The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol → (meaning "CON-TINUED"), or the symbol ♥ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la natteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole → signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ▼ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Such is that affertion, that in your tribunals is your great fecurity; that your right of fuffrage is the real bulwark of the conflictution. # REMARKS,

&c.

My dear Friend,

AMONG the remarkable events of this productive period, few are more fingular than the retreat of the New Whigs from their flation in Parliament.

The reasons affigned for this fecefion are, at leaft, original. They do not confole us with hopes, that the veffel of the ftate is left to perfue her course under more able guidance. They do not urge pass labours in exemption of future fatigue; they do not entreat a condonation of their fervices in mercy to a frail constitution, worn down, pass cure, by the anxious discharge of public duties. Their justification is far, very far different. They are eager to proclaim and magnify our perilous fituation. They paint with all the ftrong colours of rhetoric, those miseries in which their country is fhrouded and envelloped. Defeat and difgrace abroad—corruption and discontent at home—an abandoned ministry—an inefficient legillature—Ireland forced into acts of Rebellion by a tyrannous government—Great Britain bankrupt in resources, undone with taxes, yet superinely tolerative of a cabinet, in whose hands neither victory nor supplication can procure the bleflings of peace.

Such is the matter of that melancholy dirge, which opposition fung as it calmly arrayed the ceremonies of its own diffolution. Having chanted these funereal notes, it voluntarily lies down to die, in hopes, that Phœnix-like, a new and more glorious bird will spread his purple wings to the fun, as he rifes from the assorid the felf-devoted parent.

This event was announced to the country during the last feffion, while a motion for a Reform in Parliament was under debate. They declared that our representative fystem is effete, rotten, and inadequate to the functions of a free government; that the fentiments of the country have no weight in the Commons House of Parliament; ger to uation. of rheountry nd difent at fficient bellion Britain es, yet hands ure the dirge, red the Having ily lies a new purple fhes of

ry du-Reform declarte, rota free counoufe of ument; Parliament; all conftitutional controul is funk, and fwallowed up in ministerial influence. The measures of a profligate administration are voted in a mood of rash and unmerited confidence, while the falutary counsels of upright states are are rejected with disdain.

I know, my dear Sir, that you will agree with me, that this is a falfe, and wicked account of our internal government: you have already faid that it is an uncommon ftep taken by the party at a very uncommon period.

The tyrants of France have refufed us peace. Envious of our profperity they have planned an invation of the empire. They have proclaimed it as their fixed defign to overturn our conflitution, to wreft from us the dominion of the feas, to annihilate our commerce, to riot in the plunder of a peaceful country, and an industrious people. Republican armies already look to a division of our spoils. Their republican rulers already count upon the triumphs of conquest, and audaciously hypothecate our wealth in payment of those loans which they make to subdue us.

Thefe are the genuine fources of our prefent danger. It is the boundlefs ambition and animofity of France, the general and infatuated blindnefs of B 2 Europe, Europe, and the reftlefs fpirit of a republican faction among us, which render our fituation truly But even if we could add to thefe calacritical. mities the much greater misfortune of a corrupt and inefficient government at home, upon what principle is it that the accumulated wretchednefs of the country is to juftify the New Whigs in feceding from their parliamentary duties? It may be venial to indulge in the mild and ftable pleafures of fecluded life, during a feafon of public tranquility. But when the fafety of the commonwealth is placed in doubt and hazard, a patriot flatefman is left without alternative or choice. He is fummoned by an imperious duty to the awful, but grateful task of administering relief to her wants, of appealing her troubles, and healing her wounds. The heart of an honeft man grapples to his country with a tenacity proportioned to her danger. He has no time, no affections, no passions, no powers of body, no energies of mind, which he does not confecrate to her defence and refcue. He cannot, like the new Whigs, retire to fleep in peace, lulled by the ftorm which burfts upon his country, and defolates Europe. He is not betrayed into indolence by hopes, but he is utterly incapable of defpair. Difcomfited, difgraced, baffled, difappointed, ejected from the very bofom of his country, still the divine impulse will not fuffer him to reft. His refources, his plans, his exertions, his enterprizes are are inexhaustible, and his labours find no other period than the termination of his life.

But that love of our country, which, according to ancient ethics, comprehended all the virtues and endearments of humanity, is unfelt by the New Whigs. They retire from Parliament, during a period of national diffrefs, and aflign reafons for their conduct, of the most pernicious tendency. Their apology (if it will fubmit to fuch an humble name) is a direct and open declaration to the country, that we are without an effective and lawful government, at this perilous juncture. It is nothing lefs than a public exhortation to the people to reaffume the reins of government. If the ftate of our reprefentation justifies those who are chofen into Parliament, in deferting their station, the electors of Great Britain ought not to make The conftituents cannot authorife any return. acts, which the reprefentative cannot in confcience perform. The "impofture" ought not to continue, and the whole body of the people flould rife up as one mafs, and wreft the powers of the third eftate from those who have usurped its functions *.

в З

Language

* This is the very language of a fpeech made in the Whig Club, 5th December, 1797, as given in the Morning Chronicle. It is there faid, that to attend Parliament, is "to hold out falfe hopes to the country; that it is abetting imposfure, and only approving things Language and conduct like this is always pregnant with anarchy and ruin. But the danger is more imminent, becaufe the New Whigs plough in the fame furrow, and deepen the very line of diffinction, which France now draws between the government and people of thefe kingdoms, for the utter deftruction of both. Nothing can purge a party acting thus, from the charge of rafh and injurious violence. The feceffion deferves a much worfe appellation, unlefs the motives which gave rife to it are unqueftionably pure, and the reafons upon which it is founded are, to appearance at leaft, convincing and folid.

Let us examine both.

Our reprefentative fyftem has undergone but little change fince the revolution. Every partial alteration which has taken place in particular boroughs, has contributed to extend the privilege of voting more widely. For the laft twenty years, the prefent leader of the New Whigs has been at the head of a party in fyftematic oppofition to each fucceeding cabinet. No one adminiftration, no one parliament, no one meafure, has things radically wrong." It is farther declared, that the orator is "ready to act as foon as the people are unwilling to fuffer this delution." This is not the fpeech of a wild democratic baronet, but of the head of the party.

escaped his unqualified censure. He unceasingly denounced the influence of the crown, the weaknefs of minifters, and the corrupt fervility of parliament. Those who read his invectives against Lord North and his majorities, and compare them with his more recent fpeeches, may find fome change in his political fentiments, but they will meet with none in the warmth of his perfonal philippics. The counfels of Mr. Fox, and of a much larger opposition than the prefent, were rejected as uniformly in those times *, as during the last feffion. Yet neither Mr. Fox, nor any other member, retired then from his duty, because he could not effect a reform in parliament. So far as any thing can be inferred from the conduct of Mr. Fox, during that period, it was more in praife than in condemnation of our reprefentative fystem as it now stands. He admitted its imperfections, by fupporting the general principle of reform; but he gave it a most effectual fupport, by difapproving of every fpecific plan propofed to fuperfede it. It is utterly impoffible, then, that he could have confidered our reprefentation as inadequate to the ends of government, during the beft and most vigorous period of his political life, fince he could neither devife nor felect a fystem to adopt in its place.

* These remarks are, of course, confined to the period of Mr. Fox's being in opposition.

To

To what recent event, therefore, are we to attribute it, that while the shape and form of our reprefentation remains unchanged, Mr. Fox has changed his opinions? It would be injuffice to that gentleman to fuppofe, that he had formed his prefent refolution at the close of the last Parliament, much as he declaimed against its wicked acts, and unconstitutional opinions. If he had done fo, he was bound to have difclofed to his conftituents the unufual terms upon which he meant to accept of his feat. It was the manifeft duty of every one of the New Whigs to have done the fame *. If they had determined to fecede prior to the general election, they have deceived the electors by whom they were returned. If they have embraced the refolution fince that * It would be difficult to juffify them now for not refigning their feats, fince they have flubbornly refolved to neglect their duty. It feems, however, that they conftrue the filence of their conffituents into an approbation of their conduct. I queffion the right of the electors to give this leave upon any conflictutional principle. But if we admit thus much to oppofition, they muft, in return, admit, that the general filence of the country gives a like fanction to the ufual measures of Government. The fituation of Mr. Fox is ftill more aukward and whimfical than that of his coadjutors. He fays, that his conflituent; defired his attendance to oppofe the affeffed taxes. Since they command him to oppofe a meafure which they difapprove, it may be fairly urged, that when they acquiefee in his abfence, they condemn his oppofition. Into fuch abfurdities will men of the greateft talents fall, when they deviate from the plain onward track of lite.

time, they have done fo at a most fuspicious fea-The parliamentary measures of the last feffon. fion were much fewer in number and lefs important in their nature, than those of the foregoing. But, during the fpring, a few panic-ftruck, and fome difappointed gentlemen wifhed to place a refpectable nobleman at the head of a new administration. The stipulated basis of this arrangement was, the exclusion of Mr. Fox from power; and Mr. Sheridan was too wife to defert him, for the cold hope of employment under a ministry much too feeble to last *. The fcheme was filly; but though a mere bubble, fhort-lived and empty, it flewed, as it played upon the furface, how firong the current of opinion ran against the New Whigs.

Since the above was written, a letter has appeared in the public prints, giving an account of this transaction, and figned with the name of the noble Earl alluded to. The narrative shews that coquetry is not confined to the lovelier fex. It is impossible not to finile at > "The confcience of his worth, That would be woo'd, and not unfought be won; Not obvious, not obtrufive, but retir'd."

The animadverfions upon the Duke of Portland's conduct, and the panegyric upon Mr. Fox, might call for fome remark; but I would not unneceffarily offend the feelings of a gallant folder, and a most liberal and accomplished gentleman. The letter from Mr. Fox, which is fubjoined, is a model for those to copy, who would feem to answer, and yet with to fay nothing.

Was

Was it the cackling of thefe few poor geefe which alarmed our politicians for the fafety of their country, as it deftroyed their delufive dreams of place and emolument? Certain it is, that the plan of reform was introduced foon after this change was propofed, and the refolution was then taken to fecede from Parliament if it failed of fuccefs.

But let the motives of the feceffion be what they may, a defect in the caufe of reprefentation could form no ground to juftify it. The very circumftance upon which the oppofition urged the neceffity of the meafure, fails them in point of It is not true that the prefent Houfe of fact. Commons do not fpeak the fentiments of the Country-I fay this with the means of proof at hand—There never was a time in which the conduct of the legiflature was more fully and heartily approved by the great body of the people. I will not refort to that filence which the oppofition interpret into an unequivocal approbation from their immediate conftituents. They have given us a more decifive teft of the popularity of Parliament in their eagerness to obtain addreffes for the removal of his Majefty's Minifters. In most counties they did not venture to call a meeting of the people, as being well affured that the meafure would be negatived. In many where they

they did hazard the attempt, they were outnumbered and obliged to retire.

Let us fuppofe, however, that the fentiments of the people are at variance with those of their reprefentatives, and that nothing can reftore their falutary influence upon the measures of government but a reform in Parliament. Still I should contend upon Mr. Fox's own conceffions in the debate upon that measure, that Mr. Gray's plan was utterly unfit to remove the mifchief which it proposed to remedy. Its leading principle was to reduce the feveral modes of reprefentation which exift under the prefent conftitution, to one nearly fimilar to that which obtains in counties at prefent. Now, it was declared by Mr. Fox, that the body of the people are averfe from the war; but the fame gentleman admitted, that this inclination for peace had made no change in the members returned by the different counties to Parliament at the last election *. If, then, the great body of country gentlemen who are chofen upon a fimilar plan to that which is propofed by Mr. Gray, adhere to the ministry in contradiction to the people's wifnes, from whence is it collected, that an extension of the very

very fame mode of election, would give a different tone to the opinions and measures of the House.

Neither will I afk you, my dear Sir, to fet bounds to your conceffions here. Let us affume for a moment that this fcheme would "ffect all that it purposes to accomplish. Let us grant that it contains every poffible bleffing which an upright and able statesman can devise for the empire. Still the Houfe of Commons reject it. Is a Member of Parliament to neglect the interefts of his country altogether, becaufe he cannot pay her every poffible fervice? It is the boaft of Mr. Fox, that he oppofed our war with the Colonies, and that his labours were finally crowned with fuccefs. Whether the part which he took in that unhappy bufinefs furnishes an honeft fource for exultation, is a queftion which hiftory must folve. But if the opposition of Mr. Fox was of fuch fervice in the war with America, why fhould he refufe it in the contest with France?

The praife of rectifying the Ministers financial mistakes is claimed by Mr. Sheridan. If he has done this, the glory devolved on him, but the advantage redounded to his country. It may feem a poor and vulgar bleffing in contrast with the imperial gift of a regenerate constitution. But fill still it is a bleffing, and upon what principle arc we called upon to make a lumping bargain, and told that if one is above our price, we shall not be permitted to acquire the other? If the miftakes of administration were to fall on ministers alone, they might be left to reap the fruits of their own folly. But the errors of government are misfortunes to the people. It is the duty of our conftitutional guardians utterly to avert, where they can, all meafures injurious to our profperity : but an unfuccefsful ftruggle to do fo, does not difpenfe with what is not lefs their duty; to correct and foften those mischiefs which they find it impoffible to remove altogether. They are retainers of the people, pledged and fworn to watch over their interefts both day and night. While they continue upon the honourable poft, nothing can exempt them from the fatigues of duty. When they are once chofen into the Commons Houfe of Parliament, they are reprefentatives, not of a particular diftrict, but of the whole British people; and it is beyond the power of a borough, or county, to difpenfe with fervice that is due to the nation at large *.

* It '- obvious that if fuch a power does exift, it is bottomed on the principle, that Members of Parliament are bound to obey their Conflituents. Yet Mr. Fox, in the very fpeech in which he declared his intention to fecede, controverts that opinion. His words are—" It has often been a queftion both within and with-" out thefe walls, how far reprefentatives ought to be bound by " the inftructions of their conflituents. If the imperfection of the Houfe of Commons could form an excufe for the abfence of its members, flill what are we to do with those noblemen who defert their duty in the Houfe of Peers? We have not heard, at leaft, hitherto, that fome infane, or fchool-boy lord, has devifed a reform in that august assembly. It is not yet proposed to purify the Houfe by decimation, or to tear from the crown its prerogative of calling individuals of merit, and of fortune, up to its hereditary council. Flimfy, and patched up, as this vindication is, it leaves the oppofition Peers to ftand fluivering before their country, bare, naked, and defiitute of all apology. If they can be of any use to their country, it is not the constitution of the Houfe in which they ought to ferve it that can prevent them. The reafons of their conduct, (if they have any,) are at least distinct from, if not contradictory to those alledged in the Houfe of Commons. Decency forbids me to conjecture, that they have with the zeal of new converts, outftripped their affociates, and as the New Whig Commoners, by their feceffion, pronounce the Houfe of Commons to be an ufelefs incumbrance in its prefent flate, fo the New Whig Peers by a fimilar ftep, fignify their opinion that

" my mind is not altogether made up, although I ov n I lean to the opinion that having to legiflate for the empire, they ought not to be altogether guided by inftructions that may be dictated by local interefts."Woodfall's Parl. Rep. of laft Seffion, Vol. III.p. 329. the the Houfe of Lords is a fenfelefs inftitution, which nothing can render productive of advantage to the country.

Such, my dear Sir, is the famous juftification of this extraordinary proceeding. Its abfurdities are eafily fum'd up. It infifts upon applying a remedy to an evil which does not exift. The remedy it fuggefts would be too feeble to remove the malady if it was really felt. If the affertions of the New Whigs were allowed as facts, they would form no juftification for their conduct, and if their juftification were valid, it would extend only to half their party.

If the New Whigs had been fincere in their escape from public business, it would be useless to expose the weakness and incongruity of their reafons. I should fcorn to hunt pusillanimity down to its obscure retreat. Condemning the professed motives of their fecession, the public would applaud its effects, and admire the inferutable ways of Providence, which works good to its creatures from mean and foolifh inftruments. The people left to their own virtuous impulfe, would ceafe to be the victims of delufive hopes and injurious fufpicions. They would prepare to meet their ancient and implacable enemy with their ancient unanimity and courage. They would deem no facrifice of wealth, of comfort, or

These cheering confequences would result to the people without doors from the section of the party, if it were really to take place. They have given it as their own opinion, that their attendance in parliament is of no fervice to .e country.

But you, my dear Sir, are well aware that the New Whigs entertain defigns far different from what they profefs. The leaders of oppofition are refflefs and turbulent fpirits, equally impatient of obfcurity and repofe. Pinioned down in the Earth's centre, they would ftruggle to regain the political station they had left, though fin, and death, and all the plagues of hell, fhould follow at their heels. They talk of flight while they plant an ambufcade. They will not appear in the conftitutional councils of the country to fuperintend the general bufinefs of the ftate. But if a particular measure is difrelished by the people, however conducive to the real interefts of the fate, they are eager to grafp at injurious popularity, by coming down to oppofe it *.

* I cannot forbear quoting the opinion of one, who, was if possible, more of a patriot and states from than an orator, upon conduct like this.

Εςι γάς, έςιν ήσυχια δικαία και συμΦέςουσα τη πόλα, ην δι πολλοί των πολιτών ύμας απλώς αγετε. Αλλ' ου ταύτην hohitely ering hout were their arlia-

In the Whig Club, alfo, they are as active, as virulent, and as malignant as ever. They diftort the public fituation in falfe and virulent harangues. They cheer their little men with invectives against the ministry, and mis-statements of our political interests; and all that they advance passes unrefuted into general circulation, through the medium of their party newspapers.

ταύτην ουτος άγα την ήσυχιαν, πολλώ γε και δά άλλ αποςας, δταν αύΙω δόξη, της πολιτείας (πολλάκις δε δοκά) Φυλάτε όπηνίκα έςε μεςοι τώ συνεχώς λέγονΙΦ, ή παρα της τύχης τί συμθέθήκεν έναντιωμα, ή άλλό τι δύσκολου γέγονε (πολλα δε τα ανθρωπινα) άτ έπι τόυΙω τω καιρω ξήτωρ, έζαίΦνης έκ της ήσυχίας, ώσπερ πνευμα, έΦάνη, και πεΦωνασκηκώς και, συνωλεχώς βήματα και λόγες, συνείρα τυτες σαΦώς, και απνευςι, δυησιν μεν ούδεμίαν Φεροντας, ώδ άγαθε κτησιν ουδενΦ, συμΦοραν δε τώ τυχόντι τών πολιτων, και κοινήν αισχυνήυ.

For there is, yes, there is a flate of retirement, honeft and advantageous to the flate. Many of you, my countrymen, enjoy it in artlefs integrity. But his retirement is not of this kind. Far from it! He frequently retires at his pleafure from the public fervice, and watches until you grow tired of fome conftant fpeaker, until fortune has traverfed your defigns or involved you in fome of thofe various calamities incident to humanity. Inftantly the Orator rufhes, like a tempeft, from his retreat: his voice is already exercifed—his words and periods are prepared—he delivers them with breathlefs vehemence and volubility, but to no ufeful purpofe; with no effect of any real importance. They involve his fellow citizens in diffrefs, and are a difgrace to his country.

Demosthenes Orat. de Corona.

The object of that affociation was reprehensible in its first institution. It was a party instrument planned and erected for the fole purpole of forcing a change of Ministers from the Crown by factious clamour. I do not deny that it originally contained many perfons of cultivated mind and refpectable character. Some of their names may be found ftill lingering on the club roll. You will not fuppofe that I include, in this defcription, the few perfons of rank and fortune who hold the hammer at the Crown and Anchor, and fulfil the utmost limit of their talents when they regulate the bottle ceremonials of a drunken meeting. Perfons of this defcription are a fort of Political Sumpter Mule, who bear the expences of a party, when they are out of power, and carry the ornamental equipage and gala-furniture of Government, with grave and ftately dulnefs, when they are led into place. But if we must exclude them from the first rank, we ought not to confound them with the general rubbage materials of the club.

Thefe laft are an ill-forted gang, fuch as are readily picked up in a large and corrupted city; a mob of writers for public prints; of politicians without knowledge; of lawyers without bulinefs; of men of fashion without fortune; and of tradefmen without employment. Most of them in the jaws of bankruptcy and ruin. All of of them at war with the wholefome reftraints and fober demeanour of a well-ordered government. Men who turn the reftleffnefs of their own minds, and the melancholy confequences of their own faults, into a charge of high mifdemeanour, and crime againft the miniftry; whofe difcontents do not arife from any general grievance, but, have their fource in a want of induftry to encrease their means to the capacious fize of their appetites; or of fortitude to reduce their appetites within the narrow compass of their means.

What are we to think of those candidates for the government of a great and virtuous people, who foment and cherifh, and confort with fuch a rabble-rout? In mercy to the opposition leaders, we may hope that their hearts and defigns are not in unifon with those of their company; we may fuppofe that this club is nothing more than the humble rags in which they are clad during the period of diffrefs, and which they would haften to fhake off in more proud and profperous days. Still what are we to conclude from their conduct in those meetings which they hold ? The wifdom and manly port of Ulyffes must beam from beneath the fordid covering of his difguife; but what traces of the patriot hero are manifest in the conduct of the New Whig party? Is it decent or fitting for a grave and honeft flates-

man to hold his councils amidft the clangor of glaffes, and the loud huzzas of a tumultuous and drunken meeting? Is he to intermingle his anxious cares, his fober enquiries, his comprehensive plans for the public weal with ambiguous toafts, with obfcene jefts, with low buffoonery, with lafcivious fongs, and with the riotous acclamations of his wine-ftruck companions?

An appropriate toaft gives his cue to Mr. Fox, for an harangue upon the ruinous prospects of the country. In the alternate order of the exhibition, the affembly are confoled with the melodious vociferations of Mr. Incledon. The evoe bravo of fome yelping reformer ftarts Mr. Sheridan from his chair. The room re-echos with denunciations of impeachment, and the audience kindle with refentment at the encrease of influence, and the creation of peers. Soon " liftening envy drops her fnakes" at the warbled incantations of Mr. Dignum. Such is the bill of entertainment in this mongrel shew of revelry and care, where orators and fong-men, patriots and players, feverally difplay their powers, and labour for the plaudits of their audience in the fucceflive fhiftings of the various fcenes.

Indeed, my dear Sir, I take no pleafure in the picture I have drawn; it is a melancholy, a very melancholy augury for the country, when men of talents conceive that they can ftruggle into power, by means like thefe.

I fhall

I shall always be very flow to impute a deliberate defign of overturning the conftitution to those gentlemen who are supposed to direct the proceedings of the New Whigs. But what is any man to conclude from their conduct in parliament, and in this club, if he has no other means to afcertain their intentions? Are not the French Directory, who greedily attend to our opposition prints while they arbitrarily suppress their own, invited by thefe arts to confider the conquest of this country as feafible by those means which they have employed with fuccefs against the reft of Europe ? May they not fairly infer from fuch proceedings the propagation of their principles among us, and count upon the Whig Club, as a provisional government already formed to fuperfede the legiflature? The New Whigs applauded the revolution of France under all its mutations. They have defended her moderation and fincerity, in all her transactions. They have laboured to humble the high fpirit of this country, and to reconcile us to conditions of peace the most degrading and injuri-They reprefent the republic, (and God ous. knows how falfely they do it) as flourishing under a free government, while they defcribe Great Britain, as reduced to a flate of flavery, in which refiftance to the executive power is refolved into a mere matter of prudence. They extol the vigor of the French reprefentative fyftem, and they c 3

they decry our own. as a decayed and ufelefs incumbrance. Finally, as if to accelerate that ruin of the conftitution, which they denounce, in imitation of the first anarchists in France, they form a political club, who assemble to deceive the people, and to controul the legislature.

The mifchief of this conduct, does not lie in mere poffibility as d fuppofition. It has quickened a monfter into life, which may coft this country much pain and blood to deftroy. The dictators of France count upon our internal divifions as means ready formed to fubdue us. They erect their hopes of fuccefs upon the difaffection of fome of us, and the indifference and cowardice of the reft. Hence it is, and I fay it with indignant fhame, that the manifefto to their Army of England is nothing more than a brief and unexaggerated abstract of a speech made to the Whig Club during the last funmer.

There may be fome who condemn the conduct of oppofition for deferting their feats in parliament, and transferring their place of fitting to the Whig Club, and yet they may approve of those measures which they recommend to the country.

This is a polition well worthy of difcuffion. The people of Great Britain ought to liften to good good advice from whatever quarter it may come. I will, therefore, with your leave, examine those three great points which remain at iffue between Ministers and Opposition; these are the conduct to be observed towards Ireland, the subject of Peace, and the present system of Taxation.

I have condemned the practices of oppofition in the Sifter Country, at a time when I did not ufually queftion the propriety of their meafures. I was of opinion, that they laboured with unufual diligence to ftrike the roots of their party deep and wide, throughout that kingdom, and ufed every artifice to feduce her into a dangerous union with a minority in the Englifth legiflature. The defign has been avowed by Mr. Fox, in his fpeech upon the ftate of Ireland, during the laft feffion *. But its completion would be ruinous to the profperity and mutual attachment of thofe two great and effential members of the empire. If the interference of Ireland fhould materially affect the fituation of domefic parties in Great Britain, the independence of the latter would be utterly deftroyed, fince her legiflature would be influenced by opinions diftinct from those of the people whom they represent. If, on the other hand, as is more probable, the weight of Ireland could work no change upon the internal government of Great Britain, the attempt would nourish all that animosity which ftrong passions engender from disappointed hopes, and the reciprocal affections of the countries would be gradually weakened, and finally destroyed. Those who consider what took place upon the regency, and the efforts which were made by opposition at that time, will not look upon these reflections as either improbable or unfounded.

* His words, as taken in Woodfall's report of the debates of laft feffion, Vol. II. p. 519 are, "This difcuffion (of the flate of "Ireland) may be attended with beneficial confequences, becaufe "it will fhew the people of Ireland, that it is not the French alone to whom they may look for a redrefs of their grievances, that there is at leaft a portion of the British House of Commons, who feel for them under oppression, and who are defirous to administer to their relief."

Britain,

The objections, which have been taken to the prefent fysiem respecting Ireland, are the nonemancipation of the Catholics, as it is called; the adoption of an oppressive and military fystem, in ruling the inhabitants; and a vigorous opposition to a reform of their Parliament.

The real ftate of that country is but little underftood by the great body of the British people. I shall endeavour to explain it from sources not lefs authentic than those of that noble Earl, who has lately rendered the situation of his native country the subject of parliamentary discussion. fion. To do this with effect, I must take up matters a little farther back than the prefent period.

The Irifh people are divided by religious tenets into three fects: the Protestants, properly fo called; the Prefbyterians, or (as it is nore fashionable to denominate them) the Protestant Differenters; and the Roman Catholics. For more than a century past, the great mass of freehold property in the kingdom has been vested in the former. They have been folely entrusted with the principal functions and offices of government, and have been confidered as the great bond of union between that country and Great Britian.

The Protestant Diffenters obtained their chief fettlements in Ireland, during the reign of the first James, and the period of Cromwell's usurpation. The northern counties, in which they particularly dwell, not being fo fruitful as the remaining parts of Ireland, they have turned their attention to manufacture, and have cultivated the linen trade with great fuccefs. If I am rightly informed, England imports and pays for a greater quantity of their manufacture, than the total amount, in value, of all her exports to that kingdom. This part of the country, therefore, derives a more direct and palpable advantage, from from the union with Great Britain, than the reft of the island.

Ever fince the reformation, the political maxims of all European nations have been influenced by their religious tenets. This principle has prevailed particularly in Ireland, from a concurrence of various circumftances. It has given rife to an alliance between the protestant and diffenting interests there, in opposition to the Catholics. They confidered these last as a common and outnumbering enemy, from whose opinions, bothreligious and civil, they had more to dread than from their own private difagreements.

The reftraints upon the Irifh Diffenters, therefore, were never exceffive, and during the prefent reign they have been wholly removed. They are now upon the fame footing, in respect to civil rights, with the members of the established church. There are no conftitutional grievances of which they can complain, unless the payment of tithes, and a reform in Parliament are to be accounted as fuch. The very war, which has brought inevitable diftress upon some parts of the empire, might have been rendered a fource of opulence to Having raged fo widely throughout Gerthem. many, it annihilated the linen manufactures of that country, and opened new and extensive marts to Irish industry.

The

The third left are, the Roman Catholics. They are fpread over the remaining provinces of Ireland, and are defcended from the ancient inhabitants of that country, and from the first English fettlers who arrived among them.

For thefe two centuries, until the prefent reign, these poor people were defied only as Iffachar was bleffed. They were confidered as mere flaves and victims, turned out to labour, or ufed in facrifice as public convenience required, or prejudice prompted. No Roman province, no colony in the East or in the West, no dependency of ancient Lacedemon or Athens, no ally of modern France, were ever more keenly and fyftematically fleeced and pillaged than thefe unhappy people. Every thing was made a pretext They ftruggled for liberty under for plunder. Charles I. and were plundered. They ftruggled for royalty against the rebellion, and were plundered. They fought for James II. and were plundered. The robberies of the rebellion were legalized at the reftoration. The robberies of the revolution were fecured by a long and grievous train of pains, penaltics, and difabilities, too weighty for any people to ftir under. English adventurers, Scotch adventurers, Dutch adventurers, were let loofe to fatten at their expence, and their fairest possessions were torn from the owners owners to enrich pimps, parafites, minions, generals, flate creditors and land furveyors.

But a new and happier order of things has arifen during the prefent reign. The Catholics were first admitted to participate the blessings of that cup which the revolution bestowed upon the English people by that fovereign who is now upon the throne. If they are grateful, as I am well affured they are, it is their prefent king whom they must praise as the father of their liberties.

The only difabilities that now remain of that long catalogue which formerly feparated them in rights from their fellow-fubjects, are, that they can neither fit in parliament, nor fill the higher offices of government.

The British Cabinet, in advising the former meafures of humanity and justice, have departed very far from those maxims of government, which have influenced their predecessors for two centuries past. I cannot blame them for pausing to examine the effects of what has been accomplished, before they hazard what remains to be done. Having once stirred the ballast of the vessel, it is wise and prudent to try how she fails and settles, before they again venture to alter her trim. If any thing were wanting to impress this great political truth on our minds, the woeful experience of our neighbours fhould teach us, that political innovations, however plaufible, must be made with trembling caution.

God forbid, however, that I should become the advocate of galling diftinctions, which uphold no great political good. It is rafh prefumption in any individual to pronounce decifively upon a measure which may be viewed in fo many lights. and involves a variety of weighty confiderations. But fo far as I can fee this momentous queffion in all its bearings, it appears to me, that there will be little danger in concluding what has been fo well commenced. The political relation of this country and Ireland, as affected by religious differences, has been fundamentally changed by the creation of a republic in France, and by the total want of religion among her rulers. Thefe events have diffolved that alarming connection which formerly united the Irifh Catholics to the French Government. If the union of these kingdoms is to be hereafter shaken through any attachment to French manners, and a novel constitution, the form which is to convulfe the empire will not come from the Catholics. It will arife amidft that "old leaven" who have been fo lavishly praifed for rebellion and regicide, and upon whom the temperate glories of the revolution have been moft untruly beftowed *.

* Mr. Fox's speech on the affairs of Ireland. Woodfall's reports of the Debates of last Session, Vol. II. p. 498.

The

The wifnes of every man, who does not fee an abfolute neceffity for those degrading restraints, must be, with me, that such opprobrious and merciless badges of guilt should be removed from the shoulders of the Catholics, wholly, radically and promptly. The boon has been well earned by the patience and long suffering, by the constancy and unshaken loyalty of the upper ranks among them. It is a facrifice, if it can be called a facrifice, not less agreeable to policy, than grateful to justice.

A noble mind difdains to be debarred from hopes which are thrown open to his rivals, however remote his profpect to enjoy them. The people feel that they are degraded by the diftinction made between them and the reft of his Majefty's fubjects. It is here that the chief fting of these disabilities festers. The immediate advantages of unbarring the avenues to those places which are now fhut againft them, would be extremely trivial. They are not in a flate to profit by the privilege which they claim. It would be very fallacious to estimate the grievance, as if a fimilar reftraint were imposed upon three fourths of the people of Great Britain. Those who are to govern or to ferve the ftate in its higher offices, must posses fome rank, education, and means of life. In Ireland, perfons of this defcription are almost wholly confined to the reformed religions. A few

A few noblemen and gentlemen of landed property, fome rich leafeholders, and not many opulent perfons who have realized money by fhopkeeping and trade, conftitute the entire Catholic gentry. It is from the loweft orders of the people that this religion derives its greateft ftrength of numbers; from farmers of a few acres of land at a rack rent, from labourers, menial fervants, and handicraftmen. To talk to fuch poor perfons of their wretchednefs, in being fuperfeded and cut out by law from all chance and hope of becoming Members of Parliament, Revenue Commiffioners, Vice Treafurers, Chancellors, and Judges, would be to infult, not to pity them.

It fo happens, however, that the upper ranks of the Catholics, who are alone directly interefied in the attainment of this enfranchifement, are well affected to administration; while the inferior claffes to whom it is of little importance, are in fome counties extremely unquiet. I do not urge this as a reason for witholding concession; I do it to shew, that we must trace those discontents which exist to fome other causes.

These causes are to be found in the machinations of France acting upon the "old republican leaven" in Belfast, and other places, long previous to the commencement of hostilities. Dazzled by

by the progrefs of the French revolution, which has raifed in its violent and giddy whirls fo many wicked and obfcure men to the top of public affairs, a fet of needy and abandoned individuals have planned the most dangerous and fingular confpiracy that is to be found in the annals of mankind. Its object is to effect a feparation between Ireland and this country, and to form a republican government under the protection of France. Its refources are the feduction of the loweit orders of the people, under the falfe, and now stale pretext, of equality and freedom. Every ftratagem which cunning and want of principle could fuggeft, has been adopted to detach them from the prefent conftitution. Seditious newfpapers, pamphlets, and treafonable hand bills have been circulated among them. In public, frequent affemblies, violent refolutions, and more violent fpeeches, were employed to inflame the paffions even to madnefs. In private, every artifice was attempted which could work upon the weaknefs of the human mind. Diffenters in Dublin, in Belfast, and in the remainder of the North, were the first movers and principal fupport of this confpiracy. But they were aware how impossible it was to move fociety from its foundations, as they wished to move it, unless the great mass of the people were feduced to affist their defign. For this purpofe, the Catholics were to be gained.

Forth-

Forthwith, a new and unheard of cry was fct up, by these profligate innovators, of commiseration and regard for a fect whofe principles of government they abhorred, and whofe tenets of religion they defpifed. Emancipation of their Catholic brethren, and a Reform in Parliament, went forth as the public watch-words. But the hopes held up to private converts were an agrarian diffribution of property, and a total exemption from tithes. Senfible that they had to operate upon a brave but volatile people, they purfued the fame plan which has fucceeded in France, but has fortunately failed in Great Britain. They proceeded to augment, unite, and discipline their converts by affiliated clubs. These venomous and baneful weeds were trained to creep and climb until they fhould fill the country, and choak up the growth of every thing that was noble and generous in the Nothing was neglected to enfure fuccefs, foil. and to prevent difcovery. The wretched confpirators were bound to each other by horrid and mystic oaths. The matter of their tremendous pledge, was to be faithful to France, to preferve inviolable fecrecy, and to propagate their principles by encreasing their converts. Affaffination and maffacre were added as precautions more flagitiousand fecure. Friends, brethren, fathers, every endearing relation of life, were to be fcrupuloufly immolated to this dreadful object. Any. attempt to expiate crime by a disclosure of guilt, was followed by inevitable deftruction. If the murderers of an informer had leifure to indulge their fportive feelings, the terrors of diffolution were aggravated by cruel and lingering tortures. Every magistrate who stepped forward to difcharge his duty, and preferve the peace; who ventured to fupprefs their meetings, to caution the wavering, and apprehend the guilty, was marked and written down for death. He was fhot from behind fome wall or hedge, and fometimes in the open day. But if chance or prudence preferved him, for a little fpace, from the aim of these impatient lurkers for his blood, his houfe was befet, and forced by a numerous banditti, who murdered him amidft the cries, and in the very embrace and bofom of his family.

Not lefs active to fecure weapons than to prevent difcovery, they affembled in large bodies during the night, they furrounded every houfe where arms were kept, and tore them from the owners under menaces of fword and fire. In fome places they laid the opulent farmers under contribution; in many more they committed acts of violence the most atrocious and irreparable. It was impossible for any individual to result their attacks by the mere strength of his private family. The enemy stood as often within his doors as without. Servants fed by their master's bounty, and brought up under his roof, were sworn into the confpiracy; racy; and have been known, in fome inftances. to plan the attack, and to point out the opportunity for affaffination. Against outrages fo extentenfive and enormous, there was no remedy but in flight, or the interference of a military force. Before they did interfere, many quiet and refpectable families were expelled from their habitations by terror of those ruffians.

During these nocturnal arrays and domiciliary vifits, every other means were purfued which could advance their treafonous defigns. Attempts were made to corrupt the foldiery. A correspondence was kept up with France to expedite an invafion. A large quantity of arms was transmitted from thence. Fortunately a principal configument was feized before it reached the intended place of debarkation. A plan was fet on foot to feize the perfon of the Lord Lieutenant; and, in fome counties, it was defigned to maffacre every individual who was deemed hoftile to that revolution which the confpirators were refolved to promote.

These charges against the United Irishmen and Defenders do not reft upon vague rumour, or individual affertion. They are authenticated by the most clear and confistent evidence, openly delivered at various trials which have taken place in Ireland, from the period of Jackfon's conviction, to that of Lord Carhampton's tenants for р 2 for confpiring his murder. The witneffes were numerous, confiftent in their narratives, and unconnected with each other. Their teftimonies have been fanctioned by the verdict of juries, in every county where thefe troubles have prevailed. Many of the guilty have fuffered the penalty of the law. Many more have received life from the mercy of the crown, and not a few have retired to America, anticipating conviction in a fenfe of their crimes.

When the fchemes of the United Irifhmen, in the North, and of the Defenders in the counties of Meath, Dublin and Kildare, were thus unequivocally proved by their conduct, and the confeffion of their accomplices, what other meafures could a wife and prudent government purfue, but those which have been employed ? Were they to tolerate feditious meetings and conventions, affembled notorioufly for promoting rebellion and over-throwing the conftitution; or to reprefs them by vigorous and wholefome flatutes ?

But it is contended, that the fole object of thefe meetings was to exact a Reform in Parliament, and to procure Emancipation for the Catholics; and that the laws paffed to fupprefs them were new and tyrannical encroachments upon the national freedom.

The

The conduct of the New Whigs, in judging of motives and meafures, is in open violation of all the ufual rules which regulate the opinions of mankind. Where all legiflators have found it neceffary to innovate, by making new laws framed to meet new exigencies, and to keep pace with the progrefs of human crimes, these states are enemies to innovation. They are venerators of antiquity, and hold it facrilege to deface the pillars of the conflictution. But in the effential form of government, which every wife legiflator trembles to break in upon, they are eager to dabble with their dirty experiments. They feel neither doubt, nor remorfe, nor fcruple, but rip up, and cut, and patch, and disfigure the conftitution, to their own idle, capricious, new-fangled, flimfy tafte. For the laws of treafon and fedition, as they were paffed fome centuries ago, they are in-Gired with facred awe, and they kindle with pious zeal against those who would depart from the cuftoms of their Fathers. But they feel no fuch enthusiafm for that venerable altar of liberty upon which these portions of our rights were inscribed and confecrated. They will not fpare, nor do they pardon those who wish to spare from their unhallowed hands, the holy edifice itfelf, in which, and through which, this country has been fo often bleffed.

They

They are eager to attribute the most injurious intentions to government, and the friends of the conftitution. Neither protestations, nor proofs, nor the very nature of things, can fatisfy their doubts, or allay their fufpicions. But in balance to this want of charity, they yield their affent to the professions of the French Republic, and of its friends in thefe kingdoms, with the most liberal credulity. Whatever is weak in them, they are fedulous to make ftrong. On the one fide, every measure is corrupt, wicked, infincere, and inftituted on a itudied defign to deftroy the liberties of the empire; on the other, all is humanity, fincerity, virtue, peace, and the facred love of order, freedom and the conftitution. The treafonable defigns of the United Irifhmen have been proved by wridings, by oaths, by confessions, by every means of proof through which conviction can be brought home to the human heart. But the New Whigs will difregard what is proved, and believe what is profeffed !

It has been made another charge against the administration of Ireland, that they have imprifoned many innocent perfons upon accusations of treason, without proof, or sufficient of their guilt.

It cannot be fairly contended, from the circumftance of an acquittal, that there was no ground to accufe fuch as have been arraigned. The jury who who tries the indictment may negative, by their verdict, the abfolute conclusion of guilt. But the jury who found that indictment, afcertained by the very fame forum, a probable ground to accufe. It certainly may have happened that fome innocent perfons have undergone a temporary confinement. This might neceffarily enfue from the artful conftitution of the confpiracy. It was fubtle and extended in its nature. The inftruments were obscure, illiterate and desperate men. Its plan was carried on by fubordinate and limited focieties, in detached parts, and at different meetings. No perfon could have feen the whole of their transactions in a regular feries, and the most active must, in fome instances, have relied upon the testimony of others. Hence it might happen that fome individuals did fuffer the legal confequences of fufpicion upon illfounded grounds of accufation. But hence it did alfo happen, that many who were deep in guilt were enabled to efcape. The principle, which allows of fuspending the Habeas Corpus Act, admits of strefts upon proofs and fufpicions too feeble a convict upon trial. All that can be required of those to whom, for the common good, this high power is entrusted in dangerous times, is, that it fhould be used with confcientious difcretion. It is not pretended by the most malignant croaker, that innocent and unhappy men have been malicioufly crushed by this authority to gratify private refertments. A fpeedy liberation, without the expence or hazard of a trial, is the very reverfe of proof that it was exercifed in wantonnefs and oppreffion. The facts, therefore, which are flated in this inculpation of the Irifh Government might be admitted, and the imputation of blame drawn from them, would ftill be unjuft.

But there is no man who has taken falt at the fame table with a Republican, who does not feel that many of the liberated had more reafon to thank the mercy of Gover state in their deliverance, than to arraign its jufter in their confinement. In fome inftances the proofs were dubious. In others a difclofure of the evidence would have furthered the efcape of more capital and daring offenders. The object of conviction was not to fhed human blood, but to make an impreffive example upon a deluded people; and it is the wife and wholefome lenity of Government, which the New Whigs convert into the accufation of rancorous and mercilefs opprefilion.

Another charge which has been made againft the prefent Government is, that they have difarmed particular diftricts, and fuperfeded the civil administration of the country, by introducing a military police.

Inftead of perverting the political maxims of tranquil times to critical fituations for which they were never framed, let any honeft man fay what he fhould think of the folly and debility of a government, which, when the country was threatened with invafion, left arms in the hands of thofe patricides, who were eager to join the invaders. Arms, in which the poffeffors had no property, but through robbery or treafon. Arms, which were originally forced from loyal owners, or elfe procured by French gold and French affiftance.

Ought not the military to have been called in to oppofe a force which the civil power was found too feeble to quell? A force, formidable from its numbers, its object, its ferocity, its accurate and prompt intelligence, and its being deftitute of all vifible and permanent flation. When the ufual and common arm of the law had been tried, and was found too weak, either the country was to be undone, or means of more than common ftrength were to be called forth to quell this power of darknefs, which fpead univerfal terror and difmay under cover of night, and was fcattered by the approach of morning.

When a military force acts over an extensive district, fome cases of particular hardship, and even of outrage may possibly occur. A brave disciplinarian, whose situation is subordinate, cannot always distinguish between the letter and the spirit of his orders. Individuals, when flushed with power newly acquired, will fometimes reel beyond beyond the fober boundary line, to which difcretion limits the application of force. I am well affured, however, that the inftances of oppreffion, which have been recently brought forward by a noble Earl in the Houfe of Lords, have been grofsly mifreprefented to him *. That gallant officer is too well acquainted with the British foldiery, to charge them with indifcriminate and wanton outrage in the execution of their orders. If his high rank and general refidence in this country could have allowed him the opportunity of being well acquainted with the fituations of the difaffected diftricts, the temper of the inhabitants, and the treatment which the army has in general received, he would find every reafon to indulge his inclinations in applauding the feady, temperate, loyal, and forbearing condi i of his Majesty's troops,

But if we were to admit all the unfortunate cafes which have been alledged to their utmoft extent,—if we were to emblazon them with cir-

• A poor word-fpinning democratic Baronet has stated in the House of Commons, that he has been informed that 4000 families were burnt out of their habitations in the county of Armagh. As he is a member of the Corresponding Society, we may give a good guess at the fource of his information. It is fortunate, that when his correspondent was so wicked as to tell a deliberate and malignant fallhood, he was so foolish as to exceed all bounds of credibility.

cumftances of ten-fold aggravation, still they would fink into infignificance when contrafted with the favage and frequent barbarities practiced by United Irifhmen and Defenders previous to the introduction of the prefent police. It is true, that if it had not been brought forward, the perturbed diftricts could not now complain of domestic regulations, which the Irish peasantry have ufually followed as the habitual and falubrious law of an industrious life; nor of coercions applied to prevent opportunities of guilt; nor of force opposed against actual violence and open But all Ireland must have deplored, that crime. a French confpiracy had raifed its audacious front, and marched throughout the kingdom with giant ftrides ;---that the nobility, the gentry, the yeomanry, and every one who had a permanent interest in the fafety of their country were difarmed and defenceless, while a difordered and mifguided peafantry paraded the land, arrayed in the very arms of which they had defpoiled their fuperiors, inflicting death, robbery, confication, violation, and oaths of fealty upon whomfoever they pleafed; public justice eluded, infulted, and openly beaten down; no fafety for property, for confcience, or for life; timid men forced either to contravene their allegiance by treafonable affociations, or to violate involuntary oaths at the hazard of their lives; while the honourable and refolutely refolutely good, muft either determine to abandon their dwellings and their property for an attachment to their overeign, the conftitution of the count y, and the integrity of the empire, or elfe to lay their head each night upon the pillow, counting on a melancholy chance of life until morning, only from the doubtful fuccels of a ftruggle to preferve it.

Evils fo rapid and alarming in their progrefs required a countercheck unufually vigorous and active. The remedy may be fevere, but it is efficacious; and its operation is mild compared with the tortures of the malady it is applied to cure. A rabid flaver everfive of reafon, and poifonous to life, overruns and infects the country. The cauftic, which fearches out and cauterizes the venom, may inflict a deep and burning wound. But if it be not applied, the inevitable refult is madnefs and death. To withdraw it in the moment of operation, would be mercilefs barbarity; and bleffed be that humane and fteady fkill, which works out lafting health from temporary pain.

These are not the cold fentiments of a stranger folicitous to preferve the dominion of Ireland to this country, and regardless of the means. They are seen and felt by the yeomanry and gentry of that island, whose dearest interests are involved in the the event; they are now in arms to give effect to the fyftem, and to co-operate with that military who are denounced as the bane and ruin of the country.

The diffurbed flate of Ireland, and the attachment of the confpirators to France, is at length admitted by the New Whigs; but they perverfely attribute the evils which fubfift to the very remedies introduced to fupprefs them. It is not eafy to conceive upon what falle principle of argument they ftrive to remove the odium of criminality from acknowledged rebels, and impofe it upon government. The itrong prefumption of guilt lies heavy upon those who rife against legitimate power, which they are bound by the law and by their oaths to obey. Acts of tyrannous and grinding oppreffion may undoubtedly excufe fociety in fhaking off that government which abufes the great object of its creation. But it flould be the awful work of a whole nation, roufed beyond the ultimate pitch of human endurance, by flagrant and fubftantial crimes against the public weal. It is not the denial of fome theoretical innovation, demanded by a club of fhort-fighted men, that can justify a recourse to arms by their profelytes. Fair and fober liberty is not to be defiled and defecrated by barbarous ceremonies, in which the ungirt votaries celebrate their orgies by frightful wounds and frantic gashes. Unless the the want of a Reform in Parliament can justify a rebellion in 40, or 50,000 perfons, against the wishes of the rest of the nation who exceed three millions in their aggregate numbers, there can be no justification for the present conspirators. Most affuredly they are not to extract a palliation of insurgency from the consequences of their own insurrection. Nor are they to enumerate the restraints used to repress rebellion, amongst those hardships which have caused their revolt.

But ministers are held up to public obloquy becaufe they do not now concede a Parliamentary Reform to the United Irifhmen and Defenders as certain means to allay those discontents which agitate the country. Mr. Fox, " good eafy man," knows no other principle of government but to concede. To oppofe uniformly whatever is fuggested by administration, and to concede as uniformly whatever is demanded of them, conftitutes the great maxim of his politics. Those who recollect by whom this clamour for a reform in Parliament was raifed, will perceive that the conceffion, if made, would be of little avail. It is to Hamilton Rowan, Napper Tandy, and others of that caft, to whom their country is indebted for the excellent device. The New Whigs are mere fecond hand agents to promote a plan, which met its first great patrons in the accomplices of Mr. Jackfon, and the partners ners of his correspondence with the French Republic. What tenets are the difciples of that fchool likely to hold, whofe principal mafters have been guilty of treason? The conduct of those who are at liberty to indulge their hopes and their wifhes without difguife, may give a clue to the fentiments of the gang that are at home. Those tried patriots, Meffrs. Muir and Paine, were likewife advocates of a reform in Parliament *. Free from perfonal motives, they had nothing more in contemplation than the glory and interest of the empire. Exile has affayed the patriotifm of Themistocles, of Cimon, Demosthenes, and Camillus, in contradiction to a fentence of condemnation paffed by their fellow citizens. But our patriots fcorn to manifest their integrity by heaping new fervices upon their ungrateful country. The precious hours of their relegation, are confumed in devifing fchemes for the fubjugation and plunder c, the people whom they profefs to love. They applaud that invafion, of which the avowed object is, to tear from us the dominion of the feas, and to establish the commerce of France upon the ruins of our own.

• Paine's Rights of Man, were diffufed over Ireland with unwearied induftry.—Muir corresponded with the United Irifhmen. He circulated their address throughout Scotland. He proposed, in one of the Scots affiliated Societies, to make a common cause with their Brethren in Ireland, and to answer an address in which the latter had invited them fo to do.

As

As the reprefentative flaves of this imperial flate, they crouch down at those very feasts which prematurely celebrate the triumphs of France in the humiliation of Great Britain. They fawningly lick the feet of those tyrants to whom they look up for the offals of that blood and devastation which may escape from their hands.

Examples, however, are unneceffary to afcertain the fentiments of the United Irifhmen. There is no man who is acquainted with the flate of Ireland, who is not well affured that they would defpife the meagre conceffion, except, fo far as it might prove the means of fresh and more decisive changes; that they are rank, decided, incurable republicans, whose turbulence mildness cannot appease, whose notions of Government no alteration can fatisfy, thort of a constitution established under the influence and guarranteed by the power of Republican France.

We are not bound to feek for other reafons to reject this measure, than its inability to effect the purpose for which it is pressed upon us. It might ferve to animate the hopes of the Republicans, but it would not reconcile them to the present constitution.

Let us, however, affume for an inflant, that this Reform would work all those specious wonders, ders, which its advocates profess; that, fubdued by this potent fpell, the United Irifhmen and Defenders would forget their oaths of rebellion, and their habits of infurrection, and quietly fubfide into the peaceable mais of the industrious community. Let us also suppose, that the Solons, the Lycurgi, the Minos's and Pompilii, of this enlightened fraternity, had unanimoufly concerted a determinate plan, for renovating the Commons House of Parliament. That thefe patient fages, having completed their toilfome refearch into ancient institutes, their accurate furvey of the information and political state of their country, and their fevere fcrutiny of its cuftoms and manners, had felt an infpired concordance of opinions, and, refling from their holy labours. had exultingly proclaimed the conftitution they ant to beftow upon their fellow-citizens, the beft which they had capacity to receive. Let us further suppose, that it is wife to follow the dangerous precedent of conceffion, made in times of diftrefs and danger; a feafon which ftrips liberality of its genuine grace, and makes the largeffes of benevolence refemble the offerings of fear. Let us concede still further, fince concession is to be the ruling principle, that government can loofe nothing of that reverence, which gives fuch a light, but firm hold upon its fubjects, by an unconditional furrender to the haughty demands of an armed rebellious affociation. Still, my dear Sir, objections objections would remain behind, which it feems impofible to furmount.

The majority of the people of Ireland, do not demand this reform, and it would be neither just nor politic to condemn and recast the legislature of a country for the fatisfaction of a turbulent few, to the difguft of the many who are peaceable. It is not the numerous difficulties which muft occur in the plan and execution of every fuch reform that would alone perplex and embarrafs us. A reform in the Irifh Parliament involves a point of ftill greater magnitude and peril than the mere changes which might enfue in the civil regulation of Ireland. It touches the connection of the countries and their union, as one common empire to the very heart. I need not fpecify the reciprocal advantages which refult to the Sifter Kingdoms, from this intimate confolidation of their interefts and their firength. Among the confequences which might follow, if Ireland were to form a diffinet empire, of an inferior order, proportioned to her ftrength, the most prominent is, that flie must lean either upon France or Great Britain for support. From that moment the would become the victim of internal agitation and difquiet. Harraffed by the intrigues of the refpective partizans of her powerful neighbours, during peace, and made the bloody theatre of their most obfinate ftinate conflicts, during war, the would fuffer more than Scotland fuffered previous to the acceffion of James VI. to the English throne. The large fupport which the derives from being confidered as part of a powerful Empire would immediately fink from under her. She could no longer derive any direct advantage from the extended trade, the immenfe capital, or the powerful navy of Great Britain. If the looks at the prefent fituation of America, with respect to foreign powers, fhe will learn to appreciate thefe benefits at their real value. I do not urge this to diminish the advantages which refult to Great Britain from her union with Ireland. They are of the utmost importance. But I do it to shew that the connection is at least as beneficial to. Ireland as to her. He is an enemy to the two countries, who confiders themas feparate powers having diffinct and rival interefts. They are fifters of the fame house, portions of one empire, demanding a reciprocal facrifice of partial accommodations and prejudices to their common good.

When the fituation of the two Iflands is taken up in this light, the legiflature of Ireland appears as the most critical and complicated system of government in Europe. It is not obnoxious to the majority of the people. It is fully comperent to all the beneficial purposes of actual government, and it preferves the harmony and  $E_2$  connection connection of the coutries. Can human underftanding arrogate to itfelf the power of placing the balance more happily than long experience and a fortunate concurrence of events have fixed it? What perfon can fay, he has found a more effectual mean to protect the weaker country from fubjugation on the one hand, or the empire from breaking into pieces on the other? The hiftory of diffinet kingdoms united under one common head, and particularly the fate of those detached fovereignties which conflitute the prefent territories of Spain and France, may teach us not to defpife and reject a fystem which has been gradually finoothed and fhaped down to the habits, the opinions, the interests and the prejudices of the two kingdoms. A great, and therefore a cautious Statefman, would not at any time volunteer an experiment, which might deftroy that fubtle and attracting matter, by which the countries cohere; and thus crumble the whole frame of the empire into disjointed atoms. He would particularly deprecate innovation during the continuance of a dangerous war. He would feel that he might thereby cripple the energies of government, while an artful enemy was fomenting dangerous divisions among the people; and that no alteration could prove falutary, when conceffion and arrangement must depend upon opportunity and fear, in a d of a calm contemplation of expediency and right.

The

The New Whigs, however, with to hatch their reforms in a tranquil feafon. They are the declared advocates of an immediate peace. But they are filent as to the means by which we are to obtain this fair bleffing from Lord Malmefbury's Republic. French the laft negociation has removed any doubts which could exift as to the determination of the Directory to continue the war. It has, in my humble judgment, given us a fatal proof of the ardour with which our cabinet are bent on peace. To prove this, let us advert briefly to the papers laid before Parliament by his Majefty's command.

Soon after the Negociation commenced, the French Plenipotentiaries demanded the abfolute ceffion of all our conquefts "as an indi/pen/ible "preliminary of the negociation of the peace "with England." They requeft our ambaffador to explain himfelf with regard to this reftitution, and to content to it, if he is fufficiently authorifed fo to do; if not, to fend a meffenger to his court, in order to procure him the neceffary powers *. It is replied by Lord Malmefbury "that his inftructions do not authorife him " to admit, as a PRELIMINARY PRINCIPLE, " what the declarations of the French Commif-

* Nothing can give this country a more forcible idea of the fituation of France, than the refult of the ftruggle here alluded to, between the legislative and executive powers of France.

Thucydides, after detailing the political diffentions and maffacres at Corcyra, has fome reflections upon the civil commotions which diffracted Greece, fo applicable to the contefts between the feveral parties in France, that I cannot forbear to quote fome of them. The entire paffage is too long to infert in a note, but it is well worthy of our most ferious attention. The reflections correspond fo exactly with the effects of the French fyftem, fo far as it has extended, that we may anticipate, in the miferies of Greece, the final confequences of its eventual fuccefs in Europe. The refult to that fair and free country, after a most bloody conteft in every one of her feveral governments, and a general war in which fome states were exterminated, was the nified their caufe with the most specious and honourable appellations. Those who were of the democratic interest, described that conftitution, as a state of civil equality, while those who ftruggled in behalf of ariftocracy, extolled it as a government of the politic and wife. All fides professed in their speeches to have no other views than to promote the public good. But their real object was to overcome their rivals and to make the plunder of the community a reward of fuccefs. Influenced by fuch motives they were inflamed with the most deadly animofity against each other, and laboured to accomplish their schemes by the most daring and flagitious actions. Punifhments the moft atrocious and cruel were mutually inflicted, not according to the rules of justice, and the welfare of the fate, but according to their own arbitrary pleafure; for both fides were ready to glut their animofity either with the fentence of an iniquitous tribunal, or by means of affaffination and violence. Religion was univerfally despifed, and to effect the worst of purposes by the delusion of fair, but faithless promises, was admired and applauded. Those citizens who joined neither party were indiferiminately flaughtered by both, either through refertment that they had refused their affistance, or through envy that they were exempt from those calamities which the feveral factions endured. Thus wickednefs existed in every poffible fhape throughout Greece, by means of these civil commotions. Openness of mind which comprehends whatever is generous and noble was banifhed with derifion from focial intercourfe; and to countermine an antagonist by perfidy and diffimulation was preferred as the most honourable road to fuccefs. Wherever reconciliation was attempted no reliance could be placed on the folemnity of a promife or the facred awe of an oath. Hopelefs of a firm and lafting concord, the parties were haraffed in keeping perpetual

The negociators, on the part of France, were immediately changed. The demand of a total ceffion of our conquests as a preliminary to negociation was deliberately renewed, and Lord Malmefbury was defired, if he had not fufficeint powers to make the facrifice, to "RETURN IN " FOUR AND TWENTY HOURS TO HIS " COURT, TO ASK FOR THEM*." It is farther declared to our Ambaffador, that " he " can fee, in this determination of the Executive " Directory, nothing elfe than an intention to " haften the moment when the negociation may " be followed up with the certainty of a fpeedy " conclution." It is likewife faid, that the French Minifters have no orders to leave Lifle. thereby intimating that the return of our Ambaffador was expected, when he fhould have received those instructions of which it is the fovereign petual guard against the mischievous attempts of their feeming friends, whom they found it impossible to trust. In these contests the advantage was commonly obtained by the faction that was most weak and stupid! Conscious of their own desciencies, of the talents of their opponents, and trembling less they should be overcome by superior eloquence, or own-reached by deep laid stratagems, they had recourse boldly, and at once, to arms and violence. While their antagonists despissing their dulness, consident in superior fore-stight, and hesitating to affect by force, what they hoped to accompliss by substety, were attacked unawares and easily destroyed.

Must the nakedness and shame of the country be laid bare to drive the flagging Britons back again to a contest for their liberties and their lives?

The ufurpers of France urge a demand the moft infolent and extravagant that has ever been made upon a nation that was not wholly vanquifhed and undone. It is brought forward, not as a condition of peace, but as a preliminary to treaty* This country is cajoled with hopes that our refufal is acquiefced in. During a

• I am not acquainted with the determination of the Cabinet, as to furrendering up Ceylon, Trinidad, and the Cape of Good Hope in purchase of peace. It appears to me from the terms used in the negociation, that they had resolved to give them up. Upon the impropriety of doing fo, unless the relative fituation of the contending countries should alter confiderably, I have a decided opinion, which I shall give to the public, at a proper opportunity, let who will be Minister. The fagacious Mr. Nicholls regards them as paltry conquests :

pause from diplomatic businets required by the Directory, we are flandered in their public meffages as authors of that delay, which is privately admitted to originate with themfelves.* A public transfaction, between two independent nations, is used merely as an instrument to evert and featter those feeds of liberty, which feemed about to burst and germinate in France. Our advances towards peace are perfidiously employed as means to protract the contest, and foment a more rancorous and deadly animosity in the fubjects of the Republic against the people of England.

When this is effected, we are cast off with fcorn. A torrent of infolence, fcoffs and infult is pour'd down upon the fuppliant head of this petitioning country. The original demand, which had been peremptorily refused, is renewed with the most offensive aggravation. It omits the proposal that an English messer may bear this unconditional furrender on our parts, from the court of St. James's, to its representative in France. Nothing lefs will fatisfy their haughty revenge than that the Ambassador Plenipotentiary, of Great Britain shall post between the countries at the notice of a few hours. empire, shall, with his own hands, bring the liberty, honour and profperity of his nation, bound and haltered to use feet of the French Republic, to explate the heinous offence of prefuming to defend ourfelves. Even after treatment like this, our ambaffador patiently renews the moft reafonable of all reafonable requefts. He begs to know from the Minifters of France, the terms upon which the will vouchfafe to grant us peace.* The propriety of this claim had been previoufly admitted on the part of the Directory. For two months they had deluded us with the hope that they were at work to fatisfy it. Yet, even a boon which could not be refused to an Eastern Rajah is denied to us. They avow that this would not be the laft, nor (to use Lord Malmesbury's words) " perhaps the most humiliating concession "required of us. But they will not condefcend to difclofe to us those conditions which thus "thunder in the index." They refuse to give a contre projet, and tell us, with an infulting fneer, that by thefe means they facilitate, peace.† The ambiguity of the expressions cannot difguife their meaning. the note is, that we are not yet reduced into a fituation even to hear the conditions upon which alone they defign to grant us peace. We are not fufficiently broken down and fubdued to receive the law from the Grande Nation as other ftates have received it; and they will wage eternal war, or accomplifh our ruin.

Conduct fo glaringly perfidious and overbearing, even Mr. Sheridan has refused to defend. He admits, " yet cafting many a lingering look " behind," that our cabinet were fincere in the late negociations for peace; and, that it is the with of the Directory to prolong the war. There are a species of intellectual beggars, however, who must catch up, from very need, the threadbare, caft off fancies of their fuperiors. Mr. Nicholls has avowed his opinion that our ministry were not fincere. The poor man fumbles and grovels in the mire of party politics; and, exultingly shakes his muddy head in the belief, that, by rendering himfelf blind, he obscures the fight of his countrymen *.

Avoiding

• It is but common juffice to Mr. Sheridan to fay, that wherever Mr. Nicholls has picked up his reafon for fupporting the ancient errors of oppofition, he cannot have got them from a gentlemen of undoubted talents. Mr. Sheridan could never have relied upon the mere choice of a Plenipotentiary as a proof of infincerity in our cabinet. He would have drawn a diffinction between the cafe of an Ambassador fent to the court of a Sovereign where fomething might depend upon perfonal influence, and a Plenipotentiary Avoiding to put forward to public contemplation fuch a thing as Mr. Nicholls, let me afk, what genius, what eloquence, or what artifice, can obfcure from the eyes of Great Britain the implacable refentment and dreadful projects of her rival? As pledges of her refolution for war, we have her contemptuous infolence upon our fupplications for peace; her infuriate denunciations of vengeance; her pointed public profcription of every thing that is dear and valuable to the country. We have her vigorous and immediate preparations to realize all that fhe has threatened; and we are required to put in balance againft thefe, the 'affertions of a few ambitious, difap-

Plenipotentiary fent to conclude a treaty at an hundred miles diftance from the refidence of the French Executive power .---Neither could Mr. Sheridan, who underftands and writes good English, and I believe French, interpret the words " another " choice would have appeared to the Directory to augur more " favourably for the fpeedy conclusion of peace" into a manifeftation of perfonal diflike to Lord Malmesbury. He could only construe it into a forry and indecent fneer upon the frequent miffion of couriers during the former negociation. We have already feen, from which fide the delay that took place did in fact proceed. If we were to allow the French to choofe a Plenipotentiary for us, they would, doubtless, felect Mr. Nicholls himfelf, instead of Lord Malmesbury. It would be their interest to appoint a felf-prefuming, politive, passionate, dull, and wrong-headed man. The deep reasonings of Citizen De Lacroix, and the folid diftinctions of Citizen Treilhard, would appear to fomewhat greater advantage in the hiftory of their diplomatic conferences than they do at present.

* I have feen a pamphlet of Lord Lauderdale's, intituled " A Letter on the prefent Measures of Finance". It feems that the noble Author is of the fame opinion with Mr. Nicholls. He undoubtedly fnews confiderable tafte and judgment in the felection of his partners in political measures. He joins Mr. Nicholls in his acculation of Ministers, and meekly shares the hisses of the Livery of London as a Candidate for the office of Sheriff in conjunction with Mr. Waddington. If I were to animadvert upon this pamphlet in very harfh terms, the noble Earl could have no right to complain ; for few publications contain fuch bold and unqualified epithets as his own. But fome allowance is to be made for an active mind, in which zeal is more confpicious than judgment ; and we may forgive that fpleen which boils and frets itfelf down in a pamphlet when it is denied all other means of vent. The noble Lord declares, " that he has never been able to different " in the prefent Ministry any real intention to recover the blef-" fings of peace". p. 7. The frequent attempts of the Ministry to negociate; their repeated declarations to that purpofe; and the flubborn infolence of the enemy, have no influence with the noble Author. Although Ministers facrifice their perfonal quiet; although they hazard their continuance in power ; although no private emolument can pollibly refult to them from a prolongation of war, the noble Lord " hat never been able to remark any fin-" cere inclination in them to fhew the enemy that we wished for " the curlufion of a treaty." If he has any reafons for his affertions diffinct from a love of power and place, he ought to advance them; fince every probable motive to which we can attribute the actions of man unite to contradict him. He admits that " they have been greatly fuccefsful in conveying to the minds of " the people of this country, that the failure of their attempt to " treat, refted with the French, and not with them". For this he is pleafed to affign a caufe no one elfe has ventured to bring forward, ed honour of the country, if her unexampled victories are infufficient to " ferew our courage to the forward, and of which, he hinfelf will be finally afhamed. His words are, " this fuccefs originates, in a great measure, from a " caufe as novel in itfelf as difgraceful to its devifers. Hitherto " the communications laid before the public by government, on " any negociation whatever, whether fuccefsful or unfuccefsful, " have been merely official. The ideas of giving minute and " mutilated flatements of private conversations never did nor ever " could enter the head of any confiderate flatefman". p. 8. He then proceeds to obferve, " that thefe flatements naturally en-" creafe the exifting animolity between the two countries". p. 8. The country, and the Ministry, and Lord Midmefbury, &c. have a right to domand from the noble Earl upon what authority he makes this charge ; which, if true, is an high crime and mildemeanour in the guilty. If this mutilation was wilfully committed by our Ambaffador when in France, it may exculpate the cabinet; but it implicates the honour, the fidelity, and liege duty of that excellent perfon, who was entrufted by his fovereign to negoeiate for the interefts of his people. If they were made by Minifters at home, it is a piece of weak, unnecellary, and dangerous forgery. The dispatches themselves must remain in the Treasury, and, upon a change of Ministry, the detection would be inevitably made. But whence is it that the noble Lord collects the fact that those conversations are mutilated and misrepresented ? Can he fay, that their tenor contradicts the official papers, and that thefe last are not alone fufficient to prove, that the negociation was broken off by France ? If they correspond in fubstance with the written notes of the Ministers on both fides, as they most affuredly do, his Lordship must have some other sources of information. I had thought, that the noble Peer's correspondents in France had long fince fuffered the laft punishment of their atheifm, of their treafen, and of their animofity against England, which can be inflicted on this fie' the grave. If he has filled the flicking place," let us look to the fate of Europe. Let us view the fhrunk and withered finews up the void which the deaths of Briffot, and Condorcet have left in his heart, his new French friends have mifinformed him ; fince the Directory have never contradicted those details given by Lord Malmefbury, either of the first or last negociation. The country is entitled, therefore, to confider our Ambaffador's account of the negociation as true, at least until fome grounds are pointed out to shake its probability. Let me ask then, upon what principle fhould the truth be concealed from the people? Does the noble Earl with that England thould be kept in the dark, upon fubjects which it imports her fo nearly to know, that his friends may deceive her with falfe accounts of the transaction, and afcend into power by rendering us diffatisfied with war, when peace is unattainable. But it is faid, that this account will encreafe the animofity between the countries. With refpect to England, I deny the fact. The country is indeed wifely and prudently determined to profecute the war, fince the cannot terminate it with honour and with fafety; but the King, and his Minifters, and his people, are willing even now to forget their wrongs, and to conclude a treaty, if the ambition of France will ftoop to it. With refpect to France herfelf, it is utterly impossible that thefe statements could have that effect ascribed to them in this pamphlet. The Directory took every poffible precaution to keep our account of the negociation fecret from the people. They immediately suppressed what may be called the Opposition Newspapers throughout the Republic ; and prohibited the importation of Forcign Journals, left their fubjects should be made acquainted with the truth. This fact alone is amply fufficient to prove that our flatement of the negociation is accurate even in the mind of the Directory itself .- They did not fo much as dare to lay before the two Councils, or to publish in the Redacteur, the terms of peace which we tendered in the treaty delivered to their Plenipotentiaries. They did not transmit to them any one of the officialnotes finews of every country, over which the rapacious and deadly arm of this necellitous republic has paffed.

The neutrality of Genoa and Vehice were forupuloufly obferved, at least with respect to the enemies of France. In return for the inaction of these governments which preferved the French in Italy, they have been utterly destroyed upon notes which paffed between our Ambaffador and theirs: It is fair to infer from thence that the official papers were confidered by them as being alone fufficient to prove, that the negociation was for a time delayed, and finally broken off by themfelves. They were afraid to truft the judgment of the French upon their grofs and outrageous treatment of this country. I will leave it to the reader's own good fenfe to draw by mulufion upon the candor and motives of the noble Autho a making fuch a rafly mischievous, and ill-founded affertion. I shall take notice of fome other of his politions hereafter; among the reft, I shall obfeive upon an affertion common to him and many others, viz. that the French will not make peace with Mr. Pitt and the prefent Administration. There would be fo much abfurdity, difgrace, and mifchief in choosing a cabinet which is to conclude peace according to the pleafure of France, that it cannot admit of a ferious argument. But I shall close this fubject for the prefent with observing, that the only documents which manifelt a predilection on the part of France for particular perfons, are some of the public toafts of their government. These celebrate Mr. Muir, and the diftreffed Patriots of Ireland and Scotland. If, therefore, we are to felect a cabinet fuited to the inclinations of the Directory, it is from fuch men we are to choose them ; in other words, we must fubmit to change our government as one of the conditions of peace.

pretexts the moft frivolous and unjuft. The poffeflions of the ftate, and the private property of the inhabitants, have been feverally feized and fwallowed up as the lawful fpoils of thefe mercilefs invaders. Venice, the moft ancient power in Europe, has been bartered to the Emperor in a fhamelefs traffic, for a part of his dominions more immediately convenient to the aggrandizement of France.

Through the fame fatal attachment to political quietifm, Switzerland endured the murder of her fubjects, the violation of her frontiers, and the demand of a tribute. But patience and fubmiflion confritute the very worft defence againft the attacks of an ambitious and profligate neighbour. All that fhe has purchafed by her endurance is, the certainty of war without the hope of an ally to fupport her; and the profpect of a revolution without the chance of a ftruggle to avert it.

There is no poffible ihape whereby diffinst potentates can connect or interfere with each other, in which fome exitting government has not dealt where France. Neutrality, negociation, treaty, alliance, fubmiflion, have been feverally tried, and with the fame fuccefs. The prefent, fituation and hiftory of Europe, does not furnish even one folitary inflance in which that country has has refpected her own faith or the rights of her neighbours, when they flood oppofed to her plans of univerfal dominion and immediate plunder .----I have already defcribed the refult of neutrality in the cataftrophes of Genoa and Venice, and in the impending fate of the Swifs Cantons. Her inftantaneous violation of the preliminary articles figned at Udina, and her prefent conduct towards the Germanic empire, in the feizure of Mentz. are fufficient evidence of her utter difregard and contempt of treaties. Or if it be neceffary to make good the charge by other inftances, we may point at Tufcany, Sardinia, and the Pope. Let those who in suppleness of spirit with to appeaze her by fubmillion, confider the imprifonment of the Ambaffador of Portugal, and the contemptuous treatment of the Minister from Sweden. Yet further, if these examples are infufficient to cool the ardor for French alliance, let us look to her conduct towards the Dutch Provinces, and the American States. She confiders America as an enemy, and makes prize of her fhipping for having prefumed to exercife the right of an independent power in concluding a treaty with Great Britain,

But above all the reft, Holland ftands forth a confpicuous and melancholy warning to the world of the dangerous infatuation of confiding in French professions instead of trusting to the efficacy proceed from this republic under the names of freedom and alliance.

I make no doubt, my dear Sir, that the people of this country perceive, from the manner in which all our advances towards peace have been refused, and from the treatment which other nations have received from France, that our fafety and prosperity can be fecured by no other means than by a manly and refolute profecution of the War.

Inftances foflagrant as those which I have pointed out, must prevent us from erroneously estimating the temper and conduct of republican France, by fuch feelings and principles as influence the fpirit of hoftilities among civilized nations. They must impress most indelibly on our minds the firm conviction of her animofity against us, of her envy and dread of our commercial profperity, of her utter contempt of the rights of all other nations. Yet, even these acts of perfidy and injustice are furpaffed by one, which has occurred fince I fat down to write. You have anticipated me no doubt when I refer to the Directory's decree denying the use of their ports to any ship that trades to Great Britain, and enacting that the poffeffion of British produce or manufacture shall fubject a neutral veffel and her cargo to confifcation as lawful prize. Under the express title of Conque-

Conquerors of Europe, the Grand Nation has determined to prefcribe a new and monftrous law to neutral ftates. She proclaims a code to fyftematize her piracies by fea, as fhe had formerly done to regulate her robberies by land. The ordonation of this decree is a direct attack upon the property and commercial rights of every other nation. It is an attempt to extend over Europe that title to levy general contributions on neutral flates which the has actually enforced at Hamburgh. Already has France exacted two heavy tributes from that imperial city at two different periods, to fave her from pillage. In defiance of the rights of neutrality, and of her express convention with Pruflia, the has now again fent a commissioner to demand an additional payment in money, and a rigorous compliance with her recent decree.

Should Europe acquiefce in this groß infraction of the common rights of nations, fhe bends her neck to receive the univerfal yoke which it is the avowed determination of France to impofe. If fhe refufes, it is a direct declaration of war, and the northern powers must take up arms to vindicate their independence. England as the first commercial nation in Europe, could not fubmit to this decree if it had been levelled at any other ftate. But aimed as it is, to draw the life-blood of our greatness, it must teach us the true value of of French professions, of fraternity, philanthrophy, and a love of peace. It marks the real object for which we have to contend against France. It is not for Trinidad nor Tricomale as the New Whigs pretend, but for the very fource of all our prosperity and wealth. It is the commerce of Europe, of which they labour to deprive us. It is for the honourable opulence of our merchants, for the fupport of our people, for the very bread of industry which this audacious and grasping Republic would dash down from the Hands of the poor and of their families, that we are forced to continue the war.

Ought it to be felt as a doubt among an enlightened people whether they fhall contribute a portion of their property to fecure the reft. To preferve what is ten thousand times more precious to us than riches,---the independence of the country, the continuance of focial order, and of domestic tranquility.

The great body of the people, both in the capital and in the country, acquiefce in the neceffity of raifing large fupplies to maintain the war. The plan, however, which has been fuggefted for the purpofe has not been fo generally approved of. Many parifhes in the metropolis, have condemned, by exprefs refolutions, the new fcheme of of taxation proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and recently fanctioned by Parliament. Some of the objections which have been thus made, were bottomed in a total misconception of the objects and provisions of the bill. Others have been ultimately removed by those modifications which it received as it passed through the committee, at a period long subsequent to these meetings.

The New Whigs, however, have tried to raife the public indignation against the measure by the harsheft, and most opprobrious demunciation of its principle. The Earl of Lauderdale, also, has honoured a pamphlet with his name to expose its impolicy and wickedness. It is formewhat in vindication of the noble writer that few of the fentiments which are to be found in his work originate with himself.* He has merely lent his pen, to record the objections of his party, and there is little in the tract which has not appeared in the newspaper reports of opposition spectres, and in the resolutions of a meeting of Citizens at the Crown and Anchor. Regarding the objec-

* I shall fay nothing of the fourrilous terms which his Lordship has applied to Mr. Pitt, as I am perfuaded that, upon more mature reflection, he will wish to have omitted them. pen tions, therefore, which are flated by his Lordfhip, as those upon which his party rely, I fhall examine them briefly.

. He states that the bill contains two principles.

1st. " It afferts that raising part of the supplies " of the year by an affeffment on property, is pre-" ferable to the means which this country has " uniformly practifed.

2nd. " It maintains that the Affeffed Taxes " form the beft evidence of property, and afford, " of courfe, the beft criterion for imposing fuch " an affeffment,"

I fhall proceed to examine the reasoning of the noble Author on both these points.

In objecting to this plan. as a mode of raifing the fupplies, he urges, that fuppofing the fyftem of funding, to be wrong, yet that we ought to perfevere in it, with the view of " convincing the " enemy of our means*." His Lordfhip is as ready here to affume, for the convenience of his argument, that the French may be deceived by fuch an artifice, as he was, a few pages before, to affert their accurate knowledge of our diftreffed fituation†. But I omit to dwell upon this feeming

inconfistency, or to enquire whether we might not purchase this opinion of our refources at too high a price. It will be sufficient to examine the main ground of the argument.

He agrees with Mr. Pitt, that it is wife to imprefs the enemy with an idea of the great extent of our ability to carry on the war in our method of raifing the fupply. So fenfible is he of the ufefulnefs of doing fo, that he advifes the attempt though it were to be attended with a pecuniary lofs to the country. His Lordship differs only as to the means which will produce the effect. He has not pointed out what circumftances he conceives peculiar to the fyftem of funding, which must implant this idea of our incalculable opulence in the minds either of foreigners or natives. So far as I can confider the queftion, the prefent fcheme of taxation feems preferable, upon this very account to that which is patronifed by his Lordthip, fince it poffeffes, in a more eminent degree, every quality which can infpire fuch an opinion in a reflecting mind.

Thefe are, the magnitude of the fupply to be raifed; the facility with which it is raifed; and the ability and willingnefs of the people to repay it. The quantum of the fupply is exactly the fame, to whichever fystem we refort. The facility of borrowing fuch parts of it, as muft must be borrowed, cannot be dimissed but it may be encreased by this plan. This must naturally happen, inasmuch as the prospect of payment is more speedy. Lastly, the ability and willingness of the people to repay is thus rendered more manifest fince they undertake to raise a third of the supply within the year, and to discharge the whole of what is borrowed in less than three.

His Lordship's next objection is, that, fuppofing the prefent fystem of taxation to be the best, it should have been adopted before, upwards of 200,000,0001. had been added to our debt*.

When the noble Earl makes this obfervation, he feems to forget the maxim of the poet, which is worn trite, from its frequent and ufeful application to the œconomy of life.

Est modus in rebus; sunt certi denique fines Quos ultra, citraque nequit confistere rectum

So far as Mr. Pitt has raifed the fupplies upon the fyftem of funding, his conduct must be approved by Lord Lauderdale, fince he recommends the measure to his country now. But it does not follow, by any means, that reasons may not, and do not exist, which would render it

highly pernicious to purfue the fame financial pl. s during the prefent crifis, which it was wife and falutary to adopt at the former period. In confequence of the very exorbitant terms upon which government must borrow, at prefent, the following detrimental confequences would refult from the immediate funding of a confiderable loan, in compliance with his Lordfhip's advice, 1ft. The high interest given by government would render it extremely difficult, if not impoflible, for the industrious merchant and manufacturer to borrow money to fupport their trade. 2nd. To add to the quantity of public flock, would neceffarily depreciate its value, and this muft operate as a very heavy tax upon transfers, without being of any fervice to the state. 3d. The terms upon which a large loan could be made at prefent, are fo very difadvantageous to the country, that the exifting inhabitants who conftitute the community, would pay the whole furn borrowed, three times over during their lives in permanent taxes, and ftill leave their posterity encumbered with the debt.

Whether the noble Author has weighed thefe objections or not, he declares it to be "his decid-"ed opinion that funding is the best and most pru-"dent means of defraying the extended expences "of modern warfare," (p. 20.*) When he forms this

* His Lordship has supported his preference of the funded syftem with confiderable ingenuity. He condenses the whole of his argument this opinion, he must differ at least from his friend Mr. Fox, who fuppofes that our national debt is the best ally of France. I fay this, becaufe, notwithstanding the republican toasts which diftinguished the last commemoration of Mr. Fox's birth-day, at the Crown and Anchor, I hope that it is wholly impossible that his Lordship could support a fystem, whose operation must be favourable to our enemy.

Having thus condemned the plan of raifing part of the fupplies within the year, by a comparative preference given to the funded fyftem, his Lordfhip proceeds to attack the measure more directly in the following argument. He ftates it to be the wifh of the Minister, to fecure by his plan, a tenth of the income of individuals. That, argument in the two following propolitions, 1st. " That money raifed by affuming a proportion of the property of all, must occafion a greater loss to every country, than a fum of a fimilar extent borrowed by voluntary fubfeription, except we can find a Nation where the whole property is fo employed as to produce equally" and. " That the measure of that loss must be a per centage on the fum borrowed equal to the produce of the leaft productive part of the property and the avarage produce of the whole," (p. 22) If the whole fum required by government from the people were to be taken in one day, his Lordships observation would be true to a confiderable extent. But when the fum is to be taken gradually, as it is by the prefent act of parliament, it will, in truth, come from that part of the national capital which is least productive, just as it would in the cafe of a voluntary loan. The only difference is that private individuals become borrowers from the least productive part of national capital, instead of Government.

if he fucceeds, he must of course, diminish the national expenditure in a proportional degree. Thus, fays the noble author, if the revenue depending upon confumption, is 17,400,0001. by diminishing the income of the people, you will strike off a tenth of the expenditure, or 1,740,0001. which is an extravagant premium for raising 7,000,0001.*

Taking it for granted that the noble author has rightly stated the object of the bill, this argument is a little at variance with his affertion, that " the Affeffed Taxes do not afford any " evidence of real expenditure†," and his farther declaration, that " the midling claffes of " merchants and manufacturers, have very ge-" nerally outlived their incomest." I am perfuaded that his Lordship must give entire credit to this last affertion, or he would not have made it. It is not a very venial trefpafs in a man of birth and fashion, to exceed his fortune, although he may hope to difcharge his debts by a fudden vault into fome lucrative office. But, for that industrious class, against whom the charge is now made, notorioufly to exceed their income, is fuch fcandalous and difgraceful conduct, that no perfon who afpires to become a demi-fheriff of London and Mid-

dlefex, would utter the remark, if it had not been wrenched from him in a firm conviction of its truth. Undoubtedly, the statement is as unjust as it is injurious. But the point is to be fettled between the " middling classes of mer-" chants and manufacturers." and his Lord-I have only to obferve, in answer to this fhip. argument, 1st. That in cafes where people exceed their income, a diminution of that income does not, of neceffity, caufe a proportionate diminution of expenditure, 2d. That if the affeffed taxes are no evidence of national expenditure, the direct ratio of their augmentation, cannot afcertain the proportion of its confequential decreafe.

It is not fufficient however, to point out the inconfiftency of this argument, with fome of his Lordship's other positions. He relies upon it in most of his reasonings against the bill, and it is but candid to difcufs its intrinfic value.

It is defective upon no lefs than three grounds. Iff. It is not proved that this preffure can not operate, as every other onerous tax has operated in England, namely, to give fuch a ftimulus to ingenuity and industry, as will caufe the income of individuals to increase in a proportion fufficient to answer their increasing burthens. 2d. Although this flould be impracticable, cable, yet as the tax falls upon the rich, it fhould be shewn that it is not to be deducted from the annual increase of national capital, but that it must necessarily produce a retrenchment in general expenditure*. 3d. The statement upon which his Lordship forms his deduction, is altogether erroneous. He grounds his argument upon the supposition, that a tenth of the whole national income will be taken away, and that the national expenditure must confequently be reduced in the same proportion.

But it is by no means the fact that every man is to be taxed in the proportion of a terth of his income, although it is provided that his taxes thall never exceed it. The lower claffes of the community, and the direct taxes upon property, are altogether exempted from the increafe. Those who are fubject to it, are affeffed in an augmenting fcale, proportioned to their prefent payments. If, therefore, the principle

* In a poor country, rifing rapidly in population, there is no part of its capital which is unemployed. But in a rich country, where population is rather flationary than progreffive, there is a great fum of capital which is not beneficially employed. Larger floating capitals are kept by many individuals to anfwer the demands of trade, than is required for its actual extent. Anyone, who has had occafion to fee how trade is carried on in the different ends of this ifland, knows that much lefs floating capital is found requifite in Scotland than is deemed neceffary in England in proportion to the actual capital employed in trade.

were conceded to the noble Earl, that a proportional diminution of our revenues, ariling from expenditure, must refult from this additional tax, ftill his eftimate of the confequent annual deficiency would be grofsly exceffive. For as much lefs than a tenth of the income is affumed. the expenditure cannot be diminished in the proportion of a tenth. There exifts, therefore, but little chance, that those habits of abstinence will take place, which are fo gravely deplored and deprecated by the Right Honourable Financier, as a dangerous evil.

If any practice of the temperate virtues could give them the falutary controul of cuftoms over the nation, in the fhort period of "two years " and a quarter," it would be a cheap purchafe to the country, although the amount of the tax fhould be fcattered to the winds. He is but a vulgar Statefman, who regards the people as a mere inftrument to reproduce capital, and to fubmit to taxation. There are other circumftances. upon which the energy, the ftrength, the freedom and the happiness of a country must depend. The hardihood of a laborious life, the frugal temperance of manners, the manly fenfe of independence, may be rotted away by luxury, and they are not to be compenfated by revenue. If England does not now poffefs the noble firmnefs to facrifice her luxuries, in order to preferve ferve her independence, the basis of her prosperity is fapped and destroyed. We are reduced to that very state with which Mr. Sheridan infulted the nation when he afferted that our luxury left no comparison between the inhabitants of England and Rome.

The noble Lord next attacks what he calls the fecond principle of the bill, viz. " that the " affeffed taxes form the beft evidence of pro-" perty, and are of courfe the beft criterion for " collecting an aliquot part of men's eftates"." He afferts, that to fupport this principle, three pofitions muft be maintained. 1ft. That the Affeffed Taxes form a criterion of real expenditure. 2d. That expenditure is a criterion of income. 3d. That income affords a juft criterion of property†.

I fhall examine these positions briefly, becouse, in truth, it is not necessary to maintain any one of them, to justify the principle of the bill.

The first position which is controverted by the noble author, has no reference to the bill when it is confidered as a general principle without any limitation. The error of fuch reasoning,

becomes immediately apparent, as foon as it is obferved that the chief inftances by which he demonstrates the fallacy of the proposition, are exceptions provided for by the ftatute itfelf. His Lordship is right when he remarks, that houfes and horfes are not mere objects of idle confumption. They may either be used and occupied as objects of voluntary expence, or as the inftruments and means of profit and livelihood. But when the bill expressly preferves thefe articles from the general operation of the principle, by an anxious and fpecific provision, it is neither fair nor candid in the noble author, to cite those very inconveniences which the bill excepts against, as proofs of its abfurdity and injustice. Here I cannot help remarking, that the noble financier feems not even to have confidered the nature and extent of those Affeffed Taxes, which form the fubject matter upon . which this act is to operate. The Printing houfe of his Lordship's Printer, is the most unfortunate illustration of his argument, that he could poffibly produce. If the Statefman had looked into the flatute book, inftead of afferting that the affeffed taxes " formed no inconfiderable " deduction from his Printer's profits," he would have learned, that a building fo occupied, was altogether exempted from the houfe and window duty.

85

If

If his Lordship's opposition to his own remaining propositions is allowed to be just, it will not advance his attack upon the meafure Though expenditure fhould not be the itfelf. criterion of income, nor income of capital, this is no good reafon to condemn a fystem, in which the tax is not levied upon the incomings of the The real object of the prefent tax is, payer. that a part of the means of the wealthy, proportioned to what they expend in idle confumption, fhould be applied to the exigencies of the ftate. Income is not the fubject of the tax; it is only a means to prevent its partial excefs. The gains of the poor, and the return of capital, employed folely in commerce, are exempted altogether. Where a man's productive income falls short of 2001. per annum, he cannot pay more than, in a prefcribed fcale of proportions, much below a tenth of the whole. When it rifes above 2001. the ftatute provides, that the tax shall never exceed the proportion of a tenth, but whether the individual is to pay up to that amount, is regulated, in either cafe by the fum of his affeffed expenditure.

The inftance, therefore, which is proposed by the noble Author, to prove the grofs impropriety and hardfhips of this act, namely, that the incomes of a landed gentleman of 1000l. per annum, and that of a merchant, which is of equal amount, amount, are taxed by it to a fimilar extent, must rarely occur. According to the common courfe of œconomy, individuals do not expend in idle confumption, fums proportioned to their income, but to the whole of their capital. When a gentleman, therefore, owns an estate of 1000l. a year, he may expend that entire fum in his houfe, his horfes, and his dogs. But the merchant whofe trade, yields him an income to an equal amount, is fenfible of its precarious duration. He does not expend one half of it in articles which are liable to Affeffed Taxes. He faves as much as he can, and traffics with all he can fave. It undoubtedly may, and will happen, that this tax must fall unequally, when a man regulates his expenditure by his income, instead of his capital. But no scheme of taxation has ever been devifed, which does not fall with partial heavinefs upon particular perfons. Those who exceed their revenue, and those who live up to it, when it is of a temporary nature, are not intitled to particular care from the ftate. The former is injuffice to a man's family, and a fraud upon his creditors; the latter may be exempt from the fecond imputation, but is equally liable to the first. No government is to protect and favor extravagance by its fifcal provisions, and if the prefent law is fo far fumptuary, as to prevent or punish these mif chiefs, it will produce a most beneficial effect.

The

The noble Earl having thus unequivocally condemned the object and principle of the law, proceeds to arraign fome of its particular regulations.

His first ground of complaint, is, that it has a retrospect.*

The time from which the ftatute begins to operate, was fixed at a date fo very little prior to that of its passing, that it hardly deferves to be noticed. I own, indeed, that the most fpecious objection which has been made against the bill, is, that it deprives the people of the cuftomary option, to avoid the tax, by difcontinuing expenditure. This provision, however, is in perfect confiftence with the principle of the bill. Individuals are to contribute in proportion to their means-and their Affeffed Taxes are the measure of their contribution. If the provision had not been adopted, the tax would have been levied, not in proportion to the ability of the payers, but according to their feveral difpositions. Many perfons would have discontinued their equipage from parsimony. Others would have fought confolation for a facrifice of their immediate comforts, in the little triumph of having difappointed and dif-

treffed the Minifter. The provision cannot be generally burthenfome, fince those who put down their horfes, carriages or fervants, must fave more than the amount of the tax, by this diminution of their expenditure. If the capacity of the party has decreased yet further, it is in his power to exonerate himself by declaration and oath, that the affestiment exceeds a tenth of his income.

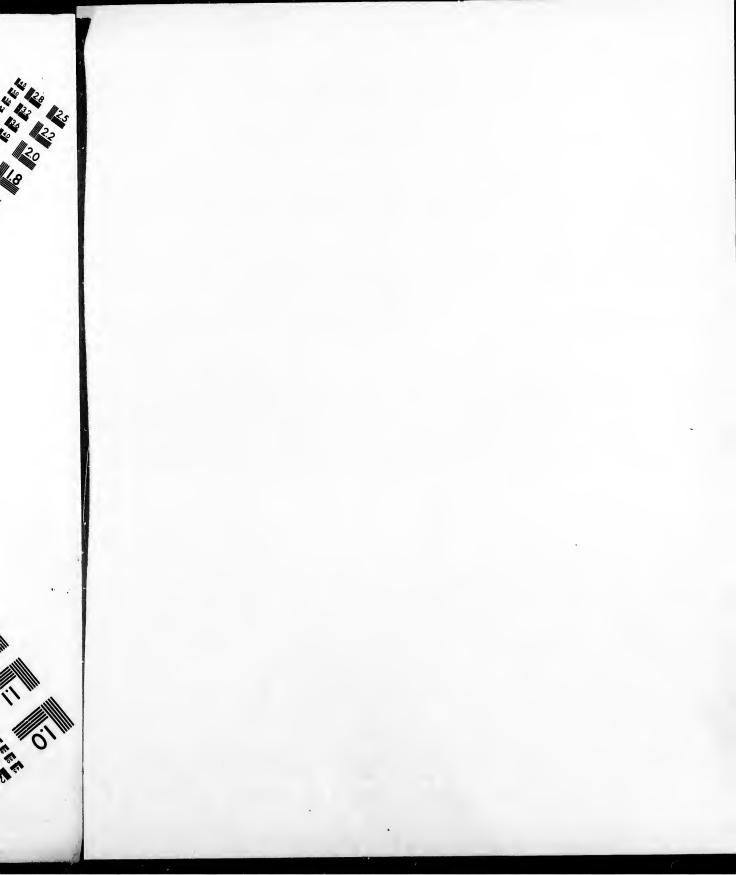

His Lordship, however impugns this mode of relief upon moral and religious confiderations, and urges that it may promote perjury and every fpecies of immorality*. This remark is accompanied with a fneer against the truly respectable and virtuous member for Yorkfhire, fo obvious, that I cannot fuppofe the noble Lord is more ferious in the obfervation than Mr. Sheridan, by whom it is was originally made, with its prefent point. If thefe grave and auftere guardians of religion; if thefe new Catos, do really confider the public morals, as endangered by the temptation held out in the confequences of this oath, let them proceed more fundamentally and fystematically to work. They must, in the fame spirit, put down all oaths at the Cuftom-houfe. They must reform all proceedings in Courts of excleniaftical, equitable, and even criminal jurifdiction. In every one of thefe judicial tribunals, an oath is taken to redrefs the wrongs, or recover the rights of the perfon who takes it. When our pious cenfors have furveyed this wide extent of their projected reformation, they will perceive that to enforce a beneficial regulation by an oath, is neither irreligious nor immoral, provided it cannot be effected fo completely by any other means.

A more ferious objection, which has been urged against it is, that "it forces a positive "disclosure of the state of the affairs of those "who choose to benefit by it*." It is, in the language of the noble Lord, a public "pro-"clamation to the world of a man's folly, or his "calamity; and, in both cases, the downfal of "his credit must ensue."

It was impossible, my dear Sir, to forbear a fmile at perusing this objection, which originated in the parochial resolutions of a great commercial city. A minute disclosure of a merchant's affairs, at some particular juncture, when moss of his means are in fupposition, would no doubt affect his credit. An inquisitorial ferutiny into private books and funds, would at all times prove detrimental to commerce, and destructive to liberty. But it does not feem fo easy to point out in what manner a fair difclofure, by the individual himfelf, of his annual average income, for three fucceflive years, can deprive a commercial man of any credit, to which he is juftly entitled from his ability to difcharge his engagements.

If one of our Bond-street acquaintance, were to continue his curricle and splendid retinue, in order to maintain his credit after his estate was gone, his coachmaker, his taylor and the remaining victims to this delusive appearance, would regard it as a swindling trick. They would do so with great justice, whether he had lost his estate from folly or misfortune; by a throw of the dice, or a defect in his title.

In what refpect does the inftance which I have put, differ from that which a conclave of fhopkeepers, in their parifh veftry, conceive to be fuch a valuable city privilege, that they publicly impeach a bill which gives a collateral check to the practice? The noble Lord applies ftrongly to the human feelings, when he puts the cafe of an individual, reduced in his means by misfortune. But it has not hitherto been contended, either in the moral or political forum, that misfortune can juftify any man in affuming the falfe appearance of wealth, to obtain a degree of credit which his actual property is unable to fupport.

His

His Lordship, however, labours much more feduloufly to defend the cafe of merchants, who exceed their income from their perfonal folly. He reprefents it as a very general evil, and afferts that the middling clafs of merchants and manufacturers, " ftruggling to fupport their credit, " have very generally outlived their income"." If the fact be fo, what can refult from fuch conduct, but bankruptcy? Is the perfon who plunges deeper into extravagance from day to day, likely to benefit his creditors by a farther extension of his credit? Is it not better that fuch a man fhould endure the natural fruits cf his folly, than that his honeft and industrious neighbours, who live within their income, (which I will venture to fay, are 99 out of 100 of the mercantile and manufacturing claffes of this country) should become sufferers from a credit that is obtained by deceit.

The only remaining objection which is made in this Pamphlet, ftrikes at the profeffed principle of the measure. His Lordthip contends, that it does not exempt the poor from affeffment—that, on the contrary, they " will be at " leaft common fufferers with others, and pro-" bably greater fufferers, than the claffes whofe " affeffments are augmented†."

P. 35.

If ·

If this argument has any weight, it goes to prove that no part of the fupplies should be raifed within the year by taxation, as the burthen must ultimately fall upon the poor. It must proceed this length, becaufe it never can be contended, that when the fame amount of taxes are laid exclusively upon the rich, they will fall heavier upon the poor than if they had been directly imposed upon both. The reasoning upon which his Lordship founds this conclusion is, the fame which he had urged before, to prove it a most extravagant fystem of raising the supply. He contends, that the tax must cause a reduction of expenditure among the rich, to an equal amount, and, by confequence, a fimilar deduction from the earnings of the poor. I have already flown the fallacy of fuppoing that the confumption of the rich, will be diminished by any thing like the total produce of the tax. But if the fuppolition were juft, it would not follow that the earnings of the poor would be reduced in the flighteft degree. Whether the fum remains in the pockets of the rich, or paffes into the hands of government, it does no more than change the perfon who diffributes it, and is ultimately laid out among the people. Such a change is to a certain extent, beneficial to the nation. It would be given, by the wealthy in general, to coach-makers, taylors, fervants, jewellers, picture-mongers, and toy-men. It is tranfferred by government, to fhipwrights, ropemakers.

makers, breeders of cattle, growers of corn, and to the labouring poor; classes of the community whom it is of much greater importance to the country to cherifh and fupport, than those who profit by it in the other alternative.

I am extremely forry to hear it fo vehemently preffed by his Lordship, that the confequences of the ftatute will fall most heavily upon the midling clafs of merchants and manufacturers, and upon the labouring poor. The observations are utterly repugnant to fact, and it requires a confiderable portion of charity to believe that the author can be ignorant of their obvious tendency to excite general difcontent, at a period when the efforts of every honeft man should be employed to calm the popular mind. But although, I may acquit the noble Lord of any defign to produce, by milreprefentation, a confequence thus wicked and abominable, I must affert, that his pamphlet can have no other effect. His Lordship is in possession of confiderable talents. and private virtues. Perhaps the first are more congenial to any other species of political difquifition, than that of detailed and fober calculation which he has chosen for himself. Certainly the last can receive no confolation if the film of party zeal fhould ever become purged from his eyes, in reflecting that the falle conclusions which he labours to eftablish, might raife the moft most dangerous classes of fociety in rebellion, against a measure defigned for their peculiar happiness and protection.

In a fcheme of taxation fo new and extensive. fome imperfections must undoubtedly occur. Particular cafes of hardship, which contradict the general principle and defign of the meafure, may poffibly be picked out by perfevering malignity. But as time and experience reveal any latent inconvenience, the wifdom of the legiflature will provide a remedy. In most instances, the fame experience will evince the folly of those objections which factious and felf-interested clamour has raifed against it. Confidering the general principle, and cautious provisions of the Bill, I do not hefitate to pronounce it the most fplendid inftance of the integrity and fifcal skill of that Minister, to whose talents for finance the recent prosperity of the empire is an everlasting monument. He has boldly met the perils of our fituation, and wifely extracted from our danger the means of our fafety. He has nobly difdained to rifk the glory of the country, and the happinefs of posterity, in a felfish fear that his perfonal popularity may be obscured for a seafon. Nor is the meafure lefs glorious to the great body of the people of Great Britain. The higher claffes willingly fubmit to difcharge this heavy contribution; most affuredly not less for the fafety ty and happinels of the poor, than for their own fecurity. It is a cheering proof, that neither our antient good fenfe, nor patriotifm, nor love of genuine freedom, have entirely difappeared.— That people are truly and alone worthy of an honourable peace, who can patiently bear those burthens, and hardships, and dangers which are neceffary to procure it.

You are well aware, my dear Sir, that if fuch a peace could be obtained, it must be fought for most earneftly by his Majefty's Ministers. They can reap little elfe, from a continuance of hostilities, than an incleafe of anxiety and care. If private gain be an objest with any Member of the Cabinet, war, which hazards his place, adds nothing to his immediate emolument. In the hour of victory, they only thare that exultation which every Englissiman feels in the triumphant valour of his countrymen. In the day of difappointment and defeat, the whole burthen of national difpleafure falls exclufively upon them. Every circumstance and accident which thwarts the public hope, is imputed to their want of judgment or of honefty. The difcomfiture of foreign armies, the defection of allies, the general pufillanimity of Europe, the weight of taxes, the very misfortunes and inclemency of feafon are laid upon our Ministers, as matters of accufation, and grounds of difgrace. No man of a wife and honourable or prudent mind mind could endure fuch unmerited odium for a fordid accumulation of riches, by a wanton prolongation of war. But it would be abfolute madnefs if he were to plunge himfelf, as our Cabinet must do, into fuch difficulties, for the fole purpose of enriching contractors and clerks, who are not fo much as known to him by name.

If it be impoffible to attribute the continuance of hostilities to any perfonal motives on the part of Ministry, it is equally idle to suppose, that the averfion of France to peace is founded on a particular enmity to the exifting Cabinet. You will, I am fure, agree with me, that no meafure can be more dangerous to our independence, than to fuffer a foreign power to intermeddle with our domeftic parties. If France does confider one fet of Ministers as her particular enemies, she must regard another as the tool and inftrument of her aggrandifement. It appears to me, that the chief defign of the New Whigs in their prefent conduct, is to elicit fuch a declaration from the Republic*. But

 I allude in particular to the fentiments publicly toafted at the recent celebration of Mr. Fox's birth-day. One of them, as it is given in the Morning Chronicle, is little, if at all, fhort of being treafonable. What can the country think of men who labour, at the prefent period, to imprefs upon the public mind, feelings which must destroy the only means of refisting an implacable enemy. It is not the first time in which, degenerate Englishmen have made a voluntary facrifice of the interests of their

But until that is accomplifhed, it might be fufficient to obferve, in anfwer to this affertion which is now circulated with confiderable industry, that France has never intimated fuch an opinion, or refused to treat with his Majesty's present fervants. It would be wrong to facrifice, at any time, our faithful friends to the unreasonable inclinations of an enemy. It would be equally difgraceful and impolitic, to permit one for restless as the republic to nominate an administration for this imperial kingdom. But we should act infinitely worfe, if we were to anticipate wishes, which our foe has no right to entertain, and to commit injustice which she has not required.

I shall go further, and deny both the fact and the conclusion which is deduced from it. The most barbarous ages cannot supply one instance of personal animosity between the Executive Officers of different nations, unless it has been founded on personal injury. If the felfish pride and passions of men have not been roused by such means, Ministers are only viewed as a part of the people whose affairs they conduct, and it is the feveral countries which become reciprocal objects of friendship or aversion. The their country to gratify their defperate ambition. The conflitution has furvived their attacks, and they have perished in exile or upon the scaffold. Let those who imitate their example profit by the lesson of their ill success.

filence of the French Executive is a conclusive proof, that upon this fubject their feelings are not different from those of other Statesmen. The have not forborne through delicacy either to afperfe our Government, or the conduct of our Ambaffador. Is it probable that they would have fhewn more respect to the Cabinet if they had been influenced by fuch perfonal antipathy. Let meask, also, what causes can exist to excite this implacable refentment independent of a faithful attention to the interests of this country? Can that be a reason to induce the people of Great Britain to withdraw their confidence.

When the Directory talk of the corruption of English Gold and our recent endeavours to foment confpiracies among them, they laugh ( at the credulity of their own fubjects. It is a charge brought with the fame views, and founded on the fame grofs violation of truth as their wicked proclamations to the French people of our cruelty to prifoners. Supposing the Republic the most corrupt and impoverished nation upon earth, the whole annual fupplies of England would be infufficient to effect the milchief attributed to our guineas.

Even if the Directory did feel any perfonal diflike to our Ministry, from whence does it appear that it would have any influence upon the conclusion H 2 clusion of peace. If the French have taken up this dangerous system of favoritism and alliance with the administration of a country instead of its Government, they must have shewn it either in the hard terms of peace imposed upon fovereignties, whole Ministers were confidered as hoftile to their liberties, or in liberal conceffions where they were regarded as friends. France is faid to afcribe all her miferies to the treaty of Pilnitz. If this treaty did really exift, it was entered into between Pruffia and the Emperor, without the concurrence or knowledge of our Cabinet*. Yet France has concluded treaties with both thefe Sovereigns without any change of their Ministers. If I remember rightly the Prime Minifter of Naples was publicly denounced in the National Affembly as dangerous from his being Yet the conditions of peace an Englishman. granted to Naples were not fo ignominious as those imposed upon Spain. On the other hand, the Directory have not abated a fingle jot of their most extravagant pretensions in favour of Ministers, who were professedly their friends. They have violated the neutrality, and raifed contributions in Tufcany notwithftanding their veneration for the Philosophic Jacobin Carletti. They have ftrangled the new-born Republic of Venice, in contempt of their pious affection for the traitor Dandolo. Will the Republic now fpare the Reverend Court of Rome from the pollution of blood, in pity to the friendship of her ambaffador with Cardinal Doria Pamphili? Will she protect the ecclessifical states from violence, the country from plunder, and the Government from annihilation, in her tender sympathy with the congenial principles of Cardinal Buon Campagna.

But I am afhamed to wafte further time in refuting fuch an idle opinio: . It is not propagated from conviction, but in the hope that it will be received without examination, into fuch minds as may be milled by an anxious defire of peace.

The animolity of France, is to be traced to a very different, but much more rational fource. It is to be found in the defigns of her rulers, and the genius of her people. The faults which characterized the nation under a Monarchy, are augmented fince it has become a Republic. Frenchmen have more vanity, more confidence in their own powers, and manifest a more extravagant affectation of national fuperiority, than ever. Unexpected victories have made them drunk with arrogance and ambition. They afpire to the unqualified dominion of Europe, and are confoled under all their calamities, by the hopes of attaining it. In their purfuit of liberty, they have found nothing more than the name, and they feek to mitigate the wretchednefs of a military defpotifm, under the empty title of the Grand Nation. It is impoffible not to difcover in this trait, the fame vain-glorious fpirit, which gave to their fovereign, in the laft century, his appellation of the Grand Monarque; the fame infolence of ambition, which at that time roufed all Europe, with England at its head, to chaftife and reprefs it.

The various fwarms of domestic tyrants, which have infelted France ever fince the Revolution. have fed and fastened upon this weakness of their countrymen, with inftinctive confiftency. The fame principles which prefcribed the Rhine and Alps, as the natural boundaries of France in the National Convention, dictate a general plan of fubjugation to the prefent directory. They are not merely flimulated to attempt it, by the infatiable appetite for conquest, and the imperious neceffity for plunder. They urge it in their eager folicitude for life, as the indifpentible ftay of their domeftic Government, and the only means to infure their perfonal fafety. The popularity of conquest, and the dread of the army, are the great causes of tranquillity in France. Peace, in removing the terror of coercion and a common object of defire from this reftless and volatile people, people, would give rife to civil diffurbances in finitely more deftructive than a foreign war.

While the French Republic purfue the fame, plan that has been followed by every other powerful Republic, and aim at foreign conquefts to preferve domeftic tranquility, they are prompted by many reafons to direct their attack againft Great Britain. Our great wealth encourages their Government with the hope of recruiting their refources; and our folicitude for peace has taught them to defpife our military fpirit. Regarding us as the natural guardians of the balance of Europe, they do not confider their prefent conquests as fafe, unless they can ruin our commerce, and break to pieces our fpirit and our pride. They are certain, that until they have effected it, they can neither deftroy the peace of Northern Europe, nor difturb the tranquility of America.

To the powerful motives of political intereft, we must add the inflamed and rancorous enmity of an unfuccefsful rival. While they have been victorious over all their other enemies, they have been foiled and difgraced in every conflict with the forces of this country. They have flood forth the emulous competitors of all our purfuits, and have proved unfuccefsful in all. It was the favorite object of their Government, ever fince the time of Colbert, to cherish commerce and manufactures in the country. Both have been. utterly ruined by the revolution, while ours have increased in a double proportion to that of They have ftruggled with us for the their lofs. dominion of the ocean; and the ftrength and glory of our Navy, is increafed by the annihilation and difgrace of their fleets. But, above all, they have afpired to excel the parent of our industry, of our wealth, of our civil liberty, and of our general pre-eminence in Europe. Writhing under the painful confequences of their intemperate zeal for freedom, they behold the ferene afpect of this country with frantic jealoufy, and madly attempt to deftroy by treachery and force, a Conftitution, whofe bleffings they are unable to attain,

Thefe are the true caufes of their animolity against us, as they appear in the manifestor of the Government, and the addresses of the people. They do not complain of the English Ministry, but of the English Government; of English perfidy; of English interference on the Continent; of the boundless extent of English commerce, and of the despotic dominion of the English over the feas. It is the destruction of these monuments of our glory, and instruments of our prosperity, which constitute the avowed objects objects of the war.* Worked up, and ftung into madnefs, they vaunt of overcoming the very elements in their means to fubdue us.

While the Republic is influenced by projects and paffions, fuch as I have defcribed, it will be vain to hope for peace upon moderate terms, and it would be madnefs to conclude it upon fuch as must confers our inferiority and defeat.

When the New Whigs counfel their country to fubmit to peace upon any terms, their advice is as pernicious to our immediate fafety, as it is derogatory to our honour.+ We are advanced to a pitch

• The public may confult among other abominable manifestos, employed to influence the minds of the French people egainst us, an address to the Ministers for foreign relations, which is the term in their new jargon for ambassadors by Citizen Talleyrand, the ci-devant "Holy Prelate of Autun."

† If the advice is good, and fuited to the digeffion of a Britifh flomach, it fhall not be loft to the nation through any fault of mine. I will therefore give the opinion of a noble author in his own words, refpecting the fituation of his country, and the terms upon which he wifhes to conclude a peace. "To me it appears upon which he wifhes to conclude a peace. "To me it appears in the flrongeft manner, that the difficulty of making peace "refts not fo much with our enemy, as with ourfelves We muft ultimately break down the temper of our minds to the real nature of our fituation. We muft turn to look, not at the "proud flate of the country, when Mr. Pitt involved us in this unfortunate conteft; but at the flate to which he has now "reduced us. For his mifconduct, wafte and incapacity, we "muft now, however unwillingly prepare to pay, not in our "paft

a pitch of power and profperity, from which we never can recede with fafety. We must maintain the glorious eminence in which we are placed with that fword which won it. If we retire puffillanimoufly, we shall be attacked as an object of plunder for our riches, and of jealoufy for the remnants of our power. The prime caufe of the grandeur of Rome, is to be found in her invariable refolution, never to conclude a difadvantageous peace. She nobly adhered to this determination under difficulties infinitely greater than any that furround this country at prefent. But Mr. Sheridan calls any reference to the practice and opinions of ancient nations, a fort of fchool-boy politics. The experience of hiftory, which is the light of human wifdom, is thus extinguished by a compendious fentence. Those accounts of the great and polished people of antiquity, in which Montesquieu discovered the grounds and the proofs of his political reflections; that ftudy from whence the fharp-fighted Machiavel extracted all his remarks,

" paft and former burthens, however heavy they may be, but in our national importance, and national confideration. We may look at the rank we held in the fcale of Europe with regret; but we muft prepare to ftand in the ftation to which he has reduced us, if not with fatisfaction, at leaft with patience." Earl of Lauderdale's Letter on the prefent meafures of finance, p. 11. The paffage is above all comment. It is well worthy the perufal of every man who wifhes well to his country, and yet dedefires a change in administration.

are despifed and put down from the view of our felf-taught politicians. It is impossible not to feel our indignation fwell at fuch rash and ignorant prefumption !

Thefe confiderate and modeft ftatefmen, how ever, will find the hiftory of modern times, not lefs fruitful in examples of the fatal confequences of a too ftrong attachment to peace than that of antiquity. There is not a fingle inftance, among the vaft viciffitudes of fortune experienced throughout the territories of modern Europe, where a ftate which has funk under a fenfe of her own inferiority, and ignominioufly thrown down her arms, has not ultimately fuffered more than fhe could have done from the continuance of a fierce and bloody war.

Struck with a fenfe of fuch dangers, the legiflators and fages of antiquity, laboured with peculiar anxiety to imprefs upon the hearts of the people an ardent love for the Military fuccefs and glory of their country. They did not whickedly encourage it from a vain principle of ambition, but wifely from a firm conviction, that it conflitutes the only means to fecure independence and refpect. When the high fenfe of national honour which cannot brook defeat, is once deftroyed and rooted out by luxury and avarice, that fpirit is departed which gave life and

and energy to the people. The reft is little elfe than a putrid mafs, infecting the foil upon which it lies. The Empire of the Eaft, Venice, Spain and more recently Holland, illustrate and confirm this opinion by the history of their decline.

When a country has heaped its couch fo high with foftnefs, as to fhudder at the rigid deeds of war, it will foon lofe those effeminate comforts which have caufed its emafculation. Its wealth becomes a lure, held out for its more warlike neighbours to ftoop at, and it must yield a fat and eafy prey to those who attack it. Even when fuffered to remain in peace under the protection of fome more powerful ally, it gradually finks down into lethargic indolence. The tranfition is rapid from an active generous state of emulation, which fpurs on the human mind to put its energies in competition with, and to excel its neighbours in deeds of prowefs and noble attainment, to one of liftlefs felfifhnefs, when the people are voluptuous, profligate, inert and factious.

Nunc patimur longæ pacis mala : fævior armis Luxuria incubuit, victumque ulcifcitur orbem.

God forbid, that our country, with the example of Holland before its eyes, fhould fink thus patiently under the weight of its own prosperity. The first fymptom of our decline will will be manifested in a readiness to submit to unequal conditions as the price, and for the sake of peace. In doing fo, we teach our enemies that perfeverance is the grand fecret to humble and subdue us.

If we should once fall, we cannot even hope to keep floating on the turface, buoyed up by the jealoufy of fuperior powers, as the Dutch have done till their late fubjugation by France. The balance of Europe which preferved declining and decrepid nations from destruction, is, at prefent, entirely overthrown. Even fuppofing it fhould be reftored, yet the fate of Antwerp may teach us what confequences enfue to a nation which allows a dangerous rival to break the heartftrings of its profperity. Repofing upon the ftability of our government and the fecurity of our laws, the fubjects of every prince and ftate where the British name is known, have been eager to invest their property in our national funds. That wealth which has flowed into Great Britain, from the rank she has held among nations, will pafs from her with the lofs of national effimation. Foreigners will no longer truft us with their property, which, though we have the means, we want the courage to defend.

Indeed, my dear Sir, that country does not exift, which has more obcasion than our own to reflect reflect deeply upon the maxim of the moft profound politician among the ancient hiftorians.• He has observed, that a just and honourable peace is the most fair and useful bleffing which a Nation can posses; but when it is founded upon terms of fervile inequality and submission, it is of all things the most 'isgraceful and pernicious.

Upon what ground do the New Whigs found their exhortations to facrifice our reputation and endanger our fafety by making an unequal peace? Is it from the dread of an invalion? The very women of Athens, in the zeal of patriotifm, deftroyed the family of him, who offered fimilar advice from a fimilar motive. Armed and prepared as this country is, what has fhe to fear from fuch an event? If, regardlefs of domeftic divifions, the people unite as they have always done to repel the attacks of a foreign enemy, the de-

Do the New Whigs urge it from the hope that we may repair the loss of war, by our industrious accumulations in peace? Looking at what has taken place, they will find that our commerce has always rifen most rapidly after the conclufion of a fuccessful war. The admiration of our courage, and the opinion of our firength opened the markets of Europe to our merchants, after the peace of Utrecht and that of 1763. If France should now rife upon our ruins, she may fhut the ports of the world against us, and accomplish, by negociation, what she vainly attempts by force. Allowing the poffibility of our emerging again, by fuch means, from that inferior station which Lord Lauderdale and his friends advise us quietly and patiently to take in the fcale of nations, is it credible that France, jealous of our commerce, and eager for war and plunder, would fuffer us to creep back again into power? The very purchase of peace would invite the renewal of hostilities, while we have any colonies, commerce, or wealth remaining. Neither inoffensive conduct, nor patience, nor fubmiffion on our parts, could preferve us from infult and oppreffion. The grounds of attack upon the Venetian States, not to mention Switzerland, and the late cruel and cowardly conduct towards ' the the Pope, may fnew those who need the lesson, that France can never want a pretext for commencing hostilities.

It is urged, however, that the heavy burdens which are imposed upon the country are decifive and infuperable objections to a continuance of Undoubtedly they are heavy. But the war. ought they to appear fo very grievous, when it is confidered; that they are imposed to repel injury, difgrace and ruin from the Empire. In no period of our profperity has our opulence been fo immenfe as it is at this very time.' Notwithstanding the taxes which have been imposed, I state it broadly, and challenge contradiction, there does not exift one state or district in Europe, where the inhabitants enjoy, fo univerfally, all the comforts and conveniencies, which riches and freedom can beftow, as they now do in Great Britain, during the calamities of war. It is to enfure a continuance of those bleffings to the rich and to the poor, that the higher ranks are called upon to contribute a portion of their means.

The fpirit and liberality of the nation cannot be roufed to a more glorious purpofe than to protect the main fources of our profperity. Let them remember that it is for the fafety of all our invaluable colonies in the Eaft, and in the Weft; for the employment of our manufacturers facturers at home; for the continuance of our commercial relations abroad; and above all, for the fecurity of our domeftic freedom, and the untarnifhed honor of the empire. When we call to mind what other nations, what we ourfelves, what France, has endured, for much inferior objects, ought we to refuse to bear, or repine at burthens which leave us a greater portion of all the comforts and elegant coveniencies of life, than our ancestors had ever enjoyed.

There is no alternative for this country, but immedia.e destruction, or a manly refiftance. The French Republic openly avow their intention to exact retribution for our former glory, for our prefent profperity, and for the humiliation of France, ever fince the peace of Ryfwick.* They have entered other countries_ with declarations of friendship, and the piercing cries of the plundered inhabitants have re-echoed throughout Europe. Do her menaces found in our infatuated ears as pledges of peculiar tenderness and moderation to us? What treatment are we to expect from that enemy, when victorious, who prefers the chances of war to all reafonable propofals of peace? What mercy could this nation hope for, if conquered, when common prudence cannot keep back the cager animofity of that Republic, from the vain fatisfaction of idle and empty threats against her.

We have made it fully evident, that we are defirous of peace on terms fcarcely compatible with our future fecurity. But when the Directory go further, and require from us what amounts to unconditional fubmiffion, can an Englishman hesitate upon the path he is to take? The merchant, counting upon the fober round of immediate lofs and profit, must perceive the certainty of ruin on the one hand, and the chance, at leaft, of a fuccefsful ftruggle on the other. But he who contrafts the fituation of his country with the fate of other kingdoms; he who has anxioully ferutinized the fources of their elevation, and the caufes of their decline; must feel the certain conviction, that once to admit the principle is to deftroy the energy of the nation, the ftability of the empire, and the happiness of posterity.

If the people at home have caught one fpark of emulous valour from the glories of their navy, they eannot fubmit thus tamely to difgrace and deitruction. They will never lie cowering, like a timorous plump of fea-fowl, fearfully and paffively expecting' upon whom the pounces of this hawk is to faften. They will not obfcure and deface the well-carned glory of those illuftrious trious heroes who have fwept the combined fleets of France, of Spain, of Holland from the feas. If, through our cowardice, those brave failors, who died to confirm our triumphs, have expired in vain, their blood is laid upon our heads.

Looking at the paft ftruggles of this country, and the recent events of the war, are we not compell'd to afk what it is that has happened, which can juftify a great and valiant people, in yielding to defpair? In every conteft, in which our fingle ftrength has been oppofed to that of the Republic, we have proved victorious. Our navy keeps every one of our enemies bound in chains upon their own ceafts. Our army is infpired with a noble emulation to rival the example they have received from our marine.

Are we to fuffer the wicked and interefted ftatements of the New Whigs, to deprefs our fpirits in contradiction to our feelings and our reafon? Let us look to their new and defperate coalition with the Correfponding Society for evidence of their motives and their views. It is not that fociety which has changed its principles. It is the Oppofition who are determined to deftroy the country, or force their paffage to the Cabinet. Their convival meetings 12 are are formed into Schools of Republicanifm and Sedition. Their toafts, their fongs, their fentiments, breath the fame contempt for the out-lines of the Conftitution, the fame difrefpect for the perfon of their Sovereign, the fame adoration of pure Democracy, and the fame fealty to the French Republic, that diftinguished the Revolution and Correfponding Societies.

Most affuredly, our fituation is not destitute of danger, when the efforts of the country are oppofed and thwarted by fuch men. Neither is it to be concealed that we can not hope for fuccefs against our natural enemy without confiderable felf-denial on the part of the rich. But what country has purchased glory and advantage at an inferior price. When we fight for our domeftic liberties, for our foreign independence, and for our commercial rights'; when we rife up to protect Europe from anarchy, barbarifm and final fubjugation, the object is worthy of the effort, and the refult is in the hands of God. If we fall in fuch a contest, we fall as becomes a noble people, leaving an example to our posterity, which may excite them to avenge us.

I know, my dear friend, you agree with me, in thinking that there is but little probability of fuch a melancholy event. Alone and unaffifted, our native ftrength is more than fufficient to enfure fure us final fuccefs. But courage and magnanimity have never failed to precure allies. A very fhort refiftance muft rally Europe round our ftandard. Those powers, which are ftill independent, cannot long endure the contemptuous violation of their rights, the reftless spirit, the overbearing haughtiness, and the ambitious plans of the French Republic. Her enormous exactions from her allies, and her newly acquired dominions have fown the feeds of refistance, discontent and infurrection. It does not require much fagacity to foresee that a storm is now gathering, which must ultimately burst upon her.

I am, &c.
