood that over an extensive period of time this world will experience scarcity in any commodity. Much of the current legislation of governments is directed to what is termed "orderly marketing" by restricting production. The scientist will soon find ample quantities of new kinds of energy with fusion power whose raw material is sea water, making life easier than ever in the twenty-first century.

But in the short run, heavy weather lies ahead on this continent with radical increases in energy costs. In the United States an almost immediate increase of 25 cents per million B.T.U.s is indicated—this translates to $1.56 per barrel of oil. For the chemical industry alone there will be an added annual cost of some $17 billion. By 1980 it is estimated imported energy will cost the U.S. $30 billion annually. Export markets are available today by new contracts at prices far above current domestic prices. This interesting situation has not gone unnoticed by the people and the Government of Alberta from whom we derive today 92 per cent of our domestic petroleum and gas.

Because of our divided authority on energy problems, and because in the East we import almost exactly as much oil as we export in the West, we must have a national objective. Throughout the years we have been magnificently served by our National Energy Board. Its constant review of reserves has assured us of an adequate future supply for all prospective contingencies of Canadian industrial growth in the areas that can be economically served by western production. It has assured the security of our eastern imports. The first imperative now is a policy that will encourage early prove-up of the extremely promising prospective resources on the Atlantic banks and the Eastern Arctic.

Alberta, and its clever government, wants in the domestic market what its gas and oil will bring in our big adjacent foreign market. I think this is an ambition that cannot be denied. Our projected marketings to Central Canada forward to 1990, an increase of only 10 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, means an added cost to them of almost $5 billion.

I read a short editorial in the Ottawa Citizen last night. It was as simple as the fellow who must have written it. The import was that Western Canada cannot do that to us or we will have them in court. As a Westerner, I want to tell that newspaper and all honourable senators that it is that kind of simple indifference to Western Canada that Western Canadians do not like and will not stand for in the future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Laing: Western Canada and the Canadian North, by the bounty of their resources, hold the key to Canada's future. The very nature of our resource industry has provided us with the most competent and highly productive labour force in the nation without question.

We speak of an energy policy for Canada. The Government of Canada has an energy policy upon which improvement would be difficult. It is to assure an ample supply of resources within our boundaries to take care of the needs of all prospective industry and households in the future and thereafter to export surplus at the highest price our energy will command.

That is our policy and I hope it continues to be our policy.

Honourable senators, since I have been in this chamber I have heard a number of excellent speeches dealing with important matters, some of them calling for the expenditure of additional huge sums of money, others dealing with matters of the heart. Someone once said that a statesman should have his heart in his head. I think it was Napoleon who said this, and had he taken his own advice he might have lasted a little longer. I think it is only fair to tell you that I am from an area where some matters which are of deepest concern to most Canadians are not of concern to us. They are important to this part of Canada and to some other parts, that is recognized. However, we in the west have other preoccupations. There is a tremendous drive, tremendous energy, and tremendous competence in Western Canada today. We are building icebreakers for eastern harbours. Do you know that Vancouver handles more freight than Montreal, Quebec City, Halifax and Saint John combined? Then there are other outlets such as the North Fraser Harbour, with its 16 million tons, and the Fraser River Harbour, and Squamish, all within an area of 30 miles of Vancouver. They carry more salt water tonnage than the rest of Canada together. There are immense projects going on in Western Canada today. We are on the Pacific Ocean which is the ocean of the future.

I have endeavoured to give you some of the ambitions and hopes of Western Canada. I think it is important that we are making contributions, and some out of our own pockets, to other parts of Canada. I do not think it is given to a man in one part of Canada to tell a man in another part of Canada that he is making his living in a wrong manner, especially when one or two of those fellows reside in provinces which have their hands in our pockets. These are the considerations, the thoughts and feelings of Western Canada. I have tried to bring them before this chamber today in the hope that they will be recorded, and that it will give you some idea of our concerns, our immense hope, our unlimited ambition, and the fantastic resources that are ours in that area.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, as probably the last speaker on the motion from this group I may perhaps be permitted to agree immediately with Senator Laing's statement, that this has been an excellent, interesting and, for me, very informative debate. I have not agreed with everything that has been said on either side but I must say that it has been my impression that important things have been said in this debate in an important way by all previous speakers. I refer particularly, of course, to the mover and the seconder of the motion. They set a very high standard in introducing the motion, which has been followed particularly, if I may say so, by some of our newest senators, who have given clear evidence that they will be heard as well as seen in this chamber.

We have been told over and over again that the document to which the motion invites response has something for everyone, and those multitudinous "somethings" have been gone over many times by previous speakers, constituting a challenge to a latecomer to the debate to say anything novel at this stage. I am fully aware of Shakespeare's warning about wasteful and ridiculous excess in gilding refined gold or painting the lily. Nevertheless, if I may, I will paint at least one lily in my opening remarks and, perhaps, gild a few bits of refined gold.

In looking over the speeches I was struck by the fact that I was able to count 22 admiring adjectives directed to the person and career of Senator Fergusson, our new Speaker. After some thought I thought of the twenty-third, which would be rather personal and certainly extravagant. I will not embarrass her by suggesting it at this time. It will, perhaps, be enough to say that in the 10 years I have been here I cannot think of anything better that has happened in the Senate or to the Senate than the appointment of Senator Fergusson to this high honour. I may add that her appointment is a very fitting reward for many years of outstanding service in the chamber and its committees and, if I may make a personal observation on which I have considerable knowledge, her outstanding contribution as a representative of Canada internationally in many countries of the world.

I am sorry that the Leader of the Government is not here, because it is my intention to pay my respects to him at this time. I have not always agreed with him, but I think it is important that we say more often perhaps than we do that we know that the Leader of the Government has at all times the interests of this chamber at heart, that in spite of what may appear, and what certainly are, at times conflicts of interest in his responsibilities, he has devoted himself in an outstanding way to reviving and restoring the prestige of the Senate.

I am sorry that my own leader has left. He has another engagement, so I do not think he has run away from the compliment I wish to pay him. Perhaps honourable senators are not all aware of the fact that in our group we exercise the right in each new Parliament of electing our leader. Senator Flynn has fought some hard and some easy campaigns in his career, but I can assure you that the easiest election he ever had was when we met recently to renew our confidence in him. We on this side are proud to serve with him, and I think all honourable senators will agree that his courage, his ability, and the agility of his mind make a necessary contribution to any democratic institution like this, where a forceful Opposition is essential to the proper conduct of our business.

I am glad to see that Senator Deschatelets is here. He was a very distinguished Speaker for a number of years. What pleases me most perhaps is the fact that after presiding over our affairs impartially and efficiently for those years, when he came to give us a verdict on the game he decided to take his seat on this, rather than on the other, side of the house.

Hon. Mr. Cook: He is so generous.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I come now, honourable senators, to the Speech from the Throne. It begins well, I think, with the reference to the Queen, which we appreciate both for itself and, perhaps, as an indication that the government today is taking a new look at our institutions and has decided that the institution of the Queen in Parliament may in many respects have some decided advantages over the presidential and other systems, to which some members at least of that government have seemed to lean for some time.

There is a reference immediately to the Commonwealth. The speech refers to the fact that the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh will be present in Ottawa for the meeting of the heads of the Commonwealth countries. The speech then tells us that the government, which will be host for the first time of these periodic meetings, attaches much importance to the Commonwealth and its common traditions, institutions and language. Perhaps as chairman of the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association I may be permitted to say that this is a very welcome statement by the government, and one which has been previously made by the Prime Minister, who has given unfailing support to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and to Commonwealth affairs.

The speech then, of course, deals with our foreign relations. I regret very much that the government, at such an important time in international affairs, has decided to devote so little in this Speech to that important subject. It is dealt with, and almost brushed off in two or three paragraphs. There is a reference to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks, the talks on Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions, the International Monetary System, GATT, and then to our new situation in relation to the European Economic Community and our relations with the United States, all in about three paragraphs.

• (1450)

The inadequacy of the extent of our relations with the European Community, to me, is most unsatisfactory. We are told that we have appointed at long last an ambassador. But there is no reference to the failure of government policy in respect to the problems of the European Common Market; no reference to our failure to obtain access to any part of that market; no reference to the fact that at the moment we have no policy whatsoever with regard to association with that market; no reference whatsoever to the fact that the essential problem is that Canada is one of the few industrial countries left in the world which does not have access to a market of at least 100 million people.

This is one of the most serious problems facing us as a nation. I find nothing in the Speech from the Throne that recognizes the seriousness and importance of this problem, or suggests that the government has any policy in this respect.

We hear often of the nine nations. Honourable senators, let us never forget that the EEC is a community of 50 nations. They are not only European nations. They are African nations, Asian nations, all of whom have preferential access of one kind or another to that market.

We have no such preferential access, and we have no indication from the government that there is any policy of seeking preferential access or close association, other than the appointment of an ambassador, after the complete failure of negotiations to obtain high-level relations at the ministerial level.

Again, it is almost unbelievable that the Speech from the Throne, at this time in our history, should brush off the problem of our relations with the United States as casually as is done here. This is the reference:

> The Government will continue its discussions with the United States to settle certain difficulties that have arisen in our trading arrangements with that country, and to maintain and expand our trading opportunities there.

That seems to me to be the political understatement of the year. One would hope that there may be a policy in the offing of returning to that "quiet diplomacy" which for so many years kept our relations with our great neighbour on an even and viable basis, and an end to the policy of headline hunting, baiting the United States in headlines, and making statements that cannot possibly be conducive to amicable and friendly relations in the future. On other occasions I have indicated the areas in which we have deliberately baited the United States. We have taken unilateral action without consultation, which has annoyed them.

Whatever we may think of our place in the world, we should not forget that the United States is our best customer, and that it is bad business at any time to annoy and alienate one's best customer.

The Speech then deals with domestic matters. The list is long. The list is so long that almost every speaker has found something that he likes, something on which he can comment favourably. But if honourable senators examine the list, they will find the amazing thing is that many items are normal, natural developments of existing policies.

Under unemployment, for example, we are told the government is taking some measures. It lists them and says:

> These measures have been announced and are already taking effect.

Then there is another reference:

> The second part consists of measures that will add to the fundamental strength of the economy, can be acted upon this session and can be expected to have effect with a minimum of delay:

Every single item, and there are many of them, is already in effect. Perhaps I might just indicate what they are.

Income tax measures: we already have them in effect partially, although we are in an extraordinary position. I am told that for the first time in our history an election occurred between the introduction of the budget and the implementation of the budget measures. The budget was introduced on May 8, it did not reach the House of Commons until June 26, and the house rose on June 30. I have heard it said by ministers that the reason why the budget measures were not implemented was Opposition obstructionism. The fact of the matter is, they were never brought before the house, and have not been brought before the house yet.

There is to be an extension of GATT and a revision of the General Adjustment Assistance Plan. That has been in effect for several years, and has been extended before.

There is to be an extension of the Industrial Development Bank. That has been extended almost every year since it has been in operation.

There is going to be help for the tourist industry, but we have provided help for the tourist industry every year.

There is going to be assistance for co-operative movements. We have had that for a long time.

We are going to have improvements to the Canada Corporations Act. That has been on the books for as long as I have been here.

Most extraordinary, there is to be a special measure. Believe it or not, the government is going to meet with the provinces. This is listed as "unique" government initiative in dealing with unemployment.

I am not saying that there is nothing in the Speech that is important or useful. Of course there is, but where I am critical about this Speech is in the attempt that is made to cover the whole waterfront. That, of course, is why it has so often been referred to as a window-dressing Speech. I have to admit that there are goods in the window and there are goods in the shop behind it, but the concern I have is whether those goods will ever be sold, and particularly whether the management of the business will still be in the shop.

I have tried to catch the tone of the whole Speech. After reading it several times, it suddenly occurred to me that it is exactly like an NDP manifesto, exactly like an NDP election platform statement. I began to wonder why. Then it occurred to me that the distinctive feature of the NDP, in any election manifesto, is that they put into it whatever they like knowing they are never going to be required to implement the promises. They are never going to be in office, and so they can promise the moon. There is something of that kind of thing in the structure of this Speech. Perhaps they are saying, "We can put anything we like in because we are not going to be here long enough that we are going to be taken to task for not carrying out our promises."

Summarizing my general view, I can do no better than quote the Financial Times, which is not an anti-government paper, of January 8. Of the Speech, it says:

> It was all very baffling for the serious citizen, because in fact the Speech gave very little indication of what the government proposes to do about anything. Any resemblance between what the Governor-General was instructed to say on Jan. 4 and what the government may subsequently do will be largely coincidental.

It goes on to say:

> Apart from the new designs which depend on federal-provincial agreements, the government's specific promises fall into two classes. Some are strictly nothings; others may or may not amount to something. In many cases, the government itself probably does not yet know which is which.

Perhaps my criticisms may have been directed too harshly at those who had the problem of structuring this document. It was a difficult situation, but I do not think it was as necessary, as the document indicates, to put so much emphasis on either the confessional or the concessional aspects. The confessions of past failures directed to the public that the principles and policies which had been announced, and which were to be followed if the government had been returned with a majority, were not now to be followed. Of course, as Senator Forsey said the other evening, the government has every right to make concessions that will ensure support from a third or fourth party in the House of Commons. That, of course, is true, but the essential question on which the government's decision in that matter must be judged is whether it involved a departure from principles or policies formerly enunciated. It is quite clear that there has been, and is in this document, clear evidence of departure from principles. Those have been noted many times in the press.

Let me sum up the areas in which I find great disappointment in this Speech. I would say there are three. The first is the failure of the government to face up to the economic realities of the moment. The second is these concessions on elements of policy. And the third is that of very clear omissions. Perhaps I may indicate a few examples.

The matter of unemployment—

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I wonder whether the honourable senator would permit me a question? I have been listening to the contribution by the honourable senator, and I am interested in his comment—and I will come to my question in a moment—that every single action of the government, as outlined in the Speech from the Throne, is really a follow-up of an existing program. That is as close as I can get to an exact quote. I am sure Hansard will have that in detail. Now, referring back to a speech that we heard yesterday from our—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I rise on a point of order. Could I have the question? I think the senator is quite out of order in making a speech at this time. I am quite prepared to answer the question.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I am merely commenting on what you said, and then relating it to what Senator Asselin said yesterday. Senator Asselin, in referring to the Speech from the Throne, said this: "It contains just about all the Progressive Conservative program." I think you can see what my question will be. Is that Progressive Conservative program, then, merely an extension, as you have stated, of already existing programs which are in effect?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I might say to the honourable senator that that was an extraordinarily long question. If I understand his question, it was whether there was a contradiction between what I said and what Senator Asselin said. The answer, of course, is no. If the honourable senator had listened carefully to what I said he would have realized that I was referring to one specific set of trivia, those that come under the head of what the government was going to do about unemployment. I was referring to only that item in the speech.

I would ask the honourable senator, if he is going to question me and quote me, that he do so accurately in the future because it will be much more helpful to me. The honourable senator referred to Hansard. He will find it very clear in Hansard that I related those trivia to one particular set of items in the speech.

I have said that unemployment has been passed over. There is no recognition of the fact that at the moment we have the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized country in the world. The Economic Council of Canada estimates that unemployment will be 4.5 per cent at best in 1975. I assume that means that if this government continues in office even the Economic Council of Canada's best hope, its best estimate, the best target it can give, is a reduction in unemployment to 4.5 per cent by 1975. This is the estimate of the Economic Council of Canada in its latest report, and presented officially to the meeting of the ministers here in Ottawa a few days ago.

My objection is that we have only palliatives in the Speech from the Throne—scores of them. Yes, they are all there. Most of them are ones that have been carried on for some time. We are going to feel the effect of them sooner or later. The Economic Council is not optimistic. There does not seem to be the realization that unemployment is a symptom of other policies that must be wrong. You do not have unemployment if the management of the economy is sound. What we have here is a long list of tranquilizers. There is a recognition, perhaps, that the patient is sick, but no realistic diagnosis of the sickness and certainly no prescription and no evidence of any intention to prescribe an effective cure.

The same applies to inflation. There is no indication in this Speech, as I had hoped there would be, that this government intends to get out of the inflation business. The Economic Council of Canada has said that taxation is one of the major elements of inflation. In a recent study it is shown that in the seven inflation years from 1964 to 1971, 50 per cent of all inflation in Canada was as a result of government taxation. There is not a single mention in the Speech of any intention on the part of the government to remedy this situation. This is compounded, of course, by the confusion—confusion in the minds of businessmen and wage earners—with respect to the government's intentions. Without some clear knowledge that the government intends to remove its vested interest in inflation, we will be faced with a continual rise in inflation expectations, which generate more and more inflation based on the government's own contribution.

I do not intend to go over the whole sorry story of unemployment insurance. It has been discussed in the committee of the other place, and honourable senators are aware of the broad facts. But again, to relate it to the Speech from the Throne, what I find amazing is that there is no recognition here that this was an unsound, unworkable policy. There is only an excuse. The unemployment insurance fiasco—what is going to be done about it? What is going to be done to prevent abuses that have not been overcome "by administrative action already taken." I find it very disappointing. The government appears not to have learned its lesson, but is hiding behind some assumption that it was administrative action that caused it not to work.

On the confessional side, I find admissions—not frank and open admissions, but implicit admissions—of areas in which Canada has no policy whatsoever. It is almost unbelievable. If honourable senators will run through the Speech they will find, for example:

> Taken together these measures will contribute to the development and elaboration of a coherent set of industrial policies for Canada.

In other words, we do not have them. At this late date in our development as an industrial nation, the government comes to us and says, after years in office, "We are now going to promise you an industrial policy."

Again, the government has just discovered that it is important to the economy of this country to create an "incentive to work," and it is going to do it now. They have promised us that the policy will contain incentives to work. It is understandable, of course, because there are good reasons to suggest that some members at least of this present government have almost made a cult of disincentive to work.

I refer again to the Speech from the Throne. There is to be a competition policy. After all these years of hearing about the proposed Competition Act, we are now told we do not have such a policy and the government is going to give us one.

Almost unbelievable is the promise about some attention to our northern frontier. Honourable senators will excuse me if I have to search for it in the Speech, because the window dressing is not very neat. We are told the "development needs of the northern frontier areas in all four provinces could also be explored." Of course, Senator Laing speaks of the importance of our northern frontiers, our Arctic land. We are now told the government has no policy, but it "could" have the policy to explore the needs. I can only assume the government is saying it has not done it before, but it is going to do it. That is one of the promises.

Much has been said about the decision to call a conference of the Western provinces. The Speech from the Throne says that this will be a unique venture in the history of federal-provincial relations in Canada. Perhaps so. Perhaps Senator Laing is right in the plea he made today for some consideration of the point of view of the West. This government tells us that it will be a "unique venture" to sit down with the governments of the provinces.

The Speech says:

> Its purpose would be to explore potentials for economic and social development and, specifically, to consider concrete programs for stimulating and broadening the economic and industrial base of western Canada.

Surely, honourable senators, I am entitled to ask if this government is just starting that today.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: What else is new?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Or as my colleague says, "What else is new?"

I said I would make some reference to some vital matters that appear to have been omitted. There is not a mention in the Speech from the Throne about what is probably the most vital single problem facing Canada today, that is, the low productivity per employed person. In the years 1960-70, the productivity of Canadian workers increased at an annual rate of 2.3 per cent. The Economic Council tells us that the best target they can set, assuming the continuance of present policies, is 2.4 per cent for the whole period 1970-80. I contrast that with the fact that the current rate of increased productivity per employed person in the United States is 6.3 per cent.

There is not a word here about what the government thinks of an incomes policy—wage control, price control, if you like. There is no mention of the quite astonishing success of a similar policy in the United States. There is no indication here—and it is important that we have an indication—of what the government intends to do.

There is practically no reference to the problem of exports. During the 1960s, we had an increase of 9.8 per cent per year in our exports. The latest prediction, again of the Economic Council is that, in the years 1973-75—the years immediately ahead—that is going to drop to 6 per cent. That is not my figure, honourable senators. We are faced with a drop from 9.8 to 6 per cent in our exports. I might remind honourable senators that there is no country in the world to which exports are more important than Canada, with the possible exception of New Zealand.

There is no mention in the Speech from the Throne—and again this possibility was mentioned by Senator Laing—of a "buy Canadian" policy. In the last few weeks we have had three or four instances of government procurement in those very essential heavy machinery and high technology areas that Senator Laing referred to. That procurement is going abroad. There is no reply from the government when protests are made. We are to continue to be the only industrial nation in the world which does not, to my knowledge, have a clear cut policy of buying Canadian in its government purchasing policy.

Finally, honourable senators, I do find something in the Speech which I like, and that is the reference to election expenditures. I have had some experience in this area and I can only say that I hope the government is really serious about it. I personally attempted, on at least two occasions, to draft a bill or the components of a bill that would control election expenses. It can be done. It has been done with considerable success in England, and with some success in Quebec. Looking across the border, it seems to me that among the very greatest single dangers to our whole political system, to the survival of democracy, are the problems created by these mounting election expenses. We have all seen these fantastic figures of the cost of elections in the United States. Already some members of our House of Commons are filing the costs of their elections—$60,000, $70,000 or $80,000 for a member. These were personal expenditures, apart from national expenditures, to get elected.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: It may be that is not all of it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Senator Rattenbury, with experience that might match my own, suggests that perhaps not all of the expenditures appear in these figures. This may be so. I am sure, honourable senators, that although none of us here requires to get elected, we all have the very greatest sympathy with those of our colleagues in Parliament who are faced with this fantastic problem at least every four years, and perhaps twice within a few months in the not too distant future, of these expenditures.

I trust the government will bring in a bill which will really control these expenditures. If I may suggest a way in which it can be done, I think one simple measure would do it, and that is to lay down the rules and say that if they are contravened the election is void. That is the one way of making sure that a candidate stays within the rules. He will not worry about fines, but he will be concerned if he knows that if his supporters and official agents contravene those rules the game is up.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: I think the rules as laid down should be realistic. It is no good talking in terms of $2,000 or $3,000 per candidate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I would agree, of course. They have to be realistic. But there are various ways that have been suggested in which they can be made more realistic than they could be on a mere cash basis. I am referring to contributions of so much air time and newspaper space paid for out of public funds, and so on. There are many ways that it can be made more realistic, but I still believe that it is more than just unfair to individual members; there is a threat to the whole system that can be caused by these tremendous election costs.

Honourable senators, I see some frowns on the faces of my friends on the opposite side. If once again I have been partisan in my remarks, I excuse it only by saying that this debate on the Speech from the Throne, after an election, is about the only time that those opposite encourage me to respond in this manner.

Thank you for your attention.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, since the opening of the present session, all my colleagues who had an opportunity to participate in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne made it a point to congratulate Senator Fergusson on her appointment to the office of Speaker of the Senate. I do not want to offend her modesty anew by repeating all the praise heaped upon her, but I must say that all the good words addressed to her were well deserved and that I, for one, am glad to endorse them heartily. It is therefore my pleasure to join all my colleagues in congratulating her, wishing her great success and assuring her also of my unqualified co-operation.

As a former Speaker, I also want to welcome our former Speaker, Senator Deschatelets, on his return among us. I congratulate him for his outstanding performance in his functions during the four years in which he presided over the Senate. I know from experience that at certain times, when one occupies the Speaker's chair, there is a certain amount of frustration because, as the saying goes, a Speaker should be seen but not heard. As I knew Senator Deschatelets when he was in the other place and knew how anxious he always was to participate in the debates, I know he was frustrated at certain times when this restriction so painfully applied to him. However, now that he is free, I hope we will have more opportunities to hear him during the coming debates.

To the movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, Senators Hicks and Lafond, I tender my sincere congratulations for the interesting speeches they made on that occasion, whereby they proved once more what valuable assets they both are for the Senate.

We are all pleased to have five new senators in our ranks. I want to welcome them heartily among us. Four of them are former ministers who have acquired in the other place valuable parliamentary experience which, I hope, will benefit us during our future debates.

As for Senator Neiman, she brings with her wide experience in the judicial and social field and I am sure she will, in the immediate future, take a meaningful and interesting part in our proceedings.

I should like to point out, by the way, that never since Confederation has the female representation in Parliament been as large as it is today with our eight ladies in the Senate and another five in the other place. I think that is all to their credit! And I congratulate them all most sincerely.

Honourable senators, last December 27, Canada and the whole world learned with grief about the passing of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, former Prime Minister of Canada. Many messages of condolences from all over the world were forwarded to his family and to the Government of Canada, and eloquent and moving tributes were paid to his memory. Here in the Senate, the various stages of his brilliant career and his distinguished services to his country were recalled. As one of those who had the opportunity of sitting with him in the other place, I can say I have seldom met so humble, so intelligent, so courageous and so sincere a man as "Mike" Pearson. For those of us who sat with him, at that time, on the Opposition benches, he was not just a leader; he was an adviser, a friend and, if you will allow me to say so, he was even a big brother to us.

Canadians from every part of the land deplore his passing away and we French-speaking Canadians, more especially, will never forget the sympathy he always showed us by recognizing better than anyone else our legitimate aspirations.

Honourable senators, ever since I entered political life, 32 years ago already—time flies so fast in the company of good friends and, shall I say, fair enemies—I have always been especially interested in our shipbuilding industry. First of all, because for 22 years I represented a riding in which was located one of the most important shipyards in Canada and also because I felt that, from the point of view of national defence and the national economy, keeping that industry alive was essential. You will recall the major role played by our shipyards during both World Wars; you will also recognize that this very same industry is now providing employment for thousands of Canadians in various parts of our country.

Since the end of the last war, operations in these shipyards have been on the up and down, and this is why governments, on different occasions, have had to help them overcome their difficulties. I do not think it necessary to relate the history of the various measures initiated by the government, either in the shape of accelerated depreciation allowances, and export grants, or of direct subsidies, because all these measures are well known to each and everyone of us.

The most recent program, commonly known as STAP and initiated by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in November 1970, has enabled our shipyards to build 24 ships for foreign owners. This program is due to expire on March 31 of this year, and these ships should be completed by October 31, 1975. Further to providing employment for thousands of workers, this program has enabled our shipyards to acquire a valuable experience in the building of heavy tonnage ships and to develop new building methods. I think the government would be well-advised, if the demand from abroad endures, to go on with this program beyond March 31 and extend it to Canadian shipping companies who could take advantage of it, either to increase or update their present fleets. I am convinced that the departments concerned are following the situation in our shipping industry closely and that they will take steps in due course to ensure its survival.

Another matter which greatly affects the operations in our shipyards is the coasting trade. Honourable senators will remember that on January 1, 1966, the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act which had been assented to on March 18, 1965, was brought into force. The purpose of this amendment was to reserve for Canadian vessels the coasting trade between the Great Lakes and as far seaward as a straight line drawn from Cap des Rosiers to West Point Anticosti Island and from Anticosti Island to the north shore of the St. Lawrence River along the meridian of longitude 63 degrees west. This amendment made it necessary to add a new subsection to section 671 of the Canada Shipping Act. This change was not agreeable to all concerned but it was passed on the ground that it was a step in the right direction.

In August 1969, the Water Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission was commissioned by the Minister of Transport to carry on an inquiry in connection with coasting trade in Canada. The inquiry undertaken by the committee was afterwards put in the hands of Mr. H. J. Darling, an Ottawa economist, who submitted a report in October 1970. This report of over 200 pages includes a list of 15 recommendations, the main object of which is to limit the coasting trade in Canada to vessels flying the Canadian flag. As a matter of fact, the first of those recommendations is as follows:

> The Canadian coasting trade should be reserved to Canadian-flag vessels only which would require Canada to withdraw from the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement.

Another of those recommendations provides for the issuing of permits to non-Canadian flag vessels to participate in the coasting trade in cases where Canadian vessels are either unavailable, insufficient or inadequate for that purpose. That section is necessary I believe, especially during the adjustment period when new changes will be put into effect.

I have not read the whole report, but I have read enough of it to say that it is the most complete and careful study ever done on the coasting trade in Canada. If its recommendations are accepted, as I hope they will be, the result will be to enable the Canadian government to better control the coasting trade throughout Canada, to get more revenue out of taxes on Canadian shipping companies, to assert ever more positively Canadian sovereignty in Arctic waters, to provide more employment for our navigators and also to stimulate activity in our shipyards with the building and repairing of ships that will be needed to meet with those new requirements.

I know the report does not win unanimous approval, but Mr. Darling, in his report, and also in an article he wrote on this subject, and which has been published in the Financial Times of Canada on January 1, 1973, answers with excellent arguments those who have objected to his recommendations.

On the other hand, several labour unions, such as the Canadian Labour Congress and the SIU, have sent to the Minister of Transport of the day during the last year, briefs and letters in which they renewed their support for the recommendations made in the Darling report asking the department involved to implement the report's recommendations. The Dominion Marine Association also forwarded to the minister last August a lengthy and interesting brief in which it expressed its views and gave its reasons for fully supporting the recommendations included in the Darling report.

I also note, as the honourable senators have noted themselves, that many members in the other place are deeply concerned with this matter.

Personally, as I said earlier in my remarks on this subject, I agree with the recommendations made. I hope that the new Minister of Transport will soon recommend to Parliament the required amendments to the Canada Shipping Act.

Another thing which would have a major impact on the activities in our shipyards would be the building up of a Canadian merchant marine.

I know this question has been discussed over the years and has given rise to much controversy. But I think that even though it is that controversial, there is nothing to prevent us from discussing it since, as I will try to prove shortly, it would be beneficial to Canada. Our country has been absent from this field for several years, even though Canada is considered as one of the most important nations in the world in the import and export business. Studies have been conducted in this connection to determine whether this kind of activity would be economically viable for Canada. The main objectives considered in these studies were the following:

Firstly, to determine the kind of ships we should build that would operate at minimum costs.

Secondly, to assess building and operation costs for Canadian ships as compared with the same costs for foreign ships involved in the same kind of transportation.

Thirdly, to analyse the profits and costs which might result for Canadian economy.

Fourthly, to determine how costly it would be to the Canadian Treasury to assist efficiently in the development of a Canadian merchant marine.

As I said earlier, I am far from being an expert on that question; this is why I cannot give a definite opinion in this regard, but I feel that, if we proceed by stages according to a well-defined plan, this project could be achieved and it would be beneficial to the Canadian people.

As for our dockyards, as far as the mercantile marine is concerned, even if the government had to provide financial assistance so that they could modernize and develop more economical building methods, they have, I suggest, the necessary knowledge and qualified manpower to build the kind of vessels which could be operated efficiently and economically in this sort of activity.

The benefits that could accrue to our economy are numerous. It is difficult to believe, in view of the ever-increasing volume of products and commodities such as grain, oil, ore, coal, wood and many others which have to be moved outside of Canada, that Canadian ships or ships flying the Canadian flag, are nearly totally nonexistent in that field. So I think what is involved here is, first of all, a question of national prestige which is important.

Furthermore, our shipyards could increase substantially their labour force. There would also be many more jobs for naval officers and crew members. The many Canadian industries which provide machinery and materials to our yards, would increase their production and thereby hire more workers. I am told on this subject that the number of workers employed in the service industries connected with shipbuilding is roughly equal to the number of employees in the yards as such.

Also, one must not forget the considerable amounts the public treasury would be drawing in the form of taxes of all sorts, of personal and corporate income tax, let alone the millions it could save by not having to pay unemployment insurance or social security benefits to those who without this new activity would be without a job.

At the present time, as one knows, the government is spending rather substantial amounts to help shipbuilding because, as I said a while ago, it recognizes the necessity and the importance of that industry from the point of view of our defence and national economy. The need for that industry being recognized, it will have to continue helping it to stay afloat and progress. The creation of a Canadian merchant marine will help us a lot to reach that goal and considering the present system, it is my humble opinion that in the final analysis, it will not cost much more to implement this project if, as I said a moment ago, we do it gradually and according to a well-established plan.

Honourable senators, one last point on which I should like to direct your attention is that which has to do with the CN employees pension fund. Between May 28 and June 25, 1970, the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Transport and Communications heard evidence submitted by the representatives of the various CNR employee labour unions, representatives of retired pensioners, and received a brief from the company regarding this fund. The Committee later tabled its report which gave a short history of the CNR pension plans, an analysis of the representations which were submitted, and finally a few recommendations. Some of their recommendations were partially accepted by the CNR management. Since September 1, 1970, for instance, the contributing and non-contributing members to the 1935 plan, and pensioners and widows receiving benefits under that plan have been eligible for the 1959 retirement plan. That measure allowed many employees and retired people to have the amount of their pension increased. Concerning retirements up to September 30, 1970, the 1959 plan has been amended so as to offer to its members early retirement at age 60 without the amount of the pension being reduced, provided that age and years of service add up to 85. Moreover, as of January 1, 1971, CN pensioners are eligible to the 1959 plan and, having retired before January 1, 1970, their pension was increased by 2 per cent for every retirement year already taken. Certain changes have also been made in the Pension Commission.

These improvements are undoubtedly appreciable and a step in the good direction, except perhaps in the case of changes made in the membership and functions of the CN Pension Commission since according to the information I could gather, the Commission has not been granted more power and responsibilities than before. Much could also be said about payments by both parties into the retirement fund, since there seems to be a difference of opinions about the amounts that both parties must pay into the fund. I shall have another opportunity of speaking at some length about such a complex question. But in my opinion, the most important problem has not been settled, that which relates to pension benefits paid to those who retire.

Since January 1, 1966, the plan has been adjusted to the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan or to that of Quebec. The benefit remained at one and half per cent for each year previous to 1966. As of January 1, 1966, this benefit was one per cent of that part of the salary subject to contribution, according to the Canada Pension Plan, and one and a half per cent on the remaining salary. The contribution rate becomes then five per cent of that part of the salary subject to contribution, according to public plans, and six and a half per cent on the remaining salary. For public servants on the other hand, where the plan was also adapted to or integrated in to the Canada or Quebec Pension Plan, the rate of contributions for a male employee is six and a half per cent of his salary, but his rate of benefit is two per cent for each year of service. It is about this disparity or difference of one half per cent between the rates of benefits paid to one and the other that the CN employees are complaining.

They wonder why as employees of a crown corporation they are not treated exactly the same way as the Public Service employees and the employees of other companies under federal jurisdiction.

I find their request reasonable and even if there is any need for adjustments regarding this difference of one and a half per cent less which they pay on that part of the salary subject to contribution under pension plans there is no reason why these employees should not be treated like those working in the Public Service and should not avail themselves of the two per cent formula.

I hope that the interested parties, keeping in mind that the government is about to improve many pension or allowance plans, will find a solution to this problem interesting over 80,000 railway employees. Should there be no solution, I think the government would be justified in intervening.

[English]

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, today I wish to express my very sincere congratulations to our newly appointed Speaker, Senator Muriel Fergusson. I believe I am the last one to do so. She not only has brought great honour to herself, to her home city of Fredericton and her Province of New Brunswick, but especially to the women of Canada. Already she has performed with the originality and distinction which she has demonstrated in her previous work in the Senate. Her natural dignity, intelligence and concern for others, I am sure, will guide and attend her all along the way. Her appointment has won great acclaim everywhere.

To Senator Deschatelets we owe a debt of gratitude for the admirable way in which he executed his duties as Speaker. I hope the functions he performs now will be as rewarding to him. I am confident his vision and work will be extremely beneficial to this chamber.

To all the new senators I should like to add my welcome. The best I can wish for them is many opportunities to serve Canada and her people. I am sure their contributions will be great.

The eloquent and heartfelt tributes paid to our beloved Lester B. Pearson by the government leader, Senator Martin, and the Opposition Leader, Senator Flynn, will long be remembered. I must add to that the beautiful tribute paid by a very dear friend, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) only yesterday. We are experiencing such a sense of loss that it is difficult to put such feelings into words. I know that we are only just beginning to realize the full genius and enormous value of this great Canadian and world leader, who had time and ability to find some good in every human being with whom he came in contact.

Before I proceed further I wish to take this opportunity to thank you, honourable senators, for the many words of greeting and deeds of kindness extended to me as a new senator last May. At every turn someone was ready to show me some courtesy. I did appreciate your help and warm friendliness.

Honourable senators, in the Speech from the Throne there is only one item that I am going to burden you with at this late hour today. It is something which concerns me very much because of the uncertainty of the time element. I refer to measures for protecting the natural environment. In more specific terms, I refer to the intention of making a third national park on the eastern shore of Nova Scotia, and to do this by February, 1973. In the interests of a "just society," which seems to become more important each day we live, I would like to bring to the attention of this house the dramatic struggle that is taking place on this eastern shore.

Forty miles east of the twin cities of Halifax and Dartmouth is a rugged coastline on the Atlantic Ocean. An agreement for a national park of 225 square miles was signed on August 25, 1972, by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Honourable Jean Chrétien, and the Minister of Lands and Forests, Honourable Benoit Comeau, of the Province of Nova Scotia. The inhabitants had heard faint rumours since 1965, but no one had been informed of the proceedings, and there are very sound reasons for keeping it a great secret, such as the danger of land speculation.

Beautiful little villages are scattered here and there at the bend of a river, or on a slope to a beach, where eight or nine rows of breakers lend constant fascination to the viewer. Further on, the breakers crash over rocky boulders. Many islands are scattered offshore. The houses are small and neat, most of them well painted and comfortable. Some are as old as 200 years. Almost everyone owns a car or a boat. Good schools are available. The men work at fishing part-time, or lumbering. There are local garage owners, a plumber or electrician, and some commute to and from Halifax to work. The road is excellent. Life is varied and rewarding. Contentment reigns.

Suddenly all this is in jeopardy. A memorandum of intent was signed by the provincial and federal governments to have a national park along there. In the plan, certain villages are to be wiped out, including Clam Harbour and other beautiful little spots, the nicest ones possibly to be replaced by a motel or playground for tourists and the pleasure of nearby twin city dwellers. Some 98 homeowners and 167 cottagers are still uncertain as to their future.

Nova Scotia already has two national parks. One is in northern Cape Breton and is 367 square miles in area. It is interesting to note that a year or so ago the department endeavoured to extend the boundaries northward to include the whole of northern Cape Breton, and 2,000 residents rose up in arms. The project was abandoned, and the people in that area remain in their homes.

The other national park is at Kegimkujik, 140 square miles in area, in the Annapolis Valley. This, with the addition of Ship Harbour, means that 3.4 per cent of Nova Scotia will be set aside as national parks. Besides this, Nova Scotia has four large game sanctuaries.

I am in possession of statistics, but I do not propose to bore honourable senators with them. They show that Nova Scotia has far more area set aside as national parks than any other province. Many meetings have been held, and a petition containing 1750 names was presented to Premier Regan imploring him to allow the residents to keep their homes. That is all they ask. Not one inhabitant would object to a provincial park which would help them keep their beaches clean and prevent unsightly construction or pollution. In fact, they would welcome such a move. But they want their homes where freedom and human rights, peace and beauty, abound.

How many people are looking for just such spots today? They pay large sums of money for them. Why should these people have to give up their cherished land, which is steeped in the history of their ancestors going back some 200 years?

Mr. Chrétien, in his "Byways and Special Places," a pamphlet published on October 10, 1972, states:

> Byways and Special places is an offer to work with all Canadians, private citizens, conservation associations, youth groups and communities not only to preserve what remains of our natural and historic heritage but also to restore some of what we have lost.

Further on he says:

> If we care enough, each of us, to accept the challenge to protect and preserve our natural and human heritage—

Clam Harbour is surely part of this heritage, both natural and human. The people have an inborn love for this place, which money cannot buy. The beach and immediate area would surely be a special place, and the byways could surely skirt the present dwellings and the whole community.

Time and again Mr. Chrétien says:

> We see developing on the map of Canada new Perspectives of our natural and human heritages, of areas beyond today's horizons to yesterday's frontiers, along the routes of history and to those special places which are so much a part of our inheritance.
> We feel that this program captures the mood of the Canadian people today. Canadians no longer have a single-minded concern with economic development. They are concerned with the quality of life, with those intangibles which are not measured in purely economic terms. They have a heritage which they seek to preserve, to understand and to experience. Thus programs would help to satisfy this need.
> The paths and experiences of the native peoples, the voyageurs and the early settlers can still be traced in Canada—along our byways and in our special places.

[Hon. Mrs. Norrie.]

We have, on the one hand, the memorandum of intent—six months after it is signed it becomes law—and, on the other hand "Byways and Special Places." There is quite a gap between the two. Can we close that gap and obtain satisfaction for these people?

There are times when the method of expropriation of land must be used, and I would be the first to admit the value of this method as a last resort. But it is never a happy one. However, is a large national park important enough to ruin and upset the communities along this once-contented eastern shore? Employment of some 30 people is contemplated. Every village, inside and outside, must attend to the upkeep of the park if it becomes a fact.

One other very worrisome factor is the position of the landowner versus the Government of Nova Scotia. The expropriation laws are very harsh. In fact, they are the harshest of any province. The landowner has not a leg to stand on regarding negotiation. I must say, in all fairness to Premier Regan, that he has welcomed delegations, consultations and petitions with an open mind, but so far does not want to promise retention of home ownership.

One factor not often talked about along this shore is the eternal presence of fog. The natives expect it, love it, cope with it, and have come to accept it as a hazard to be reckoned with. I fear tourists would think differently.

The Ship Harbour area is unique in Canada for a national park. There is no other place like it. No other area has its varied terrain, growth, wildlife, or water attractions. Other areas of Nova Scotia are clamouring for a national park. Why not consider them, and make "Byways and Special Places" the project in Ship Harbour? With a fresh committee to smooth ruffled feelings, much can be accomplished, economically speaking. This will help a bit to show Senator Laing that Nova Scotia is working hard to become one of the "have" provinces, which we would dearly love to be.

I should like to quote from a brief presented by the Association for the Preservation of the Eastern Shore:

> The association considers that the area selected by the National and Historic Parks Board for a N.P. [National Park] is indeed as they have implied, "an area of outstanding natural beauty." We are not convinced that they also recognize that the same is an outstanding example of the E.S. [Eastern Shore] way of life, of traditional communities, occupations and industries, and that these factors enhance the natural beauty. Put simply, we consider the area under question to already constitute a "natural park" and that any disruption of this existing mutual harmony between man and nature is unnecessary. What already exists is worthy of preservation as a whole and it is on this concept that we base our alternative.
> In our view, no disruption of people need take place at all, since all requirements can be satisfied if both governments adapt a flexible and broad outlook instead of the narrow one that they have now.

I should like now to say a few words in defence of the Honourable Jean Marchand, whose good name has become somewhat of a political football.

On my desk, and probably on the desks of most honourable senators, were left two accounts of misinterpretations and corrections of various activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion by two leading newspapers. One was directed to the editor of the Toronto Star, and the other to the editor of the Globe and Mail. I should like to read a sample of the misleading items published just before the election. The corrections are explained. This is from a letter dated September 13, 1972, from Mr. Marchand to the editor of the Toronto Star:

> A short while ago you published a series of articles by Walter Stewart on the activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. In the interests of accuracy and balanced interpretation, I am writing to ask that you publish with similar prominence a number of comments that I would like to make.

And there are seven or eight comments, of which I intend to read only two:

> Mr. Stewart states that "Aerovox Canada Ltd. got an industrial incentives grant of $235,950 from the federal government to start a new factory in Amherst, Nova Scotia, so it closed its Hamilton, Ontario, plant". The facts are that Aerovox took and made public its decision to close the Hamilton Plant before it even applied for an incentive grant from this Department. At that time, it was the intention of the company to supply the Canadian market from one of its U.S. production facilities. The provision of incentive assistance has meant that the Canadian market will now be served from Canadian rather than U.S. facilities and will be located in a region where growth has for decades been inadequate. We did not move jobs from Hamilton to Amherst, we moved future jobs from the U.S.A. to Amherst . . .
> In all, Mr. Stewart wrote five articles about the activities of my Department. Of these, four were unequivocally critical of a number of grant offers to various companies. And the one "success story" that Mr. Stewart singled out was dealt with in such an ambivalent fashion that he almost managed to make it appear like a failure. It seems to me that, if Mr. Stewart had been genuinely concerned to present a fair and balanced appraisal of our incentive activities, he would have found it relatively easy to identify more projects for the positive side of his particular ledger . . .
> In Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, Alwood Products Ltd., with the help of my Department, now occupies premises previously owned by a company that was forced to close down more than a year ago. The project is expected to generate 100 direct jobs and future plans may well produce further employment opportunities whenever local wood resources can be used. In addition, the potential for sales to export markets is encouraging.

And Mr. Marchand goes on to say:

> I could go on. But I think I have given enough examples to show that the overall picture painted by Mr. Stewart's articles was inaccurate and misleading. I have never objected to fair criticism. But I confess to some annoyance when observers of our programs present a picture that is biased and lacking a reasonable basis in fact.

There are many such items in those two newspapers reports. I believe, honourable senators, that we should talk about these misrepresentations as much as possible. I hate to see the good name of any Canadian maligned unjustly, and Jean Marchand has been grossly misunderstood.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lafond:

That the following Address—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division, and the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted.

On motion of Senator Molgat, ordered that the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by the Honourable the Speaker.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 6 at 8 p.m.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

RECALLING OF SENATORS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. As you realize, there are not many senators present in the house today. I was informed last night by Senator Molgat and Senator Langlois that the Senate would meet this afternoon, but the telegram message was not telephoned to my house until 8.15 this morning.

It seems that for the majority of our members there was insufficient notice for recalling the Senate at 2 o'clock this afternoon, and I suggest that it would be unfair to consider as absentees those senators who were not able to be here today.

I would second a motion by the Acting Leader of the Government that, because the notice was too short, those who are not here today be not considered as being absent.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I have no objection whatsoever to such a motion, but I should point out that the telegram which was sent to honourable senators informing them of today's sitting was telephoned to my place in Quebec City at about 9.30 last night. I think my honourable friend was away from home—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not complaining.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: —and that possibly explains why he received the telegram only this morning.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not speaking of myself, but I don't think honourable senators should have to stay at home every night to await a telegram.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am not blaming my honourable friend. I am simply trying to give an explanation with respect to what he said. The telegrams were, in fact, sent out by the Clerk last night.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: The telegram I got reached me by telephone at 11 o'clock last night right here in Ottawa, so some honourable senators must have had very short notice.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I recognize that the notice was short, and for that I apologize. However, the Senate staff attempted to call honourable senators by telephone in advance. They were unable to reach everyone, but they did make an attempt. I want to extend personal thanks to those staff members who stayed late last night to do this work.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I agree with that. My only concern is registering as absent those who were unable to get here this afternoon because of the short notice given.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Perhaps they should call after midnight and find out who stays out late at night.

Hon. Mr. Duggan: I received my telegram at 12.15 this morning down in St. John's, Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You did very well to get it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this is a matter on which I do not think I can make a decision or entertain a motion. I suggest the matter be referred to the Law Clerk to determine whether the action suggested by the Leader of the Opposition can be taken.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There could be a formal motion later, if it is believed necessary.

PILOTAGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-127, to amend the Pilotage Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read a second time now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I should like the Acting Leader of the Government to put on record the reasons for asking leave to proceed with second reading at this time.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I intended to do so in my remarks but I can do so now. The reason for my motion to proceed now is that this is a matter of urgency. The by-laws and regulations under the Pilotage Act, which came into force in February 1972, have not as yet been drafted and published in the Canada Gazette. Unless extended, the present by-laws and regulations will expire as of midnight tomorrow with the result that throughout Canada—not only on the East Coast but throughout Canada—there will be no pilotage system. This is the situation we are requesting this chamber to remedy.

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I read in Hansard of the other place that leave was given to proceed with second and third reading last night. Therefore, subject to what may be said later, we agree to proceed with second reading at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am grateful to honourable senators for having consented to give leave to proceed with second reading now.

In order to enable honourable senators fully to understand the situation that presently obtains in regard to this proposed legislation, I deem it necessary to give some background not only of this particular bill but of the previous Pilotage Act, which, as I said a while ago, was assented to about a year ago, and to which we are now seeking an amendment.

As honourable senators will recall, a Royal Commission on Pilotage was appointed in November 1962 as part of the general solution of the strike by the St. Lawrence River pilots, which the British Columbia or West Coast pilots and the Saint John, New Brunswick, pilots had threatened to join. The commission held public hearings at major ports from coast to coast, and received numerous briefs from every section of the shipping industry. The commission studied pilotage in other countries, but concluded that basically pilotage is a local matter, and few countries have as many diversified types of pilotage operations as are found in this country.

The report of the commission, published in five volumes, was completed on August 5, 1971. Following the publication of Part I of the commission's report, which contained 39 major recommendations, a task force was set up by the Department of Transport to determine how these recommendations might be implemented. A major recommendation of the commission was that legislation permit the effective use of pilotage as the ultimate means of achieving safety of navigation and safe, speedy movement of ships when required by the country's superior interest. It also recommended that the principle of decentralization be retained and fully implemented.

The Pilotage Act received royal assent on June 30, 1971, and incorporated nearly all of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Pilotage. It replaced Parts VI and VIA of the Canada Shipping Act, which had become outdated. In preparing the bill, extensive consultations took place with the shipping community, pilots' representatives and other interested parties. This decentralization is effected by establishing four regional pilotage authorities as crown corporations with wide powers to establish, operate and maintain, in the interests of safety, an efficient pilotage service within their region.

In introducing that act, the Honourable Mr. Jamieson said:

> It is anticipated that they will become financially self-sufficient and that subsidization will be reduced to a minimum, partly as a result of our over-all policy that the cost of government services should be met by the users.

After receiving nominations from the pilots' associations and shipping representatives, four regional authorities were created on February 1, 1972, namely, the Atlantic Pilotage Authority, Laurentian Pilotage Authority, Great Lakes Pilotage Authority, and Pacific Pilotage Authority.

The Atlantic Pilotage Authority has a chairman and six members; the Laurentian Pilotage Authority has a chairman and five members, and a sixth member was appointed later to serve as vice-chairman; the Great Lakes Pilotage Authority, which was set up as a subsidiary company of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, has a chairman, vice-chairman and five members; the Pacific Pilotage Authority has a chairman and six members.

The Atlantic Pilotage Authority, with head office in Halifax, Nova Scotia, has jurisdiction over all Canadian waters in and around the Maritime provinces and in Chaleur Bay south of Cap d'Espoir, Gaspé county. It employs 84 persons including 10 pilots, and it supervises 60 pilots who are not employees of the Authority. The Authority was provided with $1,033,000 in the 1972-73 main estimates.

The Laurentian Pilotage Authority, with head office in Montreal, Quebec, has jurisdiction over all Canadian waters in and around the province of Quebec, north of the northern entrance to St. Lambert Lock except the waters of Chaleur Bay south of Cap d'Espoir, Gaspé county. It employs 75 persons and supervises 253 pilots who are not employees of the Authority. The Authority was provided with $1,018,000 in the 1972-73 main estimates.

The Great Lakes Authority, with head office in Cornwall, Ontario, has jurisdiction over all Canadian waters in the province of Quebec, south of the northern entrance to St. Lambert Lock and all Canadian waters in and around the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba. It employs 80 persons, including 56 pilots, and supervises 68 pilots who are not employees of the Authority. The Authority was provided with $454,000 in the 1972-73 main estimates.

The Pacific Pilotage Authority, with head office in Vancouver, B.C., has jurisdiction over all Canadian waters in and around the province of British Columbia. It employs 55 persons and supervises 92 pilots. The Authority was provided with $799,000 in the 1972-73 main estimates.

In addition to this, a staff of 15, headed by the Director of Marine Pilotage at the Ministry of Transport Headquarters here in Ottawa, advises the minister on pilotage matters, and is responsible for establishing national technical standards and conducting research required to ensure that these standards are maintained at a high level. It is also responsible for prescribing standards for health, uniform financial reporting procedures, procedures for hearings held by Authorities and recommending the establishment of compulsory pilotage areas where an Authority fails to do so and it is considered to be in the public interest.

The Pilotage Act, subsection 43(4) provided that:

> Every by-law made or expressed to have been made by a pilotage authority as defined in the Canada Shipping Act and every regulation made pursuant to Part VIA of that Act and in force, or deemed to be in force, on the commencement of this Act—

continued in force until the by-law or regulation was revoked by an Authority. By this I mean one of the four Authorities I have just mentioned. The by-laws and regulations referred to in this subsection covered the operations of each pilotage district, including such matters as licensing of pilots, examinations, collection of dues, dispatching of pilots, entry into the pilotage service, assignment of pilots to duty, discipline and other matters respecting the regulating of pilot service and tariff schedules for each of the 29 districts which were operated under the Canada Shipping Act.

Since their establishment, the Authorities have been required to negotiate with pilots of the various districts within their regions. Under the act pilots may elect to be employees of the Authority or to contract their services through their association. The Authorities could not establish new pilotage tariffs until negotiations with the pilots were completed, and they have found it impossible to adopt new by-laws and regulations prior to the expiration of the old by-laws and regulations because of unavoidable delays involved in rendering operable their administrative structures and in negotiating new tariffs with representatives of the pilots and industry to provide for their operating costs and allow for increases in wages demanded by the pilots.

Here I deem it necessary to open a paragraph to say that the delay might be attributable in this case to an excess of democracy due to many discussions and negotiations which the authorities deem fit to initiate, not only with the users of the service but with those performing the service.

Furthermore, some of the tariffs proposed were objected to under section 23 of the Pilotage Act. When an objection is filed before the Canadian Transport Commission, a tariff is held in abeyance until such time as the objection is disposed of by the CTC. It may be some time, therefore, before hearings are held by the commission and a decision is reached on contentious items of the tariff.

To my knowledge, proposed tariffs have been filed in the case of appeals against tariffs in the East Coast District, the Halifax District. I think one also is filed or about to be filed in connection with the tariff proposed for the Laurentian District, which is that region in the waters of the province of Quebec within the boundaries I have outlined in my explanation of the various Pilotage Authorities.

Due to the reasons that I have just outlined, no new regulations or by-laws were enacted to establish compulsory pilotage areas or prescribing ships or classes of ships to which compulsory pilotage would apply.

It is believed that the proposed regulations or by-laws on compulsory pilotage areas and ships to which it applies will also be objected to by representatives of the pilots or the industry under section 14(3) of the act entailing, therefore, further delays before regulations on this subject are implemented. On February 1, 1973, when the by-laws and regulations made under the Canada Shipping Act lapse, there will be no obligation for a ship to take on a pilot. The safety of passengers, crew, ship and cargo will be placed in jeopardy. Furthermore, it is possible that the pilots' associations may call a strike to protest the refusal of ships to be piloted, and the safety of navigation will then be impaired.

Consultation has taken place with the Canadian Transport Commission, and we have been advised that the objections will be dealt with within the period of extension.

Honourable senators, this gives the complete background of the legislation before us presently, and it also outlines quite clearly the urgency which exists now and the necessity of considering this legislation without further delay.

I am grateful, as I said at the outset of my remarks, for honourable senators having granted me leave to proceed with second reading now, and I trust that the bill will be thoroughly dealt with either in Committee of the Whole or before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. And here let me say that I am open to any suggestions in this regard, because a committee meeting can be called this afternoon. Arrangements have been made to have a witness from the department in attendance, and it is hoped that with leave of the Senate we will be able to dispose of this legislation before the end of today.

I am also informed that arrangements have been made with the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General to attend in this chamber for royal assent at approximately 5.45 this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, before the honourable Acting Leader of the Government is deemed to have concluded his remarks, I wonder if he would kindly answer two questions. My first question, which is not intended as a criticism of him or any of the assistants to the honourable Leader of the Government is this: was it not obvious last week that this legislation would have to be passed by today? If so, why was no indication given to honourable senators that they would have to come back this week?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I think I must answer the first part of the honourable senator's question in the affirmative. It was obvious last week that this legislation would be needed in a matter of days. But why it was not introduced in this place or in the other place sooner is a question which I think the minister will have to answer. For myself I have no answer to that. However, I understand the minister will be in attendance before the committee this afternoon, if it is decided to refer the bill to committee. This question may then be put to him directly.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I should like to put a second question to the acting leader before I make a few remarks. Is the root of the problem dealt with in this bill the same as that discussed in previous bills, for instance Bill S-23 in 1970, concerning the conclusion of the Royal Commission on Pilotage that there was doubt with respect to the validity of certain by-laws and regulations adopted under the then existing Canada Shipping Act?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: This has been a matter of consideration in this bill and, as I have mentioned, the bill provides that all regulations in force, or deemed or considered to be in force—and those words are used to cover those cases where some of the previous regulations made under the Canada Shipping Act were challenged before the courts, some of them even going to the Supreme Court of Canada—shall continue in force. The root of the problem lies partly there.

I hope this answers my honourable friend's question.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was hoping for that answer.

Honourable senators, it is rather strange that we should meet today, because we all remember that last week the Leader of the Government either himself or through the acting leader, Senator Molgat, indicated that he could not foresee any business for the Senate this week, and therefore there was no reason why we should not adjourn until February 6. To this, of course, no one has any objection. It is obvious that when senators are summoned to the Senate they should agree to come here—and this every time they are required to attend its sittings. We all know, however, that in practice there must be consideration for those days when our duties in the Senate do not require our presence in Ottawa.

The answer given by Senator Langlois indicates that it was quite clear last week, or the week before, or even a month ago, that it was necessary for this legislation to be passed by midnight tonight, and since it had not been dealt with in the other place an effort would be made to have it passed there and sent to us for this very day at least.

This is another occasion on which we see complete mismanagement of the operations of Parliament. I will not say in the present case, because I wish to be fair, mismanagement of the operations of the Senate. I do not think that anyone in particular in this chamber is responsible for this rather cruel situation in which we find ourselves, but the responsibility certainly lies with the government and with the leader of the house in the other place. It is nonsensical that suddenly, yesterday at 8 o'clock in the evening, there should have been agreement in the other place to deal with this bill in order that it be passed by this house today so that the regulations might continue in force from midnight tonight until February, 1974. The Department of Transport and the government have been unable to sit down and adopt regulations which are acceptable to all interested parties. So now they beg for another year's delay. There are no limits to this government's incompetence.

I am not criticizing in this case the Senate itself, but I think that it is mismanagement of the operations of Parliament. By the same token I would say that it is a downgrading of the Senate.

I have read the Hansard of the other place. I will not refer to the members there in particular, because that is against the rules, but I will say that the House of Commons passed this bill last night without knowing what they were doing, and I suggest that we are about to do the same thing here this afternoon. I say that because this is a very complex problem and the remarks of the acting leader, the sponsor of the bill, are quite relevant in this respect. In the other place the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport offered only one sentence in support of the bill. Of course, he added a few remarks when it was dealt with in committee, but it was quite obvious that he did not want to go into the details, because it would have shown that we are faced with a very difficult problem.

It is not a new problem but one that goes back, as has been admitted by the sponsor of the bill, to 1969, when the Royal Commission on Pilotage submitted its report with respect to the validity of certain regulations and by-laws adopted under the former Canada Shipping Act. The government has not been able to disentangle itself from the problems which were raised by the commission four years ago, and is still struggling with them. Parliament is called upon to say that those regulations that may not be valid, that may not have been valid for years and years, and that have been continued in force since 1969—that is, four years—should be continued in force for another year.

I wish to read the statement of the counsel of the Department of Transport when he appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Wednesday, June 10, 1970, to explain Bill S-23, which was an act to postpone the expiration of certain provisions of an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act referring to pilots. He said:

> Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, the report of the Royal Commission on Pilotage was received two years ago—

Note that this is in 1970.

> —and that report raised a doubt, in view of the existing provisions of the Canada Shipping Act, as to the validity of the pilotage by-laws and the pilots' licences that had been made and issued under authority of the act. In order to validate these by-laws and licences pending legislative action to correct what was not considered to be sufficient in the act, Parliament in 1969 passed an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, which states that all the by-laws, licences and orders made under the existing provisions of the act would be deemed to have the same force and effect as if they had been made by an Act of Parliament that authorized the making of such by-laws and orders, and the issuing of such licences.
> That particular amendment that was made in 1969 expires at the end of June of this year—

He means June, 1970.

> —and the Department of Transport is not yet in a position to introduce corrective legislation.

I could go on, but it is not very relevant to what I intend to say this afternoon. I would suggest that the problem, as the sponsor of the bill indicated, has now been with us for over four years. It is a very complicated problem. The beginning of a solution has been recited in the bill with regard to the clauses which we passed in 1971, if I am not mistaken. An act to amend the Canada Shipping Act was passed in 1971. It created local Pilotage Authorities about which the sponsor has spoken.

Yet, where are we? We are asked to say that some regulations which are of doubtful validity should continue for another year, when the Senate in 1970 was very reluctant to adopt the government's proposal, and made an amendment to the bill whereby it said that these by-laws and regulations, and so on, would not continue in force later than the 31st December 1970, or such day no later than six months after the 31st day of December 1970 as might be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council issued before that date. That means that the Standing Senate Committee at that time considered June 30, 1971, to be the latest date on which these regulations could be considered valid, and that some action should be taken, and legislation enacted, in order to clarify this very difficult problem.

I agree. If we take the last date I mentioned, June 30, 1971, that was close to two years ago. We are now asked to provide another delay of one year until 1974.

To deal with this matter in just a few hours is a highly unsatisfactory way of dealing with a bill of such complexity. I would suggest to the sponsor, and to the Senate, that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications in order that we might hear the explanations of officials. They should have an opportunity of explaining the problems, and we should be told why we should provide this additional delay.

I am not hopeful that in such a short time we shall be able to form a clear opinion concerning the problem and the method by which the government is trying to deal with it or, more precisely, not deal with it. What the government is proposing is not a way of dealing with a problem, but rather a way of sweeping its incompetence under the rug.

In any event, honourable senators, both from the point of view of the circumstances under which we have been recalled—when it was obvious that the legislation would have to be passed by today—and the complexity of the problem, which has not been explained, we are not able to give a sober second thought to this question.

It is quite obvious that the House of Commons has given no real consideration to the bill. I am not afraid to say that. I am convinced that the only reason why the Commons passed the bill last night was because of the deadline. They were told, "If you don't pass the bill by tonight, and the Senate by tomorrow night, there will be no regulations and there might be some very harsh consequences."

If I might draw an analogy, I would say that this is proceeding with the business of Parliament in a manner similar to skyjacking. We are being forced to legislate with a pistol at our heads. Of course, we will. We have no choice, as pilots have no choice but to go on to Cuba, or anywhere else, until someone is able to shoot the skyjacker. To finish my analogy, I would hope that we also will soon be rid of those who hold the legislative deadline at our heads.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As honourable senators have no doubt realized, this is a very lengthy question. I shall try to answer it in the best way I can without taking up too much time of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret that I forgot to mention that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I do not intend to close the debate. I am merely answering questions.

First, the Leader of the Opposition mentioned that last week the Leader of the Government said in this chamber that he hoped there would be no legislation before the Senate this week. I do not want to take up his defence, because normally he is able to look after himself very well, but in the absence of the Leader of the Government I must say that I see some justification for his anticipation that no legislation would come before the Senate this week due to the situation obtaining in the other place. It is always hard to predict how things will proceed there, and how fast. It was the opinion of the Leader of the Government last week that no legislation would come before us this week. That is why he proposed the adjournment of the house until February 6.

I do not like to leave the impression—and I do not think it was the intention of the Leader of the Opposition to do so—that by this bill we are asking the Senate to remedy a situation to correct defective legislation.

The Pilotage Act, as passed a year and a half ago—I wish to make this clear—is a good measure, and the government is not changing its policy with regard to it.

The previous Parliament decided a year and a half ago to change, by a new piece of legislation, the system of pilotage then existing in Canada, which system was incorporated in the Canada Shipping Act. The Section dealing with the pilotage was removed from that act, and a special piece of legislation, now known as the Pilotage Act, was introduced and passed. It was then necessary to have in the new Pilotage Act a section dealing with regulations which had existed prior to its passage.

Had it been otherwise, and had the new system been incorporated as an amendment to the then Canada Shipping Act, it would not have been necessary to have this section extending the life of the previous regulations, because they would have continued in force until modified or amended by new regulations under the so amended act. It was a separate piece of legislation, totally separate from the Canada Shipping Act, and it was necessary to have such a section extending the life of regulations made under the former act.

We are now asking the chamber to consider a further extension of those regulations made under the old act, because it has been impossible for Pilotage Authorities to replace them by new regulations.

That is all that the bill purports to do. It does nothing else. It is a very simple bill.

• (1450)

I do not think it was intended but the impression was left, as I understood the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition—and I might have misunderstood him—that we are asking this chamber to legalize something which was done illegally in the past. We are not asking this chamber to do that. It is true that in this legislation there are provisions to take care of some of the regulations under the old act which had been challenged in the courts, but as soon as Parliament decided that those past regulations were valid, they became valid and they remained valid to date. They do not have to be legalized. This was done a year and a half ago. I do not think we should go back to that, and we are not asking this chamber to do so. That is the whole purpose of this bill. Nothing else is intended.

As to what was obvious a week ago with respect to having this bill passed before the end of the month, I agree, but I do not think I said that this was obvious a month ago. I agree that it was obvious last week.

A suggestion has been made as to why this bill was not first introduced in the Senate. I regret that that was not done. I recall that a few years ago a high percentage of legislation was introduced first in this house, and I think this was an expeditious way of dealing with government legislation. Why it was not done in this case, I do not know. It is up to the Leader of the Government and to the minister responsible for the department concerned to explain that when he comes before the committee later on today. Had this been done we would not have been obliged to come back this week to deal in a hurry with this new legislation.

To that extent, I agree fully with what the Leader of the Opposition has said. I hope we can get a full explanation as to why it was decided to deal with the legislation in this way when we have the officials of the department before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications later today. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that we should take every precaution to avoid a repetition of this situation. The Houses of Parliament should not be considered as being at the disposal of the civil servants or others for the correction of their mistakes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, may I say one or two words more? I thought I was very careful in saying that I was not accusing the Leader of the Government—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As I said, I might have misunderstood your remarks.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think I made it quite clear that the mismanagement originated in the other place. I believe I also made it clear that I was not criticizing the Pilotage Act for the creation of the local Pilotage Authorities. I simply said that the department has not yet been able to enforce the provisions of this act.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Langlois in closing his remarks did not intend to place the blame for this situation fully on the civil servants. It is a clear-cut parliamentary custom in this country that the minister is responsible for the department, not the civil servants. Therefore, I am sure that he would like to reconsider his remarks in which he very obviously placed the blame on the civil servants. The responsibility to Parliament is that of the minister, not the public servant.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Langlois, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I wish to inform honourable senators that notices of this meeting will be distributed forthwith. The committee will convene as soon as the chamber rises. Once the committee has reported we can adjourn during pleasure to the call of the bell.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I add, since we are not too numerous, and since all honourable senators are entitled to be present at a meeting of a committee, that they attend whether they are members or not.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Everyone is welcome at any committee meeting, as honourable senators are aware.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There will not be any vote.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Statement of the Chartered Banks of Canada showing Revenue, Expenses and Other Information for the fiscal year ended October 31, 1972, pursuant to section 119(1) of the Bank Act, chapter B-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of Transport for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 34 of the Department of Transport Act, chapter T-15, R.S.C., 1970.

Text of Notes delivered to the Parties to the Agreements on ending the War and Restoring Peace in Vietnam, and the Protocols thereto. Signed at Paris, January 27, 1973.

Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 34(2) of the Official Languages Act, chapter O-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of December 1972, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1600)

At 4 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

PILOTAGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. J. Harper Prowse, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-127, to amend the Pilotage Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), that this bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), that this bill be now read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, we have given leave, but I would not want this decision to be held against me or against the Official Opposition. We have done what we have done because of the urgency of the situation. The other place felt that they had to do the same thing for the same reason.

At least, we had some explanations in committee this afternoon. We realize that while we could not go into the problems behind this bill in depth, whatever we would have been able to do this afternoon would not have incited us to delay its passage. The government, the department, and the Pilotage Authorities in some cases need additional delay. In my view the other place passed this bill without knowing exactly what it was doing, and only because the members there were told that it was urgent. As I say, while we know a little more about it, we really had no choice as far as the Senate is concerned.

I would merely say that in a kingdom of the blind, a one-eyed man as king you will find, and I would think the Senate in this case is the one-eyed man.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I should like to reiterate that I am grateful to all honourable senators, and to my friend the Leader of the Opposition for having given leave to proceed with the third reading of this piece of legislation at this time. I should say that I expected no less from him because I knew he would realize, no matter who was to blame—if indeed anybody was to blame—for the delay in presenting the legislation to this house, that it is our constitutional duty, as the Upper House, to consider legislation and see that nobody suffers from any undue delay in its passage.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that she had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

31 January, 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 31st of January, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary
to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, February 5, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: If Senator Langlois has nothing to say with regard to this motion, I would like to make two points. First, it must be remembered that senators who have not been able to attend today are under the impression that the Senate will meet next Tuesday, rather than next Monday. Therefore, it would be fair to advise them that the Senate is to reconvene on Monday.

My second point is that, because of the short notice given to senators with regard to today's sitting, some of them may be now en route in the belief that we will be sitting tomorrow. I wonder if some device could be found to alleviate any difficulties of that nature in the event another occasion such as this occurs? Personally, I was under the impression that, being recalled today, we probably would sit tomorrow and deal with some of the less urgent matters on the Order Paper. Some senators, however, may be on their way here, and may be very disappointed on discovering that they have come to Ottawa only to return home, there being no business tomorrow. I would urge the leaders on the other side to look into this matter.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Molgat has investigated thoroughly as to legislation which may be expected to come to us next week. I will ask him to give the result of his investigation in answer to Senator Flynn's questions.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the decision to sit on Monday night instead of tomorrow and Friday was made in light of the fact that tomorrow and Friday we will not have any urgent matters before us. There are some inquiries on the Order Paper, but the honourable senators concerned with them are not here.

The decision to sit on Monday rather than Tuesday was made in the expectation and hope that possibly by Monday the other place will have passed, in particular, the unemployment insurance bill, which has some urgency to it. This could be passed before Friday, and that would leave us in the position of having to recall honourable senators for Monday. On the other hand, if we proceed to a sitting on Tuesday, and the bill is passed by the other place on Monday afternoon, we will not be here to deal with it. It was felt preferable, in the interests of good government and of the Senate itself, that we should be available on Monday. It may be that we will not receive the bill then, in which case we will proceed with the other matters on the Order Paper.

Senator Flynn suggested that honourable senators be advised of the time of the sitting. We will attempt, in the course of the next few days, to contact by telephone all honourable senators who were not here today, and advise them of the sitting on Monday night at 8 o'clock. Where we are unable to reach them by telephone, we will contact them by telegram. But to cover everyone by telegram is a costly business.

The measure which we took in warning honourable senators that the sitting today would probably be for just one day—this was anticipated but not guaranteed—was taken after conversation with Senator Flynn. We tried to reach all honourable senators by telephone and tell them what the business of the house was going to be, so that they would not expect to be faced with other legislation.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor

General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to amend the Pilotage Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Before we adjourn I wish to remind honourable senators that we will meet Monday evening at 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, February 5, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, February 5, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 34(2) of the Official Languages Act, chapter 0-2, R.S.C., 1970.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada, Volume III, Annual Statements of Life Insurance Companies and Fraternal Benefit Societies, for the year ended December 31, 1971, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 22 of the Ministries and Ministers of State Act, part IV of chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of the Joint Study Group on Basic Rate of Pension, dated November 1, 1972.

Report of the Department of Manpower and Immigration for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 5 of the Department of Manpower and Immigration Act, chapter M-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Copy of Response to Synopsis Report of the Hearing Officer, pursuant to section 8(4)(d) of the Expropriation Act, chapter 16 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970, respecting the new Toronto Airport.

Statement, dated January 30, 1973, by the Minister of Transport on the site selection for a second Toronto-centered region international airport.

Report of operations under the Crop Insurance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 13 of the said act, chapter C-36, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of correspondence addressed to the Prime Minister of Canada with respect to the 1976 Olympic Games by (1) C.O.R. Rousseau, Esq., President and Commissioner General, Organizing Committee for the Olympic Games, dated February 1, 1973; (2) Jean Drapeau, Esq., Mayor of the City of Montreal, dated February 1, 1973; and (3) Robert Bourassa, Esq., Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec, dated January 31, 1973.

Report of operations under the Government Annuities Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 16 of the said act, chapter G-6, R.S.C., 1970.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN THE GALLERY

NISGHA TRIBUNAL DELEGATION FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to call attention to the presence in the gallery tonight of the Nisgha Tribunal Delegation from British Columbia.

The leader is the Honourable Frank Calder, M.P.P., President of the Nisgha Tribunal Council, Minister without Portfolio in the British Columbia Government. The other gentlemen are all Vice-Presidents of the Nisgha Tribunal Delegation: Chief William MacKay, Councillor of Greenville, Chief James Gosnell, Councillor of New Aiyansh, Chief Hubert Doolan, Councillor of new Aiyansh, Chairman of Nisgha Tribunal Delegation, Chief Maurice Nyce, Councillor of Canyon city and Chief the Reverend John Blyth, delegate. We welcome them.

CRIMINAL CODE (CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Donald Cameron presented Bill S-2, a bill to amend the Criminal Code, (control of weapons and firearms).

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Cameron moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

VIETNAM

CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENTS—CANADA'S ROLE IN INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF CONTROL AND SUPERVISION—QUESTION

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question of which I gave notice at his office this afternoon.

Is it the intention of the government to provide for a debate in this house on the Vietnam cease-fire agreements? I ask particularly because in the debate in the other place there were some remarkably foolish statements made on which, it seems to me, it might be useful to have the sober second thought of this house.

• (2010)

Hon. Mr. Martin: I did not see my honourable friend's letter, and I am sorry that I did not speak to him about this earlier. However, it is my intention tomorrow to move a resolution that will provide for this house the opportunity of discussing the question of the International Supervisory Commission in Vietnam.

PENITENTIARIES

INMATES AUTHORIZED TEMPORARY ABSENCE—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Earl Hastings inquired of the government pursuant to notice:

1. As at November 30, 1972, what was the number of inmates authorized to be temporarily absent on a regular basis from each federal institution by authority of the Penitentiaries Act for the purpose of:

(a) pre-release employment

(b) regular employment

(c) educational purposes

(d) other.

Hon. Paul Martin: Answered.

(For text of answer see appendix A, p. 176.)

DEATHS OF INMATES—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Earl Hastings inquired of the government pursuant to notice:

2. For the twelve-month period ending December 31, 1972, in respect to each inmate death in federal institutions under the Penitentiaries Act, what was:

(a) the name and number of the inmate

(b) the date of death of the inmate

(c) the age of the inmate

(d) the cause of death of the inmate

(e) the sentence being served by the inmate

(f) the institution where death occurred.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Answered.

(For text of answer see appendix B, p. 177.)

SCIENCE POLICY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald Cameron moved pursuant to notice:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report on the science policy of the Federal Government with the object of appraising its priorities, its budget and its efficiency in the light of the experience of other industrialized countries and of the requirements of the new scientific age and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:

(a) recent trends in research and development expenditures in Canada as compared with those in other industrialized countries;

(b) research and development activities carried out by the Federal Government in the fields of physical, life and human sciences;

(c) federal assistance to research and development activities carried out by individuals, universities, industry and other groups in the three scientific fields mentioned above; and

(d) the broad principles, the long-term financial requirements and the structural organization of a dynamic and efficient science policy for Canada.

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in preceding sessions be referred to the committee; and

That the committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Aird, Bélisle, Blois, Bonnell, Bourget, Cameron, Carter, Desruisseaux, Giguère, Grosart, Haig, Hays, Kinnear, Lamontagne, Lang, McGrand, Nichol, O'Leary, Phillips, Sullivan, Thompson and Yuzyk.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in support of this motion. Senator Lamontagne is in the house tonight, and I had hoped that he would have proceeded in my place because originally I was simply moving the motion on his behalf. However, he has asked me to proceed, and he will participate in the debate later.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I am confused, because it seems to me a motion is being moved under Notices of Motions. I thought this matter had been resolved. Surely the motion should be moved in its proper place on the Order Paper, when it is called as an order of business.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is my understanding that there was notice of this motion given at the last sitting.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Your Honour is quite correct in saying that a notice of motion has been given, but surely our order of business requires that motions be moved and spoken to only under Motions. If I may say so, the whole purpose of the Rules Committee in putting Motions to the bottom of the Order Paper was to make sure that the Orders of the Day would be called before motions were moved and discussed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I was under the impression that I called for Motions. In fact, I did call for Motions.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am sorry. I did not hear the Orders of the Day called.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There were none. The item was called, but there were none.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Orders of the Day were called and the Clerk Assistant bowed, indicating there were none.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Apropos of Senator Grosart's intervention, I did give notice of motion, and I was prepared to proceed with this motion on Thursday, January 25. The Leader of the Opposition, Senator Flynn, asked me whether it would be inconvenient if I deferred it until this week. In consultation with Senator Molgat, who was acting leader at that time, it seemed that there would be no difficulty, and it was agreed accordingly.

Honourable senators, the work of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy has had an enthusiastic response from people in industry and technology in Canada. These people have been warm in their praise of that work, and particularly of Volume 2 of the committee's report, released in January 1972.

I would like to say that one of the main thrusts of the recommendations in Volume 2 was aimed at improving the innovative effectiveness of Canada's productive sector. It is hardly necessary to justify this emphasis, in view of our present concern regarding unemployment, industrial strategy, and the many future problems which will surround international trade.

Furthermore, the Senate committee realized that there would be an increasing demand for the improvement of many activities deeply ingrained into the daily life of Canadians. Health care, housing, pollution, education and training, nutrition, are some of the areas of concern.

It should be noted, however, that the productive sector in Canada will have to be effectively engaged in supplying the tools, the materials, and even the processes which will be required to ameliorate the problems in these areas. Therefore, an innovative productive sector is not only a requirement for the effective provision of goods and services purchased by individual consumers, but is also a prime requirement for meeting these new or more visible collective needs.

One must be careful, in discussing problems such as science policy, to note clearly that there is often an important difference between "life at the level of abstract discussion" and "life at the level at which it is actually lived." With regard to innovation in the productive sector, "life at the level at which it is actually lived" will be an important concern of individual firms, and of the engineers and scientists who must design and develop products which will satisfactorily meet human needs. Therefore, it is useful to review briefly the response to the recommendations contained in Volume 2 of the committee's report from those who have first-hand experience and knowledge in innovation from the firing line, from those who know innovation as it is actually practised. What do industrial associations, individual firms, and associations of engineers think of the last report of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy?

Honourable senator, I do not intend to go into detail with respect to these recommendations, but I must say that the resolutions endorsing, and warmly endorsing, the report and its recommendations have come from such agencies as the following: the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario; the Canadian Council of Professional Engineers; the Alberta Society of Petroleum Geologists; the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada; the Electronic Industries Association of Canada; the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers Association; the Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada; the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; and from Dr. Alexander King, the Director General of the OECD.

I would like to quote the following paragraph from an article that Dr. King wrote on the report:

> I have great hope that Canada will be a pathfinder in the exploration of the new areas of human and social possibility, and I look forward to the third volume of the report as a further stimulus.

In this connection I might say that seldom has a Senate committee been involved in a wider discussion with representative Canadians than has been the case as a result of Volume 2 of the Science Policy Committee's report. Senator Lamontagne, Senator Grosart and I have each spoken at 20 or 25 meetings or conventions of major organizations to which we were invited. From this discussion, this questioning and this dialogue, we have had a wide and extensive interchange of ideas. In many cases we have had recommendations for modifications in the report—modifications which have improved those recommendations greatly.

The point I want to make is that as a result of the intensive dialogue that has been established in the last year and a half there has been a broadening of the knowledge of what the report was intended to do, and there is now a broader understanding on the part of many Canadians of the importance of this vital subject.

Honourable senators, I warmly commend the adoption of this motion to you. Both Senator Lamontagne and Senator Grosart are here and I realize that they may wish to participate, but I should like to conclude what I have to say with a quotation from an article by the distinguished scientist, Sanford A. Lakoff, in the January issue of Science:

> To make matters more complicated, there are Canadians who have serious reservations about the fundamental proposition underlying the recommendations of the Lamontagne Report—that is, about the belief that, one way or another, the future of the country depends upon its success in the "international scientific and technological race." Two highly respected Canadian thinkers—

And I am sure Senator Flynn will be delighted to know that they are distinguished Conservatives.

> Two highly respected Canadian thinkers, philosopher George Grant and historian Donald Creighton, maintain that for Canada to follow such a course would be an act of the gravest folly. They argue that if Canada follows the example of the United States—which, in their view, pursues a spiritless quest for material welfare by the relentless expansion of technological capacities—the country will forego all chance of developing an alternative life-style on the North American continent. If that should come to pass, they ask, what will become of the very premise of Canadian nationhood?

I did not know that George Grant or Donald Creighton could be that pessimistic. The article continues:

> Beset by the shrill accusations of radical nationalists, on the one side, and the troubling, if quieter, laments of philosophic conservatives, on the other, pragmatic Canadian politicians must somehow thread their way through to an effective and acceptable science policy. To the extent that they succeed, the work of the Lamontagne committee could prove to have been an important milestone not only in Canadian history, but in the universal effort to make science and technology the instruments of thoughtful planning in the public interest.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no quarrel with what Senator Cameron has said with regard to reconstituting the committee. My only reason for asking that the motion stand until today was that we might have a description of the task that the committee wanted to complete. It seems to me that this motion is the same as that moved when the committee was first constituted, and I was under the impression that the purpose of reconstituting it at this time was merely to complete the work to be done. I understand there is a final volume of the report to be prepared, together with the classification of the material that has been gathered. If this is the case, then I have no objection. But from reading the motion, one gets the impression that the committee is going to start all over again, and review what has already been done.

The motion contains the following:

> That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

It would seem to me that all this has already been done, and that the only thing left for the committee to do is to complete its report and bring it before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: They have to do it over until they get it right.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what I was worried about. I was wondering if perhaps the committee had had second thoughts about some of the things said in the first and second volumes of its report, and wanted to review all this and start all over again, thereby making it a permanent committee.

Honourable senators, I think the motion is badly drafted if it is only intended that the committee should be reconstituted to complete the work already begun. I shall be satisfied with an explanation that it is to be reconstituted for only one purpose, and that is to complete the preparation of the final volume of the report and the classification of the material.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I wish first to thank the Leader of the Opposition for the interest he takes in the work of the committee. I am very pleased to tell him, before going any further, that it is certainly not my intention to start all over again on the work that has already been accomplished, and which was lengthy and difficult and required a great deal of dedication from the members of the committee, including its chairman, and I do not think that we of this house would wish to start all over again on things that have already been done.

[English]

Honourable senators, the reason we have put the same motion on the Order Paper is simply that we have a very good precedent for doing so. This motion has now been moved on three occasions—at the beginning of each session—since the committee was first constituted. Therefore, we thought it necessary to do the same thing at this time, since committees die at the end of each session.

• (2030)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: So, we had to reconstitute the committee at the beginning of each session, and we put the same motion on each occasion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On this point, may I draw the honourable senator's attention to the fact that the rules were changed. We used to appoint committees for the duration of one Parliament. We have changed the rules to provide for the appointment of committees at the beginning of each session. I am not too sure, but I do not think this motion has been put at the beginning of each session.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I am quite sure of that, and if you wish to go through the records you will discover this is true. I know, since I had to move the motion. This is the reason why we decided to move the same motion again on this occasion.

I assure the Leader of the Opposition, as I told him in French, that we do not want to go back and do the work which has already been done.

We are preparing a third volume of the report which will deal exclusively with the organization of government machinery for the formulation and implementation of science policy. Although I am in the hands of the committee, I would hope that this will terminate the work of the committee. As honourable senators know, we received many requests throughout our inquiry that this kind of exercise become a permanent operation of the Senate. All the witnesses who appeared before our committee pleaded with us to make this a permanent arrangement.

It will be remembered that this was the only recommendation in Volume 1. It has not been discussed in this house, and I would hope that once the third volume is produced we will have occasion to discuss it in order to determine whether the committee as it stands now, or in another form, should continue the operation which was begun some years ago.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I do not wish to say anything about the committee. The Leader of the Opposition came to the point very quickly when he raised the matter and I think he is right. However, I wish to raise another matter entirely.

This is a very important committee. It has a great deal of work ahead of it. It is costing a great deal of money and it needs the full attention, not only of the members of the committee, but of the chairman as well. I presume that Senator Lamontagne will be chairman of the committee, and I think that is proper. I received notice today that there will be a meeting tomorrow of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science of which he is also the chairman. I asked him if he was going to stand as chairman of this committee and he said he is being urged by the Leader of the Government to do so. I protest. I protest as strongly as I can against any member of the Senate holding the chairmanship of a standing committee as well as the chairmanship of a special committee.

There are a dozen members of the Senate ready and available at this moment to chair the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, and another dozen in the wings. They should be given their chance and opportunity. These positions should not be given to a small group of members of the Senate.

I mention this now, because this is the only opportunity I shall have to suggest that in fairness to the Senate, and in fairness to himself, Senator Lamontagne should not be a candidate for the chairmanship of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee so long as he is chairman of this special committee.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, as a member of the committee from this side of the house I rise merely to support Senator Cameron's motion and the remarks of Senator Lamontagne, the chairman of the committee. It is obvious that the motion is worded normally, that is to say, in the original terms which, as far as I can recall, is the normal method of reconstituting a committee in this place. I see nothing unusual in that. I think it would be perhaps unusual for the committee to ask for lesser powers than those normally given.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would Senator Grosart permit me a question? I fully agree that this is a very important committee, but is it the intention to call witnesses once the committee is constituted, or is this simply to enable the committee to complete the very important third report?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course, I am not in a position to say whether it is the intention of the committee to call witnesses. The point I was making was that if the committee needs to call a witness, surely it should have that power. If it did not have that power, it would probably be the first special or standing committee appointed by this chamber that did not have the power to call witnesses. The chairman could answer that, but he has already said that it is the intention to complete Volume 3 and, upon its completion, report to the Senate.

I would remind honourable members of the Senate that in the last Parliament this committee was given a very specific major responsibility.

I will wait until the discussion on the other side is over.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not in on it. Do not blame me.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No, but I was responding to a question by the Leader of the Government, and I thought he might care to listen to my answer. I was saying that it may be forgotten that this committee in the last Parliament was requested to conduct a very important inquiry into the possibility of calling a convention to consider the establishment of a Canadian Commission on the Future. Of course, it will be entirely up to the Senate whether it reviews that charge to the committee to call a convention. The committee had already started some work on that, and I just call it to the attention of the Senate that we are in that position. No doubt Senator Cameron and Senator Lamontagne will in due course bring this matter to the attention of the Senate.

I think it should not be assumed that the Science Policy Committee will automatically fold up. As Senator Lamontagne said, the almost insistent recommendation in scores—and I am not exaggerating when I say "scores"—of briefs was that the Senate should maintain a committee on science policy. There were good reasons for that. Now, whether this should be a standing committee or a continuation of the special committee, of course, is for the chamber to decide.

I would not like the assumption to get abroad here, so far as I am concerned, that I am at this time acquiescing in any suggestion that this committee has necessarily finished its work and should fold up its tent and quietly steal away. This may be what it will do, but I would not want it to be on the record that this is the assumption at the moment. I do not know what the future work of this committee will be, but it has been said over and over again that the effectiveness of this committee—and it has been effective; I doubt if there has been another committee of this Parliament which has had a large proportion of its recommendations implemented by the government—lies in the fact that we have remained on the job after our reports. We have been able, in the kind of confrontations that Senator Cameron referred to, to insist that these recommendations be given consideration at the appropriate levels.

It has been said that one of the reasons why the committee has been more effective than a royal commission is that we did not fold up. Our recommendations were not simply put on the shelf and left there. We remained as a committee, and we were able to insist that our recommendations be given consideration. One of those recommendations resulted in a minister of state being appointed to take charge of this great problem of science and technology. The announcement by the government that it intends to have a series of industrial strategies is in direct response to a major recommendation of the committee.

Finally, may I say that the official body representing science in Canada, SCITEC, is one that I might add to the list given by Senator Cameron of those who have endorsed the work of this committee.

SCITEC, representing the whole field of science in Canada—academic, industrial, and government—accepted all but two of the committee's recommendations in Volume 2. I think there were about 55 recommendations, and all but two were endorsed by that official body. Honourable senators, that is an achievement.

The greatest credit must go to Senator Lamontagne. This committee is known and praised all over the world as the Lamontagne Committee. That is a fact. Members of the committee are even now being invited to attend international conferences, in Europe and elsewhere, as members of the Lamontagne Committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. The comments of Senator Grosart implied that I had been critical of the work of the committee. I wish to make it clear that I admire the work of the committee as much as any member. I merely wished to be clear as to the terms of reference. If this is to be a permanent committee, I think the motion should be worded differently from the one we have before us. That is the only point I made. I do not wish to be misunderstood.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: In order that I too may not be misunderstood, may I say that no one in this house admires

Senator Flynn's role as a watchdog of all our proceedings, including those of the committees, more than I do. Not for one minute, in my rather vigorous answer, did I assume that he was in any way criticizing the committee.

It is unfortunately necessary that Senator Flynn be on the alert at all times, because he never knows what may be suggested from the other side that needs to be examined critically.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, it will not be necessary for me to take up much time of the house to defend the Leader of the Opposition. I did not detect in his remarks anything that implied criticism of what this committee has done. He asked what I considered to be a legitimate question, and one that was certainly in my own mind.

The committee, if constituted, may take whatever steps it wishes, but it was not intended that it should do anything more than prepare the third report. If that was so, the wording before us seems unusual and, in the circumstances, unnecessary.

That is the point which I think the Leader of the Opposition was making. Certainly it was the point in my own mind. If the committee is constituted under the present wording, and it is desired to call witnesses, then that is a matter for the committee to decide.

I do not think that in this discussion any honourable senator is belittling the work of the committee, and we should not do so. Our applause a few moments ago, when Senator Grosart paid tribute to Senator Lamontagne, indicated our appreciation of the work of the committee and particularly the leadership of Senator Lamontagne.

There is no doubt that the committee has made a significant contribution. As has already been said, many of its recommendations have been accepted by the government. It has become an authoritative voice in many parts of the country, and, from clippings I have seen, in many parts of the world.

The committee is a credit to the Senate. I wish that the person who wrote the article that appeared in the Financial Journal last week—which I saw for the first time this morning—would look at the work done by the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy. The article criticized the Senate unfairly and, by implication, some of its members. If the author would look at the work done by this one committee, at the standing it has acquired among universities and all levels of government, he would see that the committee is a credit to its members, to its chairman, and to this House of Parliament.

The discussion here has been useful in that we have been able to pay tribute to the committee. It is possible that during the course of the session we shall have information on the proposal made during the last session of Parliament. I am wondering whether that proposal has been dropped or whether it is going to be put forward in another way. At some point during the session it would be useful if we received some information regarding that proposal.

As Senator Lamontagne has said, the recommendation in the first volume concerning the setting up of a permanent committee is a matter which has yet to be decided. So far we have had only a general discussion on the first report.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

There is no doubt that Senator Lamontagne and his colleagues have done an outstanding job. Everyone has not agreed with the committee's findings. Some members of the National Research Council, some very eminent scientists, have taken issue with some of the recommendations; but in the field of human affairs, one cannot expect full support for every position that is taken.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON THE PAROLE SYSTEM IN CANADA

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon all aspects of the parole system in Canada, including all manner of releases from correctional institutions prior to termination of sentence;

That the said Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination;

That the Committee, or any subcommittee so authorized by the Committee, may adjourn from place to place inside or outside Canada for the purpose of carrying out the said examination; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the third and fourth sessions of the 28th Parliament be referred to the Committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I should say, for clarification of the record, that I have no objection to the motion as worded. The committee has not, in fact, completed the hearing of witnesses, and so forth, which was commenced during the 28th Parliament. That is the difference between this and the previous motion.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, if there is nothing else before the house I would ask leave to say a few words on a question of privilege.

First of all, I should like to say to Your Honour that I have listened with great interest to all the compliments that have been paid you. I feel that if I wait any longer before expressing my pleasure in seeing you occupy the high office of Speaker of this chamber there will be nothing left to say. So, Your Honour, I agree with everything that has been said, and I want to add that I am your devoted servant.

Honourable senators, I was somewhat disturbed by an article which appeared about ten days ago in the Wall Street Journal concerning the work of the Senate on Bill C-259. Our works on that legislation, of course, started a year and a half before the bill actually came to us, when we examined the White Paper on Taxation, which was a rough draft embodying all the changes, and so forth, contemplated in our taxation system.

After our study of that white paper, Bill C-259 came before us. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce held 55 public hearings on the white paper, and we made a careful study of all the various changes in our taxation system. It was as careful a study as had ever been made in Canada or, for that matter, anywhere in the free world.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as honourable senators are aware, held 28 public hearings on Bill C-259. The House of Commons held none. We went through the bill with a fine tooth-comb. We made eight major recommendations, none of which had anything to do with policy. The Senate has never pretended, because it is not an elected body, to set the pace for our taxation policies. The man on the street can vote the government out if he does not agree with its taxation policies, but we in this chamber cannot be voted out and for that reason we have never tried to set policy. We have tried, however, to take the policy which is set in the other place and make it read in such a way that the application is going to be what is really intended. In Bill C-259 there were eight major areas where the drafters of the bill made serious errors. The Senate recommended and insisted on amendments to correct these mistakes.

Bill C-259 came to us in the dying days of the Third Session of the 28th Parliament. It came to us at a time when a good many of the people who had done the bulk of the work on it in this chamber had gone away because of plans made well in advance of its arrival. I, for one, thought at that time it would be better to pass a bad bill with the assurance that the amendments which we felt were essential would be passed. As it turned out, we were wrong. As far as the Senate of Canada is concerned, we were terribly wrong. We passed the bill with the assurance that these amendments would be made and, of course, no attempt was ever made to pass them. The amending bill was introduced in the other place in May or June of 1972, but never received any serious consideration. I do not think it even received second reading.

We are in the situation now where public companies are holding their annual meetings. If they are manufacturing companies they calculate their rate of tax at 40 per cent, which is not the law. For example, I know of an open-end investment trust—and it has been an open-end investment trust for 25 years—which, because of a definition in the Income Tax Act, is now deemed to be a private company. That is not the only one. A great many companies are having tremendous problems as a result of this poor draftsmanship.

What is it we are doing wrong? What is it that the Senate is doing wrong? We could not have done our homework more efficiently. We could not have worked, in my opinion, more diligently. I do not think we could have had a better committee.

The newspapers, in looking at our committee and the work it did, just asked, "How many directorates do the senators on the committee hold?" What has that got to do with the results of our work? What has that got to do with the study that we made and the effort we put into it? Would people with no directorates, and knowing nothing about the problems involved, have done a better job? I think anyone looking at the results in the other place would have to agree that our committee did a much better job. As far as I am aware, the problems that our committee brought to light were never even considered in the other place.

Honourable senators, surely it is time for us to sit back and take stock. Who are we? Well, every vote in this house is worth about five votes in the other place. We have every power. We are perfectly independent. We are not subject to the whims of the public. We do not have to go out and kiss babies, and so forth, in order to get re-elected. We are here. We have a lot of ability and talent. All we have to do is use it.

I am not saying that we should decide to run the whole show, or that we should put the government of the day in a difficult position. Over the long years the Senate, I think, has done its best work when the government of the day has been in a minority position in the Senate, simply because the Senate has been more insistent that necessary amendments be passed. But that is not necessary. We can do the work. We have the people here to do the work, and we are perfectly willing to do it.

We spoke tonight about the good work which was done by several of our committees. However, there is a committee that we have not got and that is a good publicity committee with a topnotch man to look after it. When we have worked hard for months and produced something that really makes sense in the tax field, how can we explain to some young reporter who sits in the gallery what we are talking about? We should have a capable person to run our publicity, one who will, without any need to exaggerate, put across to the public the work that we are capable of doing, that we are doing and that we get no credit for.

I do not know how many of you read the article to which I referred. The Wall Street Journal is read all over the world, and that particular article made us look like ninnies. It said that we looked at Bill C-259 and passed it in three days. There is nobody in the other place who knows as much about Bill C-259 as our Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and I include the former Minister of Finance.

Honourable senators, let us have a publicity committee that will make it clear to everyone that the Senate does a great deal of very useful work.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE EXPENSES TABLED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to rule 84, tabled a report of the total amount of special expenses incurred in the Third and Fourth Sessions of the Twenty-eighth Parliament in connection with the examination of the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation.

NATIONAL FINANCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Choquette on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Choquette be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION

FREIGHT RATES AND NEW TECHNOLOGY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald Cameron rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.

He said: Honourable senators, in opening this discussion on the economics of transportation in Canada and the new technology, I am motivated because this is one of the most important elements in the cost structure of our whole Canadian economy.

I am also aware of the fact that just recently the three Western provinces in Canada have set up, to quote from the Edmonton Journal of Thursday, February 1:

> . . . a council "to break the bottlenecks" in transport routes so that grain, potash, sulphur, coal and other western resources can move to markets faster.

• (1410)

There is probably no area of the Canadian economy in which the application of new technology and new methods will pay greater dividends than the area of transportation. There is no other country in the world where transportation plays a greater role in determining the cost of production of any given item. In spite of this, Canadians are probably doing less and spending less money on transportation research than any other country of comparable size in the world.

In the course of this discussion, I am going to limit what I have to say to the question of mobility of people, or transportation as it affects passenger services by trains and airlines. I will leave the very important question of freight rates to some of my colleagues who are more competent than I am to deal with this—and I think particularly of Senator Manning who, when he was Premier of Alberta, had a constant watching brief in Ottawa on this question of freight rates, and who is well qualified to do it.

May I say that eight or nine senators have indicated they will participate in this discussion, which is an indication of the broad general nature of the topic.

The mobility of people is not only a very important element in the cost of production of our exports, but it also is a vital factor in permitting Canadians to know their own country and, as a result of seeing the country and meeting people who live in its diverse parts, to develop that increasing pride and understanding which can come about only through first-hand observation.

Canada is a particularly difficult country to see. It is so large—4,000 miles from sea to sea—that its very magnitude contributes to the factor of isolation which the Prime Minister spoke about some short time ago.

Again, most of our population is concentrated within a 150-mile strip along the American border. This means that our small population of under 22 million is scattered along a narrow corridor stretching over 4,000 miles, with the odd isothermic lines peaking up into the north, as we find it in Northern Alberta and Northern British Columbia, where the traffic into the Northwest Territories and the Yukon is becoming a factor of increasing importance on the Canadian scene. In the central eastern end of that long east-west Canadian corridor, from Windsor to Montreal and Quebec, we have two-thirds of the Canadian population concentrated. We have the phenomena of the rapid urbanization taking place in the centres of Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton and Windsor, in the East, and the same rapid development—in fact, the most rapid of all—taking place in the burgeoning cities of Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver, where a new population and business triangle is developing, with increasing interdependence among the three. The rapid expansion of our cities has given a new urgency to the search for more efficient, more effective, more economical, means of inter-urban transport than we have at the present time—if for no other reason than to curb the pollution of these communities by the increasing horde of passenger cars. Some 75 per cent of them carry about one passenger per car, and the pollution from exhaust fumes is becoming a real hazard on certain days and at certain times of the year. The needs of commerce involve the mobility of people between these urban centres by a transportation means that must be economical and safe and fast.

I do not propose to discuss anything other than land transportation, and this includes air, because of airports and so on. I will not be discussing sea transport, and though this is an important element in our transportation economy I will mainly be discussing passenger transportation because it is becoming increasingly clear that improved passenger technology can also lead to improved freight technology and lower costs. In examining the utilization of the various forms of transportation in Canada today, we find, as is shown in table 1, that the different modes of transportation are used as follows:

The Canadian Transport Commission conducted a study called "C.T.C. Inter-city Transport Study," Ottawa, 1970, and at page 2 of the study the data show that in 1970, 85 per cent of inter-city trips were made by automobile; 7 per cent by bus; 5 per cent by air, and 3 per cent by rail. In other words, these statistics could be added in the 1970 column to those of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics with the clarification that they are not DBS figures.

With respect to economics of travel, it has been difficult to get accurate comparable figures on the cost-per-mile of travelling by the various modes of transportation. There are so many variables here that it is difficult to get figures that are meaningful and comparable. However, we can obtain a picture with reasonable accuracy to show how much the price of each mode of transportation has risen in the nine-year period between 1961 and 1971.

To give honourable senators an idea of transportation statistics, referring specifically to passenger use by different modes of travel, the latest figures available of the percentage of passengers travelling by private auto, bus, railway and airlines are for the year 1970, and these figures are presented in table 1. They show the percentage of passenger miles travelled on the various modes of transportation. The table is as follows:

SOURCE: Statistics Canada. Transportation Bulletin No. 1, 1970.

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

Looking at the table you can see that from 1965 to 1970 the percentage of people travelling by automobile went up from 89.7 per cent to 90.2 per cent, by airlines from 4.2 per cent to 4.8 per cent, whereas for railways the percentage went down from 3.0 per cent to 2.1 per cent. You can see the figures for the other modes of travel in the table itself when the Debates of the Senate are printed.

The table refers to passenger traffic on services and journeys whose origin and destination is within Canada. It also includes the Canadian portion of such services which, although commencing and ending in Canada, are routed through the United States.

A word about the interpretation of the table should be mentioned here. The data presented for the years 1968, 1969 and 1970 are still being analyzed and are subject to change. To date these are still approximate percentages. This is especially true of the percentages dealing with commercial bus travel. Further analysis may show that these percentages are lower than they appear to be. As further data comes into Statistics Canada later this year and further analysis is completed, these figures may be revised. However, they do give us a general idea of the percentage of travel taking place on the different modes of transportation.

Other data that may be of interest on this subject can be found in a table which shows projected percentages of passenger-miles travelled on different modes of transportation between 1976 and 2001. These projections were made by the Systems Research Group of Toronto. The table is as follows:

PROJECTED DOMESTIC PASSENGER-MILES IN CANADA
(Percentage Share of each Mode)

				Commercial Bus
Year	Autos	Airlines	Railways	Inter-City and Rural	Urban	Other Urban Public Transport
1976...	85.10	8.64	3.14	2.38	.55	.19
1981...	82.21	11.56	3.17	2.47	.46	.14
1986...	78.54	15.29	3.17	2.54	.37	.10
1991...	74.01	19.94	3.12	2.56	.30	.07
1996...	68.57	25.59	3.02	2.53	.24	.05
2001...	62.28	32.18	2.87	2.45	.18	.03

Looking at table 2 we can see that in 1976, for example, it is projected that 85.10 per cent of the people of Canada will be travelling by automobile whereas by the year 2001 the number of people travelling by automobile will be down to 62.28 per cent. For airlines the figure will go up from 8.64 per cent in 1976 to 32.18 per cent in 2001. For railways it will go from 3.14 per cent in 1976 down to 2.87 per cent in 2001. This is, of course, based on the assumption that there is no major change in transportation technology, which is an assumption I am not prepared to accept.

> The reader should understand that the projections presented are based on historical trends. In the jargon of futurology, they are 'surprise free' projections because they are based on the explicit assumption that past and existing trends will continue. They are not predictions in the sense that we believe that they will necessarily come true.

From this statement we can see that these figures must be viewed with extreme caution. During the next 30 years many factors could occur that might alter patterns of travel and therefore render these projections inaccurate.

Also, as our statistical analysis techniques become more sophisticated our future projections will likely be more accurate than the ones presented here. The projections in table 2 do, however, give us an idea of what percentage of travel will take place on different modes of transportation if historical trends continue to the year 2001.

Statistics for the amount of money spent by passengers per mile travelled on different modes of transportation were not available. However, we are able to see how much the price of each mode of transportation has risen between 1961 and 1971. This data is presented in the following summary which replaces table 3 in the original document. By using 1961 as the base year we can see that by 1971 plane fares had risen 51.3 per cent over their 1961 level.

I just want to interject here that I resent very much indeed the way Air Canada is gouging the domestic service in Canada by this inexcusable $25 landing fee which they justify on a sector-to-sector basis. There was a time when you could travel from Ottawa to Toronto to Winnipeg to Edmonton to Calgary and back for $172. If you do that today there is a $25 charge for stopping at Toronto, at Winnipeg, at Edmonton and so on all the way through. I maintain that this is completely unjustified. Air Canada says the reason for this is that it adds extra cost to land and pick up passengers. Of course it does, but if you wish to follow that argument, then you could rationalize by saying that if the aircraft stayed up in the air all the time and did not come down at all you could save the expense entirely.

As I said the plane fares have increased by 51.3 per cent over 1961, bus fares 25.2 per cent, train fares 51.2 per cent, and automobile operation costs 22.7 per cent. In 1971 plane fares showed the highest percentage increase of the inter-city carriers of people. The airlines were closely followed by the railroads in this percentage increase. There was a hope, a dim one, that the domestic air fares might be decreased, but I see no sign of this.

It has been said that Canada is a problem in transportation. This is really not an overstatement. In spite of its importance to the Canadian economy, and in spite of the enormous expenditures the Canadian people have invested in moving people and goods from one place to another, transportation remains a sadly neglected area of research and development in this country. It is estimated that Canada is currently spending about $10 billion a year on transportation. This figure represents direct expenditures on transportation by the public, private and corporate sectors and does not include all manner of indirect expenditures on transportation. Thus, it excludes all transportation of people and goods on construction sites, in mines and factories, et cetera. It excludes costs of packaging associated with transportation, the policing of our highways, the removal of our garbage, and such other items as might be included under a more general definition of transportation than has been used in the study entitled "A Survey of Canadian Activity in Transportation R & D," a background paper prepared for the Science Council of Canada, being No. 17 of May 1971. If all of the latter expenditures were included, it is likely that our total spending on transportation would amount to almost 20 per cent of Canada's gross national product. About one-quarter of this direct expenditure is from the public purse, about one-quarter from corporate coffers, and about one-half from private pockets.

About two-thirds of all direct expenditures are on automotive transport, less than one-fifth on rail transport, and about one-fiftieth on pipeline. The remainder is divided about equally between air transport and water transport. As a nation we spend more on transportation than we do on food. The private automobile accounts for almost one-half of this expenditure. Thus, I think it can be seen why I have emphasized the importance of the role of transportation in the Canadian economy.

In 1971 it was estimated that the federal government expenditure on research and development in the transportation industry did not exceed $5 million. It was also estimated that provincial and municipal governments were spending about $5 million per annum on transportation research and development, and the Canadian transportation equipment industry is spending about $25 million on transportation research and development. The transportation operating industry was estimated to be spending between $5 and $6 million, and of this amount Canadian Pacific Railway, Canadian National Railways and Air Canada spent by far the largest part. The trucking industries were spending an estimated amount of $400,000 per annum and the shipping industry even less.

An even more serious aspect of the Canadian scene with respect to research and development in transportation is the relatively small contribution being made by Canadian universities. The total expenditure is less than $500,000 per annum, and they are not presently training the number of researchers that will be required to deal with the problem efficiently in the next few years. From the foregoing it would seem that the total expenditures on transportation research and development in Canada in 1971 were running at a figure approximately of $40 million per annum, and considerably more than half of this was spent on research and development on transport equipment rather than on economic research, systems analysis or development of new concepts. And it is in these three latter areas where the greatest scope for new breakthroughs and innovation can come about.

In the Science Council of Canada paper, the vice-president's committee on Canadian transportation of York University is quoted as saying:

> Despite the great size and importance of the Canadian transport sector, there is as yet no real national > emphasis in transport teaching and research. The universities carry out modest, mutually uncoordinated programmes which emphasize technical; e.g. highway engineering, or regional; e.g. grain transport, problems. Nowhere in Canada at present does internationally respectable systems-oriented transport teaching and research take place.

This is a very serious oversight in terms of our national needs.

> There is a severe current shortage of top transport personnel. Government and industry leaders feel that, in addition, existing staff will have to be upgraded substantially in order to keep pace with a rapidly changing technology and environment.

On page 23 of the report it says:

• (1430)

> Some embryo "centres of excellence" in transportation are already in existence on Canadian campuses. In most instances, however, their operations are currently subminimal, and none is likely to achieve an international reputation in transportation within the next decade unless the present level of support is greatly increased. Even if this were done, it is suggested that first priority at such regional centres should be given to the education of transportation researchers and managers, with next priority given to research on regional transportation problems. A central research institution, strategically located with respect to senior government, operating industry and manufacturing industry, could still play a vital role in undertaking impartial and full-time research on national transport problems, in stimulating and co-ordinating research activities by summer courses and seminars, in encouraging international co-operation in research, and in providing basic services for transportation research across Canada.

Speaking of the role of qualifications of academics on university campuses, the report goes on to say:

> Of those academics currently teaching transportation in Canadian universities, almost 60 per cent have no professional experience outside the universities. The median "outside" experience of the rest is less than six years.

That statement alone is the most damning indictment of the neglect which is taking place.

Under the National Transportation Act of 1967, there was established the Research Division of the Canadian Transport Commission. This division should fill an increasingly important need for a capability in "big picture" research to assist in policy development and for the co-ordination of research activities throughout Canada. It will need to devote a continuing effort to the planning of research programs directed towards the implementation of national transportation policies, irrespective of whether the actual research is to be performed intramurally or "by the other sectors." It is the only existing agency of the federal government which is potentially capable of undertaking the tasks of any major program and it has been given a clear mandate for this under the terms of the National Transportation Act.

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

While Canada has been lagging behind in transportation research, many other countries, notably Japan, Germany, France and the United Kingdom, have been devoting a great deal of time and effort to advanced research and its application to transportation systems. Canada, by arranging either bilateral or multilateral agreements with nations, can avoid the costly and time-consuming effort required to do her own research. In other words, by making agreements with the British Rail Research for example, or with the French, or German, or Japanese research agencies, we could arrange to have the benefit of their technology and apply it with such modifications as may be necessary to the Canadian scene. This is an imperative conclusion and we have no option but to capitalize on the experimental work that has been done if we are to maintain our place in the highly competitive transportation picture in the years to come.

Here I wish to interject that I have made two trips to the British Rail Research Centre in Derby, England, where 800 people work on transportation research. I would suggest to any honourable senator who has the time and opportunity to go there that it is well worth the trouble. As a result of some of their research they have produced what is known as the Advanced Passenger Train. I will circulate a photograph of it. This train is new from the ground up. It is operated by linear reduction engines and can travel at 155 miles per hour on existing tracks with existing signalling systems. If it had its own track and signalling system it could reach 250 miles per hour. Arrangements are being made today for transportation from the new airport at Slough to London, a distance, I am told, of 50 miles. Some say it is less, but in any case it will take the train only 11 minutes to travel from the airport to the centre of London. This is the picture of what is to come in rapid, light passenger traffic. Those trains are adapted so that they can use the existing tubes of the subway system in London.

I want to come back to this a little later. In the meantime I wish to take a look at the transportation policy with respect to airlines.

This is a good time to take a close hard look at Canadian transportation policy, because the importance of people being able to carry on their business unimpeded by strikes has never been more apparent than in the past two or three years. In the airline industry we have had strikes of air mechanics, office workers, air controllers, and radar technicians, each one resulting in great inconvenience and loss of money. People are getting tired of the disruption of their convenience, the Canadian economy and Canadian business at increasingly frequent intervals, all caused by small groups of people who can only be described as irresponsible, sometimes controlled by officers from outside the country. The recent confusion as to who was in control of the IBEW radar technicians in the last strike is a case in point. However, I do not wish to get into that subject.

In looking at the Canadian scene we have to examine the attitudes not only of airline employees but of those who run our railways. For example, officers in the Canadian railway hierarchy have been saying for years that the passenger train is as dead as a dodo. It is a fact that many senior administrative personnel with the railways seem to have been doing everything they can to discourage people from using trains.

This, in my judgment, is a completely negative attitude. The status quo type of thinking and performance, where the percentage of people using the passenger services has been going down, is being used as an excuse for saying that the economics of passenger railway transportation are such as to discourage the railways from providing passenger transportation.

It is high time that we took a new look at this kind of thinking and emulate what is being done in other countries. In Canada we have a tremendous investment in railway roadbeds, signalling systems, passenger, freight and express dispersal centres, and so on. It seems to me that it would be much smarter to do what is being done in the United Kingdom, Germany, Japan, France, and now in the United States, which is to explore, as an interim measure, what can be done to upgrade existing facilities by the introduction of new technology.

Everyone is familiar with the famous Japanese bullet train developed after the war, which is capable of speeds up to 150 miles an hour, and which has an average speed of 130 miles an hour between Osaka and Tokyo. It is the famous Tokaido Express. It is a comfortable, quiet and fast train, and has reduced the use of airline services in that section by a very high percentage. As I said, the British Rail Research Board at Derby, employing 800 people, has developed new trains.

The advanced passenger train which the British are using, and which they are now trying to sell to the Americans, is an attempt at a completely new approach to the utilization of existing investment in road and rail facilities. If that train had its own track and signalling system, it woud be capable of travelling at 250 miles an hour. One has only to think what this would do to the transport picture between Ottawa and Montreal, a distance of 125 miles. It would take half an hour to travel from downtown Ottawa to downtown Montreal. Between Ottawa and Toronto, a distance of 250 miles, it would take one hour to travel from downtown to downtown. It would take one hour and a half to make the journey from Toronto to Montreal, a distance of 360 miles. If, by using the same ingenuity, we could put a fast train on our existing roadbeds, using our existing signalling system and getting 150 miles an hour out of it, we could travel from Ottawa to Montreal in less than an hour and from Toronto to Montreal in about two hours. The best you can do with a plane today is two hours and a half from Toronto to Montreal, taking into consideration the time required to get from downtown to the air terminal, the flight time and the time from the Montreal air terminal to downtown Montreal. That is two and a half hours, providing everything goes well and you are not plagued by fog or by striking airline employees, or other factors. The British have developed another system at their research centre at Cambridge. This system has an air-screw propulsion which requires its own track and is capable of a speed of 250 miles an hour. The hope of developing a train of this type is mitigated against by the cost of acquiring new rights-of-way, something that is becoming increasingly difficult in these days of modern urban congestion. The French have an experimental train with 15 miles of track at Dijon. This is an air cushion train which is capable of doing 260 miles an hour. The Americans are developing in California a train which is capable of doing 250 miles an hour. They call it the Super Train, and it is to run from Los Angeles to Las Vegas.

I cite these examples to illustrate what is happening in passenger train technology today. Canada is doing very little in this respect. The turbo-train which was to run between Toronto and Montreal has not even made it yet. It is not very encouraging, but it can be done. The main argument cited against fast passenger trains in this country is that we do not have the population to warrant it. I feel that if we could divert a good deal of the air traffic to passenger trains it would make a great difference. I am sure a lot of people would prefer to get from centre to centre on a fast, comfortable train.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: This would get us away from the tremendous expenditures we are being forced to make for airports. The new air terminal at Ste. Scholastique is to cost over $1 billion, as is the proposed airport terminal in Pickering. By the time these are completed the costs will probably be much higher. This is subsidization of air traffic of which we hear very little.

In looking at what is happening with respect to air travel—in addition to the inconvenience and disruption of the travelling public by the airline employees, which has done so much to damage the image of the airlines—we are faced with the factor that as the planes get bigger, we need larger airports. This means moving them farther out from the centre of the cities so that more time is actually spent on getting to the airport than is spent in the air getting from point to point. As the numbers of people using the airlines increase, the congestion in the air terminals with respect to the ticketing process, baggage handling, and the general movement of people, is slowing down and becoming more and more of an aggravation. If any of you doubt that, then spend a little time, as I did the last two weekends, at the Toronto International Airport where I was stalled due to fog. The congestion and the confusion is an aggravation. Of course, Air Canada was not responsible for the fog—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was the fault of the government.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Again we are not using much ingenuity in handling this problem. Some years ago, Air Canada gave up the Calgary-Edmonton run because they said they were losing money on it. Pacific Western took the line over and put on an air bus, which means the planes take off at a specified time. It is on a first-come first-served basis and you look after your own baggage. There was a time when you got the ticket on the plane but you now buy the ticket at the counter and go right on the plane. They have reduced the travelling time between Edmonton and Calgary to 35 minutes. It leaves the Calgary airport, which is less than five miles from downtown, and lands in the Edmonton Industrial Airport right in the heart of the city. In other words, you can go from downtown Calgary to downtown Edmonton in an hour to an hour and fifteen minutes. Pacific Western has increased the number of flights to six each way on weekdays and two flights each way on Saturdays and Sundays, and they are doing a land office business. The question is: if this can be done so successfully between Calgary and Edmonton, why cannot the same principle be applied between Toronto and Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, Toronto and Windsor, and so forth? But again, if we had the type of fast train facilities I am talking about we would not have to worry so much about the airlines.

Another factor of increasing concern is the high cost of providing the necessary airport facilities for the airlines. We are familiar with the fact that the Canadian taxpayers are committed to spending over $1 billion plus to develop the new air terminal at Ste. Scholastique. This also applies to the proposed air terminal at Pickering. This is to mention only two of the major airports. I have a clipping here to the effect that we are going to spend $57 million in Calgary, which is very nice for the citizens of Calgary. I would be the last to deny my fellow citizens a bonanza such as that, but I am just wondering if it is justifiable at this time.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended on developing airport facilities in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, and similar places, right across Canada, and these are being built by the taxpayers of Canada. This fact should be remembered when comparing the costs of subsidizing passenger traffic on the railways. The provision of the air terminal and the landing facilities for airlines is a direct subsidy to the airlines. This is a fact that is seldom considered when comparing the costs of subsidizing the passenger service on the railways.

In a country such as Canada there will always be a place for long distance travel. The airplane is the obvious way to travel from here to Vancouver or vice versa, but surely railway technology is the answer for the short run of, say, 300 miles. The railways could handle a great majority of the passengers on the short runs.

Another factor to be considered as far as the airlines are concerned is the increasing pollution factor—noise pollution and pollution from airplane exhausts. One has only to sit on a runway at the Toronto International Airport some evening and watch the planes taking off every few seconds. The air is filled with black smoke. It is easy to realize how heavily these aircraft contribute to the pollution of the atmosphere, something that is not done by the much cleaner passenger train.

Probably no area of transportation needs to be upgraded more urgently than the rapid transit in cities. I am pleased that in this respect Premier Davis of Ontario has initiated a very advanced type of interurban transportation system which will go into effect in 1976 or 1977. That is a long time to wait. Here again, we are still fooling around with the technology of the early 1900s. Bus transportation, streetcars, private motorcars, congestion of cars, congestion of traffic delays in time, pollution of the air, increasing cost of providing roadways—all are factors that must be looked at critically in the years to come. For example, look at the tremendous expenditure of funds on Highway 401 going out from Toronto west to Hamilton, and on Highway 27 north to the airport. Not only is the tremendous cost of these expensive interchanges a factor, but the more traffic lanes we provide the more private cars are used, and the more congestion we get the slower the average speed. I am told that the average speed on the throughways in Los Angeles, which are supposed to be the most advanced in the world, is about 11 miles an hour. Some interchanges are taking as much as 50 acres of land, so again the waste of land under airport interchanges, airport runways, is a very considerable cost factor. All of these factors suggest that the time has come when it would be very profitable to Canada to devote more of its technological know-how, its resources of money, and its resources of manpower to innovation in our transportation systems, particularly as far as rail transport is concerned.

• (1450)

With this in mind, I am going to propose that we do one of two things in the Senate, that either we reactivate the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to tackle this problem in a systematic and organized way, or that we establish, as we have done so successfully in a number of other cases, a special committee on transportation. This matter is urgent in terms of need, it is urgent in terms of the economy, and it is urgent in terms of the opportunity it will provide to gain a new competitive advantage in the more effective mobilization of our resources of manpower and technology.

I have a good deal more material on grain technology, and so on, but I will leave that subject for some of my colleagues.

I have deliberately invoked this discussion because I think it is important to the economy of Canada. I think this opens up a whole new field whereby Canadian ingenuity and resources can be used more effectively. I hope that as a result of the interest a number of senators have expressed in this matter we will have a full and complete mobilization of the knowledge we have in this Senate on this very important factor in the Canadian economy.

Hon. Mr. Laird: I recall reading a figure of the number of people who have never flown in a plane. it is an astounding number. Does the honourable senator by any chance have that figure in his material? It is a fantastic number. Something like 90 per cent have never flown.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I could not vouch for the accuracy of the figure, but I believe about 11 per cent have travelled by plane, which leaves 89 per cent who never have.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Has the honourable senator the figure of the number of people who have never travelled by train? I am serious, because I think honourable senators will find that a very large number of the younger people in this country find a train is almost a museum piece. If they do ever travel by train it is an exciting event for them; it is like seeing a horse, something they scarcely realized existed.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I have no figures on that. However, I remember three or four years ago talking to some young people at the University of Alberta whose parents thought they would give the youngsters a real treat by taking them on the train between Calgary and Edmonton. They had never before been on a train. A very large number of young people have never been on a train. They travel by air, bus or car.

On motion of Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) for Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, before the adjournment is moved I would like to give a brief word of explanation of the present business of the Senate.

The Unemployment Insurance Bill, which we are told must be passed by tomorrow or the mailing of the cheques will be stopped, is still in the other place at the third reading stage. There is no assurance when they will give the bill third reading, but it is conceivable it could happen this afternoon or this evening. We thus find ourselves in the position of not knowing exactly when this urgent bill will come to us.

In light of that, and in order to avoid the Senate not being available to deal with this urgent business, it is my suggestion that we adjourn at this time until the call of the bell at approximately 8.30 this evening. I regret the inconvenience this will impose on honourable senators, but I think it is the best we can do. I am sure we would not want a situation to develop in which unemployment insurance cheques could not be delivered to those who need them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was wondering whether Senator Molgat thinks it is worse for the Senate to be too readily available or not available at the exact moment a bill passes in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I recognize the validity of that argument. It is a question of balance, as to how we can best conduct the business of the Senate and the business of Canada. It seems to me that under the circumstances, because certain people will not receive their cheques if we do not proceed with this business expeditiously, it is in the best interests of Canada to be ready to proceed as soon as possible.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wish I had better news to give you. The bill has made no further progress in the other place. It is still being debated on third reading, and there is no guarantee that it will pass this evening. Therefore, I move that the Senate do adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I hope that the honourable acting leader will have more confidence in me in the future.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I must confess that the advice given me by the Leader of the Opposition was sound. I do not know whether his channels of communication are better than mine, but certainly his estimate was more accurate.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: He has first class information.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: May I ask the Acting Leader of the Government if he is so pessimistic that he would not suggest an earlier meeting at, say, 11 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: How about 2 o'clock in the morning?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I will be here, if you will.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: I believe that there are other activities on Wednesday morning which would prevent certain senators from being here. I have discussed the matter with the Leader of the Opposition and the suggestion is that we adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 7, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

WESTERN CANADA

NEWSPAPER REPORT—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of personal privilege. I was intrigued, when coming up on the aircraft from Toronto on Monday, when the Toronto Star of February 5 was placed on board the aircraft, to read a report, datelined Canadian Press and United Press International, on a television interview of the Honourable James Richardson, which took place on Sunday. The subject matter of the report is not important. However, this passage caused me some amusement:

> "Richardson, one of two westerners in the federal cabinet, was interviewed on the CTV television—

And so on. Needless to say, Mr. Basford and Mr. Davis can well account for themselves in the other place. I would not have paid much more attention to this but for the fact that I later saw the same article in the Ottawa Citizen. Even then, I do not suppose I would have been prompted to say anything, because we in British Columbia are accustomed to a number of people in Canada feeling that the West begins about Guelph and trails off somewhere around Thunder Bay. I was startled yesterday afternoon, however, when Senator Cameron in his opening remarks to his very excellent speech on transportation, made the observation:

> I am also aware of the fact that just recently the three Western provinces in Canada have set up, to quote from the Edmonton Journal of Thursday, February 1:
> > . . . a council "to break the bottlenecks" in transport routes so that grain, potash, sulphur, coal and other western resources can move to market faster.

There was no mention of metals, pulp, paper, plywood, lumber or any of the things produced in British Columbia.

I admit that a number of years ago there was a movement in British Columbia, which did not come to anything, suggesting that Canada should trade off Ontario for the Hawaiian Islands, and it might have been a profitable trade to us. This was given short shrift by the people of British Columbia who are loyal to Confederation.

I wish to bring to the attention of honourable senators the fact that British Columbia became part of Canada more than a hundred years ago and is still in Confederation.

I would also bring to Senator Cameron's attention the fact that the West does not really end at the Banff School of Fine Arts but continues for several hundred more miles before it merges itself into the Far East.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT 1971 (No. 1)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1).

Bill read first time.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave, I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Langlois, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

• (1410)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I think that motion should have come after Her Honour had asked when second reading would take place. However, that is only a matter of procedure. I mention it merely for the benefit of the government leader. He does not seem to care too much about the procedure of the Senate.

Since he moved that this item be put on the Orders of the Day for later this day, I think it is a good moment for the leader to tell us why. Obviously, we know about the bill. We have not, however, had time to study the debate which went on in the other place. We haven't been able to form a real, sober, second thought on this matter. Does the leader think we can do that in about half an hour?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is not the reason. As I understand it, there had been some discussion with Senator Molgat, and it was to enable the Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to make a report on the study of the estimates. That was to be done first. That was the reason why it was done. As to the urgency of the bill, as my honourable friend knows, it is public knowledge because of the long discussion in the other place that the fund in question covered by the unemployment insurance bill is depleted and, if payments are going to be made, the bill has to be passed by a certain time. That is all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What is that certain time?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Today? I should like the honourable leader to be more certain about it.

Mr. Martin: Today. There is no money in the fund. This is the last day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Today! Is it really a declaration or affirmation of the Leader of the Government that if this bill is not passed today cheques will not be able to be sent to the recipients?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The cheques will not be able to be sent tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is it today or tomorrow, then?

Hon. Mr. Martin: If the bill is not passed today, that is the situation as has been stated in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: "As has been stated in the other place." I doubt that I will be able to accept the affirmation of my honourable friend, but in any event let us say we agree that it be discussed on second reading later today.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: On that point, honourable senators, I was rather pleased to hear from the President of the Treasury Board yesterday in the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that there had been a levelling-off and that the grants have not been as great in the last couple of months as anticipated. If that is the case, what has happened to the $1.5 million per hour that you are paying out in unemployment insurance benefits? If it has levelled off and decreased, surely we are not going to run out tonight or tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In any event, honourable senators, there is a simple motion that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for later discussion, and that question and other matters can be discussed at that time.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I read the papers and I also have been hearing about the urgency of this matter. I am not going to refuse consent, but I think I should. Once again it is quite disgraceful that time can be frittered away in the other place on a bill of this nature. With complete disregard for the parliamentary procedure of a two-house system they pass a bill to us and say that it must be passed today.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I do not think we can pick on the government alone. I think it is a matter for all the parties in the other place, because one party by itself rarely creates a delay. This repetitious habit of sending us very important bills, short though they may be as in this case, and saying that they must be passed speedily is sheer arrogance. I don't think it is right. I really do not need to repeat this, because we have had the same statement made on an enormous number of occasions since I have been in this chamber by senators who resented the situation greatly. However, in the end we have always felt that the innocent should not suffer because of our actions, and that while our refusing to go along with the situation might establish a principle, it would certainly hurt the innocent bystanders who should not be affected. In this case, as has happened once before, those affected would be the unemployed who, God knows, cannot afford to be without their cheques. Nevertheless, I do not understand why we have to be faced with this situation all the time. Surely there must be some way to make the House of Commons appreciate that with a two-house system adequate time has to be given for consideration of legislation.

Honourable senators will remember that a few years ago we spent considerable time revising our rules—not a very exciting task—and in the course of that study we considered very carefully the question of notice. At that time the question of two days' notice, one day's notice or no notice at all was discussed, because it was felt that unless there was good reason for these things, then the applicable rules should be amended. After a considerable amount of discussion and consideration it was decided that two days' notice was required in order that adequate time might be allowed in appropriate cases, one day's notice for all matters where this was not absolutely essential for good intelligent treatment of the subject, and in other cases no notice at all was required. Second reading requires two days' notice, and, third reading, which I gather from my honourable friend will be moved later this day, requires one day's notice.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Second reading will be moved.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Later today?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Molson: But you mentioned that this legislation had to be passed today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No. The difficulty of the situation in which we now find ourselves is that we are discussing a matter related to the bill while the motion before the house is that with leave this bill should be discussed later this day. It is at that time that this discussion we are now engaged in could properly take place.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I never like to disagree with my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am not in the same situation as you are. I do like to disagree with him.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Well, I am not discussing the bill. I am discussing the motion that it be considered later this day, for which normally leave is required. I, like so many of my colleagues, must say yes. That is the situation I am discussing at the moment. I think many honourable senators will remember Senator O'Leary speaking as long ago as 1964 when on two occasions he said it was the last time that he would give consent for a shotgun bill coming in here to go out the same day. I think his objection was very well founded. Yet, last week with the Pilotage Bill we had the situation where someone in the administration suddenly came to life and said, "if the bill is not put through by today, tomorrow there might be a marine catastrophe." So the Senate came back to pass a bill, with no notice, and knowing nothing whatever about it. The House of Commons passed it bang, bang, bang. They did not know what was happening either.

• (1420)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Probably less.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: They did not even discuss it.

Hon. Mr. Molson: They did not even discuss it. But this is not Parliament. This is not legislation. I would just like to add one thought. Very frequently there is a suggestion that we serve no useful purpose. It comes up in the House of Commons frequently. We have some good friends over there who never let a session go by without bringing up the question of our abolition. I would just like to say that if there is much legislation put through in the way in which the bill to amend the Pilotage Act was put through, and now this bill, then I will be completely in favour of our abolition. This house will have no time for sober second thought or any other kind of second thought. We will have no time for thought at all.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I agree completely with Senator Molson. I hate to harp on the subject I raised the other night, but we had a concrete example in December 1971 when we had Bill C-259 before us. We had to rush it through because it was the end of the year, and people had to know what their tax liabilities were. We pointed out the shortcomings of doing this but we passed the bill, and people are suffering today because amendments have never been made. No one knows what he has to do when he looks at his income tax form.

I believe the Senate has to make up its mind as to what it is going to do, and stick to its guns. None of us wants to stop the cheques from going out tomorrow. However, three or four months ago everybody knew the cheques could not go out tomorrow, unless an amending bill was passed.

Does the Senate have to take over and run the country; to keep in mind measures that have to be passed, and then go to the House of Commons and say, "Pass these bills now"? There seems to be nobody at the tiller. At the last minute we are given a bill, and we pass it. How can we possibly consider these bills, and do the work we are supposed to, if we receive them only a few minutes before they are to be passed?

Honourable senators, this reflects on us. We are not here to change policy, but we are here to analyze bills—and we have done good work in this respect in the past—and to correct errors. I am not pretending that there are more errors now than there were in the past, but I know that we can give much more time to the study of intricate bills than can the members of the other place. Most bills, although passed, are not debated properly. I refer to the income tax amendments that were introduced last June. They were never properly discussed in the other place at any time, and they have not been passed yet.

I think this is a disgraceful way to run the country. I am not pretending to play one side against another, but I am concerned about the manner in which the work of the House of Commons is being arranged. If there is to be any reform it seems to me it should be done in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: I agree with Senator Molson and Senator Beaubien. Where I part company with them is in this: they are not prepared to do anything about it and I am. I will not give my consent to third reading of this bill today.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I will try to keep my remarks relevant to the motion before the Chair at the moment, which is merely for second reading later this day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Later, yes.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: That being the case, the discussion on the point, while very interesting, extends itself beyond that narrow point. It has done so notwithstanding that honourable senators opposite made it clear in the early part of their remarks that they wished to give consent for that purpose. They then went on to complain of the situation arising out of the lack of time for adequate debate, which is undoubtedly offensive to the Senate, this part of the Parliament of Canada. As they did that I was curious to know exactly what method they propose to use to improve the Parliament of Canada so that this objectionable circumstance will not arise in the future. I listened attentively for some light on that subject. I did not hear it and perhaps this is not the time at which it should be debated. It seems to me that with respect to a bill of this type, or a bill as the Pilotage Bill which we received recently, the practice of bills of such nature being introduced in one house, dealt with fully in that house, then sent to the other house for its concurrence is not necessarily the right method.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No; no one has said that.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: However, it may not be the right method and in the case of this bill, which has been before the other house for many weeks and received, if I may say so with propriety, very slow treatment there, or lengthy examination, however you wish to express that, it may be that we ought to have been debating it at the same time. Perhaps we should review our procedures to see if concurrent debate is possible in the case of certain types of bills. I am well aware, of course, that it would not do in respect of all types of bills. Surely the remedy lies in some procedure, not necessarily a procedure of the Senate alone, to correct the situation. Certain changes in our own rules may help to correct the situation. It may be that we have to go further than that. Certainly the point is one that I would hope would not be let go and that we could look at in some objective fashion. The threat merely of not giving consent and so on is not mature enough, as far as I am concerned, nor is it the correct method to achieve the results we desire. I believe there are better methods, but I would hope that we could find a format for examining the subject and having those methods taken up seriously by Parliament as a whole in a way that would bring about a satisfactory procedure for the future.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I wish to be associated with a certain portion of Senator Molson's remarks and completely with those of Senator O'Leary. I came in here this morning fully convinced that I should not give consent for second reading this day. After discussing the matter with various senators on both sides of the house, I agreed to second reading today. But in doing so, I understood that the bill would go to committee tomorrow. Then I came into the chamber, and, despite Senator Martin's denial, he left me with the distinct impression that it had to be passed this evening.

• (1430)

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I did not.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I will not, under any terms, consent to third reading this day.

With reference to Senator McIlraith's remarks, certainly there is improvement to be made in the other house. This is probably not the time to bring in partisan politics, but I would suggest that the first step in achieving improvement is to change the administration in the other house. Secondly, no one should try to convince me that the other house considered the bill for any length of time. No. They spent their time fooling around on a bill for the abolition of capital punishment. Was that more urgent than this bill affecting the unemployed? It was not.

If we are going to operate effectively as a chamber, I agree that we could probably debate legislation at the same time as the other house. But the other chamber did not, under any circumstances, give this bill any consideration. It went through even quicker than Senator Martin wants it to go through in this house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are exaggerating.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Perhaps I am emphasizing rather than exaggerating. We have to remember that this is an important measure. As I say, for every hour that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is open, Canadian taxpayers are paying out $1.5 million an hour. If the Liberals think that is funny, that it is jocular, I am sorry, but I am too much of a Conservative to accept that. I am too old-fashioned to accept it as being jocular.

Hon. Mr. Cook: With reference to Senator McIlraith's idea of having concurrent examination, which I think is a good one, I should like to point out that we have received a copy of a report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce concerning the examination of tax reform legislation. We worked about three months and spent $80,000 in connection with that matter, yet on both sides of the house it is said that we passed the bill in one day. So what is the good of having concurrent examination?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are opening a debate. I am of the opinion that Senator McIlraith's idea should be dealt with at a later date, not later today.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Very much later.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I wonder if we can come back to the motion of the Leader of the Government, that the matter be dealt with later today. To those who say we are having a gun put to our heads, may I make it perfectly clear that Senator Phillips wasted an hour of the committee's time the other morning dealing precisely with what is detailed in this bill. When we get it we can refer it to the committee where we can deal with it. You do not have to be a genius to understand that all this bill undertakes to do is to remove the ceiling. One paragraph of the bill—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: There is a principle involved which can be discussed, but I do not intend to go into it at this point. Let us stop the nonsense. If we really want to beard the lion, if we really want to hold—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If the Honourable Senator Prowse wants to have a debate as to the manner in which we are dealing with this matter, it is up to him. But we are dealing with leave. He has criticized Senator Phillips' attitude in the committee yesterday morning, which is entirely irrelevant.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If Senator Prowse wants to have a debate, I will debate with him and others, too. However, I suggest to Senator Prowse that sometimes there is virtue in keeping silent.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: And sometimes there is virtue in listening to your own advice.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do when I feel I should.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Well, please do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have more experience in this respect than you do.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I doubt it.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Honourable Senator Prowse has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: On a point of order, honourable senators. I shall deal later this afternoon with the criticism of having wasted an hour and a half in committee.

On the point of order, as usual, Senator Prowse does not know A from B. I was dealing with supplementary estimates (A), which have nothing whatsoever to do with the bill before us. Perhaps you, in your sympathetic and understanding way, Madam Speaker, could explain the difference to him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I think we have digressed from the question that is before us. I shall put the question. It is moved by the Honourable Senator Martin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Allister Grosart, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report of the committee, to which was referred supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, and asked that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of today and form part of the permanent record of this house.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, pp. 211-13.)

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Grosart moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), that the report be adopted now.

He said: Honourable senators, I am moving the adoption of the report in the absence of Senator Everett, who is chairman of the committee. I was asked to preside over the meeting of the committee in his absence and to present this report. I might add that because of this unusual circumstance the committee agreed that the report would be prepared jointly by myself, as acting chairman, and Senator Molgat. The reason for this will be obvious, because in the supplementary estimates there is provision for appropriations to cover certain warrants, which might be the subject of discussion—on which there might be a difference of view in the Senate.

It is not my intention to read the report. I understand that copies have been prepared and are on the desks of honourable senators. I will merely make two brief comments.

The total estimate is, of course, $1,290 million, of which $817 million are non-budgetary items, that is to say loans, investments and advances. This increases the main estimates for the year from $16,500 million to $17,800 million.

Among the witnesses that we heard was the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable C. M. Drury, who was there with some of his assistants. The minister informed the committee that of this very large total of supplementary estimates, $1.2 billion, 90 per cent are items "having to do with the relief of unemployment or the creation of jobs." The report indicates the main items of which that 90 per cent is comprised, which will also include some payments to farmers, and other new policies dealing with higher pensions for the aged and veterans, and some special assistance to immigrants from Uganda.

There are the usual $1 items, and we append to the report an explanation by the officials of the Treasury Board on each of those $1 items.

Almost half the total estimates, $590 million, relate to three Governor General's special warrants, which were obtained by order in council during the period when Parliament was dissolved. These were obtained from the Governor General on October 5, November 16 and December 14. The committee asked the minister about the constitutionality of those warrants, and he replied that they complied with the provisions of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act, which requires that such payments be > . . . urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session and there is no other appropriation pursuant to which the payment may be made.

The minister indicated that the contingency fund from which such payments might have been made was not in a position to meet these very high demands.

The two largest items comprised in these three warrants were $132 million for the Local Incentives Program, and two warrants totalling $454 million, which are shown in the estimates as:

> . . . advances . . . to be applied by the Unemployment Insurance Commission towards the payments of benefits and costs of administration . . . on such terms and conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe.

The report adds up in a new way, and one not previously, I think, presented, some of the arithmetic of the balance sheet of the fund, indicating why this situation has arisen. Honourable senators will not expect me to read this, but may be interested in the figures the committee presents.

We comment on two particular items which are new this year. First, the Treasury Board contingency fund. We point out that at the present moment the fund is in the rather extraordinary position of being actually "broke." There is no money in that fund at the moment, so if a sudden emergency arose there would be absolutely no money—and the minister confirmed this—to cope with that emergency. He said, in effect, "If we had an application we would have to say we had no money." The estimates, however provide for approval of appropriations which would reimburse the fund by about $40 million; when Parliament votes supply there will be a reimbursement of $40 million.

The estimates also provide for a further appropriation, which I draw to the attention of honourable senators because it is an unusual item, of $60 million. It is to provide funds for a new program which will enable the federal government to hire new employees during the winter months on a proportional basis by provinces. Following past practice, the committee might, I think, have taken exception to that, because we have been rather concerned about the use of the contingency fund for what would appear to be more or less normal expenditures. However, in this case the minister explained that the alternative would have been to put a great number of small items in the supplementary estimates for various departments, and it is justified, I think, on the ground that there is a very close relationship between the Treasury Board, which operates the contingency fund, and the Public Service of Canada, under whom these extra employees would be engaged.

The second topic on which we comment is the Winter Capital Projects Fund. This again is an unusual item, and is unique in some respects. The committee questioned the minister and the officials on this, and we make some comment on it in our report. It is a program that provides federal assistance to the provinces, provincial agencies and municipalities, as defined in the appropriate acts, to create further employment through the construction of capital development projects. A vote under the Department of Finance authorizes loan commitments by the federal government of $350 million. These extend over a period of four and a half years from December last to June 1975.

The question has been raised as to the actual legality of requests for this type of appropriation, because section 20 of the Financial Administration Act seems to limit the requests for appropriations in the supplementaries or in an appropriation bill to items coming in course of payment during the current fiscal year. That matter was discussed with the minister, and the committee makes no comment on it. It is really a constitutional or legal question. However, the committee was concerned that we have here, in effect in what will be a single vote in an appropriation bill, a major program involving possibly $350 million which is not in any way described or presented in a normal act of Parliament. This particular item takes up about a page and a half of the supplementary estimates. It is drafted almost like a skeleton of an act of Parliament. Actually, the committee has taken the position in the past that this may not be the most desirable way of bringing into effect major legislation. It falls somewhat in the category of the criticism the committee has made in the past of $1 items. We say in our report:

• (1450)

> The committee feels that an appropriation act should not be used for this purpose.

The committee has said this before in this connection, and if honourable senators will look at this item they will be inclined to agree.

It should be stated that we do note the exceptional circumstances—the unemployment situation and so on—and the normal requirements of long-range spending. We are aware of the reasons why this was done in this case, but we question whether it is a method of legislation that should be used extensively in the future.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, before my colleague resumes his seat may I ask a question? I notice that the non-budgetary item of $817 million, which is practically half the total amount of these estimates, consists of loans, investments and advances. Could he tell us the total of the loans and who got them? Were they actually loans or were some grants?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I would have to reply, of course, that I cannot answer that question in detail. It would be quite impossible for me to say who got some $817 million worth of loans. The question as to whether they are all actually loans, investments and advances is one that goes rather beyond the report of this committee, I think.

On occasions, the committee has discussed this particular problem. An example is the loans that are made every year—although they are not in this supplementary estimate—to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. These are technically loans. It is assumed that these loans will be paid back at some time or other, but no one really believes that they will. There are bookkeeping reasons why they are carried as loans.

There are some items here where a question might be raised as to whether they are loans in the normal business sense. I would prefer not to go into that. The obvious example would be the unemployment insurance warrants, where some question might be raised as to the terms on which the Minister of Finance might require their repayment. I am reporting at this time as an impartial chairman of the committee, and if I were to express my views on that point I might be in danger of losing my impartiality.

There is always this difficulty as to the description of loans, investments and advances. We know they are not always paid back, but when we discuss them with ministers and their officials they always assure us that from an actuarial point of view it is proper to call them loans, investments or advances. I should say no more on that at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I put a question to the deputy chairman of the committee? I do so with some hesitation, as Senator Prowse stated that I wasted an hour and a half of his time. I cannot think of a greater or more effective way of disposing of it than that of wasting an hour and a half of Senator Prowse's time—and perhaps the environment might pick up something from that.

In committee yesterday I pointed out that this supplementary estimate (A) is costing the average taxpayer $50 per capita. I asked for certain information. I had prepared my homework. I had over 300 possible questions written out. Then I found myself dealing with Treasury Board officials who could say "We do not know. We will get you that information." I was promised some of this yesterday afternoon, but I did not receive it. I have not received it this morning and I would like it before we get the appropriation bill—which Senator Prowse does not understand.

My second question is: When do we expect the appropriation bill dealing with these estimates?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I cannot answer the second question. It is completely out of my area of responsibility.

On the first question, I admit that many questions were asked by Senator Phillips, and perhaps by others, for which the officials did not have the immediate answers. These were questions requiring details of items. In defence of the officials, I should say, as chairman, that they could not have been expected to have that information with them—

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I did not wish to infer that.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: —nor did Senator Phillips suggest that they should have it. They did say they would obtain this information and get it to the clerk of the committee as soon as possible. I am quite sure that the officials are making every effort to do so. I will ask the clerk to call them and see if they can expedite the transfer of the material. I am afraid that is the best I can do.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I shall move the adjournment of this debate if no one else does. There is no danger of the appropriation bill reaching us before next week—and that is being really optimistic. In the meantime, those senators who have put questions to the officials of the Treasury Board may get their answers. If they do not, when the appropriation bill reaches us it could be referred to a committee for further questioning of the officials. I do not think we should adopt the report, under the circumstances. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Very well.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

FIRE IN UPHOLSTERY REPAIR ROOM—QUESTION

Hon. Orville Phillips: Honourable senators, I intended to ask a question in a jocular mood and without any accusations, but judging from the mood of the house perhaps it is the wrong day. Nevertheless, I will.

• (1500)

I ask the Leader of the Government if the fire which occurred in the Senate last night had any connection with the notice under Inquiries standing in the name of the Honourable Senator Croll, calling for Senate reform.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In answer to that question, I do not think it had, nor do I think that the member of Parliament sitting in the other place for Winnipeg North Centre had anything to do with it.

PRIVILEGE

COMPLAINT RE FORGED LETTERS

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege, to bring a certain matter to the attention of this chamber. I am sure most of you have read in recent days reports in the media about allegedly forged letters which have been sent in the name of one honourable member from this chamber as well as in the name of Donald MacDonald, the President of the Canadian Labour Congress.

The first letter that is allegedly signed on my behalf was, surprisingly enough, responded to. It was responded to by a member of the other house, who shall go nameless, but who believed it to be genuine. He was not aware it was a forgery and, among other things, he said, "I found your ideas sound and I would certainly be ready to support them".

Hon. Mr. Argue: Who was that?

Hon. Mr. Lawson: I think it would be unfair to name him, other than to say he was a Conservative.

I should also say that there was a response from a minister of the government, which was surprising in itself because, as I am sure most of you know, before the elections if you sent a double registered letter to a minister in a perfumed envelope you would be lucky to get an answer within six months. In this case the letter was answered the following day. I do not wish to make light of this because the seriousness of the situation cannot be minimized. Here were a minister and a member of the other place who believed this to be a factual letter, and responded to it.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I suppose you left out the perfume this time, did you?

Hon. Mr. Lawson: The second letter, which is on the stationery of the Canadian Labour Congress, is a vicious, foul document. It is an obscene document of the worst possible kind, making an attack on the Prime Minister. It is even more reprehensible when you know it is a forgery, and its author was too cowardly to sign his own name to it.

As a follow-up to that a third letter appeared, which was in the form of a press release with an Ottawa dateline. I am not going to read the contents, but it does give authorship of the letters. It says, "You have received letters from Messrs. Lawson and MacDonald. The Canadian Reformation Service sent those letters to you on behalf of Brothers Lawson and MacDonald. We offer apologies to no one."

In addition, in the last paragraph before the signature, the writer says, "You politicians should be advised that if substantial progress is not soon realized towards departure from Canada of United States unions, two systems will be activated this year which will achieve the necessary results." By itself that is not a very sinister statement. The letter is then signed, "Bud Arnold, Chairman, Canadian Labour Reformation Service."

As I say, the statement, "two systems will be activated this year," is not very sinister unless you are aware that on the same morning that this forged letter appeared and was sent to the news media a fire bombing attempt was made on our office building. The damage was described as superficial, which it was. The fire bomb came through an upstairs window and landed against a metal cabinet. Because there was a witness and the fire department responded instantly, the damage was kept to about $5,000.

Hon. Mr. Croll: They did it again yesterday.

[Hon. Mr. Lawson.]

Hon. Mr. Lawson: In addition to that, obscene phone calls of a nature similar to the contents of the letter to the Prime Minister have been made to my daughter at my home. There were calls to the police station and local radio stations indicating that the next time all four walls of the building would go down, and they would make sure that I was in it.

There were further calls on the following evening to other officers of our organization containing threats of death and violence.

But what do we see next? The author of these documents appears on a local radio station, on Jack Webster's Hot Line program, to say, "Yes, Mr. Webster, I forged those letters." He said, "I did it because we don't have much money. We only have 277 members in and around Toronto, and I did it because I had to use fraudulent means to get some press attention and some media attention." He had an hour on the radio program and went on to describe the reasons why he forged those documents. Subsequently, I understand, he appeared on the CBC program "Weekend" for 10 or 12 minutes.

On Monday last he appeared on the radio station again to talk about the need to resort to this kind of action and this kind of tactic when you do not have very much money and you want to get lots of press attention. On this occasion we were able to have the Vancouver police pick him up from the radio station for questioning as to the bombing, the forging of letters, the threatening phone calls, and so on.

Part of the difficulty—and this is something which causes me great concern—is that the origin of the letters, or the place of mailing, was in Ontario and, as a result, it appears that British Columbia will have no jurisdiction. It will be necessary, as I understand it, for the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario to initiate the prosecution here. I must say that I have had good co-operation from the Department of Justice.

There is the other matter of a Post Office investigation into the illegal use of the mails for this purpose. I understand that if there is a successful prosecution the Post Office can deny him his mailing privileges. Another section of the Post Office Act deals with the use of the mails for obscene purposes, and I think surely this letter is in that category. But again it falls to the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario to initiate the complaint.

My particular concern is that, while we are waiting for something to be done, this admitted forger, this man who is posing as some local folk hero with the attention he is getting from the press, this man who admits that he has committed a reprehensible, criminal act, is allowed to tour the country getting all the press coverage he wants about why he needs to engage in fraud or forgery to achieve his purposes.

It is for these reasons that I wonder if the government leader in this chamber would use his influence, or whatever other methods are available to him, in urging the Attorney General of Ontario to see to it that this man be apprehended quickly and brought to the bar of justice. I think the maximum penalty of the law should be imposed on this individual because no one is safe when letters of this sort can be written, when stationery can be obtained and a person's name signed, causing responsible ministers of the Crown and members of the other house to respond, in the belief that the letters are genuine.

I would certainly appreciate any support in this matter. I thought it was a matter of some urgency, and that it should be brought to the attention of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If I understood the honourable senator correctly, this man admitted committing forgery. Forgery is an offence under the Criminal Code. It does not matter where he is in Canada. If a charge is laid he can be arrested for forgery no matter where he is. If he admitted committing forgery then he admitted committing an offence under the Code, and you or somebody else should lay a charge against him.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: May I ask the honourable senator if he has looked into the situation so far as the media is concerned, and here I have in mind the press, radio and television? Would they not be open to charges as accomplices? I am not a lawyer, but if they knew that the man who had signed the letter admitted it was a forgery, are they not liable?

Hon. Mr. Lawson: I also am not a lawyer, but I do not believe they are liable. I must say, however, in defence of Jack Webster that he did advise the city prosecutor that he had him there, and the kind of questions he asked him were, in effect, an attempt to obtain from him an admission that he had committed forgery. And he did willingly admit this. Probably the most shocking part of this was that some of the callers who telephoned in seemed to try to rationalize that it was necessary to do this kind of thing to dramatize your position.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: I would hope that the media, the press, radio and television—even if they are not legally liable, would feel a moral responsibility in a situation like this.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Let us be clear about this. In this situation it seems that the radio station collected evidence that Senator Lawson could use in laying a charge.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: They got an admission.

Hon. Mr. Lawson: That is true, but the performance on CBC for 10 or 12 minutes on national television, which made him appear like some sort of a latter-day Robin Hood, was irresponsible journalism at its worst.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: I only saw the CBC program and I considered it irresponsible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1).

He said: Honourable senators, I certainly share the opinions expressed earlier this afternoon concerning the pressure that is frequently put on the Senate when bills are presented to us in this fashion in the expectation of rapid discussion, consideration, and swift passage. I think all honourable senators share that feeling.

With respect to Bill C-124 now before us, I would remind all honourable senators that it really originated with the tabling of supplementary estimates in the other place on January 9. Keeping in mind that Parliament opened on January 4 and the Throne Speech had to be debated, this would be about the earliest possible date permitted by proper procedure for the tabling of the supplementary estimates in the other place.

The subsequent procedures were quite normal. The supplementary estimates went to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee and the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and I think from the government's point of view every possible effort was made to facilitate the passage of this particular bill. But without any serious recriminations directed at this time to members of the Opposition, I would say that had there been a more co-operative spirit shown, and a less valiant effort to embarrass the government, I do not think the Senate would have been placed in the position in which we now find ourselves. I mention this simply to indicate that the problem was somewhat more complex than some honourable senators on the other side would have us believe.

Honourable senators, Bill C-124 relates essentially to the ceiling on advances permitted under the Unemployment Insurance Act and seeks to establish two things; first of all, the removal of the existing ceiling of $800 million, and secondly, to provide that the additional advances obtained from Governor General's warrants are not to be considered as appropriations granted to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, but rather as advances repayable to the Minister of Finance under conditions prescribed in the act.

I do not think it is necessary for me at this stage to remind honourable senators that there is a high degree of urgency attached to the passage of this bill. That point has already been effectively made, in my judgment, both in the House of Commons and before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. As a matter of interest, and in reply to the Leader of the Opposition who asked the question earlier, I received information from the Unemployment Insurance Commission that in fact the last warrants went out to the six regional offices of the commission last evening, and there will be no warrants going out tonight. Therefore claimants, who have a statutory right to the benefits they have been guaranteed, will not in fact be paid. According to the information I have received from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, this means that on Thursday, February 8, some 49,326 claimants will not receive cheques, amounting to almost $6 million, and that on Friday, February 9, 75,651 claimants will not receive cheques, the amount of money involved in this instance being approximately $9 million. This means that the payment of about $15 million to a total of about 125,000 claimants will be held up until such time as royal assent is given to this bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is tomorrow. That means that if the bill is not passed today, some 50,000 persons will not receive $6 million, and if the bill is not passed until tomorrow a further 75,000 persons will not receive $9 million.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: That is the information as given to me. I merely pass it on to indicate that far from being imaginary, this is a very real situation that we find ourselves in, while again sharing in the opinions expressed about the pressure being put on the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask a question at this stage? I wonder if the sponsor of the bill would care to reconcile the statement he has just made with the statements made in evidence before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee of the other place that the deadline would be "February 8, give or take a day or so." That information was given before the committee, when they were considering the supplementary estimates, by two ministers.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: The information I received was that it would be either February 7 or February 8, and that it was difficult to know exactly what day. I was told, during a discussion with a senior official of the Unemployment Insurance Commission yesterday, that tonight, February 7, would see the end of their warrants, and that in fact deposits to the credit of the regional offices, so that they could draw cheques against those deposits as of tomorrow, would not be made. I think this information as to time is similar to that given in the opinions expressed to the committee.

Honourable senators, an essential element of this urgency is reflected in the statement I have just made, and consequently I think it would be appropriate for me at this point to explain briefly that there are three main reasons why advances are required. In the first place, as I am sure all honourable senators are aware, the government pays all additional benefit costs when the unemployment rate exceeds 4 per cent. That is a statutory requirement. I think it is important to remember that the government's share of the total cost for a given calendar year is not paid to the commission until April of the following year, hence the necessity for advances. Therefore, the government is responsible in law for advancing moneys to cover cash requirements.

Secondly, since the amount of employer and employee contributions, and employee benefits, are dependent upon the level of employment and unemployment, this creates a fluctuation in the unemployment insurance amount. So advances are needed at various times.

The third point is that when the revenue from employers and employees during a calendar year is not sufficient to completely cover their share of the costs of unemployment insurance, benefit advances are required to cover that deficiency.

To illustrate the situation which can result from such factors, or a combination thereof, I might recall for the benefit of honourable senators that during the calendar year 1972 the benefits paid out were $1,879,000,000 and the administrative costs were approximately $120 million, for a total program cash requirement of roughly $2 billion. Of this amount, approximately $890 million was the government's direct cost. As you are aware, the government is committed to certain direct costs. Those costs are related to the 4 per cent unemployment ceiling. Any time that unemployment goes over 4 per cent the Government of Canada assumes the costs. In addition, there are fishermen's benefits and extended term benefits, which are all part of the act.

[Hon. Mr. Buckwold.]

The sum of $890 million was the government's direct cost. The remaining $1,109 million, bringing the amount to around the $2 billion mark, is chargeable to the employer-employee account. These are premiums paid by workers and employees into the fund. The fund received from the Department of National Revenue, which is the collecting agency for that premium account, was $715 million during 1972, based upon the estimates of anticipated premium receipts.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you mean the calendar year 1972, or the fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I refer to the calendar year 1972.

However, the final figure of actual premium remittances will not be known until midsummer of 1973 when all the income tax returns and T-4 slips are in and have been calculated. If that amount of $715 million, which is the employer-employee contribution to the fund, is accurate there will have been an accounting shortfall of $394 million in premium revenue, and a cash deficit for 1972 of $158 million in the employer-employee account. You may wonder how these figures were balanced. It took a bit of study to find this out, but the difference is $236 million which was the surplus carried forward into the fund from the preceding year.

If I can explain these complicated figures in a simple way, to operate the fund on the employee-employer receipts they needed $1,109 million. The fund generated $715 million which left a shortfall of $394 million. There was a carry-forward surplus of $236 million. So the net cash shortage of the fund, and this is the amount which will be picked up in due course by the fund itself, is $158 million.

I go to some length to explain these figures because the idea that the Unemployment Insurance Fund is costing the Government of Canada $2 billion this year is really not correct. It is correct that advances are being made in very extensive amounts, but most of them will be recovered when the government pays its share under its statutory obligations and commitments.

The advances are required, as these figures would indicate, and they reached an amount in excess of $1 billion for the calendar year 1972.

The Unemployment Insurance Act, established a ceiling of $800 million on cash advances. As a result of this, special Governor General's warrants had to be obtained during 1972 on two occasions when Parliament was not in session, since the limit on cash advances was being reached. In October, a warrant was obtained for an amount of $234 million; and in December another was obtained, this time for $220 million. There has been some discussion as to whether it is proper, indeed whether it is legal, for the government to use Governor General's warrants for this type of financing. I wish to put on record section 23(1) of the Financial Administration Act which reads as follows:

> Where a payment is urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session and there is no other appropriation pursuant to which the payment may be made, the Governor in Council, upon the report of the President of the Treasury Board that there is no appropriation for the payment and the > report of the appropriate Minister that the payment is urgently required for the public good, may by order direct the preparation of a special warrant to be signed by the Governor General authorizing the payment to be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

I think honourable senators will understand this is normal procedure for handling the kind of financing which is required when the house is not in session.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: At this point, may I interrupt Senator Buckwold and ask him his interpretation of "when Parliament is not in session"? Does he suggest that the government can obtain a Governor General's warrant when Parliament is not in session but is in existence?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: In reply to Senator Flynn, I would say this has been the custom for interim financing. Certainly we do not live in a vacuum during an election period.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have never heard of this.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: The business of the government must go on.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Honourable senators, it has been done over and over again, and on a very large scale, hundreds and millions of dollars in 1896, 1911, 1926, 1940, 1958, and I think some other years.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: These were years when the Liberal Party was in office.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I want to thank my former professor for coming to my aid in a more academic, detailed way with knowledge and information for the Leader of the Opposition.

• (1530)

The Unemployment Insurance Act established a ceiling of $800 million on cash advances. Governor General's warrants were necessary to permit the Unemployment Insurance Commission to discharge its obligations under the law, its legal, statutory obligations to pay benefits to persons claiming and entitled to unemployment insurance. I share the view of, and would like to reiterate the point which has been made by the minister responsible the Honourable Robert Andras, that when the Unemployment Insurance Act was dealt with last the imposition of a ceiling on advances to the unemployment insurance account was unfortunate. I suppose hindsight is easier to develop than foresight, but that was an unfortunate anticipation of events. The government has very readily admitted through the minister that it was unfortunate—I think that is the term used.

Its actual existence, of course, stems directly from a feeling which existed at that time that it might provide a measure of control on costs. But this is not the case, because a variety of circumstances make it difficult to forecast accurately what the total cost to the government will be. Forecasting of this nature is extremely difficult because of the dependence upon national and regional unemployment rates. The amount of the ceiling must take into account the number of persons unemployed, since these have a direct impact upon the government's share of the total benefit costs and, as is known, unemployment varies greatly, for a variety of reasons, at any given time.

Furthermore, I would remind honourable senators that employer and employee contribution rates are based on the average experience of the preceding three years, beginning in 1975—and this is, I must say, a little difficult for me to understand; I still do not grasp how they average on preceding years—whereas benefits are paid depending upon the current employment rate. This creates fluctuations in the unemployment insurance account.

Then, it has to be taken into account that advances under section 137 of the act are at a maximum at times of high unemployment, because of large government cost on the one hand, as well as relatively lower contributions from employers and employees on the other. There are additional factors which have to be considered—the labour force growth, higher earnings of claimants, and length of time claimants receive benefits, which is very important.

In essence, these factors indicate that any limit on advances will become obsolete within an extremely short time of its imposition. The merit in setting a ceiling at an extremely high level is questionable, in my estimation, since it would represent virtually no constraint at all. Equally doubtful, in my judgment, would be the setting of a relatively low level as this would, in all likelihood, result only in annual amendments to the act.

I contend that a fixed limit on advances is not practical, nor is it necessary, since Parliament can review the administration costs and program expenditures on several occasions during each year through established reviews conducted by parliamentary committees, and all the other controls which Parliament already has. There are many ways by which to control the expenditures. For example, we know the unemployment rate—we know monthly how the rate is going—and Statistics Canada publishes statistics on amounts paid out. There are a variety of reports to Parliament which committees study together with appropriations and expenditures, so that at any time there is a fairly accurate knowledge of what is going on in the fund as a result of the conditions at that particular period of time.

Honourable senators, all of these are important considerations which bear directly upon the matter at hand, but there is one other aspect which is of the utmost importance when we review this subject, and that is that payments to claimants are statutory and not discretionary as far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned. It is for this reason, in particular, that I consider this ceiling to be inappropriate. It just does not seem reasonable that we guarantee certain payments to claimants because of the laws that we have passed in Parliament, and the fact that they themselves have made contributions, and then find ourselves without the funds to pay them. This is, of course, the position in which we find ourselves at the present time if this bill is not passed. The commission must, at all times, have access to sufficient funds to pay the legal claims of the unemployed, regardless of the level of unemployment.

I know that there is no honourable senator who could conceivably visualize a situation wherein the denial of benefits to qualified claimants would be imposed. Accordingly, I would respectfully solicit the earnest consideration by all honourable senators of this bill, with the hope that the amendments it proposes may be implemented at the earliest time.

Before I resume my seat I would indicate that it is my intention in due course to move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for further consideration.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the Senate as a whole should be extremely grateful to Senator Buckwold for having demonstrated without the shadow of a doubt the complexity of the bill which confronts us. It is not a simple bill, nor one which merely amends the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is a bill which has to do with the authority of Parliament versus the authority of the government. It is a bill which stems from very real problems, very deep difficulties. And we are faced with an ultimatum: Pass it or some people will suffer.

Of course, it was not an easy task to explain this bill. I can understand why the Leader of the Government would not undertake it himself but would pass it on to one of his most devoted servants. Senator Buckwold is not only devoted, but able and courageous—more so I would say, than the Leader of the Government in the present circumstances. This bill demonstrates the government's lack of responsibility, its total lack of responsibility toward the people of Canada. I am not certain how I should qualify the conduct of the government in this case, but I believe I'm right when I describe it as misconduct. This is the least I can say about what the government has done in the circumstances.

The Senate is not able to consider this bill adequately today. It will do it nevertheless, but it will not discharge its duty. It will do half a job, as it has been forced to do in many previous circumstances. It stems from mismanagement of Parliament. It is characteristic of the present government. I could quote, I could cite, I could recall many previous occasions, but I will mention only the tax reform bill. There has been discussion about whether we discussed that sufficiently or not. Senator Cook said we did. But yesterday Senator Beaubien said we did in one way, but we did not in another way. I would say that Senator Beaubien is closer to the truth than Senator Cook.

We tried to do some work in advance, as was suggested by Senator McIlraith. That is a good idea. But that will not replace the job that we have to do after a bill is passed by the other place. We have to review it then, as it comes to us, and in the light of the discussions which have taken place in the other place. We did that in the case of the tax reform bill, we did it on the white paper, we did it on the bill itself.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I rise on a question of privilege. I am sure the honourable senator does not wish to leave the wrong impression about the remarks I made earlier. I did not suggest that it would be a substitute. I did suggest that it would alleviate the problem to some extent. I still believe that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I said it would not be sufficient. The proof lies in the very special circumstance of the passage of the tax reform bill. We spent many hours studying the white paper and the draft bill, and when the bill came before us we passed it without considering the recommendations we had made, because the minister told us, "Well, these are too complicated. We will bring in an amending bill." That amending bill has yet to come.

If we do not do our duty when it is time to do it, the occasion may never return. That is the point I want to make. I am not in disagreement with Senator McIlraith. On the contrary, I agree with him. I have always been in favour of doing what he suggested.

When a bill is before us, after having passed the other place, we should have the occasion and the time to reflect upon it. I do not think we have that with regard to this bill, which is much more difficult than it appears.

It may be simple to say, "We are asking you only to remove the ceiling of the advances that the Minister of Finance may make to the Unemployment Insurance Fund." All right. That is simple. But where does it lead us? Let's consider why a ceiling was imposed to begin with. There are two questions to be asked: Why was there a ceiling, and why are we asked to remove it?

When we consider those questions, when we consider the complex and difficult figures and the huge amounts involved, we realize that the Senate, however talented its members may be, is unable to make a proper assessment and pass proper judgment on a bill of this importance in a few hours or even a few days.

But we have no choice. I think we are all in agreement on this side—and I do not need to seek the agreement of the other side—that we should pass it by tomorrow night. But we shall not have done our duty. We shall not have done what we are here for, which is to give sober second thought to this matter.

I have great sympathy for those people who are waiting for their cheques. We have been told before, with regard to old age pensioners, that people were waiting for their cheques. In that case the cheques amounted to about $15 each. A so-called generous increase in the pensions was six months in arrears, and the government invited Parliament to vote, I think it was last year, an increase of something like $2 a month or $2.42. I cannot recall the exact amount. Anyway, the amount involved for each old age pensioner was about $15. We were told, "If you delay this, they will not get it in July, and they have to get it, otherwise we are going to say to old age pensioners, 'It is the fault of the Senate,' and worse, 'It is the fault of the Conservative senators who would not forego their right to discuss the bill and pass it with their eyes closed.'"

Hon. Mr. Phillips: More specifically, you and I would get the blame.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Probably. The sponsor of the bill told us that it was certainly a mistake to include in the present Unemployment Insurance Act a clause which provides a ceiling of $800 million for the advances which the Minister of Finance may make to the fund to carry on the statutory obligations it has towards the unemployed.

If it was a mistake, it was a mistake of that government which my honourable friend supports. There must have been a reason for having a ceiling of that kind.

Agreed, there may be miscalculations when a ceiling is established, but there is a principle behind a ceiling, namely, that a government should not receive a blank cheque from Parliament and be able to dispense public funds at its will.

I am not suggesting that has happened. But, I suppose, in an electoral period, a government may feel it needs the help of the unemployment insurance fund. It invites anyone who is unemployed, for whatever reason, to apply for unemployment insurance saying, in effect, "You are going to get it." It is a very useful and practical instrument for buying votes. I am not suggesting that was done, but it could have been done, and some people have suggested that it was done. I do not know about that myself, but I have heard it said.

It is funny that this situation happened so quickly. Did the government know that it was going to happen, or did it not? If it did, it should have proceeded otherwise. If it did not, the situation, as it affects the government, is worse.

The principle of a ceiling is a good one. There is no doubt about that. Perhaps $800 million was not a realistic figure. However, that being the case, the government should have known prior to dissolution. If a billion and a half was required, it could have asked Parliament to approve it during the last session of the 28th Parliament. It could have asked on September 1. It should have asked on September 1, I suggest. I will come back to that later.

What, in fact, are the causes for this bill's being before us? There is provision in the present act for advances by the Minister of Finance up to $800 million to the unemployment insurance fund. Parliament was dissolved on September 1, and on October 5—less than five weeks later—the first Governor General's warrant was sought and obtained in the amount of $234 million. Five weeks. Of course, Parliament was dissolved at that time. We had nothing to say about it. If the government had acted in good faith it could have, of course, availed itself of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act, which I shall read in a moment.

I asked a question of the sponsor of the bill, but he was very vague in answering. I am not blaming him for that. Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act is a very important section and one which, I feel, senators should give some thought to. It reads as follows:

> Where a payment is urgently required for the public good—

And I underline "for the public good."

> —when Parliament is not in session and there is no other appropriation pursuant to which the payment may be made, the Governor in Council, upon the report of the President of the Treasury Board that there is no appropriation for the payment and the report of the appropriate Minister that the payment is urgently required for the public good, may by order direct the preparation of a special warrant to be signed by the Governor General authorizing the payment to be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The first thing I want to underline is, "when Parliament is not in session." As far as this is concerned, I think it is most likely an error. Senator Forsey, who is very knowledgeable in these matters, says that it has been used between sessions on many occasions, but not after dissolution.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Excuse me, Senator Flynn, but I did not actually say that it has been used between sessions but not during dissolution, because I think it has. The point I was making is that it has been used when Parliament is not in session after a dissolution. That is what has happened, and that is what I was referring to. I think the other thing has happened, though not on the same scale.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the very point I was trying to make. That is the point of difference between the case when Parliament is not in session, which means that Parliament is still in existence with the two chambers, and when Parliament is dissolved, as was the case after September 1, until the writs were returned some time early in December 1972.

I do not think Parliament ever intended to give the government a blank cheque for the periods when Parliament is in existence and need only be called back into session to approve an appropriation. I am not speaking of insignificant amounts or anything that can be arranged easily. I am quite sure that in many cases that has happened. However, this is not the case here. This concerns a figure of $454 million, which is not peanuts, even by Mr. Howe's standards.

I completely disagree with the purport or the meaning of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act as interpreted, or even as written. I take objection to the words, "when Parliament is not in session." Parliament has practically always been in session for the last 10 years. We hardly had a time when Parliament was not in session. It was merely adjourned. As honourable senators are aware, the practice has been to terminate a session and open a new one the next day. The summer, Christmas or Easter recesses do not apply in this case. Parliament is in session; it is merely adjourned. The government cannot use this section in those circumstances. If it does want to use it in those circumstances, then I suggest to honourable senators, if one wishes to be legalistic about it, that it would not apply when Parliament is dissolved. It speaks only of when Parliament is not in session. In this instance Parliament was dissolved, and therefore this section should not apply.

In any event, whatever meaning one wishes to put on section 23 of the Financial Administration Act, what were the facts? As I said before, on October 5 the first warrant was obtained in the amount of $234 million. I cannot believe that on the first of December, the last day of the 28th Parliament, it was not foreseen that the fund—

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: The first of September.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes. Did I say December?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I apologize. I stand corrected.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: We could have sat in December, too.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes. I will be referring to that later on. Perhaps I am going a little bit too fast.

I cannot believe that on September 1 the government could not have foreseen that the fund would require refunding before the election was to take place. Of course, the government had other preoccupations at that time. It called Parliament back to deal with the legislation respecting the strikes at the West Coast ports. Again, that bill had to be passed in a day.

It is a habit, a characteristic, of the present government that Parliament has to act quickly all the time. It does not give Parliament an opportunity to think. The government feels that it has done all of the thinking in advance. I do not say that this is the attitude of Senator Martin. He has been a long time in Parliament and in government, and has served under Prime Ministers of a type other than the present one. Some of them were rather more cautious and less arrogant as far as Parliament is concerned. I realize Senator Martin has to accept the collective view of the government. Solidarity is one thing that the Leader of the Government respects, and that is probably one of the reasons he did not sponsor this bill himself.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You cannot provoke me.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know I cannot provoke you, but I like to try.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have been around too long.

• (1600)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In any case, on September 1 the government should have known it would need additional funds to meet the requirements of the unemployment insurance fund. Therefore, if the ceiling of $800 million was insufficient, it was at that time that it should have brought in legislation. It is quite obvious that it did not do so, and that for electoral reasons. It would have had to admit that the unemployment situation was as serious as the Opposition parties were saying it was. It was only during the election campaign that we heard about the depletion of the fund and so on, but it was a mathematical discussion that did not go too far, although far enough to put the government, on the evening of October 30, in a very difficult position, from which they have not yet been able to extricate themselves.

The first warrant was issued on October 5. Then the election took place. The writs are usually returned about four weeks after the election. When was the second warrant obtained? On December 14. We remember very well that all the Opposition parties were asking the government to call Parliament at the beginning of December. Had Parliament been called at that time, it would have been able to act. If the government had explained frankly that it needed the lifting of this ceiling to provide for payments to the unemployed, as is indicated in the bill, Parliament would have been able to make a decision at that time. But, of course, the government had other preoccupations. It wanted to delay the calling of Parliament as long as possible because it was not in a position to present any program, certainly not any program based on its electoral platform, which had been completely rejected by the electorate. The government got the second warrant, when Parliament could have been called, which would apparently take it to today's date. The sponsor of the bill has indicated the fund is exhausted as of today.

According to Senator Buckwold, about 50,000 people entitled to benefits will not receive a total of $6 million if the bill is delayed a day. The number entitled to benefits will rise to 125,000 persons, and the payments that will not be made will reach the sum of $9 million. I have seen figures which indicate that this will increase very substantially for every day that the bill is not assented to. I am not too sure that the government would not be happy to see it delayed in order to be able to say, "Well, it is not our fault if you are not paid." Knowing the mentality of the Liberal Party over the years, I would not be surprised at that kind of approach to this delay in presenting the bill.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: The divine right.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is nothing divine about it. It is, I would say, a very earthy philosophy.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Surely Senator Lamontagne is not suggesting there is anything divine about Senator Martin.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This, honourable senators, is the situation in which we find ourselves. There was miscalculation on October 5. I would say there was miscalculation before that, on September 1. Indeed, I would like to have clarified in committee tomorrow by the chairman of the commission exactly what took place between him and the then Minister of Manpower and Immigration. We have been told, but I would like to hear from the chairman directly whether the minister should have known, was told, or should have been told that the fund would run out in the five weeks following. There was miscalculation on that date for sure.

There was also miscalculation on December 14, and that is less excusable, because at that time Parliament could have been called, and the government could have told Parliament frankly, "We are calling you because the act says that the total amount outstanding at any time of advances made under this section shall not exceed $800 million." That is what the act says. But the government ignored the act and used section 23 of the Financial Administration Act in a way which indicates that it is more powerful when Parliament is not sitting, that it can do more without Parliament than with Parliament. This government has been acting in a way which indicates it feels more comfortable when Parliament is not sitting, that it can do whatever it wants.

After all, this $454 million has already been spent. There is nothing we can do about it. The government has demonstrated it is convinced it can act without Parliament in a freer way than when Parliament is in session. That is the practical conclusion to be drawn from the attitude of the government and what the President of the Treasury Board has said.

I have to be fair to him. When he appeared before the committee yesterday I asked: "If Parliament had been in session would you have proceeded through the appropriation in the supplementary estimates or by way of legislation?" He replied, "Of course, by way of legislation." It is quite clear—this is the thinking of the Auditor General, and I cannot conceive of any legal adviser who could give a contrary opinion—that if an act of Parliament tells the government it cannot make advances of more than a certain amount, then it can do it through Governor General's warrants; it can legislate through Governor General's warrants. That is what it amounts to. This proves the point I made a moment ago. If the government was right in those circumstances, it might as well dispense with Parliament; it can get along much better without Parliament. And this has, of course, been the tendency of the present administration. It is quite obvious.

• (1610)

I am not sure if Senator Martin was always in agreement. Probably in some instances he just cautioned his colleagues, because he is always very cautious here. I suppose he is also cautious in cabinet; but solidarity, solidarity first, and, above all, the party, and the government.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Get on, boy. I am enjoying this. You are making a good speech.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know you are enjoying it, because you probably made it in cabinet—this speech—and they would not listen to you. I have seen that on previous occasions.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: You probably made it, too.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The minister was likely overruled by his colleagues. But now the facts have proved him right. How good it must make him feel to hear the Opposition bring this very point before the House or before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: You probably made it, too, in 1962.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I did not have much time, I must say. My tenure was not much longer than that of Senator Lamontagne. It was even shorter. I did not have much time. I sat in cabinet from late December until July, but there were only three months when we were not electioneering so I did not have much time to do it.

If my memory serves me correctly—and I think Senator Walker will support me—I think everything went very smoothly. The result of the election was not as good, but it was better than that experienced by the present administration on October 30.

I say again that this bill proves mismanagement, and the deliberate hiding of facts from the public for election purposes. It shows contempt for Parliament, because it contends that it is better to use Governor General's warrants than to have Parliament make a decision.

I cannot accept this interpretation of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act. I cannot accept the effect of section 23 with regard to section 137 of the new Unemployment Insurance Act. I cannot accept the amendment contained in Bill C-124 which would give a blank cheque to the government which would enable them to do what they did in October and December, especially what they did in October during the election campaign—to do it again without having to account to Parliament, without that type of admission, or confession of mismanagement, maladministration, which is contained in Bill C-124. This is a bad bill; it is just trying to correct faults, errors, miscalculations, and probably something worse that I dare not describe. There should have been a raising of the ceiling, but not a total lifting of the ceiling in order to permit the government to do even worse than it has already done. What it did was bad enough.

I am not too sure that the people of Canada as a whole, or the unemployed who may be receiving their cheques one day late, will understand exactly the problem that forced the Senate to take at least two days to consider this bill. As far as I am concerned, I am not afraid to say to the public of Canada "We had to take at least two days to consider this because we were trying to help you. It may be that you received your cheques a day or two late, and it may be that the delay is a matter of great concern to you. But we in the Senate, though we appreciate your concern, have to go a little further than that; we have to assume our legislative responsibility."

I think this bill is a bad bill and on second reading, as far as we on this side are concerned, we will vote against it.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I do not wish to delay the proceedings unduly and I do not wish to stand in the way of Senator Manning's observations, but there are one or two points on this business of the Financial Administration Act and its use, and the use of its predecessor which goes back to the time of Confederation, which I think should be cleared up.

I could not quite make out exactly what point Senator Flynn wished to make. Sometimes he seemed to say that the act should not be used—that the Governor General's special warrants should not be used—simply between sessions of a parliament. Sometimes he seemed to say that the act should not be used—the Governor General's warrants should not be used—when Parliament was in existence but not in session, after an election.

Honourable senators, it has been used over and over again, this and the predecessor act where the section was slightly differently worded but amounted to the same thing. It has been used, as I said in my interjection a few minutes ago, over and over again, after an election and when Parliament was already in existence, when the writs had been returned but Parliament had not met.

In 1896, for example, Parliament was in existence for a month and six days after an election, after the writs had been returned, and the country's business was being financed by Governor General's special warrants. Sir Charles Tupper made a tremendous to-do about this in the House of Commons. He said it was grossly improper, that the section was intended only to stop leaky roofs and that sort of thing occurring between sessions. But the fact remains that the section said: "when Parliament is not in session."

The same thing happened again in 1911 when Sir Wilfred Laurier's government secured a dissolution, before supply was granted. It was absolutely necessary for Sir Robert Borden to use Governor General's supply warrants to finance the business of the country until Parliament could be called at a reasonably early date, which was one month and eight days after the writs were returned.

In 1926 the same thing happened. There was a little over a month when Parliament was in existence but not in session—it could have been summoned but was not—and at that time it was done to the tune of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Again in 1940 after the session of Parliament, that historic, that unique one day—three hours!—session of Parliament, which is one of the major constitutional achievements of a former Liberal leader.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It was Mackenzie King.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: It was done in the same way. That is right. Senator Flynn and I both know what we think of that performance. I think it is one thing on which we find ourselves in complete harmony.

In 1958 there was a shorter period, but again Parliament had been dissolved when the supply had not been voted, or full supply had not been voted, though in that case Parliament had come into existence but could not be conveniently called for some length of time, and the business of the country was financed by Governor General's special warrants.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Five weeks.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I wish to add one thing, and I do so with some diffidence, because Senator Flynn, after all, is learned in the law and I am not. He apparently overlooked subsection (5) of section 23 which seemed to envisage something that no one has referred to yet in this context. Subsection (5) says:

• (1620)

> For the purposes of this section, Parliament shall be deemed to be not in session when it is under adjournment sine die or to a day more than two weeks after the day the Governor in Council made the order directing the preparation of the special warrant.

In other words, there is even actual provision in this section for the use of warrants during a relatively prolonged adjournment of Parliament, even during sessions. So that I am afraid that particular part of Senator Flynn's argument scarcely stands up.

I am not discussing the issues of principle which he raised, which are important. Possibly he should be taking steps to ask for an amending act.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what I indicated. It may be that the wording should be interpreted as you say, but, if so, the government is more powerful without Parliament than with it.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am not discussing that issue of principle. I just want to get certain facts clear at the moment.

The final thing that I intended to say—by Jove! I think Senator Flynn's interjection has, perhaps, happily turned my mind away from it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am sorry.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Oh, yes, the final thing I intended to say was that this act, the present Financial Administration Act, was adopted—I have forgotten in what year, but long after many of these events that I have described took place—and when it was adopted it embodied substantially the same provisions as the old act, which according to Sir Charles Tupper had been misused and Parliament did it apparently with its eyes wide open saying, "All right. We know that this is going to cover things which don't bear any resemblance to leaky roofs and the rest of it. We know that it's going to be used in this way because it has been used again and again; it will probably have to be used again." But Parliament deliberately adopted the wording in the present act and, therefore, presumably it intended that the act should be used, although not necessarily in precisely the fashion that it has in this instance.

I agree with Senator Flynn that the warrant of December 14 is on a somewhat different basis from the earlier one, but Parliament did contemplate, it seems to me, when passing this revised act that some such use should be made of this provision as has been made in this instance.

I simply wanted to get those facts clear before the bill went through any further proceeding, because I think it is important that people should be clear about what the legal situation plainly is, as it seems to me.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: May I ask a question of Senator Forsey? Did I understand him to refer to the events of 1962? I think those events are most relevant to our discussion at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Yes. I think the same sort of thing has happened since 1958, but my recollection was not clear and as I had not the time to check the facts exactly I thought it was more prudent not to lay myself open to the shafts of Senator Flynn and his colleagues by relying on my recollection, which is in accord with what Senator Lamontagne mentions. I wanted to rely simply on the things which I scooted down to the library to verify before I rose to make these remarks.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What you say would go to prove that we would need a few days to argue this.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: I should like to point out to Senator Forsey that in Ontario I know there is a wide use of Lieutenant Governor General's warrants between sessions by the Ontario government, and I assume there is similar usage in most of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: There is a similar act on the statute books of all the provinces, or there was a few years ago when I looked into the matter. The act disappeared by accident from the Nova Scotia statute books for a while, but that was a sheer oversight which was corrected after some years when the Deputy Attorney General noticed that it had been left out in the revisions.

From recollection I cannot verify what Senator Thompson has just said about the use of warrants between ordinary sessions, but I do know that in various provinces the same sort of thing has happened after an election, when the new legislature was in being but had not met, notably, I think, in Ontario, perhaps after the election of 1943—I think it was 1943; I am not sure, but it was one of those times—a very large expenditure was made. The same thing happened in Quebec in 1892, I think, after the dismissal of the Mercier government. A search of the provincial precedents would, I am sure, show the same kind of thing.

Of course, Senator Flynn might well reply that that does not affect the principle of his argument. He would merely say that this compounds the satanic ingenuity or carelessness or incompetence to which he referred.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I do not make those adjectives my own. I am placing them hypothetically, as it were, in the mouth of Senator Flynn.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They were very well put.

Hon. Mr. Thompson: If I may just add a word, I wish that at the time I was in the Ontario legislature I could have spoken about the use or abuse of Lieutenant Governor's warrants with the brilliance and incisiveness with which Senator Flynn is now attacking the Liberal government. I might have been a more effective Opposition leader.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Thompson, in view of his brilliance today, if he does not feel some form of regret that he did not achieve that while he was Leader of the Opposition in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Thompson: I have just said that I only wish I had the oratorical ability of your leader. I will always aspire to that.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You are too kind.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, having regard to the time element my comments will be very brief. The circumstances under which we are discussing this bill are another example of how this chamber is being prevented from properly performing its responsibilities. It has become very apparent to me in the relatively short time that I have been here that the greatest single impediment to this chamber's discharging its constitutional responsibility is the total disregard for that responsibility in the other place. They have in their power the means to order the conduct of public business in such a way that this chamber could be accorded the time it properly requires to give that serious second thought for which the Senate was constituted. This they repeatedly fail to do.

This has been a disturbing discovery, because it raises in my mind at least the propriety of accepting remuneration from the people of Canada for trying to do a job for them which we are prevented from doing by circumstances beyond our control.

Turning now to the bill before us, I have been surprised that little, if anything, has been said about the major reasons why the statutory ceiling for advances has been exceeded. Those reasons are primarily twofold: first, the extension of benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, which has placed far heavier financial demands upon the fund and has also created opportunities for abuses to a greater extent than before; and, second, and of course the major cause, the marked increase in unemployment in Canada in the past two years.

As far as the abuses are concerned, I will not take time to discuss them, other than to say that there is a great deal of concern on the part of many people that the Unemployment Insurance Act as it presently stands is providing incentives for people to quit employment, when they would not otherwise do so, and refuse employment or certainly not to seek employment in cases when it is available if they were prepared to take it.

It is fair to say that those whose main objective has been to discredit the present government have exaggerated these abuses. It is equally true to say that the government has minimized the extent of these abuses, and the concern that the whole situation relating to unemployment insurance has created on the part of a great number of employers and, to some extent, on the part of the Canadian people as a whole.

Most people will agree that the principle of unemployment insurance is basically sound. The concept with which we started out was that there would be premiums paid by the employee and the employer which would provide certain benefits to employees who became unemployed. With the passage of time, one of the unfortunate things that happened to this legislation is that it has been moved farther and farther away from the sound concept of unemployment insurance, and turned to a large extent into legislation to provide social welfare assistance.

It seems to me that these two things should have been kept distinct and separate. Once we attempted to turn an unemployment insurance act into a broad social assistance program, then, of course, we got away from the sound principles of insurance, and we opened up all kinds of avenues that lead to abuses and controversy.

I am not suggesting for a moment that the thousands of additional unemployed people who have benefited by these extensions of the provisions should not have been taken care of. My only point is that surely in the light of experience it would have been better to take care of those people under some separate or supplementary legislation rather than including them under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The inclusion, for example, of a great many categories of very seasonal and temporary employment has led to all kinds of complications. Many of these people are employed for a very short period of time. They are, perhaps, faced with problems caused by lack of skills which would enable them to hold down more permanent jobs. While these people should be taken care of, I suggest that you cannot successfully mix that category of employee with those engaged in more permanent employment, and still expect to have an unemployment insurance act that will not be open to all kinds of abuses.

Attempts have been made to supplement the unemployment insurance fund by adding some categories which in all probability will never receive any benefits from the fund. This is true of certain professional people, certain self-employed people, people who never will benefit in any way—at least there is very little possibility of their doing so—from being covered by unemployment insurance. The only reason for adding them apparently was to supplement the unemployment insurance fund. If it was necessary to supplement the fund, that should be done by the people of Canada as a whole and not by singling out certain categories of employees who will not benefit from the fund, and making them pay contributions in order to provide a measure of subsidy.

I do not know what will be done about this matter in the future. I hope that somewhere along the line, perhaps in this house or in the other place, some one will make a thorough review of this whole matter of unemployment insurance with a view to getting it back into the field of true insurance by removing those categories of temporary employment which can be better provided for under supplementary legislation, rather than having them intermingled with those who may properly be regarded as insurable employees.

This suggestion of course raises the question as to the extent to which the taxpayers of Canada should supplement an unemployment insurance fund. Most people would agree that there would have to be some degree of subsidization. But if that premise is accepted, might it not be a much sounder proposition to have a basic scale of benefits which would be provided exclusively from the premiums paid by both employers and employees, and a supplementary unemployment benefit provided from the public treasury.

If that was feasible—and I am not going to take the time now to advance arguments as to why I think it is feasible—I suggest it would be more equitable to the Canadian taxpayers if the supplementary benefit was not geared to a statutory commitment to pay certain benefits, but rather was on a per capita basis. A payment from public funds on a per capita basis to those who are unemployed would eliminate this blank cheque technique of a government being able to adjust benefits even without the consent of Parliament, thereby creating a demand on the public purse over which Parliament has very little, if any, control. That is one of the valid criticisms of the particular bill we are now discussing.

Just one further comment, honourable senators. The second and certainly the major reason why we are faced with this $800 million deficit in the fund is the high level of unemployment in Canada in recent years. If ever we have seen an example of Parliament dealing with effects rather than causes, we have it in this legislation. I would have been much happier if Parliament had spent time trying to formulate policies that would effectively come to grips with the problem of unemployment in Canada, thereby relieving the pressures on the unemployment insurance fund, rather than debating whether they should or should not, or whether it was legally proper or improper to, remove a statutory ceiling so as to place a blank cheque in the hands of the government no matter how high unemployment costs may rise.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I realize this is not a good time to rise to my feet for fear of ruffling some feathers. This is not my intention.

As I understand it, this bill will pass tomorrow, and everybody will be happy it passed. That was really a major item. I heard Senator Flynn speak. If I were sitting in his seat I should like to make a speech as good as he has made, and from his point of view. Other honourable senators have complained about the Senate being kicked around. That is a natural hazard in the Senate. You have to expect it. You always turn your other cheek. You are going to get it whether you are right or wrong.

Senator Cook indicated we spent money on studies. That is not so important. We spent 50 days on that tax bill before it came over here. No one pays any attention to this. There is no use repeating it. Everyone says, "You receive the bill and in three days you pass it." That is not true. You just do your job here, that is all, and sooner or later they will come to recognize what you are doing is in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: After we disappear they probably will.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Let us look at what Senator Flynn has said. He accused the government of mismanagement, contempt for Parliament, and bad administration. I believe that was all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, there were other complaints as well.

Hon. Mr. Croll: In so far as I am concerned, I plead guilty. We are guilty of all those offences. But who suffers? We will have money for coffee and milk, and everything else tomorrow and the next day. But lots of people will suffer, I am told, and I have to take that as the truth. I was impressed when I read the evidence of the unemployment insurance commissioner. He said that 125,000 people will be badly affected.

I do not have to tell honourable senators that the old age pensioner waits to see if the postman has brought his cheque in the morning. People on welfare have already spent their cheques before they receive them, and they wait for them. Veterans are in the same position. I do not say that all of them are inconvenienced or hurt, but some will suffer. They make arrangements for shopping on a certain day, and being picked up and taken certain places. In small towns when the cheques do not come through there will be disappointment.

We will pass the bill anyway, and that is all very good. But I am suggesting we are taking it out on an innocent third party. What difference does it make who wins the argument here? Out there amongst the people, they will say, "Those parliamentarians are stupid. They cannot run anything." We do not raise our stature in the country in that way.

This is not what we want to do. We want to feel that we have the right to stand up for our views, as Senator Flynn did, and as we on this side of the house did. We are wrong and we ask for forgiveness. You can whack us if you like, but there is no reason to whack those innocent people who will be hurt. If you do not believe what the commissioner says is true, my argument goes out the window. But I assume Senator Buckwold has received his information properly. I have seen some notes around here which would indicate this is true.

In these circumstances do not we have to say, "All right, it is going to be law tomorrow, but should it not be law today?" We can go on and say what we have always said, "Don't ever let this happen again," but it will happen again. When it does happen again you can whack us, but not in this case.

A lot of poor people claim they are pawns in the game of life. They have not anything to do with their own destinies. This is one of the proofs that Parliaments move them around and treat them in that way. It is not fair. The results of our mistakes are not to be inflicted upon 20,000, 50,000, 100,000 or 125,000 people. It is not fair.

I make a plea to the Leader of the Opposition, who was not used well in this matter, and ask, "Is this a case for putting your foot down?" Believe me, I would like to have taken Senator O'Leary's position, but I do not have the guts to do this. I do not have the credibility to do that in these circumstances because it affects many people who look to us for guidance and help in getting out of jams into which we have put them. For this reason I think the Leader of the Opposition, on reflection, and particularly if we should have a committee this afternoon—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I cannot argue with him. It is his privilege and right. But I suggest to him this is not a case for sitting on our rights.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The people of Canada have a right to know why their cheques will be delayed.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I have no intention of unduly delaying this bill because it is urgent, and indeed, I suppose this is a critical matter. However, there are a couple of points I wish to make before we vote on the motion.

First, I should like to congratulate our colleague, Senator Buckwold, for his excellent presentation this afternoon. Obviously he did a great deal of homework on, I should think, fairly short notice. He performed admirably, and has done a great service for the Senate this afternoon.

I wish to make some comments regarding the treatment of the Senate by the other place and, indeed, to discuss the whole matter of Senate reform but I will not do it this afternoon. I am a new senator with no preconceived ideas about the Senate's role. As far as I am concerned, I shall endeavour to bring some fresh thinking—for me, that is—to bear on the subject, and I hope to discuss this matter when Senator Croll's motion is under consideration.

I go along with what Senator Manning and some other honourable senators have said this afternoon. It is ironic that some of those who are most vociferous in their demands for abolishing the Senate, or at least for Senate reform, are numbered among those who are making it impossible for the Senate to carry out its constitutional responsibilities. I think this is something which should be brought increasingly to the attention of the Canadian people. I will elaborate on that at a more appropriate time.

There is one other point I should like to make, of which I was reminded by the remarks made by Senator Manning, whose long and distinguished experience in public life in Canada in my opinion makes it imperative that when he comments on matters such as this we should pay very careful heed. It seems to me that we have been fooling ourselves here in Canada by thinking that in some way or another we, by application of welfare measures in the broad sense of the term, including unemployment insurance, can solve some of the basic difficulties in our economy.

Among those difficulties is the fact that so much of our employment, through the fault of no one in particular—I think it rather silly to blame it upon this or some other past administration—has of necessity to be seasonal. In my own province—and this, I think, applies almost equally to some other provinces; certainly to New Brunswick and, to some extent, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and, indeed, to a large segment of Quebec and other parts of Canada—the main avenues of occupation are fishing, logging, and construction work. Now, I cannot foresee that at any time in the future those occupations can be anything but seasonal. We are fooling ourselves if we think that they will ever be permanent.

I know of no way whereby fishing on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland can be permanent or continuous in the sense that a secretary's work here in the Senate is continuous. I know of no way whereby a logger can log pulpwood in New Brunswick or Newfoundland continuously, five days a week for 49 weeks a year. It cannot be done. The same applies even more strongly to construction work, of which so much is carried on in Labrador and northern Canada. Therefore, in my opinion, we are fooling ourselves if we think or pretend that we can solve that problem by means of unemployment insurance or any other palliative of that nature.

I am subject to correction in this, but I cannot recall that there has ever been a serious study on seasonal employment carried out. I know that peripheral studies have been made—"tangential" I suppose is the word for it—but a study has never been made specifically, so far as I know, of the problems of seasonal employment and unemployment in Canada. In my opinion that is something which is indicated and urgently necessary in our consideration of this whole matter of unemployment insurance. A study should be made of the problems of seasonal employment in Canada.

I am very happy to second and support the motion of my colleague, Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I am a little hesitant to rise again today but, after all, the leader having been given permission to go on with his motion, I think I might perhaps be excused if I add a few words.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I wish to do so because I made remarks on the subject outside this chamber, and I should repeat one or two of them here. In the first place, I would be very disappointed if this bill was really delayed. There is no doubt in my mind it is essential that the bill be passed, but I still do not think that it should be passed without some criticism of some of the circumstances which make it necessary. As Senator Manning said, we should perhaps consider cause as well as effect. At this point I must say that I agree wholeheartedly with the observations of Senator Manning and, in fact, there are spots in my remarks which will perhaps be repetitious.

Unemployment insurance was created for a valid and unquestionably good reason, which was quite simply that the employer and employee, by paying premiums into a fund, insured that the employee, in the event that he ceased to hold his employment, would receive money from the fund, hopefully sufficient to tide him over until he could again find gainful and compatible employment. It was a very simple, sound objective but over a period of time this purpose has somehow or other been deviated from, so that now we have part unemployment insurance and, in fairly large measure, welfare benefits.

What disturbs me is that I feel that there has been some lack of frankness in this development. I do not think and am not suggesting that it is wilful, but I am suggesting that somehow or other the changes have not been fully appreciated by the public. Many, perhaps most, taxpayers did not realize what was going on until the enormous deficit of these last few months, the last year, amounting to $1 billion, no longer could be disguised. In my very humble judgment, the shock of this realization was one of the factors responsible for the results of the last federal election, because I have great respect for the intelligence of the ordinary person.

Among several other factors, I detected great resentment of the bungling in this matter, as was also obvious in the mismanagement of immigration. This is quite apart from some other factors, I admit. It is obvious that people want not only faithful stewardship, but a reasonably competent level of it.

You may wonder why I say unemployment insurance is no longer unemployment insurance, but I would point out to you that this fund is in some cases being used to give a bonus or, if you prefer, a return of premiums to persons who are in no sense needy. For example, some who retire on an adequate long service pension from a company or other organization at age 65 receive the federal old age pension, and then discover that they are entitled to up to 51 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits. The net possible result is that when they retire they frequently have more money for the next year than they ever had in their lives.

In addition, in my own province applicants to the provincial government for pension receive a letter telling them that they should register for their federal unemployment insurance benefits before the province deals with them. This, of course, saves the Province of Quebec a great deal of money. They do not pay the pension, because these persons, by drawing unemployment insurance, disqualify themselves. No one ever publicized this; I just found it out the other day, but I find it very questionable.

On page 12 of the booklet put out by Information Canada—which ought to be accurate and which compares the old and the new unemployment insurance acts—dealing specifically with the new act of 1971, there is a paragraph on retirement which says:

> This is payable to persons aged 65-70 who have had 20 weeks or more of insured employment during the qualifying period and who—on separation—retire from the work force. They will receive a lump sum equivalent to three week's benefit . . . The purpose of this benefit is to bridge the gap between regular earnings from employment and the receipt of Canada or Quebec pension plan payments.

Three weeks' benefit! I do not know where we get authority for 48 or 51 weeks, and I do not consider a person who retires on a good pension to be in any sense unemployed in the context of an unemployment insurance provision.

I should like to give an example which is factual, and which to my mind is unjustifiable in respect of unemployment insurance. In this case, the individual retired with a pension of $362 a month. He then received a pension of $82.88 a month from a grateful federal government. Had he not received unemployment insurance, he would probably have received about $70 from the provincial government, making a total of $515 a month. That is not a bad pension. But that person is drawing $356 a month from other Canadian taxpayers in the form of unemployment insurance for a period of 51 weeks, or nearly 12 months. That is $356 a month in addition to the pensions.

Honourable senators, I just do not think that is unemployment insurance. It is one of the reasons why we find enormous sums of money being put up by the government to meet the deficit in the fund.

Another area which I think is little understood is that of sickness benefits, which have appeared since the amendments to the act. Again, the principle has been changed from unemployment insurance to health or welfare benefits. There is also the delicate matter of pregnancy. Any woman who becomes pregnant after a very brief period of work can have her baby at the expense of the people of Canada, in addition to hospitalization and other benefits. Again, I find this a very questionable bending of the idea that unemployment insurance benefits are provided for individuals who are thrown out of work by economic circumstances.

I noticed, as I am sure did all honourable senators, the remarks which appeared in yesterday's newspapers saying that Ottawa caused the unemployment and should pay for it. The remarks were attributed to a late member of the government. I immediately wondered where Ottawa was going to get the money. It is the age-old question. It will certainly not be Ottawa that pays for it. Once again it will be all of us who will have to pay for it, and there is no doubt that the federal government will have to find the funds. But the amendments in the act were responsible for causing some of this unemployment.

There is no doubt in my mind that poverty in this country is far too widespread. I feel also that the level of welfare is lamentably low. However, I will not deal with that subject today, but will confine myself to speaking about unemployment insurance. There is no excuse for trying to cover the welfare field even in part, in a debate on the unemployment insurance fund—particularly if we are going to continue calling it the unemployment insurance fund.

The present situation is a result of those factors mentioned by Senator Manning, combined with a number of abuses. Abuses have been brushed off. There have been enormous abuses. Everyone in this chamber knows of abuses. Those combined factors are the reason for this enormous sum of money which Canadian taxpayers are asked to provide, and which in turn has brought forth this bill.

I want to repeat—in case I get misquoted, as I so often do, and come out as being opposed to unemployment insurance, or something like that—that I believe this bill should be passed, and should be passed without delay. At the same time we should realize that perhaps mistakes were made; that they were not made by a few but by Parliament. I doubt whether any of us realized the implications of the extra load we put on the unemployment insurance fund. Not many of us realized the change in benefits we were giving people. But those mistakes having been made, I hope, like Senator Manning, that the whole question will be gone into as soon as there is reasonable opportunity to sit down and examine it; that the unemployment insurance fund will resume its function of relief for the real unemployed as distinct from the well to do; and that our welfare benefits will be able to deal more adequately with poverty in this country.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman a question. I do not in any way deprecate what he said. He gave us an example of a pensioner who received an unemployment insurance benefit and additional benefits, all of which added up to a considerable sum. My question is a self-serving question, I must admit.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As usual.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Not as usual. Does my friend appreciate that the purpose of a basic income is to avoid exactly what he is talking about—in other words, a guaranteed income?

Hon. Mr. Molson: I think I do.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I wish other people understood it as well as you do.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, my remarks, in the main, will be entirely in support of the position taken by Senator Flynn, and will summarize and highlight some of the reasons why we on this side of the house criticize the bill and particularly the actions of the government which created the situation in which we find ourselves at this time.

A good deal has been said about the delay in bringing the bill here. I am not going to discuss the Senate's position or what might be called an affront to honourable senators. I am not on this particular occasion as much concerned with that as I am with the fact that this bill need not have been delayed in coming to us. This situation need not have been created. The only reason that we are faced with this situation today is mismanagement by the government.

• (1710)

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: It is because of delays caused by the Opposition in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am quite prepared to deal with the delays that might have been caused by the Opposition in the other place. However, the delays to which I refer, Senator McIlraith, with respect to the situation with which we are confronted today, go a long way back beyond this month or last month, which brings me directly to the point. Senator Flynn has referred to this, but I want to emphasize it.

We all know that the unemployment insurance account is "broke"—broke for a billion dollars. I use that word having in mind these components. The total cost of operating the fund for the year is $1,999,000,000. The total that could have been expected as income under normal circumstances—without warrants, and so forth—was $800 million, plus, if you like, the opening funds on hand at the end of 1971, which were about $236 million; so let us say approximately $1 billion. Now, what happened in the year? This fund at the end of the calendar year 1972 was broke for $1 billion dollars. The government, to make up the deficit temporarily and to make it possible for on-going benefits to be paid, resorted to a device known as Governor General's warrants.

What we are saying is that it was never necessary to have those warrants. What we on this side are saying is that Parliament was in session on September 1, and it was known that the amount on hand was not sufficient to pay the on-going benefits that would be required to the end of the year. I say to honourable senators that the evidence of that is abundant.

The chairman of the commission himself has said that they knew about this in mid-August. He has not said that it was drawn to the attention of the Cabinet, and I cannot infer that. However, I can infer that if the chairman himself knew it—and I can cite the record if anybody wishes—he consulted with legal counsel. The legal advisers even said, "Maybe you don't have to worry about that $800 million statutory limit; maybe the fact that the Unemployment Insurance Act says we have to pay this means that, regardless of the act of Parliament, we can still pay it out." Well, the legal advisers said, "No, we cannot go that far." But they did say and did admit that the account—I do not call it a fund because technically it is not a fund; it is an account in the consolidated revenue fund—the account was not going to be sufficient to pay out the benefits for the rest of the year. They knew that in mid-August. Parliament was in session in September.

Those are two inescapable facts, honourable senators. Parliament was in session and this could have been dealt with in the normal way. Had that been done, we would not be faced with this situation today. There would be no question of the unemployed waiting for their cheques.

The first warrant was obtained on October 5. That warrant, as evidenced by the documents we have before us and the evidence in committee, and so forth, carried through until either January 3 or January 4—there is some doubt about the date. According to the earlier evidence it was January 4, but the evidence later was no; the earlier evidence yes; the later evidence, "Perhaps it is January 3." And there was good reason for that change. The situation on the second warrant—and I am sorry Senator Forsey is not here, because I do not think he would find a precedent for this one—

Hon. Mr. Croll: Oh yes, he would.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I very much doubt it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A real one or an imaginary one?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The situation here is that, in spite of what has been said concerning section 23 of the Financial Administration Act and the requirements for paying out money under a warrant, every single cent under the second warrant will be paid out while Parliament is in session. If there is a precedent for that, I do not know of it.

We are talking about precedents for these warrants. Well, there is another aspect of this for which there appears to be no precedent—at least, the Auditor General says he can find no precedent—and that is the fact that this warrant was used in effect, to repeal an act of Parliament. The act of Parliament says quite clearly—and it was the only act governing this situation—"there is a limit of $800 million in advances that can be given." And the warrant, in effect, says, "Well, the government says no. We will find another way. We don't really care what Parliament said. It does not matter that Parliament imposed a statutory limit. We are going to find another way." And there has been some question as to the legality of that. What is much more important is the fact, again, that that situation need not have arisen. Why? Because that second warrant was issued on December 14.

Here again the evidence is that it was known that the first warrant might not carry through beyond the end of the year, to January 3 or January 4. The election was over, and Parliament could have been called into session. Many of us even wondered why Parliament was not called in December. It seemed to be the logical thing to do. There were important matters to come before Parliament. There was the very important question of payments to the unemployed, the question we are facing at this very moment.

I say the responsibility is the government's. The government, knowing the situation that was going to develop on this very day, would not call Parliament into session in December when the whole matter could have been dealt with without very much delay. But here we are on this 7th day of February, 1973, faced with the question of whether the unemployed will get their cheques or not.

The government had two opportunities to avoid this mess when Parliament was in session and they failed to take either of them. Now we are told that it is just unfortunate; that it is all a question of legality; argument amongst lawyers; argument amongst parties, as Senator Croll said. Honourable senators, it is nothing of the kind. It is an indictment of mismanagement by this government and carelessness—in the worst sense of "carelessness"—for the interests of the unemployed, whatever the number might be that may or may not get their cheques tomorrow. That, honourable senators, is the issue.

A good deal of confusion has been caused—

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I recall a similar situation in 1962. The election was held in June; a cooling off period was proclaimed by the then Prime Minister, and Parliament was called at the end of October. Throughout that period we were all on Governor General's warrants. At the end of January, Parliament was asked to vote the last one-twelfth of the estimates, without having the estimates discussed in the house at all.

• (1720)

Hon. Mr. Martin: It happened all the time then.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I thank the honourable senator for drawing that "dreadful" situation to my attention. Probably if it had not been allowed to happen this present situation might have not been allowed to happen. I am in no position to defend that situation, any more than I am able to defend this one. This is why I sometimes get tired of hearing our lawyers and constitutional experts saying, "This was done before, therefore it must be all right. It was done in 1898; it was done in 1911." This is no justification for this kind of situation in the year 1973. I do not even know what government was in office at the time to which Senator Lamontagne is referring.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Take a guess.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It was a bad government.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That does not matter.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I agree with the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This is one of the reasons I think it is very important that this situation be dealt with as soon as possible. I do not mean today. If we do not deal with it we will have Senator Forsey and others citing this as a precedent. They will say, "You do not have to pay any attention to an act of Parliament if there is a limit set by an act. Remember in 1972 we issued warrants. It did not matter then what the act of Parliament said, so let us do it again." I am not interested in precedents, but I am disturbed that this situation may create a precedent for constitutional lawyers and others to cite in justifying a situation that could not be otherwise justified.

The government itself has contributed over and over again in the last few months to the utter confusion that has been created by this situation. I am sorry to say that some ministers whom I like have themselves been so confused about the situation that it is impossible to believe the Cabinet of which they are members could have known what it was doing.

The President of the Treasury Board, in whose area of responsibility much of this situation comes—he has not the entire responsibility, but he has a good deal of it—said on January 12, only last month:

> —the minister responsible before the House will have to get the Appropriation Act adopted at three readings and by the Committee of the Whole before February 8, and that is in the House of Commons and also in the Senate. Otherwise there might be no more funds to spend after February 8—

I call attention to that date, "after February 8";

> —and this would apply to the Unemployment Insurance Commission again.

This is just not a statement of fact. The appropriation bill has nothing to do with this; it has nothing whatever to do with whether these cheques go out today or tomorrow. The minister is confused.

We now have this bill. I did not hear Senator Buckwold comment on clause 2, which says this is not an appropriation but an advance. This is the clearest indication of a straight cover-up. Listen to what the Director of Legal Services of the Unemployment Insurance Commission himself gave as evidence before the committee of the other place:

> The situation is that the Governor General's warrant is an appropriation, so the money has been received.
> It becomes part of the first appropriation act, and what must be done to permit the payment of benefits after February 8 is the passage of Bill C-124.

He is quite right in the latter part of that passage, I suppose, the situation being what it is. The legal adviser says this is an appropriation. Now we have a bill saying it is not. Well, it is not the first time we have had this kind of retroactive legislation, but it is the clearest possible evidence of this utter confusion in the Cabinet itself, and in the councils of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which has created this situation.

I bring these matters to the attention of the Senate so that we will have perhaps less talk in the future about delays caused by the Opposition in the other place. The so-called delay by the Opposition in the other place was an examination of the supplementary estimates before the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. It took a month, but the fact of the matter is that there was no delay of this bill. This bill could have been brought before Parliament earlier, when Parliament was sitting. If there was this tremendous urgency why was this bill not brought before Parliament at once? Why was not an appropriation bill brought before Parliament? As somebody remarked, why were we discussing capital punishment?

With all the urgent matters that are before the public today involving similar cases of individual human requirements, such as those of unemployment, why are we going to spend time talking about Vietnam shortly? Certainly Vietnam and capital punishment are important, but these are debating subjects. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Why do we not get down to discussing old age pensions? Why do we not get down to discussing legislation, even if it is legislation on which the government might be in some jeopardy? Face up to it. Let us have no more of this. What is now happening in the management by the government of the affairs of Parliament is a repetition of the kind of thing that caused the situation now before us. I make this plea to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Croll says we should forget the past. I suppose we have to, but we do not have to forgive it. I found some parts of Senator Croll's speech a little unfair. It was a good speech, and I agree with the position he has taken.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He made me cry.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This, surely, is what happens every time. We are up against this kind of wall. We are confronted with a situation in which we have to say that because of our compassion for the people who may be affected we must throw in the sponge and let it happen again. This is why there are some on this side who would like to stand and fight on this. Somebody said he would like to stand and fight, but he does not have the guts.

I think I am in that position too. I would like to stand and fight on this principle so that perhaps this kind of thing would not again happen; so that we would not have the government saying, as they did back in August and September, and again in December, "Look, we can get away with it." That is a famous phrase, part of the history of that party. "We can get away with it. Who can stop us?" I see that approach in this whole situation. "We will get away with it. What does it matter. We could call Parliament. If we call Parliament in September we could put it before them, but then we would have to disclose more unemployment figures and some of the muddle we have got into. Of course we will get by, the election will be all over, we will be back again in office and we will get away with it."

• (1730)

Again in December, obviously the same thing. Why was not Parliament called in December if we have this terrible urgency? Tomorrow people will go to their mail boxes looking for cheques that are not there? Why was not Parliament summoned in December?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Are you asking me?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You cannot reply.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I did not intend to reply.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: But you are the ones who were supposed to learn the lesson, said Pierre.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I would say to the Leader of the Government that the question was not directed at him, nor was it a rhetorical question. It was a question the answer to which I hope we of the party to which I owe my allegiance will be able to find the answers before very long. I hope, if it should happen that we are on the other side, that I will not be put in the position of defending such an impossible situation as that with which we are confronted here.

Honourable senators, there is a great deal more I could say, but I will leave it at that for the time being. I hope this bill goes to committee. I understood the sponsor to say he would move that it go to committee. There are some questions which should be asked there. Of course, the major question is, what is the actual state of the fund? I would remind honourable senators that, over and over again in the evidence by ministers and others, we were told that the crisis would occur, if the cheques did not go out, after February 8. Today is February 7.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, in rising to speak I realize that I have been up and down several times today. I do not enjoy that situation. From the opening through to the bill, there was a distinct feeling of bitterness which I feel is foreign, alien to the Senate. That that feeling was present shows the importance of this bill. My remarks will be brief.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: They will be pointed. You can say "hear, hear," but it would do you good to listen; you might learn a bit, and you are in need of knowledge, sir.

I might go back to earlier this afternoon, when the Leader of the Government delivered his ultimatum, "at five o'clock." He later denied it, but I have talked to people on the other side of the house, some of his closest colleagues, who said that they got the same impression that I got—it is five o'clock, or else.

As a member of the Senate, that I will not accept. That is not my view as a Conservative—and I like to remind the Senate that I am not only a Conservative, I am a right wing Conservative. The Leader of the Government in his remarks this afternoon conveyed distinctly "by five o'clock, or else." He has gone through this procedure before. I have used the phrase "hell may freeze over" before too. I have not been in hell, but I am sure that the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate has been in hell and I would like to ask him whether it has frozen over or not. Has it frozen, Paul?

Earlier this afternoon I asked of the deputy chairman of the National Finance Committee—By the way, am I interrupting your conversation with Senator Croll, Senator Martin? I would not want to be talking while you two are having your little tête-à-tête. Am I interrupting that? If I am, I will yield the floor while you two have your little conversation. It may be on Senate reform, I do not know. I remember that this government was going to listen and learn. I have not seen any indication from Senator Martin either that he is going to listen or that he will learn, and, what is even worse, I have not seen any indication that he would like to learn. I think that this is the thing that is important. Are you going to listen? Are you going to learn? Do you really want to learn, or do you want to continue in your old-fashioned, obstinate Liberal ways, of saying "To hell with everybody, the Liberal Party rules, and we will win the election." Is that still your attitude, sir?

Well, since I have not received an answer, I at least presume that he is considering and taking note. In fact, I see him signing letters at the present time. I am familiar with the technique of having an executive assistant draft a reply which is signed by the minister. In this case, unfortunately, it happens to be the Honourable Senator Martin, and while I am speaking I can note that he is very busy reading the letters and signing them. But, Senator Martin, you know that I am the most generous person in the world. I am quite prepared to sit down and let you read to the Senate those letters which you are signing now.

Are you going to continue signing letters or are you going to listen?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, I am going to continue until I finish the book. That is quite certain.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: All right. I will wait until you finish signing the book, and while you are finishing the book I would say that it is an unfortunate thing that you are signing letters that you don't know a damn thing about, and that has been the unfortunate part of your career.

Do I speak to the Senate? Do I speak to the government leader? I certainly refuse to speak to him while he is signing letters. I am quite prepared to sit down.

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: I rise on a point of order. I ask the Chair if there is any way the honourable senator could be directed to speak to the motion? I would be very glad to hear him speak on that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Buckwold inquires whether the senator would direct what he has to say to the motion that we are considering.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Your Honour, I claim the honour of having been the first senator to go through your reception line. I would therefore want to be the last person to disagree with any of your rulings, but with regard to your intervention, Your Honour, I notice that Honourable Senator Martin has now finished signing his letters so the question is no longer relevant.

There is one essential thing that this bill before us does, and that is it removes the $800 million ceiling which was stipulated and imposed by Parliament. That ceiling was not imposed by an individual. It was not imposed by Senator Croll or any other individual like him. It was put there by Parliament. We in the Senate accepted that $800 million ceiling. Are there any of you here who voted against it? Not one of you! Why was that $800 million ceiling put into the act? I will tell you why. That ceiling was put in there to assure parliamentary control. The minister has admitted it, the Auditor General has admitted it, and the chairman of the Unemployment Insurance Commission has admitted that the ceiling was put there to assure parliamentary control.

But what is the government trying to do by means of this bill? This bill will give the government unlimited control. Parliament will no longer have any responsibility. In fact, under this act the commission no longer has to report to Parliament.

Honourable senators, do you feel proud of yourselves in supporting a bill that lets funds go out, out and out without any means of controlling them? Do you not agree that the government should report to Parliament on any excess? The Auditor General himself says he cannot find any parallel for this.

Yesterday in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance I asked the President of the Treasury Board if he could give me any example of a previous instance. Well, he said no, he couldn't, and he simply used the old Liberal technique of turning to the officials so that the officials could give the reply. I have not received that reply, honourable senators, and I can look at my colleagues here. Admittedly we have different political affiliations. Let me go down the front row. Honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West)—one of my colleagues says, "Don't name them one by one." All right. I will withdraw that particular remark. It was my intention to go down the front row and ask you personally. Because I feel so strongly on this issue, I was going to go down the front row. I see some stir from Senator McIlraith. Would you like to be questioned, sir? All right, I will forget that.

But, honourable senators, as I stated earlier this afternoon, if you think this is a jocular matter, a matter of levity, well, let it go; pass it. I said I was too much of a Conservative to let that go. I don't apologize for being a Conservative; I don't apologize for being right-wing, and in case you want to investigate my background, there is nothing in my background that should make me want to be right-wing except pride and work. "You look after yourself"—this was drilled into me, and I come from a family of 11 or 12. We were all told, "You look after yourself." And we didn't have it easy. The first time I worked I got 75 cents for the day, and that was when I was 12 or 13. Seventy-five cents a day is Senator Prowse's pay today.

Senator Martin, do you have any questions? I see you yapping across the floor. What are your questions? Do you want to put them on the record, or do you want to put them privately? I give you the opportunity. Which do you want?

Honourable senators, I am telling you this because I am interested in Senator Croll's inquiry, and I think there is some connection between Senator Croll's inquiry and this. I don't know what he is going to say, but he says there is reform needed. Ye gads, there is reform needed on a bill of this type, and I urge Senator Croll to continue that.

On the other hand, early in the afternoon, it was stated by Senator McIlraith, I think, that there might be more co-operation, more simultaneous debate, between this chamber and the other chamber. Let us face facts, honourable senators.

When you are through talking to Senator Molgat, Senator Martin, I will continue. I am perfectly happy to take my seat until you people finish your conversation. If you are so worried that you have to "martinize" everybody on the other side, fine, go ahead; talk to Senator Molgat. Give him his instructions; tell him what he is to do. I will take my time.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Madam Speaker, I would call your attention to Rule 38 of the Rules of the Senate. That rule states, "All personal, sharp or taxing speeches are forbidden." It certainly seems to me that this is becoming very personal.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been called to my attention that some of the remarks made might come under Rule 38, and if Senator Phillips intends to continue I must ask him to keep to the discussion on the motion.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Your Honour, as a fellow Maritimer, I have a special respect for you and I would not in any way wish to trespass against your ruling. If I have erred, as the various prayers go, forgive me. I shall then go on to deal with a different point. And here again, Your Honour, I ask your protection. When I am speaking to the Leader of the Government I expect him to listen.

The thing that disturbs me is the fact that yesterday I pointed to the item in supplementary estimates (A) under Finance, and the sum of $350 million which the acting chairman of the National Finance Committee referred to earlier, and I ended up, honourable senators, with the feeling that the government of this day—and I hope it is not for too long—has deliberately planned unemployment to the year 1975. When I asked the chairman of the Treasury Board, he said he could not see any reduction in the rate of unemployment before 1975.

Honourable senators, I take the viewpoint, and perhaps it is unique, that the government has planned this deliberately. I cannot accept the fact that unemployment, as a government measure, has been deliberately planned, yet I find no alternative.

Other honourable senators mentioned this earlier this afternoon. But on the assumption that the Unemployment Insurance Commission works 40 hours a week, which they do, and with the knowledge that we are now paying out $60 million in unemployment insurance benefits, I ask you in all seriousness—and I am not being partisan; Conservative, Liberal, or NDP—when we start paying out per hour $1½ million in unemployment insurance benefits is not it time that someone, God knows where but I hope it is in this chamber—that may be a false hope, and I have had many false hopes in this chamber—would not it be better, honourable senators, to put $1½ million per hour into the development of this country and provide jobs, rather than pay this amount per hour to those who are unemployed?

I am not one of those people who believe that the unemployed are taking advantage of the act. I do not believe that. I have too many letters in my files to show they are not.

Yesterday morning I interviewed a young chap who had gone through the Adult Occupational Training Program, training in electronics. The federal government paid for this course for a year and a half, and he is now a specialist. He comes to me and explains that he is now a specialist and asks, "Where do I get work?" Do you know where he gets work? If any honourable senator knows where he can get work I would be delighted to refer him to that source. I do not know. Does anyone know within this chamber?

Something has been missed in this bill, and I think it is important because the average Canadian is beginning to ask, "What does unemployment cost us?" Honourable senators, I want to repeat and emphasize that unemployment is costly, expensive and wasteful. Look at supplementary estimates (A) and see that what has been spent already amounts to $50 for every man, woman and child in this country. In case you are disinterested, or you do not understand, that is every person in Canada regardless of age from one week to 100 years.

I have been reminded that I have been going an hour. Well, that may be. Fine. I had not realized that, because I feel so strongly on this, Senator Grosart. I wish to emphasize that I feel extreme frustration, more than I have ever felt since I came to this Senate. You can say, "You are wrong," to a government, and we have proven on many occasions that our advice was right, but not a bit of it is heeded. I feel very strongly on this point.

I have a note here to deal with the Governor General's warrants. I think that Senator Grosart has dealt with those very effectively, but I would like to say again that while Parliament is sitting—and, honourable senators, I want you to recognize this point—that while Parliament is sitting, but without the authority of Parliament, a million and a half dollars per hour per working day has been spent without parliamentary authority.

I had intended, honourable senators, to go back to 1958 when, much to my surprise, I was re-elected to the House of Commons. I will not go through it, but I will ask you to go back and read Hansard of that time. I will not go into my remarks concerning the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I still do not think I have been an hour, but that is fine. I did not time myself but I could go for five hours, Senator Grosart, there are so many items.

Honourable senators opposite, I say to you this, not in antagonism—as a matter of fact, I think I have more friends opposite than I have here; there are not too many of us left over here to make friends.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): And we know why.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You know what?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): We know why.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Well, if you had anything definite in your mind, honourable senator, that would be about the first time in your long career that you had adopted an opinion, and I am glad to hear it.

There are certain things that I would like to go into. There is the matter of the relationship with the war veterans' allowance, which Senator Carter and I dealt with in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance yesterday. I do not know whether legally this gives us the right to go into that, but I will very, very reluctantly look at the clock and say—

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: It says five to six.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: It says five to six? Then I am encouraged. Do you want me to go on? Thank you, senator, I will do that for another five minutes. Thank you at least for listening. The point to which I wish to return and repeat, and I wish to finish with this, is that this bill does not provide a ceiling. It does not provide any parliamentary control. Honourable senators, are you proud to pass a bill in which the Auditor General has no accounting approval? This bill completely removes, at least in my interpretation—you may take a different interpretation, senator—but the Auditor General according to my interpretation of this bill has no control. He has no responsibility to report to Parliament. Are you going to eliminate the Auditor General? I ask you, honourable senators, are you going to destroy the Auditor General by completely removing him from this inspection, this report to Parliament? As you know, he has already asked for a legal opinion concerning the Governor General's warrants.

I do not want to go into that. I have asked for the opinion of the Auditor General's legal advisers, but have been told that I cannot get it for a year. In a year from now a lot of us will have lost interest. In this bill we are giving the government complete authority to transfer income tax funds, Canada Pension funds and other funds, to bolster the fund for unemployment insurance benefits.

The Senate has often been criticized as being a group of people who are directors of companies—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. It is after 6 o'clock, and pursuant to Rule 12 I will leave the Chair until 8 o'clock this evening, unless the Senate, by unanimous consent, wishes to complete this afternoon's business.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think Senator Phillips would like to finish, and we should give him the opportunity.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the unanimous consent of honourable senators that we should continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I promise Your Honour that I shall finish in 30 seconds. I was starting to say that the Senate is criticized as being a group of people who are directors of companies. Would honourable senators, as directors of various companies, accept this bill? Would they put it to a meeting of a board of directors? If they would, fine. I would not do so. Honourable senators have their choice.

Madam Speaker, I would like to continue, but the 30 seconds are up. Thank you for the courtesy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do you wish to continue with the business of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Madam Speaker, we have a motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rowe, that this bill be now read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When?

[Hon. Mr. Phillips.]

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: For immediate attention.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I should like, as the new chairman of this committee, to plead with the members of the committee to sit tonight.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Why tonight?

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: We are all agreed that there is some urgency in passing this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I understand that a number of senators wish to ask questions of the minister and his officials. They will be available this evening. We are unemployed this evening and it would be a good occasion to use the time to commence the questioning on this very important piece of legislation. If we cannot complete our consideration of the bill in committee tonight, we would be in a position to continue tomorrow. The few hours which we have at our disposal this evening could be used in serious and beneficial discussion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not see the point raised by Senator Lamontagne as being very valid, unless it suits his own program better. I think that is probably the point. We can sit at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning and continue until 1 o'clock. We have four hours tomorrow morning. The bill cannot be passed before tomorrow afternoon, in any event.

Many senators have left the chamber, taking for granted the committee would not sit tonight. Furthermore, it was previously agreed that all senators would receive notices of committee meetings. It was agreed that not only committee members but all honourable senators would be advised of the meetings of all committees. It is now past 6 o'clock, and to sit at 8 o'clock tonight with such short notice is not satisfactory for the Senate as a whole. I do not subscribe to Senator Lamontagne's suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, it is understandable that Senator Lamontagne would make this request. It has now been suggested by Senator Flynn that the committee should meet at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning in the hope that we can dispose of this matter tomorrow afternoon. I would suggest that the other items on the Order Paper stand.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Before the adjournment, may I reply to a comment made by Senator Flynn regarding notice of meetings. I have checked into the matter of notice being given to honourable senators. There are some technical problems involved, and at the moment the Committees Branch is not in a position to do this. I am ascertaining what can be done, and it will probably require the concurrence of Internal Economy at some stage.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We may be able to advise many senators that the committee will be sitting tomorrow morning.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: If the committee meets tomorrow morning, it will meet in Room 356-S.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

Wednesday, February 7, 1973.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which were referred Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, 25th January, 1973, examined the said Estimates and reports as follows:

Witnesses heard by the Committee were Hon. C. M. Drury, President of the Treasury Board; Mr. A. Kroeger, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board; and Mr. B. A. Bruce MacDonald, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board.

The Supplementary Estimates total $1,290,790,402 of which $817,000,000 are non-budgetary items, that is to say loans, investments or advances. Previous Main Estimates are increased from $16,539,080,169 to a total of $17,829,870,571 for the current fiscal year.

The Minister informed the Committee that 90% of Supplementary Estimates (A) are items "having to do with the relief of unemployment or the creation of jobs" as follows:

Winter Capital Projects Fund, $350 million

Advances to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, $454 million

Local Initiatives and Training on the Job, $304 million

Federal Labour Intensive Projects, $60 million

Payments to establish the Metropolitan Growth Investment Limited for the Halifax-Dartmouth area, $10 million.

Payments to farmers include crop losses ($12.6 million), subsidization of livestock feed movement ($4 million), payments to the Wheat Board to purchase covered grain hopper cars ($40 million), and payments to farmers for losses caused by waterfowl ($1 million).

Other items include costs of the New Horizons Program for senior citizens ($6.2 million), higher pensions and allowances to veterans ($18 million), assistance to Asian Uganda immigrants ($4 million) and Non-Medical Use of Drugs program ($2.8 million).

The remaining 2% of the total includes public works, a loan to increase flow of tonnage on the MacKenzie River, grants for Prince Edward Island Centennial projects and compensation to Atlantic fishermen for the closing of commercial salmon fisheries.

Four vote items are for $1 each. This is a vote category discussed in previous Committee Reports and for which a description and explanation are now regularly provided by the Treasury Board to the Committee. This is appended hereto.

Almost half of the total in these estimates ($590,509,000) relates to three Governor-General's Special Warrants obtained by Order-in-Council during the period of dissolution of Parliament—on October 5, November 16, and December 14. The Committee was informed by the Minister that these complied with the requirements of Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act in that they covered "payments urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session and there is no other appropriation pursuant to which the payment may be made". The two largest items in these Warrants were $132,084,000 for the Local Incentives Program (LIP) and $454,000,000 in Vote L30a of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The latter is shown as "advances . . . to be applied by the Unemployment Insurance Commission towards the payments of benefits and costs of administration under that Act, such advances to be repaid in such manner and on such terms and conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe".

Replying to questions from Committee members, the Minister explained that the first U.I.C. Warrant (October 5, $234 million) became necessary when it appeared that the statutory limit of permissable government advances to the Commission ($800 million) would be exceeded by the end of October, in which case there would have been no authority to pay unemployment benefits as required by the Unemployment Insurance Act. "The Unemployment Insurance Commission would have ceased issuing payments if there had been no warrant."

A similar situation arose when it appeared that benefit payments under the October warrant would again leave the Commission without funds on or about January 3, the day before the Opening of Parliament. A second warrant ($220 million) was therefore obtained on December 14 and its funds are expected to be exhausted by February 7.

The financial position of the Unemployment Insurance Account for the calendar year ending December 31, 1972 is as follows:

Benefit payments $1,879 million; administrative costs $120 million: totalling $1,999 million.

Income from employer and employee premiums $715 million; due from government (statutory) $890 million: totalling $1,605 million.

Accounting deficit, therefore, $394 . . . less opening balance (January 1st, 1972) $236 = Deficit of $158 million.

The Commission's financial problems appear to be caused by (a) under-estimation of the increases that took place in benefit payments during the year (b) the $800 million statutory ceiling on government advances against the accrued liability of $890 (c) the fact that Parliament was not in session from September to early January.

Treasury Board Contingency Fund

Payments from the Treasury Board Contingency Fund exhausted the Fund's resources during the period covered by Supplementary (A). When Supply is granted by Parliament it will be reimbursed by approximately $40 million from appropriations in Supplementary Estimates (A). In the meantime, no Contingency Funds are available if an emergency should arise. The Estimates provide for a further appropriation to the Contingency Fund of $60 million for a program whereby temporary employees will be hired directly by federal government departments as part of the overall employment program for the current winter.

Winter Capital Projects Fund

This is a new program of federal government assistance to the provinces, provincial agencies and municipalities to create employment through the construction of capital development projects. Vote L12a of the Department of Finance authorizes loan commitments by the federal governments of $350 million over the four and a half years from December 1972 to June 1975. Amounts will be allocated to provinces on the basis of population and levels and seasonality of unemployment. The Committee notes that this proposes the introduction of a major item of legislation by vote in an Appropriation Act. Not only are very large amounts involved but the vote item authorizes commitments extending over several years into the future. Granting the exceptional circumstances and the requirements of long range planning, the Committee feels that an Appropriation Act should not be used for this purpose.

Respectfully submitted

Allister Grosart
Deputy Chairman.

EXPLANATION OF ONE DOLLAR ITEMS SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1972-73

Summary

The one dollar items included in these Estimates have been grouped in the attached according to purpose.

A. One dollar items authorizing transfers from one vote to another within a Ministry for the purpose of reallocating funds (1 item—this item also appears in Section C).

B. One dollar items which require listing in the Estimates in order to secure approval of a grant (1 item).

C. One dollar items which are legislative in nature (3 items including Secretary of State—National Museums of Canada Vote 90a which also appears in Section A).

Estimates Division,
February, 1973

SECTION A
ONE DOLLAR ITEMS AUTHORIZING TRANSFERS FROM ONE VOTE TO ANOTHER WITHIN A MINISTRY FOR THE PURPOSE OF RE-ALLOCATING FUNDS (1 ITEM—THIS ITEM ALSO APPEARS IN SECTION C)

Secretary of State—National Museums of Canada

Vote 90a (also listed in Section C)—Amount of transfer to this vote $2,899,999.

Purpose—To provide funds for certain projects under the Museums Policy. This Policy was originally budgeted for within the Canada Council. The responsibility for these projects has since been reassigned thus a transfer of funds is required.

Source of Funds—Vote 45 ($2,899,999)—Canada Council.

SECTION B
ONE DOLLAR ITEMS WHICH REQUIRE LISTING IN THE ESTIMATES IN ORDER TO SECURE APPROVAL OF A GRANT (1 ITEM)

Justice

Vote 1a—To authorize a grant of $10,000.

Explanation—The grant to the Canadian Association of Provincial Court Judges will be used to assist in defraying the operating expenses of the Association.

Source of Funds—Vote 5—Funds originally provided for operating expenditures will be used to pay this grant.

SECTION C
ONE DOLLAR ITEMS WHICH ARE LEGISLATIVE IN NATURE (3 ITEMS INCLUDING SECRETARY OF STATE—NATIONAL MUSEUMS OF CANADA VOTE 90a WHICH ALSO APPEARS IN SECTION A)

Finance

Vote 13a—To authorize an extension to the period of time for election of pensionable service under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Explanation—This authorization is required to extend the period of time under which an election can be made under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act for pensionable service for those persons who failed to do so previously due to erroneous advice being given or for the review of previous elections for pensionable service to ensure the full period of entitlement has been given.

Secretary of State—National Museums of Canada

Vote 90a—(also listed in Section A)—To authorize an increase of $1,000,000 in the statutory limit of the purchase account of the National Museums.

Explanation—The increase to $3,100,000 in the amount of the purchase account is required for the establishment of the Emergency Purchase Fund which was approved as part of the new ministerial policy on Museums.

Urban Affairs—Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation

Vote 10a—To authorize an extension in the vote wording so as to permit the Corporation to be reimbursed for expenditures incurred during the period January 1, 1973 to March 31, 1973 on housing research and community planning.

Explanation—The present vote wording restricts reimbursements to the calendar year 1972, a change is therefore required in the vote wording to permit reimbursements to March 31, 1973. The amount of reimbursements to be claimed would remain within the funds already voted.

The Housing Research and Community Planning Activity includes the Winter Warmth Program which provides assistance to Metis and non-status Indians. This Program, which peaks during the winter months, provides financial assistance whereby improvements can be made to their housing conditions. This extension is required to enable the Corporation to disburse funds already committed.

THE SENATE

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Chesley W. Carter, for Senator Lamontagne, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1) and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Buckwold: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), I move third reading now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I will not be very long but I think it is necessary for me, and possibly for other senators, to say a few words at this time.

This morning the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science met to look into Bill C-124. The Honourable Robert Andras, Minister of Manpower and Immigration, was present as well as officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. They were questioned at length and it was obvious that this bill was required mainly because of miscalculation and bad judgment on the part of the government—bad judgment in the way it drafted the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and miscalculation when, on September 1 last, it could not foresee or, alternatively, closed its eyes to the fact that the fund would be exhausted very shortly.

Now, the remedy provided by this bill is not entirely satisfactory. That is quite obvious. It was made obvious by the minister himself, who agreed that there might be other ways to keep the expenses incurred under this act under the control of Parliament. It is also quite obvious, whatever the deficit is, that in the enforcement of the act, in the application of the act, in the payment of benefits provided by the act, Parliament will have to ratify ex post facto the expenses which will have been paid during a given calendar year of fiscal year. There is no requirement that the government submit estimates in advance. It may simply wait and see after the year is completed, three or four months after it has been able to make its calculations, and come before Parliament and say, "Well, we have spent half a billion dollars, a billion dollars, or two billion dollars more than we expected and we now ask Parliament to say that we did well."

I don't know what Parliament could do under those circumstances but to say yes. Therefore, I say that this bill in principle remains a bad bill.

But there was another point, of course: the necessity of not delaying the passage of this bill because some 125,000 people who are waiting for their cheques from the Unemployment Insurance Commission would not receive them on the day they were expecting them.

• (1410)

In this respect the press and radio carried the news today that the Senate was delaying passage of this bill and that some people might suffer because of that. Of course that was the thesis of the sponsor of the bill. But I must remind honourable senators, in order to clarify the situation, that on a previous occasion the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Drury, said that it was only after February 8—that is today—that there would be no more funds at the disposal of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. We were told this morning in committee that no cheques and no warrants were issued as of yesterday—the day the bill reached us. I am not too sure what the consequences will be of our passing this bill today instead of having passed it last night. In fact, there is ample proof that even if we had passed it last night it would have meant nothing, because when we adjourned last evening after second reading of this bill, the House of Commons had already adjourned, according to their rules, and was not to be reconvened until today. So, even if we had sat last night, as suggested by the chairman of the committee, and if we had come back at 11 o'clock to give third reading to the bill, royal assent could still not have been given last night.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Honourable senators, on a point of order, let me point out that this was not my intention at all. I did not seek to have the bill passed last night, because this is a matter that is not within my responsibility. My only suggestion was that we might make a start last night to study the bill in committee so that we might make progress for today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was not leveling an accusation against Senator Lamontagne. I was just explaining the timing in this course of events, and I think the facts have proven that I was right in suggesting that we had ample time to deal with this bill in committee this morning, since we started at 9 o'clock and completed our study of the bill before 11 o'clock. Therefore, honourable senators, for us to have come back last night would have been a useless exercise so far as the time element is concerned. I am simply trying to point out that even if we had done that, and even if the committee had sat, and even if we had given the bill third reading last night, royal assent could not have been given before today. So, in practice it makes no difference, and nobody can, in fairness, accuse the Senate of being responsible for the delay.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Not the Senate—a few senators.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, if they say a few senators only, of course, they speak of those who consider that the Senate has something to do, not like the honourable senator who thinks he has only to sit in his seat and approve everything that comes before us. There is a difference between that kind of senator and the type of which I am speaking.

Hon. Mr. Walker: He is a new boy. He doesn't know any better.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: He has the same style as many senators who think they have to approve, in advance, bills that come from the other place. In fact, if we did not want to delay the cheques we would have had to pass this bill two days ago. I suppose Senator Côté would have been prepared to do that. He does not care anyway.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: May I say a word?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh yes, certainly, with great pleasure, especially from my friend Senator Prowse. I would love to hear what he has to say at any time.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: No, this is just a question. Could the Leader of the Opposition tell us whether he feels the House has had adequate time to deal with the contents of the legislation which is presently before us?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have no judgment to pass on that except to say that if you want to engage in a debate as to whether the House should have debated this bill rather than the abolition of the death penalty, which has in fact been abolished for 10 years—

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Will the honourable Leader of the Opposition just answer the question and not go off into some other matter.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This was your question. You asked me whether the House had used sufficient time, or adequate time to deal with this bill. I am not going to pass judgment on what the House did as far as that is concerned. But the fact that the bill—

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Do not let him keep interrupting you.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not mind letting him interrupt us, or me, or anybody else. We have some other individuals such as this whom we have to give a chance to say stupid things occasionally. It is better that way. It takes less time when we let them speak their minds.

I did not want to attack the government. I wanted to defend the Senate. I wanted to justify the fact that we had spent a whole afternoon yesterday dealing with this matter, and to say that there was no justification for rushing the bill and trying to give it royal assent yesterday. That was my point. If the honourable member did not understand that, I am very sorry. But I can explain it to him out in the hallway after I have finished my speech. He probably would understand it better outside the chamber than inside.

I am not the only one to voice the grievance that the Senate is being pushed into passing bills in one day. I resent these accusations, especially when it does not create any real problem to the people involved by passing this bill today rather than yesterday. That is the point I wanted to make. We could not have given royal assent to this bill yesterday. It is going to be given today.

The Chairman of the Unemployment Insurance Commission indicated this morning that the commission had taken all precautions to arrange for the cheques to be put in the mail tonight at whatever time the bill received royal assent. That could not have been done last night. It means that the cheques were ready to be sent out, but, of course, the chairman would not acknowledge this. In any event, with the kind of service that the Post Office gives the Canadian public at this time, if there is a few hours' delay I do not think it should be charged against the Senate but rather against the Post Office. Again, as I said yesterday, if it requires a few hours' delay in the receipt of the cheques by the unemployed in order to allow the Senate to accomplish its duty as it should, I do not care and I will do it again.

• (1420)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I assure you that I will not be blackmailed; I will not be threatened nor will I accept the accusation of senators who say that members of the Opposition, and that includes Conservatives and others, are delaying the sending of cheques to the unemployed.

After all, there was mismanagement of the affairs of the House. Whether or not the House considered this bill in the length of time required, there remains the fact that the House spent a lot of time on other matters that were not at all urgent. The bill could have reached us much earlier, after receiving the same time and attention in the other place, and we would have had time to deal with it in a proper manner. We did not, but we did our best and that is all that can be asked of us. Anyone who would accuse the Opposition or the Senate of delaying this bill would be totally unfair.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Would the honourable senator permit one other question?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Would he tell us what information he has now that will enable him to vote for this bill—as he is apparently prepared to do—that he did not have yesterday?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The fact is that we were at least given an explanation by the minister in committee this morning. If the honourable senator didn't need any explanation, he is very fortunate. However, for the benefit of the rest of us the minister made a statement before the committee and gave explanations which permitted us to assess the situation much better than we could have done yesterday. In any event, last night it would have been the same thing as this morning, except that we were very tired, after a long sitting and a very difficult one, I must say. We did a better job this morning in committee, without delaying royal assent to the bill.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as the mover of this motion I should like to say just a word or two. First of all I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for defending the Senate. I want to state that in moving second reading of the bill I made it clear, early in my remarks, that I would not press for third reading. As far as I was concerned it was proper that it should go to a committee. As a matter of fact, that the committee did not meet last night was a matter of events rather than urgency, as we knew that royal assent could not have been achieved until today. Therefore, I wish to make it clear that all of us on this side of the house share the concern which the senators opposite have for the prestige of the Senate and the pressures put on it in this regard.

So far as the members of the other place are concerned, it is all well and good for the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate to suggest that they should not have been discussing capital punishment, but I would remind him that this unemployment insurance legislation was before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. In fact, it was bogged down in those committees, which had not reported to the House. We should make that very clear. Those committees had to bring their reports into the House.

I appreciate very much, as mover of the bill, the co-operation received this morning from members of the Opposition, who asked very searching questions and came away, I think, reasonably well satisfied. I hope that the house will now support the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the house adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 13, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before this question is put I should like to say that I am conscious of the fact that there is another piece of legislation presently under study in the other house which might come to us at any time. However, no one knows exactly when.

I understand there are some eight or nine votes to be taken in the other place, and it is unlikely that this financial bill will reach us before Monday. Therefore, in moving that the Senate adjourn until Tuesday evening, I do so with the proviso that should the bill pass in the other house before the weekend is over, we could be recalled on Monday at the request of Madam Speaker.

I want to make that point very clear before the motion is voted on. As far as today's program is concerned, it is intended to have royal assent at 5.45 this afternoon. After we have dealt with the business of the day, a motion will be made to adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.40 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not wish to quarrel with my good friend Senator Langlois. The motion is a reasonable one under the circumstances. But may I point out that even if the bill to which he has referred is passed by the House of Commons tomorrow, there would really be no justification for us to be here one day ahead of time. There is no particular urgency with respect to this bill. One day will not make any real difference. That may have been the case with Bill C-124, but there is no such urgency about this bill.

I do not mind coming back on Monday, if it is the judgment of Her Honour, in consultation with the Leader of the Government, that we do so. I am quite sure that Her Honour would not recall the Senate without consultation with and advice from the Leader of the Government. That is putting it mildly.

When a motion is made to adjourn, say, to a Tuesday, or whenever, the members of this house should normally expect that they will not be recalled simply because of a fancy on the part of the Leader of the Government, or because a bill has passed third reading in the other place. Unless such a bill requires immediate action by the Senate, I do not feel the Senate should be recalled immediately to deal with it. It should be dealt with in the normal course.

Both the Leader of the Government and Senator Langlois know that I have always been co-operative. I have never delayed any bill without valid reason. We granted leave to proceed with second reading of Bill C-124 yesterday, and we have granted leave to proceed with third reading today. It seems to me that the Senate should not be waiting to say, "Yes, yes, yes," every time a bill has passed through the other place. It is completely contrary to the dignity of this house to be here waiting and saying "Whenever you're ready, we're here to pass the bill." That is something I object to.

I leave the responsibility of these things to the Leader of the Government. My views are on record. No one can say that I agree with the policy that the Leader of the Government has been following for some years in this respect, which policy I feel is undignified.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have been taking careful notice of the remarks of my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, and without giving any commitment I can assure honourable senators that his remarks will be taken into consideration before any decision is made with respect to recalling the Senate on Monday.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that she had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

OTTAWA

8 February 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 8th of February, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary
to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I should like to know what channel of communication there is between the Senate and the Governor General's office? I have never seen anything that fast in my life.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: An improved mail service. A good mail service.

VIETNAM

CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENTS—CANADA'S ROLE IN INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF CONTROL AND SUPERVISION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Martin moved pursuant to notice:

That this House welcomes the conclusion of the Agreements on ending the War and restoring peace in Vietnam and notes the provision for an International Commission of Control and Supervision as part of the cease-fire arrangements, in which Canada has agreed to participate for the initial period of 60 days as provided for in the Note, dated January 27, 1973, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the four Parties to the Vietnam cease-fire.

He said: Honourable senators, I indicated to Senator Forsey the day before yesterday that it was my intention to place this resolution before the Senate for consideration. It will be recalled that a resolution in similar terms was placed before the other place by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. While the debate in the other place has not concluded, that does not, of course, prevent us from initiating a discussion ourselves; although I suspect, from conversations with my colleague this morning, that debate will not conclude in the other place until we have made some progress in our debate here.

I am sure we agree that this is a matter that should be discussed in Parliament, not that the executive has not the authority in the exercise of its responsibility for foreign affairs to take initiatives in this area, not that the executive is bound, before it takes such initiatives, to come to Parliament and say, "This is what we would like to do and we are now waiting for your approval," but because we believe that a matter of this importance is one that should be discussed in the two Houses of Parliament.

For eighteen years now, the world has been deeply involved in the war in Vietnam. No more tragic event in the last 25 years has taken place than this conflict. That it should now seemingly be on the point of being finally settled is a matter for great rejoicing. Certainly, because of the involvement proposed for Canada, we should be anxious to discuss that involvement, what it means, and what the policy of the government in connection with that involvement is.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced—and this is related to the commitment that we have accepted for a limited period—that the government had decided to recognize North Vietnam, the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

• (1440)

The Prime Minister had sent messages expressing his satisfaction, on behalf of the government, at the signing of the Paris agreements, to the Prime Minister of the Republic of Viet-Nam which Canada already recognized as the sole legal government of South Viet-Nam, and to the Premier of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

The message of the Premier of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, and Mr. Sharp's statement yesterday, incidentally, constitute our act of recognition of the government of the north. The effect of this decision is that Canada now accords equal status to the government of the Republic of Viet-Nam (RVN) and the government of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRVN). This should facilitate the work of our delegation to the new International Commission of Control and Supervision. It is referred to in the agreement and in the protocol that was tabled in the House of Commons.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday, it is not our intention, however, to establish diplomatic relations with either country; but there is no doubt in my mind—and this seems to have been widely accepted in the other place—that this act of recognition does give an opportunity to our personnel on the commission to discharge more effectively what could be their difficult responsibilities. We are the only country of the four members of the commission, who will have accorded recognition to the governments of both the North and the South.

Honourable senators know that the other members of the commission, in addition to Canada, are Hungary, Indonesia and Poland. The members of the former commission, three in number, were Canada, Poland and India. India is not a member of the new commission.

It will be recalled that on January 24 we had an exchange on the position that Canada was about to take with regard to the invitation to serve on the new commission. This exchange took place in this house on January 24, and it took place before the first group of observers to the new commission in Vietnam had left Canada.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator allow a question at this point? He has just said that Canada now recognizes the governments of both North Vietnam and South Viet-Nam. Are there other members of the commission which have recognized both governments?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have just indicated the position—perhaps Senator Connolly did not hear it—that we are the only country of the four which has accorded recognition to both North and South.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Did any other one of the four recognize either government?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, Hungary, Poland and Indonesia have recognized North Vietnam.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, it is important that we should understand the nature of the obligation which Canada has assumed, even on the temporary basis, as I will indicate.

Our assignment in this instance, and for a longer period if it should happen that we take on the obligation, is to observe and report on the implementation of the agreement to establish peace in Vietnam. That is the nature of the obligation. It is for that reason that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I, the other day in this house, explained that this is not in the customary sense a peacekeeping operation, any more than the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam established in 1954, along with India and Poland, was anything more than an observation group.

This particular commission, while it has peace objectives, is not the kind of body that was set up in Cyprus by the Security Council of the United Nations, or in Palestine in the case of the United Nations Emergency Force, again by the Security Council. These at least were paramilitary bodies. In the case of the force in Cyprus, it is still a paramilitary body; a body set up as a result of the initiative of Mr. Lester Pearson in 1956. That in Palestine was in every sense a military operation.

The particular commission on which we have been invited to serve is not a military operation at all. It is an observation commission. It is an institution set up to report, as I said, on the implementation of the agreement to establish peace in Vietnam.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

The personnel from our Department of External Affairs and from the Department of National Defence are already in Vietnam on behalf of the international community. They are there to report on the implementation of the cease-fire. Those who have been sent are now there for the non-military task of supervising the peace—which all of us hope will come soon and will remain unbroken in the days ahead.

The Minister of National Defence has indicated that other personnel will be in Vietnam within a few days. I think that they will be there some time around February 10.

Honourable senators, I say it is important that we should clearly understand that our role is not that of a peacekeeper in the sense in which peacekeeping has been understood in the many operations in which we participated under the auspices of the United Nations. As Mr. Sharp has indicated, neither are we there as the nominee or spokesman of any party, nor the spokesman of any one side in the struggle. This is a very important point.

I know that it was said, during the time when I was Secretary of State for External Affairs, between 1963 and 1968, that there were a number of occasions when Canada took part as a member of the international control and supervisory operation on behalf of another country. I have seen that statement implied even in the book Perspectives of the Presidency by the late President Johnson, when he wrote of the Seaborn mission which I authorized in 1964.

I want to make it clear that, while I do not intend to spend much time in proving my point because that will be done in the appropriate way and at the appropriate time, at no time between 1963 and 1968 did any representative of Canada on that commission have any authorization to act as anything but a member of the commission, discharging an internationally-accepted responsibility. Certainly at no time did any one from Canada act on instructions from any government other than the government of which he himself was the nominee. And I am sure that this applied from 1954 until 1963 as well.

If any member of the International Control Commission, set up as a result of the Geneva Agreement in 1954, did not comply with the letter of the "law" as stated in 1954 by Brigadier General Lett from Vancouver, who was the first Canadian representative on the commission, then that person acted contrary to authorization given him by the Government of Canada.

My knowledge of this situation is extensive, because from 1963 to 1968—and some of my colleagues of the government of that day who are now in this house can verify this—there were few matters that occupied my attention more than the utilization of Canadian representation in Indochina to bring about a cease-fire and some kind of peace arrangements in that tragic conflict.

I have heard it said likewise, with respect to the Ronning Mission, which was authorized by the government of Mr. Pearson—a mission that took this well-known and distinguished Canadian diplomat to Hanoi on two occasions—that Chester Ronning went there not as a spokesman of the Canadian government but as one carrying messages on behalf of the government of the United States. I want to make it clear that Chester Ronning went to Hanoi at the instance of the Canadian government. He conveyed information which, in the judgment of the Canadian government, was designed to try to encourage a cease-fire and a peace settlement. Anyone who knows of the background of Chester Ronning, a man born in China, a man whose views on the nature of the international system are well known, would never for a moment suggest that he could be used for any other purpose than that which I have stated.

Now, in the light of the government's experience in other peacekeeping operations, it has laid down four pre-conditions, for its participation in the commission. Those pre-conditions are worth recalling: first, that the conditions for the operation of the new organization should be workable and should offer real prospects of being effective; second, that the United States, the Republic of Viet-Nam the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the Viet Cong, should be bound by the agreement, the implementation of which the new commission would observe and report on; third, that there would be a continuing political authority which would assume responsibility for the settlement as a whole; and, fourth, that the proposed new international commission would have the freedom of movement and observation which it would require for the proper performance of its functions.

These four conditions were stated publicly for the first time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on January 5. They were reiterated by him when he spoke in Toronto on February 5, repeating that Canada was not prepared to accept an open-ended commitment.

Now, the reason for this caution must, I think, be clear. It is not because Canada does not want to accept its international responsibility. Rather it wants to do so under conditions that will make possible, in so far as can be foreseen, the success of the operation to which it is committing itself.

We have had much experience in this kind of operation. Not only have we been involved in the commission in Vietnam for 19 years, but we have been 19 years in Cambodia and Laos as well. This experience has often been referred to as a frustrating and an unsuccessful one. I must say that I do not share that view. I am now speaking personally, but I do not share the view that the experience has been a completely frustrating one. I feel that the commission did serve, from time to time, particularly at the beginning, a valuable purpose. Nevertheless, 19 years is a long time and human memory is short. Thus, many forget what has taken place over this period.

I believe that we were right in 1954 in accepting the responsibility which was extended to us. Together with Poland and India, as representatives of the nations of the world, we attempted to effect a cease-fire and, ultimately to bring about a peace, which, unfortunately, is only now before us.

The record is there to show that our foreign service officers and our military personnel have rendered a great service in the cause of peace, even though their efforts did not ultimately succeed. This service has become part of the Canadian international tradition, and has been now for many years, certainly since 1956. We participated in peacekeeping operations or peace observation missions such as that in Lebanon and the Kashmir in the hope of making some contribution to the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy.

But even in latter days, when the war in Vietnam was most bitterly raging, I would not personally draw the conclusion that the commission on which Canada then served was not a useful body. Undoubtedly it was a frustrating experience; undoubtedly as each campsite was closed in Vietnam, in Laos and in Cambodia, it became impossible fully to perform the task. But I can say that we had every intention, and, indeed, we hoped from 1965 on, in answer to an invitation extended to us and other nations by President Johnson, that the commission would be used as a means of bringing the parties together, as a means of encouraging, together with Poland and India, a cease-fire.

When we could not persuade Poland and India that the commission should be used to contact Hanoi and Saigon, for purposes of promoting peace talks, we used that contact ourselves. Canadian representatives on the three-state commission have maintained contacts from 1954 right up until this day with both sides, and for part of that time for this very purpose.

We thought that during the period from 1965 to 1968 in particular this contact would bring an opportunity for dialogue between Hanoi and Saigon, between the Canadian member of the commission on behalf of all the parties. We were invited by President Johnson, as were other countries, to do what we could to try to bring about a cease-fire arrangement, and the record, when it is exposed—and I certainly intend at the proper time to expose it—will show that the commission did serve a constructive and useful purpose. The fact that it did not succeed does not in any way destroy the potential usefulness of that mechanism, for the purpose I have mentioned.

Even if all the essential criteria that the government is laying down at the present time were met, except that which relates to the existence of what Mr. Sharp calls "a continuing political authority," we would nevertheless serve on the international commission for a period of only 60 days pending the formation of such a political authority. But if no such authority were established, or if, once established, it ceased to exist, Canada reserves the right to withdraw.

The point here, and it is an important one, is that when the commission was set up in the case of the 1954 Geneva accords, it was agreed that the two co-chairmen of that conference, the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom, would act as co-chairmen and the members of the commission would report to them. It proved not to be a very salutary arrangement, because the two co-chairmen felt they had to act together, and while there were occasions when the United Kingdom was prepared to act, it was not able to convince the Soviet Union that it should do so, and the result was that this "political authority" set up in 1954 was unable to bring about a cease-fire or a settlement.

Honourable senators, this time we hope that there will be a political authority. We have expressed the view that preferably it should be the Security Council of the United Nations. Toward the end of February there is to be an international conference in Paris for the purpose of elucidating these matters. At that time Canada, Hungary, Indonesia and Poland will be in attendance together with representatives of those parties that were engaged in the fighting.

We did not participate in the conference in 1954, but we did participate in the Laotian Conference in 1962. We were then, of course, functus officio members of the commission and on that account we were invited to the 1962 conference. But the Canadian Government hopes that at the conference to be held in Paris at the end of February there will be set up this political authority, this body to which the four members of the commission may report. It would be unjustifiable to set up a commission unless the body was able to report to some authority.

The presence of Secretary-General Waldheim as one of the participants in the conference justifies one in hoping that the political authority might well be some organ of the United Nations. I think, in retrospect, it is remarkable that the United Nations had no part whatsoever in the regrettable war in Vietnam. There was no more frustrating experience than to go to the United Nations, a body set up to try to provide collective security for the world, and find it had no authority with respect to the situation in Vietnam at all. Neither North Vietnam nor South Viet-Nam was a member of the organization, and China was not a member, and so we had the situation that the United Nations, designed to promote peace in the world, was unable to act because of constitutional inadequacies. That situation may be remedied this time by the presence of the Secretary General at the conference and may well determine the future course of the commission's operations.

When the cease-fire agreement was signed on January 27, Canada and the Canadian Government had to decide immediately whether or not to take part in the new international commission. We could have chosen not to participate, and by doing so we might well have blocked the way to a settlement. No one, I am sure, would want us to have done that. Instead, we decided to engage ourselves for 60 days and to fulfill our responsibilities to do all we could, not only in discharging our obligations as members but to further the cause of peace which all desire. We have now accepted a 60-day participation and we may accept a much longer participation after the conference in Paris. That remains to be seen. But our 60-day participation will allow us time to evaluate the situation, to see whether a continuing political authority is going to be provided, and to see whether there is sufficient goodwill to make the agreement work. There will certainly be need for goodwill between the parties because no peacekeeping operation, no peace observation group such as this one, can work unless there is goodwill between the parties.

We are now in Cyprus, and we have been there since 1964. We would not be there if it had not been for the agreement of the host country. We would not stay there unless it was clearly understood by the parties involved that we should. The same will be true in Vietnam.

[Hon. Mr. Martin.]

No one should expect this body of a few hundred people from four countries to be able to perform their function in Vietnam unless all of the parties involved in the fighting of yesterday are themselves prepared to see that the peace is kept. The parties of the ICCS will have to report on the extent to which the peace has been kept. They have solemnly committed their countries to do so.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Would the Leader of the Government permit me a question? I understand from the motion that Canada has agreed to participate for a period of 60 days. Are we the only country whose participation is limited to 60 days?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, that is the case. The other countries have put down some conditions, but they have not stipulated a condition such as this. I want to make it clear that this limitation in time does not mean that we do not recognize the value of the commission. We are aware of the frustrations that will be involved, and what will be said of the operation in years to come. We have, however, laid down four conditions which, if they are observed, will justify our accepting the heavy responsibility.

The machinery for the cease-fire is twofold. There are to be two joint military commissions known as the Four Party-Joint Military Commission, composed of the United States of America, the Republic of Viet-Nam, the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, and the Viet Cong; and a Two Party-Joint Military Commission made up of the Republic of Viet-Nam and the Viet Cong. These military commissions will interact with the ICCS on which we are now serving for this limited period, and in connection with which a longer period of consideration will be given in light of the respect or attention paid to our conditions.

While it is important to reiterate that neither the Canadian delegation to the ICCS, nor that commission as a whole, is a force to keep the peace, it is equally important to point out that the international commission cannot function at all unless the two joint military commissions demonstrate goodwill and unless they agree to function effectively with the ICCS.

I assume honourable senators have looked at the complicated agreement and the accompanying protocol. There are many complexities of the texts embodying the international observer arrangements and it appears that serious inadequacies for Canada remain in these documents. But, given the difficulties of the peace negotiations in Paris and elsewhere over a long period of time, and particularly during the past month, it will be understood how difficult it was to reach an accommodation that would bring about a cease-fire and, hopefully, a more lasting peace arrangement. However, it is important to note at this stage in our deliberation what these inadequacies are.

The agreements worked out in Paris do not by themselves provide for a continuing political authority, the kind of political authority that Mr. Sharp has laid down as one of our conditions. Perhaps it would have been impossible for the warring parties to have ended the fighting had they to agree on all political points beforehand. But the Government of Canada would have preferred it if both the agreement and the resulting supervision had come under the authority of the United Nations, the Secretary General, as I indicated earlier, acting as the continuing, political authority.

The agreement obligates unanimity on the part of the four members of the commission. As a result, there is a veto; but this is not a new arrangement. The international commission as a whole and each of its teams comprising representatives of the four nations involved must act as a single body.

Despite the expressed opposition to the principle, each of the four nations represented on the international commission is expected to pay not just the salaries and maintenance of their own personnel, but a fixed percentage of the commission's budget as well. I said at the beginning that in spite of the expressed opposition to this principle, the Canadian government has agreed to be responsible for the cost of its participation and to bear a small percentage cost of the expenses of the whole commission. This was the case with the supervisory commission set up in 1954. Mr. Sharp indicated his opposition to being called upon to pay for other than Canadian costs. However, he said, and I think rightly so, that we were not prepared to let our objection stand in the way of progress being made in so vital a matter.

Finally, speaking about inadequacies, no arrangements are foreseen for widening the cease-fire to include Cambodia and Laos. Nor does there seem any intention of having these countries participate in the international conference. It is the position of the Canadian government that the involvement of Asia in this whole matter is so slight as to cause us disappointment. However, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made it clear that our criticism of a very difficult task in Paris is not meant as criticism of the accomplishment to date. Rather it is to point to the enormity as well as the restrictions of the task undertaken in achieving a cease-fire. It is to lay bare the problems that can be foreseen. It is also an attempt to explain why total commitment cannot be undertaken by Canada at this time.

We are determined, as the Prime Minister said, not to be frustrated by the shortcomings that we see. We are doing everything to overcome these. We shall, whenever possible, open the doors of the commission to the public and allow its activities to be viewed. Nor shall we consider Canada in any way bound to keep privy its differences with other delegations on the commission. It will be at the end of the period of 60 days that we will form judgments which will determine our future course of action. On the basis of our evaluation at that time we will make decisions on continued participation. My colleague, Mr. Sharp, I think, has been candid in his discussion of this matter. He has said that the international observer arrangements are unpromising, and that no one should assume as a matter of course that continued Canadian participation will be forthcoming.

Honourable senators, this will not be the whole story. We will have to await the results of the conference in Paris before the government can decide upon the next course and, of course, it will always be open to Parliament to discuss decisions the executive has taken, but within the parameters of our conditions it seems to me that in this very vital situation in Asia the responsibility of Canada in the international system is evident. We signed the charter of the United Nations in 1945 because we believed that war was an anachronism. We believed that the time had come when war should no longer be an instrument of national policy. We have as a nation lived up honourably to our commitment. We have served in many peacekeeping operations, notably that proposed by Mr. Pearson in 1956, the United Nations observation group in Lebanon, the United Nations truce and supervisory organization now operating in Palestine, in Cyprus, Kashmir, and so on. We have done so because we believe that all nations have a responsibility to co-operate in building a peaceful world and eliminating the occasions of conflict.

We had nothing to do with bringing about the situation in Vietnam. We are involved there because we have been invited to serve in the cause of peace. We have accepted the responsibility to try to bring about a cease-fire, a responsibility that will occupy the minds of members of the two Houses of Parliament when consideration is given to the commitment for 60 days, and to the course that we will consider at the end of that period. I am also sure that Canadians generally are proud of the role of our foreign service officers and military personnel in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia over a period of 19 years. This was one of our first vital contacts with Asia and with troubled Indochina. The contributions that Canadians have made there is something of which we should all be proud.

I have the greatest confidence that in this difficult situation Canadians will again, given the right circumstances, accept an international responsibility as their way of asserting, through their foreign service officers and military personnel, that they believe the most effective way to maintain law and order in the world is not by the use of force, but by the employment of those methods which have kept order and peace in the domestic community.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would Senator O'Leary mind if I ask a question?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you very much. Honourable senators, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but simply to ask two questions of the Leader of the Government.

He indicated that the first observer group that Canada had in Indochina back in the 1950s was frustrated, part of the frustration arising from the fact that the United Nations could do nothing to help. Now it is proposed that some agency of the UN should be a continuing political authority to which the supervisory group, to which Canada has now attached itself, can report. How is this agency of the UN to assume authority? Is this going to arise out of agreement, or a hoped for agreement, to be concluded in Paris at the end of this month between the four belligerents, as well as the four members of the International Commission of Control and Supervision in Vietnam?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, at the conference in Paris there will be the four parties to the Paris agreement, the four members of the commission, and the Secretary General of the United Nations, together with representatives of certain other countries, such as the People's Republic of China. It is anticipated that as a result of the conference it will be agreed to set up an authority to which the commission may report. We have expressed the hope that that body might be the security council of the United Nations.

The conference may decide that it should not be the security council, but the Secretary General. In any event, we hope that there will be an authority, a body to which the commission can report.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In other words, it is to be done by agreement, if it is to be done at all?

Hon. Mr. Martin: By agreement.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is another question about which I wonder, and perhaps it is something that the Leader of the Government cannot reply to now. In addition to the control and supervisory group to which Canada is attached, Senator Martin said there are established in Vietnam two joint military commissions. Presumably these are what their name implies, namely, military bodies that are capable of taking military action. What is the relationship between the control and supervision commission and the two military commissions? To be more specific, are these military commissions policemen to whom the Canadians and the other three groups in the control and supervision commission can refer in the event of trouble between the belligerents?

• (1530)

Hon. Mr. Martin: Under the present arrangement there are two joint military commissions. If a disagreement concerning the implementation of the Paris agreement arises, it is presumed that these two bodies will go to the scene and attempt to resolve the violation, if possible. If they cannot settle the dispute, the matter is referred to the ICCS. But it should not be assumed for one moment that the military commissions will, against a reluctant party, be able to keep the peace. No one can keep the peace in a situation like this unless, as I said earlier, all parties want peace.

The military commissions will represent the four parties that participated in the Paris conference. They will have their own staff, but they will not be capable of using force as a means of correcting a situation. One could not have a peace force big enough to do that task, unless it became a belligerent itself. In the beginning the military commissions will be made up of representatives of the four parties participating in the Paris conference on Vietnam. It will be presumed that they have the approval of their respective authorities to take the necessary action under the agreement preliminary to the act of observation by the International Commission of Control and Supervision in the event that the dispute cannot be resolved.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps I may be allowed to ask one supplementary. Will these two military commissions act in every case on their own initiative, or at the instance of the supervisory commission?

Hon. Mr. Martin: They will act on their own. Just as the supervisory commission must agree, so must the military commissions agree. One cannot impose a condition on these people. The military commissions will represent the four parties. If they do not agree, it will be a case of frustration, a case of failure.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, I rise—

Hon. Mr. Aird: With the honourable senator's consent, I have one question that I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government. It is really an expression of opinion relating to the 60-day period. In the event that Canada should decide to withdraw within the 60-day period, and the other participating parties do not, such a step would be of significance, not only to Canada but to the world, and the 60-day period would seem to be unrealistic. I should like to have the opinion of the Leader of the Government as to its validity.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Aird knows, of course, that as a member of the government I can only express the opinion of the government itself on this matter. The four conditions which have been laid down in this instance are basically no different, except with regard to the 60-day period, from those laid down by Mr. Pearson in 1954.

It is true there was no control period at that time, but the situation that confronted the government on January 25 was certainly different from that which confronted us in 1954. The war was over. All of the parties were meeting in Geneva, arrangements had been made, and a proposal, new to the international community, was made—namely, that there should be an observation peace mission.

It is because of the frustrations and difficulties over a period of 19 years that the government, on this occasion, felt that unless we could be certain that there was going to be peace, with a minimum of running conflict, we would be embarking—as would other countries—on an action which could not hope to succeed. My view is that the 60-day experiment is a good one. It was a wise precaution laid down by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In Senator Aird's question there was implied a very important point. Assuming that at the end of the 60-day period Canada decided not to continue, what effect would it have on the instrument of the commission itself? He could have added, what effect would it have on the three other member states? I think we can look at that situation if and when it arises. My own view is that the conditions which Canada has laid down are sensible, and that they will be recognized as such by the members of the commission.

The parties are anxious that Canada should be a member of this commission, and there are strong reasons for believing that great attention is being paid to the four conditions we laid down.

Hon. Mr. Aird: I thank the Leader of the Government for his answer. The point I am making, obviously, is that in a situation of this kind there eventually becomes a leader. I suggest that in laying down this unique condition of 60 days, Canada may have put itself in the position, and taking the risk, of being the judge of the peace. That is the reason for my question.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am speaking longer than I had intended, but Senator Aird has suggested that there is a role of leadership here. In the particular situation that now confronts the commission in Saigon, I am sure we have all a sense of pride in the leadership shown already by our ambassador to Greece, Michel Gauvin, who is the first Canadian representative on the commission. I know that some members of this house know Michel Gauvin. He has been in our public service since 1945; he has had a distinguished war record, and is a citizen of Quebec. He has already emerged as a significant figure in the operation in Saigon.

As a friend of his, as one who had the responsibility of sending him to the Dominican Republic in 1965 to deal with the situation then existing there, and later, in 1966, to Africa, I have great confidence in the contribution he will make. I have similar confidence in the contribution of our foreign service officers and members of the Department of National Defence.

I am sure we are all anxious that Canada should contribute to this whole arrangement, if it is going to be the means of minimizing conflict. I do not think that I can state the situation or the position of the government any better than I have.

• (1540)

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Honourable senators, my motion to adjourn the debate seems to have failed rather miserably. I rise now on a question of privilege to ask if I could be given permission under the rules to withdraw my motion to adjourn?

When I made the motion I did not realize that Senator Forsey was in the chamber. I understood two or three days ago that he wished to speak on this question and he now desires to do so. If there is permission for me to withdraw my motion, I should like to have Senator Forsey take my place.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I am extremely grateful to Senator O'Leary for his courtesy. I do not propose to detain the house long. I could, I suppose, wait until Tuesday evening or later, but there were certain reasons which I felt made it desirable that I should speak this afternoon if at all possible.

I had some diffidence about asking Senator O'Leary to take the step he has, because I know he dislikes having two supporters of the government appear in succession. But I do not propose on this occasion to say anything that I think will be regarded as unduly partisan.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: We cannot always assume that you are always going to support the government.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I am grateful for that intervention, also.

Before I embark upon the substantive part of what I wanted to say, I should like to say how very much I have admired—and I think a great many other people have admired—the, in my view, extraordinarily able and comprehensive and judicious statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the other place and by the Leader of the Government here on this extraordinarily complicated and difficult problem. I should like also to say that I am sorry that more attention has not been paid in the public press, or perhaps elsewhere, to a magnificent, a superb speech on the Opposition side of the House of Commons by Mr. Gordon Fairweather. Those of us who know Mr. Fairweather and his work in Parliament were not surprised by the quality of that speech, but I think that even for Mr. Fairweather it was a particularly notable and particularly fine performance, and one that deserves to be read by every member of both houses, and to be taken into serious consideration by the government. It was a most comprehensive speech; it was a most positive speech; it was a most constructive speech. It was filled with statesmanship and good judgment.

The particular reason why I wanted to speak on this subject this afternoon arises out of certain remarks that were made in the other place about the sovereignty of Parliament. There seems to be some feeling that in the resolution presented in the other place by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—a resolution, I think, identical, or at all events nearly identical with that presented this afternoon by the Leader of the Government here—that in that statement there was insufficient regard for the rights and the sovereignty of Parliament. Two amendments were introduced for the purpose of remedying what the Opposition parties felt to be this omission

My own feeling is that the sovereignty of Parliament is not really in question here at all—in the resolution presented by the government in the other place and here. The sovereignty of Parliament is beyond doubt. It cannot be put in question. But it is necessary to be clear about the difference between the legislative and the executive powers. Parliament has no executive powers. Its power is explicitly, under the British North America Act, to "make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada," with the exceptions which follow. Neither house has any executive powers—in contrast, incidentally, to the American Senate, which, of course, has the power to ratify treaties and to approve appointments to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think certain other posts also; ambassadors, if I remember correctly. At any rate, it has certain executive powers which neither house here has.

Parliament, especially the House of Commons, has, of course, power over the executive. But that is another matter. Parliament can advise, instruct, and limit the executive, both by statute and also by resolution. The House of Commons can remove the government, or force it to appeal to the people of the country. But Parliament cannot, and the House of Commons cannot, perform executive functions. That is not only a matter of the law of the Constitution. It is a matter of sheer common sense. It is obviously impossible for a large body like even one of the two houses to perform executive functions.

The power of Parliament to advise, to limit, to instruct, can be exercised even in matters of foreign policy. There is ample precedent for that. I have on my desk here Todd's Parliamentary Government in England, in which there are a series of references to motions of that kind proposed, and in some instances carried, in the British Parliament over a very long period. I can give the exact page references, if anybody wants them. There is no question about this power of Parliament, or of either house, to instruct, to advise, to limit. But, especially in foreign policy, that power, I think, must be exercised with peculiar care.

The executive has, and must have, information which is not at the disposal of Parliament, and which cannot be at the disposal of Parliament. There is certain secret information which comes to the executive which cannot, at least at the time when it comes, be disclosed to Parliament without imperilling good relations between nations.

Unquestionably, also, immediate action may sometimes be called for in matters of foreign policy where it is utterly impossible to get the prior approval of either House of Parliament, let alone both houses, in order for the executive to act with the necessary speed. Parliament should, of course, be given all possible information and every possible opportunity to discuss these questions. But fundamentally Parliament and the House of Commons must trust the executive to carry on foreign policy, subject to the controls already noted.

That brings me to one specific consideration. If you are going to lay it down that the executive can only move with the prior approval of Parliament or of one house in these matters, you are faced with the fact that Parliament may not be in session when some crisis arises; that Parliament may not even be in existence. It is perfectly possible that a crisis may arise after the dissolution of Parliament has taken place and before a new Parliament can legally meet. A period of two months may elapse between the dissolution of one Parliament and the earliest moment at which a new Parliament can meet, and one cannot say that during a period like that—at least, it seems to me one cannot, in common sense—say that during a period like that the executive government of the country must be in a state of total paralysis in any particular matter of foreign affairs. It may have to act and have to act immediately, not only for the good of the country but even for the good of the international comity.

Sometimes the action that may be required may have to be taken in a matter of hours. It is easy to say that Parliament can be recalled quickly, but hardly quickly enough for that, even with modern means of communication and transportation.

That brings me to the two amendments to the resolution which were proposed in the House of Commons on February 1. And I venture to say that in the light of the considerations I have just been setting out, and especially in the present circumstances when a fresh election might take place in this country in the very near future—I hope it will not, but it might—both those amendments were ill-judged. I sympathize with the intent of the proposers of both amendments, but I still think they were ill-judged.

The second amendment, to my mind, which called for prior approval of the other place for withdrawal from the International Commission of Control and Supervision, is particularly ill-judged, because the government might find at a given moment that the Canadian personnel of the commission were in imminent danger of death, and it would be absolutely essential to get them out of there in a matter of hours, almost a matter of minutes. Indeed, we have foreseen this by placing a Canadian naval vessel in the waters off the coast of Indochina, if I am correctly informed, for the express purpose of removing our personnel in case of great danger. It seems to me completely impossible for the government to have to say, "Oh well, we cannot get these people off. It is true they may be massacred at any minute, but we cannot get them off because we have to take the matter to the House of Commons and get a prior resolution of the House of Commons permitting us to do so." If, of course, the other place had for the time being ceased to exist because of a dissolution, the case would be particularly absurd.

I sympathize with the desire of both Opposition parties in the other place to make sure that Parliament is adequately informed, and that Canada is not committed to some vast undertaking of unknown proportions which might blossom like the American intervention in Vietnam. But our very limited undertaking there now is, in my judgment, in no way comparable to the kind of wide open, open-ended intervention in which the United States engaged in Vietnam, which developed into the awful situation we are all familiar with. Ours is a carefully limited intervention, limited by a series of conditions, and in those circumstances it seems to me that the amendments presented by the Opposition parties in the other place were, as I said a moment ago, ill-judged. I might perhaps be tempted to use a somewhat stronger term, but I think that is sufficient.

I think the legitimate purposes which both amendments had in mind can better be served by other means, and that the two amendments that were proposed could seriously interfere with immediate and necessary action by the government to withdraw our participants from the International Commission of Control and Supervision, and could also interfere with a possible action by the government to continue our participation at a time when it would be impossible to consult either House of Parliament because Parliament had ceased for the time being to exist.

I wanted to make those few points clear about the constitutional position in this matter, because I think it is unfortunate that there should be misunderstanding on the subject, and unfortunate that questions should have been raised in the other place on the basis of what seems to me a fundamental misunderstanding of the working of our constitutional arrangements.

On motion of Senator O'Leary, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 13 at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 13, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

MR. PAUL KEATING—MEMBER OF AUSTRALIAN PARLIAMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I should like to direct the attention of honourable senators to the presence in the gallery of a young and distinguished parliamentarian from Australia, Mr. Paul Keating, who recently headed the delegation of his country at a meeting of Commonwealth ministers at Lusaka, Zambia. We are honoured to have him within our precincts this evening, and we extend to him a very warm welcome.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of Permits issued under the authority of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 8(5) of the Immigration Act, chapter I-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Revised Capital Budget of the Northern Transportation Company Limited for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1972-1866, dated August 25, 1972, approving same.

Capital and Operating Budgets of the Canadian National Railways for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 37(2) of the Canadian National Railways Act, chapter C-10, and section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1972-1865, dated August 25, 1972, approving same.

Revised Capital Budget of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1972, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-138, dated January 18, 1973, approving same.

Report of the Department of Communications for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of Communications Act, chapter C-24, R.S.C., 1970.

25862—15

First Annual Report of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology covering the period from the formation of the Ministry in the latter half of 1971 to March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 22 of the Ministries and Ministers of State Act, part IV of chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1965

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Allister Grosart presented Bill S-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965 (Yukon and Northwest Territories Senate representation).

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Grosart moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

INTRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the government leader whether it is his intention to convince the government to introduce some legislation first in the Senate as was done in former years. It seems to me that most of the time we are waiting for the other place to pass legislation, and perhaps it would be helpful on some occasions if we dealt with it first.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Senator Grosart has done that tonight.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not a government bill. I suggest to Senator Argue there is quite a difference.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That was just to fill the gap.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that this is a desirable practice. However, most of the bills that have passed consideration by the Cabinet and are now available are money bills, but I do hope that if bills that are within our jurisdiction become available they will be presented here.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Yes, like capital punishment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The pilotage bill was not a money bill, in any event. That bill came to us as a surprise in the absence of the Leader of the Government.

SENATE CHAMBER

SEATING PLAN

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I notice there are a number of visitors here this evening who are apparently using the same Senate seating plan that I have in my hand. In view of the fact that at least 50 per cent of the plan that I have is inaccurate, I suggest we discontinue using it. We only cause confusion and misunderstanding to visitors, and, for that matter, to new senators, who are endeavouring to ascertain which senator is speaking.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is 70 per cent inaccurate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand there will be a new plan issued, but it is not printed yet. Rather than give nothing to people in the gallery and those who visit the Senate chamber we thought it better to give them the old one and tell them it is not up to date.

I might say that I had a large group here today who were delighted to have this guide because of the information it contained, even though the seating plan is inaccurate. So I think it is still quite valuable.

VIETNAM

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 8, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Martin, that this House welcomes the conclusion of the Agreements on ending the War and restoring peace in Vietnam and notes the provision for an International Commission of Control and Supervision as part of the cease-fire arrangements, in which Canada has agreed to participate for the initial period of 60 days as provided for in the Note, dated January 27, 1973, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the four Parties to the Vietnam cease-fire.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I certainly do not intend to waste the time of the house in a long discussion of what is a fait accompli, nor do I intend to debate with my old friend, Senator Forsey, the matter of whether the government should have the authority of Parliament if or when it decides that after 60 days, certain circumstances existing, our observers should be called home.

In this day and age no one challenges the supremacy of Parliament. Some may try to abuse it, some to escape it, but it stands nevertheless as the rock foundation of our system, something we must ever believe, assert and affirm. But in our world, our world being what it is, there remains a question of balance, and that balance we must strike between Parliament's supremacy and the duties and problems which beset an administration in a turbulent and rapidly changing world. Unfortunately, events have a way of not waiting, so I would agree with Senator Forsey that, in the not unlikely event of hostilities being renewed between North and South in Vietnam and those hostilities perhaps endangering the lives of our observers, then the government should not wait for Parliament's authority before trying to save those lives. I think that should be self-evident to any reasonable person, regardless of party. I think any sensible person in this country, or any party in this country, would want something like that to happen. That is what I mean by balance, but what I think should have happened and what I think could have happened is that when the government agreed, or decided, to send observers to Vietnam it should have come to Parliament, announced its decision there, and got the feel of Parliament about it.

In Canada today under the existing government set-up we have too much government by television. Too much government by television, announcement of policies, defence of policies, lead to public misunderstanding and confusion and, God knows, there is enough confusion already about the place of Parliament, about its supremacy and how it should operate.

We hear again and again of Parliament's ratification of treaties. Honourable senators, there is no such thing as Parliament ratifying treaties. The word ratification is not even used when Parliament approves treaties. Parliament consents to treaties. It can approve treaties and it could, with possibly dangerous consequences, reject treaties, but the fact is that Parliament does not ratify treaties. As I said, the word "ratification", used so often, is not even used in the documents, whatever they are, in approval by Parliament. This is understandable. We could and perhaps we should reject certain treaties, but that rejection, the world again being what it is, could be fraught with dangerous consequences. My complaint is concerned with the government rushing to television to announce and to defend—almost to apologize—for sending a mission to Vietnam.

This mission has been described again and again as a peacekeeping mission, and that, honourable senators, is utter nonsense. We have not sent a peacekeeping mission to Vietnam, and responsible ministers of the Crown should not be going around the country leading the public to believe that this is what we have done. If you read the press, or a large section of the press, if you watch TV or listen to radio, it is hardly possible to escape the belief that we have sent to Vietnam some kind of peacekeeping mission, yet we have done nothing of the kind.

What we are doing, and all we are doing, is sending a group of reporters to Vietnam. Why some of them have been put in uniform, under the command of a major general, God only knows. We had the spectacle of His Excellency the Governor General, the Prime Minister, and the Minister of National Defence going to Montreal to see these people off. That in itself was a misleading thing.

Why on earth should the Minister of National Defence be there when we are merely sending to Vietnam a body of observers? These are good people. These are dedicated people. I have nothing against them. But it is sheer nonsense for the press to have made all this fuss about the thing. You would almost think we were sending forces to Vietnam to take on the Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese single-handed. This is absurd. Even the other day, the Leader of the Government in this house, in the brief statement he made, used the term peacekeeping. He said "other peacekeeping missions," and in the context of what he was saying this could mean only one thing, that this too was a peacekeeping mission. My honorable friend is looking at me as if he doubted this but, unless it has been deleted from Hansard, it is there, and he can find it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I said it was not a peacekeeping mission, and Senator Grosart took issue with me and said it was. I said it was a peace observation group.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: You also spoke of other peacekeeping missions. What other peacekeeping missions were there? This must have been a peacekeeping mission too. Surely, no one understands the English language better than you do, and in the context of your speech when you said "other peacekeeping missions" you must have meant that this was a peacekeeping mission too.

But that was not the worst. Last week the Minister of National Defence, in the House of Commons, told how proud he was to be sending fighting men out of Canada, not to fight but to stop the fighting. That, honourable senators, is what Mr. Churchill once called a terminological inexactitude—and worse; it was a dangerous abuse of words, and utter nonsense. These men are not being sent to Vietnam to stop the fighting. They could no more stop the fighting there than I and my Belfast friend, Senator Thompson, could stop the fighting in Belfast if they sent us over there tomorrow. Why on earth are we losing our perspective?

Hon. Mr. Côté: You would start another war.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: If I valued my friend's opinions I would want to reply to them, but I don't. I shall not be bothered by interruptions of that kind.

They have given the impression all over this country, causing misunderstanding and confusion, that we are sending to Vietnam a peacekeeping mission, and we are sending nothing of the kind. We are sending observers and reporters, and, as I said before, I don't know why in heaven's name we should have put them in uniform with a major general commanding them. This is utter nonsense, and this is the sort of thing that goes on when you have government by television. It is getting now that you can't turn on your TV set without seeing Mr. Mitchell Sharp explaining or defending or condoning, with a sort of a guilt complex, what we are doing in respect of this thing.

I resent that sort of thing. As a journalist I believe there should be some responsibility in journalism. But how can you expect that when responsibility, exactitude, and respect for words are violated day after day by members of the Cabinet.

There is something else. We are told that if things do not go as we expect or hope them to go in Vietnam, we are going to ask our people there to pick up their marbles and come home. That again, honourable senators, is humbug. Our men are not coming home in 60 days, and no one knows it better than the Leader of the Government in this house.

What has happened in the past? I remember six years ago the then Leader of the Government in this house, Senator John J. Connolly, announced that we were sending a peacekeeping mission to Cyprus, and it was a peacekeeping mission in that case. I asked him at that time if other countries were sending forces to Cyprus and he said, and I think quite properly, that he was not in a position to say whether they were. I think he was right. But the fact is that very few other countries sent people to Cyprus. Now six years later our force is still there. They are advertized as a United Nations force, and that again is humbug. They are not a United Nations force. They are Canadian soldiers paid by Canada, their pensions are paid by Canada, and not one nickel is contributed to the support of that force by the United Nations. It is a Canadian force. When people talk about that bankrupt organization, the United Nations, having a force in Cyprus they are just talking nonsense.

So I do not believe these people are going to come back in 60 days. I am sure they will not come back so soon. I call as witness to that a very able commentator, whom I am sure my friend the Leader of the Government is familiar with, Mr. Mark Gayn. Mr. Gayn is in Saigon at the present time. He wrote a dispatch for the Toronto Star. He is a journalist of world renown. This man ranks with Sulzberger and James Reston of the New York Times. He wrote on Saturday a dispatch from Saigon, and I propose to put it on Hansard:

> Now and then, ever so subtly, Canada reminds her Hungarian, Polish and Indonesian partners on the observer force that she is committed to stay here for only 60 days. After that, she wants to take a fresh look, and if she does not like what she sees, she will leave.

He goes on to say:

> The very idea of that shocks the Indonesians, but the Hungarians and Poles take it lightly. Wise in the ways of politics, they think Ottawa cannot be serious. The fact is that there is no easy way out of the observer force.
> They know that, unless there is a total breakdown of the cease-fire, Canada will stay on, endure the frustrations, bear the costs and find excuses to offer to the electorate.

And then he says:

> Indeed, the whole notion of reassessment after the first 60 days may have been thought up primarily to still the doubts at home. There were the memories of two decades of wasted effort by the old International Control Commission, and all across the land editorials urged the government either to stay out of the peacekeeping venture or at least to look carefully before going in.
> The government did the manful thing.

I do not know if that is the right word.

> It said it would go in, but look at the whole enterprise again around May Day.
> If it was in earnest when it made that pledge, it does not understand the world in which we live. This is a time of colossal re-alignments, and for Canada to insist that she will do her own thing while the world is swept along by the new tide is, to put it mildly, naive.

• (2030)

> Is this an exaggeration? Try to visualize what might well be the picture around May 1. The fighting has largely died down, but there is a political struggle for every hamlet in the south. Saigon is determined to hold all it has . . .
> This will be peace at 60 per cent, something similar to what happened in 1954 after the French retreated from Indo-China . . .
> Will Ottawa say that 60 per cent is not good enough, that the venture is futile in the long run, and announce it is bringing its men back home?

> It is easy to imagine what would happen then: powerful pressure from Washington, and perhaps from other western nations, to reconsider; the charge that Canada was sabotaging the peace. The editorial writers will begin to say that the government cannot shirk its responsibilities, and that if it does, we had better get a new one.
> One is almost tempted to agree—

And this is Mr. Gayn.

> —with the Poles, Hungarians and sundry cynics who insist that Ottawa never meant its 60-day pledge to be taken seriously.

I do not believe that in 30 days, 60 days, or twice 60 days, the Canadian forces, or the Canadian mission, now in Vietnam will be on their way back to Canada. This has not happened in the other engagements we have made around the world.

I now want to say something that I know is not in the hearts of those who sit around me. I am afraid I will be in disagreement with most of my colleagues, with my party, and I want to insist that I am speaking solely for myself in saying that so far as I am concerned I would not have sent that mission to Vietnam. This country, this land of ours, is distressed and oppressed by manifold problems, by problems that are bearing upon our nation and undermining its morale. Seventy-five per cent of our people over 65 years of age live in poverty in this land of so-called plenty. These are things that exist in our own country, and these are things to which we should be addressing ourselves. Yet we are sending people all over the world to oversee the conduct of others. We, like our American friends, who have more power to do it than we have, are trying to regulate the behaviour of mankind all over the world, and that is nonsense. We shall make precious little contribution to setting the world's house in order unless we first show some capacity to set our own house in order.

I would not send those people to Vietnam. If the United States and other nations wanted somebody to observe and report upon what is going on in Vietnam, why did they not ask Japan? Why did they not ask some other nation with more prestige and more military power than we have? Why come to us? "Oh," they say, "You have great experience in keeping peace all over the world." What is that experience? Have we kept peace in Cyprus?

We had a conflict between two NATO countries, and the only people who should have interfered with them was a NATO nation. There were two NATO countries at each other's throats. Who better to interfere with members of NATO than members of NATO? But they did not. So we have had troops for six years in Cyprus, at a cost of many, many millions of dollars—not a nickel paid by United Nations—and they are not coming home after six years, and perhaps they will not be home in six years more.

This is not the part this country should play. Our part is to try to do something for the gain and benefit of our own people. If we do that, if we can show the world we know how to govern our own country, how to improve the well-being of our own people—if we can set an example of that kind—we will be doing more for peace in the world than by sending so-called observers all over the universe to see how people are behaving.

[Hon. Mr. O'Leary.]

I do not believe these people will do good in Vietnam. I think it is beyond their capacity to do something good, and I think that we are merely ministering to our national vanity, to a small, parochial, chauvinistic vanity, by accepting these offers to send people here, there and everywhere in the world.

Honourable senators, I have spoken for too long—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: —and I have perhaps said more than I should have said, but I would be very sorry to have said less.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Grosart for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the March 31, 1973.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —you will be sorry to have applauded me, because I do not intend to speak long. Of course, I never do.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When I moved the adjournment of this debate on February 7, I mentioned that I thought the report should not be adopted until some questions put by senators in committee had received answers. That was my main purpose in adjourning the debate. I find at this time that what I would like to say would be much more appropriate when we have the appropriation bill. The play on words is accidental.

The only comment that I will make, therefore, is that out of the nearly $1,300 million called for in the estimates, some 90 per cent, as was mentioned by the President of the Treasury Board, relates to relief of unemployment or the creation of jobs. In other words, this is a program which was initiated by the government after the election of October 30 and because of the result of that election.

We have first the Winter Works Fund of $350 million. As everyone knows, Mr. Trudeau's administration has always thought that winter works programs were not efficient. Now they find that such programs might be efficient. Out of this $350 million, of course, only about $60 million to $75 million can be spent during the present winter season. I doubt that even this amount will be spent. I intend to deal with some of the technical problems involved in this appropriation when we have the bill.

• (2040)

The next item is the advances to the Unemployment Insurance Commission of $454 million. We dealt with that to some extent when we passed the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act removing the $800 million ceiling for advances by the Minister of Finance to the fund. So I need not go back over that.

Local initiatives and on-the-job training involves $304 million. Well, the government had some doubts about this but again the results of the election convinced the government that they had to go on with these programs on an ad hoc basis, or daily basis. We will see what the result of that is when the time comes.

The rest of the items are less important.

My comments would be more properly directed to the bill and the fact that some of these programs should not be proceeded with through an appropriation bill. But since the committee was only dealing with the estimates, or supplementary estimates, it was only necessary for the committee to look at the substance of the items involved and the purposes that the government had in mind. I will leave the subject at this point because I think practically everything has been said that can be said about it. My remarks will be more relevant when the appropriation bill reaches us.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in my capacity as Deputy Chairman of the National Finance Committee, I moved the adoption of this report on Wednesday, February 7. The report contains reference to questions asked in committee that were answered by the minister and officials. Comment was subsequently made in this chamber about some other questions asked in committee, the answers to which were not forthcoming at that time. There was a good reason for that. Those were questions in depth and in detail which the officials were not in a position to answer. However, as I indicated on February 7, the officals undertook to provide the answers as soon as possible. If I may say so, although there has been a delay of almost a week, I want to compliment the officials on their effort in providing the answers.

I should like to read the questions to indicate the scope of the committee's inquiry under the chairmanship of Senator Everett. I do this because the Senate, to a great degree, relies on the work of the Finance Committee in examining the estimates. As a matter of fact, we do have a resolution which requires that the estimates go to the Finance Committee before the appropriation bill based on those estimates will be considered by the Senate.

Honourable senators have in the past indicated how important it is that the assessment of the estimates and supplementary estimates be thorough. For that reason I would ask that the replies that have now been provided by the Treasury Board, together with the questions, be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The Senate having consented to this, I should now like to read the questions to demonstrate the probing that goes on in that committee. The questions were asked by Senators Argue, Carter and Phillips, all of whom have received copies of the answers. They are as follows:

QUESTION: What is the maximum payment per farmer?

QUESTION: For the grants to compensate commercial Atlantic Salmon fishermen for loss of income resulting from closure of the fishery, what is the breakdown by province of how these grants will be distributed?

QUESTION: Are the balance of farmers claiming grants for crop losses due to adverse weather being held up in proving a 60 per cent loss for the year?

QUESTION: Are farmers not eligible to apply under the $1.6 million program of contributions for the cost of transportation of fodder and silage until May of this year?

QUESTION: What form of proof of purchases must farmers present when applying under the $1.6 million program of contributions for the cost of transportation of fodder and silage?

QUESTION: With respect to the grants to compensate commercial Atlantic salmon fishermen for loss of income resulting from closure of the fishery, what percentage of the fishermen have received payments?

QUESTION: Have all the provinces signed agreements to participate in the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program?

QUESTION: What percentage of the $350 million in the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program is it estimated will be forgiven?

QUESTION: If one province does not assume its full share of allotment of the Winter Capital Projects Fund, how then can this be allotted to another province?

QUESTION: Under what terms and conditions are the grain hopper cars leased to the railways?

QUESTION: Have there been any changes in the conditions or regulations for approval of Local Initiative projects this year as opposed to last year?

QUESTION: What percentage of Local Initiatives Programs have been rejected by the provinces?

QUESTION: What form of auditing is being used for LIP projects this year?

QUESTION: Are the rates of training and travelling allowances for the adult occupational training the same all across Canada?

QUESTION: How are the directors appointed for the Metropolitan Area Growth Investments Limited?

QUESTION: Concerning the loan to the Northern Transportation Company Limited for the purchase of a number of barges: 1. Were tenders called for the barges in question? 2. Were they built in Canada, using Canadian materials?

QUESTION: What percentage of the supplementary estimates for each pilotage authority was accounted for by contracts concluded by legal advisers?

Honourable senators, those questions, and the answers, by consent of the Senate, will appear as an appendix in today's Hansard.

(For text of questions and answers see Appendix, pp. 235-237.)

Report adopted.

FREIGHT RATES AND NEW TECHNOLOGY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 6, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), who adjourned this debate, may I have leave to resume it in his place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Carter speak in place of Senator Fournier?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, transportation has an impact, a very serious impact, on the life of every Canadian in every part of Canada. Senator Cameron is, therefore, to be highly commended for bringing this resolution before us at this time because it enables the Senate to debate, and focus attention on, a matter of great public importance to all Canadians. This enables the Senate to perform a natural function, and at the same time render a service to the nation.

As Senator Cameron has pointed out, transportation controls the mobility of every Canadian and, therefore, his opportunity of seeing other parts of his country, and of getting to know and understand better the lives, problems and contributions of fellow Canadians of different backgrounds and traditions, living in different parts of this vast land of ours—the third largest in the world. Thus transportation is in a very real sense linked up with national unity.

It also influences the cost of everything the Canadian needs for his personal comfort and well-being, and therefore it affects both his standard of living and the general prosperity of the area in which he lives. Nowhere is this more true than in my own province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

From the very beginning the whole vision and promise of the benefits of Confederation have centered on transportation. In 1867 the Maritime provinces were relatively more prosperous than Upper and Lower Canada, because they controlled their own economies and particularly their transportation links with the world at large, especially with their great markets to the south. One of the inducements, perhaps the deciding factor, which caused them to join with Quebec and Ontario to form the Dominion of Canada was the promise of a railway to provide access for Maritime products to the markets of Central Canada.

Students of Canadian history know that years passed—ten years I believe—before any attempt was made to keep that promise, and then the route chosen for that railway was selected on the basis of military needs rather than the requirements of Maritime trade and commerce. As a result, the Maritime provinces became captive markets, economic colonies, of central Canada and have remained so ever since. They merely exchanged one form of colonialism for a worse one.

Some attempts have been made to remedy the situation by subsidies and maritime freight rate differentials, but these have never worked because the rate structures are based on wrong concepts of industrial strategy which have concentrated industry and population in central Canada at the expense of the other parts of Canada, in both the east and the west.

The railways east of Quebec built for military rather than for commercial purposes were never economically viable and as they went bankrupt, one by one, they were taken over or incorporated into the CNR system, and to the extent that the CNR is burdened with the debt structure of those old defunct railways, the Maritime provinces and Newfoundland are still suffering the consequences.

In the West the story is very similar. British Columbia was promised a railway connection with Central Canada as one of the terms of union. It was only when British Columbia threatened to secede some ten years later that action was taken on this promise but, when completed, the transcontinental railway system became the main physical instrument of connecting all the provinces of Canada and binding them together as a nation.

At the same time, because of a wrong industrial strategy to which I have referred, it also became a source of tension and division because it diverted the flow of trade from its natural north and south direction to an unnatural east and west direction, and the Western provinces, like those of the Maritimes, were transformed into economic colonies of Central Canada.

These stresses and strains led to a general discontent which seems to have come to a head in Western Canada, so much so that the question being asked most often today is not, "What does Quebec want?" but, "What does the West want?"

The answer has not been long in coming. It has been given most often and most eloquently on a number of occasions by Izzy Asper, leader of the Liberal Party in Manitoba. In positive terms they simply want economic justice. They want to be equal partners in Confederation instead of being economic colonies of Central Canada. And that, honourable senators, is exactly what the Maritime provinces and Newfoundland also want.

Our complaints and our grievances are identical with those of Western Canada and are equally valid. They do not want freight rates heavily biased in favour of Central Canada—neither do we. They do not want to pay up to $200 more for a Canadian-made car than a person living in Toronto has to pay. They do not want to pay $100 more for a colour television set made in Canada than a similar set would cost in the United States simply because of tariff protection of Central Canadian industry—neither do we in the Maritimes and Newfoundland.

They no longer want to suffer the economic handicaps and discrimination of banking and financial institutions centralized in Toronto and Montreal—neither do we. The figures speak for themselves. The Bank of Canada Review for November 1972 shows that in the second quarter—that is, the summer quarter—of 1972 the country's chartered banks loaned $583 million to business in Quebec; $849 million to business in Ontario. In Manitoba they loaned only $103 million; in Saskatchewan even less—only $80 million; in Nova Scotia, $74 million; in New Brunswick, $54 million; and in Newfoundland, only $27 million.

The Western provinces are voicing their grievances—they are coming in loud and clear—and the Maritime provinces must do the same. Ottawa is listening. Already the Prime Minister has held one conference with the Western leaders, and it is understood that more are to follow.

It would seem then that this is the time for the Eastern premiers and party leaders to request a similar conference with the Prime Minister to make known our problems and grievances. The Western provinces are quite rightly sick and tired of getting the short end of the stick, and so are we. They are kicking up their heels a bit and making a noise, and they are being heard. The Maritime provinces and Newfoundland should follow their example, and do it now while the iron is hot—otherwise we could very well end up with an even shorter piece of the stick than we have had in the past.

Honourable senators, what I have said so far is by way of background. Other senators better qualified than I can elaborate on the transportation problems of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. My main purpose this evening is to put before you the situation in my own province, Newfoundland and Labrador.

All the handicaps and disadvantages of our present transportation policy and transportation system that exist in the three Maritime provinces apply to a much greater degree in Newfoundland and Labrador. There are three simple reasons for this. The first is that we are geographically some 650 miles farther east at the very end of the railway system. The second reason is because the Newfoundland part of our province is an island, and there has to be a sea connection between the eastern CNR terminal in Nova Scotia and the western terminal in Newfoundland. This necessitates extra handling and delay.

The third reason is because the huge area of Labrador, comprising some 110,000 square miles, has no rail or road connection with the rest of the province. Sea connection with coastal Labrador is limited to approximately five and a half months, from early June to late November. During the rest of the year the shore is blocked with ice. Consequently the people of Labrador are heavily dependent on air traffic which adds greatly to their cost of living.

Prior to becoming part of Canada, Newfoundland as a completely self-governing country had access to world markets. Our flour and dairy products came mostly from Canada. Our salt beef and pork came mainly from the United States, and manufactured goods and other products came mainly from Europe, except electrical appliances which were imported from the United States. These goods were brought by ship to St. John's, the main distributing centre for the province. From St. John's the bulk of these goods was distributed to outlying coastal communities by smaller boats—some owned privately, others owned by the railway system—leaving only the inland towns to be served by rail. Transportation costs were relatively cheap, but prices were high because the Newfoundland government was so heavily dependent on customs tariffs as a source of revenue.

When Newfoundland joined Canada, one of the anticipated blessings was a reduction in the cost of living, and there was great disappointment when this failed to materialize. There were three reasons for this.

In the first place, instead of being able to purchase freely in the world markets as heretofore, Canadian tariffs compelled us to become a captive market of Central Canada. Everything that formerly was brought from the four corners of the earth by sea now came from Ontario and Quebec by rail to North Sydney in Nova Scotia. There it was unloaded from rail cars and put in the holds of ships to be taken 90 miles across the Cabot Strait to Port aux Basques in Newfoundland, where it was taken out of the ships and placed in sheds. Those goods were then taken from the sheds and loaded into narrow gauge rail cars to be hauled 547 miles across Newfoundland to St. John's or Argentia, where once again they were taken out of the rail cars and put into sheds from which they were loaded into the holds of coastal boats for distribution along the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador.

The second reason was that the CNR system itself proved to be totally inadequate to handle the volume of goods formerly brought in by sea and now coming from Central Canada by rail. Consequently, there were long delays in getting those goods to the Nova Scotia terminal at North Sydney, and huge backlogs piled up there because there were not sufficient ships to transport the goods to the terminal at Port aux Basques. The delays ran into weeks and even into months, particularly during the spring when the Cabot Strait is blocked with ice.

The third reason was because the Newfoundland railway system which was meant only to serve the inland communities, and which had been practically worn out carrying war supplies now proved totally inadequate for carrying the extra burden of goods coming from mainland Canada for the coastal communities. Consequently, huge backlogs piled up in the sheds at both Port aux Basques and St. John's, as well as at North Sydney. Because of all the handling involved, a large proportion of goods became lost, stolen or damaged.

Due to tariff protection, the initial purchase prices in Central Canada were some 30 to 40 per cent higher than world market prices. When we add to this the high CNR freight tariffs, the costly delays and the extra cost of lost and damaged goods, it is easy to understand why our cost of living went up instead of down when Newfoundland became a part of Canada.

This is a very serious handicap because while we are compelled to buy 90 per cent of our requirements from Ontario and Quebec, they purchase next to nothing from us. The bulk of Newfoundland products—fish, paper, pulp, minerals—are all sold outside Canada. Like those of the Western provinces, our products too have to compete in the world market and the high cost of living is part of our cost of production.

The increase in our cost of living, forced upon us by an inadequate transportation policy, together with tariff policies and a freight rates policy geared to the requirements of Central Canada, makes it that much more difficult for us to meet world competition. In fact, we can do so only by taking a proportionately lower margin of profit on our products which, in turn, means lower wages, a lower standard of living, and in some cases higher welfare.

It would not be fair to create the impression that no attempt has been made to remedy this situation. As far as freight is concerned, much has been done. The roadbed and rails in Newfoundland have been upgraded and improved. More freight cars have been provided. Diesel engines have replaced steam. Additional boats have been provided to ferry goods from North Sydney to Port aux Basques. These include rail ferries carrying wide gauge cars and containers which are transferred to narrow gauge trolleys at Port aux Basques. But still it has not been sufficient to keep pace with the growth in volume. Backlogs still pile up at North Sydney and long, costly delays still persist while freight rates keep going still higher and higher.

Once, when I was a member of the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, I remember asking the late Donald Gordon, then the CNR president, why the charge for moving a certain commodity in Ontario was so much lower than the charge for moving the same commodity the same distance in the Maritime provinces. His reply was simple. The railway in Ontario had to meet competition from the truckers. Ontario at that time had a fairly extensive network of very good roads. Competition from truckers was considerable, particularly in those high priced, low volume items which are considered the cream of the freight traffic. In the Maritimes at that time there was no network of good quality roads, and truck competition was negligible, consequently the freight rates were higher. As the Scripture says, "To them that hath shall be given."

While still dealing with freight, a word must be said about the CNR express service. Time was when a parcel was shipped express, you could count on receiving it rather quickly. Today the express service exists in name only. You can still ship a parcel by express. You are still charged express rates, but that parcel travels by freight and it may be in the shed a day or two before anyone takes the trouble to ship it at all. It may also arrive two or three days before anyone gets around to notifying you about it.

Last summer a parcel that I needed very urgently was shipped to me at Halifax from Port aux Basques. It took a month to arrive. I found that this is not an isolated case. It is regular practice. Naturally I expected to receive that parcel within a week at most. I found it took a week to get from Port aux Basques to North Sydney—a six-hour crossing—and three weeks from North Sydney to Halifax. The express agent at Halifax was completely unconcerned about it, and regarded the service as normal. The CNR express service as it operates today is completely dishonest. It amounts to obtaining money under false pretences.

With respect to rail passengers, although more and larger ships including car ferries have been placed on the Cabot Strait service, and the frequency of crossings has been increased, there are still not enough to cope with the demand, particularly during the tourist season. Last year reservations for cars and berths were abandoned, and passengers were treated on the first-come first-served basis.

Within the province, the rail passenger service was continuously downgraded, and finally abandoned altogether and replaced by a bus service. Now, it must be said that the bus service is quicker. The bus leaves Port aux Basques at 8.00 a.m. and gets you to St. John's at 10.00 p.m. the same day—that is in the summertime. In winter it is a different story. In winter buses have gone off the roads and stuck in snowdrifts for hours, sometimes being completely lost without anybody knowing where they were. It is a miracle that as yet no lives have been lost. There have already been some very near misses. When one considers that the Trans-Canada Highway between Port aux Basques and St. John's was built only to minimal standards, and that motorcar registration has increased from 94,600 in 1965, when the highway was completed, to 144,627 last year, it is understandable that the probability of serious accidents will increase every year from congestion alone. To these figures must be added the tourist cars and trailers coming into the province, which have increased from 14,051 in 1965 to 44,568 in 1972, so that total motor vehicle traffic has increased over 80 per cent since the Newfoundland highway was completed.

However, apart from the safety factor, there is the question of comfort. I travelled on the CN bus once from Port aux Basques to St. John's. I would never do it again. The problems of women with very small children, the hardships imposed on the young, the sick and the aged are indescribable. For short distances of 100 to 150 miles, it is perhaps tolerable. For long distances of over 600 miles, over Newfoundland roads and under winter conditions, it is not only intolerable but unjustifiable in terms of dollars saved. To save dollars at the expense of human safety, suffering and misery, is in my opinion immoral, but that is not all. The substitution of buses for passenger rail cars has relegated Newfoundlanders to the status of second-class citizens.

Apart from buses, the CNR operates small passenger ships between communities located on the Newfoundland and Labrador coastlines. Hardly any of the Labrador coastal communities are connected by road, and during the shipping season these fishing settlements are completely dependent upon the coastal service for freight and transportation. The frequency of this service still leaves very much to be desired.

On the island of Newfoundland, as more outports are linked up by road, the CNR coastal service is withdrawn. During winter and spring, when these roads are impassable, those communities are as isolated as they were 50 years ago. In recent years, as Canadian National coastal boats grow old and are taken out of service, they have not been replaced. It is easy to see that the CNR plans to abandon the service altogether as soon as possible.

The coastal ships now in service, built around 15 years ago, though a little faster are much smaller than those they replaced. The result is terrible congestion. Last summer I planned to visit a part of my old riding, Burin-Burgeo, which is still accessible only by sea. I tried to make reservations but could not. I boarded the ship at a terminal half way along the coast, and not only was it impossible to get a berth or a place to lie down and rest but it was impossible to find a place even to sit down.

In 1949, when I was first elected, Newfoundlanders forced to travel on coastal boats were treated like cattle. I have personally seen old ladies sitting out on the open deck on their suitcases exposed to the wind, snow and rain and the salt spray because every sheltered place on the ship was occupied.

I have seen these same old people, some of them sick, manhandled down over the side of the ship to a small tender to be rowed in the worst kind of weather to a cove where they had to clamber up over the rocks to get ashore. I have seen the same old people landed on the ice, and forced to travel miles in a howling snowstorm to get to their homes. That was over 20 years ago. Today, except that the ships are a little more modern, there is not a great deal of difference.

Honourable senators, it is easy to point the finger at the Canadian National Railway for this sorry state of affairs, but the real blame rests with the federal government. Ownership of the Newfoundland railway service and the Newfoundland coastal service is not vested in the CNR but in the Canadian government. The CNR is only the operating agent. If the Government of Canada wants to provide a better transportation service for Newfoundland, all they have to do is to order the CNR to do it, and provide the money to purchase the necessary equipment.

Air Canada service to and from Newfoundland is not too bad, but still below the standards provided to other provinces. In recent years there has seemed to be a general deterioration of Air Canada service all across Canada. Schedules are unreliable, meals are not as good as they used to be, and stewardesses seem to be more preoccupied with selling booze than with feeding and looking after the comfort of the passengers.

Last December my wife and I travelled from Ottawa via Toronto to Los Angeles and back by Air Canada. I wish I had time to describe our in-flight experiences on that trip, our connections at Toronto, and the confusion of trying to find our baggage and getting through customs on our return. It is unbelievable. I do not know whether a new airport is really needed at Pickering, but certainly something needs to be done to improve the situation at Malton.

So much for the problems. What about the solutions? Solutions are long-term propositions. They cannot be worked out overnight. In the meantime, short-term remedies must be replied.

With respect to freight transportation in Newfoundland, our most immediate needs are two more large rail car ferries for the Cabot Strait, and at least two more heavy icebreakers. More icebreaker service must be provided even if a user fee has to be charged. At present we have three large cargo ships stuck in the ice in Labrador harbours, and they will have to stay there all winter as it is impossible to get them out until the ice breaks up in May or June.

We need also a fast air freight service to take our fresh fish to mainland markets on a daily schedule at reasonable rates. We have proved that the markets are there. Special air transportation is required to exploit them.

With respect to passengers, we need immediately more car ferries on the Cabot Strait, and much more passenger accommodation on those ferries. For winter travelling in Newfoundland, a much improved rail passenger service should be reinstated. Plans should be made to extend the rail passenger service on a year-round basis.

Even if the bus service is to be operated only during the summer months, for the sake of safety a new Trans-Canada Highway, double the width of the present one, is needed, and, for the sake of comfort, new and much more comfortable buses than heretofore. For the coastal service, we need several more ships with a vastly increased number of staterooms, berths, and other types of passenger accommodation.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Would the honourable senator repeat his proposal regarding road transportation? Did he suggest that there should be another Trans-Canada Highway in his province?

Hon. Mr. Carter: The present one will have to be doubled in width to accommodate the traffic, which has almost doubled since it was completed.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Everywhere?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Across the island, yes. I do not know what the honourable senator means by "everywhere." There is only one highway, that connects one end of the island to the other. One cannot get from one end of the island to the other without using that highway.

For the long term—

Hon. Mr. Rowe: The honourable senator mentioned upgrading the bus service. Does not the solution lie rather in the rebuilding of the railway bed on a wide gauge basis and the restoration of a railway passenger service? I wonder if he would give his opinion on that.

Hon. Mr. Carter: I am coming to that. Whatever is done to the rail bed, the Trans-Canada Highway has to be improved and widened.

For the long term, not only is a new type of policy required, but that policy must be based on a new and different philosophy—the philosophy of equal opportunity for all Canadians as set forth in the Throne Speech. Equal opportunity for all Canadians includes equal economic opportunity, and in terms of transportation policy that means equalization of freight rates.

This new principle will have to be applied within a framework which takes into account certain limitations imposed by the need to conserve land and energy, to minimize pollution, and to utilize the benefits of new technology. No longer can we afford, with reckless abandon, to cover up good productive land with tarmac for airplanes, with asphalt for highways and parking, as we have done in the past. The diesel engine may have to be greatly modified or even replaced because of its high pollution characteristics. More emphasis will have to be placed on rail transportation for both goods and people; first, because it is the most economical means of transportation and, secondly, it is necessary in order to minimize the use of airports for inter-city travel. As Senator Cameron pointed out last Tuesday, the technology for moving large numbers of people safely, rapidly and comfortably by rail is already available and in use in some countries at present. Hovercraft and other air cushion vehicles may be used to transport passengers and cargo in certain areas, particularly in the North.

The different means of transportation—railways, airlines, trucks, buses, et cetera—will have to be integrated into a coherent whole, so that each can make the greatest contribution to the maximum efficiency of the other, and at the same time contribute to the most efficient use of the St. Lawrence Seaway. The new system should be designed so that the seaway and rail systems contribute to the development of our northern ports such as Port Churchill, and of transshipment ports such as Bay D'Espoir and Mortier Bay in Newfoundland.

Conflict of jurisdiction may arise between the provinces and the federal government concerning trucks and buses, but it should be possible to iron those out to the benefit of all. Certainly the federal government must take the lead in providing communication links with the more isolated parts of Canada, particularly our northern regions.

Within that broad framework the provinces will have to develop their own integrated transportation policies inside their own boundaries. In Newfoundland we started out with a railway and coastal service designed for an era when St. John's was the main distributing centre for the whole province, when 90 per cent of our products came from overseas to St. John's by sea, and the bulk of our products were shipped out the same way. During the past 23 years we have tried to adapt that system to meet a completely reversed situation in which 90 per cent of our imports come from Central Canada over the CNR system. It has not worked. For the future we need a completely new transportation system designed to meet these new conditions, and designed also to minimize hauling time and distance by bringing freight and passengers to a central point for distribution.

We need a completely new wide-gauge rail system and the reinstatement of rail passenger service. The present Trans-Canada Highway needs to be widened or twinned to double its present width, and we urgently need some kind of all-weather surface transportation to link Labrador with the island part of our province. This means crossing the Strait of Belle Isle by bridge, tunnel, or some other means such as air cushion vehicles.

The coastal service, too, needs to be greatly improved with larger ships or hovercraft. In addition, our airports need to be greatly enlarged and improved so that Air Canada's service can be upgraded. At present we have no all-weather landing systems and no covered walks between planes and terminals. Small airports are also needed at strategic places so that local airlines can develop, with Air Canada becoming the main trunk line.

However, with all these improvements, unless freight rates are equalized our economic growth will remain terribly handicapped and equal opportunity for all Canadians will become an empty hollow phrase.

On motion of Senator Cameron, for Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

NEED FOR REFORM—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of the Honourable Senator Croll:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the urgent public need in Canada for Senate reform now.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, if I may beg your indulgence, I have had any number of senators ask me during the day if I intended to go on this evening with this inquiry standing in my name, and I have said no. However, I think that is not a good enough answer. Debate on Senate reform is a serious matter because the Senate is assessing the Senate. I think it is the first time we have ever attempted to do that. It needs the attention and concern not only of the public but of the Senate also.

With the budget being presented on Tuesday next and the debate on it lasting for a week, and the devaluation of the dollar and all the implications arising out of that, I feel that my timing is not very good. In view of that I thought I would put the inquiry off for a week, but, in effect, I do not think it will be proceeded with until February 27.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

1972-73 SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE (A)—REPLIES TO QUESTIONS ASKED OF TREASURY BOARD REPRESENTATIVES AT THE MEETING OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE, FEBRUARY 6, 1973

SENATOR ARGUE—concerning Vote 15a for the Department of Agriculture.

QUESTION: What is the maximum payment per farmer?

REPLY: The maximum grant is $400 to farmers in designated areas that have experienced crop losses due to adverse weather. This is the same maximum as applied to other provinces under similar conditions.

SENATOR CARTER—concerning Vote 20a for the Department of the Environment.

QUESTION: For the grants to compensate commercial Atlantic Salmon fishermen for loss of income resulting from closure of the fishery, what is the breakdown by province of how these grants will be distributed?

REPLY: The full 1972-73 program for commercial Atlantic Salmon fishermen provides approximately $2.9 million. Of this amount, $1.3 million consists of grants to compensate for loss of income and $1.6 million is for the purchase of gear, vessels, etc., which are no longer of use to the fishermen. Expenditures to date under the full program break down by province on a percentage basis as follows:

New Brunswick	66.4%
Quebec	18.3%
Newfoundland	14.4%
Nova Scotia	.9%

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Vote 15a for the Department of Agriculture.

QUESTION: Are the balance of farmers claiming grants for crop losses due to adverse weather being held up in proving a 60% loss for the year?

REPLY: To determine "designated areas" for crop loss assistance, the criterion used was that, for the area, 1972 crops were 60% or less of normal crops. Designated areas have been determined, using this criterion. To make an application, a farmer within a designated area must receive over 50% of his normal income from agriculture.

QUESTION: Are farmers not eligible to apply under the $1.6 million program of contributions for the cost of transportation of fodder and silage until May of this year?

REPLY: Applications may be received with respect to:

1. Silage and hay delivered between July 1, 1972 and May 1, 1973;

2. Roughage delivered between August 24, 1972 and May 1, 1973.

Applications may be made as transportation costs are incurred. Some payments already have been made.

QUESTION: What form of proof of purchases must farmers present when applying under the $1.6 million program of contributions for the cost of transportation of fodder and silage?

REPLY: Farmers must produce original copies of bills of sale or invoices and receipts of purchases indicating name and address of seller, location of farm, number of tons, the mileage and date moved to the purchaser's farm, and a bill of lading if transported by a commercial carrier. The farmer is required to complete an application form, which must be countersigned by the Agriculture representative in the area.

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Vote 20a for the Department of the Environment.

QUESTION: With respect to the grants to compensate commercial Atlantic Salmon fishermen for loss of income resulting from closure of the fishery, what percentage of fishermen have received payments?

REPLY: Virtually 100% of the fishermen claiming compensation for losses arising out of the closure of the Atlantic Salmon fishery have received at least partial payments.

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Vote L12a for the Department of Finance.

QUESTION: Have all the provinces signed agreements to participate in the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program?

REPLY: No agreements have yet been signed, although five provinces have indicated official acceptance of the proposal (Nfld., N.S., N.B., P.E.I. and Quebec) and all provinces are expected to participate.

QUESTION: What percentage of the $350 million in the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program is it estimated will be forgiven?

REPLY: It is estimated that $120 million of the $350 million will be forgiven.

QUESTION: If one province does not assume its full share or allotment of the Winter Capital Projects Fund, how then can this be allotted to another province?

REPLY: Provinces must declare their intent to the Minister of Finance. If one province does not assume its full share or allotment of the Winter Capital Projects Fund, the Minister of Finance could reallocate the unused portion to another province at his discretion, based on need, employment rate, demand etc.

25862—16½

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Vote 30a for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

QUESTION: Under what terms and conditions are the grain hopper cars leased to the railways?

REPLY: The cars are operating under an interim agreement while final terms and conditions are being worked out with the railways.

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Votes 5a and 10a for the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

QUESTION: Have there been any changes in the conditions or regulations for approval of Local Initiative programs this year as opposed to last year?

REPLY: The changes in regulations from last year are as follows:

1. Hiring must be done through referrals of local Canada Manpower Centres and preference must be given to persons on unemployment insurance or other social assistance.

2. In the assessment of projects, higher priority is being given to services to communities rather than task oriented services such as public works.

3. All projects affecting other social costs such as funding from provinces would not be approved without clearance by the provinces.

QUESTION: What percentage of Local Initiative programs have been rejected by the provinces?

REPLY: The responsible department advises that the coordinator appointed by each province will review all projects approved by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in the province. The provincial coordinator may register objections with the LIP coordinator. However, final approval or rejection rests with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and it therefore is not possible to determine which projects were rejected because of objections raised by the provinces.

QUESTION: What form of auditing is being used for LIP projects this year?

REPLY: The auditing process for LIP is in three phases this year:

Phase 1—Visit to each project, except municipal undertakings, to determine if the financial records are in good order.

Phase 2—Interim audit of selected projects. Any projects which were questionable in Phase 1 will receive the interim audit.

Phase 3—Final audit of selected projects. The selection process will involve three parts:

a) All projects over a certain dollar amount will be audited. The dollar figure has not yet been specified.

b) As a result of the interim audits, questionable projects will be reviewed.

c) Additional projects will be selected on a sample basis.

QUESTION: Are the rates of training and travelling allowances for the adult occupational training the same all across Canada?

REPLY: There are two categories of allowances:

1. Basic allowance—This category of allowance relates to a payment to housewives and young people who are being fully supported, but who would incur additional costs related to training. The minimum allowance for this class of expenditure is $30 per week. It was introduced in July, 1972 as a result of an amendment to the Adult Occupational Training Act. This type of allowance permitted the Department of Manpower and Immigration to train dependent adults, whereas previously they were not included in the program.

2. Regular allowance—For the normal adult who is dependent on his own means, the regular allowance will apply. These allowances will have increased because of a requirement in the act that the regular allowance rate minimum and maximum adjust annually in relation to the change in the average wages in manufacturing for the past year. The minimum would generally relate to single persons with no dependents. Between the minimum and the maximum, changes are a matter of departmental policy but adjustments are made in much the same manner.

The basic allowance of $30 per week and the minimum level of the regular allowance are the same across Canada. There are minor variations across Canada in allowances related to dependents.

Because travelling allowances are based on costs incurred, there would be an escalation factor related to the rise in costs of these services. Therefore there would have been some increase in travelling allowances, but the application is standard across Canada.

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Votes L31a and L32a for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

QUESTION: How are the directors appointed for the Metropolitan Area Growth Investments Limited?

REPLY: Seven directors will be appointed, four by the Minister of Development of Nova Scotia and two by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The seventh will be appointed jointly by the Minister of Development of Nova Scotia and by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Upon their recommendation the seventh director will become President of the Corporation and Chairman of the Board. Upon the constitution of the Board, the Directors become independent of the respective Ministers and assume a relation comparable to that of Directors to shareholders. The shares are divided in the following way: 14,999 to Nova Scotia, 5,001 to the federal government.

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Vote L110a for the Department of Transport.

QUESTION: Concerning the loan to the Northern Transportation Company Limited for the purchase of a number of barges:

1. Were tenders called for the barges in question?

2. Were they built in Canada, using Canadian materials?

REPLY: Tenders have been called for the construction of the barges, to be built in Canada using Canadian materials.

SENATOR PHILLIPS—concerning Votes 65a, 85a, 90a and 115a for the Department of Transport.

QUESTION: What percentage of the supplementary estimates for each pilotage authority was accounted for by contracts concluded with legal advisers?

REPLY: The Minister of Transport advises that these supplementary estimates were requested to cover the operating cash shortfall during the month of January, 1973. Cash payment to legal advisers for the same period, as a percentage of the supplementary funds, were:

Atlantic Pilotage Authority	1.0%
Laurentian Pilotage Authority	4.4%
Pacific Pilotage Authority	6.1%
Great Lakes Pilotage Authority Ltd.	NIL

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH THE EXPANDED EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

Hon. John B. Aird, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon Canadian relations with the expanded European Communities.
> That the said committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the foregoing purposes, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of travelling and living expenses, if required, in such amount as the committee may determine; and
> That the papers and evidence received and taken on the said subject in the preceding session be referred to the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), it is moved by Honourable Senator Aird, seconded by Honourable Senator Molgat, that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Explain.

Hon. Mr. Aird: Honourable senators, in presenting this motion for your consideration I would like to make several observations, and I will endeavour to be brief.

Firstly, we have witnessed in the past few days an attack on the American dollar and its subsequent 10 per cent devaluation. Tough trading measures are being rumoured in Washington to which Europe may well react defensively. Obviously, this type of trade confrontation between economic power blocs, which is so full of dangers for Canada, no longer is a remote possibility. I believe it is very much at hand.

Honourable senators, while it was important to us last year to undertake an examination of the expanded European Community, it is self-evident that it is even more important at the present time.

Secondly, preliminary trade figures for last year's performance showed a disturbing downward trend in relation to EEC trade. Canada had a deficit—and I would emphasize the word "deficit"—of $30 million with the original six EEC countries in 1972 as compared to a surplus of $169 million in 1971. This comes at a time when EEC trade with the rest of the world was expanding. Clearly we should examine more fully why Canada's trade balance with the EEC seems to be shrinking instead of growing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask Senator Aird if it is not a fact that in the last two years our trade with the Community has doubled as compared with the consequential shrinkage of our trade with the United Kingdom?

Hon. Mr. Aird: I would not be able to confirm that it has doubled, Senator Martin. What I am talking about is the net position. Certainly there is a relative factor as between the EEC and the United Kingdom, but I am not sure it is a doubling multiple.

My third point is that in the past year the Community has concluded important trade arrangements with a wide range of countries. This will undoubtedly adversely affect Canadian exports in the short as well as in the long term. Now, obviously there is no benefit to Canada in confrontation with Europe. Our attitude must be one of co-operation. Nevertheless, Canada must protect its own legitimate economic and trading interests and remind the Community of its responsibilities under GATT.

Perhaps most fundamental, and I would emphasize this, Canada must do all it can to ensure that the growth of this new large power bloc does not lead to its confrontation with the United States and Japan, with obviously disastrous results for Canada.

• (1410)

Honourable senators, I am glad to have had this opportunity to briefly outline some of the reasons why the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs wishes to continue its study of Canada's relations with the expanded European Economic Community. Our study of this subject was important enough last year, but current worldwide factors are so much in play between the constituent elements that go to make up the world trading situation that we in Canada must be very aware of and have a hard look at what is going on in the European Common Market. It is with these remarks that I commend this motion for your consideration.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, might I ask Senator Aird a question? We are, of course, delighted that you have done this, but, why was this not done by the government—I know it is not your responsibility—one or two years ago? When I was last at NATO and we went to see these Common Market people, and the other people in Brussels, they wanted to know then what was Canada doing about its association with the Common Market. Why is it left until now, when things have reached a serious impasse?

Hon. Mr. Aird: That question, perhaps, might be more properly directed to Senator Martin.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I know he will answer anyway.

Hon. Mr. Aird: I am not just sure which one of us would give a better answer. However, I would say in reply to your question that this will be a great opportunity for the Senate in its committee function. Governments do move slowly. I assume that, as a former cabinet minister, you are well aware of that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Especially the present government.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Better late than never.

Hon. Mr. Aird: I do not wish to be too optimistic as to when the committee will complete its study, but I would like to have a target date of June. I would hope that we could give form and substance and, in effect, an agenda for government action. Hopefully, some degree of attention will be paid to the report. With respect to the committee's two previous reports on the Caribbean and on the Pacific Rim, I have expressed to this house, and others have agreed with me, some measure of disappointment at the Government's action on our various recommendations and advice. On the other hand, some things were done. Perhaps the developing bloc situation in the world today, while I do not like to say it is of crisis dimensions, will be self-evident and the necessity for action will be manifest.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I do not wish to engage in a confrontation with my classmate of many years ago, Senator Walker.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I do not mind.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do, because I would come out second best.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We all know that.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I always know when to choose my opponents, but I should have thought—and I hope Senator Aird will not think that this is taking unfair advantage of him—that the reply he might well have made to Senator Walker was twofold. First of all, the motion that Senator Aird is making is a motion on behalf of a Senate committee and not on behalf of the government. Secondly, he could have pointed out—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You are not suggesting he has not received your blessing?

Hon. Mr. Martin: —that he is engaged in a study which was begun over a year ago. So the Senate itself is not dealing with the problem of the Common Market for the first time. This is a study which Senator Aird, along with members of the committee, undertook to prosecute over a year ago. All he is doing now is seeking authority for the work of this committee to resume.

As he was told when the Secretary of State for External Affairs appeared before the committee—I think February a year ago—the government welcomes the study being made by the Senate into our relations with the Common Market.

Senator Aird was quite right in saying to Senator Walker, as a distinguished member of a former administration, that the government is concerned with Britain's proposal to join the Common Market; and he will remember the very vigorous discussions that the then Minister of Finance, his friend and my friend, Donald Fleming, and the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Hees, had at Accra. As to the consequences of their outburst in Accra, I know that Senator Walker would not want to make any comment at this time, any more than I would. What was expressed at that time is undoubtedly in our minds today. We recognize that the entry of the United Kingdom into the Common Market is an important development for Britain, a development which in principle we approve. In the short term we may suffer as a result of Britain's entry, but in the long term the possibility of sharing in this large European market will give us an opportunity of balancing our interests there with our interests in our greatest market, that of the United States.

I had asked Senator Aird a question. I may have been wrong in saying the last two years, but from my recollection of the statistics, in 1971—and possibly 1972, but certainly in 1970 and 1971—our exports to the Common Market increased, if they did not double, and they increased on a much more accelerated scale than did our exports to the United Kingdom. So that while we have reasons for wanting to scrutinize our relations with the Common Market, we should not take an absolutely pessimistic view that the long-term value to us will not be a useful one.

In any event, I am sure we all agree that this study by Senator Aird's committee into our relations with the Common Market is a timely and important one. It is not being thought of for the first time today; it was thought of over a year ago.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: May I ask a question of the government leader? He spoke about increased exports to the Common Market. Is he able to tell us what character of goods, what class of goods, we have been exporting to the Common Market?

Hon. Mr. Martin: We have increased our exports—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: What class?

Hon. Mr. Martin: —of timber, some minerals—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: Unfinished goods.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I don't know. They may be unfinished goods, but I cannot give the honourable senator particulars, except to say that I know we have increased our exports to the Common Market at a rate much greater than we thought would be the case three or four years ago.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary: They have been unfinished goods. It is they and not the United States that are making us hewers of wood and drawers of water.

• (1420)

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, that is a generalization. It may or may not mean anything.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Senator Aird, in introducing this motion, spoke of a possible confrontation between large trading blocs and the kind of worldwide crisis that we are in today. It would seem to me that Canada may be in an exceedingly favourable position because of certain developments in the last few days. Our currency has gone down along with the currency of the United States, and if it remains at the same level as it is today, then, of course, we will get a very substantial increased advantage in the export markets.

Also, if the Japanese currency is floated, it seems to me, it will increase in value. This, too, should result in putting Canada in a still more favourable position. We can talk of crisis; we can talk of difficulties; we can talk of large trading blocs, but to me a strong prosperous European Economic Community—European Common Market—means that Canada, with its dollar value as it is today, is likely to be in a more favourable position as events unfold.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I should be interested to know if the Leader of the Government shares the view expressed by Senator Argue that this consequential devaluation of the Canadian dollar is a good thing. I recall hearing some speeches in 1962 by Senator Martin that would have been in disagreement with this philosophy.

Hon. Mr. Martin: If the Leader of the Opposition is interested in my discarded opinions, that is his privilege. However, I should like to read carefully what Senator Argue said before I comment on it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have so many discarded opinions, we are liable to get lost if we try to compile and index them.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Let us not lose our tempers.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, with the greatest respect to our learned leader who talks about what a nice position we were in in 1971, it is my understanding that the reason for the urgency in proceeding with the deliberations of this committee, as given by Senator Aird, is that the position has materially depreciated and that we are in a very serious, adverse trade balance. Is that not correct, Senator Aird?

Hon. Mr. Aird: That is correct, Senator Walker. That was my second point. We have gone from a surplus to a deficit position.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes, exactly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I understood that Senator Aird was simply moving for the resumption of this committee which was set up a year ago.

Hon. Mr. Aird: That is correct, Senator Martin.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Well, which is correct?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I suggest that Senator Aird be allowed to say something that does not please the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Walker: No matter how you spread it.

Hon. Mr. Aird: Honourable senators, without prolonging this debate I should like to reply briefly to Senator Argue with respect to the monetary situation and the immediate benefits that we have today.

It has quite obviously been reflected in our stock exchanges right across the board that in nearly every phase of industry there is a feeling of buoyancy, optimism, related to the devaluation of the American dollar. The point I was making is that in conjunction with the devaluation of the dollar is the position that I read in the newspaper, as enunciated by President Nixon, that he now feels that if Congress would pass the enabling legislation, tariffs would be considered for the benefit of the exporting sector of the United States economy. What I tried to say is that in the light of that circumstance the possibility of a tariff war, a trade war, is not a remote one. I believe that it may well be at hand.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators—

[Hon. Mr. Argue.]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Leave the record as it stands for once. You can study it and try to correct the situation on another occasion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You must never lose your patience.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I never lose my patience.

Motion agreed to.

POLYMER CORPORATION

INVESTMENTS IN SOUTH AFRICA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, on January 23 Senator Forsey asked me certain questions regarding the sale of the Polymer Corporation. My reply is as follows: The federal government sold this corporation in July, 1972. It is now in the private sector. Details of its commercial transactions are kept confidential, but its annual report provides general information about its main acquisitions and dispositions during the year.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That answer is so clear that it has not been prepared by you, I am sure.

CRIMINAL CODE (CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Criminal Code (control of weapons and firearms).

He said: Honourable senators, the rapid escalation of the annual death rate as a result of the use or misuse of firearms in this country and in the United States has given rise to an increasing clamour for governments to take some effective action to amend the Criminal Code in such a manner that greater controls can be placed on the availability, distribution and use of offensive weapons. The clamour has been given a new impetus by the fatal shooting of two police officers in the city of Toronto within a period of three weeks. Four were shot in one year in that city, and this is just one example of an alarming situation which is threatening to get out of control.

In bringing in Bill S-2, an act to amend the Criminal Code, dealing specifically with the control of weapons and firearms, I should say that there is nothing new or original in the bill. In order to save time and expense, I have simply reproduced, in its entirety, the bill that was given first reading in the other place on February 25, 1972, in the name of Warren Allmand, who is now Solicitor General.

It is my intention, if the bill receives second reading, to recommend that it go to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, where a number of appropriate amendments can be made. I think the bill introduced in the other place was essentially a good bill, but in the light of another year's experience it can be tightened up in a number of respects.

Before dealing with the bill itself and the amendments which I think are necessary to give it effect, I should like to review briefly some of the information now available which underlines the importance of taking immediate and effective action to bring guns under a greater measure of control. One has only to look at the papers in recent weeks, starting with the Windsor Star of Saturday, January 20, which had an editorial entitled "Firearms controls still need tightening"; to run through an editorial in the Calgary Herald of February 5, 1973, under the heading "Another policeman is shot"; to a story in the Calgary Herald of February 6 entitled "Gun laws under review", and a story in the Ottawa Citizen of last week which indicates that the anti-gun lobbyists are becoming active in Ottawa. The organization is called FARO (Firearms and Responsible Ownership) and the president, Mr. Bill Jones, has been actively interviewing members of Parliament with a view to inhibiting the passing of legislation which would be restrictive on the sale and distribution of guns. Mr. Jones quite openly admits that the label "lobby" applies, but he says it is not rabid or radical. Part of his statement on behalf of FARO, as set forth in its pamphlet, is as follows:

> Unless all firearms enthusiasts in Canada organize to counter demands for further restrictive firearm legislation, the shooting sports in all their facets may soon be legislated out of existence.

That statement is sheer nonsense. There is no intention on the part of anyone to legislate legitimate firearms out of existence. Mr. Jones says that FARO is a non-profit organization, having no links with the National Rifle Association of the United States. However, the gun lobby in the United States has been so blatantly powerful that it has succeeded in negativing almost all attempts at effective gun control in the United States. However, the clamour in the United States is on an increasing tempo as a result of the senseless slaughter that is increasing in that country every week and every year.

The need for firearms control legislation was dealt with in the Windsor Star editorial of January 20, 1972:

> The gun situation in Windsor is infinitely better than in Detroit, as is clear from even casual reading of the crime news. At the most, Canada's gun control laws need some tightening and a few additions. and there is every hope that these necessary changes are on the way.
> Two changes are obvious: a tightening of the restrictions on the sale of rifles and shotguns, and the elimination of the 'look-alike' toys made in exact imitation of real handguns.

Continuing, the editorial says:

> The philosophy of gun control should be that guns are a serious business and should not be made available to anyone who cannot show a serious and lawful purpose. To make guns available to criminals, the unstable, and the irresponsible is folly.
>
> Our present laws governing the sale and use of guns for hunting appear adequate, with the one exception that there is virtually no control over the sale of rifles and shotguns by retailers. The only requirement is that the purchaser be 16 years old. There is no registration of such weapons. Nor is a licence necessary, unless the owner wants to use the weapon for hunting, in which case he must take a course in use of the gun and buy a provincial hunting licence.
> The hunter, who has a legitimate claim to a rifle or shotgun, is thus subjected to stricter regulation than the person who buys a weapon for some other reason, perhaps not legitimate. The obvious answer is federal law covering the sale of rifles and shotguns, including a provision that a record be kept of both the weapon and the purchaser.
> A second change is the elimination of imitation handguns, both the pellet guns similar to a BB gun and the non-firing toy. Such imitations, close likenesses of the genuine gun, can be purchased easily, need not be registered, and can be carried at will. Their potential use in crime is obvious, and it is not difficult to see the bad psychological effects they could have on a young person. There seems to be no need for such imitation guns, and no reason why they should not be banned.

In a statement made by the Ontario Solicitor General, John Yaremko, as reported in the Calgary Herald of February 6, he said:

> Statistics indicate there are 200,000 registered handguns in Ontario. Rifles, shotguns, starters' pistols and gas-powered pellet pistols do not require registration.

One aspect of the current situation with respect to gun control which I think we must recognize as having a relationship to it is the rise of the drug culture with its tremendous demands for money. In the district in which I live hardly a week goes by but that homes are broken into and ransacked by people searching for money. These are usually people looking for money to buy drugs. I can speak with feeling here because my own home has been broken into five times in the last four years. It's bad enough to have one's home broken into and ransacked, but it's even more dangerous when these people acquire drugs and lose control of any senses that they might have had, and when cornered become very dangerous and irresponsible.

Related to the increase in crimes committed by people under the influence of drugs is the appalling situation which has developed in connection with the abuse of the parole system in Canada. Dangerous criminals are released on parole with all too little concern for the individual's past record and the possibility of this person's becoming a threat to society.

It must be a matter of concern to all Canadians to see that as a result of the increasingly permissive society we have let our sense of compassion completely run away with our commonsense. Some of the cases which have been reported in the last year or so—where criminals were either out on bail or out on parole and repeated in even more dastardly form the crimes for which they were originally sentenced—should give us all pause, and cause a re-examination of the administration of justice in this country. It seems to me that, as part of the breakdown of discipline and of morale in this increasingly permissive society, we have lost all sense of objectivity. In saying this I place a special blame on some school teachers and some university professors. There are sloppy, often dirty, untidy and scruffy-looking people teaching our children in a number of the schools, particularly in the universities.

It is no wonder that we have created a substantial number of young people in this generation who are scruffy, undisciplined and unproductive and who want to live off the earnings of hard-working and honest citizens.

One has only to think of the countless "pads" that have been established by 16- and 17-years olds in our larger cities where young people have left home and have been able to go on welfare and have taken up communal living of the very poorest type. Unfortunately, our legislative program and many of our legislators have wrong-headedly tried to encourage this kind of useless society. The other day there were about 100 young people from Montreal parading all afternoon in front of my office—they weren't parading in front of me particularly, of course—because they had been cut off welfare in Montreal. It is high time we curtailed the abuses, the flagrant abuses of the unemployment insurance legislation and of the welfare legislation. Of the thousands of hard-working, honest Canadians, there are many who would fit the Poverty Committee's description of the "working poor," and in many cases these working poor are earning less than the minimum wage, but are too proud and too honest to take advantage of the welfare legislation. And yet these are the people who are helping to support a large number of useless people who don't want to work.

I was very disappointed to hear the Prime Minister say in a broadcast some weeks ago that we need to take another look at the "work ethic," that maybe it is not as important as it was before. Certainly, I agree that in an age where people have increasing leisure there is not the same need for them to work the way they used to, but it is still unfair for some people to work to support able-bodied, young men and women who refuse to work.

One has only to go back through the pages of history to examine the incidence of the downfall of empires to see that the deterioration arose out of just the kind of irresponsible and undisciplined abuses which we see creeping into our society with increasing frequency every day.

In any comparison between gun law legislation in various countries and statistics on crime and murder, the United States is the obvious choice to use as a base. It may seem an anachronism that America has more gun laws than any other nation while at the same time it suffers the highest rates of violence due to firearms. On closer inspection, however, it is seen that many of the 20,000 state and local firearms regulations are obsolete, unenforced and unenforceable. Their provisions range from an almost total absence of control to fairly strict licencing requirements. This lack of uniformity hampers enforcement, even where there is a will to enforce.

The failure of the United States Congress to come to grips with the gun control problems in such areas as registration of firearms, the abolition of mail order services, the over-the-counter sales to incompetents, juveniles and the criminally insane, et cetera, has led to some alarming statistics of which only one or two need be recorded here. I quote from the Congressional Record of June 10, 1968:

> Far more people have been killed by firearms in the United States since the year 1900 than have died in all its wars from the American Revolution to Vietnam. Between 1900 and 1966, firearms have been responsible for 280,000 murders, 370,000 suicides and 145,000 deaths by accident—making a grand total of 795,000 people. Against this figure the total number of American war dead since the beginning of the nation to the war in Vietnam stands at 550,000.

In other words, over 200,000 more people have been killed by guns in a so-called peace-loving society than were killed in all their wars from 1776 to Vietnam. For the year 1971, the statistics—and this is for the year 1971 only—are recorded as follows:

> Murders committed with guns, 11,300; Deaths from gun accidents, 2,400; Policemen killed by gunfire in line of duty, 120; Suicides by gunfire, 10,000; Accidentally wounded, 20,000; Aggravated assaults involving guns, 92,000; Persons robbed at gunpoint, 160,000.

An American's attachment to a gun was fostered by the peculiar history of his nation that began and flourished in the taming of a wilderness. The American frontier favoured the gun toter. The gun was necessary to kill game for food, to ward off predators, to protect the traveller from bandits, and to enforce primitive justice where established agencies of law and order were either weak or non-existent. The firearm was also an essential instrument of combat against the Western Indian tribes, and for many years the armed citizen-soldier was the country's first line of defence. It has been said that the Kentucky long rifle opened the frontier, the Winchester repeater won the West and the Colt revolver made men equal.

Out of the traditions of these "rough and ready" days evolved a "gun mystique," whereby many Americans today associate the image of man and boy and a gun with patriotism, self-reliance, courage, manly skills, family togetherness, defence of home and country and good sportsmanship. Pressure for stronger gun control measures strikes them as an attack on many of the admirable qualities found in the American way of life.

This kind of "gun mystique"—which is found in no other nation—should not be regarded lightly. It is even written into the United States Constitution in the following form:

> A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

As a consequence, the 800,000 strong and influential National Rifle Association acts as a powerful force in frustrating the attempts of legislators to place sane and reasonable controls on the use of firearms in America.

There is no doubt that strict, ably enforced, gun control laws greatly reduce the crime, suicide and accident rates of any nation. Other than the United States, most Western countries demand that, at least, all hand guns be registered, and many include rifles and shot guns as well. As a result, the annual death rate because of firearms has become a negligible statistic in most democracies, with the exception of America. Prior to the passage of the 1968 United States Gun Control Act, the debates in Congress referred many times to the measures adopted by other nations. The following table, although somewhat outdated, provides a good indication of America's problem in relation to a selected group of other countries. The rates are based on 100,000 per population and nations are listed in accordance with their homicide rates per 100,000 of population. I will ask permission to insert this table in the record.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Death by Firearms

Country	Population	Year	Homicides		Suicides		Accidents		Total Numbers
			Number	Rate	Number	Rate	Number	Rate
United States	190,000,000	1967	8,332	4.2	10,550	5.3	2,896	1.5	21,778
Australia	11,810,000	1967	66	.56	357	3.02	77	.65	500
Canada	19,604,000	1966	98	.50	609	3.10	197	1.0	904

(1) The Congressional Record. 16 June 1970, p. 19983.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: The figures speak for themselves with the exception that the rates for the United States continue to increase. Taking these numbers as they stand, however, and considering homicide rates alone, it can be seen that for 100,000 per population the rate in the United States stands at 4.2 per annum. This is roughly seven times the rate for Australia; eight times the rate for Canada; 12 times greater than Italy; 16 times that of France; 20 times that of West Germany; 50 times the rate of England; 56 times the rate in the Netherlands, and finally, 200 times the rate in Japan.

What provides this great disparity is that other nations have enacted, in varying degrees, legislation based upon the registration and restriction of firearms. This the United States has yet to do.

The legislation in the United Kingdom is looked upon as a model for most countries. Britain has a long history of firearms control through which the actual licensing of guns started as early as 1870. Only 45 murders involving guns were recorded in England and Wales during 1967, and despite the killing by guns of three unarmed policemen in August 1966, the London Police Federation voted against the arming of constables except in "most exceptional circumstances." Weapon controls for civilians are strict, and the restrictions are divided into three categories:

a. Guns which fire in burst, that is, machine guns, may be only possessed with a certificate of approval from the Ministry of Defence. Even the police must have certificates for holding weapons of this nature.

At this point I cannot help reminding you that you cannot look at your television set any single night without seeing two or three or four shows, often in children's viewing time, where machine guns and other weapons are used for committing mayhem all over the place. This cannot help but influence the climate in which our young people are growing up.

b. Other weapons, including hand guns and rifles but not shot guns, are covered by the Firearms Act of 1937, which consolidated a number of earlier laws. Under this Act it is an offence to possess such weapons without a certificate issued by the chief constable of one's locality.

c. Shot guns are controlled under the 1968 Firearms Act, which came into force on August 1st of that year. Controls on shot guns—which had previously been exempt from gun laws—followed a rise in indictable offences involving firearms through the early 1960s. As with hand guns and rifles, a certificate to possess a shot gun is now required, but the onus is on the chief constable of a locality to give reason for not granting a permit. This is not a requirement where other weapons are involved.

Approximately 220,000 firearm permits are extant in England and Wales and, because of the severe penalties for possessing weapons without a police certificate, it is doubtful that there are more guns in private hands than the number of permits indicate. Prior to the Firearms Act of 1968, a three-month amnesty was held for returning weapons held by citizens without a certificate. A total of 25,088 were turned in, including 8,847 revolvers and automatics, 4,340 rifles and 9,488 shot guns. Three other amnesties have been granted since the end of World War II. The first was in 1946 when 76,000 weapons were turned in; the second in 1961 when 70,000 were returned, and the third in 1965 when 41,000 guns of all descriptions were acquired.

The English gun control legislation, as I indicated earlier, has been accepted as a model by most other democratic countries. Stiff penalties are provided for non-compliance with the law. In most cases the minimum sentence, on summary conviction, is six months or a fine of £200 or both, and on an indictment, three years or a fine, or both. These penalties are provided for a list of more than 100 different offences. All it is necessary to say from a casual review of the English law is that all the factors necessary for good gun control have been taken into account. The registration of weapons for dealers, manufacturers and individuals is the basis of this comparatively strict legislation, and the granting of permits to police constables to search without warrants on the grounds of suspicion only aids in enforcement of the law.

The French method of controlling firearms is simple and effective. Small arms, apart from hunting weapons can be purchased only on a police permit. Two kinds of permits are issued. One is for possession of a personal weapon, either in the home or at the office, where there is a special or peculiar security problem. The other is a permit to carry a weapon, and this is next to impossible to obtain. Such permits are issued only on the authority of the Minister of the Interior and apply only in very special cases; for example, in cases of citizens requiring personal bodyguards. Furthermore, official inquiries into requests for permits can take as long as six weeks, and there is no guarantee that they will be approved.

Anyone found in possession of a weapon without one or the other of these permits is automatically arrested and is subject to varying degrees of jail sentences depending on the circumstances and the plausibility of his explanation.

An individual cannot walk into a store and purchase a revolver without first obtaining a police permit. If he should then sell or transfer the weapon to someone else who does not hold a permit, he is in violation of the law. Serial numbers and full identity of all weapons are, of course, part of police files.

Prior to the outbreak of protests by students and workers in the late 1960s, anyone in France could own a hunting rifle or a .22 calibre weapon without authorization or registration. In May 1968, however, the Ministry of the Interior imposed a "temporary" control during which government approval was needed to buy such a weapon. This control is less restrictive today, although hunting weapons are only purchasable with a hunting licence and can be transported only if such a licence is in the possession of the individual carrying the gun.

Each of West Germany's eleven states have gun laws that on the surface appear to be the most liberal in the world. Anyone has the right to buy and own a gun. There is one important proviso, however, and that is that everyone needs a special licence to carry weapons. By the same token, only the police can grant such a licence and they will do so only if the applicant has a clean criminal record and can show cause that he needs a weapon for self-defence or professional reasons.

Hunters and members of shooting clubs must also obtain this special licence and can buy their weapons only from specified dealers. Military weapons are not for sale, and there are no mail order purchases of guns.

Japan's crowded nation of 100 million people has perhaps the strictest arms regulations in the world. With the exception of police, military personnel, Olympic Games marksmen and a few government research agencies, the possession of pistols, carbines and all small concealable guns is absolutely prohibited. Possession of such weapons carries a maximum penalty of five years' imprisonment or a fine of 200,000 yen—$555—or both.

Japanese national police headquarters claim that, because of their vigilant enforcement of the law in this regard, there are never more than 50 illegal revolvers in circulation at any one time. The largest source of illegal hand guns seems to be through purchases from American servicemen on leave from Vietnam.

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

Hunting and target rifles, shotguns and air guns are licensed through Japan's Public Safety Commission. The licensing requirements are stringent and unique and include a minimum age limitation of 20 years, no criminal record, reasonable grounds for possession, and a mental health certificate signed by an authorized medical doctor.

Firearms offences are negligible in Japan, and authorities all agree that it is because of the weapons restrictions. In 1967, out of 92,100 cases of murder, robbery and assault only 120 cases involved firearms.

In the United States, crimes committed with guns have been increasing since 1964. According to the FBI, murder through the use of a firearm has more than doubled; aggravated assault has increased 167 per cent, and armed robbery has gone up 200 per cent. The following extracts from the Congressional Record of June 1970 provide figures for the years 1964-68. When combined with the 1971 statistics, they corroborate the FBI's recent findings.

There is a table I should like to have inserted in the record.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Increase in Gun Crimes in the United States

Year	Homicides by gun	Percentage of total homicides	Aggravated Assault by gun	Armed Robbery by gun
1964	5,090	50	27,700	42,600
1965	5,634	57	34,700	52,000
1966	6,552	60	43,500	59,300
1967	7,700	63	52,950	73,000
1968	8,930	65.4	65,250	99,000[2]
1971	11,300	—	92,000	160,000

Hon. Mr. Cameron: This table shows that from 1964 to 1971 homicides by guns went up from 5,090 to 11,300. The percentage of total homicides went up from 50 per cent to 65.4 per cent. The number of cases of aggravated assault by a gun went up from 27,700 in 1964 to 92,000 in 1971. Armed robbery by gun went up from 42,600 in 1964 to 160,000 in 1971.

One reason guns figure so prominently in crimes of violence is that there are so many in circulation. A task force for the Violence Commission estimated in 1969 that there were roughly 90 million firearms in private possession in the United States, and that one-half of the nation's 60 million households had at least one gun on the premises. On June 27, 1972, Senator Edward Kennedy stated:

> According to some estimates guns outnumber our population of 210 million people.

As already mentioned, there is great diversity between state and local gun laws. A number of efforts have been made to promote uniformity of legislation among states, but little headway has been made. One thing is certain, however, and that is the gun homicide rates in states with strong or at least minimal gun legislation are far lower than in states with weak or non-existent laws. For those with relatively strong laws such as Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, the percentages of gun murders to total murders is 43.2 per cent, 38.6 per cent, 31.8 per cent, 35.3 per cent and 24 per cent respectively. For those with weak laws such as Florida, Arizona, Nevada, Texas, Mississippi and Louisiana, the rates are 66 per cent, 66.4 per cent 66.9 per cent, 68.7 per cent, 70.9 per cent and 62 per cent.

Interest in federal gun legislation began in the 1930s with the rise of gang warfare in the big cities. The National Firearms Act of 1934 was directed at the armaments of gangland and called for the registration and taxation on manufacture, sale or transfer of machine guns, sawed-off shot guns, cut-down rifles, mufflers and silencers. Four years later Congress passed the Federal Firearms Act which

(a) required manufacturers and importers of firearms and of pistol and revolver ammunition to obtain licences from the Internal Revenue Service,

(b) made it unlawful for a dealer or manufacturer to ship a firearm to unlicensed firms where state law required licensing, and

(c) Made it unlawful to knowingly ship firearms and ammunition to anyone convicted of a serious crime or under indictment.

• (1500)

No further United States federal legislation of significance was passed after that time until the 1968 Gun Control Act. This law strengthened the restrictions on hand guns and extended them to include long guns and ammunition. It prohibited interstate shipment of mail order firearms, and shipment within a state was only permitted if the buyer submitted a sworn statement to the seller that attested to his competence to possess the weapon. The law also strengthened licensing procedures for gun manufacturers and dealers, and prohibited the importation of certain foreign firearms. However, the one proposal sought by most gun control adherents—the federal registration of all firearms—was not included in the act.

One aim of the 1968 Gun Control Act was to stop the flow of the cheap and poorly made little hand guns from abroad. These "Saturday-night specials" were useless for sport but suitable for holdups. The effect of the import ban, however, was to nourish the growth of a protected domestic industry for the manufacture of similar weapons. The legal loophole was that the importation of gun parts was not affected by the act—only importation of the complete weapon was banned. As a consequence, more than one million cheap revolvers, selling at between $5 and $25 each, were produced in the United States in 1970, of which some 600,000 were quickly put together from imported parts.

A bill to stop the manufacture of all these hand guns was introduced in September 1971 by Senator Birch Bayh and approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee on June 27, 1972, despite objections from administration witnesses and the National Rifle Association. On August 9, 1972 the United States Senate approved the measure by a vote of 68 to 25. If the bill becomes law it will mean that no firm will be able to sell these so-called "Saturday-night specials."

It is of interest to note the voting patterns on two amendments to Senator Bayh's bill, which in other nations would have been considered realistic and mere common sense in view of the circumstances. The first amendment was a measure to prohibit privately-owned hand guns of any kind and was rejected by the senators in an 83 to 7 vote. The second amendment, by Senator Edward Kennedy, proposed that all firearms, shotguns and rifles as well as hand guns, be registered, and that owners be obliged to obtain federal or state licences. This was rejected by a vote of 78 to 11, which gives some idea of the influence of the National Rifle Association and the philosophy of the "gun mystique" in America.

The arguments put forward by the senatorial foes of Senator Bayh's bill centred around the contention that the measure would prove unenforceable and that it usurped local and state police powers. Other arguments, both pro and con, which are recurrent themes in America's struggle to gain some equitable balance in its gun legislation, are worthy of note.

The arguments for gun control might be summarized as follows:

(1) The increase in crimes of violence makes it necessary to reduce the number of guns in circulation.

(2) Possession of a gun by the ordinary citizen provides little protection and may present additional hazard in case of attack.

(3) Guns in the home increase the likelihood of fatal accidents and crimes of passion.

(4) Gun registration would not deny gun ownership to responsible persons who can prove a legitimate need for the weapon. It would also aid police greatly in tracking down criminals.

(5) Stricter rules to qualify for a gun licence would represent only a minor inconvenience to sportsmen.

(6) Countries with strict limitations on gun ownership have lower crime rates. This is demonstrated over and over again.

(7) Federal regulation is necessary because differences between state laws negate effectiveness of control measures.

The arguments of those against gun control are as follows:

(1) The gun is not the criminal. We are beginning to hear this argument in Canada. The way to prevent crime is to punish more severely the criminal who misuses the gun.

(2) Citizens need guns to protect themselves and their homes from criminals.

(3) Education in the safe use of guns is the best safeguard against unintentional misuse.

(4) Gun registration would be an intrusion on the privacy of the individual, and would provide a means of large-scale gun confiscation by the government.

(5) Oppressive gun regulation requirements would harass sportsmen and lower the level of national marksmanship skills.

(6) Gun laws are not determinants of the incidence of crime.

(7) Gun regulation is the province of states and localities, not the federal government.

Honourable senators, these are the arguments that are used in the United States and which we are beginning to hear used in Canada. I must say that I was a little disappointed to hear the Minister of Justice, speaking on this very matter not long ago, saying that he was not very enthusiastic about more restrictions on the sale of guns in this country. However, if you read the record and the kind of information I have been putting before you today, you can see that wherever tight gun control exists the incidence of crimes related to guns has been greatly reduced.

It is one of the curiosities of the gun control situation in the United States that public opinion, as measured by polls, has for 30 years in large majorities favoured strengthening the control measures. The latest Gallup Poll, conducted in May 1972, indicated that 71 per cent favoured a law that required a police permit for buying any firearm. It is possible in the face of such opinion that the tide may be turning and that weapon registration—the only real deterrent to weapon proliferation—will yet become a reality in the United States.

The conclusions are:

(a) Strict gun control laws—by which is meant partial or complete weapon registration—coupled with good enforcement, reduces the crime rate in a nation, along with the numbers of people who are killed or maimed through accident, assault and suicide.

(b) In no other country is the record of gun violence and gun killing so great as in the United States. The reasons for this are the loopholes in a large number of relaxed and liberal state laws, and the lack of a strong federal law which demands the registration of firearms and a system of permits for gun owners.

(c) In recent years many western nations with strong gun laws have shown increases in crimes committed with hand guns. In comparison with the United States, however, the increases have been slight, and gun problems remain minimal.

(d) A gun legislation model for most western nations is the Firearms Act of the United Kingdom.

(e) Should a restrictive gun control act become law in the United States tomorrow it would still take many years before its effect would be felt. This is because of the massive numbers of unregistered firearms in private hands—anywhere from 90 million to 200 million weapons. The need for such legislation is urgent in view of such modern-day phenomena as civil disobedience, political kidnapping, assassination, skyjacking, and out and out terrorism.

(f) Canada's 1970 amendment to the Criminal Code tightened the control of private firearms. It restricted the sale and ownership of hand guns, automatic weapons, sawed-off shotguns, and rifles to persons granted permits by the police or a provincial attorney general. It provided no restrictions, however, on the sale and ownership of regular shotguns and rifles for hunting purposes. Practically speaking, any person 16 years of age or older can purchase a shotgun or rifle in a sporting goods shop in Canada without having to give his name or address.

Although Canada is not generally imbued with a "gun mystique" as is the United States, its close proximity to that nation and its similar life style makes it far more vulnerable to gun proliferation and gun violence than other nations.

[Hon. Mr. Cameron.]

• (1510)

It seems reasonable under these circumstances that all firearms should be registered in Canada. It could be done in the following manner without undue inconvenience or loss of democratic rights to either buyer or seller:

(1) Every person who purchases a firearm should be obliged to show proper identification.

(2) Both buyer and seller should be jointly responsible for filling out a form that links the firearm to its owner and gives the reason for its purchase.

(3) The buyer should also be required to list all other firearms in his possession.

(4) The seller should be obliged to send this information to a central registry office kept either by the RCMP or the provincial governments.

(5) The buyer should be obliged to notify the registry office if his weapon is sold or stolen.

These points were itemized in the Ottawa Journal of November 20, 1970, under the heading: Why Not Register all Firearms.

To the five points listed above, I would add a sixth: That guns must not be sold to people with criminal records, or to those who have any history of mental illness or addiction to drugs.

Admittedly, such a law embodying the foregoing points would only control weapons owned by honest citizens, but in time it would frustrate criminal activity by making police investigations much simpler and quicker.

It is with the intention of giving effect to these principles that Bill S-2 is submitted for the consideration of honourable senators. The bill deals essentially with sections 82, 87, 92 and 95 of the Criminal Code. I shall now deal with the amendments and explanatory notes as they appear in the bill.

Clause 1: The purpose of this clause is to place machine guns and shortened guns—sawed-off shotguns—which are now "restricted weapons," in the category of "prohibited weapons." It also places rifles and shotguns which are unrestricted in the category of "restricted weapons." As a result, all weapons will be either "prohibited" or "restricted."

Clause 2: The purpose of this clause is to make all transfers of weapons, whether commercial or private, subject to authorization.

Clause 3: The purpose of this clause is to make all offences relating to guns indictable, and consequently to eliminate all summary convictions. Section 92 becomes unnecessary because of the new section 87.

Clause 4: The purpose of this clause is to require a permit for all "restricted weapons," which in fact includes all firearms.

Clause 5: Under the present law a judge may order that a person involved in a crime be prohibited from possessing any firearm for a maximum period of five years. This amendment would require the judge to make such a prohibitive order for at least 10 years.

Clause 6: The purpose of adding paragraph (e) to section 97(2) is to provide that a permit may be granted to use a rifle or shotgun for hunting subject to the granting of a hunting licence.

The proposed new subsection (2A)(a) makes it mandatory that a test be passed before any weapon permit may be granted. The test would deal with the knowledge and handling of weapons and the laws pertaining to them. Paragraph (b) sets out those persons who are prohibited from being granted a permit for a weapon.

As I indicated earlier, if this bill receives second reading, I shall propose that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I commend the bill to the house, and hope that it will receive favourable support.

Hon. Mr. Argue: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Is this bill identical to that introduced in the other place on the same subject?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Yes, and the reason is that there is a considerable saving in time and expense by reproducing the same bill. Any amendments that we wish to make can be made in committee.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Will the honourable senator permit me a question? Is there any reference in the bill to the sentence to be imposed on a person convicted of a criminal offence while carrying or using a gun?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: The bill deals mostly with the control of weapons rather than offences.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: The honourable senator has compared the laws of several countries, such as the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and Japan, governing this aspect of criminal offences. Has the honourable senator any information on comparisons between those countries in respect of the sentences that are imposed?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I have details only for the United Kingdom. There are about 100 different offences for which there are penalties. The minimum penalty is six months' imprisonment or a fine of £200, or both, on summary conviction. On indictment, the term of imprisonment is three years.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, it would normally be a pleasure for me to support any legislation proposed by Senator Cameron because he is a fellow Albertan and a personal friend of many years, but I am afraid that is a pleasure I shall have to forego on this occasion. I should like to be on record as being emphatically opposed to the type of legislation represented by Bill S-2.

I am not a member of any sportsmen's or gun club. I am not a gun enthusiast. I have no axe to grind from any of those standpoints, but I oppose this legislation because I consider it to be basically unsound in principle.

It is based on the premise that greater restriction on the possession of firearms will be helpful in reducing crimes of violence, particularly those of murder, manslaughter, suicide, and so on. It is my submission that that premise is without foundation.

The criminal element responsible for a large percentage of crimes of violence will certainly not be deterred in any way by the imposition of further restrictions on the ownership of firearms. Surely we all recognize that a criminal, a person with criminal intentions, has no difficulty, and will have no difficulty, in obtaining firearms, whether or not we have more restrictive legislation. The black market will always provide whatever the criminal element requires.

So I say at the outset that the concept that we can in some way curb crimes of violence by imposing restrictions on the ownership of firearms is unsound. It will not affect the criminal element in any significant degree.

Do we think for one moment that men such as those who ambushed and gunned down the policemen, to which incident Senator Cameron referred, will be prevented from acquiring firearms by the passage of legislation of this kind? Of course they will not. Do we think that the individual who intends to take his own life will be prevented or deterred from obtaining a revolver? He will not worry very much if after his death it is found that he was illegally in possession of a firearm. It is completely impracticable to think that the imposition of restrictions can stop crimes of that kind.

The argument is advanced that a great many murders and manslaughters are crimes of passion. A weapon happened to be handy to the individual whose anger was aroused, so it was used to commit manslaughter or murder. Undoubtedly, this has happened, but here again, does anyone seriously think that a man who is emotionally disturbed to the point that he would kill someone is going to be restrained from so doing merely because he is not able to put his hands on a revolver? He will put his hands on something else. He will hit that someone on the head with something, strangle him, or use any one of a dozen means to kill him. Crimes of violence are not going to be stopped merely by eliminating one of the weapons. If a revolver or a rifle is not handy, the offender in all probability will use something else.

My concern about legislation of this kind, in addition to some of the points mentioned by Senator Cameron as arguments advanced against it, is that we would be imposing on a great many law-abiding citizens another government restriction, another permit that they would have to get, another examination that they would have to take, before they can possess a rifle or a shotgun.

I am not speaking now of machine guns or sawed-off shotguns. I cannot think of any valid reason why the average citizen, outside of the criminal element, would be interested in owning those types of weapons. But in the rural areas of Canada, certainly in Western Canada—and I think Senator Cameron will agree with me—I doubt if you would find a farm home in which there is not a rifle and a shotgun, and probably several of them. These are normal instruments as far as rural families are concerned, especially if there are boys in the family. As soon as boys are old enough, their fathers teach them how to shoot. They have their .22 rifle for shooting rabbits, gophers, and other pests, and their shotgun for hunting in the fall. These things are found in every rural home.

When you tell these law abiding people that because the occasional individual uses a weapon in a crime of passion, or because the criminal element is using weapons for illegal purposes—which they are going to continue to do, in any event—they have to obtain permits before they can own a .22 rifle or a shotgun and probably take an examination to prove they know how to handle them, you are adding to the multiplicity of government permits and authorizations they already have to have. You are imposing another inconvenience on thousands of law-abiding citizens. I do not want to give the erroneous impression that this is something major, but it will be one more government regulation added to the multiplicity of those already in existence. This, in my opinion, creates a disrespect for law and order in this country today.

A person can hardly turn around without having to go to some level of government for a permit, or to find out if it is permissible to do something. Senator Cameron mentioned the activity of the sportmen's world in this matter. I agree with what he said. I think probably one of the reasons why they are so sensitive to this type of thing is that that is a field in which they are regulated time and time again. If a man wants to fish he has first to obtain a licence, and he is told which stream or lake he can fish in, and when he can fish. If a man wants to go big game hunting, again he has to obtain a permit, and again he is told when he can go. The government also regulates the size of his rifle and the weight of the pellets in his shotgun. He is smothered with permits. Now the government comes along and says, "Before you can even own a rifle you have to fill out forms, take tests, and go through all this in order to obtain a permit."

Honourable senators, what we are doing with this type of legislation is illustrative of what we are doing with scores of other pieces of legislation with which the average citizen is confronted across this country today. We are smothering people under government requirements and regulations with respect to a great many things.

The practical value of these permits is very debatable. However, in the process we are making people so sick and tired of being regulated that we are breeding a disrespect for law and order which, to my mind, is far more serious, and in the long run far more damaging, than requiring an individual to obtain a permit for a rifle or shotgun, especially when you take into consideration the fact that 99.44 per cent of the people are going to use those rifles and shotguns within the law.

It is for this reason that I am against any further legislation which imposes restrictions of minimal value and which are just added irritations to the citizenry. People are already extremely irritated by the amount of this type of thing that we have in Canada today.

I do not intend to argue all the points in the list of objections mentioned by Senator Cameron. Personally, I think there is a good deal to them.

If we are serious in wanting to control crime, it is the criminal with whom we ought to be dealing. An increasing number of people in Canada are coming to the conclusion that this stupid philosophy—as I call it—of the last 10 or 15 years, where almost everyone who commits a criminal act becomes the object of public sympathy, is encouraging crime rather than curtailing it. If we are serious about curtailing crimes of violence, then let us start treating the criminal as a criminal. Let us not start requiring thousands of law-abiding, decent people to go through more government tests to obtain more government authorizations before they can do the things which are quite reasonable and normal for them to do.

[Hon. Mr. Manning.]

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Henry D. Hicks rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the importance of federal government support for post-secondary education in Canada and the relations between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces concerning the universities of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not have to explain why I have a particular interest in this subject, and why I think it is important that our attention should be directed towards it at this time, because it will be the subject of discussions between representatives of the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces, and hopefully of the universities of Canada, some time later this year. The arrangements under which we presently operate, which expired under the original terms in 1972, have been extended for two years, and will now expire in 1974, so that some new arrangements will have to be made between the federal government, the provinces and the universities of Canada to take effect after the end of the fiscal year 1973-1974.

I know it is customary to say that the Constitution of Canada, the British North America Act, charges the provinces with the exclusive right to legislate in respect to education, but we all know, of course, that this is a pattern which has not been followed exactly, and that there has been in the history of our country a great deal of overlapping of interest and responsibility, and indeed even legislation and financial support, for education at various levels, particularly at the post-secondary level.

Let me remind you, honourable senators, that at the time the British North America Act was drafted and came into force in 1867 it was not contemplated by the Fathers of Confederation or, so far as I know, by anyone else at that time, that governments in Canada, at either the federal or provincial level, would have very much to do with such important matters as education, health and welfare, or even highway construction. Indeed, virtually no expenditures were made at the time of Confederation, more than a hundred years ago, in these areas, which now account for the major portions of both the current and the capital expenditures of the provinces of Canada—education, health and welfare, and highways—and which also constitute a major proportion of the budget of the Government of Canada.

It is really remarkable that our Constitution, drafted at a time when government involvement at the federal and provincial levels with education was not seriously envisaged, has served our needs so well for more than a hundred years. Indeed, to me it is not the inflexibility of the British North America Act which is surprising; it is its flexibility to deal with the changed circumstances that have occurred in Canada in the more than one hundred years of our history. We have found it possible for the federal government to participate in old age pensions, unemployment insurance, various shared programs, the tax rental agreements, and so on. In most cases this has been done by agreement between the federal government and the provinces, though occasionally we have had to resort to constitutional amendment.

The point I am trying to make, honourable senators, is that there is no constitutional bar to our approaching these problems in the way we want to handle them. The problem is not constitutional; it is political. When the people of Canada, through their elected representatives, decide what they want to do, they will not find that the Constitution of Canada prevents them from doing it. However, I should point out that even from the strict constitutional point of view there is, in my judgment and the judgment of many other scholars, no bar to the federal government's assisting in post-secondary education—as indeed it has done in the past—at the university level as well as the many other kinds of post-secondary education and training.

It is generally stated that section 93 of the British North America Act charges the provincial governments with the exclusive responsibility to make laws in relation to education in and for each province. However—and I stress this point—it is rather interesting that the inclusion of section 93 was rather to guarantee the rights of certain denominational schools in various parts of Canada than to allot, assign or apportion financial responsibility. It is also interesting to note, while it was quite clear that section 93 charged the provincial legislatures with the responsibility for education that at the time the Fathers of Confederation thought the ultimate safeguard, in the event that provincial legislators did not do their work properly, was an appeal to, or an intervention by, the Government of Canada through the Governor General-in-Council.

Section 93 was included in the British North America Act, in my judgment, for a very special purpose. We have to look to the great sections 91 and 92, which divide the legislative responsibility among the federal government and the provinces. We have to consider the importance of the "peace, order and good government" provisions of section 91, and the various provisions of section 92, chiefly the "property and civil rights" one. Without prolonging this argument, I think that my friend, Dr. J. A. Corry, the former principal of Queen's, and one of the most distinguished constitutional experts in Canada, summed it up extremely well when he said that the provincial legislature must speak for the province, but the "federal government must speak for the nation." In Dr. Corry's view, section 93 of the British North America Act refers to the powers of the legislature "in and for each province," but Parliament has the requisite competence over needs that transcend provincial boundaries under the "peace, order and good government" clause. Dr. Corry is not the first person to make that observation, but, as he usually does, he makes it succinctly and well.

What is the history of this matter in Canada? First of all, in support for post-secondary education in the eastern provinces of Canada there was very little provincial government participation until comparatively recent times. Indeed, until after World War II these governments did not concern themselves significantly with financial support for post-secondary educational institutions, though they did pass laws granting charters to colleges and universities, and regulated the power of universities to grant degrees. It was different in the western provinces of Canada, because there the provincial universities were developed largely as provincial institutions, somewhat analagous to the land grant colleges in the United States. Hence the history of provincial government involvement with Canada's universities changes as we move east or west from the central province of Ontario.

In any event, there was, until the end of World War II, no direct federal assistance to post-secondary education at all, except in certain vocational and technical education programs, which were first supported, I think, by the federal Department of Labour and, more recently, by many programs in the Department of Manpower and Immigration and other departments of government.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The first in 1919, I think.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: The first was that of the Department of Labour in 1919. I was correct in my recollection there.

The federal contributions to university research have been very different, and would support a student at the post-graduate level under various research grants. This kind of support, of course, goes back to the foundation of the National Research Council in 1917, if my recollection is correct there. The government leader has such a wealth of knowledge on these historical details.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I doubt if it was as early as that. Dr. Tory was the first President of the National Research Council.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I do not think their involvement in post-graduate support and university research goes right back to the beginning.

• (1540)

In any event, certainly from the early 1920s, the National Research Council began to play an important part in the support of research in the universities. In later years, similar support in the humanities and the social sciences has been forthcoming from the Canada Council, and in the medical sciences from the Medical Research Council, as an addition to and in continuation of programs started earlier in the National Research Council.

Support of research related to various federal government departments has been a long-standing occurrence in the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Fisheries, and many other departments. This sort of mission-oriented research has been supported inside and outside the universities by federal departments. I am not really concerning myself very much, in the balance of my remarks, with the subject of research. We have to come down to the year 1950-51 to note the entrance of the federal government into any direct program of support for post-secondary education in Canada.

The first reference to this that I have been able to find occurred in a speech made by the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent in October 1950, at the fall convocation of the University of Toronto, when he said:

> I think many of us recognize increasingly that some means must be found to ensure to our universities the financial capacity to perform the many services which are required in the interests of the whole nation.

I stress that last point because Mr. St. Laurent was to repeat it again and again, as he did next in the other place on May 3, 1951, when he quoted the remarks that he had made in Toronto in response to questioning about the policy of the government in support of the universities, and the expectations of the report of the Massey Commission.

Mr. St. Laurent repeated the same sentiments on June 19, 1951, referring to the need for the federal government to recognize the services which Canada's universities render to the whole nation, and the responsibility of the Government to give some assistance to enable the universities to discharge this responsibility. At that time, his sentiments were approved entirely by the Honourable George Drew, the then Leader of the Opposition. Indeed, I could show you that this recognition of the services of the universities to the federal government and to the nation as a whole was affirmed as being more and more important, as our society became more complex in the post World War II era. On June 30, 1951, Mr. St. Laurent, speaking on the supply motion, supported the first appropriation of $7,100,000, based upon 50 cents per capita of the population of the nation, to support the universities as direct grants to them.

I must admit here that it seems to me that the device which Mr. St. Laurent used constituted a classic example of a non sequitur, because the support was based on the population of the provinces, not on the population of the universities or, if you like, it was not in proportion to the services which the universities were rendering to the nation—which was the rationale which Mr. St. Laurent had used to explain or justify, even to require, the federal government's getting into this field.

This resulted in some very interesting anomalies. It meant that the level of support of universities, in relation to the numbers of students they had, or to the educational services they were rendering, varied widely across Canada.

I think one could justify the fact that this support was very high on a per student basis in a province like Newfoundland, which at that time had very few university students in relation to its population. It was more difficult, however, for us in Nova Scotia to accept the fact that at that time the average grant to the universities in Nova Scotia ran at about one-half the figure per student that was provided for students at the University of Toronto.

As I say, there were some anomalous situations in this kind of support, but it did at least mark the beginning of the federal government's participation in bearing some of the costs of operating our universities—costs which we all know have been rising so rapidly in the last 20 years as to cause genuine concern to all Canadians, both inside and outside the universities.

Honourable senators, I shall not take you through the long history of this support program, which embraces the objections of the Province of Quebec to the direct grants, and the justification in that province for providing the money in proportion to the population, because it was felt that it would be too difficult to define university students and to differentiate between some students in religious institutions as to whether they should be counted or not. In any event, it was felt better by the federal government—at least, I have always supposed that this was the reason—to make the grants in proportion to the population, and to leave it to the local authorities, the provincial authorities, to decide which institutions were eligible for the grant in any particular province.

Even so, I say this was somewhat less than a satisfactory method, though one must acknowledge that it provided tremendous urgently needed support to the universities at a time when they certainly would have faltered if some such support had not been forthcoming.

In any event, it was then decided that the money should be distributed through the National Conference of Canadian Universities and Colleges, and this overcame some of the difficulties, but not all of them. It did not overcome the inequities in the level of support to the universities in one province in comparison with those of another.

Since we are not concerned here with an historical analysis of the situation, I think I should now deal with the formula which was developed in the fall of 1966, in contemplation of the end in 1967 of the previous arrangements. This is generally referred to by my academic colleagues as the Pearson formula, and it is the formula which presently determines the support of our universities.

This support is given through the provincial governments. Roughly, one arrangement was accepted by all but three provinces. It is significant that the three provinces which could not accept that arrangement were all Atlantic provinces—Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. They chose to accept support on the basis of so many dollars, originally $15 per capita, and because it was also tied to the aggregate cost of post-secondary education in Canada, the $15 figure is now up to $35 or $38, I believe, in those provinces. The remainder of the provinces accepted a proposal whereby Ottawa would transfer the yield of certain tax points—four personal income tax points plus one corporation tax point. Again, that also has been slightly increased, and it is now about 4.4 personal income tax points and one corporation tax point. Then followed the payment of a supplementary grant or an equalization grant to bring the transfers from Ottawa, to the provinces concerned, up to half the approved cost of operating the universities in a particular province.

On the face of it, this seemed like a pretty good arrangement. Indeed, at the outset I must acknowledge that this enabled a great growth to take place in the universities of Canada in the last third of the 1960s and the first years of the 1970s. Over the last six years this kind of support has been a lifesaver to the universities of Canada, but it has also perpetuated some inequities which it would be desirable for us to correct, if we could possibly manage to do so.

First of all, the effect of this formula has been to give the most generous support to the richest provinces. It is just as simple as this: If you can get half the cost of a Cadillac provided by someone else but you cannot buy the Cadillac because you cannot afford the other half, then you do not get it. So the wealthiest provinces in Canada, those which have been able to spend more of their own money in support of the universities, notably Ontario and Alberta, have received the greatest benefits under the 1966 formula for post-secondary education support, while provinces that could only afford to buy a Chevrolet, or some more modest educational vehicle not in the Cadillac class, have been able to draw down in support from Ottawa only half the cost of their reduced programs.

The result has been, I am sorry to say, that while it has supported great improvement in the universities—and no one should disparage the value of this support—it has tended to increase the disparity between the universities in the wealthy parts of Canada and the universities in those parts of Canada which are not so well off. I would hope, therefore, that when the arrangements are renegotiated this time some device might be found to remedy this situation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Does the disparity about which my honourable friend is speaking apply to all of the universities in the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Well, here one must say that we have been very good in the Atlantic provinces at belt-tightening, and I would not say that we have lagged behind the rest of Canada in either growth, with some exceptions, or the quality of our educational services. But we have lagged behind in average salaries and in all the statistics that so often compare the Atlantic provinces disadvantageously with other parts of Canada.

The answer is that Nova Scotia chooses to take from Ottawa a transfer payment equal to half the operating cost of the universities. The other three provinces, as I said before, take so many dollars per capita, which in this current year I believe is between $35 and $38. This means, for example, that if a professor in Nova Scotia is paid $15,000 the Government of Nova Scotia eventually draws from Ottawa $7,500, but that same professor in Ontario would be paid $20,000, in which case the Government of Ontario would draw $10,000 from the Government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask you a question, Senator Hicks? Are you using "per capita" in terms of the population of the province, or the population of the universities?

Hon. Mr. Hicks: The population of the province, not of the universities.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Well, there is some relationship between the population of the universities and the grants in New Brunswick, because we are now in deep trouble there.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I am not saying there is no relationship, but the moneys that the government of New Brunswick is entitled to take as transfer payments from the Government of Canada are calculated on the population of the province. The government of New Brunswick then distributes those moneys among the universities in New Brunswick in proportion, although not in exact proportion, to the population of the universities, allowing for certain weighting factors and taking cognizance of the fact that it is more expensive to educate a student at the PhD. level in chemistry at U.N.B. than it is to educate a student in a bachelor of arts program at Mount Allison, and so on. There are various complicated arrangements like this.

Furthermore, the province of New Brunswick, since the moneys that it can get from Ottawa are limited by the population of the province, has decreed that that money should be spent largely for students from New Brunswick. This has had the result that the universities of New Brunswick have been fixing quotas in relation to the numbers of students who may attend New Brunswick universities from other provinces in Canada. I am going to deal with that very matter in a minute, because it is, in my view, an undesirable result of these transfer payments in terms of the interests of the whole of Canada as one nation. New Brunswick is not the only province that has devices in its educational finance programs which have this result which I consider undesirable.

In any event, the thing that concerns me is the fact that the effect of this program has been to provincialize the universities of Canada. Senator Burchill has given me the opportunity to state the case in New Brunswick. Some other provinces have already started inquiries—none has yet adopted the policy, I am glad to say, but they have started inquiries which would have the effect of raising fees against students from outside the province, because the federal money that comes to a particular province does nothing to ensure that there shall be the same availability of places in the universities of that province to students from outside. For example, there would not be the same availability of places in the universities of Quebec, let us say, to students from Ontario as there would be to students from the province of Quebec.

It is my contention, honourable senators, that one function which the universities of Canada ought to play is a unifying function within the Canadian federation. Surely the Government of Canada ought to recognize that one of the important ways that this country can be held together, that the people of the West Coast can be made to understand the problems of Central Canada and the East Coast, and vice versa, that the people of French-speaking expression in Canada can be made to understand, and become aware of, and sympathize with, the problems of English-speaking people in Canada, and, perhaps even more important, that the people from the English-speaking provinces can become aware of the problems of the province of Quebec, is for young men and women during some part of their educational experience to have the opportunity of studying in a university that is not in their home town, or even in their home province, and, as a consequence, have the benefit of seeing something of the offerings that are available to them in other parts of Canada.

A secondary result of this kind of support, although it is not in the direct grants, also flows from the way in which students are supported by the system of student loans. Again this is administered by provincial authorities, and some provinces, on differing bases, add to it moneys of their own, either by way of loans or by way of bursaries. But even the federal money that can be loaned to a university student can be so controlled by the provinces that assistance can be denied to students coming from another province.

To give an example, I know of one case which entailed some degree of hardship. A student who had been attending a university in Nova Scotia, with support provided by the armed services, took his first degree and served the requisite number of years in the air force. He was discharged from the air force in the province of Quebec. He came back to Nova Scotia to undertake graduate work but found that he did not qualify for a student loan in Nova Scotia because he did not have the residence qualification in Nova Scotia. He was told by the authorities of Nova Scotia to apply for the student loan in Quebec since that is where he had been discharged from the air force. But he found that he could not meet the residence qualification for a student loan in the province of Quebec either, unless he went to a university in Quebec. It seems to me that it is quite wrong when federal moneys can be used so that it is made more difficult for young Canadians to study in the universities of their choice, particularly in universities outside their own provinces.

• (1600)

Surely if the federal government is going to provide moneys by programs like this, it ought to ensure that those moneys are available to Canadians all across the country to study at universities all across the country.

Therefore, I say that while the universities of Canada might have been, and I hope they will become, a great unifying influence within the Canadian confederation, partly because of policies of financial support, they have not played their part in developing a Canadian unity and a Canadian consciousness which I think they are capable of doing, and indeed, honourable senators, which I think they must do if this country of ours is to stay together.

So, to sum up this part of my remarks, it seems to me that universities do serve the whole nation, and that they ought to be supported on an equitable basis, as between one another, from the federal treasury, regardless of the province in which they are located.

I know, honourable senators, that we have fallen into the habit of thinking it is anathema to Canadians in some parts of Canada that the federal government should participate directly in the support of universities. Speaking for myself, I do not believe that this is undesirable. Indeed, I believe that it is desirable, and I make no bones about stating my views on this. I think the universities of Canada ought to be supported in part directly from the federal treasury, and that the level of that support ought to be exactly the same to the universities of Newfoundland as it is to the universities of Alberta or British Columbia or wherever else they may be. That at least would ensure that a fair portion of the income of universities everywhere would be derived at the same rate as in the richest provinces in Canada.

It should also be pointed out that another result of the present system of transfer payments to the provinces has made it possible for the governments of some provinces to take the moneys, which are calculated on the basis of the expenditures of the universities in the province, but not to turn it over to the universities. This was notably the case in three of the Atlantic provinces.

In Nova Scotia, for example, Mr. Stanfield, who was the Premier of the province when the new formula came into operation, saved money for the taxpayer of Nova Scotia for three whole years under the Pearson formula. In later years, it is true, the proportion of expenditures contributed by the Government of Nova Scotia has risen rapidly. But there were three years when the amount of Nova Scotia money put into universities was actually less than it was in the year 1966-1967, the last year when there were direct grants from the federal treasury through the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, as it had then become, and direct grants from the provincial government to the universities.

In addition, the situation in British Columbia is well known. I do not think there one could say that it was because of lack of financial ability to support the universities at adequate levels, but the government of the day in British Columbia also did not turn over to the universities the moneys they derived from Ottawa under the so-called Pearson formula. Let me put it this way: If they turned over that money, then they withdrew some of the money which they themselves had previously been giving to the universities.

Therefore, honourable senators, I make no bones about my position, popular or unpopular as it may be. I think in the long run the Government of Canada ought to recognize the national importance of universities, it ought to recognize the national contribution of universities, and it ought to find some device for supporting the universities of Canada through a uniform formula which would apply to all universities across the country. It may very well be that the thinking is rigid in some parts of Canada—and here I am not speaking exclusively of the province of Quebec either, although it is quite true that in the province of Quebec it is generally felt that direct grants to the universities would not be a desirable course of action to pursue. I suggest that this view is not held even today by a great many—I cannot say most—university people in the province of Quebec, and I wonder even if it is held by the rank and file of the people.

I wonder how significant it is that politicians, at whatever level they operate, are naturally inclined to want to control things at that level. The federal government would be naïve if it thought that when the grants to support the universities of Nova Scotia were announced as "so many millions of dollars per year," the provincial government was going to say, "And of this amount we will recover half or some larger proportion from the Government in Ottawa." The federal presence in university support is virtually not known at all by the rank and file of people because the moneys that are transferred to the provinces by the tax points and the equalization payments are taken into provincial government revenues, and then the moneys that are paid out to the universities are paid out as if they were exclusively provincial grants.

My submission, honourable senators, is that in the long run this is not a healthy situation for our country, and some day the federal government—and I feel confident about this—will feel that it should once more get back into the situation of supporting the universities of Canada by direct subvention from the federal treasury, to be worked out in some way perhaps between the federal government and the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

Here again my friend Dr. Corry made a very cogent remark when he said, "The university has today become a public utility of a most important kind." That is true; it is a public utility of a most important kind in a complex federal state such as ours. Their importance cannot be ignored by the federal government, and the obligation of the federal government to provide direct support ought not to be shirked or postponed any longer than absolutely necessary.

Honourable senators, I have referred in my remarks this afternoon primarily to direct support of Canadian universities. Some of the principles which I have enunciated, indeed most of them, apply to both current and capital support. I did not mention that the federal government during the early years of the Canada Council embarked upon a program of direct capital support to Canada's universities, and this was done, with the limited amounts of money available, in a most equitable way, and was very acceptable to the universities. The federal government then withdrew from the area of capital support, except under very special circumstances—grants by the National Research Council for major equipment installations or major research projects, and in one or two instances by special agencies of government. The federal government withdrew from the area of capital support when it adopted the Pearson formula and said, in effect, "Since we are paying half of the operating costs of universities, we will leave capital support to the provincial governments." This again was all right with some governments, but it worked hardships on the universities in some other areas, and it did not result in a uniform practice across the country. Naturally, this operated to the detriment of universities in some of the less affluent parts of Canada.

I also recognize, of course, that the federal government does give substantial support to other forms of post-secondary education, and because I have talked about universities this afternoon, I would not want any honourable senator to think that I am of the opinion that the university is the only instrument for post-secondary or higher education. This, of course, is not true, and I do not hold that view. But I think the entrance of the federal government into the field of support of post-secondary education and training in vocational, technical and manpower retraining schemes is not subject to the same kind of criticism, and hence I have dealt largely this afternoon with support for the universities.

I have also, honourable senators, not dealt at any great length with research because again I recognize that the question of support of research, while being very important, is a matter where the federal government has a long history of successful participation. But I, for one, am just a little bit worried about the tampering with the National Research Council that has been recommended by many other agencies in this capital city, and, indeed, even by a committee of this very chamber. I think we should be very cautious about dismantling the National Research Council or stripping it of some of the prerogatives that it has discharged so well for so many years. I would want to be very sure that we have provided adequate alternatives before we take granting powers—and I am referring largely to the support of research and graduate programs in universities—away from the National Research Council.

In any event, I favour direct participation on the part of the federal government in support of research as well, without the kind of provincial intervention which, I am afraid, will delay and limit and circumscribe research activities in our country.

Honourable senators, I think I could not do better by way of conclusion than to read the last paragraph in an article reprinted from The Journal of Politics entitled "The Universities and Governments Under Canadian Federalism." This was written by an American professor at Duke University where they have a very good centre for commonwealth studies. R. Taylor Cole, writing on this subject as a friendly American with a great deal of knowledge about Canada and its universities, strikes a note that should be of concern to all Canadians today. He says:

> In appraising the role played by universities in Canadian federalism, it is clear that they have been one focal point for adjustments in the process of arriving at a flexible balance between the centrifugal and centripetal forces that are operative. It is difficult in the long run to determine in which direction the power pendulum is moving, though at the moment the pressures away from the centre toward the provinces are strong. The separatist demand from Quebec is particularly significant, and the faculty and students of the universities may be increasingly affected by it. It is also possible, however, that in the long run the university elites will furnish the basis for some type of national unity. There is reason to expect that the Canadian universities will continue to provide, even from different cultural perspectives, some of the key members of the political or bureaucratic elites who can and will speak the language of accommodation. And in that crucial role may lie the future importance of the university for Canadian federalism.

Honourable senators, I think we in this chamber, and the government, cannot ignore the vital role which Canada's universities ought to play and must play in the future of our country, and in the preservation of national unity which depends upon the kind of understanding and tolerance which ought to characterize the functions of a sophisticated university in any society, and certainly in a federal society.

Hon. Mr. Graham: I wonder if Senator Hicks would permit a question. My question arises out of the extensive coverage given in the Nova Scotia press yesterday of an exhaustive report on the state of the health care delivery system in that province. It was submitted to the Province of Nova Scotia by the Health Council of Nova Scotia. In its report the Council suggested that the supply of doctors in Nova Scotia was approaching what it described as an adequate number. However, I suspect the distribution of those doctors throughout the province still leaves a good deal to be desired.

The report went on to say that an expansion of dental training facilities in Nova Scotia is needed immediately and that the government should take the initiative in defining support for an institution which is very dear to your heart, the Dalhousie Dental School.

In another section of the report, reference was made to what was described as an acute shortage of dentists in the province. In a survey it was found that at least two counties had no dental service whatsoever.

In the Nova Scotia Legislature last week a Cape Breton member, who is also a dentist, Dr. Michael Laffin, suggested that greater use could be made of the facilities available at the Dalhousie Dental School. He suggested that with two shifts a day, with weekend and summer classes, the number of graduates in dentistry in Nova Scotia could very well be doubled.

My question is this: In view of the acute shortage of dentists in Nova Scotia, is such a program as proposed by Dr. Laffin feasible and, if so, is this the kind of program which might be undertaken with greater financial assistance from either or both the provincial and federal governments?

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Honourable senators, the question that Senator Graham has asked is, of course, one of great importance not only to Nova Scotia but to all four Atlantic provinces, since the facilities at my university for medical and dental education have for many years satisfied the needs of Canada's four Atlantic provinces. The medical school established in Newfoundland, which will graduate its first class in 1973, will add to the facilities for training medical doctors, but not dentists.

I think it may very well be that the supply of medical doctors has been greatly improved as a result of enlarging the Dalhousie Medical School, and of the coming into operation of the medical school at Memorial University. However, I do not think there are reliable statistics that would show there are too many medical doctors available in the Atlantic provinces of Canada, although there may be areas such as greater Halifax where there is as large a concentration of doctors per 100,000 people as you will find anywhere in Canada. I do not think we have reached the point yet where doctors are going around looking for patients, or are unemployed. Indeed, from the number of patients who are endeavouring to get an appointment with a medical doctor in almost any part of the Atlantic provinces, you would come to the conclusion there are not too many doctors.

The medical profession cannot be blamed for being interested in its own future. Doctors are beginning to see that they cannot have everything their own way today as perhaps they had 20 years ago, but that is another matter. I do not think the medical training facilities at Memorial University and Dalhousie University will provide an oversupply of medical doctors for many years to come.

The situation regarding dentists is, of course, far more serious. The Dalhousie Dental School was designed to handle only 24 dentists in a class, although they crowd two or three others in as well. This is not enough to provide for even the replacement needs in the four Atlantic provinces today. We have had plans, not to double our dental school, but to nearly triple it for many years. Indeed, the Health Resources Fund has had allocated from it for the support of a new dental school at Dalhousie the sum of $10 million by agreement with the four Atlantic provinces going back some years now. However, we need greater sums than this. This $10 million is entirely federal money, although some of it is money allocated under the special Atlantic provinces allotment of the Health Resources Fund, and it requires the concurrence of the governments of each of the provinces in order for it to be used anywhere in the four provinces. As I said, the $10 million was earmarked for a new dental school some years ago, but the costs of such a school will run to 50 per cent more than this amount, and perhaps even more than 50 per cent.

The feeling of the Government of Nova Scotia is that the other Atlantic provinces should make some contribution toward these additional costs. They have as yet been unable to agree as to how or to what extent they should make such a contribution. So far as Dalhousie University is concerned, we have taken the view that we cannot raise $5 million or, indeed, any significant part of that for the construction of a new dental facility. With the public concern for the provision of health services these days, we feel that it is no longer possible for a private university to finance the capital and operating expenses for medical or dental education. I think it has to be plainly acknowledged on behalf of us Maritimers, or Atlantic province people, that so far as the Government of Canada is concerned it has done its part and made its contribution available from the Health Resources Fund, and we should get together and agree among ourselves as to how we will finance the balance of it.

The other part of Senator Graham's question had to do with the doubling of the school's present facilities. Much of the teaching of dentistry, I am advised by others more knowledgeable than I, depends upon the availability of clinical facilities. We cannot carry out a 24-hour day operation and provide enough clinical services. We would have to have enlarged clinical facilities. In training a medical student the clinical services are provided by the affiliated hospitals. In training a dental student the dental school must provide its own clinical facilities. I think it is impossible to enlarge our present class without enlarging those clinical facilities. Negotiations are proceeding far too slowly in so far as the members of the university are concerned, and far too slowly in so far as the interests of the people of the Atlantic provinces are concerned.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask a question relating to another phase of Senator Hicks' remarks? When he advocates federal grants directly to universities, and doing away with provincial government intervention, does he advocate the universities dealing directly with the federal authorities?

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I wish to be careful how I answer that question. Yes, I favour the federal government supporting the universities directly. Now, this might very well be through the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. Obviously the federal government is not going to make individual bargains with the 60-odd universities which exist in Canada today, but they could do it through the university association. I do not think it is necessary for them to do it through provincial governments; that is my point.

However, I think the provincial governments also have an interest in and obligation toward the universities in the province. The provincial government should also continue to support the universities to the extent that seems appropriate. Of course, this is where the different interests of the people in one part of Canada compared with another can be reflected. If the people of Alberta, for example, are more interested in excellent universities than the people of Nova Scotia, then the Government of Alberta could reflect that in the measure of support that it affords to the universities in that province. However, at the same time there would be a certain basic support which would be common throughout Canada for the universities in every province.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: Senator Hicks, you did not tell us whether Nova Scotia made a good deal in these arrangements while the three other Atlantic provinces made a different deal.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Yes, Nova Scotia made a good deal, but the circumstances in Nova Scotia were different from those obtaining in the other provinces. We have a great many universities in Nova Scotia in proportion to our population and, until very recently, we had the largest proportion of university students, in comparison with our population, of any province in Canada. We have fallen back a little in the last few years. Nova Scotia's election to take transfer payments calculated on half the actual operating costs of the universities resulted in a higher level of support for Nova Scotia than would have been the case if we had chosen as the other three Atlantic provinces chose.

It is very interesting to note that in 1967-68 the range of federal support on a per capita basis—they did not all take it on a per capita basis, as I have explained—across Canada was from $15 to $27. Alberta received the most; the Atlantic provinces the least. It is estimated that during the current year the per capita range across Canada is from $35 to $55, with the Atlantic provinces and British Columbia bringing up the rear. The reason for British Columbia's being in this category is that its government has not seen fit to support its universities at as generous a level as the universities of Alberta and Ontario have been supported.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: May I ask one further question of Senator Hicks, and preface it by expressing my appreciation for the excellent summary—in fact, I would say one of the finest summaries I have heard—of the university situation. I can speak with a little authority on this because, as some honourable senators know, I was for a period of seven years in all the Minister of Education in Newfoundland, during which time we virtually created a new university in Canada.

In his advocacy of "nationalizing" the universities—I do not mean that in the accepted sense, but in the sense that more and more there would be an interchange of students and so on—I wonder if Senator Hicks also suggests that students who go from one province to another should enjoy the same financial assistance that a province grants its own students? I think, for example, of student aid in Newfoundland. We give free tuition to a goodly number of our students, and additional student aid to possibly 90 per cent, which varies from perhaps $100 up to a very substantial amount—$700 or $800 altogether. Would Senator Hicks suggest that if an Ontario student decided to go to Memorial, he should be given the same assistance by the Newfoundland government that Newfoundland students enjoy, and, if so, should this become a national policy?

Hon. Mr. Hicks: Senator Rowe, I did not go that far. I did go so far as to say that where federal government funds are used they ought to be available to the student from Ontario at Memorial on exactly the same basis as they are available to the students from Newfoundland studying at Memorial. My own personal inclination is to avoid any discrimination relating to the origin of students. I would like to see all student support made available to students wherever they come from, but one realizes that this could be carried to ridiculous lengths. Therefore, I would not think, speaking in this place, that it is up to me to say to the Governments of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Quebec or anywhere else, that they must offer their scholarships to students from outside their own province on exactly the same basis as they are offered to students from that province.

Ideally, the student should be supported first by a scholarship, in accordance with his intellectual excellence, and secondly by a bursary. We usually distinguish between scholarship and bursary, as Senator Rowe knows. The bursary is awarded in accordance with the student's financial needs. Neither of these should be related to geography.

At the same time, while I am anxious to bring about a large degree of mobility among students from different parts of Canada, I do not think we would want all Newfoundland students to elect to go to the University of British Columbia, and vice versa. It would be unhealthy if the majority of students at the honourable senator's university, or at my own, were not students from our own provinces.

In Nova Scotia we have had in the past a high proportion of students coming from most of the other provinces, but in recent years the number has steadily diminished. The situation is somewhat different in Western Canada. The number of students attending Western Canadian universities from outside has generally been smaller than those at Eastern universities. In my judgment, it would be unhealthy, in the interests of both Western Canadian universities and people generally if the number of out-of-province students in Western Canada should diminish further.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I should like to make a brief intervention by congratulating Senator Hicks on a most valuable contribution to our thinking on university education in Canada. It was a magnificent presentation. In listening to his speech, I was concerned, as a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Science Policy, about a term which has been used rather loosely by the press. I refer to the alleged interference with and dismantling of the National Research Council.

This term has had wide circulation in the press. I wish to emphasize, as a member of the committee, and one who has great respect for the accomplishments of the National Research Council, that there is no intention whatsoever on the part of the Standing Senate Committee on Science Policy to dismantle the National Research Council. On the contrary, by suggesting changes which we consider appropriate, we wish to strengthen it, and make it more effective.

Hon. Mr. Hicks: I may have been unduly influenced by press reports rather than a careful reading of the report, which I look forward to completing.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator O'Leary, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Monday, February 19, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

May I be permitted to remind the honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Capital Budget of Canadian Arsenals Limited for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1973-281, dated February 1, 1973, approving same.

THE SENATE

DISPLAY OF CANADIAN FLAG IN CHAMBER

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I have the honour to move, seconded by Honourable Senator Flynn:

That the Honourable the Speaker be authorized as of February 15, 1973, to display the Canadian flag in the Senate Chamber in such location as she chooses.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to ask the government leader a question concerning the motion we adopted a few moments ago with regard to displaying the flag in the chamber on special occasions. Has any thought been given to displaying the flag at all times?

Hon. Mr. Martin: The flag will be displayed at all times.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: The motion was read quite fast and I was under the impression that it said on special occasions.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No; at all times, every day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do honourable senators wish me to put the question again?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator McIlraith has something he wishes to say about the wording of the motion.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, as I heard the motion, I understood it to read that the flag would be displayed as of February 15. My understanding of what was intended was from and after February 15.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: I now have the motion, and the word "location" is quite clear. I heard "on such occasions."

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is my fault.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate I will move:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to consider any matter affecting the internal economy of the Senate, and that it report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On a motion like that we would have given leave to proceed today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is very generous.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Could I ask Senator Molgat whether the Internal Economy Committee has met yet?

Hon. Mr. Molgat: No, it has not, but an organization meeting is expected to be held soon. This motion is required so that the committee can proceed with some work at its first meeting, if necessary; otherwise, the first meeting would be for organizational purposes only.

CONSUMER CREDIT

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not certain whether I should put this as a question or an inquiry. I know that the government leader does not have the information handy. It may not be a verbal question, and I apologize if I am in error.

I should like the Leader of the Government to table a statement covering salaries and expenses incurred by professional personnel, such as counsel and accountants, retained by the Joint Committee on Consumer Credit which sat and made a report about 1965-1966.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will see that it is done forthwith.

CRIMINAL CODE (CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Cameron for the second reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Criminal Code (control of weapons and firearms).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to yield at this time to the Honourable Senator Rowe.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has Honourable Senator Rowe leave to proceed in place of Honourable Senator Macdonald?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, perhaps the most comprehensive survey ever made on the problem of private arms was that done by Time magazine in its issue of June 21, 1968. I strongly recommend that all those interested in this matter at the present time refresh their memories by reading that article again. The library will gladly make copies of it available, as it did for me this morning.

This article outlines the incredible abuses in the United States associated with private arms, and the equally incredible lengths to which the private arms industry, through its spokesman or its agent—unofficial agent—the National Rifle Association, is prepared to go to protect its profits by discrediting and opposing all efforts to introduce some effective controls in the Congress of the United States.

I should observe at this time that Time magazine has never been regarded as a communistic publication, nor as an advocate of wild-eyed radicalism and fanaticism.

I must take complete issue with our respected colleague Senator Manning on this question. Statistics, in any part of the world where they have been compiled, impartially show the same result. Those countries or societies which have the most stringent gun control laws have fewer murders. Another way of putting it is that the fewer the guns in circulation, the fewer the murders.

It is totally unnecessary for anyone to argue that murders can be committed in other ways than by shooting. Stabbing and strangling are methods that have been used over and over again, and will continue to be used. No one has yet disproved the simple fact that the most convenient, effective and efficient way to commit murder is with a gun. Surely it is not merely coincidence that every leading figure assassinated in the United States since 1865 was killed by a gun of one kind or another. Lincoln, Garfield, McKinley, John Kennedy, Robert Kennedy, Dr. King and Malcolm X were all killed by guns. It is also not a coincidence that virtually every attempted assassination of a leading public figure has been through the medium of a gun. With Roosevelt, Truman, Wallace in recent times, and others, all attempts involved guns, not knives, not bare hands.

I have knocked around the world a fair amount, and if I had to be confronted by a crisis involving my life, given the choice of being faced with bare hands which were trying to strangle me, a knife or a gun, which would I prefer, which would I be most afraid to be confronted with?

A factor that seems to be left out of our consideration is that every community or society, no matter how stringent the regulations, no matter how strong the laws to protect human life, has always had, and will continue to have, what one might call a basic number of murders. These murders are usually domestic in origin, the commonest one perhaps being typified by the traditional picture of the husband who catches his wife in a compromising situation and seizes the first weapon at hand, or if there is no weapon uses his own hands, to dispatch her. The other type of murder in this basic group or reservoir of murders, as I have called it, results from paranoia of one kind or another, from psychiatric aberrations of one kind or another. Included among these are most of the so-called sex murders. I regret to have to say that also included in this basic group—although I do not think it should be; I think it is a national disgrace in Canada that it is there—is the large number of helpless and innocent children who are battered to death by their parents or by other close relatives. Since we are apparently not prepared to do anything about that we must, I presume, continue to regard those murders as being part of that basic group which will continue in our society.

If we ever attain Utopia we will still have some of these murders. Most of them cannot be anticipated, and most of them are unpreventable.

In the American society today the murder rate has risen out of all proportion. Obviously, there must be factors other than those I have referred to, the basic ones resulting from domestic discord, paranoia and psychiatric aberrations. For example, in 1971, in Detroit—which I cite because it happens to be the nearest big American city to Canada—there were 20 murders for every murder committed in Toronto, a couple of hundred miles away. Why? I know that the social climate in Detroit is different from that of Toronto, but we do not have to stick to Detroit. Why does Houston have so many more murders per capita than Vancouver? In Baltimore which is smaller than Montreal, there were ten murders for every murder committed in Montreal.

I am sure one could find many answers to these questions, but there are certainly two facts which stand out above all others. First, taking Detroit, the ratio of guns in circulation in Detroit, as far as can be ascertained by competent investigators, as compared with guns in circulation in Toronto, correlates almost exactly with the respective murder rates in those two cities—20 to 1.

But there is a far more important factor at work. The number of murders, not just in Detroit but in all major American cities, is in almost direct proportion to the number of hard drug addicts. Again, the ratio of hard drug addicts in America, as against Canadian cities, is almost precisely in the same ratio as the murder rate in those cities. Surely it is not an accident when the ratio of guns in circulation, the ratio of drug addicts, and the ratio of murders in American cities as compared with Canadian cities is so exact?

I tried just a year ago here in this chamber to sound a warning in this matter. I said then that with conditions as they are in American cities, it is only a matter of time before our hard drug addiction rate would rise. Events of the past year have validated that prediction. It gives me no pleasure to say something which is known to all honourable senators. The hard drug addiction rate in our cities has risen. I said also at that time that the murder rate in our cities would rise in direct proportion with the hard drug addiction rate. The latest figures, as we saw today, indicate that this also is happening. These three things go hand in hand—availability of guns, hard drug addiction, and murder.

We are living in a fool's paradise if we think that with our present policies here in Canada we can escape the fate that has overtaken so many American cities, which have become jungles and where life for the innocent and law-abiding citizens has become a nightmare. Give a gun to a hard drug addict, and you may have given a gun to a madman no more responsible for his actions than is the most serious sexual psychopath locked up in one of our institutions. This explains why so many robberies now result in irrational murders. There was a case recently in Washington where a respected senior citizen, a senator, was robbed of $5 or $10 just outside his own home. The two young robbers took his money and said they were going to kill him. They shot him, but as far as I know he is still alive, unless he died in the last twenty-four hours. This was a completely irrational act, with no explanation for it. The police commissioner in New York, and every police commissioner in the United States, reports that the murder rate has gone up in proportion to the hard drug addiction rate. That is the explanation.

These are not rational human beings out merely to rob in the sense that someone would pick your pocket or try to rifle something out of a supermarket. These are madmen and, in some cases, madwomen, who are not responsible for their behaviour because they are under the influence of hard drugs.

One of the most frightening aspects of this whole situation—and this is the last aspect of it that I intend to deal with today—is that once more we have here an example of big business, as represented by the multibillion-dollar private arms industry, being prepared to go to any length to protect their investments and their profits.

But we should not be surprised by this, because we have seen examples of it in other fields. For instance, there are the drugs that come from the so-called legitimate drug industry. I am not talking about the Mafia. The people in that "legitimate" drug industry are prepared to put improperly tested drugs on the market and they will fight like maniacs to keep those drugs there, in spite of the demonstrated fact that those drugs might cause suffering and death among the unsuspecting population.

Even today, for example, we still have these drug companies hanging on desperately to their practice of putting on the market for children deadly drugs in the form of candy. I did not mean to refer to this, but last week it happened that in my own family my two-year old grandchild got access to a bottle of candied drugs. I realize that you might very well say that he should not have been able to get access to them, but it happens even in the best regulated homes. In any event, he got access to the bottle of candied drugs and within a minute or two had devoured the entire contents. Only the alertness of his mother and the purely good luck of having a hospital within five minutes of their home so that he could be there and within 20 minutes have his stomach pumped out are all that saved him from becoming one more casualty on the altar of profit. And that is all it means—one more casualty! Between 300 and 400 children died in the United States last year from the same cause. The drug companies know that.

And look at the tobacco industry. I am not talking about the humble grower of tobacco who is the victim of circumstances, but I am talking about the great multibillion-dollar tobacco interests. Nor are these companies confined to the United States. Have these great corporations spent tens of millions of dollars in trying to find a cure for cancer, in trying to eliminate the injurious ingredients from tobacco? No! They have spent tens of millions of dollars in trying to discredit the legitimate findings of medical science in every country of the world. They have spent that money in trying to discredit those results, in trying to prove them to be untrue. They have finally given that cause up, but they are still continuing to spend—and I say this deliberately—hundreds of millions of dollars every year to seduce our young people into smoking. They link up smoking with romance and sex, virility and athletic prowess and other things that young people consider desirable and are interested in. Hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent by them this year for that purpose.

The motor car industry is another example of what I am talking about. Over and over cars have been put on the market with known lethal defects, defects that could have been removed. But these people have put the cars on the road knowing that they were going to cause human suffering and death.

Honourable senators, no one knows better than I do that big business is not automatically immoral and irresponsible. We have many examples of morality and responsibility in big business right in our own country. I am happy to say, but I want to state with all the emphasis at my command that while I believe in democracy and I want democracy to work, because my people just like your people have worked, suffered and in some cases died to preserve that democracy, the irresponsible and totally immoral practices of some of those great corporations—for example, the drug companies—are such that they are just as guilty of pushing their so-called legitimate addictive drugs as is the lowest and most reprehensible mafia agent in Harlem today. They are pushers making money out of the blood, misery, suffering and in some cases death of human beings who become addicted to those drugs because, honourable senators, drug companies are pushing them on an unsuspecting public. There are people going into drugstores today and coming out with these drugs whom you could not under any circumstances persuade to experiment with heroin or LSD. Nevertheless, they are becoming addicts. Therefore I say that these great corporations represent a far more serious threat to our democratic way of life than does any other factor.

No one who has followed in recent years the acquisition of power by big business in the United States should fail to realize that that great nation, with which our own destinies are so inextricably intertwined—and it gives me no pleasure whatever to say this, and I hope I am wrong in saying it—has all the ingredients necessary for becoming, and indeed at this very moment may be in the process of becoming, a fascist society. While this may be a pessimistic point of view, I feel that we as a nation would be most derelict in our duty if we simply shrugged our shoulders and failed to take note of what is happening in that country, or failed to take appropriate action here to prevent the disintegration that can take place in Canadian society as it is at this moment taking place in American society.

Hon. Mr. Davey: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Rowe if he would again identify the issue of Time magazine he has referred to. I should also be interested to know if the article contained the relevant Canadian statistics.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: It is the issue of June 21, 1968. I went through it this morning and to the best of my recollection there are no specific Canadian statistics. There are incidental references to circumstances and situations in other countries, but no specific reference to Canada.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 13, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to make a contribution in this debate and to underline some of the adverse effects that high and discriminatory freight rates are having at this time in Western Canada.

We have heard much about Western alienation. We have heard recently, particularly in the Prairie provinces, much about people being anti-Ottawa and being upset by the kind of treatment they have been given. One of the sorest points is the continued increasing discrimination regarding freight rates and their effect on Western Canada.

I am pleased that the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean Marchand, early in January used his good offices to persuade the railway companies to postpone an imminent increase in the freight rates. He is to be commended for taking this action. As a Westerner, I am also encouraged by some of the steps the government has taken regarding Western Canada. I am pleased that the Honourable James Richardson, on every occasion where he has had the opportunity, has spoken loudly and effectively on behalf of Western Canada.

I am pleased that the Honourable Otto Lang, in dealing with the grain situation in Canada, particularly on behalf of the producers in Western Canada, has had most outstanding success in selling our grain at the most acceptable current prices. Nonetheless, I think it is well that the Senate should be aware of some of the discrimination that currently applies regarding freight rates. One look at economic measures and I can think of no single greater action that the federal government could take than to remove some of the discrimination regarding freight rates in an endeavour to help Western Canada. Nothing would be greater than this.

I have a few examples of the kind of discrimination about which I speak. Railway revenues per ton mile for moving iron and steel products from Eastern Canada to Regina and Saskatoon are respectively 131 per cent and 134 per cent higher than are the rail revenues per ton mile generated on similar movements to Vancouver. No wonder it is difficult for companies to operate in the Prairie provinces when they have to pay for iron and steel products rates so much higher than those that are paid for shipments between Eastern Canada and Vancouver. Saskatchewan has pointed out that it is difficult for pulp and paper industries in that province because of the discriminatory freight rates. For example, to ship pulp from Prince Albert to the East the ton rate is 60 cents more than from Hinton, Alberta, or from Kraft, British Columbia, to the East; but the differential becomes higher by $3.80 per ton and $4.80 per ton respectively for shipments from Prince Albert as compared to shipments from Hinton, Alberta, and from Kraft, B.C., to U.S. Pacific markets.

Those are a couple of examples of the discriminatory freight rates against which producers must operate their businesses in the Prairie provinces.

Saskatchewan has a potash industry. The market has been somewhat restricted in recent years. Freight costs are exceedingly high in relation to the value of potash. There was an increase in freight rates for potash of 70 cents a ton in June of 1972. The potash producers complained that the railways should not have charged this additional rate. They pointed out that they had an agreement with the railway companies at the previous rate. The agreement was that the railway companies, in cars supplied by the potash industry, would have a turnaround time of 12 days at the West Coast. Instead, the turnaround time was from 17 to 18 days. The original agreement between the potash industry of Saskatchewan and the two large railway companies in Canada was that this rate would apply on a single car shipment basis. The potash industry pointed out that the railways, operating efficiently as they have been, have taken potash to the West Coast in unit trains and therefore have made substantial savings for themselves by this operation. They feel that because of these two factors—the longer turnaround time and the savings by taking potash in unit trains—this 70 cents a ton increase should not have taken place. Freight rates absorb 49 per cent of the selling price. These increases make it difficult for industry in Saskatchewan as well as in other parts of the Prairie provinces.

Manitoba presented a brief on freight rates. I am quoting a couple of sentences from the Winnipeg Free Press of February 3, 1973:

> Rates on iron and steel products from Selkirk to Vancouver are identical to those from Montreal to Vancouver, although the Montreal-Vancouver haul is twice as far.

So it is easy to understand why it is difficult for industry in Selkirk to compete with industry in Eastern Canada.

The brief also points out something that I think is most serious, and that is that the freight rates for livestock should be lowered between Calgary and Winnipeg to make possible the slaughtering of cattle in Winnipeg rather than shipping it to Toronto or Montreal for packing.

> Manitoba is concerned that the railway companies are facilitating a transfer of packing house activity from Winnipeg to Toronto-Montreal as a result of rate disparities.

• (1450)

We have had a major packing industry on the Prairies, but it has been disappearing in many places during recent years. The Burns company at Regina announced a year or two ago that it was closing down its operation. It was only after a great public struggle that this operation was kept going, at least on a temporary basis. Western Canada feels it should have an opportunity to industrialize. The way freight rates are affecting that part of the country, it is becoming increasingly difficult for industry to maintain its operations there, so that we are in danger in many instances of losing those few industries that we now have in the Prairie provinces.

A hearing is proceeding before the Canadian Transport Commission with regard to freight rates on oilseed and oilseed products.

The following appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 25, 1972:

> The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Agra Industries Ltd. of Nipawin, Sask., Co-Op Vegetable Oils Ltd. of Altona, Man., and Western Canadian Seed Processors Ltd. of Lethbridge are appealing freight rates applied on rapeseed oil and meal in relation to charges for unprocessed rapeseed.
> The applicants say rates on these products are 50 to 100 per cent higher than charges on shipping unprocessed rapeseed to the same markets for finishing.

They point out that if these rates are not adjusted there is a great danger of the oil-processing industry on the Prairies being transferred to Toronto. The report goes on to say:

> Bulk rapeseed can move from Thunder Bay to Montreal for 44 cents per hundredweight while rapeseed oil going from Saskatchewan to Montreal has a rate of $1.10 per hundredweight and meal costs about $1 per hundredweight.

So that the Prairies are certainly disturbed and up in arms about the continued discrimination in freight rates. The loss of industry is serious. A loss of industry contributes to a loss of population. A loss of population contributes to a loss of political power and a loss of political power contributes again to a further loss of industry and further loss of population. Statistics will show that Saskatchewan, my own province, will experience prosperous times for the next few months and, perhaps, the next year or two, because of higher prices for agricultural products. As a province, however, as a place where one would like to see the population grow, as a place where one would like to see towns and cities grow, I tell my friends in the Senate that Saskatchewan is a sick province. Saskatchewan is very sick economically and, no matter what the housing starts may be in Regina or Saskatoon, these two largest cities of Saskatchewan are basically at this time no-growth centers. They are not growing; they are not expanding, they are standing still. The last figures I saw, which are about a year or so old, indicate that Regina grew by 1,000 in population and Saskatoon lost the same number, or a little more, so that there is no growth when the two cities are combined.

The small communities in Saskatchewan are literally disappearing off the map; they are no longer there. Even the somewhat larger places are having a hard time and their population is decreasing. It is therefore urgent, particularly for Saskatchewan but also for Manitoba, that action be taken soon to see that the unjust burden of freight rates is changed so that industry in that area will have at least a chance.

The talk of freight rates is as old, I guess, as Canada. For a long time there was control by a federal body of freight rates in general that railways could set in Canada. This has changed since 1967, however, mainly because of the recommendations of the MacPherson Royal Commission which was set up when the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker was Prime Minister. Those recommendations were carried out. They said, "Let the railways set their own charges; let competition come in and this will make the best possible state of affairs."

So now the CNR and the CPR are masters of their own rates. They simply file with the Canadian Transport Commission a 30-day notice of intention to increase their rates, and under the law they do so as they see fit. I would suggest that this enormous power in the hands of the railway companies in Canada today should be controlled or taken away. The Honourable Jean Marchand, I would hope, has made a first move in this direction by using his influence to prevent an increase in railway freight rates within the last few weeks. It is easy to see from figures that have been produced recently what happens when an area such as the three Prairie provinces is not growing as it should, when the Maritimes and other parts of Canada are having difficulty in growing as they should.

We come to the point now where in 1972 Ontario had 140,000 of the 250,000 new jobs created in Canada. That is over half of the new jobs in Ontario and less than half for all the rest of Canada. Unemployment dropped in Ontario from 5.2 per cent in 1971 to 4.8 per cent in 1972, the only Canadian region to experience a decline in the jobless percentage. More and more industry to Toronto, more and more activity in Toronto. Siphen off the industry from the Maritimes and the Prairies and we are making Canada to a very major degree a one-province country or, at best, a two-region country. One region is Ontario and the other is all the rest of Canada. Action is required now to see that industry has a chance to grow in other parts of Canada as well as in Ontario.

Another question which I would like to raise in this general field as it applies to Western Canada is a ticklish one and politically sensitive. The government will have great difficulty in coming to a solution that is fair to all. This can be, I think, best demonstrated by the difficulty within the Canadian Federation of Agriculture itself, where producer organizations from Ontario and Quebec have taken a stand very much opposed to the position taken by farm organizations from the Prairies—so much so that delegations walked out of a recent Canadian Federation of Agriculture meeting.

A long time ago it was decided by national policy to provide a measure of freight rate assistance to feeders in Central Canada and the Maritimes by paying part of the freight of feed grains coming east from Western Canada. I think that policy has served a purpose. Perhaps the feeders in Central Canada and those in the Maritimes required some action to make their lot a little easier. However, we should also take a look at what may be the future effect of, shall we say, granting payment from the federal treasury of all freight costs, as is being asked, so that feed costs on the Prairies are identical with feed costs in Ontario, Quebec and Eastern Canada, and see what that does to the agricultural industry on the Prairies, whether it distorts the agricultural industry, and whether or not we want to go far along this road.

I have been pointing out this afternoon the way that discriminatory freight rates have made it impossible for us to have industry on the Prairies, and are in fact threatening the steady removal of the industry we now have to Toronto and Central Canada. Where we have built up a livestock industry, partly because it was economic in relation to the freight rates of this country, it seems to me there is a great deal of pressure on the government to pay more freight rates, to pay more subsidies, so that these prices can be more equal. This, too, in reverse may cause further difficulties for producers on the Prairies, and for Prairie economy generally.

Over the years I have heard a great deal of criticism from colleagues in the other place, and here to a lesser extent, of farmers on the Prairies, when it has been said, "Oh, these farmers just want to produce grain. They all want to work a few months in the summer and then go to Florida and California for the winter." To hear these statements one would think there was no one out on the Prairies today, that they were all in Florida or California. I have to stop and try to think of one or two people who might be on holiday today, which of my neighbours are in the southern United States. Of all the hundreds of farmers I know, I can think of only one who is down there, and he lives a hundred miles away from where I do. So I think the percentage is much less than the holidaying among parliamentarians.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Some people make the same untrue accusations about certain senators, and it is very unfair.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is right.

Our farmers have gone into the livestock business to quite an extent. They are producing hogs and beef cattle. They feel it is perhaps a good thing to finish cattle in the country where the grain is produced, that this should be an economic thing for the country; that perhaps it is not the most economic thing, or should not be the most economic thing, to transport the grain a thousand or two thousand miles and finish the cattle in another locality.

There is the additional real danger of the agricultural industry itself, in a relative way, being removed or transferred from the Prairies to Central Canada. One of the huge advantages the agricultural industry has in Central Canada is the large populations of Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and other big cities; they have the advantage of being very close to a large consumer market. This gives them a substantial advantage over producers on the Prairies. For example, two days ago in Regina producers were being paid for Grade A large eggs 47 cents a dozen; in Toronto producers were being paid 61 cents a dozen. That is a very substantial price benefit for producers in this area. This week in Toronto top grade steers have been selling for $43.44 a hundredweight. In Calgary they have been selling for $40 to $41, which is a $3 per hundredweight advantage to producers of cattle close to Toronto. The same $3 differential applies to hogs.

The Honourable H. A. Olson, who a year ago was Minister of Agriculture, presented a paper in which he showed the higher cost of feed and the higher market prices in Central Canada, the lower cost of feed on the Prairies and the lower prices for finished animals being marketed. His conclusion, and that of the experts who drew up this paper, was that the advantages to a producer on the Prairie relative to one in Central Canada were almost identical, that if you were producing beef and hogs close to Ottawa you got a higher feed grain price, but when you sold them you got higher prices for the animals. A year ago the two things were almost in balance, according to the experts and officials. If that is the case, as I think it is, then any additional move to further increase freight subsidies on grains coming east must distort this picture, and must give a relative advantage to those in Central Canada.

Senator McNamara knows the pricing policies of the Canadian Wheat Board over the years. However, I have made inquiries, and I find that the pricing policy of the Canadian Wheat Board today is to sell feed barley in Central Canadian markets at 20 to 25 cents a bushel cheaper than the Wheat Board receives for the same barley on the export market. Since the Wheat Board is a pooling operation, all this means is that the barley producers on the Prairies are today being paid for the barley they produce and have sold in Central Canada 20 cents a bushel less than they are paid for their barley going on the export market.

It is one thing for the Government of Canada to bonus, to subsidize, a part of Canada, which often should be the case, but it is a very questionable practice for the producers of one part of Canada to be required themselves to subsidize producers in another part. My information leads me to believe that in the production of barley this is being done today by over 20 cents a bushel. When farmers are given the fortuitous advice, "Don't produce so much wheat. Stay in barley production," steps will have to be taken—I think this is elementary—to show the farmers that it is economically just as profitable for them to produce barley as to produce wheat.

I am sure that the Prairie producers will produce all the barley that this country requires, if they have a price for barley that will give them something of the same return as they got for wheat. I suggest to you that if they are going to be required to bonus part of their industry in some other part of Canada, we may wind up with a very severe feed grain shortage in Canada within the next few months.

What happened to agricultural production on the Prairies over the years? We have had a dairy policy that said that the small dairy producers should not receive a subsidy, that one had to be a middle-sized dairy producer or a huge one to get a subsidy for butterfat, or industrial milk—so these subsidies for the small producer were removed.

In 1955, there were just over two million dairy cows in Ontario and Quebec; in 1970 there were just over 1,900,000 dairy cows in Ontario and Quebec. In 1955 there were 788,000 dairy cows in the three Prairie provinces, and in 1970 this had decreased to 431,000. So the dairy industry in the Prairie provinces is being shut down to a substantial degree because of the lack of consumers and large cities on the Prairies, and further because of a policy which took away the price support on butterfat from the small producers. Incidentally, on the Prairies, butter production, creamery production, was mainly from small producers.

Take the chicken industry. In 1955 there were 35 million hens and chickens in Ontario and Quebec; in 1970 this number had grown to 53 million, an increase of 18 million. The three Prairie provinces in 1955 had 22 million; in 1970, 26 million. In other words, the chicken production has shifted in a very substantial way from the Prairie provinces to Ontario and Quebec. No doubt again this is because the very large consumer population is in this part of Canada; nonetheless, it has reduced the opportunity for production in this field on the Prairies.

Turkey production used to be quite an industry in the Prairie provinces. In 1955 there were 1,600,000 turkeys in Ontario and Quebec; in 1970 there were 6,100,000 almost four times the number. In the three Prairie provinces, the total of turkeys in 1955 was 1.7 million; in 1970 it was 2.4 million, a very modest increase of some one-third as against the fourfold increase in turkey population in Central Canada. I am pointing out the difficulty the Prairies have in maintaining industry, in getting new industries, and in maintaining diversified agriculture.

Honourable senators, I suggest that Senator Cameron has done a good service in presenting this motion to the Senate. I would think that an inquiry might take place. The time may have arrived when the Government of Canada should appoint a royal commission. After all, it appointed a Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism when there was great difficulty in the province of Quebec, and I think it was wise to have done so at that time. Perhaps the government should consider appointing a royal commission at this time to consider the grievances of Western Canada, to consider the economic disadvantages of Western Canada, and to see if we as a nation can come up with new policies that will give the people on the Prairies a chance to share in the general prosperity of our nation.

Honourable senators, I do not wish my remarks in relation to change, and the relative transfer of the dairy industry from the Prairies to Central Canada to be taken as any attack on the producers of Ontario and Quebec. They have pointed to difficulties in their operation, but I think the point of view of the producers in the Prairies should be looked at as well so that in any policy with regard to agriculture and to industry we may arrive at solutions that will treat the people on the Prairies fairly and equitably, and that will give the people in that part of Canada a chance to grow, prosper and share in the production of this country.

I congratulate Senator Cameron on having made this debate possible. I hope the Senate itself will come to some conclusion so that we may take some positive steps that will result in fairer freight rates to all the remote parts of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I was very impressed by the speech of Senator Argue. He mentioned a royal commission. Does he think there would be any merit in his own committee, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, going in greater depth into some of those problems, or would we be ignored?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators, we represent all parts of Canada. Half of the membership is from the East and half from the West, so I suppose the committee could take a look at these difficult agricultural problems, and policies and freight rates, if it wishes to do so.

I certainly would not be opposed to that. Perhaps we could come up with some recommendation which might be of help. As far as the question of freight rates is concerned, I think this might be beyond the scope of a committee dealing with agriculture. Freight rates, in general, are a matter of transportation policy. While we would have a great interest in what might be done and what might come out of it, I would certainly think it is beyond the scope of the Agriculture Committee as now constituted.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Why not appoint a special committee on this?

Hon. Mr. Argue: A special committee might serve a useful purpose. I would think that the Agriculture Committee is not the vehicle for it, although it might take a look at the section that applies to agriculture.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You would be the man for the job.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: I was about to ask Senator Argue a somewhat similar question, with a slightly different angle to it. I understood Senator Cameron to suggest in his speech that this matter might be followed up by an inquiry by our own Committee on Transportation. I wonder whether Senator Argue feels that there are particular advantages in having this done by a royal commission rather than by a Senate committee, whether it be the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications, or a special committee as Senator Langlois has suggested. It is not clear to me that there are advantages in having a royal commission. It seems to me that it might be much more expensive to the taxpayers, and perhaps rather less useful, than an inquiry in depth by a properly constituted committee of the Senate.

• (1520)

I should like to know whether Senator Argue feels there are special advantages in having a royal commission deal with the matter and, if so, what he thinks they are in comparison with having the work done by a Senate committee.

Hon. Mr. Argue: A royal commission might perform a very useful service and its recommendations might be of great value to Canada. In trying to answer your question, Senator Forsey, I say that I feel a royal commission could do the job, but I am certainly not opposed to the Senate's doing it. In fact, I am convinced, if there are senators who wish to devote the amount of time, research and labour involved in this kind of inquiry and they are prepared to do it, that the Senate would be a good place to do it.

I have great faith in politicians. I know they are often in ill repute, but I have a great faith in them. We have some politicians in the Senate and we have some senators who are not politicians, but if a committee of the Senate could get the kind of research back-up and expertise that is required, there are senators who have a sense of the country and a sense of the public will and desire, as well as a sense of politics, who could probably bring in a report that would be even more practical than one brought in by a royal commission.

Perhaps Senator Forsey would have to decide this, but if the Senate itself is prepared to do it this way I, for one, think that the results would be as satisfactory as if the study were done by a royal commission. But it is not for me to say whether the Senate is prepared to do it.

Hon. Mr. Graham: Honourable senators, I, too, wish to congratulate Senator Argue on the thoroughness of his research and the excellence of his presentation. As I recall, he stated that the Canadian railways were masters of their own destiny and that all that was required to increase rates was for the railways to give 30 days' notice to the Canadian Transport Commission. This leads me to ask the question: Just what is the function of the Canadian Transport Commission, and what control does it have in a situation of this kind?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am no expert on this subject, but I think the purpose of filing the notice is to determine whether there is anything in a legal sense that would be unfair or improper. But having posted it publicly, they have the right to proceed. As I say, I am no expert on what is involved here, but they have to tell the public what they are going to do. The commission is not in control of freight rates any longer.

[Hon. Mr. Forsey.]

Hon. Mr. Forsey: May I ask another question of Senator Argue? Is there no provision for appeal when these rates are filed? In fact, I rather thought Senator Argue made some reference to an appeal launched by some organization or organizations in the West. I wonder if he could clarify that for me.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I don't think I should put myself forward as an expert on the legal aspects of transportation. I will have to do some more research before I can endeavour to answer those questions.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

PEARSON COLLEGE OF THE PACIFIC

Hon. John Nichol: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of personal privilege to make a statement on a matter which I believe will be of interest to all honourable senators.

In recent days there has been some considerable public debate about the form which memorials to the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson might take. An informal committee has been set up at the request of the Pearson family, chaired by the Honourable Jack Pickersgill, to look into the various proposals which might be put forward. There is one proposal, however, which was very close to the heart of Mr. Pearson, and which is coming very quickly to fruition. I refer to the United World Colleges project.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Is that to be in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. Nichol: Yes. If I may, I should like to go back in time for just a moment. Many years ago a college was set up in Wales called the United World College of the Atlantic, to which students went on scholarships from all over the world to study together. They were from 20 to 30 different countries. Courses are taught in 11 different languages at that school.

Mr. Pearson was very impressed with this project, and the hope which it held out for better understanding among young people around the world. To that end, several years ago he became honorary chairman of a committee to investigate the possibility of establishing such a college in Canada. On that committee several members of this chamber served: Senator Aird, Senator Cameron, our Speaker, Senator Fergusson, Senator Norman MacKenzie, Senator Molson, and myself. We were joined by 20 or 30 other people from across the country in investigating this subject.

After Mr. Pearson's death, Mrs. Pearson picked up his interest in this institution. It is now to be built at Pedder Bay on the West Coast of Canada, on an inlet at the southern tip of Vancouver Island which looks across the Straits of Juan de Fuca to the Olympic Mountains in the state of Washington. It will be called the Pearson College of the Pacific.

I have been asked to be the chairman of the board of governors of the college, and I have accepted. It is going to be my responsibility to build this institution so that it can open in the fall of 1974.

The headmaster of the institution will be Jack Matthews, who was until recently the headmaster of Lakeview School near Peterborough. Mrs. Pearson has agreed to be the honorary chairman of the Canadian committee of the United World Colleges, replacing Mr. Pearson in that position, and His Excellency the Governor General has graciously agreed to be a patron of the committee.

Honourable senators, if I may just take a moment more of your time I shall tell you something about the institution. To begin with, I should tell you what it is not. It is not a private school for the children of rich people. We are aiming for a 100 per cent scholarship enrolment. We realize that this is extremely difficult, but that is what we are aiming for. We estimate that when the institution is running fully it will have 300 students, of whom 75 per cent will be from countries other than Canada. It will be coeducational. It will be built to reflect the fact that it is a Pacific college, facing the Pacific, and it will attempt to recognize the changing directions in which Canada faces. We hope to have students from all countries of the Orient and the other countries of the Pacific Rim, between the ages of 16 to 18, who will come and study together, to learn about each other's cultures, and hopefully to build some bridges of understanding that will do something for peace in the world.

The architecture will be quite unlike normal institutional architecture. There will be single-storey and two-storey buildings, built around squares and small pathways, probably of western red cedar with cedar roofs reflecting the Oriental architecture which is already evident to those of you who know the West Coast. In any event, we want through architecture to try to create an environment which will make these people from various places around the Pacific Rim feel at home. We are not constructing an institution of granite walls, ivy, and stained glass. We are constructing something which will enable these people to relax and think rather than concentrate on buildings and bricks.

The institution will be one of service, and the students will be involved with the community in which they live. They will be involved in lifeguard duties on the coast, pollution fighting, and all kinds of other community services within their environment. These will replace the traditional extracurricular activities to a great extent. For that reason sports and activities of the usual nature are not likely to be a dominant feature of the institution, particularly since many of the students will come from places where they engage in entirely different sports. The students will be encouraged to work in the community and to learn about each other in that way.

I am sure many honourable senators have questions to ask, but I want to draw attention to one or two other items. We are now almost in the position of owning the land. We have our committee functioning, and our people in position. We have our building chairman, our financial administrator, and a fund-raising program is under way. I might add that those of us who are working on it are very excited about it.

As honourable senators are aware, we are speaking now of the great things in which Mr. Pearson believed—people, friendship, understanding, and the brotherhood of man throughout the world. We intend that this shall be a Canadian institution, and not merely a transplant of the British institution. It will be a Canadian institution, built in Canada, situated in the West and facing the Far East. In this way it will reflect the things in which Mr. Pearson believed, and we hope that we will be able to make his family proud that they agreed to the association of his name with what we think will be a very great work.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I think that what Senator Nichol is talking about is a subject that Her Honour the Speaker will recall hearing about when we were in the Orient early in 1972. At that time it was not particularly associated with Mr. Pearson. It was to be an institution in Western Canada that had a particular relationship to the Orient, with the expectation that the personnel and the student population would, to a great extent, come from that area.

On that particular trip, Her Honour and I were much impressed by the number of people in various Pacific countries that we visited—and who, I might add, looked after us so well—who had had experience with Senator Cameron's School of Business Management in Banff. Now we have the possibility of a further extension of our connection with, and our interest in, the Pacific Rim.

I commend Senator Nichol for his initiative in this. I am, of course, very glad that the name of the late Mr. Pearson is to be associated with it but, as I say, I think it was contemplated long before his death. It is something we talked about last year when we were in Japan and Hong Kong.

Hon. Mr. Nichol: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: In fact we were told by people from the Philippines and from Indonesia—although we did not visit those areas at that time—that this was an admirable project and that a logical place for its location would be on the West Coast of Canada. We were told that great results could be expected from it, just as amazing results had been achieved by the Banff institution.

Honourable senators, let me also add that I am very pleased to hear that Senator Nichol is giving this project leadership. It is something that deserves our endorsation.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask Senator Nichol a question. I realize he may not have the answer at this time, but I shall ask it anyway.

I should preface my question by saying that several years ago at UNESCO we discussed the feasibility of setting up a world university, and we made recommendations in that regard to the United Nations, I believe. I am not at all sure whether in fact the United Nations has accepted the recommendation but I believe it has. In any case, I have lost touch with their plans. Then, a few days after Mr. Pearson's death, I was contacted by a well-known Canadian citizen whose name I shall not divulge at this time, who asked me whether I would support the proposal for such a world university to be called after Mr. Pearson. Of course, I was only too happy to reply in the affirmative. Later I heard that for some reason this proposal was being dropped, and that nothing was going to come of it.

I wonder if perhaps Sentor Nichol can give us some new information on that whole matter?

Hon. Mr. Nichol: Yes, I certainly can. To begin with, I should point out that this is not a university. These are students in the last two years of high school. Perhaps I could stick with that for a moment. The original concept of this sort of institution for international study arose out of the NATO college. I am not sure that that is the correct name. The people who worked on the NATO college were dealing with people in their mid-twenties, and they came to the conclusion that, valuable as the mid-twenties relationship was, it did not have the strength of bite of relationships formed between the ages of 15 and 17. To be effective in developing people's attitudes to each other they felt they should move into this lower age group. Although I am not an educator, that seems to me eminently sensible. First of all, therefore, this is not a university.

I am not completely familiar with what happened with regard to the suggestion to have a United Nations University in Toronto. My belief is that a lot of people wishing to move quickly to set up a memorial to the late Prime Minister got together and decided they would raise money to establish, as I think it was called, a United Nations University to be located in Toronto. While I have the greatest respect for those who started that movement, and for those who are presumably still working on it, a committee chaired by Mr. Pickersgill, which represents the Pearson family, has specifically said that this Pearson College of the Pacific will be the major educational memorial to the late Prime Minister.

I am being careful, honourable senators, not to denigrate or downgrade the efforts of those who started the project in Toronto—by no means do I want to do that—because their motives are somewhat like those of our group, and I hope we will have their support.

Perhaps I should read a note written by Mrs. Pearson. It is not a secret document.

> Members of the Pearson family have stated that the educational project closest to Mr. Pearson's heart was the establishment of a United World College of the Pacific on the West Coast of Canada.
> As tangible expression of that interest, he assumed the role of Honorary Chairman of the United World Colleges Canadian National Committee as well as membership on the United World Colleges International Council. He participated actively in the planning of a truly international school for young people, 15 to 18 years of age, to be built on the West Coast of Canada.
>
> The fund-raising for this venture has begun and because of Mr. Pearson's deep desire to see this school realized in Canada, we wholeheartedly approve the use of his name in connection with the United World Colleges School of the Pacific project.

That is signed "Maryon Pearson."

I have to say that this is a different institution. What will happen to the United Nations University proposal, I cannot say. It is obviously a much larger, more complicated, more far-reaching and, I suggest, more difficult institution to put together than the one on which we are working.

[Hon. Mr. Rowe.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately six o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I think the motion is completely irregular and cannot be made without previous notice. The only thing we can do when we have exhausted the business of the day is to adjourn the sitting, and that is the only motion that can be entertained at this time.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Has Senator Langlois in mind a possible need for Royal Assent?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No. The question has not been put and I should like to give an explanation. I can give it now, or wait until the question is put.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The question cannot be put if the motion is not in order.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I beg to disagree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I know you would like to.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have discussed this matter with him this morning. The only purpose in moving this motion at this stage is to ascertain developments in the other place. It is possible we will be getting an appropriation bill some time today, probably late in the evening, and I think it is the duty of the Senate to be available at that time to consider that bill. There is no intention on this side of the house to rush the legislation through, and we have no intention of asking leave of any kind. However, since it is an appropriation bill I think the Senate should be ready and available to consider it once it has passed the other place. I am informed that in Great Britain the House of Lords would even sit on Sunday to consider an appropriation bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Who cares about the House of Lords?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Look at what happened to them.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We have a constitutional duty to fulfil and we should not abdicate it. Our rules call for the sitting of the Senate on a six-day week basis. In the majority of cases we have been able to take advantage of long weekends. However, when we have an appropriation bill coming to us, I believe it is our clear-cut duty to be ready to consider it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not think the remarks of the acting leader are relevant to the point of order I raised. However, since they were made in explanation of his motion I would say that I am in complete disagreement with him when he says the Senate should be here waiting for the other place to pass a bill in order that we might do likewise immediately afterwards. That is an entirely erroneous attitude. I disagree entirely with the idea that because the possibility exists that the other place might vote tonight or some time today, or tomorrow, on an appropriation bill we should be standing in servile readiness.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Let us meet tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We must have time for second sober thought. That being said, I repeat that when we have completed the order of business for the day only one motion can be entertained, and that is for the adjournment of the Senate.

We could adjourn until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon, as is provided under our rules. But I warn the acting government leader that if we follow the rules and meet tomorrow, and if the bill is received and given first reading, I will then refuse leave for second reading, unless it can be done in accordance with our rules, and that will take us to next Tuesday. If he decides to force the Senate to meet tomorrow for nothing, that is his privilege, but he will have to take the responsibility for such behaviour.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You will have to take yours, too.

• (1550)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suggest that there is no reason for not proceeding as we normally do. Many senators have already left with the idea that the Senate would resume next Tuesday. I suggest that is what we should do; that is the normal thing to do.

If I cannot persuade my honourable friend with my argument, I know I can force him to follow the rules.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is what I suggested this morning.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order, according to our custom—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not a question of custom.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: —in the Senate, there is ample precedent for what is being proposed by Senator Langlois. There is a distinct possibility that the bill will pass in the other place this evening.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not care.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: It seems to me reasonable, if in the past we have been able to complete all our business by sitting three days a week, when there is business to be done we should be prepared to sit longer hours. The rule book provides for sittings on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, let us come back tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: It seems to me that it would not be unreasonable for the Senate to sit five days a week. We are not asking in the proposal for any hurry in the debate.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then let us meet tomorrow at 2 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: We are quite prepared to have a full debate on the appropriation bill when it reaches us. We are not asking for leave, if there is no inclination to give it. What we are saying is simply that, as it stands now, there is a good possibility that the bill will arrive this evening.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not care. I am not going to wait for that.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: We should proceed this evening with first reading. We could then perhaps adjourn until Monday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is nothing before the house at this time.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: There will be no need for a sitting tomorrow. We could adjourn until Monday. We could simply get the bill into the house, and then proceed with it on Monday as regular business. The alternative is to sit tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock, as the rules provide.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Sit tomorrow, and it will be all for nothing.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: That, of course, is the choice of my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would be my choice.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: If he wishes to make that choice, I want to make it clear that it would be his choice.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not only mine.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: We are not imposing anything. We are not trying to be difficult. We are simply trying to do the business of the Senate. It seems to me that it is reasonable to request an adjournment until six o'clock. We are not being unreasonable in suggesting that it would work out better for all senators. We will see at about six o'clock what the situation is in the other place. If it appears that we can do some business later this evening, such as proceeding with first reading, we will do that, and then come back on Monday and go through the business in an orderly way.

It seems to me that we are not proposing anything unreasonable. This will be convenient for all honourable senators. The alternative is to come back at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, which I think will be more disruptive to honourable senators than what we are proposing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator Molgat has simply repeated what Senator Langlois has said. And what both have done is to express the long standing views of the Leader of the Government, who would have us hang around just waiting for legislation, sometimes even giving it approval before it reaches us. I say again, as far as the rules are concerned, having exhausted our business for today, we can only adjourn to tomorrow. If the bill is passed in the other place, it can receive first reading tomorrow. But, applying the rules, the bill could not be presented for second reading before next Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Monday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, next Tuesday, because there has to be one intervening sitting day between the two, and that is Monday. The bill cannot be given second reading before Tuesday. So I tell my honourable friend that if he wants to proceed according to the rules he can have the Senate sit for nothing tomorrow. That is his privilege.

We will have done what apparently the Leader of the Government and his assistants want, and that is show that we are at the beck and call of the other place. That would be stupid. Most honourable senators have already left for the weekend. They are under the impression that they will not have to come back before Tuesday, since the bill cannot be dealt with before then. I hate to see the Senate left standing around waiting. Second sober thought means something to me. I do not accept that we should be rushed into it as soon as a bill arrives from the other place. We have had enough of that nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I think that both Senator Molgat and I have explained that we were just trying to accommodate the Senate and avoid coming back tomorrow, probably for nothing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: But since the honourable senator has objected to this procedure, I am ready to withdraw my motion and move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, before leave to withdraw the motion is granted, I should like to deal with the point of order and the question of following the rules on which Senator Flynn based his point. As I see it, in today's sitting we have temporarily finished with the work before us.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not temporarily.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I should like to make my argument, whether it be good or bad. I was careful to listen to the honourable senator when he was making his argument. I listened as carefully as I could.

The Senate has finished the business presently before it. At this stage, we do not know whether we have further business to come before us today. Instead of the presiding officer merely suspending the sitting, so that we will not sit idly here for the next two hours, a motion was put, without notice.

It was alleged that the motion was not a proper one. The argument is that the only motion that can be put without notice is one for the ordinary adjournment of the Senate at the close of the business of the day. We may not have reached the close of business for the day.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We have.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: We may not yet have come to that stage, and I respectfully suggest that Rule 46(r) is not the only rule, or is not the rule applicable to this case; that the rule applicable to this case is Rule 46(s)—other motions of a merely formal or uncontentious character.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Surely, what we are being asked to do is a formality. Instead of the Speaker merely suspending the sitting for two hours, there is a motion—the formality of the method of coming back to finish our business for the day.

The Honourable Leader of the Opposition, in presenting his argument, made it clear that there is really every reason for us to proceed in this formal way rather than by merely suspending the sitting, because he has indicated that in respect of the expected bill—which is one of those bills which are of primary concern to the House of Commons, rather than to this chamber—he will require the one day's notice before it proceeds to the second reading stage, that he will not waive that rule.

That being so, perhaps it is desirable that we proceed under Rule 46(r), and put the motion. We will then know that when we come back tomorrow, if we do, we can deal with the bill in a substantive way rather than going through the mere formality of first reading.

I want to make it clear that it is not correct to say that the only motion that could be put without notice in the circumstances in which we are now is the simple motion for adjournment in so many words.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would like to know if the acting leader has or has not withdrawn his motion, because if he has withdrawn his motion then—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have not obtained leave to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: He has not obtained leave yet. He may.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then the debate is still on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Senator McIlraith suggested that this was a motion of a merely formal or uncontentious character. What the honourable acting leader has said to support the motion, if there is any substance behind it, is that there is the possibility of a bill coming from the other place. Well, that, of course, should not be of any concern to the Senate. The fact is that, at this time, we have nothing before us. That the bill might reach us is a mere possibility. It might come tonight; it could come tomorrow. But there is nothing before us at the moment. I suggest that to decide whether we have or have not concluded our business, we have only to look at the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and at the Orders of the Day and the Inquiries, to find that we have exhausted our Order Paper for today. Therefore, if we are to agree with the argument of Senator McIlraith, it means we will sit here without saying a word until six o'clock. That is all very well. We can stay here, if that is what he wants. Nobody is to move and nobody is to say anything. We will simply look at each other and smile.

If that is the suggestion, and if that is Senator McIlraith's idea of a solution—and I cannot validly put any other interpretation on his argument than this one—then, all right, I am going to sit here and wait until six o'clock, when Her Honour the Speaker has to follow rule 12, which is:

> If, at six o'clock in the afternoon, the business be not concluded, the Speaker or the chairman of the committee leaves the chair until eight o'clock—

It will be pretty difficult for Her Honour to decide whether we have concluded our business or not if we have been sitting here without saying a word for two hours, but I suggest that at that time Her Honour may exercise better judgment than some others here, and decide that the only intelligent thing we can do is adjourn for the day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in my opinion we have not finished the business of the day because I have not yet called for Motions, although a motion was made.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There were no motions on the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: In any event, I had not called for Motions. I also think this is not a motion for adjournment of the Senate, but rather a motion for the suspension of the sitting. If the word "adjournment" was used, it was used so inadvertently. This is merely a motion for the suspension of the sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Your Honour, I do not know how you can suspend something that has been finished.

The Hon. the Speaker: In Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, at pages 213 and 214, there is this:

> The Senate and Commons also sometimes suspend a sitting during pleasure, or with an understanding that they resume at a certain hour. This is done frequently at the close of a session whilst one house is waiting for messages for the other.

It may not be a message in this case, but we are waiting for word from the other house.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Your Honour, we are not waiting, because they have not done anything.

The Hon. the Speaker: However, I do not quite understand whether or not Senator Langlois has withdrawn his motion for suspension until six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Your Honour, I could withdraw my motion, but I am not at liberty to do so. Therefore, my motion is still before the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: If the motion is still before the house, I think I have to put it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not know if Your Honour has decided that the motion is in order, but Your Honour has quoted Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, and made some reference to a suspension of the work. May I suggest with all due respect, Your Honour, that you cannot suspend something that has been completed. You can suspend a debate. I could move that a debate be suspended until later this day, which is a mere motion, both informal and uncontentious, but when there is nothing before us that is another case. If we knew that the bill had been passed and that they were sending somebody to tell us that they had passed it, we could be waiting for a message, but we cannot be waiting for a message when nothing has been done in the other place.

With the greatest of deference to Your Honour I suggest that the quotation Your Honour has read does not apply in the present case. It is quite obvious that this motion is out of order and I suggest to Your Honour that you could be creating a precedent by accepting it.

I would suggest to Your Honour that perhaps we could suspend the sitting to allow Your Honour to study the matter. Perhaps that would be one way to gain the time that the Honourable Acting Leader of the Government wants. If Your Honour wishes to take it under advisement, I have no objection, but I suggest that this motion is completely out of order since we have exhausted the business of the day.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I suggest that a ruling has been made by the Chair, and it is not debatable.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A ruling has not been made by the chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am of the opinion that the business of the house under Rule 19 has not been completed. It is not finished until all the items (a) to (i) have been called, and I have not yet called (i).

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then I would suggest, Your Honour, that you call it.

The Hon. the Speaker: However, I would be glad to accept the suggestion of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that I take the matter under advisement. I shall suspend the sitting until six o'clock, and in the meantime I shall seek further information.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Your Honour, since you have mentioned that Motions have not been called, may I inquire what motions could be called? There are none on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: We do not know what motions might be called. Nobody knows.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You cannot make a motion unless it is one that does not require notice. There are no motions on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: In any event, the sitting has just been suspended on your suggestion.

At 4.10 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

At 5.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting was suspended for the purpose of considering a point of order that was raised. However, I am informed that the matter has been resolved by mutual agreement. In view of that, I do not see the necessity of making any further ruling.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I have the honour of moving, seconded by Senator Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 20, 1973, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Langlois to indicate whether we shall also sit on Tuesday evening at eight o'clock?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is possible that we shall need to sit on Tuesday evening.

Perhaps I should inform the Senate at this time that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition and I have had a discussion, during which we came to an understanding that we would likely have both first and second readings of the appropriation bill on Tuesday. Whether the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I do not know. I have no objection to that procedure being followed. If it is, the committee could meet later on Tuesday afternoon, or in the evening. For that matter, the committee could meet on Wednesday morning, although on Wednesday morning there are caucuses taking place. In any event, I am completely in the hands of the Senate in this respect.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, as Senator Langlois has said, we did reach an agreement. The agreement is that if the bill has passed the other place by the time we resume our sitting on Tuesday next, then first reading will take place, and be immediately followed by debate on second reading. We shall then see what has to be done about that, and whether we have to sit in committee the next day. In any event, we will proceed in the ordinary manner at that time.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps I might say a few words from the point of view of the committee. It has not been the normal practice for an appropriation bill to be referred to committee. There is no reason why it should not be so referred, but normally the Senate has taken the position that the committee's report on the supplementary estimates relating to the appropriation bill satisfies those requirements.

As I say, that is not necessarily so, but it has been the practice.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am in full agreement with what Senator Grosart has just said. I simply repeat that I am completely in the hands of the chamber so far as this matter is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In discussing this with the Acting Leader of the Government, I suggested that it would not be necessary to refer the bill to committee unless the debate that might arise on second reading causes some senators to ask questions which cannot be answered in the house. Of course, regardless of what the practice has been, each case depends on its own circumstances.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 20, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 20, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Republic of Cuba on Hijacking of Aircraft and Vessels and Other Offenses. Signed at Ottawa, February 15, 1973.

Report on work performed and expenditures made as at December 31, 1972, under authority of section 1 of chapter 3, Statutes of Canada, 1968-69, respecting the construction and completion, by the Canadian National Railway Company, of a line of railway from near mile 17 of the Windfall Extension on the Sangudo Subdivision in a westerly direction approximately 51 miles to Bigstone in the Province of Alberta, with a connecting line approximately 9 miles in length from a point near mile 38 of the said 51 mile line to South Kaybob, pursuant to section 8 of the said Act.

Report of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1972, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of State Act, chapter S-15, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the Acting Leader of the Government whether the special message that he was expecting last Thursday will reach us eventually?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, the message is still awaited. As I said the other day, it is very hard to predict what is likely to happen in the other place; but it is expected that the message will reach us sometime today or at the latest tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is what you said last week.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: "Tomorrow, and tomorrow, and tomorrow . . ."

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There is nothing like hope.

CRIMINAL CODE (CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS)

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 15, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Cameron for the second reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Criminal Code (control of weapons and firearms).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my purpose to speak at any length on this bill. Actually, I do not hold very strong views on the subject matter of the bill, and the views that I hold have been formed since the debate began.

At present the control of what is called offensive weapons in Canada is somewhat strict. Weapons fall into three classifications: the first is prohibited weapons, the second is restricted weapons, and the third applies to those weapons that do not fall into either of the previous categories.

The definition of the three classifications is found in section 82 of the Criminal Code. Weapons which are presently not restricted can be made so by order in council, the one exception being shotguns or rifles commonly used in Canada for hunting or sporting purposes.

As I understand the bill, its purpose is to do away with that exemption and to make shotguns and rifles restricted weapons. Under the provisions of the bill, one must have a permit in order to possess such a weapon. At present, as I understand it, such weapons must be registered, but a permit is not necessary. Even a restricted weapon does not require a permit if it is in a dwelling house or place of business.

Two things have to be considered when deciding whether or not the bill should be supported. One is whether the fact that these weapons can be bought and owned without a permit leads to an increase in crime. We have heard a great deal about the increase in crimes of violence. However, I do not think it has been shown that the people committing these crimes are doing so with weapons which are not now classified as being restricted. Even if it could be shown that the increase in crimes of violence is due, even in part, to the possession of such weapons, I think it would also have to be shown that by restricting those weapons we would keep them out of the hands of those persons who might use them for illegal purposes.

• (1410)

Honourable senators, on these two, perhaps, narrow grounds, I feel we have to determine whether or not this bill should be supported. I feel, too, all things considered, I must agree with the arguments put forth by Senator Manning. I feel by passing this bill we would be putting a good many law-abiding citizens to a great deal of inconvenience and expense, while doing nothing to prevent these weapons from falling into the hands of those who would use them for illegal purposes.

Honourable senators, I do not feel I can support this bill at the present time.

On motion of Senator Davey, debate adjourned.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1965

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill S-3, intituled: "An act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965 (Yukon and Northwest Territories Senate representation)".—(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill S-3 is to make provision for the appointment of two additional senators, one each from the Yukon and—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the Honourable Senator O'Leary, that this bill be now read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, apparently I was too eager to get this long overdue measure before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You overlooked the rule.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I did not overlook it; I forgot it.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to make provision for the appointment of two additional senators, one each from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and to make consequential amendments respecting the total number of senators.

It would seem to be particularly urgent that we consider this matter at the present time. The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, which was presided over with such distinction by Senator Lamontagne and Senator Molgat, made a similar recommendation in very strong terms. I will indicate some of the differences between what is suggested in this bill and what was suggested in the report of that committee in a moment.

Perhaps honourable senators would look at the bill while I explain the clauses.

Clause 1 would repeal sections 21 and 22 and substitute new sections. The only major difference in the substituted sections is to provide for the two extra senators. The new section 21 would provide that the membership of the Senate consist of 104 rather than 102, for an obvious reason. The substituted section 22 maintains the present constitution of the Senate in respect to the four senatorial divisions of Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime Provinces, and the Western Provinces, and makes no change in the number of senators allotted to each province. It also continues the representation of Newfoundland by six members, and then provides:

> The Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories shall be entitled to be represented in the Senate by two members, one for the Yukon Territory and one for the Northwest Territories.

It then repeats the provision for the appointment of senators from the province of Quebec from the existing 24 electoral divisions.

Clause 2 of the bill would repeal section 28 of the act, and substitute a new section to provide:

> The number of Senators shall not at any time exceed One Hundred and Twelve.

I am sure I need not explain that, except to say there is provision in the British North America Act for the appointment of eight additional senators at any time by order in council, distributed equally between the four divisions.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Such as the situation last October where we would have had to use it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My honourable friend might be looking ahead a few months, or perhaps a few days.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Why not a few years?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not like to make predictions such as Senator Langlois made last Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You should quote your former leader on that.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: These two territories have been represented in the other place for some years—in the case of the Yukon Territory by the Representation Act of 1902; and in the case of the Northwest Territories by a series of Representation Acts, those of 1947, 1952, and 1962, gradually extending the electoral representation of the Northwest Territories in the other place to the whole area. I am sure honourable senators would be inclined to agree that it is very difficult to think of any justification for a situation where these two territories, populated by 55,000 Canadians, should be represented in one House of Parliament and not in the other. The purpose of this bill is, of course, to correct that, among other apparent inequalities.

The general process by which representation in the Canadian Parliament has been extended from time to time to those parts of Canada that were not included in the original confederation is well known, particularly the situation where Senate representation was extended to two new provinces, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, as they came into Confederation.

The gradual development of senatorial representation in the West, however, is perhaps less well known. The Manitoba Act of 1870 provided for two senators from Manitoba, the "postage stamp province" as it then was, with provision for an increase to four as the population grew. An order in council admitting British Columbia in 1871 added three senators from that province.

This left the land area between Manitoba and British Columbia without representation at that time. As it filled up with settlers, it was decided to be necessary to make provision for the representation of that area in Parliament, so the British North America Act was amended in 1886 and the relevant provision in that act appears in the notes to the bill. The act of 1886 specifically provided that representation could be given by Parliament in either house or in both houses to any territory which was outside the areas which had been organized into provinces. The exact wording was that they could be given "representation in the Senate or in the House of Commons or either."

• (1420)

Under this act, then, this area between Manitoba and British Columbia was given, first of all, two senators; then four in 1904, just before the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were organized, at which time each of the provinces was given four senators, with provision for an increase to five or six as the population grew. By 1915 the four Western Provinces were recognized as a senatorial division with 24 senators, six from each province.

This pushed the Yukon and the Northwest Territories above the 60th parallel, to their present boundaries. As I indicated, the Yukon Territory was given Commons representation in 1902, after a petition and very strong representations had been made to the government of the day that it should have two members of the Commons and one senator.

Looking back, it is difficult to see why senatorial representation was not given to those two territories in the many years which have elapsed since 1886. I have done some research and I must say that I have found no evidence of any outright refusal by the government to give senatorial representation to those territories, and certainly no indication of a substantial reason why they were not given this representation. I suggest that there was probably no good reason.

This is surprising because, as you all know, representation in the Senate from any part of Canada is on a geographical basis, and here we are dealing with part of the geography of Canada which represents about 40 per cent of the land area. As I said, it has representation in the House of Commons. Why it has not been given representation in the Senate, as far as I understand it, nobody really knows.

It is not a question of population because, as we all know, population is not an integral part of the basis of representation in the Senate; otherwise, we would not have the situation where senators represent anywhere from 25,000 to perhaps 300,000 citizens. It is not a question as to whether or not the area is organized as a province, because the act of 1886 specifically provided that such an area could be given representation in the Senate. Therefore, there is both authority and precedent. There is the precedent under which senatorial representation was given, before they became provinces, to that part of the territories which are now the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

At this point perhaps I should say that while the act of 1886 does give specific authority to provide for representation of senators from these areas, it is probably not at the present time a necessary authority. From an eminent legal counsel whom I have consulted, it seems quite clear that the amendment of 1949 would give complete authority to the Parliament of Canada to implement Bill S-3 without the more cumbersome formula of an Address to Her Majesty and a request that she put the measure before the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

As honourable senators will remember, the act of 1949 added a new class 1 to section 91, making the previous class 1 become class 1A, giving the Parliament of Canada authority to amend the Constitution—and those were the words used—in all matters except certain entrenched provincial rights under section 92 and other sections of the British North America Act. Certain language rights were excluded from that power, and there was the requirement that Parliament be called annually and be dissolved after five years as a maximum.

I believe there is consensus among constitutional experts that the bill I am proposing would come within the competence of this Parliament.

I am also informed, in case anyone should raise the question, that this is not in the restrictive sense a "money bill" about which there would be constitutional problems as to the propriety and legality of its being introduced in the Senate. I will not go into the details of that, but Bill S-3 seems clearly a measure that does not offend against section 53 of the British North America Act, which provides:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

I suggest that the provisions of this bill would not come within that restriction.

Honourable senators, the enactment of this measure will constitute a very important step along the long road to political equality of these 55,000 Canadians. They are still, constitutionally, "second-class citizens." They are still denied the level of responsible government that the rest of us enjoy. They have been travelling the road toward what we would call complete self-government for a very long time, by hard and sometimes tortuous steps. It is fair to say that in recent years considerable progress has been made, but a case can still be made out that in respect to these territories Canada is a colonial power.

Here in 40 per cent of the land area of our country are 55,000 citizens who are denied responsible government, denied the same rights of representation through a legislature, a responsible legislature, and the Parliament of Canada, that the rest of us enjoy.

I would suggest that unfortunately the situation has a good many elements of colonialism. The majority of those citizens are non-white. They occupy, as I say, a very large and rich part of Canada. The main reason why we hesitate to give them the "full rights" that the rest of us enjoy is the fact that they live in a very rich land, they have rich resources, and we are rather afraid to let them have the complete power over those resources that they would normally have if they were organized as a province.

I do not want to overemphasize that. I say again that steps are being taken. But only the other day there was a very serious clash between the Executive represented by the Commissioner and the partly elected Council in one of those territories. Anyone reading the account of that would certainly see some reflections of the long struggle that many people in many parts of the world are undergoing for political equality.

However, leaving that aside, because this is not really the place to argue that larger question, I suggest to honourable senators that the passing of this bill would certainly be one step, and an important step, toward giving these 55,000 fellow citizens much more adequate representation, and it would bring them closer to having a degree of political equality. Any longer denial of that right would seem to me, as a senator, to be quite indefensible, particularly in view of the fact that one of the traditions of the Senate, if not one of its constitutional obligations, has been the protection of minorities.

As I have said, the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, with Senator Lamontagne and Senator Molgat as co-chairmen, recommended a step similar to that suggested by Bill S-3. They stated in the report that one of the two "most obvious deficiencies in the current distribution of Senate seats" is "the fact that the Yukon and Northwest Territories, being a major part of the Canadian land mass, are not represented at all in the Senate." The committee recommended that this be rectified by the appointment of senators from these two territories. In fact, it stated that provision should be made for the appointment of two senators from each territory, but that is because their recommendation suggested an increase in the number of Senate members to, I think, 130 in order to provide for nominations from the provinces.

• (1430)

I think the principle of this bill is exactly the same, and the arguments behind it are exactly the same as those advanced by the Constitution Committee.

Honourable senators, for these reasons, and for a good many other reasons that I could elaborate but shall not at this time, I recommend this bill for the consideration of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Molgat debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 14, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of federal government support for post-secondary education in Canada and the relations between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces concerning the universities of Canada.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, my first observation must be to point out how fortunate a thing it is for this house that Senators O'Leary and Grosart are always here to keep the place going. My second observation must be this: having never hung my hat on an academic peg, and never walked in the groves of Academe, I hesitate to follow the distinguished president of a famous university who presented this motion with such skill, with such force and lucidity.

As I listened to his speech and read it since in Hansard, it seems to me that what he wants to try to accomplish is in some way to have the central government, the dominion Parliament, contribute more than it is now contributing to the maintenance and upkeep of our universities.

I think the real problem in the situation is that in trying to do this we are not distinguishing sufficiently between skills—between technical and vocational training and true education. Senator Hicks quoted a statement by the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent when he said:

> I think many of us recognize increasingly that some means must be found to ensure to our universities the financial capacity to perform the many services which are required in the interests of the whole nation.

I think that is true, but Mr. St. Laurent did not make clear, nor did Senator Hicks, just precisely what they meant when they spoke of the many services which the universities perform. I am convinced that if the founding fathers had been living in our days of technology, had been living in our computerized age, they would have made section 93 of the B.N.A. Act a little clearer with respect to what was called education.

I am bit disturbed sometimes about the increasing costs of universities. For example, I remember when Carleton University was established by a good friend of mine, Dr. Tory. They began their days in the old Ottawa Ladies College in the Glebe with practically nothing in the way of equipment. I recall that when I began as one of his lecturers in journalism I lectured in the basement of a church. Well, honourable senators, I ask you to go and look at the campus of Carleton University now with the vast buildings, the vast costs, expenditures of millions; and sometimes you wonder where these millions are coming from. Or you could go to the University of Ottawa. I remember when it was a small, sectarian university, often famous for its football. Today you could not cast a stone on Sandy Hill without breaking a window of a building owned by the University of Ottawa. Again, there is an investment of millions.

I remember talking to a good friend of mine, Father Légaré, who was the rector of the University of Ottawa. He was telling me of the millions and millions of debts which they had incurred. I said to him, "Father Légaré, where do you expect to get this money?" He hesitated a long time and finally said, "I hope the Lord will provide." I said, "Well, I hope so too, but I doubt if the Bank of Montreal would receive His cheque." This is the trouble—millions have been spent here and there, and then demands have been made on the poor alumni to get around and raise the money.

My good friend, Dr. Somers of St. Francis Xavier University, used to come up to Ottawa. I sometimes thought that he thought money grew on trees. This famous little university has incurred expenditures of millions, and God only knows where this money is coming from.

These expenditures have grown because our universities, to a large degree, have become schools of technological science, and schools of technological training. I am not against skills. I imagine that in this world today skills are desperately important. But skills in themselves are not education; and unless and until we make the distinction between true education and vocational training we are going to be in trouble. Technological education is not education. Education is not something which tells a man how to make a living. Education is not something to make a man a lawyer, barrister, doctor, engineer, or priest. It is something to make him a man. It is not something to give him a standard of living. It is something to provide him with a standard of life. Education is something which teaches a man to love truth and beauty for their own sake. It is something to teach him to love sportsmanship, to love God's courtesy, and which teaches love for one's neighbour, to love mercy, compassion and pity.

If a man has not these things, then in truth he is not educated at all, and this no matter what his skills are, no matter even what his scholastic attainments are. We are in danger of forgetting in this land that there is no sense in pasting wings on man unless you give him a winged nature, and no sense in making men free in order to make them good, when the real task is to make them good in order to fit them to be free. We are becoming completely addicted to the cult of bigness.

I sat last evening in the Senate gallery in the House of Commons and watched and heard the often mindless desk thumping which accompanied the statistics of my good and brilliant friend, Mr. John Turner. Is this education? I said we have become victims of the cult of bigness. Years ago James Russell Lowell warned the American people that the greatness of a nation must be weighed in scales more delicate than the balance of trade. That warning is for us now. We have become obsessed with the gross national product. Well, the gross national product is not unimportant, but it is not the be-all and the end-all of life. Unless we Canadians come to understand that and to practise it, we are heading for trouble.

I spoke of universities expanding into great buildings. Why, even our high schools now are veritable cathedrals, vast auditoriums, vast gymnasiums, and so on. In the old days great cathedrals were built for the glory of God. Now it seems that we are building these mighty high schools for the glory of school trustees. Something must be done about this. Yes, let us spend all the money we can on true education, but let us keep in mind the while what true education is about. It is not about big buildings; it is not about bigness at all. Is is not about high-rise buildings; it is not about a paved planet. True education is more than that. I repeat, unless we make a distinction between what I call true education and merely vocational and technical training, we shall be courting peril.

Of course we need skills; of course we need technical training; of course we need vocational training, better lawyers, better doctors, better engineers, but that is not necessarily education. That is not what I believe education should be about, and I know the best thought I have been able to find has come to that conclusion. Paul—not our friend across the way—put it very well when he said:

> Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report.

That is what education is about. So, while I support with all my heart the proposition advanced by Senator Hicks, I think first of all before we do anything about it we must make sure for what it is we are spending this money. If we are spending it for vocational training, let us distinguish between true education and vocational training.

Incidentally, quite recently I had the privilege of speaking in the magnificent law school erected by the university in Halifax. As I spoke in that university and talked later with the young students there, the thing they were proud of was not this magnificent building, but they remembered and were inspired by the great Dr. Weldon. Let us spend more for good teachers. When John Hopkins University was established it was located in a field, but they sought and went after teachers and it became, as you know, one of the famous universities of the world. They, too, now have fallen into the cult of bigness. When they opened one of their great buildings some years ago they were visited by the great Huxley. Huxley spoke to them and said, "Gentlemen, I am not impressed by this bigness. The question I put to you is this: What do you propose doing with it?" What do we propose doing with all these great structures we are building here, there and everywhere? This is a question which we must solve. We must clarify our minds in Canada about what we mean by education and for what we are spending our money.

Years ago when Woodrow Wilson, who was not only a great President but a great scholar, spoke to the classes at Swarthmore. He said, "Young men, try to remember why you are walking these classic halls. You did not come here to get something to help you make your way in life; you did not come here to get something to enable you to make a living. You came here to help to make a wider and a grander world and you will betray yourself and betray your country if you forget that errand."

We live in an age of statistics, the statistician is over us all and, if it is not the statistician, then we have the pollster, who is abroad in the land trying to find out whether we herd with the mob. This has become too much of our way of life. We are all information, all facts and no wisdom, all know-how and little know-why, all signposts and no destination.

Honourable senators, I am not attempting to tell you that I despair of our future. I am too old; I am too old to join the easy pessimism of the young, but I am old enough to know this, that our voyage through history would be more brave and more meaningful if we reassessed our understanding of what true education is about.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, unless another honourable senator wishes to speak at this stage, I would move the adjournment of this debate.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: May I be permitted to move the adjournment of the debate? I intend to make some observations on this subject at some future time, but I am not prepared to do so now in a fashion that would be at all acceptable.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Will it be more so in a few days?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am prepared to yield to the honourable senator.

On motion of Senator Forsey, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE ANY ASPECT OF AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue moved pursuant to notice:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to examine, from time to time, any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I am moving this motion today so that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture may be in a position to go to work during the course of this session.

As honourable senators realize, very often there are leaders of farm delegations in Ottawa who would be happy to appear before the committee and present a brief, if the committee were in a position to hear them. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, L'union des Producteurs agricoles, and others come to Ottawa from time to time, and it would be useful if the committee were in a position to say to them, "If you wish to appear before our committee, we can have a meeting tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock at which you can present your brief." By making such a forum available, the Senate would be making a worthwhile contribution to the agricultural industry in this country.

This motion and the next motion dealing with the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, have been phrased in somewhat similar terms, but the second motion concludes with the words "and that it report the result of such consideration to the Senate." In drafting my motion I was advised by officials that in accordance with rule 71 the committee would have the power, if the motion were passed, to report to the Senate from time to time; and certainly, as chairman of the committee, it would be my intention to report to the Senate from time to time on anything presented to the committee. That is the only reason these words with reference to reporting to the Senate have not been included. If it is considered wise to have them included, I shall be happy to agree to it; but whether or not they are included it would be my intention to keep the Senate fully informed on the work of the committee.

It would seem to me also that subjects may be mentioned from time to time about which the committee would like to be informed, and in order to avoid seeking the authority of the Senate each time the committee wishes to hold a meeting, perhaps we might have this general provision enabling the committee to meet from time to time to hear briefs and presentations on any agricultural question that may arise.

As honourable senators realize, Senator Michaud has taken a particular interest in the problem of abandoned farms and declining agriculture in the County of Kent in New Brunswick. The situation in that county is similar to that existing in various parts of Eastern Canada. If my motion is passed by the Senate, the committee might study the problem of abandoned farms in Eastern Canada.

I would suggest that the committee first hear a few expert witnesses, perhaps from the Farm Credit Corporation, the federal Department of Agriculture, the New Brunswick Department of Agriculture, and then decide whether it feels justified in having a more extensive and thorough examination of the subject. In other words, once the committee had heard from a few expert witnesses it would be in a position to judge whether, by means of a more exhaustive inquiry, it might be able to put forward recommendations to help provide a more viable agricultural industry in that part of Canada. If such a thorough inquiry were decided upon and certain expenditures would seem to be required, then a budget would be presented to the Senate for approval.

By giving the committee the kind of authority requested, it would be in a position to consider, during the course of a few meetings, important questions raised by agricultural organizations, and as a result might well have something most useful to report to the Senate.

I would point out that there is no provision in the motion for a budget allowing payment of expenses to people travelling to Ottawa to appear as witnesses before the committee. There is also no provision for the establishment of a research staff, and so on. We ask for the authority stated in the motion because we wish to be in a position to hear witnesses and to do our work. If in the future the committee felt that a more thorough examination should be made of any matter, if it felt that research assistance was required on a continuing basis, or any other expenditure was required, it would ask the Senate for approval of a particular budget.

In asking the Senate to pass this motion it is hoped that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture may be in a position to do a competent job on behalf of Canadian agriculture, and provide in the Senate a forum where farm organizations and others may present their ideas on current agricultural questions.

Hon. John. J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I had no intention of speaking on this matter when I entered the Senate this afternoon, but I should now like to say a few words.

Firstly, it is salutary that the Senate has appointed a committee on Agriculture. The initiative and enthusiasm of Senator Argue and other honourable senators will result in a useful exercise being undertaken by the committee.

I do not rise to oppose the motion. It would be quite appropriate to pass the motion, and also appropriate for the committee to have all the power the motion asks the Senate to confer upon it. If the motion is passed I hope the members of the committee will not feel that, on a mission that is so broad and so pervasive, they will not be able to deal with specific problems.

I was particularly pleased to hear the chairman, Senator Argue, suggest that the committee should return to the house for authority to engage in specific projects. If a mother project, or a typical project, such as one envisaged for northeastern New Brunswick, or other projects of that nature—even a meeting with a farm delegation—requires special authority from the Senate, then the proper thing for the committee to do is to come, through its chairman, before this house to obtain whatever authority it needs.

I repeat, the committee probably has the authority to do what this motion suggests. It is my view that the limitations which Senator Argue has put upon the granting of this authority are limitations that we, as a chamber, should expect to see not only honoured but meticulously honoured. I am sure that Senator Argue and the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will do that. Generally speaking, I do not feel we need to give our committees broad powers to investigate in a field such as that which is proposed to be cultivated by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

With those few words, honourable senators, I, too, commend the motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I disagree with both former speakers on this motion. I feel that the terms of the motion are too broad. The rules prescribe the matters that should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. What the committee is now asking for is a blanket authority to consider whatever problem it deems within the scope of the general powers provided in the rules. I am not prepared to agree to that, especially as Senator Argue himself has suggested that it may be necessary to amend the motion somewhat. He did not say that he would restrict the scope of the inquiries, but at least that he would provide for reporting to the house. That is rather important.

Senator Connolly, on the other hand, says that any committee which has general terms of reference provided in the rules can proceed on its own without any authority from the house. I very much doubt that that is the case.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In order to resolve this problem, I move the adjournment of the debate. This will give Senator Argue and Senator Connolly an opportunity to reconcile their views, and perhaps re-word the motion.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: After sober second thought.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I think Senator Flynn probably misunderstood what I said.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That would be my mistake.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think that a committee of this house should probably have the general authority to investigate. Otherwise, we would not have these committees. I rose because I, like Senator Flynn, did not like the general authority that is requested. However, my feeling is that within the terms and reservations set out by Senator Argue—that for specific projects he will come back to the house for authority—very little harm will be done by passing this motion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I have great confidence in Senator Argue. However, if there is something to that, then why is it not in the motion itself?

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved pursuant to notice:

> That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to consider any matter affecting the internal economy of the Senate, and that it report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a routine motion. It is the intention to call the first organizational meeting of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration at 10 o'clock on Thursday morning. In order for the committee to be able to proceed with whatever work it will have to do at that meeting, apart from the organizational aspects, the Senate's agreement to this motion is required.

I gave notice of this motion the other day, although the Leader of the Opposition did indicate that he would be more than happy to give leave to proceed with it then.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I find that I have to go back to my so-called prophecies, and express the hope that a message from the other place will come to us at some time today. I have discussed with the Leader of the Opposition the possibility of adjourning this sitting to the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening so that we might have an opportunity of finding out what the situation is in the other place. If no progress has been made at that point, we will adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

This gives me an opportunity to reply to my honourable friends who have been taunting me about my erratic prophecies. In this connection I should like to relate to honourable senators what took place some 40 years ago in this chamber. At that time the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen was the Leader of the Government in the Senate. After having adjourned the Senate the previous evening to 12 o'clock the next day, upon its resumption he asked the Honourable the Speaker to call it one o'clock. The Senate resumed at 3 o'clock, and then he suggested that the Honourable the Speaker call it 6 o'clock. The Senate resumed again at 8 o'clock, at which time Senator Meighen, as reported in the Debates of the Senate of May 26, 1933, said:

> Honourable senators, with great reluctance I have to abdicate my role of prophet, and for the remainder of the session I shall say nothing as to when Parliament will prorogue. I merely move, on such information as I am able to obtain—

Taking a similar attitude, I only go on the information that I obtain, and the latest information I have obtained is that we are likely to get this message from the other place later this day. Therefore, I move that this sitting of the Senate be suspended until the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I was hoping that Senator Langlois would provide a better authority than the one he has just quoted, not because it was the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen but because the circumstances were entirely different at that time. They were awaiting prorogation of Parliament. That is not the case here. I should like it to be so, but the fact is that we are not awaiting prorogation or dissolution. The circumstances are not at all the same. I should have thought that the Acting Leader of the Government and Senator Molgat would have learned something from the experience of last week. They should try to understand that it's not the idea that the Senate should wait like a butler on the other place.

This problem will have to be resolved soon, because we are fed up with it. Senator McIlraith, who lives in Ottawa, has only to go home and wait for a telephone call to come back here. He is in a very privileged position, but not all senators are in that position.

In any event, I suggest that it is undignified for the Senate to wait for the other place, wondering if they are going to pass the bill in ten minutes, an hour, or three hours, and agree to return to inquire whether they have made some progress, or whether we can deal with the bill right away. I am opposed to it. As I said last week, when we have concluded our business I do not see that any motion, other than a motion to adjourn, is in order. I will not start that debate again. I told the government leader last week, and he agreed, that if the bill passed the other place and reached us before today, then it would receive first reading and we would commence the debate on second reading immediately.

What I am proposing to the Acting Leader of the Government now is that we adjourn until tomorrow, and if the bill passes the other place before we re-convene tomorrow we will proceed with first and second readings immediately upon meeting. That is what we should do, instead of waiting like turkeys on the fence, like obsequious toads.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Or messengers.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would rather adopt the attitude I suggest. If that is not the view of the acting leader, then I am sorry, but I am in complete disagreement with him.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I think I should correct what Senator Flynn has said about the situation to which I have referred, which took place in 1933. The Senate was then awaiting a message from the other house with a bill concerning the Criminal Code, precedent to prorogation. We are in a similar position today in that we are awaiting a message from the other place having to do with legislation.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: This is 1973.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have here excerpts from the Senate Hansard going back some 40 years.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You mentioned they were waiting for prorogation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There are hundreds of examples of situations similar to that in which we find ourselves today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is not the same.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I merely point that out. Senator Flynn referred to the situation of a senator who lives in Ottawa. Today we are all living in Ottawa; we are all present here, and to wait until 8 o'clock to find what is happening in the other place is imposing no sacrifice on anybody.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is not a question of sacrifice. It is a question of looking stupid and servile.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I do not think we look stupid when we are waiting to do our duty. That is not the way I look upon my duty as a senator.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then scrap the rules.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I oppose the motion, and I suggest that it is out of order. We have exhausted our business for today, and no motion can be put but a motion to adjourn the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when on Thursday, February 15, the Leader of the Opposition raised a point of order on the informal motion to "adjourn during pleasure," I quoted Bourinot, 4th edition pages 213 and 214, where he says that the Senate and Commons sometimes suspend a sitting during pleasure . . . to resume at a certain hour . . . whilst one house is waiting for messages from the other.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We are not waiting.

The Hon. the Speaker: May, 18th edition, pages 294 and 295, also refers to informal suspension of a sitting, which passage, in my opinion, is relevant to our practice.

Honourable senators, there are long-standing precedents to indicate that the Senate has followed the practice to adjourn during pleasure, not only to await the arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General for the purpose of opening or proroguing Parliament or for royal assent, but also when there is a prospect of the submission to the Senate of a measure which is awaiting passage in the House of Commons. I have looked up the record as far back as 1932, as has the Deputy Leader of the Government, and found that each year, in circumstances described above, the Senate adjourned during pleasure a great many times.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Of course.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is true there are no specific provisions in our rules regarding adjournments during pleasure; however, Rule 1 of the Senate reads as follows:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by sessional or other orders, the standing orders, the rules, usages, forms and proceedings of the Parliament of Canada, in force up to the day on which the present rules go into operation, shall be followed so far as they can be applied to the proceedings of the Senate or any committee thereof.

Honourable senators, I suggest that the practice of adjourning during pleasure is a well-established usage in this chamber which would come under Rule 1, and, in my opinion, it is perfectly in order to resort to it.

Of course, I am in the hands of the house, and until the Senate decides to change this practice, I do not see why it cannot be followed. Perhaps the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders would like to examine this procedure and make suggestions to the Senate as to the clarification of our Rules on this question. I would welcome the views of honourable senators in that regard.

In my opinion, however, this motion is in order, because it conforms to the usage and practice of a great many years. I would now ask honourable senators if it is agreed that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Your honour, I take exception to your ruling. I will simply say that the motion will be passed on division, because I reserve the right to use all the privileges provided in the Rules in the future, in view of the attitude of the Acting Leader of the Government.

Motion agreed to, on division.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, I understand that the other place has not completed its work on the appropriation bill. I do not know exactly what the situation is. In those circumstances, I take it upon myself to move the adjournment of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 21, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION OF SENATORS

RETURN PRESENTED

The Hon. the Speaker presented a return, submitted by the Clerk of the Senate in accordance with rule 114, listing the names of members of the Senate who have renewed their declaration of property qualification.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETURN AUTHORIZED

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Clerk of the Senate be authorized to receive the renewed Declarations of Property Qualification from those Members of the Senate who have not had the opportunity to make and file the same in accordance with rule 114, and to make a Supplementary Return accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, perhaps I could add a word of explanation at this stage. This motion is to cover the case of two honourable senators who have been absent from Ottawa due to illness, and therefore unable to file their renewed declarations.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1973

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-141, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1973.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: With leave, now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, not today.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Honourable senators, has this bill been referred to the Standing Committee on National Finance? Was Senator Grosart's report last week in connection with this bill?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, that was with respect to supplementary estimates (A), which is something different.

I do not give leave to proceed with second reading today.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Her Honour did not hear you.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If Your Honour did not hear me, I said "No, not today."

The Hon. the Speaker: Since unanimous consent has not been granted to proceed now, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We will see. We cannot give leave now for tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: You are not giving leave now, nor am I asking you to give leave.

• (1410)

The Hon. the Speaker: There must be two days' notice.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Your Honour, I think the answer is simply to have the bill placed on the Orders of the Day but with no leave.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Normally it should come on Friday.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Quite right.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there has not been unanimous consent, the bill will be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday next.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I could seek leave now, or we could do it tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think that is the way to put it. Put it for Friday. Tomorrow we will see how we feel.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: May I say in reply to the honourable Leader of the Opposition that if it is not put on the Orders of the Day for tomorrow, it will automatically go to Friday.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With leave you can obtain anything.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The item is not going to be called tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You can put a motion to adjourn during pleasure without previous notice.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am not insisting.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there was not unanimous consent, following rule 44(1)(f), which says that two days' notice shall be given for the second reading of a bill, it will have to be set down for second reading on Friday. May I have a motion to put Bill C-141 on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You do not have to.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It does not require a motion. It is automatic.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that when first reading is given there is a requirement under the rules that two days' notice must be given before proceeding to second reading, but that rule has nothing whatever to do with putting it on the Order Paper. It goes on the Order Paper immediately. If at an intervening sitting of the Senate between now and Friday the bill is before the Senate, with leave the rule can be waived at the wish of the Senate before the two days have elapsed. When Your Honour asked, "When shall this bill receive second reading?" the answer should have been "Next sitting," then if the bill is called at the next sitting the two days' notice rule has to be satisfied. The answer to the question should simply have been, "Next sitting." It then goes on the Order Paper, and what disposition is subsequently made by the Senate is up to honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If it is not considered as acceptance by the Senate, I agree with the view of Senator McIlraith that it be put on the Orders of the Day, but the rule would still have not been waived.

Hon. Mr. McIlraith: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: That is exactly the point I made at first. This is not a waiver to seeking leave tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: I appreciate the experienced advice of the honourable Senator McIlraith. Honourable senators, is it agreed that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for a second reading at the next sitting of the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, together with copies of a booklet entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent".

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1974, in advance of bills based upon the said Estimates reaching the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

EDUCATION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of federal government support for post-secondary education in Canada and the relations between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces concerning the universities of Canada.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise chiefly for the purpose of giving my heartiest and strongest support to the speech which Senator Hicks made last week on this subject. It seems to me that it was a most important and most valuable speech. I hope it will be considered very carefully by the powers that be.

• (1420)

I should like to draw attention first of all particularly to the exact terms of section 93 of the British North America Act dealing with education. I emphasize the point which has already been made by Senator Hicks—but I think it is worth emphasizing, worth repeating—that that section confides to the provincial legislatures exclusive jurisdiction over education "in and for each province." I don't think those words are without significance. I am, of course, bolstered in that lay opinion by the professional opinion, the very high professional opinion, of Dr. Corry, the former principal of Queen's University and, of course, by the professional opinion of Senator Hicks himself.

I think, essentially, that means that while there are certainly provincial aspects of education there are also national aspects of education and that this was in the minds of the Fathers of Confederation when they drafted that section in the precise terms that they did.

True, in those days the probability is that the national aspects of education were considered to be of minor importance. They probably thought very little about it, because the provinces then had very little in the way of direct communication with each other. National unity had still to be forged. The Intercolonial Railway, let alone the Canadian Pacific Railway, had yet to be built; there was still great isolation of one province from another and, overwhelmingly, education was obviously a provincial concern, quite apart from the necessary guarantee of the special rights of the French Canadian population in Quebec to control their education as they saw fit and not to have something imposed upon them by a majority of a different origin and a different religious faith.

I have noticed a curiosity on this subject in the Revised Statutes of Canada. If you look at the French version of the British North America Act, section 93, in the compilations, the successive compilations of Dr. Ollivier, the former Law Clerk of the House of Commons, you will see that the phrase "in and for each province" is very precisely translated, "dans chaque province et pour chaque province." If you look at the latest official version of the British North America Act in the Revised Statutes of Canada, however, you will find, for some reason which is completely unintelligible, incomprehensible to me, that the French version reads simply, "dans chaque province." The "pour chaque province" has disappeared. Why, I don't know. I remonstrated. I called up the proper officials of the Department of Justice and was informed by somebody who had been in charge of the translation that they had carefully collated all the earliest translations and had decided that this was the proper thing. I take leave to question that very seriously, and I think it is unfortunate, very unfortunate, that in the French version of that section in the Revised Statutes of Canada the words, "pour chaque province," which must have had some significance and at any rate are certainly there in English in the text of the British North America Act, have been dropped.

We had an example here the other day of something getting left out in a French version or an English version, I have forgotten which, by sheer inadvertence. I had an example of it also when I was on the Board of Broadcast Governors, when the omission of a certain phrase in the French text caused an immense amount of difficulty and misunderstanding. I am inclined to think that this omission, as I consider it, in the French version of the British North America Act in the Revised Statutes of Canada could also lead to unfortunate misunderstandings and could lead to French-speaking people placing one interpretation upon the section and English-speaking people placing another interpretation and their arguing very much at cross-purposes.

However, I am relying on the original text of the British North America Act, "in and for each province", and it seems to me that, whatever may have been the case 100 years ago, nowadays there is a great deal in post-secondary education and, specifically, university education which by no stretch of the imagination can be regarded as "in and for each province."

Nowadays people go to universities far away from their homes. People from Ontario go to the University of British Columbia or they go to the University of New Brunswick, more particularly for forestry, or they go to Dalhousie University; or people from the Maritime provinces come up here or go out to the West for part or all of their university education. A great deal of the university education is for people from quite outside the province altogether. And a very considerable part of it also, of course, is for people from outside the country, not only the people who come here from the United States to go to renowned medical faculties like those at McGill or Dalhousie, not to mention some others with which I am less familiar, but also people who come from the underdeveloped countries—what do you call them now?—the developing countries. One has to keep pace with the euphemisms which are constantly applied. But, as I say, I am speaking of the people who come from the underdeveloped or the developing countries, the people who come here from the third world—the hungry two-thirds of the world—to do post-graduate work or even undergraduate work in our universities.

An immense amount of the expenditure of the universities is really for purposes quite beyond the needs of the province or the desires of the people of the province. This is, in my judgment, as it should be. It is to my mind a highly desirable thing that people from one province should go to universities in other provinces for part or all of their university education; it broadens their minds, it gives them a new understanding of other parts of the country, and heaven knows we need that. One of the things we suffer from most in this country is that people from one section so often have very little knowledge, direct knowledge or experience, of other sections or of people in those sections. This complicates the difficulties we have because of our two basic or official languages, and the fact that people familiar with one of them are often totally or very nearly totally unfamiliar with the other.

When you superimpose on that difficulty, which is already considerable enough, the further difficulty that even people belonging to the same language group tend, too often, perhaps, to stay in their own particular province for their higher education, you have one of the major obstacles to the development of a real national unity.

So that is the first point I want to make—that a great deal of university education now is not simply "in and for each province." It has taken on a national dimension. Senator Hicks even suggested that we might find in the British North America Act, apart from that phrase in section 93, some warrant for national assistance to post-secondary education in the general words at the opening of section 91—"Peace, order and good government of Canada"—except for the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. And in the case of education, of course, you would have to read that, in my interpretation, as subject to the phrase "in and for each province." The exclusive jurisdiction of the legislature of a province extends over education "in and for each province" only, subject always to the safeguards for the denominational minorities in the subsequent paragraphs of section 93.

I think this national aspect of education is enormously important. One of the things we require most, as I have just been suggesting, is more mobility in this country between different parts of the country, and especially more mobility for educated people. This is an aspect, also, of the policy which I think is common to all parties, of trying to reduce, if not eliminate, regional disparities. Economic disparities are important. They are not altogether unrelated to educational disparities. If we want to get rid of these regional disparities, or reduce them, which I think we all do, this, to my mind, is one of the most important aspects of that particular question. If we are really serious about reducing these disparities in different parts of the country then we should be prepared to use some national funds for the purpose of removing these regional disparities in education.

• (1430)

There are, of course, a variety of methods by which this can be done.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: With the consent of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: Not necessarily, no. This is basic to my argument that under the British North America Act there are national aspects of education. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council long ago recognized that "subjects which for one purpose and one aspect fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces, for another purpose and another aspect fall within the jurisdiction of the dominion." This is a basic principle of the interpretation of our Constitution. Whether we like it or not, there it is. Now it is perfectly open to any honourable senator to argue that as a matter of political expediency, or even as a matter of what should be done constitutionally, the provinces should be consulted on this, and I think it is highly desirable that they should be consulted. But I suggest that there is a jurisdiction, nonetheless, and a jurisdiction also, I might add, in the dominion's spending power for the national government and Parliament to do as in fact they have been doing—something to assist post-secondary education across the country. If they can do it by way of arrangement with the provinces, so much the better.

I was about to add when Senator Asselin interjected his interesting and valuable comment that the methods by which this might be done, it seems to me, can vary very considerably. I am not prepared to say that you have to have one particular way of doing a thing for every particular province. And if a particular province prefers to have an arrangement of one kind and another province an arrangement of another kind, I do not see any theoretical obstacle to that. Nobody is stronger for national unity than I am, and nobody is less enamoured of the theory of two nations or 10 sovereign states. But administrative or even legislative arrangements varying from province to province for national legislation or national policy, it seems to me, are perfectly proper and may be highly desirable, provided they are kept within reasonable bounds.

One thing I think we want to be very careful about in making these arrangements is that we do not hand out the money of the national Treasury in a manner which is inequitable or, to put it more bluntly, tends to make the richer provinces still richer and the poorer provinces still poorer. I think we have to face the fact that in any dominion aid to post-secondary education we shall have to give special consideration and an extra amount of money in one form or another to the poorer provinces. It seems to me this is inescapable. Otherwise the whole purpose of the exercise is partially, if not wholly, defeated. This means, of course, that the Atlantic provinces particularly, with which I have a rather special concern, a hereditary concern you might say, will have to get quite different treatment obviously from the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta which are in a much better position to look after all their educational needs as well as other needs without any assistance. But I do not want to go into the technicalities of the thing. This would take me far beyond my competence, my knowledge for one thing. I merely want to insist on the necessity of some form of national help for post-secondary education and the variety of forms which that has taken; and on the necessity of seeing to it that the disinherited, the disadvantaged, the backward, the underdeveloped, the developing—we hope—regions of Canada do not get the short end of the stick or are not treated exactly the same as the richer parts of Canada, on the assumption that every province is a province like the others. This is certainly not true.

I want, before I sit down, to mention one or two other things arising out of the speech which the Honourable Senator O'Leary gave. We had from Senator O'Leary a characteristically noble and beautifully phrased discourse on the philosophy and essence of education, with all of which I need hardly say I entirely agree as, I should imagine, every member of this house does. But, on the other hand, I could not help feeling as I listened to Senator O'Leary that what he was saying about the essence of education was not markedly relevant to the kind of problem that Senator Hicks had raised. I should be inclined to agree that the universities in the last few years have perhaps rather overemphasized buildings and creature comforts. I cannot look back as far as Senator O'Leary, but I can look back a certain distance, and I can say that when I was a student the kind of amenities that were provided for us were far less than those that are provided now. But then, on the other hand, everybody is now very considerably better off than people were 40 or 50 years ago and I do not know that there is any particular reason why university students should be regarded as excluded from this. I am prepared to agree that there may have been overemphasis on the physical amenities of universities in the last few years and this may have got out of proportion. I am all in favour, on the whole, of plain living and high thinking. This is, perhaps, part of my New England, Ulster and Methodist heritage, but I do not know that that really touches the essence of what Senator Hicks was saying. If the universities pared away every scrap of the fat that they may have now—and in some cases as far as buildings are concerned they cannot do much about them, they are there and they may as well be used—but if they pared away every bit of superfluity, they still would have an extraordinarily difficult position, especially in the poorer provinces, notably in the Atlantic provinces.

As I listened to Senator O'Leary talking, for example, about the Dalhousie Law School and the immense pride of the students there, not in the beautiful new building in which it is housed, but in the great reputation and renown of the Dalhousie Law School—especially in the days of the great Dean Weldon, but I think I may safely say much more recently than that as well—I could not help feeling that, after all, you cannot very well have a law faculty, in modern circumstances at any rate, without giving it reasonable housing. The essence of the family is not the house, but the family needs shelter. The essence of a law faculty or a university generally is not the buildings, no; but the students and the professors need adequate facilities and the facilities which were adequate in my youth are not necessarily adequate now. Senator O'Leary talked also in the same context about Johns Hopkins and how it started off, in a field I think it was, and how it tried to concentrate on professors rather than on buildings. He indicated it had since fallen from grace in this matter. But again, as I thought of this emphasis on professors I said to myself yes, but after all, if you are considering universities in the poorer provinces, if they want to attract and keep good professors, which I agree with Senator O'Leary is the essence, or a large part of the essence, of university education, then they have to be to a certain extent competitive with the universities in the rest of the country in the salaries and amenities which they can offer.

Now I am prepared to admit that they do not have to come up absolutely to arithmetical quality in salaries with the universities in the richer provinces. People in the Atlantic provinces, I suppose, ought to be prepared, out of devotion to the Atlantic provinces, to take rather lower salaries in university education. But there is a limit, in fact, to the degree to which you can expect them to do that.

This business of national aid to education is not going to be solely concerned by any means with buildings. It is going to be concerned, surely, with university salaries, with aid to students, bursaries, loans, grants, whatever form it takes. I think therefore that some of Senator O'Leary's admirable discourse on the essence of education, particularly university education, post-secondary education, was perhaps not entirely directed to the kind of problem that Senator Hicks was raising, which I think is a very serious practical problem which will have to be resolved on some basis in the very near future.

There was one other thing that Senator O'Leary said that I think requires comment. He drew a distinction between education and the teaching of skills. Well, obviously, that is so. He is quite correct about that. On the other hand, some skills, professional skills, have long been regarded, and I think properly regarded, as part of the function of a university. For some considerable time at least, professional training in the law has been, to a considerable degree at any rate, regarded as the function of the university. This is becoming truer and truer. I think this is desirable. We have had some very great lawyers—we have some in this house—who came through the old system of non-university professional training for the law, getting articled to a lawyer and studying in the lawyer's office, under his control, and eventually passing the bar examinations, and so on. Sir Robert Borden was a very notable example of the brilliant success of this old system. But more and more we have found that the professional training of lawyers has been confided to university faculties of law.

I think this is a healthy development, because if the university faculties of law are doing their job properly, they should be doing something more than simply giving the lawyers a technical proficiency in the law. They should be giving them some conception of the place of law in society, some conception of the social ambience of the law, some conception of the relationship of law with history, with economics, with politics, with sociology; and I think they are doing this more and more. I think the consensus of opinion among lawyers nowadays is that this kind of thing is necessary, that the narrow technical training of other days, good though it may have been, excellent though it may have been, nevertheless had certain deficiencies; and if you turn to other branches of professional education, the same thing holds to some degree, it seems to me.

In medical schools now they usually require, if I am not mistaken, some premedical work in arts faculties, something that will give the modern doctor more than just sheer professional skill. The modern doctor more and more is drawn into discussion of, and contact with, sociological, economic and political aspects of his profession. A lot of them don't like it, but it can't be helped. There is no question at all that when you have a system of hospital insurance and a system of medicare, the doctor cannot just withdraw into some ivory tower of his own and say, "I am not concerned with it in any way." Even if he insists on getting direct payment from his patients, he has to take cognizance of the fact that there is a scheme under which certain things will be done, and more and more he is finding that he is drawn into a discussion of whether the particular scheme which exists now is desirable or whether it isn't desirable, a subject on which the health professions ought certainly to be heard amply, but on which also the narrow professional technical skill of the health professions is not the sole or even the final consideration. It seems to me highly desirable that professional training of all these people that go to professional schools and universities, such as engineers, dentists, or whoever they are, should be confided to the universities precisely for the purpose of giving these people, in the course of their technical training, some conception of the sort of thing that Senator O'Leary was talking about.

I am not prepared therefore to go all the way with Senator O'Leary in the consequences which he appears to draw from his distinction between professional training and university education.

I think I have now covered the ground that I wanted to cover. I haven't really added anything essential to what Senator Hicks said, but it may be useful, perhaps, for someone from another part of the country than Senator Hicks, with somewhat widely different experience, and with some semiprofessional connection with a university in this province—it may be useful for the Senate to have some support of Senator Hicks' proposals, Senator Hicks' views, and some emphasis upon them.

I suppose one can overdo emphasis and repetition. I trust I have not committed that fault, but I think there is some room for emphasis and some room even for repetition. I very much hope that in the discussions which will be taking place, which are perhaps on the verge of opening, between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces in regard to post-secondary education, considerations of the kind that Senator Hicks raised the other day will be looked into very seriously, and the thing will not be regulated simply on the basis of hard cash transactions between the Minister of Finance and the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance, but that some of these great considerations of national unity and of a national spirit will enter into the discussions.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my remarks will be very brief. I should not like this debate initiated by Senator Hicks to immediately reflect the consensus of senators from another province on such an important issue as the one now before us.

Short of bending the Constitution and legislation relative thereto, it has not yet been established by courts that education per se does not come under the exclusive jurisdiction of provinces, whatever you may call it, elementary, secondary or post-university education, and even Senator Forsey will not convince me that experts in constitutional law and the courts of our country have given any other meaning to the word "education" than that contained in the Constitution, i.e., a power exclusive to the provinces.

I rise today, honourable senators, because it may be that for our English-speaking colleagues, who live in other provinces such as Ontario, the English-speaking provinces, the meaning of the word "education" in their own language goes beyond that expressed in our constitutional documents. However, in Quebec, whatever government we have had, whether Liberal or Union Nationale, we have never accepted any other interpretation of the wording in the Constitution but that education comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of provinces, justifiably in our case because, honourable senators, we do not have the same teaching methods and we do not speak the same language.

We do not teach common law and our civil law is designed for the protection of the family and of individuals.

So, if English-speaking provinces can accept federal grants for primary, secondary or post-graduate education, it is their right because in those provinces, of course, with regard to common law, you have the same spirit, the same facility to interpret the statutes but there is a very big difference in our province with civil law, and Senator Forsey will agree with me on that point.

However enlightening may have been Senator Hicks' speech on this extremely important problem, as well as that of my colleague, Senator O'Leary, and the one made by Senator Forsey this afternoon, I think that if the federal government wants to keep on meddling with matters which come exclusively under provincial jurisdiction, it falls short of the target, and heaven knows that if there is an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, it is that of education.

I think I am really discharging my duty, my responsibilities as a senator from Quebec, not in order to object to this debate, but to say to my English-speaking colleagues that we do not give the same meaning to the word "education" in the wording of the Constitution as Senator Forsey did this afternoon and Senator Hicks the other day.

When Senator Forsey spoke this afternoon about the mobility of education, I agree with him and for good reason, since we have had, for several years now, a committee of all provincial ministers of education which meets at least twice a year to study the standards that should be recognized by the various provinces in order to allow all our university graduates to practice their profession in provinces other than the one in which they were graduated as lawyers, doctors or engineers. Speaking of interprovincial mobility, it already exists, and Senator Forsey is aware of it. Obviously, it may not have reached perfection, but we already have an embryo for consultation between the provincial ministers of education with a view to giving our university students the possibility of furthering their studies in their chosen sphere in one province or another. But if the federal government has so much money to spend, why does it persist in interfering in fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction? In that regard, I will never accept that the federal government spend sums of money without consulting the provinces, especially Quebec—and I repeat it—because Quebec does not have the same teaching methods, nor the same education; we do not speak the same tongue, our religion is different. Our definition of education is different whether it be primary, secondary, university or post-graduate, and I object again on that point.

Moreover, honourable senators, if we want federalism to survive we must let the provinces which have an exclusive jurisdiction in some fields exercise their rights. If the federal government has too much money, if it wants to spend part of it on education, let it give some to those provinces which want to exercise their exclusive jurisdiction; let it give it to them unconditionally so as to enable them to carry out their responsibilities in that sphere.

I am not saying, honourable senators, that this debate is not likely to crop up again in this house or at the other place, but I say, as a Quebec senator, that never will I accept that the federal government interfere in a field as important as education. Unfortunately, I would be unable to support, if ever a motion were introduced in this house, Senator Hicks' views on federal grants to post-secondary education.

That was what I wanted to say, honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: May I put two questions to Senator Asselin? Will Senator Asselin allow me?

They are two extremely simple questions.

First, if I understood him correctly, he said that no expert on constitutional law supports the position of Senator Hicks. But I believe that Senator Hicks himself quoted Dr. Corry who, in my view, is an expert in constitutional law.

I think that he could also have quoted Professor Frank Scott of McGill University who, in my opinion, enjoys a certain reputation as an expert in constitutional law.

I am not saying that there is unanimity on this, but I believe that the honourable senator will admit perhaps that there are experts in constitutional law who support Senator Hicks' interpretation of this matter.

My second question is the following: Has Quebec accepted in the form of the concession of tax points, as a kind of assistance to post-secondary education in Quebec? I think that the province has accepted that, and I believe that it is one of the methods that Senator Hicks has suggested, because it already exists in the arrangements with the provinces in this regard, and I feel that Senator Hicks certainly did not exclude this arrangement from his proposals.

I certainly did not intend to exclude such an arrangement. If Senator Asselin was left with that impression, I am sorry because such was not my intention at all.

I am asking those two questions. Are there experts in constitutional law who support Senator Hicks' interpretation? Did the province of Quebec accept this sharing of income tax for post-secondary education?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I think it is easy enough to answer Senator Forsey's questions.

Those experts who expressed opinions are obviously centralizers.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: If you will allow me—

Hon. Mr. Asselin: One moment; you gave your opinion, I will give mine.

I know Professor Scott who taught me for a few months. Professor Scott will never think otherwise than in terms of centralization in favour of the federal government at the expense of the provinces. I am not saying that you are completely wrong about those three experts. I am saying that some experts have supported Senator Hicks' point of view, and I am saying that I do not agree.

If Senator Forsey can quote me a judgment of the Supreme Court which says that education should be shared by the federal government and the provinces, very well, but there are none and if such a judgment existed, I would not accept it.

It is not because Professor Scott endorsed the opinion of another expert in constitutional law that those people have the monopoly of truth.

On this point, I question their opinion.

Secondly, it was stated that the province had accepted points with regard to post-secondary education—this is true. But I must tell Senator Forsey that when we came to office in 1958, a considerable amount of money intended for the University Conference was frozen at the federal level and it was then that Mr. Sauvé and Mr. Diefenbaker found a formula to give back to the universities, through the provinces, this money which had been held back for years at the time of Mr. St. Laurent.

Senator Forsey is sufficiently aware of our political history to remember that. At that time, the province of Quebec agreed to it without condition. Quebec accepted that those payments should be made to the province and that the latter, taking into account the priorities and needs of the university, should distribute those payments to those most in need. I repeat that I agree that the federal government should help the provinces in the field of education. However, I say that education is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces and that the payments made to the provinces in fields under their jurisdiction must be unconditional payments with no strings attached, so that the provinces may decide about their own priorities, their educational needs and the universities which they have to help.

Hon. Mr. Lafond: Will Senator Asselin agree that the time of Mr. St. Laurent was also the time of Mr. Duplessis?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: This changes nothing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What does it change?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: I must say this: Mr. St. Laurent, in the fields to which we are referring, was never able to agree on satisfactory arrangements with Quebec. Mr. Sauvé had to propose a formula to the federal government of Mr. Diefenbaker at that time and say that this formula was acceptable to Quebecers. If Mr. St. Laurent had had more imagination, perhaps he would have found this formula that Mr. Diefenbaker found at that time.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: Would Senator Asselin permit a question?

You mentioned federal payments to the provinces. You said these payments must be unconditional. Is it not true that right now payments are unconditional and that the money is spent by the provinces according to their own policies?

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Yes, it is true, but it takes time to get anything from the federal government.

There is another field, that is, family allowances, where the provincial minister Mr. Castonguay has been struggling to obtain a satisfactory formula. This has been going on for two years. However, some condition is always laid down. Why? Perhaps to preserve national unity, university standards and relations throughout the country. However, I would say, for example, if Senator Hicks and Senator Forsey mean to say that the federal government is empowered to give grants to post-graduate students without consulting the provinces, that they are on the wrong track. This is against my principles.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As for Senator Goldenberg, firstly, when he states that grants are unconditional today, I hope that he does not forget that the formula was established by the Diefenbaker government, especially by the Honourable Donald Fleming, then Minister of Finance, in 1959-60. Secondly, as for the entire problem, is Mr. Turner's budget, which includes the problem of school taxes in the equalization formula, not moving in the same direction and does it not recognize that the provinces themselves must solve those questions? However it comes quite late, as a result of repeated requests by several governments, especially the Quebec government.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: If you will allow me, I talked only of grants to universities. I did not mention the Liberal government or the Diefenbaker government. I understand what you have just said.

However, in the case of grants to universities, it is the provinces who spend the money, unconditionally, according to their own needs and to their policy.

Hon. Mr. Asselin: Unconditionally. With that principle, I agree. If anybody wants to change this principle, I am against it.

On motion of Senator Cameron debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE ANY ASPECT OF AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lafond:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to examine, from time to time, any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I think this order should stand. We have had some discussions with Senators Argue and Molgat, and probably this motion could be redrafted in a way that would be acceptable, I should not say to myself but rather to the Senate as a whole.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 15, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, although this order stands in my name, I am pleased to yield to Senator Manning, if that is agreeable to the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that Senator Manning should proceed in place of Senator Langlois, who adjourned the debate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I commend Senator Cameron for placing on the Order Paper the inquiry with respect to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation. Both Senator Cameron and Senator Argue have pointed out that the subject matter of this inquiry is one of the factors that has for a long time been the cause of a great deal of dissatisfaction in Western Canada. This question goes beyond the mere economics of transportation. It relates to a prominent cause of regional dissatisfaction and, therefore, it is inseparable from the public concern over the feeling of alienation that has developed in various regions in recent years.

• (1510)

We are all conscious of the fact that the future of Confederation depends to a large degree on the ability of the Canadian people and Canadian governments to remove the feelings of alienation which have developed.

The present freight rate structure, while by no means the only cause of dissatisfaction in Western Canada, is definitely a long-standing grievance in that part of the country. Alberta has a special interest in this subject because of the geographic location of the province. Alberta is the farthest point removed from Central Canada of those regions which are subject to standard freight rates from Eastern Canada.

As was pointed out by Senator Cameron and Senator Argue, shippers in British Columbia can reap the benefit of what are known as the "seaboard" rates, which in some cases provide cheaper transportation for eastern manufactured products to British Columbia than for those same products when moved from Ontario to points in Alberta. It is equally true that in the case of primary products, such as grain, moving from Alberta to the Lakehead, our producers are the farthest removed and, therefore, bear the heaviest burden of the freight rates which apply.

It has rightly been said that the Canadian freight rate structure has been wonderfully and fearfully made. The average layman has difficulty in finding his way through the multiplicity of rates and factors pertaining to rates as they apply to the different regions. In our part of Canada, our shippers are very familiar with at least four broad categories. First, there is the seaboard rate to which I have referred, which permits the movement of certain products from Central Canada to the Pacific coast at substantially less cost than for the same products delivered to intermediate points. It is paradoxical, as Senator Argue pointed out in his excellent speech the other day, that products can be moved from the manufacturing centres of Ontario to seaboard in British Columbia, and then shipped back to Edmonton or Calgary in Alberta, for less cost than the same products can be dropped off in Edmonton or Calgary on their way to the Pacific coast. The reason is that if they go all the way to the coast they get the advantage of the seaboard rate which, theoretically at least, is related to the cost of seaborne traffic moving through the Panama Canal. The seaboard rate to Vancouver plus the short haul rate back to Alberta in some cases is less than the freight charges from Ontario to Edmonton and Calgary, even though the goods have been moved almost a thousand miles further.

We are very familiar in our part of the country with the Crowsnest Pass grain rates. The Senate had something to do with their origin many years ago. These are special rates applying to wheat moved from Western Canada to the Lakehead. The Crowsnest Pass grain rates have been the subject of debate for many years. The railway companies have maintained that these rates are uneconomic, and therefore must be subsidized by other freight charges. This view is disputed vehemently by the farmers' organizations in Western Canada. It has been the subject of considerable controversy down the years.

A third category of freight rates is known as "agreed charges." There are many of these. An agreed charge is a rate established when a certain industry agrees to ship its product over a certain railway, and in return is given a special rate for the movement of that product. There is a great multiplicity of these. Agreed charges are frequently the result of competition between the railways and truck transportation.

When you take out the volumes of traffic covered by those rate categories, you have left the commodities to which general freight rates apply. In the central provinces, where there is a large population and the movement of vast quantities of goods over relatively short distances, and where truck competition is more significant, a large volume of traffic is moved under agreed charges.

Every time a commodity is moved out of the general freight rate category into the agreed charge category, the total volume of freight movement remaining in the general rate category is reduced. When increased rates are implemented they are generally applied to the general freight rates. As the volume of traffic in that category decreases, the increases in rates become more and more severe on the remaining commodities. This has been the cause of a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst shippers in Western Canada.

Senator Argue pointed out the other day the impact of the present freight rates structure on Western industrialization. Those familiar with that part of Canada know that primarily it produces raw materials and primary products—wheat, coal, oil, lumber, and products of that kind. If we are going to have a stable economy in the Prairie provinces it is absolutely necessary that we have greater diversification in the form of more secondary industries. We are at a disadvantage in that regard because of a relatively small population and long distances to the major markets in the heavily populated areas of Canada and the United States. The bearing freight charges have on the development of secondary industries in the Prairie provinces is significant.

I recall that a number of years ago in Alberta we did a study on the impact of various factors pertinent to developing secondary industries. You very often hear it said, or read in your newspapers, that Alberta has an advantage in attracting industries because of our vast quantities of natural gas as an industrial fuel, and because we enjoy the lowest prices for natural gas anywhere in Canada. This is true, but the interesting thing that these studies showed was that the disadvantage to industry of locating in Alberta because of high freight costs in almost every instance more than offsets the advantage we could offer by reason of cheaper fuel.

The present freight rate structure penalizes the western primary producer in two ways. It penalizes him because it is the producer who pays the freight rate charges on wheat or other primary products moved from Alberta to the Lakehead. It is not the purchaser. The price the farmer is quoted is the Lakehead price less the cost of freight from where the grain is delivered in Alberta. But when this same producer purchases farm equipment manufactured in Ontario, or buys a truck or an automobile, he is quoted the f.o.b. price Toronto, Windsor or Detroit, and then he has to pay the freight charges to where the equipment is delivered in Alberta. So he finds himself in a position where he is paying the freight costs on his outgoing primary products, and also paying the freight rate costs on the manufactured goods that are shipped into his part of the country.

It is not uncommon in Alberta—in fact, I have done this myself—that a person purchasing an automobile waits until he happens to be in eastern Canada, where he can pick up a car in Windsor, Detroit or Toronto and drive it back to Edmonton for a total cost that is less than the price for which he can buy it in Edmonton, because he gets the freight charges taken off the price of the vehicle.

Alberta, as I have said, has always been deeply concerned over freight costs, so much so that for over 25 years we maintained here in Ottawa a special counsel, whose major work was dealing with freight rate and shipping problems as they affected our particular province. There are perhaps honourable senators who are acquainted with Mr. J. J. Frawley, Q.C., who was our special counsel for a quarter of a century, and who became one of the best informed men in Canada in the intricacies of the Canadian freight rate structure.

On many occasions we made representations through our counsel to the Board of Transport Commissioners, to various royal commissions, and to boards of inquiry set up by the Government of Canada. Frequently submissions were made jointly by the Prairie provinces, and sometimes by the four western provinces. On some occasions we were joined by the Maritime provinces, whose problem is quite similar in many respects; sometimes we were alone. In our efforts to get redress from the inequities inherent in the freight rate structure, our greatest disappointment was the lack of appreciation by the national government of the nature and the seriousness of the problem. Time and time again we would meet the attitude, "Oh, well, you people out in the Prairie provinces are always complaining." There seemed to be no real understanding that this was not merely a regional but a national problem, that it had a significant bearing on the growth of Western Canada, and that as I said earlier, it had a significant bearing on the growing dissatisfaction of the people in that area of Canada and the alienation which results from such dissatisfaction.

Honourable senators, I am not going to take up your time in discussing the complicated technical aspects of the freight rate structure and the inequities which, in our view, are inherent in that structure, but I would like to try to pinpoint a few of the basic factors that underlie this problem. The first, of course, is the fact of geography and population distribution. Where you have density of population and large volumes of traffic, this naturally makes for cheaper transportation costs. That is true in central Canada. Also, as I have said, these circumstances invite truck competition, which has a significant impact on freight rates. When you get west of central Ontario you have a vast stretch of territory through northern and western Ontario, and the eastern side of Manitoba, which is sparsely populated and has very little activity which generates freight movement. That is the case until you get to Winnipeg and then further on to Saskatoon, Regina, Edmonton, Calgary, and so on. To be fair to the railways, they are faced with very high transportation costs in moving products in either direction over that 1,000 miles of territory where very little traffic is generated, and where the population is sparsely settled. As a result, you have a costly proposition to provide transportation services between central Canada and the Prairie provinces.

A second factor that enters into this problem is that in Canada we have both a private and a public railway system. We have the Canadian National which is backed by the taxpayers of Canada, and the Canadian Pacific which is, of course, one of the world's great transportation companies—in fact, it is a conglomerate engaged in many lines of endeavour. The co-existence of these two types of transportation companies leads to considerable duplication of capital and operating costs. The fact that the Canadian National is backed by the taxpayers of Canada does not stimulate efficiency, because if there is a deficit there is always the taxpayer to pick it up.

The Canadian Pacific is involved in land ownership and development on a large scale and also in resource development—oil, gas, coal, minerals, and so on. It has large ocean transport interests. It is involved in air transport and in operating a large chain of hotels. CP Investments is involved in real estate and other activities in the investment field. This in itself has given rise to some controversy as far as the shippers using the rail services of the company are concerned. In the case of a conglomerate of this kind the question arises: Should the rail transportation service stand entirely on its own feet? Should the mineral division stand on its own feet? Should the hotel chain stand on its own feet? Naturally, that is the position of the company, and understandably so. But I think you can also understand the attitude of many shippers who say that if the company is making a profit in this field, and a profit in that field, but losing in another field, there should be a financial interrelationship between the entities of which the company is comprised.

The Canadian Pacific undertook the construction of the transcontinental railway, as one of the conditions under which the Province of British Columbia entered into Confederation. The land and mineral grants in Western Canada associated with the building of that railway have been a matter of considerable debate. I think the debate sometimes has been unfair to the company which carried out the commitments it made at that time. But you have people, especially those who have not taken the time to go back into the history of the matter, who say, "The company was handed a great deal of land and was given mineral grants, and this imposes continuing obligations with respect to the provision of freight services and the correction of inequities that may develop within those services."

In the matter of competitive transportation, the trucking industry is a significant factor. Over the years, as the trucking industry became a significant competitor of the railways, both railways have themselves moved into the trucking industry on a large scale.

I believe you are all familiar with what has happened to rail passenger services in recent years. Senator Cameron made some interesting observations on this the other day. Rail passenger services have been very significantly reduced by two things—one is air transportation, and the second is the automobile. In a country the size of Canada this is inevitable. I well recall in the early days when I was in the Government of Alberta, before we had airline services, when we were required to come to Ottawa, it involved three nights and two days on the train each way. This meant that in order to have a meeting of one or two days in Ottawa it was necessary to be away from our offices for a week.

The situation is very different now. You can step on a plane in Edmonton, and three hours and 15 minutes later you are in Toronto, non-stop, and a further 45 minutes to Ottawa. In a nation with such vast distances as Canada, people are naturally going to go by the most rapid type of transportation. That is inevitable.

On short-haul passenger travel, the automobile has pretty well eliminated rail travel on the branch lines. In fairness to the railway companies, it should be said that some of the criticism that is raised when the railways suggest taking off a local passenger service is not always justified and is not always fair. I recall occasions when there were hearings on this subject, and people came from 50 to 100 miles either side of the point where the hearing was held to protest against the removal of a dayliner that ran every other day or so. The interesting thing was that every party to the protest drove in by automobile; nobody came by the dayliner. The railway company rightly asked, "Is it just for sentimental reasons that you want to keep the dayliner service? We cannot operate without passengers."

Senator Cameron put his finger on an interesting point the other day, when he said it may well be that the railway companies have not gone out of their way to make rail travel attractive. Perhaps more could have been done, as it has been done in some other countries, to make this form of travel attractive even for the short haul. But certainly that is not the fact in Canada, and as a result rail passenger service has been a very heavy financial drain on both railways for a long time. If we are going to be consistent and fair, it is no use saying to the railway companies, "Our freight rates are too high and our transportation costs are too high," and at the same time insist that they maintain services which are being used by the public to such a small degree that they are demonstrably uneconomic, and therefore add to the problem we want to see resolved.

In all of these transportation matters the factor of government regulation figures prominently. Senator Argue outlined one of the basic changes which has taken place in recent years. It used to be that when a railway company wanted to increase freight rates it filed a notice of its desire, and then had to prove to the Board of Transport Commissioners that in fact the increase was necessary. That has now been changed. Today they file a 30-day notice of intent, and the burden now rests on the shippers to prove that the company does not require the increase, and if they cannot do this it automatically goes into effect. None of the various forms of government regulations to date has proved entirely satisfactory, and certainly they have not resolved the basic problem or removed the growing dissatisfaction.

In Senator Cameron's address the other day, and also in Senator Argue's, the question was raised as to whether the time has now come for another royal commission or some form of inquiry into this whole problem. From my experience in this field for more than 30 years, I have to say that I am less than enthusiastic about the idea of setting up another royal commission or another inquiry. We have had a number of these inquiries, and we have not very much to show for all the time and money and all the effort that has been spent.

It is clear to me that this question of dissatisfaction over freight rates is an integral part of a larger problem which will never be resolved until there is first of all a major policy decision by the Government of Canada. I am convinced that what we need in this country is a comprehensive national transportation policy that takes into account not merely disparities in the freight structure between the Prairie provinces and Central Canada, and the Maritime provinces and Central Canada, but that takes into account the total role of transportation in the economic development of a nation. Beyond the economic factors, there must also be taken into account the impact of an unsatisfactory transportation system on the social and political well-being of the nation, including the regional dissatisfactions, the regional alienations, to which I have already made reference.

It is my conclusion that until the Government of Canada recognizes the need to develop a comprehensive national transportation policy in this country very little will be accomplished by setting up more royal commissions and boards of inquiry in an endeavour to thresh straw that has already been threshed many times. To date I have seen little, if any, indication on the part of successive federal governments to recognize the importance of a national transportation policy, and have the determination to see that such a policy is developed.

Without wearying you with details, let me close by commenting on a few of the factors that are pertinent to a comprehensive national transportation policy. In the first place, it is important that the central government have a full and detailed knowledge of the transportation requirements of each major region of Canada, and of the nation as a whole. Let us begin by finding out what we actually require to provide this country with an adequate, satisfactory overall transportation system. Hand in hand with that, there should be an inventory of all existing transportation facilities—rail, truck, air—or in other words all of the facilities which currently exist. It would then be possible to determine the extent to which the existing facilities measure up to what is required to provide an adequate overall transportation structure for Canada. It would be possible to determine whether there is unnecessary and costly duplication, and whether there are gaps where services are not being provided at all, or at prohibitive costs.

The formation of a meaningful national transportation policy would require a decision as to the degree to which rate equalization is desirable in the national interest, and the development of a formula to bring about whatever measure of equalization is justified.

Honourable senators, equalization is not an unknown factor in Canada. We have created all kinds of programs in this country in an endeavour to bring about greater equality between different regions. The budget which is now being debated in the other place includes another $190 million of public funds to increase the equalization payments to seven out of the ten provinces of Canada. The argument is that this is necessary for the good of the nation as a whole. I am not disputing that argument. I think there are inequities in it, from the standpoint of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia who receive nothing in return but have to put up most of the money. The principle of equalization is accepted. Why is it then that when we come to the matter of transportation in a vast country where transportation cost differentials are excessive between the heavily populated areas and the sparsely populated areas, we say it is the shippers' problem and not the responsibility of the state?

To be fair, there are certain equalization factors built into the present freight rate structure. I do not want to leave the impression that this is not so. But it would be hard to think of a single situation more deserving of an intelligent examination to determine the extent to which equalization factors are necessary in the public interest than the case of the transportation system of this country.

A comprehensive national transportation policy would also involve a determination of the extent to which public subsidies are necessary. We have public subsidies with regard to our railways today. But as a nation we must decide the extent and form of subsidies necessary to provide this country with the kind of transportation system necessary for sound economic and industrial growth, and which will remove regional disparities and inequities. We are doing this today, but certainly not on any well thought-out scientific formula which surely could be developed if this matter were adequately examined.

Finally, there would have to be determined the extent to which government regulations regarding transportation facilities and rates are necessary. I am an opponent of government regulations wherever they can be avoided. I believe the more you leave the economy open to free competition the sounder the structure and the greater efficiency you acquire. At the same time, if we are going to impose equalization to some degree by law, if we are going to subsidize transportation to some degree from the public purse, then obviously there is a responsibility to have whatever measure of government regulation is necessary to protect the public interest.

• (1550)

Honourable senators, I express my appreciation to Senator Cameron for raising this issue. I suggest again that the most constructive way in which we in this house can proceed is to consider the desirability of a comprehensive national transportation policy, and urge on the Government of Canada the necessity and importance of a policy decision to develop and implement such a policy. If this is done, it should be done in co-operation with the railways, the trucking firms and the airlines, all of which have a vast stake in providing transportation facilities and in their successful operation. I am confident there would be a warm response from all major transportation companies in this country if the Government of Canada were to say it has decided that the time has come to develop a meaningful, comprehensive transportation policy and wished to sit down with the companies and work out the very best arrangement that it is possible to develop.

On motion of Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, before the adjournment I should like to remind you that the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy is meeting now in Room 356-S.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 22, 1973

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

TRANSPORTATION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to add a few humble words to the debate on this important subject of transportation in Canada today and especially in the Maritimes and Newfoundland. I wish to let my friends from New Brunswick know that although I am not very strong and am still quite shaky, I am not dead yet and I still have these interests at heart.

I want to congratulate Senator Cameron, Senator Carter, Senator Argue, Senator Manning and all other senators who have taken part in the debate. My remarks will be short as the subject has been well covered from east to west and the problems are much alike across the nation. I see nothing that I could add. The cost of freight rates is gradually destroying our economy. Who is responsible for this sad situation? It is we, the legislators. On too many occasions we have waived our responsibilities to crown corporations, which have grown into giants. I could name quite a few which have lost the sense of what they were created for. They are so powerful today that they disregard the duly elected members and the public in general.

It is true that once a year they present to a cabinet minister an annual report to be rubber-stamped, and to be patted on the back for their good behaviour.

If my figures are right, we have today some 46 crown corporations, a list of which may be found on page 847 of Volume II of Senate Hansard of 1969-70. My friends, it is an eye-opener and I suggest that we take time to look at it. Some of these corporations are small, I agree, but some are big, some bigger and some really too big and beyond control. I should like to mention in particular the CNR and the CBC. We, the legislators, appointed every one of these corporations. I have no hesitation in saying that many of them are very successful and served the country well before serving the corporations. In my view, that makes a big difference.

Coming more to the subject of transportation, every year we are faced with the same situation in the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications when we are asked to rubber-stamp the estimates of the Canadian National even after more than half the estimates have been spent. This so-called act of good will lasts approximately three or four hours. The CNR officials have the same answer for every question. The regular excuse is that "it is done every year." But I note that they are not so hasty to answer simple notices of inquiries dealing with management.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, how can we sincerely justify such an action? How can we approve amounts of $50 or $60 million within a few hours without examining them thoroughly?

This is where we stand today. You must not be surprised if some of those corporations close their doors in the legislator's face.

In New Brunswick, transportation is the key to survival. Our agricultural, forest and sea products have to be moved across the country to the Western provinces or to the U.S. markets. We have no alternative. It is a matter of life or death. However, freight rates are being increased day after day without any consideration for the taxpayers.

[English]

I conclude my remarks by answering a question which was asked during the debate by Senator Graham, namely:

> Just what is the function of the Canadian Transport Commission, and what control does it have in a situation of this kind?

My answer is very simple. The control is limited, and in the past one of the major functions of the commission has been to rubber-stamp the requests or demands of the railways. I am of the opinion that it is high time that the commission justified its existence.

I believe that today we have arrived at a crisis which either we have refused to accept or have failed to recognize. Let us not wait until it is too late. It is late enough already. Therefore, I approve all of the recommendations. Nevertheless, I take some objection to some of the remarks made by Senator Manning yesterday, when he was giving us an example of the situation in Western Canada and spoke about people not using the passenger service any more. I don't disagree with his remarks concerning the West, but I am not ready to accept carte blanche that people are not using the railway passenger service any more. But, in any event, let us find out in the first place why there is a reduction in that service before we jump to any hasty conclusions.

Just by way of comparison, let me point out that the Amtrack on the American side, which is a subsidiary of Penn Central, which is six companies together, showed in their passenger service last year an increase of 14 per cent. Many of their trains have been put back in service. Even the train between Washington and Montreal has been put back into service and is running at capacity. I happen to know that because when I was there last week I tried for three days, without success, to get a reservation and finally gave up. Let us not overlook, either, the fact that in Canada in 1970, and I believe my figures are correct, 32 million people used the passenger service of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways. That is more than one and one-half times the population of Canada. That certainly indicates that the service is there. I have to agree, however, that there was a slight decrease from 1970 to 1971.

Just looking at transportation in general, what do we find? We find that our airports are crowded and our highways are overcrowded. The cost of maintaining highways, not to mention airports, is tremendous. Nor is there any question that we are ready to spend and are spending millions of dollars to improve highways, airports and other facilities. Despite that, however, we do very little to improve railway transporation. But what would happen if we were to put on our highways all of those people who use the railway passenger service—and remember that there were 32 million of them in 1970 and only slightly fewer in 1971? Our other modes of transportation could not possibly absorb them; neither the airlines nor the highways would be capable of taking care of such an increase in traffic.

Add to this the fact that we are now living in an age of widespread travelling. Young people, students of every age, businessmen, old people—everybody is travelling today. There is certainly no shortage of potential passengers. So, if people are not using the railways then let us find out why. It may be that there is a shortage of passenger service.

In my opinion a good passenger service is most essential to the economy of any country, but admittedly, and I want to stress this, it will cost a great deal of money because in many cases they will have to revamp their equipment in order to give better trains and better facilities. People today are demanding good service. They do not want to travel in a way that is less than comfortable. In fact, many passenger services have had to be reduced because suitable equipment and adequate comfort to the traveller was not provided. The rail-liners are not fit for long runs. If you have ever had to travel in one of them on a long journey, you will understand what I mean.

• (1420)

Honourable senators, the point I am trying to make in my brief remarks, to the best of my ability, is that we should try to find out why the companies cannot give adequate service before we accept this statement at its face value that people are just not using the trains any more.

On motion of Senator Cameron, for Senator Laing, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE ANY ASPECT OF AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lafond:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to examine, from time to time, any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Argue has a few words to say at this time so I shall yield to him.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, since the debate on the motion as it appeared on the Order Paper the other day, I have had an opportunity to discuss this matter with Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) and Senator Flynn. As a result, I have prepared an amendment to the motion as it appears on the Order Paper. I believe Senator Flynn and Senator Connolly concur with this amended motion, and therefore I ask leave, pursuant to rule 23, to modify the motion by changing the period after the word "Canada" to a colon and adding thereto the following:

provided that no special expenses shall be incurred by the committee without specific authorization by the Senate and full compliance with rule 83A, and that all Senators shall be notified of any scheduled meeting of the committee and the purpose thereof and that it report the result of any such examination to the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the Honourable Senator Argue leave to modify his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lafond, that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be empowered, without special reference by the Senate—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

NOTICE OF MEETINGS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, while the item about which I want to say a few words is not a direct inquiry, it was a request made some time ago by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to sending out notices of committees to all honourable senators. I said on a previous occasion that this matter was being investigated, and I am pleased to report that what he requested is feasible and will henceforth be done.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO SIT DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO SIT DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1973

SECOND READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-141, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1973.

He said: Honourable senators, with leave—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable senator indicate for the record the reasons why he is asking leave?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I refrained from doing this yesterday because I did not want to leave the impression that we on this side of the house were trying to rush this measure through. But with regard to what I said last week when I gave assurance that we were not going to ask for leave, the situation has changed, as it was explained in the other place the day before yesterday by the honourable President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Drury. I quote what Mr. Drury said as reported at page 1474 of Hansard of the House of Commons.

> I have been advised that with respect to the Manpower and Immigration programs, allowances to persons on Canada Manpower training courses, LIP grants and further payments in respect of LIP grants under the 1972-73 program and contract payments to companies giving on-the-job training to unemployed workers, all further payments in respect of these programs will have to be suspended commencing February 22. On that date the funds available for these programs will be exhausted. Without further parliamentary authorization it will not be possible to continue to make payments.

> Similarly, on the same day, Thursday, with regard to 74,700 recipients of war veterans allowances who are normally paid on the third last banking day of the month, unless approval is received by February 22 for mailing them, they will be delayed by the number of days beyond February 22 that it takes to secure royal assent to this bill. I might add that in addition to the 74,700 recipients of war veterans allowance there will also be similarly affected 3,300 recipients of civilian war allowances.
> I appreciate the necessity and desirability of giving adequate consideration to the estimates but we wish, if we possibly can, to meet these deadlines.

Honourable senators, I think I can find no better reason than this to ask leave at this stage.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable senator indicate whether the Senate will meet next week?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The present plan, if we can dispose of this legislation, is to move the adjournment of the Senate to March 13, which is Tuesday two weeks hence.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So that our return on Monday would be for the purpose of dealing with this bill.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Quite so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Under the circumstances I will give leave to proceed with second reading today.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, second reading of Bill C-141, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1973.

I am grateful to honourable senators who have given leave to proceed at this stage. As you will recall, royal assent has already been given to the two supply bills covering estimates for the current fiscal year. The first provided interim supply for the months of April, May and June. The second, agreed to on June 28, 1972, provided full supply for the balance of the main estimates for 1972-73. The bill introduced today provides for full supply of supplementary estimates (A) for 1972-73. These estimates consists of $473,790,402 in budgetary items and $817 million in non-budgetary items. The total estimates tabled to date consist of budgetary expenditures of $16,223,091,-571 and non-budgetary expenditures of $1,606,779,000, for a total of $17,829,870,571.

Supplementary estimates (A) were referred, as honourable senators will recall, to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on January 25, 1973. These estimates were discussed in committee on February 6 with the President of the Treasury Board and some of his senior officials. The form of the bill presently before us is the same as that passed in previous years, except that the amounts which the bill will authorize to be paid include the amounts which were authorized by special warrants issued by the Governor General when Parliament was not in session. No additional borrowing authority is requested, since the first supply bill for the current fiscal year provided sufficient borrowing authority in the amount of $3 billion.

Honourable senators, the supplementary estimates before you amount to $1,290 million. They are made up almost entirely of items having to do with the relief of unemployment and the creation of jobs. About $1,180 million, or more than 90 per cent, are for these purposes: the Winter Capital Projects Fund, $350 million; Advances to Unemployment Insurance Commission, $455 million; Local Initiative and Training on the Job, $304 million; Federal Labour Intensive Projects, $60 million; Payments to establish the Metropolitan Area Growth Investments Ltd. for the Halifax-Dartmouth Area, $10 million.

A substantial portion of these estimates concern measures to assist farmers: payments to farmers who suffered crop losses due to adverse weather conditions, $12.6 million; additional subsidization of the movement of livestock feed from the West, $4 million; payments to the Canadian Wheat Board for the purchase of covered grain-hopper cars to facilitate the movement of Canadian grain exports, $40 million, and, finally, payments to protect farmers from losses due to water fowl depredation, $1 million.

There are also provisions for costs incurred or to be incurred in the New Horizons Program for retired people in the amount of $6.2 million; payment of higher pensions and allowances to veterans after cost of living adjustments, $18 million; assistance to Asian immigrants expelled from Uganda, $4 million; and expansion of operations under the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Program, $2.8 million.

The items which I have listed amount to 98 per cent of the total. The remaining two per cent covers such matters as additional capital and operating costs of Public Works; a loan to the Northern Transportation Company Ltd., grants for the Prince Edward Island Centennial Projects and the National Theatre School, and, finally, expenditures to compensate fishermen for the closing of the Atlantic Salmon Fisheries.

Also included in these estimates is the sum of $60 million for the Treasury Board for the contingency vote to provide for new employment by the government itself as part of the direct employment program for the winter. The departmental votes may be supplemented from this contingency vote.

At this stage I should further explain this item of $60 million by quoting what the President of the Treasury Board had to say on January 11 before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee of the other place.

Mr. Drury said:

> Mr. Chairman, as part of the winter works program for the current winter, we plan a program whereby temporary employees would be hired directly by government departments; these temporary employees would carry out additional work, but would be taking part in programs already approved by various departments.
> We asked for ideas and suggestions from the departments to find jobs which would supply the greatest possible number of man months at the least possible cost. Some of the suggestions received involved rather large amounts of money; in making our selection we distributed the money and jobs available across Canada in accordance with the criteria used for the Finance Department's Municipal Winter Works Program, for a total of $350 million. In other words, we distributed the jobs suggested across Canada in accordance with the degree of unemployment, the seasonal effects of climate and the population of the provinces. The $60 million was assigned to programs across the country in accordance with these criteria. We attempted to choose departmental proposals whereby as much money as possible would go for salaries and as little as possible for capital expenses; at the same time we gave preference to suggestions which were related to departments "regular programs" and which therefore could be implemented very rapidly. We authorized the departments to begin work on these programs in December; the programs are to operate from January to May. The $60 million was shared among the departments, but it was much easier to include it as a lump sum in the supplementary estimates under the Treasury Board than to indicate small sums for each department.

• (1440)

I think that is a full explanation of the $60 million item.

These estimates continue a practice instituted in the fiscal year 1968-69 of seeking to finance supplementary estimates through complete or partial offsets in other votes in the same program, or other programs of the ministry where funds can be made available through the exercise of restraint or where changed circumstances permit lower expenditures. The complete offsets are treated as $1 votes in order to bring them before Parliament for authorization.

I should add at this stage, for the benefit of those honourable senators who are not members of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, that a complete list and explanation of these $1 items was tabled before the committee when the estimates were under consideration.

There are a total of four $1 items included in these supplementary estimates. These items consist of:

1. The itemization of a grant requiring parliamentary approval—one item.

2. The authorization of a transfer of funds from one vote to another—one item. This item also includes a requested amendment to a previous Appropriation Act and is therefore also shown under category 3.

3. The amendment of a vote included in a previous Appropriation Act—two items.

4. The amendment of other legislation—one item.

Honourable senators, I think I have covered the most important features of the bill presently before us. If you wish further explanation, I shall be pleased to give it, if I can.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I wonder if the Acting Leader of the Government will permit a question. Vote 42, grant to the National Theatre School, is in the amount of $2,529,000. I wonder if the acting leader can say what that works out to per student in that school?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am afraid I do not have this information at present. I will supply it to the honourable senator.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, obviously I rise as a spokesman on this bill from this group. Under our rules it is possible that this bill will be referred to committee. I am not suggesting that it will be, but it is possible. It is equally possible that the committee might be the Standing Committee on National Finance. It is my intention, if this bill is referred to that committee, to ask the committee members to seek someone other than myself as acting chairman until Senator Everett returns. I am not suggesting I would be in a position of conflict of interest, but some of the remarks I am about to make on Bill C-141 might indicate some differences of viewpoint as between the position I might have as acting chairman of that committee and the role I have now.

Bill C-141, honourable senators, is presumably—and certainly hopefully—the last supply bill for the current fiscal year 1972-73. It brings us to the end of the long, long trail of the granting of supply, which, of course, has been going on since about this time last year in respect to the expenditures for the current fiscal year. As a matter of fact, we are starting on the new long trail of next year. Already the main estimates for 1973-74 have been tabled. So we find ourselves tramping on the heels of the future at this time.

If anyone asks why this trail has been such a long one, the answer, of course, is the complexity of the subject itself, and particularly the growing concern among parliamentarians—and I am sure the public—about the inability of Parliament to gain control of the spending of public money or, conversely, the apparent inability or unconcern on the part of the executive to permit Parliament to control the spending of public money.

If any proof of that were required, there is ample proof in the bill before us. I need hardly say that a very large part of the amount that we are today asked to authorize has already been spent. This is an example of what is happening in the so-called "control" of the spending of money by Parliament. To give just one example, $590 million is covered by the item under warrants. That is $590 million of public money spent, and we are now asked by this bill to authorize that expenditure.

As was stated when we were debating Bill C-124, Parliament was in session at the time the need arose for the first of those warrants in respect to the unemployment insurance account, and Parliament could have been called into session in December when the second warrant was issued. There were other warrants in addition to those respecting the unemployment insurance account covering, I believe, five departments. However, that kind of operation is perhaps normal except that, even in most of those cases, supplementary supply could have been asked for in the normal fashion of Parliament.

I suggest to honourable senators who may be concerned that the Senate might want to take a little time to look at this situation. We were impressed, of course, by the explanation that the Leader of the Government gave as to the urgency that certainly arose. We are now told that all sorts of people are not going to get their money if we do not pass this by tomorrow. What a confession of utter mismanagement that has to be!

We have had this type of situation before. We have had it in this short session with respect to the pilotage bill. Someone forgot to read the act; someone forgot that the whole pilotage system would be without money, and the House of Commons and the Senate were asked to approve that bill urgently in one day, which we did.

We on this side keep saying that we will not do it again, but we keep doing it again.

If Parliament is being destroyed, if this house is being put in a position where it cannot do its duty, I say the fault lies entirely with the utter mismanagement of affairs that allows this sort of thing to happen over and over again. I do not want to overemphasize this, but every senator in this chamber knows that if this happened in any organization of which he was a member he would protest. In fact, he would do what he could, I am sure, to get rid of the directors.

This has not happened only once. It has not happened only to the Senate. I am not at the moment complaining about what it does to us. It is being done to the other place. What is the explanation? I do not know. I was going to say it is the "creeping power" of the executive—perhaps I should say "leaping power." I have to say that the government simply cannot care about Parliament. Why? The other day I was reading the results of a Gallup poll in which the public were asked to give their reasons for certain things that happened on or about October 31. The one that attracted the largest percentage of response from the public was mismanagement, and the second referred to the government's attitude towards Parliament.

Perhaps the lesson has been learned. We are told over and over again that the lesson has been learned, that there is a more humble approach to the rights of Parliament and the people now. I hope that is so. It would not be fair to say this bill is an indication that it is not so, because the situation caused by this bill perhaps antedates that particular lesson that was to be learned.

This bill raises this question perhaps more than an ordinary bill covering supplementary estimates. It is in many ways an unusual bill. Perhaps it is the most unusual appropriation bill that has ever come before Parliament.

[Hon. Mr. Grosart.]

In the first place, there is the enormous amount of $1.3 billion involved in these supplementary estimates. It is quite true that this is in itself an indication of the lesson learned. The Acting Leader of the Government made it very clear that apart from the large amounts under the warrants, which might be included in that category, the purpose of most of the spending here is to do something about the great problem of unemployment. He said, I believe, that 98 per cent of the total amount asked by the government in budgetary and non-budgetary items is, in one way or another, for the relief of unemployment or those directly affected by unemployment. It is, of course, unfortunate that the public has to pay this enormous cost. The public gave the lesson and now they are getting the bill, a $1.3 billion bill. The student fees are going up.

This bill is unusual in that it is a post-election appropriation bill. I have indicated some aspects of that, and there are others. It is not entirely unusual to have a post-election appropriation bill, but the fact is that this is the first time in the history of Canada that we have been faced with a situation in which measures arising out of a budget—the May 1972 budget—were carried over the end of the year and over an election period. In that respect this is a unique bill. This again is an obvious indication of mismanagement. We are now faced with having to start examining the estimates for the next year while we are still waiting for the measures from the budget of last May, and there is no indication that I have seen when we are to get them, or if we are to get them.

I have mentioned the warrants as one of the unusual features of this bill. They total some $590 million, of which $454 million consists of amounts required to cover the benefit payments under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have already given my views on that. I merely repeat that those warrants were not necessary. The evidence is clear, and if anybody wishes to read it he will find it, in part, in the examination of the supplementary estimates by the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee of the other place. It was abundantly clear in the middle of August, when the officials were discussing it; when the officials were calling in experts from the Justice Department, asking, "What will we do? What can we do? Should we go by warrants? Should we have supplementaries?" That is the evidence. The officials were sitting there discussing it.

It is only fair to say there is no evidence that they drew it to the attention of the minister, and there is no evidence that the minister drew it to the attention of the Cabinet. I cannot comment on that, because I cannot say the minister knew. I can say it is not surprising that he is not the minister any more if he did not know. If he did know and the Cabinet did not know, perhaps we have a clue to one small aspect of the mismanagement to which I have referred.

This appropriation bill covers some expenditures under the famous Treasury Board contingency fund. This is a fund the misuse of which has been criticized over and over again by the Auditor General, and it has, of course, been criticized many times in Parliament. There are two minor items, one under Agriculture in respect of crop payments and another million or so for the Prince Edward Island centennial, and I will not criticize them.

They may very well be the kind of expenditures out of the contingency fund for which the fund was originally established.

Then we have the item, to which the Acting Leader of the Government referred, of $60 million. As I understand it, that $60 million is to provide jobs in the federal service across the country on a more or less equal basis, province by province. I will not comment on the propriety of that. It perhaps makes sense in somebody's view at this time to add more public servants. I was under the impression that we had enough, but that may not be so. Anyway, the purpose of this $60 million is to hire more people in various parts of the public service. My criticism is not of that at the moment; that is another subject.

But why is this in the contingency fund? The acting leader gave the official, conventional explanation, that it was easier to put it in this one fund than to put it in supplementary estimates department by department. Of course it was easier—you did not have to add up the figures; you did not have to explain how much each department would be spending. It is the kind of thing that I say has created this situation in which Parliament has little control of the expenditure of public funds.

What possible justification can there be for saying that 16 or 20 departments will spend so much money? Surely the whole concept of the estimates, the whole supply system, is that each department will indicate to Parliament and the public what it intends to spend, what it wishes to spend, forecasting the nature of the expenditures and asking for approval, department by department. There may be devices necessary at times, but any device that circumvents that basic principle has something wrong with it, unless a better explanation can be given than that it was easier to give the whole $60 million to Mr. Drury than to tell Parliament which departments would have the various parts of it.

This is the kind of thing we find all through this bill, and which I hope justifies some of the rather extravagant statements I have made about its significance in terms of the whole business of parliamentary control of supply.

Honourable senators, this appropriation bill adds considerably to the projected expenditures for the year. When we started to discuss the estimates a year ago, we were told that the government expected to require about $16.5 billion. As the Acting Leader of the Government said, this supplementary will bring that up to $17.8 billion, an increase of over $1 billion at the last moment, at the tail end of the year. It is $1 billion in a budget of $16 billion—the purpose of which is to remedy errors, and give the impression that the government has learned the lesson of October 30.

We are entitled to be concerned, because this escalation of government spending is going on, with the estimates for the next year before us, to a figure of $19.2 billion. Just ten years ago the expenditure—that is, the main estimates including the supplementaries—was $7.1 billion. So in ten years federal government expenditures have risen from $7.1 billion to something like $19 billion.

Honourable senators, I would comment on one other item, which may be the subject also of comment from others. It is the item which you will find under the Department of Finance, vote L12a on page 16. It is $350 million to provide loans for provincial and municipal winter works, over a period beginning December 6, 1972 and ending June 30, 1975. I have not heard an explanation that makes any sense. It has been suggested that this is directly contrary to section 20 of the Financial Administration Act, which clearly states that Parliament may vote appropriation only for accounts coming in the course of payment in the calendar year. Yet here we are asked, absolutely needlessly, to vote $350 million which may be used to cover obligations that the government may incur for such a long period of years running up to 1975.

There has been an explanation that there is a difference between "committing" and "contracting" to spend money. In my view, this is as specious an argument as any could be. In clause 2 of the bill it is made very clear that the item "shall be deemed to include and not to be in addition to the amounts authorized" by the warrants. That is one point. This is, under clause 3(2), "deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the first day of April 1972." Clause 4(2)(a) speaks of "the amount, if any, appropriated in respect of that item or provision"—which goes back to clause 2 which appropriates the money. It is clearly an appropriation. This $350 million cannot be regarded, under the terms of the act, as anything but an appropriation—which the Financial Administration Act says cannot be done.

I say this procedure is unnecessary. I am not suggesting that there is no merit in the provision of $350 million for jobs at the provincial and federal levels. The item would provide forgiveness of certain percentages, 50 or 100 per cent, of the on-job pay list. So it is difficult to say exactly how much it might be. It will depend to some extent on what the provinces might spend, and on the conditions of the forgiveness.

There seems to be no reason in the world why the government could not say it estimates it will need $70 million next year. That would bring it within the terms of the Financial Administration Act and the whole concept of supply.

This seems to me to indicate carelessness, unconcern, saying, "Who cares about Parliament? We can do it this way. There is no reason why we should not say we need $70 million this year and appropriate that amount, but we can put in $350 million and who cares about the Financial Administration Act?"

When the minister was asked why, he replied that the appropriation act is an act of Parliament and it supersedes any other act. That was his statement. That would mean that at any time, in the judgment of the Minister of Finance, all the Statutes of Canada can be repealed by one item in an appropriation bill. That is the effect of the guess at what might be a legal excuse by the minister. I am sure that at some time or other in his legal studies he has taken a course in conflict of laws, but he must have forgotten most of it, since he makes a statement of that kind.

Honourable senators, we are coming to the end of a long, long trail. It has been a long trail. This emphasizes the absurdity of the Acting Leader of the Government being put in the position he has been put in. He did not get into it himself; he is too wise a man to have got into that position, but he bears up under it well and occasionally he even smiles when I make these observations.

On this bill we are faced with this urgency, that difficulties will arise if we do not pass it today. Yet the government comes along at the last moment with this ultimatum. This is the first we in this chamber have heard of it. We have had this bill before us a few days, but a few minutes ago was the first we heard of this urgency here, the urgency that if we don't pass this bill today there will be dire consequences. Perhaps the Acting Leader of the Government is going to tell us how many thousands of people are going to starve. He did not put it in those terms, but apparently there would be a horrendous number of LIP people who would not be able to get on with their jobs. He even mentioned the veterans.

It always worries me a bit when a minister, in pushing for this kind of sudden decision, mentions veterans, but I suppose that is part of the game.

However, honourable senators, the supplementary estimates on which this bill is based were tabled in the other house and referred to committee on January 8. They were reported back on February 2. They were debated from February 7 to February 12. The motion was put on the 12th, and it was debated on the 12th, 13th, 15th, 16th, 19th and 20th in the other place. According to my count, 76 members of Parliament spoke on it in the other place. Now we are told in the Senate at just about two o'clock on February 22 that if we do not pass this bill today we will be depriving hundreds of thousands of Canadians of their rightful "bucks"!

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The statement by the minister was made two days ago in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: If the honourable Acting Leader of the Government will allow me to make it clear, what I said was "the first time we were told in this place." There is a rule in the Senate that we do not know what is going on in the other place, or what the minister says in the other place, until we are told here. If the Acting Leader of the Government happened to hear it on the radio or if it was communicated to him two days ago, I wonder why he did not tell us, if he is concerned about that time lag.

I merely say, honourable senators, that at two o'clock today we are told, "You must pass this or veterans won't get their cheques." I say it is a disgrace that we are put in this position under these circumstances.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I can appreciate that Senator Grosart and others would be upset at the kind of situation we are facing in this house today. We know that it is not of our doing. We know that it is the doing of someone else. But it is a little too easy to say that the fact that we are in this predicament, that we are under the gun, that we are under this pressure, is tantamount to a confession of mismanagement by the government, to use the words of Senator Grosart.

The Senate is often abused when there is no foundation at all for the abuse. There is a member of the other place who perennially moves motions to abolish the Senate, and there is nothing that he is not prepared to say in a derogatory way about the Senate. To him and some others this place has no value. But we should not be misled—and it would be a case of being misled—in concluding that we are in the predicament we are in today because the government failed to place the bill we are now considering before the House of Commons in ample time to have it dealt with effectively.

As I understand it, there were fully 11 days of debate on this bill in the other place which, as is the case with this chamber, has been in session since January 4—almost two months. But what progress has the other place made in dealing with the important legislation before it, and in taking the actions it must take in order to assist in governing this country? Well, as I read their progress, it has been exceedingly slow. We got the Unemployment Insurance Bill (No. 1), which merely removed the ceiling on advances, and changed nothing else in the act. We got the Pilotage Bill, which provided that the pilots will operate for the next year as they have been operating. Now we get this bill after 11 days of debate in the other place. And who held it up in the other place? The government? Of course the government didn't hold it up. Not the members of the government party; I don't think so, as I read the House of Commons Debates. Did the members of the Official Opposition delay its passage? Well, they spent a lot of time on it, and they have big stakes in the other place. They are hoping that by some means, some legitimate means, they can bring about the toppling of the government, and I suppose that is fair game. However, generally speaking, the members of the other place wasted time; many of them spent it in exhaustive speeches, in my opinion, not altogether relevant to this bill.

So it was because of the filibuster in the other place—the continuing filibuster, the almost permanent filibuster over there, and not the inefficiency of the government, that we are faced with this mess now. And it is a mess, because the people will not get their cheques if we don't push the bill through today and allow those cheques to be sent out.

Who held things up? On Thursday last towards the end of the sitting, Mr. MacLean, a Conservative member, asked whether or not the members generally would agree to continue the discussion beyond ten o'clock so that Bill C-141 might be passed and progress made, but a member of the NDP—one person—said, "No, I will not allow the debate to continue." So the NDP on Thursday said, "We are doing everything we can to delay it and to make sure that the Senate is under the gun."

And what about last Friday, which I believe was the ninth day of the debate? Another member of the other place, Mr. Nielsen, made the following suggestion:

> Mr. Chairman, before Your Honour leaves the chair, may I once again suggest that you ask whether there is unanimous consent to pass all stages of these estimates tonight? If that is not agreeable perhaps Your Honour would not see the clock.

Again opposition was taken and progress could not be made, and our friend in the other place, that friend of the Senate, one called Knowles, said:

> Mr. Chairman, I must inform you that we have other members who have a few things they would like to say.

• (1520)

They had been talking there for nine days, but they still had a few things to say to ensure that the filibuster would continue, to make sure that the House of Commons could not pass the bill on that day, and consequently to make sure that we were put in this ridiculous position we find ourselves in today.

I suggest that the danger to this country—and I personally think it is a very grave danger—does not come from the Senate's failure to do its job. We do our job as we see fit. We can be criticized for the kind of job we do perhaps, but the fact remains that we do our job. The legislation that comes to us goes through this chamber, as it should, after due consideration. But, honourable senators, the other place is not doing its job. There is a permanent filibuster, a continuing filibuster, and I make the forecast that the other place in the next six months will come nowhere near dealing with the legislation required for the proper government of this country. Our nation is suffering because of these continuing filibusters in the other place.

I might add that it will surprise me if they pass all the bills based on the budget. The budget debate itself will be concluded, of course, but will the bills based on the budget be passed? As I have said, it will surprise me if they are. I certainly doubt if they will be passed in this session.

I suggest, honourable senators, that the other place is incapable, because of the way in which its members are conducting themselves, of dealing in three sessions with the volume of legislation required for the efficient government of this country in one session. But when we are criticizing the actions of that place we should try to see where the blame lies, and in my judgment the blame lies with those members who by continuing to speak, and by refusing unanimous consent without good reason, are placing the economic life of this country in jeopardy. I hope that soon somebody over there will have the courage and ability to arrange their proceedings so that after a particular period of time and ample debate, legislation will be passed and will come to us in a manner which will permit us to do our job as it should be done.

Honourable senators, I had not really intended to speak at length on this bill. I simply wanted to say a few words about what my friend Senator Grosart described as a relatively minor item, namely, the payment of moneys to farmers who find themselves in difficult circumstances. I know my friend did not mean that the item was in any way insignificant, but that it was only a small proportion of the total.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: It was only $9 million. What is $9 million?

Hon. Mr. Argue: Even the $400 payment is important if you really hit a rough year, and some of these farmers were in very poor shape last summer and last fall because of the amount of rainfall, which in turn meant that they were unable to harvest their crops. They suffered greatly in consequence.

If I might go to another theme, it is my view that the provinces get off pretty well scot free when it comes to dealing with important public questions such as this—and here I am not talking about any one province or any one political party. When the farmers were in trouble, where did the leadership come from? It came from the federal Parliament and the federal Department of Agriculture. I was present at one of the mass meetings held by farmers near Ottawa and I can say that not one single provincial representative was in attendance. Why did they need payments? They needed them because of the disastrous conditions that had affected their crops, and in most cases farmers did not have crop insurance. Here again the federal government is giving leadership. Up to the present the federal government has paid 25 per cent of the benefits, and the farmers have paid 75 per cent. All the provinces have done is share the administrative costs on a fifty-fifty basis with the federal government.

Honourable senators, the crop insurance scheme needs a severe overhaul if farmers are to be able to benefit in an effective way. I think the federal government is moving in this direction substantially by proposing to double the federal contribution, thus bringing it from 25 per cent to 50 per cent, with the result that it will be a fifty-fifty proposition as between the federal government and the farmers. But the provinces are in the middle. The provinces pay 50 per cent of the cost of administration and they have full control, which I suggest is not a desirable thing when the federal government is in fact paying out these vast sums of money. The federal government has a responsibility to engage in talks and enter into arrangements with the provinces whereby crop insurance will be effective and will be administered in a fair, non-partisan, non-political way.

At the present time they are providing a maximum payment of $400 per farmer under this item. Where did they get this figure? That is the approximate federal contribution to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act—in other words the payment made to each farmer who qualifies for the maximum payment. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act is being discontinued and, in my view, that in itself is a mistake. However, the federal government has used it in this respect as a pattern for establishing the payments we are considering today. As I say, it is a great mistake to discontinue it on the Prairies where some farmers do not have an opportunity to obtain satisfactory crop insurance. Instead of the federal government getting out of the scheme, which they have operated pretty efficiently, and turning everything over to the provinces under the so-called provincial crop insurance schemes, I would like to see Prairie farm assistance maintained for those farmers who would prefer to retain it rather than try to obtain crop insurance.

At this stage I should like to make particular reference to the way in which crop insurance has been operated in the Province of Saskatchewan. In Saskatchewan there is a crop insurance act, and there is a crop insurance plan. As honourable senators know, there was a recent change in the administration of the province. Where once there was a Liberal government, there is now a NDP government. The Liberal government in its time knew how to deal with things in a political way, and they were not all that pure. But then there was a change and the NDP came in.

The director of crop insurance was dismissed. Seventy-three of the insurance agents out of a total of 123 who were selling crop insurance have been dismissed and are no longer allowed to sell crop insurance in Saskatchewan. New people have been hired by the Saskatchewan crop insurance plan. A great many of them are exceedingly well known NDP organizers who have been taken on the payroll of the Saskatchewan crop insurance plan, who are handling it, who are meeting the farmers, and who are in control of the crop insurance scheme. And still 50 per cent of the benefits to the farmers is paid by Ottawa and the other half is paid by farmers themselves. The Saskatchewan government, as well as every other provincial government, by making a small administrative payment into this fund, has control of a vast political machine which is made possible by these arrangements.

We know there should not be taxation without representation. I think the federal government is abdicating its responsibility if it continues to pay large sums of taxpayers' money out of the federal Treasury and into the coffers of a provincially-operated scheme which is being operated openly in a political, partisan manner. I do not think that the public money of this country, or of any province, should be used to fuel that kind of political machine. I think it is a sorry state of affairs if the federal government does not do something to correct this kind of partisan administration.

The federal government is considering a small farms development program. Saskatchewan has a land bank program. The Saskatchewan land bank program undoubtedly will be administered by political friends of that government.

I suggest to the federal government that crop insurance and small farms development programs should be administered in such a way as to remove all appearances of political partisanship. I suggest that if it is to be a joint venture they might set up something resembling a crown corporation in which, let us say, two directors would be appointed by the federal government, two by the provincial government, and three by interested farm organizations so that in fact there would be a body administering these plans that is non-political in nature.

It is a great disservice to the country if the federal government is to continue blindly supporting provincial government programs when those programs are obviously administered by their partisan friends.

I am pleased that the government has taken action to bring forward this legislation and to pay the $400 to the needy farmers. I would like to see Prairie farm assistance continued and made available to anybody who wants it. And I would like to see action taken with regard to crop insurance, to make certain that it is administered in the interests of the farmers, and in no way influenced by the interests of any political party.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, perhaps I would be permitted to make one comment on some of the remarks made by Senator Grosart and Senator Argue regarding the problem which faces us again today of having to pass a bill without satisfying ourselves that we are giving it all the attention we would like—a bill that we have to pass in order to prevent thousands of Canadian citizens being deprived of some of their rights. It is in the form of a suggestion to the acting government leader. I would be satisfied if he would kindly take notice of this suggestion and see if it is a practical idea.

[Hon. Mr. Argue.]

What we have to ask ourselves in this situation today is whether a practical step cannot be taken to avoid similar occurrences in the future. I know that honourable senators have been complaining about this for years, but I am wondering if one practical step has ever been taken—that of a conference with members of the House of Commons—in order to prevent this happening in the future. We should not be placed in this situation.

I refer honourable senators to page 140 of the Rules where they will see that if the Senate amends a piece of legislation, and the amendment is not agreed to by the House of Commons, there is provision whereby three representatives of the Senate meet with three representatives of the House of Commons. My suggestion is that there should be an unofficial meeting, let us say, between four representatives of the Senate among whom the Opposition would be represented—and I am thinking as well of Senator McIlraith who has been Leader of the House in the other place—and four representatives of the House of Commons, where this precise problem can be discussed to see if a solution could be found to prevent us being placed in the situation we are in today.

I do not know if this is a practical suggestion, but we have to ask ourselves now and again: What can we do to improve the relationship between the two Houses of Parliament? I leave this with the Acting Leader of the Government. Perhaps some honourable senators have other proposals.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I agree with those who have spoken and expressed a feeling we all share about the need for the Senate to have an opportunity to give full study to all legislation submitted. I wonder, however, whether this legislation which is before us today has not been studied by the Senate. I wonder whether the criticism really applies here.

• (1540)

After all, on February 7 Senator Grosart presented the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance "to which was referred supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973." Those estimates had been fully studied by the committee, and the report of the committee was debated in the Senate when it was presented by Senator Grosart. Again on February 13, when Senator Flynn spoke, Senator Grosart complimented the officials of the departments concerned for the detailed information they supplied in answer to questions submitted by senators. Senator Grosart said:

> Honourable senators have in the past indicated how important it is that the assessment of the estimates and supplementary estimates be thorough. For that reason I would ask that the replies that have now been provided by the Treasury Board, together with the questions, be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

This was agreed to and done. Senator Grosart was very pleased with the thorough work of the committee, and I congratulate him and the members of the committee for what was done.

Then on February 15 Senator Grosart indicated that when the estimates have been studied by the committee:

> It has not been the normal practice for an appropriation bill to be referred to committee. There is no reason why it should not be so referred, but normally the Senate has taken the position that the committee's report on the supplementary estimates relating to the appropriation bill satisfies those requirements.

In the circumstances it appears to me that this is not legislation which has come to the Senate very suddenly, a last minute affair, and the Senate is asked at 2 o'clock to enact it immediately without consideration. I think the Senate has considered it. I feel that the Senate has a right to assert itself in order to fulfil its proper function, but, honourable senators, let us not always pick on measures which make the poor, the veterans, and others in that category suffer. We are only hurting ourselves. The press, after the last delay two weeks ago, relating to unemployment insurance, unanimously condemned the Senate for—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: I have a number of clippings I could show Senator Flynn. Perhaps I should change the word "unanimously."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: There is no doubt that some of the principal papers condemned the Senate, I say wrongly. I am not in agreement with them, but they did, and that will be the reaction if we are once again responsible for delaying a measure of this kind. Let us assert ourselves when there is a measure that will not affect the underprivileged and others dependent on the state.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the honourable senator a question, in view of the fact that he seems to have misinterpreted my remarks, in that he seems to have assumed that there is no difference between supplementary estimates and an appropriation bill. The fact of the matter, of which I wonder if he has taken note, is that in the other place the supplementary estimates were reported on February 2, and they have been debating the appropriation bill ever since.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I do not wish to engage in the dispute that has been going on, but I think it might be salutary for us as a body to remind ourselves of certain things. For the nearly 20 years that I have been here, and for many years before, I remember hearing in this house from honourable senators of the Opposition and, indeed, from honourable members on the government side, the same kind of complaint with respect to appropriation bills that we have heard today. They talk about the Senate being placed in an unfortunate predicament, in a dilemma. They speak of the demeaning position in which the Senate has been placed, and of its being made a rubber stamp for the government or for the other place; of having its back up against the wall; of being coerced; and practically of being faced with a shotgun, "pass or else."

I ask honourable senators to remember a number of years ago, because that kind of criticism was voiced in this chamber on almost every occasion that an appropriation bill came here, the Senate as a body decided to protect itself from the criticism of being a rubber stamp and being coerced. The Senate decided that it would inform itself. The procedure adopted is that which has been followed in respect of this bill, and I think it was most useful to have Senator Goldenberg recount the steps which were taken in respect of the supplementary estimates upon which this bill is founded. However, I wish to discuss it in a more general way.

The practice that we adopted at that time, and have followed ever since, upon the tabling of the supplementary estimates, is that the Leader of the Government immediately moves, on that same day, that the supplementary estimates be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Honourable senators should bear in mind that the items in the supplementary estimates are exactly the same as those contained in this bill. I think it has been a salutary practice because honourable senators, or any one of them, can attend the meeting of that committee and examine the witnesses on any item, whether it be supplementary estimates or main estimates. Then in due time the committee makes its report.

We have all recognized through the years—and I think both Opposition and Government sides approved the procedure—that we could have a debate on the report of the committee with the Senate in session.

After preparation of this kind I think we are justified in saying we have not rubber-stamped these bills. We have perhaps given this bill more attention—not debate for 11 days, but more careful attention—than it received in the other place.

• (1550)

I do not think we need apologize for the position we find ourselves in today because, theoretically at least, we should be ready to deal with this bill with full knowledge of what the items are. We have had an opportunity of examining those items in committee, and an opportunity of debating the report of the committee.

It has been our purpose over the years to do our very best to make our parliamentary institutions work. There is bound to be a certain amount of conflict and difference of opinion as to procedure and timing in any bicameral legislature. The procedure that we have adopted for appropriation bills is evidence of the good will and good judgment of the Senate in trying to make these establishments work in the best possible way.

We do not wish to be accused of being rubber stamps, and we do not wish to say that we are being coerced. The press should take note of the fact that we are reforming ourselves in a very effective way in order that we may contribute to the efficient operation of Parliament.

Having said that, honourable senators, there may be good sense in the suggestion of Senator Deschatelets. I would not shut the door on his proposal. The more satisfactory and easy the working arrangements between this house and the other place, the more efficient will Parliament be. The Senate need take second place to none in its efforts to make our parliamentary institutions work.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, first I want to admit that we have been given, as a result of the study of the estimates in the National Finance Committee, the explanation in the report of that committee, and the explanation today by the sponsor of the bill, the Acting Leader of the Government, a lot of information on the substance of the bill, or at least the amounts which we are called upon to vote today.

However, this, for me, is not the whole story. The question of delay, the question of being asked to pass a bill quickly is something that doesn't always arise in the same circumstances. For instance, Senator Argue mentioned that in the present case, considering the length of time taken in the other place, whether in committee or in the house, some responsibility should be attributed to a certain group with which Senator Argue is very familiar. The government is not the only party responsible for the fact that we are faced with the obligation once again of giving quick passage to an important piece of legislation.

Similar circumstances may arise again, and we might be able to solve the problem in part by following the suggestion of Senator Deschatelets. The problem was not the same, for instance, with respect to the recent pilotage bill. In that case, it was mere mismanagement and miscalculation on the part of the government. The other place was told the night before the last day that it had to pass the bill. They did, and we passed it a day later. As a matter of fact, the House of Commons passed it in one hour. That was an entirely different situation.

With regard to the removal of the ceiling on the unemployment insurance fund, the bill came to us at the last moment. We were told that if we did not pass that legislation in a day or two, some people would suffer by having their cheques delayed. Senator Goldenberg said the Senate was criticized for taking two days—just imagine, two days!—to deal with that problem. I did not see any criticism of that. I do not suppose that I read the same newspapers as other honourable senators, but I saw at least one editorial in an Ontario newspaper that was very laudable of the Senate for having stood its ground and at least taken two days rather than one.

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Senator Goldenberg may have been reading Le Devoir.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not think Le Devoir cares very much about what goes on here. He must not read very much about the Senate in Le Devoir. One thing that I should like to underline is the fact that I have not received one complaint from a recipient of unemployment insurance benefits. I am quite sure our delaying that bill one or two days did not, in effect, cause any inconvenience to those who were entitled to the benefits. I do not believe that any deadline, any decree that we have to pass a measure today or tomorrow, makes any difference. In fact, as far as I am concerned, this bill need not receive royal assent before tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Goldenberg: If Senator Flynn will allow me, I shall mention two newspapers—the Montreal Star and the Montreal Gazette.

[Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West).]

Hon. Mr. Flynn: As far as the Montreal Star is concerned, I have read it for a long time, and I have no great respect for its editorial page. As far as the Gazette is concerned, the deterioration of its editorial page has been so evident over the past year or two that I need not comment on the value of its opinion. To me it has become a third class paper.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Fourth class.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I hope they'll read my comment, because I have never seen such deterioration. I've never seen a newspaper, which was producing really good information and worthwhile opinion in its editorials, go down the way that paper has in the last two years. I do not know whether it has to do with the fact that it was bought by Southam Press. Thank God, it still has a few commentators who occasionally give some life, if not to the editorial page, at least to the one next to it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: They even criticize the present government.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That happened more often a long time ago, if my memory serves me right. In any event, in the case of this bill, we are not really placing the criticism at the door of the government itself. We are merely saying that when we are faced with a situation like this, we should take the time required—the maximum time possible—to study the bill properly.

• (1600)

I agree that we were given information in the committee, but the bill is something else. For example, Senator Argue, at the time the report of the Standing Committee on National Finance was presented to the Senate, was not prepared to make the comments he made this afternoon regarding the problems of agriculture. As Senator Goldenberg mentioned, only Senator Grosart and myself said a few words about the report. I would have thought that more honourable senators would have been interested in commenting on the report, and in commenting on the substance of the estimates. We did not do so then because it came too quickly, and some were waiting for the appropriation bill. At that time I indicated I would have some comments to make on the appropriation bill. We have seen this afternoon that merely starting a discussion on this problem has prompted a few honourable senators to speak.

I was pleased to see that for once supporters of the government have taken part in a debate on an appropriation bill, and I hope this will continue and will improve. Instead of discussing only the question of procedure or the question of whether we should take more time or not, I hope they will in future deal also and primarily with the substance of appropriation bills. I commend the Liberal supporters in this house for their contribution today. It is something new, something unusual, or, let us say, something more substantial than has been the case over the years I have sat on this side of the house.

It is often said in support of giving quick passage to this type of bill that the Senate should not really delve too deeply when they are called upon to deal with an appropriation bill. We sometimes use the phrase "money bills" loosely. Of course, I make a distinction between a money bill, which includes an appropriation bill, and one which sometimes has other provisions which are of substance and really not exclusively financial.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Incidental.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Incidental. I think the thesis has been that the Senate should not take too much time on appropriation bills. Constitutionally, I feel, that is not correct. It may be based on practice, or on an interpretation derived from the fact that Westminster has deprived the Lords of their responsibility with respect to appropriation bills, or on the fact that the Lords have considered that appropriation bills are not really their responsibility. Our Constitution puts the Senate on the same footing as the House of Commons in so far as any bill is concerned.

The practice of the Speaker of the House of Commons, when he comes to this chamber for purpose of Royal Assent, is to present an appropriation bill with a green ribbon, saying: "The House of Commons has passed this bill to which they desire Royal Assent." He does not mention that the Senate has also passed the bill. This is not based on any text in our Constitution; it has no constitutional justification. It is only that this has been the practice and because the Senate has said, in effect, "If that is the way they want to do it, then let them do it. We do not want to quarrel with them." But even if we do not want to quarrel with the House of Commons, we should not give up our responsibility, because very often appropriation bills are not really appropriation bills.

Bill C-141, which is before us now, is not, in substance—most of it, anyway—a real appropriation bill. I base that view on the opinion given by the Minister of Finance, which was echoed by Senator Grosart, on this subject. This appears at page 1064 of Hansard of the other place of February 7, where Mr. Turner says:

> Vote L12a, which is before Your Honour, is set out in supplementary estimates A for 1972-73 as are the other items to which reference is made. When these are annexed as an addendum to the supply bill, that bill will pass and will become an act of parliament, as any other bill of this House, and in the same way as the Financial Administration Act itself. What parliament, therefore, does on any supply bill and what it will do on a supply bill that follows these estimates is override any contrary provision, including the provision of section 20 of the Financial Administration Act.

And I underline, "any contrary provision," which refers to other legislation than the Financial Administration Act. Mr. Turner goes on to say:

> One does not have to say directly—

And I underline "directly."

> —in the supply bill or estimates that this overrides section 20 of the Financial Administration Act; that is the clear effect of any subsequent piece of legislation that is drawn in more distinctive or specific terms. In other words, I am submitting to Your Honour that there is nothing illegal in what parliament has over and over again provided for in supply bills and has indeed effected through this vote in question.

And at this point Mr. Turner cites precedents which refer to estimates under Liberal administrations. I do not intend to deal with them because he is, in effect, quoting himself as an authority in that he is quoting his own party or the government he supports.

At page 1065, about half way down, he says:

> Let me turn to further supplementary estimates for 1958-59 for the Department of Transport for air services, civil aviation division, vote 793 for airways and airports—construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment. There is a further amount required including authority to contribute during the current and fiscal years amounts not exceeding in the aggregate $196,000 and so on. Or look at the estimates for 1959-60 for loans, investments and advances for the Department of National Defence. Vote 475 was to authorize loans to be made in the current and subsequent fiscal years in respect of housing projects constructed pursuant to an agreement with the Minister of National Defence for occupancy by members of the Canadian forces. That is in the amount of $10 million. Or take the estimates for 1958-59. Vote 285 relates to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for the northern administration and lands branch, Yukon Territory. It authorized payments to be made in respect of each of the fiscal years for the period commencing April 1, 1957 and ending March 31, 1962—a five year period, well beyond the fiscal period reviewed in the estimates.

• (1610)

I have put that on record because, the other items having been dealt with by Senator Grosart, the main thing I want to deal with on this bill is the fact that we are here invited to vote the sum of $350 million for what is described in vote L12a as "Winter Capital Projects Fund Program." It says:

> Loans to provinces, provincial agencies and municipalities as defined in the Municipal Development and Loan Act in the 1972-73 to 1975-76 fiscal years inclusive for the purpose of creating employment.

And so on.

The total amount is $350 million. It has to be remembered that when the President of the Treasury Board testified before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance he said that the maximum which would be required for the year ending March 31, 1973, would be $75 million, and he was not even sure whether that amount would be required. When the $350 million, which is included in the total amount we are required to approve, is compared with the $1,290,790,402, it will be realized that it is almost one-third, yet clause 2 of this bill reads as follows:

> From and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding in the whole one billion, two hundred and ninety million, seven hundred and ninety thousand, four hundred and two dollars, towards defraying the several charges and expenses of the public service, from the 1st day of April, 1972 to the 31st day of March, 1973, not otherwise provided for, and being the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March, 1973, as contained in the Schedule to this Act.

It can be seen that clause 2 says the amounts voted by this appropriation bill apply only to the current fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, whereas the description of the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program refers to a three-year period, and $350 million, when we know very well that the government does not need more than $75 million and is not authorized to spend that sum after March 31, 1973. That is quite clear from clause 2. There is a direct contradiction between clause 2 and the schedule concerning this special item, vote L12a.

I submit to you, honourable senators, that the Minister of Finance was wrong in saying that this has been done before. Of course, it may have been done under a Liberal administration, but it was not done in the case quoted from the years 1958-59 and 1959-60. I have checked this, and the position is quite clear. The record shows how this bill should have been drafted to avoid this confusion, or this misleading of Parliament and the people.

The item concerning the Northern Administration and Lands Branch is included in the estimates of 1958-59 at page 56, which says:

> To authorize payments to be made, in respect of each of the fiscal years in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1957, and ending on the 31st day of March, 1962.

I agree it covers a period of five years. You have to go to the end and read that the estimated total amount for the fiscal year 1958-59 was $478,752.

You may commit the government to do something, over a period of years, but each year an appropriation has to be made by Parliament for the part to be spent that year. If you do not want to do that, you have to enact special legislation, which I think should have been the procedure followed in the present instance.

From reading the wording of the schedule concerning the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program it will be seen that this should have been presented as a separate bill, covering statutory disbursements over a period of three years, rather than being presented as a budgetary item. I suggest to you, honourable senators, that despite the fact that $350 million is provided in this bill for the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program, the appropriation bill, being in the usual form, as indicated by the Acting Leader of the Government, does not in fact permit the spending of one cent of this $350 million after March 31, 1973.

We have always objected to using an appropriation bill to legislate in other ways than the appropriation of money. There are other items that are less important here. Sometimes an appropriation bill is used to hide a little problem, such as the one to be found at page 18, vote 13a, which is entitled "Special programs." It is somewhat amusing to see that. If a government were only using the device of a supply bill to correct a problem like that I would not really object. The item "Special Programs" in vote 13a is:

> To provide that a person who, by reason of erroneous advice received by him from a person in the Public Service whose ordinary duties included the giving of advice relating to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, failed to make an election or to make an election for his full period of pensionable service under that Act may, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Governor in Council, notwithstanding that the time therefor under the Act has lapsed, make such election as he would otherwise have been entitled to make pursuant thereto.

That is not really an appropriation; it is merely an amendment to the act hidden in a supply bill. We have seen that happen on other occasions. I have seen it done in order to allow a pension to be paid to the widow of a senator whose resignation did not reach the Governor General before he died, in which event his wife was not entitled to a pension. On that occasion, this device was used in a supply bill in order to correct the situation. This is really legislating, but as it dealt only with a matter of detail, to correct a special case, no one raised any objection.

As far as the Winter Capital Projects Fund Program is concerned, this sort of legislating is of questionable rectitude. I cannot see how clause 2 can be reconciled with the schedule covering and describing the program and the conditions, and providing for an amount of $350 million.

• (1620)

I think my comments should be related to those made by Senator Grosart, that the device of using a supply bill in effect to legislate rather than to appropriate moneys for the public service, is a bad one, because Parliament is very often being placed in a position of not being able to recognize exactly what it is doing.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: I merely wish to ask—since I did not follow the proceedings in committee—whether this point was discussed then.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It could not be because we had only the estimates; we did not have the bill. That is why I suggest that the bill can, in itself, often be very different. Granted, the estimates mentioned this, but we did not know what form the bill would take.

The bill merely tells us that we are voting, for the current fiscal year, the amount of $1,290 million of which $350 million to that end, but for the current financial year, when in fact the $350 million is supposed to cover three years and not three months.

[English]

That is why I say very often these estimates deserve closer attention than we can give them in a few hours here in the Senate. We are in a better position than the other place to do such work, to make such a study. We should take the time to do so properly. That would be acting responsibly.

I read the Debates of the other place. When it comes to problems of this kind, problems of principle, while I do not say that they are not interested, they are much more concerned about the possible reactions back home in their ridings. We don't have that problem. We are not against subsidizing public work at this time, although we know that this was not government policy until the result of the election indicated to the government that they were going in the wrong direction. That is something we have discussed previously, and I do not intend to come back to it. I say there is more in this bill than meets the eye, and I would like it to be referred to committee to clarify the problems I've pointed out.

Incidentally, there is another point. We are appropriating the amount covered by the Governor General's warrants for the unemployment insurance fund, amounting to something like $454 million. We do not know if the government needs that at all, now that it has passed legislation to remove the ceiling. I think the way to deal with this situation would have been by saying in the bill removing the ceiling that Parliament ratifies the advances made to the unemployment insurance fund of so many millions of dollars through Governor General's warrants issued on October 5 and December 14, 1972. That would have been the better place to do it.

I am not sure whether these advances are supposed to be sums of money appropriated for the public service, because advances are not the same as loans and expenses. I understand part of this will be repaid to the government by the unemployment insurance fund. If this is not possible, and if there is no other way but to subsidize the fund definitely, we should have legislation to do so. I suppose the government takes the attitude that by this device of doing these two things together, passing the bill removing the ceiling, and appropriating this sum in this bill, they can avoid coming back to Parliament and do whatever they want when the accounts are finally audited.

When we are faced with an appropriation bill which is clearly and exclusively an appropriation bill, the National Finance Committee can certainly deal with it. But the bill itself sometimes will change the whole problem, the whole perspective of Parliament. For that reason Parliament, and the Senate in particular, should have ample time to consider all the aspects involved in such a bill.

Therefore, I suggest that the bill be referred to a committee. Normally it would go to the National Finance Committee, but really what I want to have is some legal advice on what I consider irreconcilable—the text in clause 2 and the schedule concerning the winter works program.

Honourable senators, I repeat that it does not worry me for a moment that this bill won't receive royal assent until tomorrow, one day after the deadline given by Mr. Drury. Mr. Drury gave this warning only, as is mentioned by Senator Langlois, on Tuesday last, February 20, and the bill was passed at 10 o'clock that evening. Only one day has passed since the warning was given or since we learned of it. In fact, as was mentioned by Senator Grosart, officially the Senate was not made aware of it before today. I cannot see that it will make very much difference if this bill receives royal assent tomorrow, after we have had a chance of questioning officials of the Department of Finance or the Department of Justice, depending on whom the Acting Leader of the Government will want to have answer the questions I have put.

Honourable senators, again I do not apologize for having refused to give leave, for refusing to proceed with third reading today. I think we should consider these bills as much as the circumstances of each case will allow. Tomorrow will be Friday. Even if the bill received royal assent tonight, the cheques couldn't be mailed until tomorrow. If we pass the bill tomorrow morning, the cheques will go out tomorrow afternoon. In either case, they'll be received on exactly the same day, Monday.

With these remarks, I would hope that, when the bill receives second reading here, the sponsor will move that it be referred to a committee.

• (1630)

Hon. Mr. Langlois:: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget): I must ask Senator Langlois if it is his intention to close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget): Then I will have to inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, first I wish to give an answer to the question put to me by Senator Cameron regarding the grant to the National Theatre School. The total amount of the grant is $2,529,000. The average annual enrolment at that school is 100 students, which gives, therefore, approximately an average per student of $25,290. I should add, however, that most of this grant is to enlarge and equip the school premises, which would permit a higher enrolment in future years.

I should like to refer to the $60 million item which Senator Grosart mentioned, and about which he levelled some criticism at the government for not having distributed that amount over the departments from which the jobs are going to be secured. My answer to his criticism is that, as I explained earlier, these jobs were distributed among the departments using criteria such as population, the rate of unemployment, climatic conditions, and so on. Also, these jobs were chosen on the basis of a study made by civil servants, and the government had to make a choice of positions which would yield the greatest number of man-hours with the least possible expenditure. I am informed that when the estimates were prepared that study was not yet completed and, therefore, it was impossible to make the distribution to various departments. It was then decided that it would be more practical to put that item under Treasury Board and stipulate the various criteria under which the amount would be distributed among the various departments.

I pass now to the criticism levelled by Senator Grosart regarding the use of special warrants to provide the necessary funds to pay unemployment insurance benefits for the period during which Parliament was not in session. This was fully covered by the Honourable Mr. Drury when he was before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, at which time he explained first that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is a totally independent body doing its own estimating, its own accounting, and having its own administration.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: And its own minister.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And its own minister, yes, if you wish to add that. But the forecasting of this commission is also regularly checked, so I am told, by the Auditor General. I must say that I have read through the proceedings of that committee and I have seen no evidence to the effect that the minister had been informed before Parliament was prorogued that funds were going to be exhausted as from such a date in October. I do not remember the exact date in October, but I believe it was the latter part of October.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Would the honourable senator allow me to clarify? I am sure he would agree that I made it quite clear that I was not saying that the minister knew.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Oh, no. I am merely adding that I have gone through the proceedings of that committee and I have been unable to find any such evidence. I am not suggesting that you charged the government with having done this deliberately.

At any rate, the second suggestion made by Senator Grosart was to the effect that, with regard to the second series of special warrants, Parliament could have been reconvened after the election, some time in December. I have not checked as to the earliest date at which Parliament could have been reassembled, but it would have been early in December.

Hon. Mr. Forsey: December 5.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: December 5, yes. Mr. Drury explained before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that one would have to allow at least a minimum of 30 days before any new Parliament could deal with supplementary estimates, or estimates of any kind. If Parliament had reconvened on December 5, which was the earliest day it could have met, that would not have provided sufficient time for the houses to pass supplementary estimates for the period which the first series of warrants was to cover, because it was originally forecast that these funds would be exhausted some time around the end of December, but in fact the funds lasted until the 3rd or 4th of January.

As Mr. Drury said before the committee, when he was explaining why the second series of warrants provided funds to cover a period as far ahead as February 8, it would have been like putting a gun at the head of Parliament if they had been asked to do that in so short a period after the opening of a new Parliament. After all, there has to be the Speech from the Throne and the debate on the Speech from the Throne, and it is necessary to give ample time to both houses to consider any new expenditures, and that would require at least 30 days. So, it would be quite presumptuous for any government to anticipate that a new Parliament would be able to act that fast.

That argument is borne out, I suggest, by what is presently happening. Parliament has been in session since January 4; today is February 22, and the bill has not yet been passed. Obviously, 30 days would not have been sufficient to allow Parliament to provide the necessary funds even if the house had been reconvened on December 5 with the purpose of providing the money to cover the necessary period.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask a question? Would the honourable senator not agree that the government could have set a deadline, and then announced to the House of Commons and the Senate that, if the bill did not pass, the unemployed would be starving the next day?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I am quite surprised to hear Senator Grosart make that remark. He has been levelling criticisms today about deadlines, and now he is suggesting a deadline himself. He is changing his mind so rapidly that I can hardly follow him.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am merely suggesting that the government could have employed a skill which it seems to have perfected.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I come now to the suggestion which was made by Senator Deschatelets regarding the possibility of a conference between the two houses. I think his suggestion is good, although I have not been able to find any precedent for the use of such conferences between the two houses to cover the situation which is confronting us today. Admittedly, there are many precedents for using this device when, for example, the houses are not in agreement on amendments to legislation. In fact, I have before me such a precedent.

Hon. Mr. Deschatelets: It would be unofficial, of course.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I have before me a precedent from 1933, at which time such a conference took place after the Senate had amended a bill amending the Criminal Code, and the amendment had not been accepted by the other place. There was a kind of deadlock between the two houses.

• (1640)

The move came from the other place, and in the House of Commons there was a motion that there should be a special conference with the Senate, and this was accepted by the Senate. The conference took place. Unfortunately, I did not have the time to continue my research to find out what the result of the conference was beyond the fact that it took place.

Other than that, as I have already said, I think it is a very good suggestion, and I can assure my honourable friend that I will see that it is pursued further and given every possible consideration.

Honourable senators, as I stated on several occasions in the house last week, we have no intention on this side of trying to rush this bill through, and I even suggested that I was entirely in the hands of the Senate. I would welcome the reference of this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and it is my intention to so move.

I shall also seek leave later to move that when the Senate adjourns today it should stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock, having in mind the possibility of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance sitting at 9.30 a.m. to consider the bill. This would enable us to have third reading at 11 o'clock. That would give the committee an hour and a half to consider the bill.

In any event, honourable senators, as I have already said, I am in the hands of the Senate, and if the house wants the committee to sit tonight, I have no objection.

At that time I hope we shall be able to get the explanation the Leader of the Opposition was seeking in regard to Vote L12a under the Winter Capital Projects Fund program. Personally, I think the explanation lies in the direction that this vote seeks authority for the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces, and these agreements are to cover a period of three years. However, I shall endeavour to have a minister of the Crown before the committee to elaborate further on this point.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: To clarify a point for the record, I searched through the estimates tabled the day before yesterday, and there are no provisions that I could find for the year 1973-74 or for the year 1974-75. Therefore, if my interpretation is correct, none of that money could be spent after March 31, 1973. The government could commit itself, but it would have to come back to the house for another appropriation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: As my honourable friend has pointed out, these agreements refer to the Municipal Development and Loan Act which was passed in 1963, although that act was not reproduced in the 1970 revision of the Statutes. But there is a reference there to the definition of the agencies of the provinces with which the government is going to have these agreements to carry out these different winter works programs. In this connection also I am hopeful that all the necessary explanations will be provided when this bill is referred to committee, and I will so move.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Côté: May I ask a question? I would like to ask Senator Langlois if the President of the Treasury Board said in the other place that if this bill was not passed today, if it did not receive royal assent today, some programs would be affected and some cheques would be delayed? Is this true or false?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I believe that the honourable senator was not here when at the beginning of my remarks, even before I moved second reading of this bill, I read from the House of Commons Hansard—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Of the 20th.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: —dated February 20, at page 1474 of the Debates of the other place, where the Honourable Mr. Drury said that if this bill was not passed today, that is on February 22, the cheques for the Manpower programs—Canada Manpower training courses—the Local Initiatives programs, the payments to contractors who have hired unemployed people to train them on the job, as well as cheques to 74,400 recipients of war veterans allowances would not be put in the mail today. The civilian war allowances cheques—covering a group of approximately 3,300 people—would also be delayed during the period of time required to pass the bill and give it royal assent today.

Hon. Mr. Côté: Honourable senators, I was here when Senator Langlois read this statement. For this reason, I wonder if we are really aware of what we are doing presently? How is it that the Acting Leader of the Government wants to send this bill to the committee which will sit tomorrow morning instead of pursuing consideration immediately in committee or instead of moving third reading so that we can pass this bill today? Otherwise, I do not know if we are really aware of what is going on. We are attempting to restore the prestige of the Senate. We want to create a better image of the Senate throughout the country but I wonder what Canadians will think upon learning that the Senate adjourned until a certain time tomorrow to resume study of the bill in committee and will sit for an hour and a half, during which hour and a half we will try to clarify any doubts remaining in the mind of some senators concerning this bill. Later, we will return to the Senate and adopt the bill, and then there will be the royal assent. I believe the problem is more serious than that, and that to deal with it properly—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I rise on a point of order. I have no objection to Senator Côté pursuing his remarks, but I suggest that since the debate is closed he can do so only by unanimous consent of the Senate. We can however return to this matter, if he has not quite understood my views and if he insists on doing so. I have no objection, but he is now completely out of order because the debate was closed by the speech of the acting government leader.

Hon. Mr. Côté: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. I heard the acting government leader move that the bill be referred to a committee—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not yet.

Hon. Mr. Côté: I understood, "I so move."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is what we are trying—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget): Second reading is not over yet and there has been no request to refer this bill to committee. In these circumstances, I was under the impression that the honourable senator was asking a question, but I admit he was going a bit further.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

Senator Côté in his remarks seemed to imply that I was proposing to refer this bill to a committee because I so wished. I suggested referring the bill to a committee because unanimous consent has been refused; thus we can go no further today. We cannot accept his suggestion to pass the bill on third reading today because the Leader of the Opposition has said that he would refuse leave, and as we need unanimous consent, we cannot proceed any further.

Hon. Mr. Côté: There is no motion before the house.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He stated before a motion could be moved that he would refuse leave.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget): The motion cannot be put because the bill has not been read the second time. So, is Senator Langlois moving that this bill be now read a second time?

• (1650)

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget): When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: For clarification purposes, with leave, now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Third time now? No.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I said, "For clarification purposes."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Let me indicate to the former Postmaster General what I said before, that if the bill received royal assent tonight the cheques would likely be mailed tomorrow morning. If the bill receives royal assent tomorrow noon, the cheques will then be posted tomorrow afternoon. I don't see much difference, given the department's reputation for speed and efficiency, that a few hours delay can make. They will not get them before Monday, in any event.

Hon. Mr. Haig: They won't get them for two weeks.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Côté: Honourable senators, I would just like to say about this matter that if we want to know exactly the reason why the bill was not passed today on third reading, it is because we did not approve second reading yesterday and if we did not pass the bill on second reading yesterday—

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Bourget): I am sorry to interrupt you, Senator Côté, but there is nothing before the Senate. We are now waiting for a motion to refer the bill to committee or, with leave, to have third reading now. We have to decide what to do.

On motion of Senator Langlois, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Mr. Molgat: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, arrangements have been made for the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to meet tomorrow morning at 9.30 in room 356-S. I urge all members of the committee to attend.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, February 23, 1973

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1973

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Chesley W. Carter, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-141, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1973, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), with leave now.

• (1100)

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Leave is granted.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on third reading. There are a few comments which I should like to offer for your consideration on the bill before us, largely some comments on comments that were made on my comments yesterday. I might say that they were very valuable comments and I am glad they were made.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Which ones?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: As Senator Langlois has asked which ones, I will start with his. Senator Langlois seemed to raise some doubt as to whether I was correct in saying that Parliament could have been called into session to deal with the matter which was dealt with under the second warrant respecting the unemployment insurance fund.

I was not giving just a personal opinion at that time. I had recalled a statement by Mr. Drury, the President of the Treasury Board, who was before us this morning, in which he said before the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates in the other place on January 16, and I quote:

> There was a possibility that Parliament might have been convened. I think the date set originally was December 5.

I merely put that on the record to indicate that I was not talking off the top of my head when I suggested that Parliament could have been called into session.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I never said that. I never suggested that you were talking off the top of your head. You are adding to my comments.

• (1110)

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That was the impression I got. I was dealing with my impression euphemistically rather than otherwise.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I assure you that you had a wrong impression.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you very much. The spirit in the house this morning is rather better than it was yesterday, and I thank Senator Langlois for his great contribution to that. I am always happy to see him start a sitting smiling, particularly when I rise to speak.

Senator John Connolly made some interesting observations about the role of the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance. It was appropriate that he should make those observations, because I believe it was when he was Leader of the Government in the Senate that the decision was made by the Senate to send all supplementaries and estimates to the committee before the legislation arising from those estimates or supplementaries was introduced in the house. I think the general opinion is that this has worked very well, and I compliment Senator Connolly on it. I recall that I was one of those who urged that very strongly. I think that the committee, first under Senator Leonard, presently under Senator Everett, and this morning under Senator Carter, has discharged its responsibility to the general satisfaction of the Senate.

It is a mistake to assume, however, as it appeared to me Senator Connolly was assuming, that this was all we expected of the Senate on appropriation bills. I hope I am not misinterpreting him, but I thought he placed rather too much emphasis on the fact that once the estimates and supplementaries had been before the committee and reported on, the whole responsibility of the Senate was discharged. That may not have been his intention, but that was the impression I received from his remarks.

I think the best proof that that is not so was our meeting this morning. The committee considered the bill, and in that hour and a half of very interesting discussion we were not discussing the items so much as the five clauses of the bill. Obviously the clauses, particularly clauses 2, 3 and 4, which were discussed at great length, were not before the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance when the main estimates or supplementaries were before it.

I would hope that we would take the next step past that initiative of Senator Connolly's, and, in due course, have in this chamber a fairly thorough discussion of supplementaries and estimates, perhaps on the report of the committee. I would suggest this might be done on appropriate occasions by having the Senate sit in committee of the whole. Many interesting discussions on items of particular interest to senators arise occasionally almost casually in the committee, and I am sure if we had the estimates or supplementaries before us in committee of the whole a very interesting discussion would be initiated.

I believe the discussion in committee this morning fully justified Senator Flynn's suggestion that the bill go to the committee, because the minister himself admitted to us that the principal question raised by Senator Flynn had not been considered by the department, as far as he knew, or by the law officers of the Crown. I think this was complete justification for the suggestion of Senator Flynn that this bill should go to a committee.

Senator Goldenberg made a plea that in future we should not take a stand in respect to the time schedule of passing a bill in those cases where the deadline involved individuals who might not be paid and cheques might not be sent out, and so on. I am sure we are all in general agreement that it is essential to avoid this kind of situation. It seems to me that to put it in those terms is really begging the question, because the question is not whether, when we are faced with this situation, we should co-operate and say that we cannot hold up unemployment insurance cheques, LIP cheques and veterans cheques. That is not the question. The question is, should we be faced with that kind of a schedule? Obviously, our only objection at this point is to the use of the rights of individuals to force us into this situation.

Senator Goldenberg suggested that we take a stand only when these kinds of things are not involved. But obviously if these kinds of things are not involved there is no question, because we are not up against the wall, we are not faced with a deadline. It is only so when there is a situation where we are told if—and three times in this session it has happened—if we do not pass this bill by a certain date, then individuals will suffer because of what some might regard as the intransigence of the Senate.

That, perhaps, leads me to Senator Argue's observation that the real cause of the problem was the filibustering by the Opposition in the other place. I did not rise on a point of order at that time, because I was too close to Senator Argue and could not have risen except in my own seat. I did feel then that he might have been transgressing a conventional rule we have here, that is, that we do not pass those kinds of aspersions on the conduct of their affairs by members of the other place.

I once read the reasons for that. One very good reason was given, that if one house does this to the other it will set up a cycle of retaliation. I would not be too afraid of that, because I think all the incentive to retaliation from the other place is there already, certainly in some quarters which he mentioned.

However, I think it is a fallacy, if I may say so, to use this argument over and over again, that if the Opposition in the other place did not take time, did not filibuster, as he said, then these bills would come through to us quickly and we would have adequate time to consider them.

I would suggest that the whole history of parliamentary control of the executive has been achieved by exactly this kind of thing. If you read the history of parliamentary control of the Crown, going back 300 years or more (and the not too successful control of the executive since) where there has been control it has been achieved in almost every case—in every case I can think of, historically, at the moment—by what some would call a filibuster, in other words by Parliament standing up and saying "No, no, no." The most recent famous case of that was the pipeline debate of 16 years ago. I can well remember that for days and days the press kept saying "The Opposition is obstructing, obstructing, obstructing." The obstruction, if that is what it was, achieved general agreement on a basic principle of parliamentary control at that time. I say that non-politically, because there have been occasions—occasions in this house within the last 10 years—when the stand taken by a non-government majority in the Senate achieved some useful purposes in the understanding of the authority of both Houses of Parliament in respect to legislation.

• (1120)

Just to comment on Senator Deschatelets' suggestion, I would say that it was certainly well meant and I feel we would all hope an attempt would be made to implement it. I am not myself optimistic as to its results, largely because, as was said by several senators in the corridors, one part of the representation in the other place seems to be committed to the principle that anything it can do to embarrass this chamber is all to the good from its point of view. However, I would hope an attempt would be made, although not necessarily under this section of the joint rules. But, and this has been urged before, I think the time has come when the management of the Senate, the leadership in the Senate, should take the initiative in bringing this problem, in a friendly way, to the attention of those who have the management of the schedule in the other place. For it is the schedule with which we are concerned. We have taken a position here—perhaps you could say half a position this time—in that we on this side have said that we can only be pushed so far. We hope the other place gets the message that the solution of this whole problem is very simple, namely, that those who have the management of affairs in the other place set their deadline having in mind the rules of the Senate. It is that simple. At least it is that simple in theory; it might be more difficult in practice. But with a little practice and a little staunchness on our part here, I believe that within a year we can solve this problem.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators—

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I do not mind if Senator Langlois wishes to speak, because as this is third reading it would not have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No, please go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In any event, I have very few words to say. First I want to indicate that it would be entirely wrong to be critical of the Senate because it has taken two days to pass this piece of legislation. For one thing, if we had followed our rules, second reading could not have taken place before today, and, moreover, if we had referred the bill to committee, it would have gone to committee next Monday, because in accordance with our rules we do not sit on Saturdays. As a result the bill could have received third reading only on Tuesday of next week. Therefore, it seems to me that the Senate has proceeded quickly and that the government side of the house will appreciate that the Opposition, despite the fact that sometimes it feels it is being pushed, has been nonetheless co-operative and has not reacted pettily to the shabby way in which it is sometimes treated. I believe we have acted in a responsible way and I would like to put that on the record. I would suggest that there should be agreement on all sides that that is correct.

I should like to say just a word about the committee, meeting this morning. As Senator Grosart mentioned, the meeting was both useful and interesting. Some good may well come out of it. I hope those of you who were not there this morning will eventually read the proceedings. You will find them interesting.

Yesterday I raised an objection that there might be a contradiction between clause 2 of the bill and the schedule in so far as the winter works program is concerned. That objection is going to be studied by the Department of Justice, and the chairman of the committee will receive an opinion from the department on that specific point. Of course, as was mentioned, it is not a reason, even if I am right, for delaying the passage of the bill. I say this because if there is, let us say, any irregularity in the bill, then it can be corrected by making provision for this program in the supplementary estimates—since the main estimates provide nothing for it for the time being—that will eventually come for the fiscal year 1973-74. I think this proves, honourable senators, that with the possibility of having to correct problems such as this, we must examine appropriation bills, especially since in many cases appropriation bills are not in fact appropriation bills but are to the extent of 50 per cent of their substance purely legislative. The present bill is a case in point.

With these few remarks, honourable senators, I hope that those of you who have been delayed here today will forgive those of us who considered that we had a responsibility to point out what we think are deficiencies in this bill. We felt justified in asking that it should be sent to committee even though it resulted in our having to sit today. If my understanding is correct, however, the leader is to propose an adjournment for a certain period of time that will more than compensate for the time you have spent here on a Friday.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall try to be brief in my remarks and I shall deal only with those comments of Senator Grosart which concern myself. I want to reiterate that I did not say yesterday, nor indeed have I the intention of saying at any time, that he was speaking off the top of his head. Far be it from me to be in any way discourteous to my honourable friend.

All I said yesterday was that his suggestion that Parliament could have been recalled in time to deal with the second series of special warrants through an appropriation bill instead of proceeding, as was done, by special warrants, was unrealistic. I based my statement on what the Honourable Mr. Drury said before our committee on National Finance on February 20. I know he had made a previous statement before the committee of the other place, and there was apparently no connection between the two statements. But he said that early in December the government had tried to assess the situation and had come to the conclusion that it would be presumptuous on their part to expect a new Parliament to deal with an appropriation bill in a period shorter than 30 days, because time had to be allowed to the new Parliament to deal with the Speech from the Throne, to arrange for the organization of its standing committees and time also had to be allowed for this new Parliament to deal through the house and through its committees with this appropriation bill. I added that this assessment by Mr. Drury was borne out by the facts.

This Parliament has been in session since January 4. Today is February 23 and the appropriation bill has not yet been passed. So, the period of 30 days which the minister had assessed as being necessary to deal with an appropriation bill by a new Parliament was, in fact, a conservative one, because more than 30 days have now elapsed since the new Parliament was called into session, and the appropriation bill is still being considered by this house. The only point I made yesterday was that this point of view is amply justified by the evidence as we know it today.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I put this question to the Acting Leader of the Government? If, instead of dealing with supplementary estimates Parliament had been recalled in December and a bill had been presented right away to remove the ceiling of $800 million on advances by the minister to the Unemployment Insurance Commission fund, isn't it so that you would not have needed any estimates, or any warrant for the period after December 14?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My honourable friend is forgetting a very important factor—the very composition of the other place as it is now. As my honourable friend and the public know, no party has control of that house and it is pretty hard to forecast the amount of time that house would take in dealing with an appropriation bill or any other piece of legislation.

Coming back to the suggestion made by my honourable friend Senator Grosart, it has been established that the earliest date Parliament could have been recalled would have been December 5. Taking into account the holiday season during which Parliament would have had to recess, and considering the fact that the estimating done by the Unemployment Insurance Commission on the second series of special warrants, and the fact that the authority to draw on the consolidated revenue fund would have been exhausted by the end of December—in fact, it was exhausted a few days later, on January 3 or 4—even with that period of 30 days there was not enough time for the government in a new session of Parliament to pass this bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We passed that bill in time. That is my point. When Parliament was told that the amount involved in the second warrant would be exhausted and that therefore the bill removing the ceiling had to be passed by a certain date, it was passed. The problem would have been the same if the bill had been introduced at the beginning of December, and if it had been said that the fund was going to be exhausted in a few days, Parliament would have passed the bill then as it did later on.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My honourable friend is referring to the bill amending the ceiling, not of the fund but of the drawing authority of the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is true this bill was passed, but not before February 8. We had money to carry on to February 8 because of the special warrants. So this does not answer the point made by Senator Grosart.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am answering your point.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The money would have been exhausted by January 4.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, but you had money at the beginning of December to carry you until the end of December. What I am suggesting to you is that if the bill were to have been introduced at the beginning of December it could have been passed by Christmas. That is quite obvious.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My honourable friend is comparing two different situations. The situation in December would have been different, because the Christmas holidays were coming into play. This situation was not repeated in January. I repeat that it would have been very unwise for the government, and presumptuous on its part, to say that this legislation would be passed in time to provide payments, not on February 8 but on January 4, as the authority was exhausted. As I said at that time, the assessment was that this authority would be exhausted at the end of December. In fact, it lasted until January 4. However, I do not think governments have the right to take chances with situations over which they have no control. Again my honourable friend is forgetting the composition of the present House of Commons, where no one is in control.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It did not change between December and January 5.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, it would not be in order to continue the debate but perhaps I may be permitted to ask the Acting Leader of the Government—I called him the Leader of the Government yesterday and I see Hansard changed it to Acting Leader, but my understanding is that under our rules when he is sitting here in this capacity he is the Leader of the Government. The question I would ask him is if he recalls a recent occasion when the government was not very much concerned about the Christmas holidays, and at the same time thank him—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: And we also adjourned for Christmas.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: For the day.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On Christmas Eve. I thank him for putting it so well on the record that the government, on this one occasion at least, was concerned about being presumptuous in its attitude toward Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My honourable friend again is switching to another situation. We are pressed for time and you will appreciate that I am in the position that we expect the Deputy of His Excellency to arrive shortly.

I think I have covered quite well the points made by both my honourable friends and I do not believe I would be able to satisfy them even if I spoke for another hour. I do not intend to reply to the comments respecting the remarks of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) and Senator Goldenberg, but will leave it to them to cover these points.

[Hon. Mr. Langlois.]

I return now to the suggestion that the Senate should give leadership in endeavouring to arrange a schedule for the legislation to be dealt with by the two houses. Yesterday a suggestion was made by my honourable friend Senator Deschatelets with regard to which I said I was very much interested and that it would be pursued. In my opinion it is a direction in which the Senate should take leadership. I can assure my honourable friend that although my power is very limited, as he pointed out, I being merely an assistant to the government leader, I will use what little power I have to attempt to see that this idea is pursued.

Now I come to a few words in relation to the remarks of my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition. I agree with him that the Senate cannot be criticized for having taken the number of days it did to consider this legislation. We have demonstrated this morning the real role of the Senate, and I am very pleased that we had an interesting discussion in committee. I wish to remind my friend that last week I repeatedly said in this house that I was not asking for leave. I never attempted to push the Opposition. As soon as the Opposition indicated that they did not intend to grant leave, I yielded immediately to their undeniable right and privilege to take that position. I do not think anyone can say that we on this side have pushed anyone in any direction whatsoever.

In connection with the debate that took place this morning, the Leader of the Opposition was right in suggesting that it would be very useful to obtain a legal opinion from the Department of Justice with respect to the wording or drafting of the legislation. We are expecting this opinion. It was agreed in committee this morning, however—and this should be said at this stage—that it is only a question of wording. There is apparently a contradiction between the preamble and the schedule to the bill. I even suggested this morning that this degree of apparent contradiction could probably be explained by the words "unless otherwise provided" in the preamble. This phrase probably covers any possible discrepancy between the preamble and the schedule. But even if the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition is accepted as being right—and I do not say it is not—this matter could be corrected by a simple supplementary item in the next budgetary provisions after March 31. If the funds are not available to the government to pursue the winter works program, the situation can be easily remedied by putting through a supplementary estimate. That would correct the situation.

• (1140)

Hon. Mr. Lamontagne: Or by Governor General's warrant.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Not when the house is in session.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that she had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

23 February 1973

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 23rd of February, 1973, at 12.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,

Your obedient servant,

André Garneau
Brigadier General

Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO SIT DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 13, 1973, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before this motion is voted upon, I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that four committees of the Senate have been authorized to meet when the Senate is not sitting. They are the committees on Foreign Affairs, Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Science Policy, and Agriculture.

I am informed that these committees are planning sittings during the adjournment. As a matter of fact, I have been informed that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has arranged for almost continuous sittings during the week of March 6. This adjournment will provide the chairmen of these committees a free hand in arranging any sittings they may wish to have during the adjournment. It means, therefore, that the Senate will not be idle during the adjournment. It is anticipated that honourable senators will be very busy.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he has any information regarding sittings of any other committees. I know that some sittings have been arranged tentatively.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: My only definite information is that the schedule has been arranged for the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I know that the chairmen of the other committees are planning sittings, but I do not think their schedules have been finally arranged.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized by the Senate on the 14th February, 1973, to examine and report upon Canadian relations with the expanded European communities, be empowered to adjourn from place to place for the purposes of the said examination.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: I move, seconded by Senator Molgat, that the sitting of the Senate be suspended during pleasure and that the Senate reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 12.40 this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I will not object to the motion, because I understand there is a reason. We are awaiting the arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General; otherwise, as my honourable friend knows, I do not like that kind of motion.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is very hard to please the Leader of the Opposition at all times.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 12.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker:

The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

> May it please Your Honour:
>
> The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.
> In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:
> An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1973.
> To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. John M. Macdonald moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

> That the name of the Honourable Senator Asselin be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator O'Leary on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 13, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 13, 1973

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) has been substituted for that of Mr. Bell on the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Library of Parliament.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-31 (LACHINE)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-31, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill read first time.

Honourable Senator Molgat, for Honourable Senator Forsey, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-156 (WATERLOO)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-156, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March 1973.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

NEED FOR REFORM—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the urgent public need in Canada for Senate reform now.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of the resolution and my speaking tonight is to present a 12-point plan for Senate reform in the seventies. In the form that I give it to you tonight it will be distilled wisdom. I think the Senate has a problem.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Just one?

Hon. Mr. Croll: And if you don't think it has a problem, then we have a problem indeed. This is a serious attempt on my part and I hope it will have the result of interesting members of the Senate in the subject of the reform of the Senate. My purpose tonight, therefore, is to make a record so that it may be read, so that it may be examined and so that other views may be placed before the Senate. In doing so I may take a little longer time than usual. I shall appreciate your indulgence.

You may ask, as you have the right to ask, what gives me the idea that I have the qualifications to dispense advice as well as wisdom. I began my political life as Mayor of Windsor in 1930, during the height of the depression when the city was very hard hit. There was no time for training, and whatever training was done was training on the job. I spent nearly ten years there and later became a member of the provincial Legislature where I held three portfolios, Welfare, Municipal Affairs, and Labour. In fact for some years I was at the same time both Mayor of Windsor and member of the provincial legislature and they overlapped because in those days there was no law against this.

In 1945 I came to the House of Commons where I spent 10 years and then in 1955 I came to the Senate and as of now I have spent 18 years here. If you add it all up you will realize that I have been in politics now for more than 40 years, longer than anyone else in the Senate and indeed longer than anyone in the House of Commons. I am a graduate of the Canadian school of practical politics. I have been doing post-graduate work here in the Senate for the last 18 years. But this is the end of the road. I have recently entered my seventy-third year and I have lifetime tenure in the Senate. You may say to me, "You don't look too old; you are very active." Well, that may be. One of the inheritances from my parents, both of whom lived to a great age, was the physical gift of growing older without growing old, for which I am very thankful.

Honourable senators, in saying what I am about to say, let me make it clear that I am not preaching for a call; there is nothing I want from the Senate. I realize fully that I am in my twilight years and my future was yesterday. What is more, if my lifetime tenure should stand in the way of the reform of the Senate, then I am prepared to forego it if others will do likewise. The Senate is important to me because it provides me with something to do and a place to serve. If I did not have my duties as a senator, then I would have my law office to keep me busy. I also have some interests in the business world. But, honourable senators, I prefer to stay in the Senate and for that reason my lifetime tenure is important. But, as I have said, I am prepared to give it up if others will do so.

I have been fortunate. I am doing here today and have been doing during my 40 years in politics the things that I like to do and what I consider I am qualified to do. That sort of opportunity is given few men. I want the Senate to be a better and more acceptable place after I leave, not because I have left it but because I was part of it.

Perhaps I could spend a few minutes to tell you about my time in the House of Commons. I had good political training in the house. I was chairman of some very important committees, such as Defence Expenditures, the Bank Act, "horses on the payroll" which some of you may remember, Labour, Veterans, and many others. When there was a special committee at the drop of a hat I would chair it, and I was generally able to come out alive. Frankly, the Senate was not my cup of tea; in modern language, it was not my bag. I had been used to the cut and thrust of politics. I liked the House of Commons. It suited my temperament, and I felt at home there.

However, I did come here and you might well ask, "Why did you?" I think you are entitled to an answer. If you understand my background as a member of an immigrant minority you will understand that there are pressures unseen, but very real and very worthy. There is an overriding sense of obligation to open doors which have traditionally been closed, and to provide opportunities for new Canadians to fully join the Canadian family. The most effective way is to get elected to Parliament. That is acceptance. It sets the tone because it is Parliament. I need not tell you that to us minorities there were bolted doors that had to be unbolted and unlocked. People of my tradition suffered the most for doors were slammed in their faces. After 80 years the anglophones and francophones, who had had this Senate all to themselves, finally let us come in out of the cold to join the Senate, and to show that we can take our place alongside our fellow Canadians who were the founding fathers.

Senator Wall, a professor from Winnipeg, came into the Senate when I did. He died very prematurely. Hnatyshyn begot Yuzyk; Gladstone begot Williams; and Wall was not replaced. The three members of my tradition have been improvements on the original. I did not think this would ever be necessary in this country, but the francophones feel the necessity to prove their undoubted capacity; so at the Canadian Radio-Television Commission we have Juneau, and at the CBC we have Picard. They are proving to the Canadian people that which should be unnecessary to prove.

We have long overlooked Canadians of immigrant background who have, by service and responsibility, earned beyond question the right to be represented in this great chamber of Parliament. Since 1917 there have been minorities represented in the House of Commons. It is unfortunate that today we neglect Canadians of Italian background, German background, and Polish background, to name only a few, who are here in large numbers and who are good Canadians. This should be remedied as quickly as possible and I will indicate today how it could possibly be done.

I came to the Senate in 1955. I must tell you I was bored and frustrated. It was an intolerable situation. There were great men in here, fine men. No one would dare use any but the finest words in speaking of them, and they did not neglect their responsibilities or their duties. We met, we prayed, and we adjourned. They were old and they were coasting. There was a small group, an oligarchy, which conducted the business. We were young, we were fresh, and we were anxious. We came to serve and we remained to sit, and history is repeating itself now. Many here sit who came to serve; there has not been much change in that respect. Senator W. Ross Macdonald was the leader when I came here. He was never a captive of Cabinet, neither was Senator Connolly. They were both very flexible. They were both members of the Cabinet, but the Senate was number one for them. They were primarily interested in the Senate, which is not the case today.

After a while Senator Macdonald sensed that there was a revolt among the youngsters or, at least, the new men. The Senate at that time was in the public eye mistrusted, misunderstood, in many circles disliked and written off; in any event at a very low ebb. The administration, as I have indicated, was in the hands of a competent, capable, but chosen few. There was no response to change. All important posts were allotted, all interesting assignments were designated, and all junkets spoken for. They were very well organized to do nothing more than rubber stamp that which the Commons sent over, although I must say that they did it with a great flourish and some very fine speeches.

We sat for very little time in the winter. We adjourned long enough so that everyone who could afford it could go south. We did not sit in the summer, and in the fall absenteeism was heavy. As I say, they did whatever they did with a flourish, which was still better than our travelogues and repetitious speeches which we give from time to time in order to appear to be doing something. The Senate was at a low ebb. The public did not care. They were not mad. They just ignored the Senate for all purposes; they wrote it off.

So, out of desperation and to avoid unpleasantness, but with the grace of leadership, both Senator Macdonald and Senator Connolly agreed to, encouraged, and assisted the initiation of inquiries which formerly had been carried out by commissions and royal commissions, the reports of many of which had been neglected. They permitted a member to make a choice and show initiative, subject to the consent of the Senate.

Senator Martin pursued this initiative and in some ways enlarged on it. But there appeared here in the Senate for the first time upstarts who did not always agree with government action and policy, and had hard questions for the establishment. This was the beginning of a new course for the Senate. It was a new direction, a new concept, and the Senate started reaching out to new horizons.

It began slowly in 1958 with Land Use, and went into high gear in 1960 with Manpower and Employment. We were beginning to deal with problems that touched people—bread and butter problems. I propose to relate some of them to you, because we studied them well, as we do now and continue to do. We do this work much better than a royal commission. Later on I will tell honourable senators about the expertise which we have in this house, but which we have not used. We not only have the expertise, but it costs less, and we have the impact of continuity in that we are here to see that something is done about the various things that are recommended from time to time. In the past 15 years I think we have made spectacular progress in the Senate. We had such a long way to come, and we have had problems.

We changed the face of the Senate for the better, and our own generation—by then we too were getting older—responded and gave us a degree of confidence. We were dealing with subject matters to which they responded, because their grievances had long been neglected. Aging is the best example.

We lost some perspective in this place. A politician should have periscopic vision if he hopes to stay in business. We did not have that. There was a new generation growing up with somewhat different ideas. There were persons who demonstrated their love for free speech by denying it to others. There were persons devoted to peace who were using violence. There were those who had a thirst for education, and they expressed it by wrecking classrooms and destroying buildings and equipment. We had not quite made it with them.

But we did change the face of the Senate. Time gave us some help. Some of the older men went to their just reward, and our appointments became younger, abler, better qualified. They came to serve. They stayed to sit, and many of them ended up by moonlighting to the Senate rather than from the Senate. These people came to participate, to display and use their capacities, and in time they became part of the fixtures and lost interest.

Honourable senators will see why I did not raise this before, and I do so now by turning to the Debates of the Senate of February 6, 1969, at page 982 where there is the following:

> HON. JOHN J. CONNOLLY: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege, and I am sorry that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) is not in his place when I do so.

It has come to my attention that among the documents tabled this afternoon, which he did not mention specifically in the tabling, is a document called "The Constitution and the People of Canada." This document is a white paper prepared, and presumably circulated, by the government in connection with the federal-provincial conference which is to start on Monday next. Some half hour ago I tried to get a copy of this document and I was informed by the distribution office that they were no longer available. Somehow or other a copy has now appeared on my desk.

Certainly I express my own feeling of outrage that a document like this, which vitally concerns the constitution of this house, should be brought to us here on the eve of an adjournment which will last until Tuesday night, when the constitutional conference will virtually be finished.

And there is an interruption at that point. Then Senator Connolly continues:

I think that in common decency and courtesy to the Senate, at least the attention of senators should have been drawn to this document when it was tabled. There was no opportunity for any of us to see it, and there will be no opportunity for any of us to discuss it until Tuesday night. By that time, of course, any provisions affecting the Senate will probably have been dealt with, if they are reached at that meeting. I simply object to the method of tabling these documents without our knowing what is in them, without our knowing at least what the title of the document is.

I think that if the privileges of the Senate have not been violated, certainly the courtesies of the Senate, courtesies that are due to all honourable senators, have been outraged.

SOME HON. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

HON. JACQUES FLYNN: Honourable senators, I share the sentiments—

HON. MR. CONNOLLY (OTTAWA WEST): Indignation.

HON. MR. FLYNN: —the indignation of Senator Connolly concerning the tabling of this document. To show how much it affects the members of the Senate, I think I should quote for the record from page 30.

I do not know to what that reference refers—the document, perhaps. Then the discussion continues:

HON. MR. ROEBUCK: I have not received a copy of it yet.

HON. MR. CONNOLLY (OTTAWA WEST): Nobody has.

HON. MR. FLYNN: That is the reason why I think I should quote from it. It is an excerpt from the chapter entitled "The Senate". It deals generally with the role of the Senate, and then says:

The Government of Canada would therefore propose a new approach to the organization of the Senate to achieve this end.

I think nobody would quarrel with the end that is outlined, but here is the substance of what I want to put on the record:

The Senate could be partly selected by the federal government and partly selected by provincial governments. The method of selection of senators by the provinces could be by nomination of the provincial governments, acting with or without the approval of their legislatures, depending on the provisions of each provincial constitution. The term of office for senators could be limited to a specific number of years—perhaps six.

Equitable transitional arrangements would of course be required in respect of those holding Senate appointments at the time these changes come into effect. These arrangements would have to be considered with care, ensuring that no injustice is done while at the same time permitting those changes required in the interests of the Canada of the future.

I merely want to say that these words that I have just quoted do not suggest the abolition of the Senate, but they certainly suggest the dismissal of the present membership.

HON. MR. FOURNIER (MADAWASKA-RESTIGOUCHE): Do I understand that copies are not available?

HON. MR. CONNOLLY (OTTAWA WEST): That I cannot answer. Half an hour ago I tried to get copies and was told there would be no more available until tomorrow. Now, miraculously, a copy has appeared on my desk. I should add that I do not say what I do to provoke a debate on the substance of the document. That is impossible at a time like this; nobody is prepared for it. But I do object strenuously to the method in which the document was produced, so that we had to go through the back door to find out where and what it was.

Just to enlarge a little on what he said, the Senate's views on reform were placed before that body and yet not a single member of this chamber knew, contributed or had any input in it whatsoever, except the Leader of the Senate and some civil servants. It became necessary, as I will later indicate, that we should be heard. Other people cannot solve our problems; we have to do it. Immediately after that, the Prime Minister said in a public statement that he would see to it that we were heard; that was on the next day, on February 7, when we were assured that the Senate views were wanted.

Sometimes those people who call attention to problems and insist that they be dealt with end up by being considered the problem. I think I am doing what needs to be done and what has been delayed for too long. I will later indicate why I do it now. If we do not do something quickly, I believe it will only be a matter of time before something is done, because we are still looked upon as a place of privilege, remote from the problems of ordinary people, and by the House of Commons as an appendage.

We need to clearly, outspokenly, critically and courageously assess ourselves from time to time and take remedial action. That is what the electors do when an election is held, and sometimes those who present themselves for election are a little surprised. But to the mind of man, non-elective is non-representative, and many of the public look upon us as not gone but forgotten. Let us see if we deserve that by any standard.

What are we doing? How are we doing it? What should we be doing? I said we should change our course. Keep this in mind. We pass judgment on legislation which is the work of others. That takes judgment and knowledge. With a special committee, however, others pass judgment on our work. That is a much more demanding undertaking. Yet the reports of the Senate over a period of years have stood up extremely well. They have been useful in research, imaginative in ideas, resulting in legislative action, sometimes beyond our hopes, and keeping the interest and participation of many senators.

What have we been doing? We have been carrying out our normal responsibilities, examining bills and doing what has had to be done for years. One of the best reports on what the Senate has been doing through its committees was made by Senator Hastings in a speech on Wednesday, April 30, 1969. It was a well-documented report, and what I am doing today is bringing you up to date on it, because it fits into the ideas I have in finally presenting the program.

We began between 1957 and 1963 with the Special Committee of the Senate on Land Use in Canada. The purpose of that committee was to ensure that our land resources were more effectively utilized for the benefit of the Canadian economy and the Canadian people. It did not make much of an impact in 1960, but whoever suggested it at the time had his head on his shoulders. He could see further than most of us. We had as the chairman of that committee a very wise and fine gentleman, the former Senator Arthur M. Pearson. He was a co-operative man who loved land, who loved people. He had a deep understanding of the problem. He was absolutely reliable. I got to know him well, and when he served on the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty he showed great concern and was a tower of strength. Today we appreciate more than ever the work that was done 10 years ago, for land and land use is a topic on every agenda today.

That committee brought about serious discussion of regional development. The research material that was accumulated over the years made regional development understandable, when before that they were two remote words without special significance. From that came ARDA (Agricultural and Rural Development Agency), FRED (Fund for Regional Economic Development), and ADA (Area Development Agency). Now these same studies are being used in attempting to solve the problems of urban development. I remember the former Senator Pearson saying something to me that I had never heard before. He was a man who knew land well and had dealt with it, and he once said to me, "Buy land. They've stopped making it."

In 1960 came the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Manpower and Employment. We spent two full years on that, and from it came, as the minister has said on occasions, the Department of Manpower. We were well staffed. Dr. Deutsch, the Principal of Queen's, was our director; Sylvia Ostry was one of our research people. We built a great team. We did a great deal of research. I must say we did not have too many solutions. Some of the problems of employment and manpower are still unsolved. However, we did open doors of understanding and let some light onto the problem. One of the benefits I got out of it were speeches on curling from Senator Haig's father.

After that came the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, from 1963 to 1967. That was a great plus for the Senate. The report was imaginative; it was a blessing for the aged. It is interesting to see what we said in 1966. Nobody else ever reads these reports, and now and then I feel better if I look at them. I should like to quote from that report, although I notice here some people who were on the committee and who know what was in it. Recommendation (1) was:

> The committee endorses in principle the institution of an income guarantee program for all persons aged 65 and over—

It was then 70 years. Then it goes on:

• (2050)

> The establishment of a technically competent body to study the income needs of older people and to develop a socially acceptable minimum budget for single persons and couples, which would be adjusted automatically each year on the basis of a suitable index of consumer spending or of earnings, with a review every five years to reflect changes in the relative circumstances of the working population and the retired population.

And further:

> . . . that the program be administered and financed by the federal government,
> . . . that the procedure call for the completion of a simplified income form annually and that the amount by which the declared income falls short of the established minima in any year constitute the benefit for the year following,
> . . . that income, capital and deductions be defined and treated as for income tax purposes so far as possible, except that all public transfer payments other than temporary needs-tested supplements would be included.

A body that can put that on the record ought to feel that it is serving the Canadian people well.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Even if it voted against the principle some years later.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I did not hear you. That was the bones of the recommendation. We broke new ground. But Allan MacEachen, who knew poverty from his infancy as none of us here knew it, put meat on the bones and he brought in the recommendations which produced the supplement. Today, a man and wife aged 65 and over receive $3,895 if there is no other income. This is very acceptable in the rural areas, in the small towns, in the cities. What is more, it has stopped the movement of older people to the cities, and many of the older people, by returning to their homes in small towns, can get along pretty well.

The amount of $3,895 is truly a good beginning. It is not as high as the Senate poverty line. Our poverty line in 1969 for two people was $3,570, in 1971 it was $4,040, and in 1972 it was $4,270—which is about $375 more than what the government pays.

For single persons the government line at the present time is $2,040; ours was $2,580. That was one of our contributions, a really valuable one. From that, if they continue keeping the poverty line up to date, much good will come.

We achieved something else here—truth in lending. It took us a couple of years. All we wanted was that borrowers be told the interest rate and how much it represented in dollars and cents. That was real people's law and it emanated from here. It is hard to believe how vigorously it was opposed in the Senate.

We had a very active part in the consumer credit and cost of living examination of another day, and from that came the Department of Consumer Affairs, which is a department unlike any department in Great Britain or the United States. It is a separate department. We did not solve too many problems. We slowed up the cost of living. As soon as we turned our back, it started up again.

We have the Committee on Science Policy, 1967 to 1972; in fact, it is still going strong. It was a forward-looking undertaking, well conducted. It created a new interest. It provided a considerable amount of research and it was hailed by many people who understood it. I did not, and it is not my cup of tea.

The Committee on Mass Media in 1968 to 1972 was a real winner for this Senate and for the country. It brought to the Senate a new audience, the young. Here was an enlightened approach, well presented, introducing Canadians to media as they have never before been introduced. It turned out to be a great facility for students. It is read much and it is discussed at the university level. It was well written, easy to read, and the research on it was extremely good. I think it is one of the Senate's better achievements.

Honourable senators, we now come to the Special Committee on Poverty, 1968-72. The participants are in this house. Some senators may think that I am particularly prejudiced, and I may be. Why not? I tell you frankly that it is a bench mark in Canadian social history. It brought issues out into the open which cannot be ignored, and the report is not being ignored. We lit a fire that will not be extinguished. Our report was needed, it was provided, and it was enthusiastically received.

Last week three reports were brought before the Canadian people. The National Council of Welfare made a report. All of you have read at least some parts of it. They recommended the guaranteed income. The Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada, appearing before the Committee on Trends of Food Prices, said "We recommend the guaranteed income. We realize it will cost some money, and we will pay it." The Canadian Railway Labour Association did the same thing. Now, that is three reports in one week, but that has been happening right along.

The basic income is a very important part of the Canada of tomorrow. The guaranteed income was a small first step in the right direction for a great social and humanitarian cause. I can tell you, with some pride, on behalf of the committee, that the report is in its third printing and that it will continue to be printed. People are around scrounging copies, because copies have not been printed and distributed quickly enough; and if Information Canada were not a warehouse without a catalogue we would have sold twice as many. It is one of the government reports that is sold, and it is a best seller.

Honourable senators, let me see if I can picturesquely dramatize for a moment what this report does. Some honourable senators are old enough to appreciate what it did. We came into this century under the British poor laws, which continued almost up to the 1930s; they dealt with destitution and starvation. I am not going into that now, but I will do so on a later occasion.

Came the depression and we started the welfare state, which dealt with dependency, food, clothing and shelter on a means test basis. That went on for 30 years. Now we have this report and its acceptance, and what has been produced here is a breath of fresh air and fresh ideas, for it lays the foundation for a just society because it gives people, as of right, what they require and it is no longer a matter of being worthy or unworthy. The only necessity is to meet the disciplines of society. That is what this report does in laying that foundation.

But remember, honourable senators, social problems are not resolved swiftly, even though there is acceptance of their solution in principle—and there was an acceptance of the principle of this report in the Speech from the Throne. Moreover, you should read Mr. Lalonde's speech in the house. I caught a bit of it the other day. It amuses me when I think that I was standing around here talking about the welfare system being in a mess and everybody was saying, "Oh, there is Croll talking again, exaggerating." Well, Mr. Lalonde, the minister himself, said it was a disgrace, and he gave examples of what he considered a disgrace, and said it had to be corrected and corrected quickly.

I am not suggesting that the just society is around the corner, but I do suggest that its foundation is; namely, the fact that the old folks are receiving the kind of money they are receiving, and that there are 300,000 children and 150,000 widows who have to be looked after. There are the crippled and maimed and others who must now immediately receive the same as the old folks receive. They are all out of the labour force.

For your information—and I think I have been very fortunate not to have given you erroneous information at any time—the working poor, who have not officially been covered at all, are also being helped. These are the people who work their heads off morning, noon and night for low wages and salaries when they could do just as well on welfare. But they don't take welfare. There are not just a few of them, either. There are three quarters of a million of them in Canada, and when you start talking about welfare bums keep that in mind. They are being provided for in one way or another; they are being helped out in order to keep them off welfare, and, of course, we all agree that that should be done.

One thing that gave me some satisfaction was seeing some of our work being utilized by the Commons, even though they did not give us credit for it. How do you fix a poverty line? Well, poverty lines are not easy to fix. Take my word for it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Just before you go on, may I point out that you did not tell us how you were amused by Mr. Lalonde's assertions or statements.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Amused?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, you said you were amused.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, I agreed with him.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You agreed? I see. I was amused, but you agreed. I thought you said you were amused.

Hon. Mr. Croll: In talking about a poverty line, and the fact that it is not easy to arrive at one, may I say that there have been all sorts of studies made in that direction. It is very hard to reach one that is acceptable. You can arrive at a poverty line on the basis of budget. You can arrive at one on the basis of a great number of things, including budgeting, but how do you get one that stands up to the test of time? Well, we came up with an idea which we discussed a dozen times in committee. We found one statistic in Ottawa, a statistic that is always available in the department, namely, the statistic of the average wage across Canada. So we took the average wage and cut it in half. After all, who would refuse to see the poor man getting at least half of what he should get? We then added to that the increase in the consumer price index—inflation—and then we added to that the increase in the gross national product. Thus we came up with a figure, and that was in November, 1971.

This time, Senator Choquette, I was amused.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Oh, yes?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I was amused because of what I read in Hansard. As well as following the proceedings of the Veterans Affairs Committee in the other place I was reading the debate on the old age pension in the house. In both Hansard of the House of Commons and the report of the Veterans Affairs Committee, I came across the assertion that they had changed the principle of the pensions, which is the same as the poverty line, for future adjustments. They said that they were going to take the average gross of five unskilled labourers, take away the income tax, and then adjust it accordingly.

Well, the amusing part is that that is exactly what we did 18 months ago. Eighteen months ago! And it has stood up! I do not want to claim any royalties from them, but at least we should have been given credit as the authors. That was the least they could have done, instead of claiming it as their own. And they will continue to claim it unless somebody stands up and tells them that it is not theirs.

In addition, let me point out that there have been joint committees of both houses dealing with Indian affairs in 1960, Indian claims in 1965, divorce in 1966, the Canada Pension Plan in 1965, penitentiaries in 1967, hate literature in 1967, immigration in 1966, the Public Service in 1966, national and royal anthems in 1968, the National Capital Commission in 1968, and the Constitution of Canada in 1971-72.

We had always been partners in these joint committees, but when we came to the trends in food prices the House of Commons refused to join with the Senate, which was their right, saying that it would upset the balance, in that it would not reflect the membership of the house but would give the government a majority.

Quite right. I may say that a majority is useful if you are considering a bill, but a majority in a committee cannot get you anything when you are seeking a solution to a problem—unless you come up with the answer. In committee a majority is not much good, because the genius of a committee is unanimity. No matter what they agree on, if they agree, you can rest assured it will make some sense, and then at least there will be something for the government to get its teeth into instead of having to put it aside.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But the agreement comes from a majority.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, not in a committee. There are minorities, as you will see. You will see minority reports in the committee, without question. Don't you think so? I do.

I have indicated to you our accomplishments and I think they have been considerable.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You have forgotten fiscal reform.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not an expert on that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Well, at least it should be mentioned, because if the Senate ever accomplished a difficult task, that was one.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, you are quite right. I am sure you will enlarge on it.

Despite the fact that we had co-operated, and had done our own homework and performed our own task, nevertheless, when the House of Commons turned down the opportunity to have the Senate join with it, not a sound was heard in the country. Thunders of silence descended upon the Senate. There was not a word in the press about it. There was not a word from any knowledgeable commentator, nor was there any editorial comment. There was absolutely nothing; nobody gave a damn.

We deserved better. To be criticized is normal and to be expected, to be praised is abnormal and unexpected, but to be ignored is frustrating and disappointing.

We have to do something about that, honourable senators, because there is a meaning to be found there. If we do not realize that we have a problem now, then when we do realize it it will be too late.

Immediately afterwards a bill was introduced in the House of Commons to abolish the Senate. It is a perennial there, and really does not make much difference. I have read the debate on that bill and I must say that the arguments were not new. It was obvious that the proposer of the bill knew what we were doing in the Senate. I know that he knew. He spoke with tongue in cheek, but since it was there he had to speak to it. But the report in the press was a discouraging one. The Canadian Press, as quoted in the Ottawa Journal of January 27, indicated that while the motion was talked out "it received moderately favourable attention by some Liberals and Conservatives."

But there were some who spoke up on our behalf in the House of Commons. They spoke in favour of reform, and tried to be helpful to us. I should like at this stage to read to you some of the words that were spoken simply to see how much comfort you can get out of them. I quote from the House of Commons Debates of January 26, 1973.

> Rightly or wrongly, Mr. Speaker, the Senate of Canada seems to have the worst reputation of any legislative body in the world.
> In 1942, Senator Grattan O'Leary, then a reporter, wrote and I quote:
> > A Senate appointment is not employment and the Senate is not a place where they are supposed to work.
> And he was appointed senator in 1962!
> When Jean-Luc Pepin was an hon. member as well as a cabinet minister, he called the Senate a political house of refuge, a house for the dead, the most exclusive pensioner's club in the world and a tourist attraction. In short, he saw it as being the only flaw in the British North America Act of 1867.

That from friends!

Hon. Mr. Choquette: He was defeated and he would be glad to be appointed here.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: You have forgotten what Joe Greene said. He called us a nice bunch of old men.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What I am trying to say now is that it is time we took stock of ourselves and assessed our work. Are we doing enough? What else should we be doing? What do we have to do that would better involve our members and reach out to the people? What is more important, honourable senators, we have to do things in our own way to get the government off our necks. We have a credibility gap to close in the Senate.

I have 12 recommendations, some of which may appeal to you and some of which may not. But I remind you that 106 years have gone by, and times are changing. We need new, young, fresh people and for so long as we remain under the influence of the aura of power of the Cabinet and the government, we are not as independent as we should be. Let me say that the first two recommendations are not very original. I commend to honourable senators the following 12-point plan for Senate reform in the seventies.

> 1. The present absolute veto power of the Senate over all legislation should be reduced to a suspensive veto for six months according to the following formula:
> A bill may become law without the consent of the Senate,
> (1) if the House of Commons, having once passed it passes it again no less than six months after it was rejected or formally amended by the Senate, or
> (2) if, within six months of third reading of a bill by the House of Commons, the Senate has not completed consideration of it, and the House of Commons again passes it at any time after the expiration of the six months. (Any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing the six months.)

This, of course, is a recommendation made by the Committee on the Constitution, and I agree with it entirely. I very strongly support the idea that the veto must go, and the suspensive veto is all that should be left. To me it is inconceivable that an appointed legislative body should have an absolute veto over decisions made by an elected legislative body. It is undemocratic, unjust and morally wrong. Whether we use the power or not does not matter at all. In my view the absolute veto lets the eyes of the people look upon us as an anachronism. I am sure if I were to call the United Nations and ask the question they would tell me that the Hottentots did away with the absolute veto many years ago. The effect of this will be what you probably already know, that the House of Commons, by a majority vote, will be able to reform or abolish the Senate subject to the suspensive veto, and no matter what we do the veto must go. But when it goes it is a new ball game and we had better be on the ball.

• (2120)

Point 2 deals with the distribution of senators. Here again I accepted what the Constitution Committee said because I thought that was the right thing to do and I could not think of anything better.

> 2. The distribution of senators should be as follows:
> Newfoundland 6
> Prince Edward Island 4
> Nova Scotia 10
> New Brunswick 10
> Quebec 24
> Ontario 24
> Manitoba 12
> Saskatchewan 12
> Alberta 12
> British Columbia 12
> Yukon Territory 2, and > Northwest Territories 2

—A total of 130. This is a matter of choice. The rest of the country is quite right when it says there is far too much domination by Ontario and Quebec, far too much preponderance. There is a great future in the West with their natural resources which are available in immediate and long term. The need is to have much more representation than they have now so that their power is felt in the seats of government. You cannot reduce the numbers from the Maritimes. That is impossible and should not be done. If we reduce Ontario and Quebec in order to give more to the West, we will be in a politically impossible position. The House of Commons went through this exercise some time ago when they were faced with the same problems. They decided that the best thing to do was to increase the number. That would be far more acceptable. Of course, they may increase the regions and instead of having four regions they may have five. I see no difference, but I would rather see the number increased in order to give these other provinces a greater voice in Parliament. However, I am not set on it one way or the other. It is before us for discussion. I am like the doctor whose patient said to him, "When can I go back to my office? When am I going to get rid of this cold?" The doctor said, "It will be a week." The patient was not satisfied and went to another doctor and asked, "When can I go back to the office?" And the doctor said, "Oh, about seven days from now."

The third point has to be read along with the fourth.

> 3. The supporters of any one political party should not comprise more than two-thirds of the membership of the Senate at any one time and the Canadian Constitution should be amended as soon as possible to ensure this result.

I will speak about that in a few minutes.

4. The compulsory retirement age of senators, present and future, should be seventy years. Upon retirement, a senator should retain the title and precedence of an active senator and also the right to participate in the work of the Senate and its committees but not the right to vote therein. Senators retired retroactively should on retirement retain their salary and fringe benefits until they reach their normal retirement age under existing law.

Let me indicate what this means.

Hon. Mr. Rowe: Did you read both recommendations 3 and 4?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes. The Senate as presently constituted has 76 Liberals, 18 Conservatives, and about 3 others—76 in the majority party and 22 in the minority parties. If everyone was retired at 70 it would affect about 30 to 35 members, and the normal annual rate of erosion here is five. It would affect about 35 members, seven of whom would be from the minority party. So if we dealt on the present basis of 102 members, the minority party would be entitled to about 19 or 20 new members. If we dealt on the basis of the recommendation in the report of the Constitution Committee they would be entitled to about 28 members. I think it should be admitted that the present Opposition is a numerical disaster. They are not able to man the house and they are not able to man the committees. The Senate is too heavily weighted on one side, and this is not good for the Senate. It is not good for democracy. The house needs a balance. Good opposition makes for good government. It would be a new house. It would no longer be the preserve of a single party, for with the Opposition numerically weak there is very little cut and thrust in this place. It is mostly pussycat purrs with hardly any scratches.

Senator O'Leary was right the other day when he said that Senators Flynn, O'Leary and Grosart are the members who carry the burden. They receive a little help from some of the others, but in the main there is truth to that statement.

In so far as tenure is concerned, I said that I had life tenure. But I think that in the interest of the Senate, and we are interested in the Senate, those of us who have life tenure have had a pretty good run at it. We have been here for some years now. We should be prepared to assist the Senate and to make it more acceptable to the public, and to accept our limitations at 75, or whatever it may be, keeping the retirement age of 70 in mind. It will mean some sacrifice for a small minority. But certainly there will be no hardships.

5. The speaker, the government leader and the opposition leader should be elected by the members of this house: the government leader by the supporters of the government; the opposition leader by non-supporters of the government.

It is time to stand on our own feet. The time has come to choose our own leaders. We urgently need a change of image, and we are entitled to a life of our own within constitutional limitations. What needs to be done to the Senate is not an acupuncture, but major political surgery. If there was a referendum in this country tomorrow on the question: "Are you in favour of abolishing the Senate?" my view is that we would lose. If we had a referendum in this country tomorrow on the question: "Are you in favour of an elected Senate?" the voters would be in favour of an elected Senate. The Canadian public would be wrong on both counts. First, if they abolished the Senate they would have to put something in its place. If they elected a Senate they would bring on conflict and confrontation between two elected houses.

• (2130)

6. The government leader and the opposition leader in the Senate should serve for only one Parliament and should not be eligible for re-election subsequently.

7. The age of the government leader and the opposition leader in the Senate, and the Speaker, should not be more than 65 years at the time of election to that position, so that at the end of the Parliament for which he or she is elected, he or she will still be under 70 years of age.

8. The government leader in the Senate should not be a member of the Cabinet.

The leader has to be our man. He is not, and it is time that we cut the umbilical cord with the House of Commons. We do not want a divorce, we do not want a separation; we just want a life of our own and to respond to our duties and responsibilities in our own way. We know where we came from. We know who appointed us, and those who come here and say, "When you come to the Senate you are no longer interested in politics," talk a lot of nonsense. Politics is the name of the game here, but it does not have to be blind, partisan politics. The leader has a constant conflict between being a member of the Cabinet and being leader in the Senate. One who has been there 22 years pretty well takes on the mentality of a cabinet minister who thinks he can do no wrong and his party can do no wrong. All who correct him are mistaken, and the people are all wrong. It is not possible in this day and age to wear two hats. Whoever leads us must have the Senate as his top priority.

The Senate must have a different concept. It needs younger people. Retreads like myself and others have a purpose, but it is time old faces should fade, or at least should not be up front. The public wants new faces, new people, and new thinking. On our own we will not be anti-government. We are not anti-establishment. The Senate interest is the public interest, and we know what needs to be done. You must keep in mind that when the Senate was established democracy had not sufficiently matured, so the Senate was established for elder statesmen to give measures what is termed a sober second thought, but things have changed. Take the House of Commons with the rules today—second reading, committee report stage and third reading. The same things happen here. I think it can be useful to have a second sober thought, but only in special cases. I do not think normally it makes that much difference.

9. The government should appoint a senator as a minister without portfolio for the purpose of liaison with the government.

10. Minority groups have long been under-represented in the Senate. This should be corrected so that the multicultural character of the Canadian people will be reflected in the Senate.

11. The chairmen of standing committees should hold office for one Parliament only and should not be eligible for re-election. He or she must be no more than 65 years at the time of election to that position. No member should be chairman of more than one committee of the Senate whether it be standing or special.

12. There should be constituted a Senate standing committee on miscellaneous Canadian affairs, with subcommittees staffed to study matters of national importance such as:

(a) Provincial and Regional Affairs

(b) Municipal and Urban Affairs

(c) National Energy

(d) Foreign Ownership

(e) Multiculturalism

(f) Youth and their Special Problems

(g) Aging and its Special Problems

(h) Ombudsman

(i) Official Languages

(j) Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms

(k) Pollution

(l) Education

(m) Poverty—Social Services

As to implementation, the plan should be designed to come into effect at the next ensuing Parliament.

The purpose of the last point is, of course, to have a new spirit of inquiry into the broad public interest, small committees sitting from Monday to Thursday, both inclusive, and acting as a catalyst for people's problems. I gave a list of subject matters. Ask yourself the question some time on the subject matters, if you had to pick 10 people in all Canada—I have gone over it—in two-thirds of those subject matters you would have to include a senator. I did not provide for Senator O'Leary's oratory either.

Now, with that kind of talent around here, with that kind of ability, why cannot we make more progress? What is holding us back? Are we using the members of this house to the full, and giving them the facilities they require? We fail to give them opportunities to use their faculties. We are full of talent and specialists that have not been used. Administratively we have been failures. We will need some re-organization. We must remember we were fresh when others were tired; we are now the tired ones.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: We sure are.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You have the 12-point plan. It is my hope that the initiation of this inquiry will be followed by a lively and informed debate. I am sure we shall all follow the course of that debate carefully in an effort to judge whether there is a fair prospect of achieving a consensus in the Senate with respect to the whole, or any substantial part, of the package. If it appears that such a prospect exists, no doubt the Senate will consider further steps which should be taken to examine the plan which, of course, requires much further study, refinement and elucidation. I would hope that in due course such a consensus might be reflected in a form which could be presented for implementation by the Parliament of Canada, in its legislative aspects as well as in its administrative aspects.

History has shown that Senate reform is much more likely to be achieved through the initiative of the Senate itself than through an outside agency. I spoke earlier about that. It seems to me that there are only two options open—Senate reform or Senate abolition. It is a clear case of reform or perish. The Senate must be more credible, viable and useful.

For whatever reason—and some of the criticism is justified—in the mind of the public the Senate's image, despite efforts in recent years to improve it, has not been a satisfactory one. The Senate itself must take steps of the nature and magnitude proposed in the foregoing package which I have presented to the Senate.

The Canadian people are looking for, and will accept, meaningful Senate reform as an alternative to abolition. The key phrase nevertheless is, and remains, reform or perish.

Honourable senators, I believe that these recommendations are in tune with the times, the wishes, and the best interests of our people, and also in the best interests of our parliamentary institutions.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Loan and Trust Companies for the year ended December 31, 1971, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

THE SENATE

NEED FOR REFORM—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to rise—very meekly, I may say—on a question of privilege. It concerns the speech made in this house last evening by my good friend Senator Croll. Senator Croll was deploring—rightly, I think—the numerical weakness on this side of the house. He went on to say this—I am quoting from page 323 of Senate Hansard of yesterday:

> Senator O'Leary was right the other day when he said that Senators Flynn, O'Leary and Grosart are the members who carry the burden.

I must point out that I did not say that the other day, nor the day before that, nor on any other day, and I would be violating truth if I did say it, especially if I linked Senator O'Leary with Senator Grosart and Senator Flynn.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I said that from memory only, Senator O'Leary, but I was pretty sure that you had said it. I will look it up just the same, but I certainly accept your statement.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 22, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Cameron calling the attention of the Senate to the need to re-examine the structure of freight rates in Canada and the importance of new technology to the economics of transportation.

Hon. Arthur Laing: Honourable senators, I want first of all to associate myself with the feeling of gratitude towards Senator Cameron for having raised this matter. I appreciate very much the opportunity of participating in the discussion to the extent of outlining some of the problems in respect of transport in the northern parts of our provinces, and particularly in the Canadian North.

I feel, however, that merely condemning to a piece of paper a number of speeches that those others who are with me are going to make is not sufficient to a proper discussion of this problem at all. If we are going to do anything sensible and productive with it, I think that it is a matter that should be referred to one of the committees of this place so that something can be put together that is valuable to the country.

It would be hard to stress the magnitude of what we are talking about to the economy of Canada and its people. I have some figures that indicate that the total cost of transporting an article—of moving a required article from one part of Canada to another part of Canada where it is wanted, or taking it from one part of Canada and delivering it to salt water where it can be shipped abroad, or transporting it down to the boundaries of Canada for further shipment by rail—constitutes almost 26 per cent of the total value of the commodity itself. I am not going to swear to the accuracy of the figures, but we did include the cost of packaging of the article, because if it is an article which is valuable in its form here, and then has to be packaged in order to transport it to some other place, then I think it is valid for us to add the cost of packaging as well. Therefore, the computation we made at 26 per cent of the value of the gross national product in respect of those things moved across the country either for export or simply for delivery to another part of Canada comes to a very, very considerable amount of money.

I have been thinking recently of a consideration which I have even put before a committee of the other place on one occasion. What would happen in Canada to our economy and to our people if we adopted a principle of absorbed freight costs throughout Canada on all articles produced in Canada? As late as this afternoon I have been talking to my colleague, Senator McIlraith, who has had long experience as Minister of Transport and previous to that in working for other Ministers of Transport. He thinks it might be of value to the Canadian economy if we applied the principle to manufactured goods, but that beyond that it might have no validity at all.

It has come to my attention that the extremely competent manufacturers of motor cars in Japan have a common price in Canada whether their cars are delivered at the ports of Vancouver, New Westminster, Halifax, or St. John, New Brunswick. The price of a Japanese car is the same in every part of Canada, and this in turn leads to great simplification of their selling organization right across the country from one side to the other. It seems to me that such a system has a great deal of merit.

In Canada we are dealing with various kinds of transportation, which is in itself an immense subject, moving goods or people by water, by rail, by air and, shortly I think, to a large extent by pipeline. When I was in business, as was the case for 27 years, and had to deal with transportation costs, we had at that time an accepted dogma. I do not know whether it still stands up or whether it even had any validity at that time, but we were told that to arrive at a per-ton-mile basis one should use the figure 1 to ship by water, 3 to ship by rail and 9 to ship by truck. It was the old 1-3-9 ratio. Today people are asking what it costs to transport by air, and as nearly as I can make out the figure would be 27. As I have said, I am speaking now of cost per-ton-mile. This gives us a ratio of 1-3-9-27, which in my view still has validity.

A great deal of new technology is being developed in the area of transportation, and one of the most important is the use to a very great extent of pipelines for the transportation of liquids and quite probably for solids as well. At the present time the Saskatchewan Research Council, on a grant from the Canadian Transport Commission of $500,000, is undertaking the work of putting solids through pipelines that are of a large diameter. There are pipelines operating in the world today carrying solids. But I note, and I do not know any reason for this, that the largest diameter is 15 inches. It is one operating in France carrying coal. There seems to be some intricacies involved in developing pipelines of large diameter to transport solids. Of course, if you are putting some solids through a pipeline you have to put liquid in to carry the solids through, otherwise the commodity, be it ore, concentrate, or coal, would soon wear out the pipe. There is a great deal of hope that development will take place in this particular field.

There is one so-called slurry pipeline operating in Arizona. It is 273 miles long and only 18 inches in diameter. Last year it had a through-put of 4.8 million tons of coal.

Honourable senators, when you get down to liquids it would appear that pipelines are the only reasonable method of transport. The Trans-Mountain Pipeline, which originates in the environs of Edmonton and runs through the Rocky Mountains to Vancouver, British Columbia, is 742 miles long, and last year it carried 22 million tons of oil. I have difficulty reading their annual report. I think some of these companies write their annual report so that they will be difficult to understand. But as near as I can make out, the strictly operational cost—without making provision for investment or retirement of debt or anything like that—was something less than 70 cents a ton for 742 miles. So, as far as liquids are concerned, the way to transport them today is by pipelines.

I think we should pay some attention to the principle which has been accepted in Canada that it is imperative that the public be served by railways or transportation companies that are competitive. I think acceptance today is very wide for a trans-continental railway owned by the people of Canada competing openly with privately owned railways. As against that, I have some question as to whether this competition is real.

There are potash mines in Saskatchewan, and I think in every case these mines are served by both national railways. I remember when a bill was put through the other place to provide the Canadian National Railways with access to one of these potash mines, and a spur line was built at a cost of $18 million. I would suggest that if the number of trains per day, per week, or per month are not sufficiently great, the railways should be instructed to divide the freight revenue between them rather than duplicate the construction of spur lines to these particular areas.

We have other examples, principally in respect of provinces which were of the opinion that their northern areas would not be properly developed by trans-continental railways, either the CPR or the CNR, and that if they were going to throw their borders back and develop the northern territories they had to build their own railways.

This happened first in Ontario. The Ontario Northland Railway, which runs north to James Bay, has been of tremendous value to Ontario. In addition to throwing back the frontier, it opened up that great mining area of northern Ontario which the trans-continental railways were not serving, and out of which has been brought hundreds of millions of dollars worth of minerals. This has contributed to the economy of Canada and our balance of payments. In British Columbia the B.C. Railway, which was the old Pacific Great Eastern Railway, is 842 miles long, with present projections of another 1,000 miles. This is the only railway which gives a spine to our province. It has led to the development of pulp mills, mines, and so on. The provinces view these railways as development and pioneer railways. I am quite certain that the old P. G. E. under Premier Bennett, who was with us for 20 years, actually suffered an annual loss of $8 million to $10 million. But when two or three pulp mills can be established and new mines opened up, putting thousands more people to work in new areas, probably the concept of pioneer railroading is very good indeed. In actual returns to the government, probably the development that took place more than offset any loss by the railway. There are other railways, which I shall deal with later, that make a great contribution to the northern parts of this country.

I should like to say a word about the geography of Canada; it is exceedingly difficult. We are a country that is 2,875 miles deep. From our northernmost point to our southernmost point it is 2,875 miles, and from east to west it is 3,223 miles. But, honourable senators, it is proven that today 84 per cent of all our people live within 200 miles of the United States boundary, and I should think that of our gross national product even a higher percentage than that is produced within that 200-mile limit. To all intents and purposes, apart from the very real development that is taking place today in the northern parts of the provinces and in the Arctic areas, we are a country 3,200 miles wide and 200 miles deep. This makes transport exceedingly difficult and has created many problems for Canada.

The climate of our country must also be considered. It costs far more to employ and maintain people in the high Arctic than it does to employ and maintain people living along our border with the United States. There are 500 or 600 men working for Panarctic Oils today, and I am told that it costs $24.50 a day to feed one man and another $14.50 to house him. These are expensive areas in which to operate. Food has to be flown in. For example, a sack of potatoes laid down in Inuvik costs $27 a hundred pounds, and from there the potatoes have to be delivered to various points of operation. The climate makes it very difficult country in which to operate.

I remember only three years ago a corporation lawyer from Toronto coming to see me. He had a vision of the North. More than one man has had a vision of Canada's northland. He had a lovely map, and just under James Bay he had it green all across Canada. But he was critical of the railways for not building a railway farther North, and said, "We must build a railway in this mid-continent area of Canada." I asked, "Have you ever been in the North?" Well, he did not know whether he would answer that one or not. I inquired, "Have you ever been in the Arctic?" and he replied, "No." I then asked how far North he had been, to which he answered, "I have been to North Bay."

Well, I had to tell him that if I were to take him in August to the particular area where he was going to build his railway, I would have to take him in by helicopter and drop him off on one of those humps amidst the muskeg, and I would have to come back and pick him up with the helicopter or he would be there forever.

In that area there is too much water on top of the land in summer, and too much ice on top of the water in winter. It is a very difficult area in which to operate. As one goes farther North one gets into Arctic desert country where the total precipitation, from snow alone, is as little as four inches per year.

In working with machinery and men one is faced with difficulties every day which are totally unknown in the southern part of Canada. Our North, we should at once realize, has to be served by facilities that run north and south. The great task of the CPR in putting the railway across mountains, partly in Alberta but principally in British Columbia, is one of the great success stories of Canadian history, because that is not normally the way, or the place, in which railways are constructed. One does not usually construct a railway to go uphill or downhill. One follows water levels, and Canadian rivers run north and south. If one wants to build a railway economically, one sticks to the water level. Therefore the policy of the provinces in developing their own railways, as has been done in Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, has been a very wise one. They have put spines through their provinces, pushing their economies north, and serving themselves to the best advantage having regard for the climate and geography.

I was told—it has not yet been refuted, and I have put it to a number of railwaymen—that one tries to avoid grades on a railway, because it costs twice as much to pull a train up a one per cent grade than it does to operate it on a level. If this be so, grades are important in the operation of our railways, and we should stick closely as possible to operational levels.

What we have to move in the North at the present time are people, supplies for those who work there and for the communities, whose population is increasing very rapidly, and, finally, the resources.

One of the difficulties is extremely cold weather. At one of the mines in the Yukon there is today a standing order which says that when the temperature goes down to 65 degrees below zero, the whole thing is called off for the day—not because the men are afraid of freezing, but because they are afraid of having the machinery fly into pieces under them due to metal fatigue.

These are some of the problems that have to be faced in supplying that particular market. It is a market that is growing rapidly, because today we are extending into the far reaches of the Canadian North, as well as the Arctic. We are not justified in building a huge and costly facility for transportation until we are reasonably sure that it can carry itself. I am in favour of pioneer railroads, but always with a pretty good understanding that there will be justification in the end for the immense expenditure.

There are a great number of suggestions being made today by various people who are writing observations on Canada. These people, I feel, are paying very little attention to the economics behind their writings. In the far North today we are exploring. We have not yet established the presence there of the kind of assets which would justify the expenditures being advocated by these people.

We have the B.C. Railway; we have the Pine Point Railway. I am going to take the opportunity now, as I have taken it before, of congratulating Mr. Diefenbaker on making the decision, first of all, to build that railway up to Hay River and across to Pine Point and, secondly, to build it on the west side of Alberta rather than on the east side. As Senator Manning will recall there was a great deal of pressure to put it on the east side of Alberta. I think that is one of the better paying lines of the railways of Canada. It serves not only the mining industry in that particular location, but a rapidly increasing amount of freight that goes down the Mackenzie to the Arctic.

The Schefferville Railway is one of the most efficient railways in Canada today. This railway runs from Schefferville to Seven Islands and was built by a company for a specialized job. It uses ultra-modern equipment, and is a good operation all the way through. These are railways and services that are genuinely serving the extended areas of Canada.

I should also say a word about the White Pass and Yukon Railway. This narrow gauge is a great attraction for tourists. They like to go up there, and thousands of them make that trip. They get on at Skagway and go up to a place called Bennett where they are fed, and then brought back—and they are as happy as all get out. This was a small railway originally built with British capital. It went through the depression, saw the population of the Yukon retreat and decrease until there was almost nothing left. Any businessman with any acumen or understanding at all would have shut the thing down. However, they were too proud. They kept it going, and today they are carrying a million tons a year, and before 1980 they will be carrying two million tons a year. They will sooner or later have to get into a standard gauge railway because there are great assets up there.

I feel great credit is due to people who stick a thing out when times are bad, having in mind that some day the economy is going to come back, as the Yukon economy has. In the meantime Canadians have invested in the American port of Skagway about $10 or $12 million in an ultra-modern trans-shipment facility for the concentrates produced in the Yukon.

I come now to air transport. The Territories are 1,500,000 square miles in area, 42 per cent of the land mass of Canada, and are occupied by 57,000 people. My view of the North is that it is rich in resource value. I am speaking now of the area north of 60, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. As far as money coming into Canada out of resources is concerned, most of us here will live to see the day when over 50 per cent of all of that money will come out of the area north of 60. This is a fantastically rich area, in spite of all of its difficulties.

We are now getting into new and exotic concepts of transport. There is the hovercraft. It is a magnificent machine. It was developed in Britain. It has no aerodynamics; it is straight push or straight pull. It has been operating across the Channel, although not entirely successfully, carrying 30 cars and 200 people, at speeds of up to 50 and 60 miles an hour. We have had them in the Canadian North, where they have been not exactly satisfactory because of the high operating cost. They have a skirt about them which contains the air that is pressed down on the water surface and raises the machine. If the skirt were immobile and the machine did not move it would be easy to maintain the pressure, but you cannot move the thing sideways and keep the air in it at the same time. The development of that machine is not yet complete, but it will be of value in the Canadian North when it is perfected. However, it is not suitable for that use today because of its high cost.

Let us consider the helicopter. Again no aerodynamics; straight pull. It is a costly machine, but for low-level flying, for access to particular places, for picking up power lines and putting them on the tops of mountains, it is unsurpassed. It is a marvellous machine. For transporting people, and so on, and in emergencies, it is extremely valuable.

There are many suggestions being made today, many studies, many people advising us what to do. We have a surfeit of environmentalists warning us as to what we cannot do. I have become a little angered by certain environmentalists, who I do not think are practical people. Only last week I had to tell one, "If you and the likes of you had been around when God made the world none of us would be here yet. You would still be studying whether or not a world was practical." They are just full of studies.

One man has come up with the idea that we should carry gas out of the Arctic by airplane. Gas can be liquified by putting it in what they call cryogenic on supercooled tanks, and so move it. One can reduce 635 cubic feet of gas to one cubic foot to make a package that presumably you are able to carry around. Today we are exporting about one billion cubic feet of gas per day, and we are selling it at the international boundary at, I think, an average of about 31 cents per 1,000 cubic feet. To make that little package out of 635 cubic feet of gas costs 50 cents to start with, and how you put a machine on an airplane to maintain the appropriate temperature until you get it anywhere I do not know.

I am an immense admirer of the airplane. It has made our Canadian North possible. Right from the beginning, mankind's whole concept, thought, and effort in transportation was to do something to minimize friction. That is why he made the wheel, instead of dragging a stick across the ground with a load on it. Finally he got around to saying "We will get off the ground entirely, and go through the air." The airplane is a wonderful machine. It was devised first to carry people, the most expensive kind of freight that can be carried.

I spoke to one of the men who these days are proposing a railway to the Arctic. They are products of Queen's University, who sit down to produce ideas like building a railway to the Arctic to bring the oil down from Prudhoe Bay so that we will not have to have tankers along the British Columbia coast. I asked one of these men if he knew what a ton of oil was worth, and he said no. I said: "Would it be $100 or $200 a ton?" The answer was: "I do not know." I had to point out to him that at the wellhead today, worldwide, oil is worth less than $12 a ton. I am going to tell you now, as I told him, that you cannot put any freight in an airplane and get it off the ground, whether you are going only two miles or a thousand miles, for less than $70 a ton.

We have to get down to some practical thinking on this, or we are going to be confusing our public over a matter that is of the first essential. What we want is the most effective, the most economical means of moving freight, people and supplies from one part of the country to the other. When you get into these Jules Verne proposals that we hear around the country, it is time for someone to say, "Let's blow a whistle on it, and sit down and talk some sense." It is extremely important that we do not commit ourselves to vast expenditures.

The cost of this railway, they say, is only $2.4 billion; that is all and I think their figures are wrong. They have estimated that they can carry the oil on this railway for 0.44 cents a ton mile. I have got the annual report of the Canadian National Railway here. It is a considerable railway, because its freight receipts last year exceeded $1,100 million, and 90 per cent of that was carried in carloads; and 90 per cent of that freight was carried within 200 miles of the United States boundary, where you do not ever get 70 or 80 degrees below zero weather. Their revenue per ton mile last year—and the CNR did not make money—averaged 1.48, or 1½ cents a ton mile.

Honourable senators, they cannot convince me that they can operate at 0.44 cents from the Arctic coast, when the Canadian National has to get 1.48 cents in Southern Canada. I am not convinced that these are valid figures. It is difficult to operate. They propose to move 397,000 tons of oil a day in cars. To start with, you do not put a liquid in a car; if you want to carry it economically, you put it in a pipeline.

All this, of course, hinges on whether TAPS, the pipeline across Alaska, is going to be built. The President of the United States has indicated that he wants it built down to the Port of Valdez, from where they would bring the oil by tanker.

We shall have pipelines in Canada for the transfer of Canadian oil and Canadian gas. Canadian firms today, in the production of the pipe itself and in the technology required to put it in permafrost, are well advanced. The oil goes in the pipe at a temperature of 160 degrees; it is hot. You cannot put that kind of a pipeline on top of permafrost, because it would melt it and you would have trouble; the pipe would break. Canadian companies in the last four or five years have spent something like $34 million in devising the kind of berm in which they have got to put that kind of pipeline. With gas it is relatively easy, it could be put on top, because there is no danger of any kind of damage from breakage of a gas pipeline.

Honourable senators, I was interested last evening in the very competent speech of Senator Croll, who indicated what this institution of ours could do in respect to a variety of subjects, and the competence that is resident in this particular part of Parliament. I intend to have further discussions with senators, but I should say now that I would like to see convened a small group of senators who have the interest and the time to give to the Canadian North and I am talking about the area north of 60 degrees. There are immense potentials there; there are equally immense problems.

There are thousands of new experts—some of them 24-hour experts. There are branches of the Government of Canada interesting themselves in the North, with very little knowledge. There are self-appointed economists in Canada who say that if there is wealth there, leave it in the ground. One of them is Mr. Kierans. However, that pronunciamento of his hardly squares with his advocacy, in the province of Manitoba now, for the Government of Manitoba to take over the mines within the next ten years. I do not know whether that is with the idea of leaving it in the ground, but I think not.

It is time, in respect of the immense potential coming out of those regions in the future, with its undoubted effect upon the entire economy of Canada, that we have a committee making a study of this, calling before it the people who are making comments on the North. This committee would be extremely beneficial to the people who are increasingly making their living in the Canadian North.

Some 20 or 25 years ago a man went in there, made a bit of a stake, and got out as fast as he could. That is not the pattern any more. Men are going in there now with their families; they are raising their children there, and putting them in schools that are just as good as the schools in Ottawa. Transportation from one place to the other by jet aeroplane, right down to the Arctic coast and on the Arctic islands as well, has revolutionized the whole situation there. It is time that kind of study was made by a small group of senators who can give it some time. I rather hope that Mr. Manning will agree with me in this, that a study of the Arctic would be of considerable value to the provinces, with their northern sections partly developed today.

The whole issue in Canada is transport; the whole problem of Canada is in getting people, ideas and goods from one part of the country to the other. This is our number one problem. In respect of that particular area, we could bring some knowledge out of there that would be good for all the other parts of Canada.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Haig, debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SIXTIETH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, ROME, ITALY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton rose pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Sixtieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Rome, Italy, 21st to 29th September, 1972, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegates from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it is always a great pleasure indeed to listen to Senator Arthur Laing. It has been my privilege in the past to have heard him on many occasions in the other place. There is one description which applies to him, and it is appropriate because it is certainly true. This senator, whom we now have among us and who has brought to this chamber so much knowledge and so much wisdom, can be described as the man who brought the Canadian North to the attention of the Canadian people because he has done so much to open up the Canadian North, and to focus attention upon the great potential for our country in the Canadian North.

I wanted to make that point in partial answer to certain reporters who say that the Senate is comprised of older people who do not do much, and also to point out that we have in our midst a great expert on the Canadian North.

Yesterday I ran into Senator Grosart and had the benefit of a little criticism from him. I showed him my text for this speech and he said, "It is far too long. It is probably boring, too." I imagined he was right on both counts so, following his cue and acting on his suggestion, I changed the speech into a report.

Although the speech was, perhaps, too detailed, I had thought it necessary to answer the questions: Why did you go there? What did you do? What did you come back with? And so I put a lot of detail into my speech, but I would ask permission to table it later, and for the moment I will just give a few highlights of what we did at the conference.

Although this report will not be in the same class at all as the remarks that Senator Laing has just concluded, it is another evidence of the fact that senators do something for and on behalf of, not the Senate but their country, outside of Canada. I maintain, and I have seen this in operation many times, that senators, old as they may be—but, shall I say, full of some experience at least and, I would hope, some wisdom—can act in a proper and very persuasive way on behalf of their country so that their attendance at these international conferences is very useful indeed. We as senators, older people of sober second thought, I hope, can use our past skills and present capacities to advance Canadian policy in many different directions.

Honourable senators, it occurred to me that my first duty would be to tell you why this particular delegation was selected; then to tell you, very briefly, what the Inter-Parliamentary Union is and how it operates; then to try to give you an account of what the different delegates accomplished; and, finally, I thought I would table some resolutions and request permission to refer them to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

First, the delegation. In fact, there were almost two delegations. When the first delegation was appointed it consisted largely of members of the House of Commons, but owing to the election being called on October 30, it soon became impractical for members of the other house to participate in this delegation to Rome in June. After all, they had to face the practical problem of being re-elected and they had to explain their parties' positions.

A second slate, therefore, if I can call it that, was selected consisting largely of senators. Senators were thrown into the breach because the country had to be represented at this conference. The chairman of the delegation was Mr. Gordon Aiken, M.P., as he was then. I must say that I regret very much that he is no longer a member of the other house. For health reasons he could not run again. However, at that time Mr. Aiken was the leader of the delegation as well as being a member of the Inter-Parliamentary Council. He made an excellent chairman and, through his guidance and tact and his insistence on attending early morning meetings, the Canadian delegation accomplished what it set out to do.

As far as the Senate's representation is concerned, there were Senator Raymond Eudes, Senator Jacques Flynn, Senator Sarto Fournier, Senator Joe Greene, Senator Fred Rowe, and myself as vice-chairman of the delegation. The other place was represented by Mr. Louis Comeau, M.P., the Honourable D. S. Harkness, M.P., who also, probably for reasons of health, did not run in the last election, and Mr. R. R. Southam, M.P., a long-time member of the other house who also decided not to contest his seat.

I may say in passing, of course, that the wives were a very necessary part of our delegation and were of great assistance on many occasions, and they certainly made time pass more pleasantly.

At this point I should like to mention, because they are mentioned so infrequently, those members of our staff. Miss Jean Macpherson of the Inter-Parliamentary Relations Branch year after year has the job of correlating activities, briefing members, and arranging details. In fact, the Inter-Parliamentary Relations Branch should have a good word said about it, I think. When I had a job to do in the other place it became very quickly evident that with many parliamentary organizations and no particular person in charge, we were running off in all directions. So we decided that we should set up an Inter-Parliamentary Relations Branch. Mr. Imrie was put in charge of that branch, and Miss Jean Macpherson is what you would call the assistant manager.

I call attention to the fact that this branch consists of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the IPU; the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, the CPA; the NATO Parliamentarians; the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group; the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Group; and l'Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française, AIPLF. There are six groups in all so that throughout the year there are many delegations, many trips, many activities, and many visitors, and this particular branch is a very active branch indeed.

Miss Jean Macpherson was in charge of our delegation and we did not have many problems. She was assisted by Mr. Bruno Lecci of the committees branch of the other house, and by Mr. Alex Small, Second Assistant Clerk in the other place, who at the same time is a member of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliament, which is a branch of the IPU having to do with, shall we say, the staffs of parliaments throughout the world. They discuss problems of how to improve procedure and all the rest of it.

I should mention one other person—Mr. Peter Dobell, of the Parliamentary-Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade, who was basically responsible for briefing the different members of the delegation. I should like to record, not only on our own behalf but also on yours, the expert assistance that month after month and year after year we receive from the different departments of government—the Departments of External Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Environment, and others which I cannot specifically remember at the moment. They are always there to help us and give us expert guidance when we represent our country abroad.

At this stage I should like to try very quickly to answer the question: What is the Inter-Parliamentary Union? It started back in 1889 as an organization established by the United Kingdom and France which met periodically for the arbitration of disputes between the two countries, though I must confess that this is not an exact description. By 1894 the Inter-Parliamentary Union had statutes and a secretariat. During the two world wars there was a temporary interruption. In 1960, Canada reaffiliated.

I should like also, honourable senators, to bring to your attention its objectives, and I shall quote from the statutes and rules. Article 1 of the statutes lays down that the aim of the Inter-Parliamentary Union is:

> —to promote personal contacts between members of all Parliaments, constituted into National Groups, and to unite them in common action to secure and maintain the full participation of their respective States in the firm establishment and development of representative institutions and in the advancement of the work of inter-national peace and co-operation, particularly by supporting the objectives of the United Nations. With this object in view, the Inter-Parliamentary Union will also study and seek solutions for all questions of an international character suitable for settlement by parliamentary action and shall make suggestions for the development of parliamentary institutions, with a view to improving the working of those institutions and increasing their prestige.

Since 1971 the headquarters have been located in Switzerland. What is its structure? The union is the only worldwide organization for parliaments, and is composed of national groups—that is to say, the Canadian Parliament has a national group called the Inter-Parliamentary group—and Canada is affiliated with the international organization.

The organization of the IPU expresses itself through an annual conference held each time in a different country. It has an overall council, consisting of two representatives from each country or national group. It has a standing study committee, which has five sub-committees. There is an Inter-Parliamentary Bureau, which really is the bureaucracy, and an association of secretaries-general of parliaments which, as I have said, is there to study how to improve parliament and exchange ideas. It also maintains an international library.

At the present time there are 72 member countries; and the budget—and I do not have the latest value of the Swiss franc—is 1,534,000 Swiss francs.

Annual meetings are held, the last one being in Rome in 1972. Previous to that they were held in Paris, The Hague, New Delhi, Lima, and Teheran.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union has formal relations with United Nations agencies and different parliamentary organizations. So much for the Inter-Parliamentary Union and its setup.

The inaugural ceremony of this conference was held in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, which is one of the rooms in the Italian parliament buildings. There were 710 delegates present of which 526 were members of parliament representing 64 countries, half being from the West and the other half being from the East, representing people who hold slightly different ideas. To me this represents the value of these international gatherings, because one can learn a great deal, and there is always a chance to persuade some people.

Speeches were given by the President of the Italian Republic, the President of the Senate, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, and the President of the Council of Ministers who is their prime minister. The events were held in the city of Rome, where the "Senate and people" throughout the centuries have been foremost in promoting the ideas of law and order, and I hope that some of that rubbed off on the members of the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

The agenda had five main subjects for discussion, and responsibility for Canadian participation in these discussions was allocated to different members of the Canadian delegation. There was a general debate on the Middle East and on new forms of political pressure in international affairs. The leader of the delegation, Mr. Gordon Aiken, took this matter under his wing.

Then there was a discussion on the need to intensify efforts to put an end to the arms race, with regard to all types of weapons, in view of its political, economic and social consequences. Senator Flynn handled this matter efficiently and tactfully.

The subject of problems of the human environment was discussed, and Mr. Louis Comeau, M.P. and I were given this responsibility.

The question of education in the developing countries was under the care of the Honourable Douglas Harkness, while the subject of the fight against drug abuse was under the care of Senator Rowe. The question of responsibilities of members of parliament towards the electorate was dealt with by Mr. Southam of the other house.

Senators Eudes, Sarto Fournier, and Greene assisted in the preparation of the above items, and had special responsibilities with regard to attending all plenary and general sessions, the committee meetings, and the social gatherings. It must be kept in mind that it is at the social gatherings of international conferences that a great deal of the salesmanship of this country's policy can be carried out. In the past, these events have proved to be extremely worth while.

At least three other important events took place. The whole delegation—that is, the whole Inter-Parliamentary Union conference—was received by His Holiness Pope Paul VI at the Vatican one Saturday morning, and I think he spoke to us for three-quarters of an hour. Many references to his text are contained in my report. A message from the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Kurt Waldheim, pointed out the difference between the United Nations and the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and indicated where the two organizations could and should co-operate. This is quoted extensively in my report.

I do not need to dwell on the social program at length. The Italian Government, with all the wealth of history, buildings and a glorious past and present, and with all the richness of Italian civilization, was naturally in a wonderful position to entertain us in the right way. The Canadian Embassy and our Ambassador, Mr. Rogers, could not have been more helpful in our efforts to bring about an improvement in international relations.

Participation in the conference proceedings by our delegates was very active indeed. So far as the Middle East question is concerned, I shall not take time to deal with it at this stage in detail, but I should just like to say that Mr. Gordon Aiken looked after that, and the conference finally deplored the escalation of aggression and acts of violence, and approved a motion that steps be taken to obtain a just and lasting peace. There were, of course, two elements to this Middle East discussion, with Israel on one side and the Arab countries on the other, and ourselves as arbitrators in between. We did our best to try to cool things, and to reach an eventual peace in that particular section of the world.

On the question of the human environment, honourable senators will recall my general interest in environmental matters and will permit me to explain in some detail the stand we took in Rome. At this conference, coming only two months after the Stockholm Conference, environmental problems were very much in the limelight. It provided a special opportunity to press on with Canada's general policy on environmental matters.

A draft resolution was prepared in advance and was submitted to the general conference for discussion, and rejection or approval. Outlining the problems of the human environment, it was a comprehensive resolution touching on many areas of activity, and it provided an excellent summary of the kind of measures which should be recommended to governments. For example, it spoke of the need to recognize that the atmosphere and the oceans are the common heritage of all mankind, and that their quality is being seriously impaired by the effects of industrialization and by the accidental or deliberate discharge of wastes. The draft also said that it is important to recognize that development is essential to the elimination of poverty in the developing nations.

Furthermore, it indicated that the use of the world's resources by the developed nations has increased many times during the past few decades, and that the demand may overwhelm the supply in the case of some resources.

The draft emphasized the importance of maintaining and preserving the natural resources of the earth, including the air, water, land, flora and fauna, and especially representative samples of natural ecosystems.

It stressed the fact that urbanization has reached alarming dimensions that are detrimental to the quality of human life, and that the situation is continuing to deteriorate. It also stressed the need for governments and the mass media to provide citizens in their respective countries with information on all aspects of environmental management.

The draft resolution also noted the environmental threat posed by the stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction and, lastly, said there should be an awareness of the important role of the Inter-Parliamentary Groups in contributing to the implementation of international juridical instruments or, if you wish, the carrying out of treaties.

Consequently, said the draft, the IPU should call upon the Inter-Parliamentary Groups to take action within their respective parliaments for the speedy ratification—following their approval by the 27th Session of the United Nations General Assembly and the relevant bodies of international agencies—of all the conventions proposed by the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment, and should keep the Bureau of the IPU informed of the action taken and the results obtained.

It is surely evident that this resolution covered many of the problems of the human environment. Why, then, did Canada propose amendments? It is important to understand the Canadian position. Amongst the many countries in the world, Canada is to the forefront in framing and enacting new environmental law. This did not happen by sheer accident. Due to our position on the North American continent, with our great neighbour, the United States of America, to the south, we have been for the last 50 years or more in the process of adjusting claims and grievances, either with or against our neighbour.

For example, let me cite the Trail smelter case in which Canada paid compensation for the spoiling of certain countryside in the United States through smoke emanations from the Trail smelter. Again, I can refer to the Gut Dam case which had to do with the raising of the water level and for which, after arbitration between the two countries, Canada paid certain damages. By the test ban treaty we tried to prevent nuclear testing in the air. I refer to the Boundary Waters Treaty with the United States and to the Great Lakes Agreement. All of these meant a breakthrough either in arbitration or in settling disputes by agreement with the payment of damages, and in nations accepting responsibility for their own acts.

Over the years we have gradually come to the conclusion: "Thou shalt not pollute, and if you do you should pay the price." The second principle to be derived from this is the duty to consult before taking action that will harm a neighbour. These things seem rather obvious between private individuals within a nation, but as between nations it is very new.

[Hon. Mr. Macnaughton.]

The draft resolution presented to us in Rome was, in effect, pretty much a repetition of some of the principles in the Stockholm Declaration. Let me say right here that I was at Stockholm as vice-chairman of the Canadian delegation, and that most of these principles were drafted and pushed by our delegation, and that we have much to be proud of. The Rome draft contained specific recommendations to the parliamentarians for follow-up action with their respective governments. I have referred to these. There was, however, one glaring omission in the resolution on the human environment, namely, the principle of state responsibility. Whether this was left out for some reason, or whether some countries did not want it pushed, I do not know, but it was not put into the resolution. In point of fact, the legal principles in the Stockholm Declaration, particularly those numbered 21 and 22, do not appear at all. Consequently, the Canadian delegation proposed an amendment in the following words:

> Recognizing that States have the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction,
> Urges the National Inter-Parliamentary Groups to encourage their respective Parliaments and Governments to take measures both on the national and international level to develop further international environmental law as well as procedures and arrangements for the peaceful settlement of disputes involving environmental problems—

The Finnish Group then came to the Canadian Group and said that they wished to support and associate themselves with the Canadian amendment. In order to accommodate our Finnish friends, inasmuch as their proposed amendment more or less carried out the same idea, we agreed to replace the second paragraph of our suggested amendment with the Finnish amendment, which reads:

> 1. Calls upon the Inter-Parliamentary Groups to take steps to initiate regional cooperation between national Governments in order to avoid further deterioration of the environment in specific regions;

Canada, at Stockholm, proposed this great principle of state responsibility. Canada reintroduced this principle of state responsibility into the draft resolution in Rome, and this has now been accepted by the Inter-Parliamentary Union. There is very little international environmental law, and there is an urgent need to press forward with the development of such law. This was the purpose and the accomplishment of our amendment, which was accepted.

The Stockholm conference laid down a number of legal principles, some of them applicable particularly to the marine environment. Canada, with an Atlantic coast, an Arctic coast and a Pacific coast, has a particular interest in the Law of the Sea. We are one of the great maritime countries in the world, with a tremendous shoreline. Our difficulty today is in working out an accommodation between coastal states and flag states. None of these difficulties were reflected in the draft resolution. It is Canada's objective to reflect the Canadian position as to (a) the viability of the concept, or (b) the need to modify it.

I refer in particular to the concept of freedom of the high seas. The Canadian position is that freedom of the seas is now licence to exploit. For example, massive oil tankers would appear to have a licence to pollute. Where does responsibility for pollution lie? Should there be an unregulated freedom of the seas with regard to fishing and/or over-fishing, with regard to movement of ships and possible pollution? Is it not possible for treaties to assign new rights to nations which have a particular interest in protecting their coasts against pollution? The Canadian position, which is slowly being advanced, is: Give jurisdiction to the local coastal state, but not necessarily sovereignty of the seas beyond its coast. Give us jurisdiction and we will make sure that these waters are controlled. I admit this will be for the benefit of Canada, but it will also be for the benefit of other countries throughout the world because if we do not take some steps soon there will not be any benefit to other countries.

The question is not an easy one to decide, as between the conflicting viewpoints, but Canada proposed useful amendments with regard to the oceans, by inserting the words "beyond national jurisdiction," and with regard to the high seas by inserting the words "and seabed beyond national jurisdiction."

• (1520)

The proposed amendments would bring our resolution into line with those which were passed in the United Nations, and would avoid raising those difficult jurisdictional issues which must be left to the Law of the Sea Conference to resolve.

There were two other matters in the draft resolution which deserve a brief comment. The first related to the elimination of poverty in developing nations, but it seemed to ignore the preoccupation of developing countries as to who pays.

The implication is clear. Donor countries and agencies must recognize that environmental problems of the developing countries are vast in scope and potentially so critical that they constitute strong reasons for an increased flow of financial and technical assistance to the Third World. At the Stockholm Conference, Canada explained this view. We announced our intention to play our part in achieving a more rapid rate of resource transfer to the developing countries, and called on other donors to do the same.

It should be realized that this more rapid increase in aid flows can be achieved within the existing international targets of the International Development Strategy of the Second Development Decade. These targets are 0.7 per cent of gross national product for official development assistance. At present, all donors together provide only about half that amount, or 0.35 per cent.

The second matter refers to use of the world's resources and the new patterns and techniques that could hinder the development process of the developing nations, or their trade. This raises the issue of the trade losses which developing countries could, and probably will, experience in consequence of developed countries' measures to protect their environments.

Let me give you an example. It was advanced by a certain country in Africa that they are raising, shall we say, beans which they cultivate and spray with certain chemicals which, for instance, Canada or the United States of America decide should not be used because they pollute the air, soil, beans, food, or whatever it is. So we prohibit the importation of beans from this particular African country. These beans happen to be the whole production of that country; its entire financial existence depends on the sale of the beans to the United States and Canada. On account of our new environmental laws, we prohibit the importation of the product, so the African country goes bankrupt. Very naturally, they tell us that if we wish to impose our laws on them we must offer some assistance or compensation for their product, the loss of which will bankrupt their country. This is what I mean when I say there are many questions which must be very carefully considered.

Developed countries should be prepared to offer, in case of trade dislocation, compensatory trade arrangements under GATT and under bilateral or multilateral agreements. They should also be prepared to provide still more aid, to help strengthen developing countries' capacities continuously to adapt their production and trade to the constantly evolving pattern of world trade. At Stockholm, Canada worked hard to try to reach a compromise between developed and developing countries, so as to help those developing countries which may suffer losses of access to markets. Canada, through its bilateral aid program, has for several years assisted developing countries to preserve and improve their renewable resources—especially forests, fisheries and soils—and to manage them efficiently.

In 1972 at Stockholm, Canada offered $7.5 million to help set up a new environmental fund and a secretariat. In 1973 Canada looks forward to participating in the Conference on the Law of the Sea. In 1975 Canada will act as host to the Conference on Human Settlements. In 1977 Canada has offered to host the second United Nations Conference on the Human Environment.

We believe that Stockholm was a successful first step and that Canada will continue to do its duty to the international community.

At the Rome Conference we tried to carry forward these environmental concepts and to push environmental law and new goals further.

Following the presentation of my views, it became Mr. Louis Comeau's turn to make his remarks on the same matter. I have detailed his remarks to some extent in my written report. Mr. Comeau was selected by the IPU as one of four delegates from the IPU International to attend the Stockholm conference and to report back to it. This he did very effectively and efficiently.

The Bulgarian group—which belongs to that section of countries east of West Germany—did not attend the Stockholm conference. Consequently, they argued in Rome that their views had not been considered, that they had much to contribute and, therefore, that the whole question of our amendments and others should be delayed until 1973. The Bulgarian group tabled a motion to the effect that the resolution be referred to a subcommittee at the 1973 spring meeting, so that delegations of those countries which had not attended the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment in Stockholm might have time to study the findings of that conference, and thus contribute better to the solution of the environmental problems.

After all, they had refused to go. It was their decision and that of no one else. This Bulgarian motion was rejected, 144 votes in favour and 368 against, with 80 abstentions.

After the plenary debate on these subjects, I was asked to be chairman of the drafting committee, but I declined the honour and suggested the selection of a very clever younger member from Finland, who did a remarkably good job. I am very glad to say that we were successful in having all the important aspects of the Canadian amendments incorporated in the resolution adopted by the conference.

The next subject on the agenda was "End the Arms Race." In my written report I have referred to this extensively, but it really was the baby of Senator Flynn. I understand he will develop his own argument in due course, and I certainly do not wish to trespass on his territory.

The next major subject was "Fight Against Drug Abuse." This is recorded in my written report in extenso; but Senator Fred Rowe is here and I know that if you listen to him you will learn a lot. He was certainly most effective at the conference in Rome.

The fifth subject was "Education in Developing Countries." The Honourable Douglas Harkness is no longer a member of Parliament, but his memorable words are incorporated in my report.

The agenda item "Responsibilities of Members of Parliament Towards the Electorate" was handled by Mr. Southam of the other place, and extensive extracts from his remarks are incorporated in my report.

The Inter-Parliamentary Council, which consists of two delegates from each national group, held its meeting and Mr. Aiken and I were in attendance. The council decided to admit the German Democratic Republic, which is East Germany, into the organization. It refused the application of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and reconsideration was deferred until the conference this year. The Bangladesh group was admitted. The sixty-first meeting of the IPU will be held in Chile in 1973; the sixty-second in Tokyo, Japan, in 1974; and the sixty-third in London, England, in 1975.

Hon. Mrs. Heath: Would the honourable senator permit a question at this time?

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Certainly.

Hon. Mrs. Heath: I wonder if you could state briefly why the Korean group was not admitted?

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: I listened for many hours to the reasons for and against. If I am correct—and I do not wish to make misstatements—Korea is divided between north and south, with two governments. They are in the process of making an accommodation between them, and one party does not wish the other to be admitted until the accommodation is negotiated, signed and sealed. The other, perhaps, was seeking some debating advantage; I do not know. However, it certainly was not up to Canada or the other countries to decide matters between those two states, which are neighbours and, presumably, are becoming friends. It is thought that by 1973 they will have settled their differences and that everyone will be happy, and they will be welcomed with grace and appreciation. I could obtain a more detailed answer, but I believe that will be sufficient for your purposes.

Hon. Mrs. Heath: Thank you.

• (1530)

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I appreciate very much your patience in listening to this rather long dissertation. I have included extracts from the speeches of our different delegates in connection with the different items on the agenda because they contain many new and worthwhile ideas, and because they serve to explain the purpose of the draft resolutions which were subsequently passed, and which we, from Canada, endorsed.

Canada, as a group member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, sends delegates to play their part in formulating these resolutions and voting for their adoption. Article 7 of the statutes and rules of the Inter-Parliamentary Union states:

> It is the duty of a national group—

That is, our national Canadian group.

> —to keep its Parliament informed, through its committee or through one of its members, of Resolutions adopted at the Conferences which call for parliamentary or governmental action and, not later than one month before the next following annual Conference, to report to the Bureau of the Inter-Parliamentary Union as to the action taken thereon.

May I suggest, therefore, that if the Canadian group is going to live up to its membership commitment, follow-up action should be taken on the resolutions its delegates adopt at union meetings.

If honourable senators agree with this suggestion, they may wish to refer the resolutions adopted by the Rome Conference to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs for review and appropriate action. If this could be completed before the summer recess, the results could form part of the group's report to the bureau, which will be filed no later than August of this year.

As I stated at the commencement of my remarks, I have prepared a detailed report to the Senate on the Sixtieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Rome. I now table this report, together with the resolutions adopted by the conference, and ask that these documents be printed as appendices to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

(For text of appendices, see pp. 337-349.)

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I should like first to extend my congratulations to our colleague, Senator Macnaughton, for his excellent resumé on the great Inter-Parliamentary conference at Rome last fall and on its implications, particularly as they affect our own country.

I join with him also in expressing appreciation of the contributions made to the conference by our fellow members of the Canadian delegation. Senator Macnaughton has already detailed some of them. I should like also to add my voice to his in expressing our thanks to the various Canadian officials who helped to make the conference the success it was.

Before continuing with a few brief remarks on the drug problem, I must say that this was my first international conference as a senator from Canada, and I was very pleased, as a Canadian, to see the respect in which the Canadian delegation, and indeed Canada, was held by the other delegations representing 71 of the world's parliaments. It is a matter of great pride—it should be, and I think it is—that Canada is so highly regarded by other countries, big and small.

In the statement on the drug problem which I made at Rome, to which Senator Macnaughton referred, I made it quite clear that while my views were shared by many people in Canada, they were not necessarily those of my colleagues at the conference or of any Canadian group or body, including the Canadian Senate; they were my own views. I am very happy to say, and I was very gratified, that many delegates supported the views that I expressed. Indeed, it is my recollection that only one delegate—I think the record shows, surprisingly, that he was from the United Kingdom, from one of our own mother countries—opposed my views.

What I said at Rome can be summarized in this way: Because our approach to marijuana has been characterized by emotionalism, irrationality and hypocrisy—I am using those words deliberately—we have antagonized millions of our young people—and I am referring not only to Canada—who have seen through our stupidity and our hyprocrisy. This, in turn, has made them less inclined to take seriously the warnings about really dangerous drugs.

Even more important, by lumping marijuana indiscriminately with hard drugs we have not only made it more difficult to deal with the hard drug problem—one of the great problems facing our society and one that is becoming increasingly serious in Canada—but we have earned the undying gratitude of the criminal element. You cannot have 600 murders committed in the name of hard drugs in the city of Detroit in one year and not have the situation spread eventually into Ontario. Our forefathers did the same in the name of alcohol. We have given criminals the opportunity of cashing in on the demand for marijuana, where the market comprises tens of millions—let us not forget that: the market for marijuana comprises tens of millions of people, young and old—compared with only thousands who constitute the hard drug market.

The millions of young people whom we have branded as criminals for using marijuana—that is what we have done—look around them and see their parents, some of their religious advisers, and many of their political leaders—in short, a significant portion of the respectable adult community—hooked on alcohol, tobacco, and a variety of prescription drugs and even over-the-counter drugs, all infinitely more harmful than cannabis, as represented by marijuana. We then wring our hands in despair and puzzlement over the disrespect that our young people show for law and order.

These same young people know that some of the very doctors who once admonished them about marijuana have made fortunes from prescribing addictive "legitimate" drugs—I attach quotation marks to the word "legitimate"—which compare with marijuana in their deleterious effects, in the same degree, perhaps, that raw alcohol compares with a bottle of coke.

How can we expect a fourth year chemistry student to feel, put in jail for months or years for simple possession of marijuana cigarettes—honourable senators will note that I stressed "a chemistry student"—when he knows that the great drug companies of the world have persistently used every trick or ruse to "push" drugs that are useless, improperly tested, or addictive. The Mafia of New York are pikers compared with the great drug corporations when it comes to pushing harmful drugs.

Returning to the drug debate in Rome, because of time restrictions a number of national delegations were unable to present papers or make statements on this matter, although they indicated a desire to do so. Among them was the Dutch delegation. One of the leaders of the Dutch delegation, Dr. Lamberts—who in addition to being a member of the Netherlands Parliament is himself a prominent medical scientist—was kind enough to give me a copy of the statement which he had prepared for delivery at the conference. I have it here, and I shall be glad to make copies available to any honourable member who might be interested.

I shall not attempt here to summarize the whole statement, but will deal only with his references to cannabis, or marijuana. After pointing out that earlier last year the Dutch government had decided to cease treating the use and possession of cannabis products as a crime—the Dutch government took that step last year—Dr. Lamberts went on to say that a great many of the scientists and politicians concerned, including himself, felt that there should be the same freedom for cannabis products—and this is not indiscriminate freedom—as for alcoholic drinks and cigarettes, with, of course, state regulation of manufacture, traffic and place of sale. Here is a paragraph from Dr. Lamberts' statement:

> In the Netherlands there are some 1,000 drug dependants and some 70,000 alcohol addicts. Furthermore, every year at least 14,000 people die by smoking cigarettes. It is abhorrent to us that elderly men, a glass of brandy in one hand and a cigarette in the other, get excited about a young person smoking a joint. Likewise, we abhor that in several countries the possession and the use of small quantities of cannabis are punished by years of imprisonment.

The Dutch statement concluded by saying that the agreement of the Netherlands delegation to the resolution before the conference, a resolution which the Canadian delegation helped to frame, was given on condition that a clear distinction was made between drugs in general and cannabis.

Honourable senators, no people on earth have a better record for sanity, realism, and practical hard-headed common sense tempered by humanity and compassion than the Dutch people. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that they have been among the first to see through the sham, hypocrisy and inhumanity—these are strong words, and I use them deliberately; there are no other words to describe this situation—that have characterized society's approach to marijuana. The latest findings of impartial scientific and medical investigations, including those conducted in England a few weeks ago, show clearly that the use of marijuana is not addictive; it is not conducive to violence; it is not the prelude to hard drug addiction; in no way can it be considered so harmful to society as are amphetamines, barbiturates and a number of other drugs that any one of us can get in an Ottawa drug store this afternoon.

I want to finish my remarks by asking this question: Did the great drug companies that have manufactured and advertised methaqualone—that is the name they use in the United States; we have a different one here—as a sleeping pill know that it produces dependency; that mixed with alcohol its effects can be lethal; that its addictive qualities following abuse are so strong that withdrawal is frequently accompanied by convulsions, and are actually worse than those of heroin? Did they have to wait for other agencies to reveal that in the United States alone there have been numerous deaths from this form of drug addiction, and that at this moment there are thousands of young people, many of them in high school, and some of them not even in high school, hooked on this drug? And that is only one of the respectable drugs on which people are becoming hooked.

If the drug companies did not know that the drug had those properties, then they were guilty of pushing a drug without having tested it adequately. This, of course, is what they did in respect of thalidomide, to name only one. If they did know, or had reason to suspect, that this drug could produce such potentially lethal effects, there is little to choose between them and the heroin pusher in the street.

In the light of this, I ask you to consider this fact: Ten days ago a 21-year old Newfoundlander was given a seven-year sentence in the penitentiary for smuggling marijuana into Canada. He was lucky. Under the laws of Canada, the judge could have sentenced him to life imprisonment. As matters stand at the present time, our drug laws, or lack of them, do more damage to society than the diseases they are meant to cure.

In so far as marijuana is concerned, our laws are indefensible on moral, medical, and social grounds. In fact, in their injustice and inhumanity, they are doing infinite harm to our young people. I am not thinking only of Canadian young people, but young people generally in our society. Politicians admit this privately, religious leaders admit this privately, and the consensus of medical and scientific opinion has admitted it publicly. Why, then, do we perpetuate this situation?

Is it perhaps—and I do not know; I do not ask this rhetorically—that we are too much influenced on this problem, as on so many other matters, by our proximity to and intimate relationship with the United States. The very fact that so many of our drug companies in Canada, many of which were once independent Canadian companies, are now merely branches of the great American companies should give us cause for serious concern. Whatever the reason for our hesitancy and reluctance to revise our drug laws and our procedures for dealing with drug problems—and let me say I am not advocating the wholesale legalization of any particular drug—there was never a better time for Canada to assert its independence and its progressiveness, even if we go no further than have some of the smaller and, in my opinion, more enlightened countries of Europe.

Only today we have seen from the statements made by the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Canada's Minister of National Health and Welfare, that narcotics as such constitute only a small part of the drug problem in Canada. Evidence has been produced showing that many of the drugs being offered to the Canadian public contain impurities or adulterations, or, even more seriously, have not been properly and adequately tested.

In addition to these factors, there is the ever-increasing burden of the cost of these drugs, and drugs generally, to the Canadian people. In the light of all these factors perhaps, honourable senators, the time has come when this body should take the initiative in having an inquiry made into the whole matter of drugs in Canada—not an inquiry into just narcotic drugs, but an inquiry which would include an examination of the laws respecting drugs and narcotic drugs.

If there is sufficient senatorial interest in this suggestion I shall be very glad to bring in a formal resolution later.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS REFERRED TO THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS FOR CONSIDERATION

Hon. Mr. Macnaughton moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), that the Resolutions adopted by the Sixtieth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Rome, Italy, September 21 to 29, 1972, tabled this day, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs for consideration.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See page 334.)

REPORT TO THE SENATE ON THE 60TH CONFERENCE OF THE INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION, ROME, ITALY, SEPTEMBER 21 TO 29, 1972

BY SENATOR ALAN A. MACNAUGHTON

Honourable senators, in presenting this report on the 60th Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, which was held in Rome, Italy, September 21 to 29, 1972, I have several purposes in mind.

I should like to explain how and why this particular delegation was selected. I should like to explain what the Inter-Parliamentary Union is and how it operates. I should like to give an account of what your delegates accomplished at the conference and the position they took on various matters.

THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

Honourable senators will recall that the date fixed for the Canadian General election was October 30, 1972. As a consequence it was impractical for several members of the House of Commons, who had already been selected delegates, to take a trip to Rome and not risk being re-elected in their own constituencies. Honourable members of the Senate were then called upon to step in and fill the breach and take over on relatively short notice. As a consequence the Canadian delegation consisted of more senators than is usual.

The delegation participating in the Rome Conference was as follows: Mr. Gordon Aiken, M.P., leader of the delegation and member of the Inter-Parliamentary Council. Mr. Aiken, a long-time member of the other place was not a candidate for re-election. As a long-time member of the IPU and as a member of the Inter-Parliamentary Council of the IPU, it was right and proper that he lead the delegation to Rome. May I say right now that he did a superb job of leadership and organization and the successes that the Canadian delegation to Rome obtained were, in large part, due to his wisdom, experience and direction.

Having, myself, been a member of the other place for many years and having known Mr. Aiken for many years and his many contributions to debate in the other place, may I say that I regret that for health reasons he could not continue as a member of Parliament.

The Senate was represented by the Honourable Raymond Eudes, Q.C., the Honourable Jacques Flynn, P.C., Q.C., Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Senator Sarto Fournier, the Honourable Senator J. J. Greene, P.C., Q.C., the Honourable Senator F. W. Rowe, and myself as vice-chairman of the delegation and as member of the Inter-Parliamentary Council. The wives of these members came along to help us out.

The House of Commons was represented by Mr. Louis Comeau, M.P., the Honourable D. S. Harkness, P.C., M.P., and Mr. R. R. Southam, M.P. In the case of Mr. Comeau, he attended the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment in Stockholm in June, 1972, on behalf of the IPU. Both the Honourable Douglas Harkness and Mr. Southam, long-time members of the other place, decided not to contest their seats in the October election and consequently were available to be delegates and to tender their experience and counsel to the delegation.

I should, at this time, mention Miss Jean Macpherson the delegation's Deputy Executive Secretary-Treasurer and the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Bruno Lecci, from the Committee's Branch of the House of Commons. Mr. Alex Small, Second-Clerk Assistant and Director of Legislative Services of the other place, attended meetings of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliament, which took place during this conference.

I think a word of appreciation should be entered on the record, at this stage, of the work of our Inter-Parliamentary Relations Branch, which services the following organizations:

The Inter-Parliamentary Union—IPU

The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association—CPA

NATO

Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group

Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Group

Association Internationale des Parlementaires de Langue Française—AIPLF.

SIX IN ALL

When I had something to do with these matters in the other place, we decided that instead of spreading ourselves far, wide and handsome, these various associations should be placed under a central administrative center so that all members of Parliament and senators would have the opportunity of sharing the activities and becoming members of delegations, that proper research and administrative facilities would be provided on a yearly basis, so that Canada's image abroad could rely on maximum effort and maximum contribution.

Prior to the delegation leaving for Rome, the Parliamentary Center for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade arranged for intensive briefings. Mr. Peter Dobell of the above organization was largely responsible for the very intensive and worth-while briefings given by top representatives of External Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Health and Welfare, Defence, Finance, Energy and the Department of the Environment. I am sure you would want me to express your thanks and appreciation to these unheralded and worthy experts, who year after year are responsible for the proper briefing of members of both houses.

THE INAUGURAL CEREMONY

The inaugural ceremony was held in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, where some 710 delegates, including 526 members of Parliaments from 64 countries assembled to hear welcoming speeches from the President of the Italian Republic, the President of the Senate, the President of the Chamber of Deputies and the President of the Council of Ministers. It was no mere coincidence that it was in the city of Rome the conference was held, a city whose "Senate and People" had in times past contributed to forming the supremacy of law and rights and the permanency of institutionally organized assemblies, the same principles invoked by the Inter-Parliamentary Union. An appeal was made to reaffirm these principles of law, disrespect for which make international relations impossible.

Now I would like to list the subjects which were up for discussion and which were in turn allocated to one or two members of the delegation. These subjects were:

1. A general debate, including the situation in the Middle East and new forms of political pressure in international affairs. The leader of the delegation, Mr. Gordon Aiken took this matter under his wing.
2. The Need to Intensify Efforts to Put an End to the Arms Race, with regard to all types of weapons in view of its political, economic and social consequences. Senator Flynn handled this matter efficiently and tactfully.
3. Problems of the Human Environment. Mr. Louis Comeau, M.P. and myself were given this responsibility.
4. Status and Prospects of Education in Developing Countries with Particular Reference to the Training of Middle and High Level Technical Personnel. The Honourable Douglas Harkness was in charge here.
5. The Fight Against Drug Abuse—International System of Control—Suppression of Illicit Traffic, Prevention Treatment and Social Rehabilitation. Senator Rowe took this on.
6. Responsibilities of Members of Parliament Towards the Electorate. Mr. Southam, M.P. dealt with this matter.

Honourable Senators Eudes, Fournier and Greene, while assisting in the preparation of the above items, had special responsibilities with regard to attending all plenary and general sessions, committee meetings, along with the many social duties carried on in the evenings, which conferences of this sort entail.

Honourable senators, I remember some few years ago the Honourable Senator Grosart rising and asking some honourable senator, who at the time was making a report on an association meeting, to give this house details as to what the delegation accomplished and how its time was spent. This, I think, is a very proper and useful request. In consequence, I would like to explain what the IPU is and later on what the delegation tried to accomplish.

THE IPU

First a short note with regard to the history of the organization. The origins of the Union date back to 1889, when on the initiative of the United Kingdom and of France, it was decided to hold periodically an "Inter-Parliamentary Conference of international arbitration." The movement developed rapidly and by 1894 a permanent organization had been set up under the name of "Inter-Parliamentary Unions" with its own statutes and secretariat.

Since then, and although two world wars caused a temporary interrruption of activities, the continuity of the Union's existence has been maintained, its membership and field of work expanded and its methods adapted to changing circumstances.

Canada re-affiliated in 1960.

WHAT ARE THE OBJECTIVES OF THE IPU?

Article 1 of the Statutes lays down that the aim of the Inter-Parliamentary Union is:

> "to promote personal contacts between members of all Parliaments, constituted into National Groups, and to unite them in common action to secure and maintain the full participation of their respective States in the firm establishment and development of representative institutions and in the advancement of the work of international peace and cooperation, particularly by supporting the objectives of the United Nations. With this object in view, the Inter-Parliamentary Union will also study and seek solutions for all questions of an international character suitable for settlement by parliamentary action and shall make suggestions for the development of parliamentary institutions. With a view to improving the working of those institutions and increasing their prestige."

In 1971, the Union concluded a headquarters agreement with the Swiss Federal Council. Its juridical capacity and international status are recognized in Switzerland.

WHAT IS ITS STRUCTURE?

The Union is the only world-wide organization for Parliaments. It is composed of national groups which must be established "in a Parliament constituted in conformity with the laws of a sovereign state of which it represents the population and on the territory of which it functions."

HOW DOES THE IPU EXPRESS ITSELF?

The organs of the Union are:

a) The Inter-Parliamentary Conference which meets once a year.

b) The Inter-Parliamentary Council, composed of two members from each affiliated Group.

c) Standing Study Committees. There are at present five:

The Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament;

The Parliamentary and Juridical Committee;

The Economic and Social Committee;

The Educational, Scientific and Cultural Committee;

The Committee on Non-Selfgoverning Territories and Ethnic Questions.

d) The Inter-Parliamentary Bureau, which is the Secretariat of the Organization and the operational mechanism for implementing the Union's programmes of activities.

In addition, the Association of Secretaries General of Parliaments, constituted as an autonomous section of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, seeks to facilitate personal contacts between the Clerks of Parliaments, whether such assemblies are represented in the Union or not. The association studies the procedure, practice and working methods of different Parliaments and proposes measures for improving those methods and for securing co-operation between the services of different Parliaments.

Membership as at January, 1973, consisted of 72 countries. The Union's budget for 1973 amounts to Swiss francs 1,534,000 and is met by contributions from national groups.

WHAT ARE THE ACTIVITIES OF THE IPU?

The Union's work is essentially carried out in two field, action for peace and the strengthening of parliamentary institutions; in order to fulfil the second of these tasks, the Inter-Parliamentary Bureau has a specialized department: The International Centre for Parliamentary Documentation (CIPD), which organizes symposia enabling different points of view to be discussed. The International Centre for Parliamentary Documentation also carries out studies and publishes special works on parliamentary matters, maintains a complete library on the life of legislative assemblies, renders technical assistance to the assemblies of developing countries to help them improve the qualifications of their staff and their working methods.

The activities of the Union take the following forms: International meetings, such as conferences which bring together M.P.s representing different countries. It holds two regular sessions each year: the first, which takes place in the spring, is primarily devoted to the work of the Inter-Parliamentary Council and the Standing Study Committees and, in general prepares the work of the second session, the Inter-Parliamentary Conference, which is held in a different country each autumn. Recent conferences have been held in Teheran (1966), Lima (1968), New Delhi (1969), The Hague (1970), Paris (1971) and Rome (1972).

Various publications are issued by the IPU such as extensive reports of the proceedings of the different IPU conferences, parliamentary studies, parliamentary reference books with respect to the structure and functioning of representative institutions in 55 countries. The Inter-Parliamentary Union has consultative status category 1 with the United Nations Economic and Social Council. It has concluded consultative agreements with UNESCO and maintains contacts with other specialized agencies of the United Nations. It has also close relations with various regional parliamentary organizations.

From this rather long analysis of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, honourable senators will appreciate how important it is that Canadian delegations going to these international conferences be fully briefed and aware of the great opportunity to meet other parliamentarians of wisdom, capacity and influence.

HIS HOLINESS POPE PAUL VI

Before dealing with Canadian participation in conference proceedings, I should like to refer to two speeches the delegates were privileged to listen to. On the morning of Saturday, June 23, His Holiness Pope Paul VI received the delegates in special audience at the Vatican. Speaking in French, Paul VI thanked the delegates for testifying by their visit to the action of the Apostolic Seat and the Catholic Church in favour of world peace, and offered some personal reflections concerning political action whose basic aim he defined as the implementation of the common good. He congratulated the members of Parliament on seeking to attain this goal through an international organization, thus manifesting their awareness of the link between the common good of one nation and its fulfilment at the world level.

Did this mean, asked the Holy Father, that the very nature of the parliamentary function should be reconsidered? Was it not to be seen, in fact, in liberal democracies, that the people were placing increasing confidence in intermediary bodies, such as trade unions, professional organizations, various associations, that were closer to their daily interests and worries? Outdistanced by technical progress, was Parliament no longer able—for lack of competency and rapidity of reaction—to intervene effectively, thus allowing the executive power to extend, sometimes abusively, its field of intervention to an increasingly broad range of subjects, simply because the executive had surrounded itself with technical experts and modern means of action?

After stressing the salutary role of Parliament in safeguarding democracy and as a guarantee of political balance in the face of the frequently growing power of the executive, the Holy Father enumerated the remedies to this situation suggested by this exceptional meeting with the elected representatives of so many of the world's nations. He defined the double aspiration to equality and to participation as "two forms of the dignity of man and of his freedom." Parliament must, therefore, he said, win recognition from the government and public opinion through the weight of its knowledge and debates. To that end, it was more than ever necessary to seek a high level of collective and individual morality, the awareness of a common responsibility with regard to the future of the nation, the will to reach a national consensus. The member of Parliament, he insisted, must appear as the artisan of the good of all and not as the spokesman of a clientele and must, therefore, resist all forms of pressure. In addition, the rights of the opposition should be recognized, in the limits of what is just and honest, so that it should not need to have recourse to secret means which often had harmful results.

The Holy Father expressed his conviction that "Parliaments have still an important role today. They are, in fact, the only place where group conflicts can be solved by law, and a just law, if it is correctly conceived and applied."

MR. KURT WALDHEIM—SECRETARY GENERAL OF U.N.

Another message from the Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Kurt Waldheim, said in part "many of the subjects that you will discuss in Rome will also be on the assembly's agenda in New York. Parliamentary debate is a vital part of the process of generating the support and guidance which government must have if they are successfully to face the many and bewildering problems and challenges of our time. Although the United Nations charter speaks for 'We the People of the United Nations,' our organization is in fact an association of the sovereign governments, and it has the limitations as well as the advantages of such an association.

One of the differences between your conference and the General Assembly of the United Nations is that you have much will to act but perhaps not always sufficient power to do so, while the governments in the United Nations have the power to act but often lack the collective will to do so."

SOCIAL PROGRAM

At this time I should like to make short reference to the social program. It doesn't take a genius to point out the great value of social contacts and the opportunity of meeting your opposite number from 72 different countries around the world. Here a chance is given to persuade others to your country's point of view, to learn of different viewpoints and attitudes and to try to reach compromises where necessary in the general good.

The Italian group arranged an interesting programme of social events which enabled participants to visit historic palaces and art galleries which would not otherwise be open to them. Few places in the world can compare with the historic significance and the magnificance of the different buidlings in Rome where dinners and receptions were given. The President of the Italian Republic, the President of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Senate, the Prime Minister, in turn entertained the delegates at Castel Sant'Angelo, Palazzo de Quirinale, Palazzo dei Conservatori in Campidoglio and Palazzo Venezia. The latter was Mussolini's palace, and many of the delegates stood on the balcony from which he used to address the crowds in the square below.

The embassies of the different nations entertained extensively and a very special vote of thanks should be tendered to Ambassador Rogers, of Canada, for his attention and assistance to us during the conference.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE PROCEEDINGS

1. The Middle East: The conference opened with a general debate on the political, economic and social situation of the world, the situation in the Middle East and new forms of political pressure in international affairs.

In his address during this debate, Mr. Aiken said that with the positive action to organize the parliamentary conference on European Co-operation and Security, the Inter-Parliamentary Union was beginning to make its influence felt beyond the organization itself, which was a new and useful surge forward.

By 459 votes to 51, with 188 abstentions, the conference adopted a resolution on the situation in the Middle East in which, among other things, while deploring the escalation of aggression and acts of violence, it reaffirmed its support for the rapid achievement for a just and lasting peace.

2. Problems of the Human Environment: I hope honourable senators will recall my general interest in environmental matters and permit me to explain in some detail the stand we took in Rome. Coming only two months after the Stockholm conference, environmental problems were very much in the limelight. It provided a great opportunity to press on with Canada's position.

The draft resolution dealing with problems of the human environment was a comprehensive one, touching on many areas of activity and it provided an excellent summary of the kind of measures which should be recommended to governments. For example, it spoke of the need to recognize that the atmosphere and the oceans are the common heritage of all mankind and that their quality is being seriously impaired by the effects of industrialization and the accidental or deliberate discharge of wastes.

Again it is important to recognize that development is essential to the elimination of poverty in the developing nations. Further, that the use of the world's resources by the developed nations has increased many times during the past decades and that the demand may overwhelm the supply in the case of some resources. Or, again, the importance of maintaining and preserving the natural resources of the earth, including the air, water, land flora and fauna, and especially representative samples of natural ecosystems.

It is important to stress the fact that urbanization has reached alarming dimensions that are detrimental to the quality of human life and that the situation is continuing to deteriorate, and also the need for governments and the mass media to provide citizens in their respective countries with information on all aspects of environmental management.

One must take note of the environmental threat posed by the stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction and, lastly, one should be aware of the important role of the Inter-Parliamentary Groups in contributing to the implementation of international juridical instruments.

Consequently, the IPU should call upon the Inter-Parliamentary Groups to take action within their respective parliaments for the speedy ratification following their approval by the 27th Session of the United Nations General Assembly and the relevant bodies of international agencies, all the conventions proposed by the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment, and keep the Bureau informed of the action taken and the results obtained.

It surely is evident that this resolution covered many of the problems of the human environment. Why then did Canada propose amendments? I think it is important to understand the Canadian position. Of the many countries in the world, Canada is amongst the forefront in enacting and making new environmental law. This did not happen by sheer accident. Due to our position on the North American continent and our great neighbour, the U.S.A., to the south, we have been for the last fifty years or more in the process of adjusting claims and grievances either with the U.S.A. or against the U.S.A. For example, let me cite the Trail Smelter case in which Canada paid compensation for the spoiling of certain countryside in the United States due to the result of smoke emanations from the Trail smelter. Or again refer to the Gut Dam case, which had to do with the raising of the water level and on which, after arbitration between the two countries, Canada paid certain damages. Then again the Test Ban Treaty in which we tried to prevent testing in the air. And I refer to the Boundary Waters Treaty with the U.S.A. and the Great Lakes Agreement, all of which meant a breakthrough in either arbitration or settling disputes by agreement with the payment of damages and accepting responsibility for one's own acts.

Over the years we have gradually come to the conclusion that "Thou shalt not pollute and if you do you should pay the price." The second principle to be derived from this is the duty to consult before you take actions that will harm your neighbour.

Now, the draft resolution which was presented to us in Rome was, in effect, pretty much a repetition of some of the principles in the Stockholm Declaration, with specific recommendations to the parliamentarians for follow-up action with their respective governments. I have referred to these. There was, however, one glaring omission in the said resolution, namely, the principle on state responsibility. In point of fact the legal principles in the Stockholm Declaration with respect to principles 21 and 22 of the said Declaration do not appear at all. Consequently the Canadian delegation proposed an amendment in the following words:

That the following two paragraphs should be added as a new Section A:

"Recognizing that states have the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction,

Urges the National Inter-Parliamentary Groups to encourage their respective parliaments and governments to take measures both on the national and international level to develop further international environmental law as well as procedures and arrangements for the peaceful settlement of disputes involving environmental problems;"

The Finnish group then came to the Canadian group and said that they wished to support and associate themselves with the Canadian amendment. In order to accommodate our Finnish friends inasmuch as their proposed amendment more or less carried out the same idea, we agreed to replace the second paragraph of our suggested amendment with the Finnish amendment, which reads—

1. Calls upon the Inter-Parliamentary Groups to take steps to initiate regional cooperation between national governments in order to avoid further deterioration of the environment in specific regions;

Canada, at Stockholm, proposed this great principle on State responsibility. Canada reintroduced this principle of State responsibility into the draft resolution in Rome and this has now been accepted by the Inter-Parliamentary Union. There is very little international environmental law and there is an urgent need to press forward with the development of such law. This was the purpose and the accomplishment of our amendment, which has been accepted.

The Stockholm conference laid down a number of legal principles, some of them applicable particularly to the marine environment. Canada has a particular interest in the law of the sea, with an Atlantic coast, an Arctic coast and a Pacific coast. We are one of the great shoreline maritime countries in the world. Our difficulty today is how to work out an accommodation between coastal states and flag states. None of these difficulties were reflected in the draft resolution and it is Canada's objective to reflect the Canadian position as to:

a) The viability of the concept, or

b) The need to modify it.

I refer in particular to the freedom of the high seas concept. The Canadian position is that freedom of the seas is now license to exploit; for example, massive oil tankers would appear to have a license to pollute. Where does responsibility lie for pollution? Should there be an unregulated freedom of the seas with regard to fishing and/or overfishing, with regard to movement of ships and possible pollution. Isn't it possible for treaties to assign new rights to nations who have a particular interest in protecting their coasts against pollution? The Canadian position which is slowly being advanced is: give jurisdiction to the local state, the local coastal state—not necessarily the sovereignty of the seas beyond its coast. The question is not an easy one to decide between the conflicting viewpoints, but Canada proposed useful amendments with regard to the oceans by inserting the words "beyond national jurisdiction," and with regard to the high seas by inserting the words "and seabed beyond national jurisdiction."

These proposed amendments would bring our resolution into line with those which have been passed in the United Nations and would avoid raising any difficult jurisdictional issues which must be left to the Law of the Sea Conference to resolve.

There were two other matters in the draft resolution upon which I should like to comment briefly. The first relates to the elimination of poverty in developing nations but it seems to ignore the preoccupations of developing countries as to who pays.

The implication is clear. Donor countries and agencies must recognize that environmental problems of the developing countries are vast in scope and potentially so critical that they constitute strong reasons for an increased flow of financial and technical assistance to the third world. Canada explained this view at the Stockholm Conference. We announced our intention to play our part in achieving a more rapid rate of resource transfer to the developing countries and called on other donors to do the same.

It should be realized that this more rapid increase in aid flows can be achieved within the existing international targets of the International Development Strategy of the Second Development Decade. These targets are 0.7 per cent of gross national product for official development assistance. At present all donors together provide only about half that amount, or 0.35 per cent.

The second matter refers to use of the world's resources and the new patterns and techniques that could hinder the development process of the developing nations or their trade. This raises the issue of the trade losses which developing countries could, and probably will, experience in consequence of measures by developed countries to protect their environments. Developed countries should be prepared to offer, in case of trade dislocation, compensatory trade arrangements under GATT and other bilateral and multilateral agreements. They should also be prepared to provide more aid to help strengthen developing countries' capacities continuously to adapt their production and trade to the constantly evolving pattern of world trade. At Stockholm, Canada worked hard to try and reach a compromise between developed and developing countries which would help developing countries which may suffer losses of access to markets. Canada, through its bilateral aid programme, has for several years assisted developing countries to preserve and improve their renewable resources, especially forests and fisheries and soils, and to manage them efficiently.

In 1972 at Stockholm, Canada offered $7.5 million to help set up a new environmental fund and secretariat. In 1973 Canada looks forward to participating in the Conference on the Law of the Sea. In 1975 Canada will act as host to the Conference on Human Settlements. In 1977 Canada has offered to host the second United Nations Conference on the Human Environment.

We believe that Stockholm was a successful first step and Canada will continue to do its duty to the International Community.

Following the presentation of my views, it then became Mr. Louis Comeau's turn to make his remarks on the same matter. It should be recalled that Mr. Louis Comeau had been appointed by the IPU last year, one of four delegates sent by the IPU to the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment at Stockholm in June, 1972, and as a consequence he had, along with the other members, made a complete report to the council. Consequently, in his remarks Mr. Comeau expressed his disappointment that the IPU delegation attending the Stockholm conference had been present only as observers and said that Parliaments aught to be heard more at the United Nations and that wider recognition ought to be given to the work of the IPU. He pointed out that, after all, the Stockholm resolutions would have to be ratified by the Parliaments.

Problems of the human environment differed from country to country and each country had to decide its own priorities and its own actions. Nevertheless, this was a subject in which it ought to be possible to reach agreement on regional co-operation between national governments in order to avoid further deterioration of the environment in specific regions. The Finnish and Canadian groups had submitted an amendment to this effect.

The fact that Iceland wished to take unilateral action to extend her fishing limits showed that it had not been possible to reach agreement on this subject in the Conference of the Law of the Sea. Several other countries had been frustrated by an inability to reach agreement at the international level, and Mr. Comeau urged development of international environmental law and procedures for the peaceful settlement of the disputes which involved environmental problems.

The Bulgarian group tabled a motion to the effect that the resolution be referred to a subcommittee at the 1973 spring meeting, so that delegations of those countries which had not attended the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment in Stockholm might have time to study the findings of that conference and thus contribute better to the solution of the environmental problems. This, I am glad to say, was rejected by 144 votes in favour and 368 against, with 80 abstentions.

After the plenary debate on the environmental questions, I was asked to be a member of a nine-man drafting committee charged with the responsibility of studying the amendments which were being submitted and to bring before the conference a revised draft resolution. I refused to accept the chairmanship of this drafting committee and suggested instead that a Finnish member of Parliament become chairman, which was done. I am happy to report that we were successful in having all the important aspects of the Canadian amendments incorporated in the resolution adopted by the conference.

END THE ARMS RACE

Senator Flynn, speaking during the general debate on the Need to Intensify Efforts to Put an End to the Arms Race with Regard to All Types of Weapons, in View of its Political, Economic and Social Consequence, criticized the draft resolution because it tended to confuse the issue and seemed to suggest that the main purposes of states in seeking disarmament was based on reasons which he thought were merely secondary reasons.

He said that it must be borne in mind, in determining what could be done at each stage, that the resistance to disarmament arose because of the nuclear danger and the fact that each country gave priority to its own security. The fact that the important thing was the security of each country did not emerge in the draft resolution. Consequently, it was important to devise a means of insuring security without the use of weapons. There could be a move toward disarmament only if all people were to accept the idea of abandoning part of their national sovereignty under a supra-national authority capable of giving effect to its decisions.

The conference unanimously supported the activities of the United Nations in this field and called upon parliaments to increase efforts for the ratification of existing international instruments, for the preparation of a draft convention on the complete prohibition of chemical weapons and for the finding of a solution to disarmament problems in the context of a world disarmament conference.

FIGHT AGAINST DRUG ABUSE

During the plenary debate, Senator Rowe said that confusion and uncertainty had existed in the minds of many young people because responsible authorities had continued to equate the use of a soft drug, such as marijuana, with the use of a potential killer drug, such as heroin. Unfounded predictions about the use of marijuana, which millions of students had discovered from personal experience to have no basis in reality had led young people to project the marijuana results to the use of other, more harmful drugs, where such predictions and warnings were fully justified. He said that his experiences with young people had led him to conclude that the casual and nonchalant attitude which some of them displayed towards LSD, heroin and other hard drugs resulted from the unreliability of the advice which they had received in respect to marijuana. He concluded by saying that any approach to the drug problem based on ignorance, prejudice or irrational emotional reactions could only strengthen the hands of the predators.

Canada submitted amendments to the original draft resolution, and Mr. Aiken was a member of the 12-man drafting committee which produced the resolution adopted by the conference by a vote of 591 in favour, 5 against, with 73 abstentions. The text of the resolution appeals to parliaments to support the efforts of the United Nations in this field (contributions to the special fund for drug abuse, ratification of international conventions, etc.), to take appropriate measures at the national level which will limit the illicit cultivation of plants yielding dependence-producing substances; attack the illicit manufacture and traffic of harmful drugs; promote welfare programs, particularly for young people; advance international co-operation for detecting illicit drug and further scientific research in the socio-medical field and to enact legislation providing for very heavy penalties on persons convicted of trafficking in drugs.

EDUCATION IN DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Mr. Harkness, in his remarks during the plenary debate on the Status and Prospects of Education in the Developing Countries, with particular reference to the training of middle and high level technical personnel, said that he thought the most effective aid to a developing country was that given to education, particularly technical education. He strongly supported the paragraph of the draft resolution which referred to the importance of nationals in developing countries being trained to take over development projects. Canada's objective in aid to developing countries had always been that native personnel should take over the project as rapidly as possible.

He said a constantly increasing portion of people from developing countries were being given technical training abroad but he said that one great weakness had been that many of them did not return to their own native countries to employ their skills. The whole purpose of the exercise had thus been defeated. He suggested that bilateral agreements should be reached between developed countries and those receiving aid to ensure that, once trained, the personnel returned home to contribute to the development of their own country.

The conference also unanimously adopted a resolution on Modern Forms of Vocational Training in Relation to Employment, in which it formulated detailed recommendations on the various aspects of the problem (training of young people, retraining of adults, adaption of programs to current and future needs, training of handicapped persons, etc.).

RESPONSIBILITIES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT TOWARDS THE ELECTORATE

The conference held very detailed discussions on the Responsibilities of Members of Parliament towards the Electorate, which brought to light the differing conceptions of the problem in the various countries represented in the Union.

During the plenary discussion of this subject, Mr. Southam said that every legislator could decide for himself whether his first loyalty belonged to his constituency, to his party, to his country or to his own conscience. The choice was not always easy. A member was usually elected on behalf of a political party with a certain program. But sometimes the interests of the member and the interests of the party might be at variance, such as when a member's constituents disagreed with a certain policy. The member might have his own views on the subject.

He said that a parliamentarian who lived a great distance from the capital, and where it was difficult to travel great distances regularly while parliament was in session, should cultivate close contact with the press, radio and television so that he could report regularly week by week the issues under debate in parliament and what his stand would be when a vote was taken.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY COUNCIL

The Inter-Parliamentary Council met on September 20 and 29 and Mr. Aiken and I attended. The German Democratic Republic took their seats in the council. The request for affiliation by the Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea was not accepted. Their request to join was referred to the 1973 spring meeting in Abidjan. The council decided to admit the Inter-Parliamentary Group constituted in Dacca by the Constituent Assembly of Bangla Desh. The council also decided that the spring meeting for 1973 would be held in Abidjan, the Ivory Coast; the 61st Inter-Parliamentary Conference, in Santiago, Chile, in 1973, and the 62nd Inter-Parliamentary Conference, in Tokyo, Japan, in 1974. The 63rd conference is to be held in London in 1975.

Finally, since legislative elections were to be held in the Federal Republic of Germany on November 19, 1972, the council decided to postpone the Inter-Parliamentary Conference on European Co-operation and Security to be held in Helsinki, Finland, until January 26 to 31, 1973.

Honourable senators, I have included extracts from the speeches of our different delegates in connection with the different items on the agenda because they contain many new and worthwhile ideas and because they serve to explain the purpose of the draft resolutions which were subsequently passed and which we, from Canada, endorsed.

Canada, as a group member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, sends delegates who play their parts in formulating these resolutions and voting for their adoption. Article 7 of the statutes and rules of the IPU provides:

> It is the duty of a national group to keep its Parliament informed, through its committee or through one of its members, of resolutions adopted at the conferences which call for parliamentary or governmental action and, not later than one month before the next following annual conference, to report to the Bureau of the Inter-Parliamentary Union as to the action taken thereon.

May I suggest to you, therefore, that if the Canadian group is going to live up to its membership commitment, follow-up action should be taken on the resolutions that its delegates adopt at Union meetings.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY 60TH CONFERENCE OF THE INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION, ROME, ITALY, SEPTEMBER 21 TO 29, 1972

I

NEED TO INTENSIFY EFFORTS TO PUT AN END TO THE ARMS RACE WITH REGARD TO ALL TYPES OF WEAPONS, IN VIEW OF ITS POLITICAL, ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL CONSEQUENCES

The 60th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Noting that the constantly accelerating armaments race, in particular nuclear armaments, is causing an enormous waste of human and other resources,

Expressing grave concern in connection with increasing world arms arsenals, both in the field of nuclear and of conventional weapons,

Recognizing that the effectiveness of UN action in removing threats to peace and suppressing acts of aggression renders possible the undertaking of progressive measures towards disarmament,

Believing that the diversion of enormous resources and energy, human and material, from peaceful economic and social pursuits to an unproductive arms race places a great burden on both the developing and the developed countries, and leads to international complications,

Convinced that the implementation of disarmament measures could release considerable resources which should promote economic and social development, and would increase the possibilities of providing additional resources to the developing countries,

Expressing satisfaction that the international community has been able to achieve some agreement in the field of disarmament,

Considering that, in the contemporary world which is becoming increasingly interconnected, the destructive force of modern weapons implies participation by all countries in the search for solutions to disarmament problems,

Realizing that Parliaments should continue to make efforts for the adoption of efficient disarmament measures and for the achievement of concrete progress towards general and complete disarmament under effective international control, in the interest of all countries and in the belief that this is the most important task facing mankind today,

Welcoming Resolutions 2667 (XXV) and 2831 (XXVI) of the United Nations General Assembly,

1. Calls upon Parliaments in all countries of the world to intensify their efforts against the arms race and in favour of disarmament, to work for the banning of nuclear, chemical and bacteriological weapons, for the ending of nuclear-weapons tests, including underground tests, by everyone everywhere, for the setting up of nuclear-free zones in various regions of the world, where favourable conditions prevail, for the reduction of armed forces and armaments, and for the universal reduction of military expenditure, especially that of big States;

2. Expresses confidence that the success of these efforts could be promoted by the speediest coming into force of the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction and by the speedy preparation of a draft convention on the complete prohibition of chemical weapons;

3. Calls upon all Parliaments to see that the obligations arising from the Agreements already accepted on the limitation of the arms race are respected;

4. Enthusiastically approves the decision taken by the XXVIth session of the UN General Assembly with reference to the convocation of a world disarmament conference, open to all States, and calls upon Parliaments in all countries of the world actively to promote its preparation in accordance with that decision.

II

SITUATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST

The 60th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Expressing its deep concern over the situation in the Middle East which continues to represent a threat to world peace,

Deploring the escalation of aggression and acts of violence which make increasingly numerous victims and have the effect of hindering efforts for peace,

Recalling previous appeals by the Inter-Parliamentary Union for a peaceful, just and lasting settlement in the Middle East,

Mindful of the Resolutions adopted by the United Nations on this subject, and especially those adopted by the Security Council, in particular Resolution 242 of November 22, 1967,

Re-emphasizing the importance of respecting the rights of the peoples concerned in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

1. Reaffirms its support for the rapid achievement of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East pursuant to UN Security Council Resolution 242 of November 22, 1967;

2. Urges all the parties concerned to co-operate with the United Nations and the Secretary-General's representative to promote agreement and assist efforts to achieve a peaceful and accepted settlement which would take into account the well-being and the legitimate interests of all peoples concerned;

3. Expresses the hope that a rapid solution of the problem will be forthcoming so that the armed conflict will not be resumed.

III

NEW FORMS OF POLITICAL PRESSURE IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

The 60th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Gravely concerned at the increasing number of new forms of political pressure, such as acts of violence committed by Governments or individuals resulting in injuries to and the death of innocent persons and the exacerbation of international relations; acts of unlawful interference which cause serious security problems, endanger lives and jeopardize the freedom of air travel; acts of violence committed against diplomats and foreign officials entitled, in conformity with international law, to benefit from special protection; acts of hijacking; and reprisals against populations and innocent persons,

Recalling the relevant Resolutions adopted by the UN General Assembly and Security Council and by the International Civil Aviation Organization,

Recalling, in particular, the Resolution adopted by the 58th Inter-Parliamentary Conference on hijacking,

Appeals to the Parliaments of all nations to exert influence on their respective Governments:

1. To ratify as quickly as possible the Tokyo, Hague and Montreal Conventions against hijacking and to give serious consideration to further measures to the same end;

2. To support urgent consideration, in the UN General Assembly, of the draft articles prepared by the International Law Commission on the protection of diplomatic agents and other persons entitled to special protection under international law;

3. To support the convening of a conference on the adoption of a Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of International Terrorist Acts such as murder, kidnapping, blackmail, extortion, hijacking and sabotage;

4. To take all appropriate measures within their jurisdiction to deter and prevent hijacking, terrorism and kidnapping, including measures to deal with those who commit such acts;

5. To fulfil, in particular, the duty States have undertaken under the UN Charter to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in acts of civil strife or terrorist acts or reprisals against populations or innocent persons in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within their own territory directed towards the commission of such acts;

6. to pursue efforts to study and eliminate the causes of violence and to find solutions to social, economic and political problems which may be used as a pretext for the above-mentioned acts;

Nothing in this Resolution shall be interpreted as affecting the right of peoples under colonial domination or under foreign occupation to struggle for their liberation according to international law.

IV

THE FIGHT AGAINST DRUG ABUSE: INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM OF CONTROL; SUPPRESSION OF ILLICIT TRAFFIC; PREVENTION, TREATMENT AND SOCIAL REHABILITATION

The 60th Inter-Parliamentary Conference,

Recognizing the epidemic proportions which the abuse of drugs and psychotropic substances (dependence-producing substances) has assumed in the international community,

Recognizing also the destructive effect of drugs on the youth of many countries, the broken homes and destroyed lives, the deaths, the physical and mental suffering, as well as the social and individual loss caused by the abuse of dependence-producing substances,

Recognizing that the problem of the abuse of dependence-producing substances is international in scope and demands that national measures be supplemented by international co-operation in order to achieve international solutions,

Recognizing that the international problem of the abuse of dependence-producing substances must be attacked within each affected nation at the levels of cultivation, manufacture, traffic and sale of these substances, as well as at the consumer level,

Recognizing that significant steps, both on the national and international levels, have already been taken to deal with the abuse of dependence-producing substances, but that an increased international commitment and more complete international co-operation are necessary to solve this problem,

1. Appeals to the Parliaments of all nations to exert influence on their respective Governments so that they:

(a) Contribute to the United Nations Drug Abuse Control Fund on a continuing basis;

(b) Ratify the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, signed at Vienna on February 21, 1971, and the Amending Protocol to the Single Convention (New York, 1961) so that these two agreements may enter into force at the earliest possible date;

(c) Apply the significant measures which have already been taken by various nations and international organizations in dealing with the international drug problem;

(d) Take appropriate measures which will:
