medicines, not entirely consumed by his patients, and put them altogether in a single bottle, and label it "All-Sorts."

Miramichi Advance, "Advance" Scientific Miscellany.

Some of the remedies adopted by modern medical science are peculiar. Tubaine—a bright aniline dye—was, not long since, recommended in Bright's disease, and now the use of nitro-glycerine in minute doses is advised for certain chest affections.

"And now, gentlemen, I am going to tell you what I know to be true: Within a week of the expiration of the year, and the filling of the bottle, our physician had a case that puzzled him. It was a chronic complaint—a sort of all-gone-ness—the patient a lawyer. The electric determined to try his All-Sorts. Said he to the ailing man,—"Look you, my dear sir: I have a medicine which I am going to try in your case—a medicine for which I have no name, and which I have never used; but I have faith to believe it can perform wonders. I want you to give it a fair trial."

The Deacon's Turkey.

BY JUDGE CLARK. Deacon Turner had been a "professor" for upwards of thirty years, and his walk and conversation had corresponded with his profession; but the store he set by that turkey, some of the stricter sort shook their heads and said, was altogether greater than it was meant for one of his calling to set by any carnal creature.

But there was great excuse for the worthy man; for it must have been a very spiritually minded person whose youth would not have watered at the sight of such a fowl as the deacon was fighting for the coming Thanksgiving.

That turkey, it is our candid belief, stood full four feet barefooted; at what figure he turned the scale is not set down in the records of competent statisticians, and we prefer not to shock the reader's credulity by hazarding an opinion. Not old enough to be tough, but in the full perfection of completed adolescence, plump in contour without the grosser obesity of declining years, gifted with every gallinaceous grace, he was, indeed, a bird to be proud of.

Now, what! turkey visions were sitting before the minds of expectant guests, and more than one mature maiden was longingly anticipating a tug at his wishbone, the deacon's turkey became a stumbling-block of temptation in the way of Sam Whipple and Dick Spangler—a pair of light-minded youths who could see a great deal of fun in a very poor joke.

"Which capital sport it would be to steal that turkey on Thanksgiving, eh?" suggested Sam, with a wink at Dick.

He had a regulation for science amongst the better people of our village, which was really enough to upset any man's modesty, and he was generally known by the lower orders of society as the knowledgeable gentleman in the Tower House.

And got Tom Grill, the colored cook, to roast him, then call in a lot of the boys, and have a glorious time, added the latter.

It was up in the tower that gave the house its name, that I first fell in love with Abbey Dill. She couldn't have been prettier and she couldn't have been brighter, and there were sixty steps to the tower, and she wore pink stockings and low ties fastened with blue ribbon, and blue and pink bows in her hair, and a great bunch of roses at her waist, and she looked at the moon together, and she thought it was "lovely," and my uncle was delighted with her admiration.

"Let's do it," said the one.

In fact, we were both a couple of fools, for, as old one, I am young one.

"I'm not," said the other.

My mother received as much gratitude for this warning as people generally do for good advice.

"Don't fall in love with Abbey Dill, Alfred," said my mother. She's a nasty little flirt, like her mother before her. She tries to make every man she knows fall in love with her, and wishal she is a mercenary creature. She'll never marry a poor man. She has no heart."

It is so natural for elderly women to think ill of pretty young ones," I said to myself. "I thought mother above it."

But I did not tell her that I had fallen in love with Abbey already. Neither did I say anything to my uncle about it. I did not want to offend him, for very good reasons, and I supposed that he might expect me to devote myself to astronomy, and remain a bachelor.

I called on Abbey very often. I made love to her, and I was very kindly received. So were my protestations. In fact, though, as I afterwards remembered, she had made no promises. I considered her engaged to me. Our liking for each other was to be a solemn secret; that she made me vow; and really, under the circumstances, it seemed the best plan for all reasons.

"Put 'em up!" squawked the turkey, and stop, stop, went his wings, as Sam grasped his legs and pulled him down from the perch.

After a sharp scuffle, Sam was triumphant, and held his gobblefast fast under one arm and securely gagged with the other hand.

"Yes," was the answer in the same tone.

"Perhaps," I began to think, "he wouldn't mind so much if I did marry Abbey Dill."

"That's too thin," sneered Sam.

So matters stood on the—Well, I've forgotten the date, but if you remember on what day of August, 1869, the moon was at its full, you'll get me for yourself. On that day two things happened to me. I met Abbey Dill at nine in the morning, as I took the train for the city, and she whispered to me behind her handkerchief:

"I swear it, uncle," said I.

My boy, he said, in a very agitated voice, "my boy, I want you to promise me not to leave the house to night. I can't be there, and Heaven knows what I may lose by it. You'll take observations and all that, won't you? Fill my place until the morning!"

"What do you mean?"

After that uncle spoke but little until we parted.

"That's too thin," sneered Sam.

I returned to tea, and told my mother of my uncle's desire, and that I should fulfill it.

"What do you mean?"

When, at the appointed hour, they severally entered the deacon's parlor, each bearing that if he stayed away he would be liable to suspicion—Sam had concealed his damaged optic with a pair of goggles, wore, he said, for sore eyes brought on by excessive study, and Dick accounted for his swollen nose on the ground of a violent catarrh.

"I tell you what, friends," said the deacon, when he had finished saying grace, "We have more to be thankful for than most of you are yet aware of. You don't know what a narrow escape horror-stricken. He was sitting on a chair, dressed in a brown coat, with bright buttons. He wore a white tie and a moustache; his hair was pepper and salt; his watchchain heavy—he was the image of my Uncle Liebig. My knees shook under me; there was a report to make, indeed. As I gazed, to him entered the lady of the moon, dressed in rose pink and white; her brown hair braided and fastened with a silver arc. She looked like Abby Dill, exactly like Abby Dill. The man in the moon kissed her. She sat on his knees; he put his arms about her waist, and took from his pocket a little box; from it he took a ring, pure straight, or a diamond; he put it on her finger. She kissed him again, and he expressed his ecstasy in dumb show. Was I mad? I stumbled back from the telescope. I understood all now.

You know how easily a touch will change the direction of a telescope. I had given it that touch and brought it to bear upon the window of the back parlor of old Mr. Dill's house. On this July evening it was wide open. What I had seen was this: My rich old Uncle Liebig putting his engagement ring on Abby Dill's finger. I understood it all now. Her anxiety that I should stay in the tower, and that question about the diamonds, I was tricked, jilted, made a fool of.

I gave the telescope a kick that injured it internally and prevented me from taking another observation, and I went down out of the tower to my mother.

"How is the moon, dear?" said she.

"Yes, said I, "you understand human nature. Abbey Dill, now, is just the creature you believe her."

"Good gracious, Alfred!" cried my mother. "I must warn him."

She did; but it was late. Abbey Dill had promised to be my aunt, as I will know already, and my uncle was so horrified at what he called "my carelessness with the telescope," that I have lost his favor altogether. We never met now, and my mother passes my Aunt Abbey with a freezing bow.

"Let's do it," said the one.

"I'm not," said the other.

"That's too thin," sneered Sam.

"What do you mean?"

"I swear it, uncle," said I.

"Good boy," said he. "Which do you think the handsomest ring, a large solitaire or a cluster?"

"A cluster," said I; thinking to myself that I was to be rewarded for my vigil with the moon.

After that uncle spoke but little until we parted.

MILLINERY. GENT'S DEPARTMENT. A. J. LOGGIE & Co. MECHANICAL ORGUINETTE.

The ORGUINETTE may now be called a celebrated instrument. In tone it is akin to the Calinet Organ, but the organ must be manipulated by an artist in order to produce music; the ORGUINETTE is on the other hand entirely mechanical in its action, and at trifling expense it can be made to furnish an unlimited supply of all kinds of music. It surpasses the Calinet Organ, for the reason that the instrument is simple in its mechanism, and consequently not liable to get out of order.—Measured Gents.

THE ORGUINETTE is the most perfect automatic musical instrument yet invented, its repertoire is unlimited, the tone is remarkably good.—Measured Gents.
