House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION—TWELFTH PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, January 23, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

JUDICIAL SALARIES.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has any memorandum been received by the Minister of Justice for the increase of salary of the County Court judges, and that of the Superior Court judges, in the rural districts generally?
2. What action does the Minister of Justice intend to take?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have had a number of communications and a number of interviews upon the question of the increase of salaries of County Court and Superior Court judges. The matter is under consideration.

STEAM TRAWLING.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Was any investigation made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries during the year 1912 relating to the effects of steam trawling on the fishing industry of the Atlantic coast?
2. If so, by whom and with what result?
3. Were experts employed to make observations on board trawlers when in actual operation? If so, who were they?
4. What are the dates and names of the vessels?
5. Was a report made to the department? If so, when and by whom?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. Angus L. Frelick and Amos Toole. Information was secured regarding the kinds, sizes, quantities, &c., of fish taken by a trawler, and whether the gear of ordinary fishermen was damaged or interfered with.
3. Mr. Toole was employed to remain on a trawler and report on its operations.
4. Mr. Toole was on board the trawler Carmania from August 2 to October 5.
5. Yes. By both Mr. Frelick, who accompanied fishing schooners, and by Mr. Toole. Mr. Frelick's final report is dated October 10th, and Mr. Toole's is not dated; but reached the department November 30.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ICE SUPPLY.

Mr. REID (Restigouche):

1. Have tenders been asked to furnish ice for the Intercolonial railway at Campbellton?
2. If so, how many tenders have been received, what are the names and amounts of the tenderers respectively, and has the lowest tender been accepted?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.
2. Tenders were received from the following parties:—William J. Price, Campbellton, $1.18 per net ton (2,000 lbs.); Thomas Ellsworth, Campbellton, $1.13 per net ton; Elias B. Pritchard, Campbellton, $1.40 per net ton. The above prices included the delivery and packing of the ice in the ice-house at Campbellton. The lowest tender was accepted.

THE CUSTOMS TARIFF.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has any person or persons been employed by the Finance Department during the past year to make inquiries or obtain information as to the tariff, or as to its operation or effects, or as to the wisdom or necessity of any change sought to be made therein?
2. If so, who were they, when were they employed, and have they reported to the department in writing?

Mr. WHITE: No.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MacNUTT: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday, it appears, was an inopportune time to do so, but to-day I think I am in order. I wish to read a statement which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press some days ago, having some reference to myself. It is contained in a speech of Sir Rodmond Roblin referring to the Macdonald election and delivered in the Provincial Legislature at Winnipeg. Sir Rodmond is reported to have said:

In no case had he found that the Liberals of the constituency of Macdonald had taken part in the work themselves. The Liberals had seen the wrong-doing going on, the whiskey and the money, and they had given information to the Government. Who were bringing this whisky and money? Not Norris, but Frank Oliver and Thomas MacNutt and the heelers from Saskatchewan. 'Whereof I speak I know,' said the Premier. They were not the Liberals of Macdonald or Manitoba, but all men from outside. Eleven Frenchmen from Quebec, the Whip from Ontario, and many from Saskatchewan and Alberta. When Mr. Norris stood for this he made a low standard for his party and its future. Oliver and MacNutt and Sullivan had done the work, and the result was that some of the men were arrested. But they were the mere tools of political criminals.

When the premier of a province makes such an accusation as that against two members of this House it is somewhat serious, and I think Sir, a committee of investigation should be formed to look into the matter. I personally would welcome such an investigation. I wish to say that I absolutely deny the accusations made here; they are entirely without foundation, and if Sir Rodmond Roblin will come out into the open, leave his castle walls, and make these accusations public in some newspaper over his signature, then Sir, he will be compelled either to prove his charges or to stand convicted of malicious libel.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to ask two questions. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce whether there will be any amendments to the Canada Grain Act this session, and the Minister of the Interior whether there will be any amendments to the Dominion Lands Act this session, and if so, when?

Mr. FOSTER: With reference to the Canada Grain Act, it is possible that there may be one or two slight amendments. I am not entirely decided yet.

Mr. ROCHE: In reference to the Dominion Lands Act, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) yesterday introduced some amendments. Other than those, there is no present intention of amending the Act.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to his promise to introduce legislation in regard to the South African scrip. I would like to point out that it is somewhat desirable that the country should know as soon as possible what that legislation will be.

Mr. ROCHE: When the hon. the ex-Minister of the Interior asked this question before the holidays, I announced that it was my intention to recommend to the House an extension of last year's Act for another six months, namely, until the 30th of June, 1913.

Mr. MACNUTT.

Mr. OLIVER: In the last Act extending the right to locate there was, I take it, a flaw which, without intention, excluded some of those who, I believe, were intended to be included. I would ask the minister to pay special attention to that feature of the case and see that whatever flaw there is in that regard may be corrected.

WEST INDIAN TRADE AGREEMENT.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved second reading of Bill No. 28, respecting an agreement between Canada and certain of the West Indian colonies. He said: The Bill itself was explained pretty thoroughly and discussed quite generally on the resolution upon which the Bill was founded. The negotiations and the whole course of matters that preceded the introduction of the Bill have been somewhat prolonged, and have been before the House and the country for a considerable period of time. It is therefore unnecessary for me at this stage to occupy one single minute of the time of the House upon the second reading of the Bill. I am ready to go into committee on the Bill and make such progress as we can with its different clauses. I do not therefore propose to spend any time in moving the second reading.

Mr. OLIVER. When my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought this matter to the attention of the House on the first occasion, he handed to some members a copy of a blue book which contained certain facts in regard to the arrangement. I think he promised then that this blue book would be printed in further numbers for general distribution. I have made enquiry several times at the distribution office and have yet been unable to get a copy of this book. I would respectfully say that it is not possible for myself, not having direct knowledge of this subject, to give the matter the attention that I would wish, not having had the opportunity of considering the full statement that my hon. friend promised to lay before the House.

Mr. FOSTER: The document to which my hon. friend alludes is the record of the proceedings that took place before the delegates. I brought that down to the House and moved for a suspension of the rules and that it be printed forthwith. I had no idea that it had not been printed and circulated among the members. However, whilst I regret that it has not been printed and placed in the hands of members generally, the negotiations after all are what precedes the conclusion arrived at, namely, the agreement which is before the House and which is in the hands of members, and the Bill which is founded upon the agreement. Everything that is essential to what is before the House is really in the possession of members.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to hold the House at all, but I think my hon. friend's statement is rather extreme when he says that the report of the negotiations is not something that would be of value in informing the House with regard to the conclusions arrived at. While I do not wish to suggest delay in the discussion, I would ask my hon. friend to be considerate of those of us who have not had the opportunity which has been afforded to others if we ask for information which otherwise we might have had by simply studying the report.

Mr. FOSTER: I did have some copies of my own and I gave them, as far as they went, to hon. gentlemen on the other side. I am sorry that I have not more.

Mr. OLIVER: I am aware of that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Before the second reading of the Bill is passed, I desire to make a few observations, and I am impelled to do so by reason of statements which have been made publicly by hon. gentlemen opposite respecting this Bill rather than by reason of the provisions to the West India agreement which is before us for ratification. As the hon Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated, there is very little room for wide difference of opinion respecting this measure as it is practically in the terms of the proposal recommended by the Royal Commission appointed some two or three years ago, upon which commission were two members of the late Government. I am sure that upon this side of the House we welcome any trade or tariff arrangement by which it is possible to make freer trade between any two countries, particularly between Canada and the British West India islands, with which we have had long and very agreeable commercial relations. We, upon this side of the House, would naturally commend the agreement by reason of the fact that we were the pioneers in the development of closer trade relations between Canada and the West Indies and all parts of the Empire. I shall go further and say that had it not been for the tariff policy of the late Government in respect to the British preferential tariff accorded to British colonies throughout the world, it would not have been possible to have consummated the agreement which is now before the House.

The friends of hon. gentlemen opposite and the press supporting them, I find, since the making of the West India agreement, were too eager to accord to themselves the entire credit for the treaty. It was stated by friends of the Government when the negotiations were in progress between the Government and the West Indian delegates about a year ago, that such efforts for reciprocal trade agreements with the West Indies was more preferable than the efforts which had been made by the previous Administration to consummate some tariff agreement with the United States. We were told in express words, that this West Indian-Canadian treaty would be the means of again strengthening the Empire which had been seriously threatened by the proposed reciprocal tariff arrangements with the United States.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce visited England last year and on one occasion he was the guest of an association which is called in England the West India committee. This committee represents larggely the proprietors of the sugar cane industry in the West Indies. The minister was the special guest of that committee on this occasion. It was said to him by his hosts that he was responsible for this Canada-West India agreement, and while I must say in justice to him that he thrust that crown aside, still blushingly he said that he had sown the seeds many, many years ago, that they had taken root, that they had been growing in the meanwhile under the care of others; the result being this particular agreement. I wish to give to the House just one extract from the remarks made by that hon. gentleman on that occasion. I do not think that I need apologise to the House for referring to this matter. After the hon. gentleman, as I have already observed, claimed that some credit was due him for the consummation of the treaty and that it was always a consummation devoutly to be wished so far as he was concerned, he referred to the report of the Royal Commission on this subject and proceeded to say:

> Their's was an invaluable report——

Referring to the Royal Commission report.

> —and it laid the foundation for the present agreement. But other things intervened and the Administration which preceded us laid this arrangement in a pigeon-hole and took up another policy which they thought much better for Canada and much better all round. In the hurry and bustle of the new and large question the West Indian matter was laid aside and I am only telling the naked truth when I say that if the verdict of September 21 last had been different from what it was, there would have been no West Indian treaty.

The inference is, the dissolution of the Empire and the extinction of Canada would have followed. I particularly rise to speak on the second reading of this Bill to protest against that statement. It was untrue, misleading and unworthy of any man occupying a prominent place in the public affairs of this country, particularly from an adviser of the Crown. I further make the statement that such a remark should be resented by every fair-minded, respectable and intelligent man in this country. I do not think there was any justification for the remark made by the hon. gentleman on this occasion. True, his legs were under the mahogany with many followers of the Unionist party of England who assisted him and his party at the last election in this country, pecuniarily and otherwise. They had promised to give to Canada a market for her exportable surplus by means of a preferential tariff treatment in the shape of food taxes in Great Britain, a policy which they have abandoned, I imagine forever, within a few days past. It may have been quite popular for the hon. gentleman to play the demagogue on that occasion for, unfortunately for this country and for the Empire, we find today, too many men in England who take the position that this Empire was saved in September, 1911, by reason of the defeat of the reciprocity agreement, and such remarks seem to be readily accepted by many. We have been treated during the past year, or last few months, to many inane, puerile remarks from travelling English unionists who have come to this country to tell us that the Conservative party of Canada saved the Empire in 1911. We have had the muddling and vacuous views from visiting unionists such as Mr. Walter Long, delivered time and again here, as to the effect of trade with the United States upon our Imperial relations, and which were usually offensive to the people of this country. I think it is a matter of regret that many of these English Unionists who visit this country from time to time do not apparently do themselves the justice or credit of obtaining even a superficial knowledge of what that particular agreement meant. I protest against these observations from time to time made by representatives of the English Unionist party as to the effect of reciprocity with the United States upon the Empire. It is very difficult for a large section of the Canadian people to endure the contented ignorance of English opinion respecting some Canadian affairs and it is only proper and natural that on this side of the water it at times should be resented. I have not any objection to those who, usually the followers of the Unionist party, devote their best efforts to the perpetuation and welfare of the Empire, but it would better become them first to devote their time and their talents to the settlement of the many difficult political problems which confront them at home, and when they have ceased to be mediaeval and foolish respecting these, I am sure it will be time enough for them to give their attention to Canadian affairs. Until that time arrives the people of this country are justified in resenting in the most vigorous fashion their interference in matters of Canadian politics when it becomes offensive, as it is when they say the proposed trade agreement of 1911 meant the dissolution of the Empire had it been ratified. I do wish to express my astonishment and surprise that there should come any succor or support to the element of public men in Great Britain from the hon. gentleman who is responsible for the measure now before the House. I want to repeat what I said a moment ago that had it not been for the British preferential tariff policy inaugurated by the Government which preceded the present Ministry, it would have been utterly impossible to have secured the consummation of the Canadian-West Indian agreement. In order to demonstrate the accuracy and correctness of my position, I want to review briefly I trust, but historically and chronologically the events leading up to the agreement now before us. If we get the proper starting point, I think we will get the proper direction and the proper destination in considering this matter. In 1890, the Minister of Trade and Commerce visited the West Indies on behalf of the Canadian Government with a view of securing some trade arrangements with these colonies, but without success. The events leading up to the appointment of the last Royal Commission very well set forth the history of the efforts made to secure a trade arrangement between Canada and the United States as it is, and I shall follow the wording of the report rather closely. The report relates that:

> In 1890 Mr. Foster, then Minister of Finance in the Dominion, visited the West Indies with this object in view. The project met with little favour in the West Indian colonies; the governments were at the time negotiating with the United States for favourable treatment under the McKnley Tariff Act, and they considered it certain that the grant of reciprocal preference to Canada would be followed by the penalizing of West Indian sugar in the United States.

At that time sugar cane was the great product of all the West Indian Islands, or of the greater number of them. At that time it is to be remembered that owing to the prevalence of bounties paid in many European countries to the beet sugar industry, the sugar cane industry of the West Indies was paralyzed, and it did look then as if that particular industry would be crushed. The report of a Royal Commission appointed in 1897 was to the effect that at that time the sugar cane industry in the West Indies was almost at an end. In 1898 the Canadian preferential tariff was extended to the British West Indies. The report proceeds as follows:

Mr. Fielding, then, as now, Minister of Finance, in the course of his budget statement referred to the previous abortive negotiations for preferential trade. The Canadian Government recognized the large opportunities that existed for the development of trade between Canada and the West Indies, whom they regarded as the natural customers of the Dominion. The West Indian colonies were then suffering from a very severe depression, so much so that their condition was a matter of serious concern to the people of the colonies and a grave problem for the Imperial Government. Mr. Fielding claimed that Canada had some Imperial responsibilities in the matter, and he stated that, with a desire to assist Her Majesty's Government in dealing with these problems, the Canadian Government had decided to extend the preferential tariff to the West Indies, without demanding any concessions in return.

The report proceeds further to say:

Under the preference thus granted, the produce of the West Indian colonies was entitled, on importation into Canada, to a reduction of 25 per cent on the import duty. It was at the same time provided that raw sugar, when imported from any British possession, could be entered at the British preferential tariff rates. It was further provided that refined sugar, to be entitled to the preference, must be manufactured wholly from raw sugar produced in the British possessions. Thus refined sugar imported into Canada from Great Britain, to be entitled to the preferential rates, must be manufactured from sugar grown in a British possession. The importance of this further provision has not been fully appreciated especially in the West Indies.

That was the beginning of our tariff and commercial relations with the West Indian Islands, which made possible the agreement with those islands. The sugar cane industry was practically dead, and its future was feared by the owners resident in Great Britain, and the Imperial Government were very much concerned as to the future conditions of the British West Indian Islands. The extension to them of this preferential treatment was largely done upon the ground that Canada was under some Imperial obligations in the matter; that it was their duty to relieve the Imperial Government of what appeared to be an approaching problem in respect to the West Indies by virtue of the decadence of the sugar cane industry. Therefore, without asking for anything in return, we extended the British preferential tariff to the British West Indies. Our commercial relations have since been closer. The appointment of the last Royal Commission which recommended some tariff arrangements was also one of the results. When that British preferential tariff was extended to the British West Indies, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce occupied a seat in this House; but he did not favour the application of the preferential tariff to the West Indies. Instead of that, in his place in the House of Commons, he opposed it and, so far as I know never expressed his approval of the same. The effect of the preferential tariff on the West Indies sugar industry was very marked; it was responsible for the revival of the sugar cane industry. I think I could almost make the statement, without fear of successful contradiction, that if it had not been for that preferential tariff, it is quite possible there would have been a much smaller sugar cane industry in the West Indies to-day. I think that view has been frequently entertained by many, competent to form an opinion. At least it was of tremendous value to the West Indies and made them favourably disposed to Canada and ultimately made possible the present agreement. Had hon. gentlemen had their way there would have been no preferential tariff and very likely no trade treaty such as we are now considering. The effect of this preferential tariff upon importations from the West Indies, particularly in the matter of sugar, can be seen by the manner in which our imports of sugar from these West Indian colonies have grown since that time. In 1899 the importations of sugar from the West Indies amounted to about £3,860, or about $16,000. In the figures which have been presented to the House, in the form of a return asked for by myself, I find that the total exports of the principal products of the West Indian islands, which are parties to this agreement, amounted only to about $26,500,000, of which sugar composed over $12,000,000; and of that $12,000,000 worth, Canada took $6,786,000 worth. It is to be noted also that our total imports from the West Indies for 1911 amounted to a little over $8,000,000 and nearly $7,000,000 of this was sugar. So, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce ventures to say that if it had not been for the defeat of the tariff agreement with the United States this agreement would not have been before this House to-day for consideration, I say he is making a statement which is absolutely untrue, absolutely unfounded and absolutely unworthy of himself. A tariff arrangement——

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will excuse me, for a member of the House to say that another has made a statement absolutely unworthy of himself, is out of order according to my understanding of the English rulings on that subject.

Mr. FOSTER: I do not think he meant it.

Mr. MACLEAN: I will not occupy the time of the House, Mr. Speaker, debating whether the expression was unparliamentary or not. I hasten to withdraw the same, and express my great astonishment and surprise that the hon. gentleman should have made such a remark. I was proceeding to say that, the views of the people of this country respecting a tariff arrangement made between Canada and the United States which was the subject of a heated political contest a little over a year ago is no great importance in relation to the measure now before the House. I wish to point out further that even had that agreement with the United States become effective by the mandate of the people it could not in any way have interfered with the West Indian-Canadian agreement, because this agreement with the West Indies in no respect deals with any article mentioned in the agreement between Canada and the United States. I think I can safely make this statement—and I have made it, perhaps, once or twice before in the course of my remarks— that had it not been for the inauguration of the British Preference Customs Tariff and its application to the British colonies throughout the world, and its particular application to the British West Indies at a time when the important industry of the West Indies, sugar-cane raising, was in peril, that industry probably would have been in a different condition to-day, and there would have been nothing to justify the commercial arrangement which is now before the House for consideration.

The effect of this agreement upon the trade of the two countries, as I said on the first reading of the Bill, is problematical. I trust it will be productive of good both to Canada and the West Indies, and that at the termination of the period of the agreement, ten years, the result will have been such that there will be a desire on the part of each to renew it for a further period. However, the effect of the arrangement will largely depend, as was stated in the report of the Royal Commission, and as is plainly understood by all who understand the question of trade between Canada and the West Indies, upon the steamship service between Canadian ports and the West Indian Islands. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce might very well take the House into his confidence before asking us to pass upon this agreement, and tell us what progress has been made in the way of establishing an improved steamship service between Canadian ports and the West India Islands. I should like to ask him whether recently he has entered into any permanent contract for a Canada-West India steamship service. I think we should also like to hear from him, before passing upon this measure, as to what success he has had in the establishment of cheaper and better cable facilities between Great Britain, Canada and the West India Islands.

The agreement in the form presented is, as I have said, practically in the form recommended by the Royal Commission appointed in 1909. In the appendix to that report I find a schedule containing a list of the articles which the commission recommended might be put on the preference tariff list between the two countries. This list has been added to a little. I notice that under the agreement three articles now on the free list in this country are proposed to be placed upon the dutiable list, namely so far as foreign countries are concerned, cocoa beans, lime juice and limes. I trust that the members of the Government will be able to present to the House a justification for the transfer of these articles from the free to the dutiable list.

Further, it will be very difficult to measure correctly the true effects of this agreement upon our trade until we hear from the Minister of Finance as to what amendments he proposes making in the tariff by reason of this agreement. I fear that some aspects of this agreement, which otherwise might naturally be considered at the present stage, will have to be postponed until the annual budget is presented. As I have said, I trust that the members of the Administration will give their reasons for the transfer of these articles from the free to the dutiable list, and I trust that they will be able to show that this change was necessary to consummate a fair arrangement with the West Indies. The only instance in which the delegates from the West Indies asked that anything be placed on the Canadian free list was in respect to arrowroot. I observe that the Minister of Customs protested very vigorously against the placing of this particular product upon the free list, and his views ultimately prevailed. There was however, a slight reduction of the duty thereon. I trust that on some occasion, possibly when the tariff amendments are being considered, an explanation will be forthcoming as to why the request of the West Indies in this respect was not favourably received.

There are many other features of this agreement which might very properly be the subject of discussion, but as they are matters of detail I shall reserve any further remarks I wish to make until the Bill is being considered in Committee.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I shall not, for more than a very few sentences, delay the consideration of this arrangement in Committee, but the rôle of self-imposed silence on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, upon the second reading of a measure is so unusual, that such a spectacle, I think he himself will admit, necessarily begets comment. He has not always been silent upon the second reading of Bills, whether in power or in Opposition. I think, however, that I understand, in a measure, his silence upon this occasion; I can quite understand that a general discussion of the policy of preferences cannot be quite palatable to him at the present moment. I should like to pay to him a tribute for the extreme grit and perseverance—which should be a splendid example to younger men—with which he has pursued this question of inter-Imperial trade. My only regret is that he should have devoted his great capacities to a subject which has hitherto not given the results these capacities would have produced if they had worked in a more fertile field. The discussion, I say, must be unpalatable to him at the present moment, because he, the father of preferential trade, knows better than any other man that preferential trading within the Empire is practically if not quite a corpse at the heart of the Empire.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Dead and buried.

Mr. CLARK: Any member of the Government reading in one of the morning newspapers the article upon the tariff reform muddle will see that it is recognized by their own supporters in the press that tariff reform in Britain is dead. If tariff reform in Britain is dead, there can be no preference from Britain to Canada, and certainly one of the lessons of the moment is: Do your trade upon the same commonsense principles as those under which the Mother Country trades, and you will speedily achieve a measure of greatness far exceeding that of the Mother Country herself. The attention of the House should be directed to the fact that it is recorded in very high political circles, inadvertently, no doubt, that he to whom I have referred —my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce—as the father of preferential trade, has been guilty in this case of infanticide. I do not know how much there is in the rumour, but I can assure this House, that, as I have said, it is prevalent in high political circles in Britain that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was not without his influence in the adoption of one of the recent policies of Bonar Law and Lord Landsdowne, to which the reply was the election which has undermined and blown to shivering atoms the whole British preferential idea. That was an inadvertent injury to Mr. Bonar Law and the laws of tariff reform, but a kick of another character was administered by my hon. friend's leader, because of all the—I do not wish to use offensive language —but of all the resemblances to the rat leaving the sinking ship, I do not think anything quite so like it was ever seen as the extreme haste with which the Prime Minister of Canada avowed to the world that he had no connection whatsoever with Mr. Bonar Law.

I have been wondering how my hon. friend has reconciled the Minister of Finance to this arrangement, because the Minister of Finance has been in this House the great exponent of the fact that trade arrangements mean loss of fiscal independence. I have heard him again and again elaborate that argument at great length. It is a new doctrine I have never heard anybody explain, if, when Cobden arranged the trade treaty between Britain and France either of those countries lost their fiscal independence. I do not think this little mouse of an arrangement with the West Indies—which is the smallest mouse that ever proceeded from so great a mountain—will undermine the independence of Canada; but the argument remains, and I have the right to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to look into this matter and see whether the fiscal independence of Canada is not in danger of being lost. I do not desire to offer any opposition to the arrangement, although in some cases the tariffs are raised, and it therefore has objectionable features to a free trader. However, anything tending to extend trade is agreeable to a free trader, and I do not wish to offer any opposition to it. Neither would I offer opposition to the journey my hon. friend is likely to shortly undertake to the Antipodes. Whatever comes to him in his latter days in connection with his Imperial and political connections at the other end of the world is due to him because of the sevice he has given to Canada and the Empire. I have referred to the grit with which he has expounded his own ideas, but as a member of the trading firm known as Canada—and Canada is a firm and I am a member of it—I have a right to look into the doings of my chief commercial agent. The recent agent of that firm made a trade arrangement which would have led to immediate action along the common sense lines of trade, and we have a right to ask those who led this country to defeat that arrangement what they are offering to the people as an alternative to the scheme which they defeated. Well, they may say, we have this arrangement with the West Indies, and we may get one with Australia and New Zealand. I might state that last year our total trade with Australia and New Zealand, and the West Indies thrown in, amounted to $16,000,000, and that during the same period our trade with the United States amounted to $460,000,000. May I ask the House to consider the significance of these figures? What is the guidance they ought to give to those who are responsible for the Government and development of Canada and the expansion of her trade? This is part of a general policy, and I want to say that it is calculated to bring disappointment to those who expect an alternative which would mean something to the country. I have taken the liberty playfully and I hope not offensively, to refer to my hon. friend as the chief commercial agent of Canada. At the present moment, is it not perfectly obvious that while he is making this journey to the Antipodes to do a semi-fractional trade for Canada, the only trade possible in those parts of the world, he might have gone to Washington, as he had gone before, if it had not been for our fiscal independence, and done a trade which would have meant much for the commercial development of this country without for one moment interfering with our connection with the Empire. I was surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite cheer the ironical remark of my hon. friend, who has just resumed his seat, as to the Empire having been saved on the 21st of September, 1911. I do not understand why they applaude that statement, because they are saving it again by a gift of $35,000,000 to the British navy. I should like to say, while on that subject of Empire saving, that after all Wellington and Nelson and a few others did something along that line without the Canadian Tory party saving the Empire every three weeks. My fear, as a member of this Canadian trading firm, and my only fear, is that the travelling expenses of our agent will run away with more than the profits on the orders. I want to say seriously that this measure will be a disappointment to the western farmers who have grain in their barns now for which they cannot get more than sixteen or eighteen cents a bushel.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why do they not go into mixed farming?

Mr. CLARK: Or exchange for the sugar of the West Indies. It will be a disappointment to those farmers who have raised oats at great labour, undertaking the duties of landlord, tenant and workman, duties in which I have been personally engaged with my family for the past eleven years, and the hardships of which I know thoroughly. They have raised those oats which are in the barns, and they do not cover the cost of production. They would rather leave them lying in the barns than sell, because they know that the moment they have sold them the machine men and others, to whom they owe money, will be round and will take everything of the proceeds from the sale, the farmer himself being left no better except that it is better to be able to say that we have paid our debts. But as far as the prospects in Canada are concerned, what good does it do to pay one's debts if one does not know where to look for a living after he has paid them? The consequence is, and I am not drawing a fancy picture, that the machine men at the present moment are not able to make more than five to ten per cent of their collection in many parts of the province to which I belong. In this way the rejection of a trading measure that would have meant something to the country touches Ontario just as closely as it touches Alberta, and I am speaking most seriously to my hon. friends opposite, many of whom I know have open minds, when I say that I would like them to look into this question. I want to reiterate the promise I made before in this House, that if they will look into it and study it, and take the solution which an easy sacrifice of consistency would lead them to adopt, I will be the strongest supporter they have in the carrying out of that measure. Why, to talk about going in for trade with the West Indies while our whole trade at the present time is $16,000,000, when you had a chance of vastly extending your trade, where you are at present doing a trade of $460,000,000, is the most frivolous piece of statesmanship which was ever undertaken by the men responsible for the government of a great country.

Now, I may be asked, could those oats be sold in the United States, because there was no argument so frequently used by the opponents of reciprocity as this, that there was no market for our goods in the States. Well, I do not propose to deal with that in a long argument, but I should like to give four or six figures to the House to show that just at this moment they have reached in the United States a condition where the production of foodstuffs has nearly reached its limit, while in this country we are just at the beginning of our production. In the States there is an enormous population with a limited extra production. Here we have a sparse population with an unlimited possible production. Now, if these figures do not bear out that general principle then I am unable to support an argument at all. According to the figures of the Blue-book last issued upon the trade of this country by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, giving the respective exports and imports from and to the United States and Canada, we imported during the seven months ending October, 1912, 127,000 bushels of what; but we exported to the United States 467,000 bushels of wheat. What we imported was a convenience to the people who imported, or they would not have imported it, as Canadians are mostly sane. The point to which I draw attention is the vastly larger figure of our export. Of oats, we imported from the United States 59,000 bushels, an inconsiderable and negligible quantity, while we exported to the United States 685,000 bushels. Of barley we imported from the United States 811 bushels; to the United States we exported in round figures 122,000 bushels. Of flax we imported from the United States 3,700 bushels; to the United States we exported 3,613,000 bushels; almost nothing coming in, and this enormous export going out. And yet our friends opposite gulled this country into the belief that we could not do trade with the United States, forsooth, because both countries are raising the same kind of stuff.

There is another feature in regard to this, we are surmounting a higher tariff than they are; we are climbing a higher wall and still passing that stuff over the wall. Of all the frivolity of mankind Nero is supposed to be the greatest example the world has seen, he fiddled while Rome was burning. But I want to say that Nero was a serious minded person compared with my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). If the Fernie miners in the Crowsnest Pass had got free coke as they would have got under the pact, as opposed to a ninety per cent tariff against that coke, we should have done more trade from the Fernie mines than you will do under this pact, that is, in coke alone. Would that have ended with the Fernie mines in the Crowsnest Pass? Our friends opposite are supposed to be the great exponents of the building of industries in this country, but they stand not for the building of industries but for the restriction of industries. I was travelling across this continent the other day with a gentleman who knows the Fernie coal trade well, and he told me that at the present moment they raise in the Fernie mines from 2,000 to 3,000 tons of coal every day, and with the exception of what is sold in the immediate area of the mines, where it is raised, every ounce of that coal goes to the United States. And yet our friends opposite say you cannot trade there, you have to go to the West Indies or to the Antipodes to do so. That gentleman told me further that the present plant of the mines could put out from 5,000 to 6,000 tons a day. I asked him 'could they sell that extra coal in the States?' He said they would sell it as coke, and these men, when the matter was under discussion, were prepared to build coke ovens.

Mr. TURRIFF : There are hundreds idle to-day; they have been built already.

Mr. CLARK : The coke ovens must be idle because they are not in existence.

Mr. TURRIFF : They are idle; they are built in now.

Mr. CLARK : They should have built these coke ovens. I would not ask a child of ten to assent to my proposition that it would have been a benefit to Fernie and district. Does the hon. gentleman opposite believe in his heart—because he and his friends claim to be the great builders of industry—that this would have been any great hurt to the prairie ? My hon. friends believe in the home market. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce used to be a great apostle of the home market, but he seems to have changed that. Now he is going in for foreign commerce and he is going in for it with a vengance. He reminds me of a story I once heard of two Scotchmen who were riding out one day. They saw a man whom they both knew very well and he resembled the Minister of Trade and Commerce in that he was in an unaccustomed role. These Scotchmen had always seen this man in the kilts, but upon this occasion he was observed to be wearing an extremely wide pair of trousers. One of the Scotchmen commented upon the same circumstance and the other replied: 'Converts are always enthusiastic.' When the Minister of Trade and Commerce goes in for foreign commerce he takes a long journey for that purpose. Would it have hurt the plains to have built these coke ovens ? Where do they get their agricultural products in Fernie and district now ? —in Alberta and Saskatchewan. It would have put fresh settlers on the plains just as surely as supply follows demand. Would it have hurt Ontario—poor frightened, loyal Ontario? Where would the machinery, which would have gone into Fernie, have come from if not from Ontario ? Where would the extra settlers on the plains have got their boots, shoes and clothes ?—from Ontario, the place from which they get such a large quantity now. This pact would not have hurt any man, woman or child in Canada, but it would have given an enormous impetus to the trade of this country and conferred a tremendous benefit on every one. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh and they may think that this is a trifling matter. It may be a trifling matter to people who are always spending their time in Empire building, who are saving the British Empire every three weeks, but it is no trifling matter to the men who are living on the plains and who are the real Empire builders. It is no trifling matter to men who have put their all in the land out there and who are doing the duty of landlord, tenant and labourer and doing it without the ability to dispose of their produce. It is not much consolation to the men who lost that trade pact that we have made a little bit of an arrangement with the West Indies and that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has, after twenty-one years' hard work, got down to real business on this question of preference at the very moment when the British end of the thing has broken down, and the creature having died at the heart, the remains are pretty sure to follow on short notice.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): It was not my intention to take any part in this discussion, and it is not my intention to occupy at any great length the time of the House. But my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has honoured me with his attention, and he seems to be in some doubt as to whether I regard this agreement as jeopardizing in some manner the fiscal independence of Canada. Let me assure my hon. friend that I have no doubts on the matter whatever. There is no danger to the Empire in this agreement which has been presented to the House by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). There is no man in this House to whom I listen, speaking generally, with greater attention or interest than the hon. member for Red Deer. There is a quality of spontaniety and of wholesome humour about him that, I must say, appeals to me and there is also an originality about the hon. gentleman. When my hon. friend from Red Deer is speaking it is always my hon. friend from Red Deer; we know that it is no one else. If he strikes a hard blow, a good English blow, it is usually above the belt. I will pay him that credit. My hon. friend is interesting to me because he is one of the few specimens of free traders still extant in this country; at least he was until very recently. He is a graduate of the Manchester school, I believe, an apostle of Bright, of Cobden and, I think, going back farther, of Adam Smith.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto): A son of Adam.

Mr. WHITE: And a son of Adam. That is one point of similarity between him and the rest of us; we are all sons of Adam. But, until recently he was an apostle of Adam Smith. I have always considered my hon. friend a free trader, dyed-in-the wool, a convert not likely to apostasize, a free trader, free trader to-day, to-morrow and for ever. It was to me a suprrise recently in the naval debate to find that my hon. friend had changed from a dyed-in-the-wool free trader to the most rabid protectionist that we have ever had in this country. My hon. friend is a fiscal chameleon: he can change his colour not only overnight but in a few minutes in the course of a debate. I was so surprised to hear my hon. friend's utterances in the naval debate in regard to the building of ships in Canada, required to meet the serious need of the Empire at this particular juncture, that I did not trust my memory, but I took occasion to look up 'Hansard,' and what did I find? I found that my hon. friend was speaking of the serried hordes of labour that he had seen in the Glasgow ship yards.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I am sorry to do so because I do not fear any argument that is borrowed from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I think it is not according to the rules of the House that speeches of this session should be discussed at this present moment.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds).

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is quite plain that a previous debate cannot be quoted in the House. I was not quite sure that the hon. member intended to quote a previcus debate.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend is not willing that this House should have again brought to its attention what the hon. gentleman said only a few days ago I cannot object to the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. CLARK: As a member of this House I claim, what my hon. friend has just said, that I can give hard knocks and take them. I am a little bit of a stickler for the rules of parliamentary procedure, and, after all, rules are bigger than my hon. friend and bigger than I.

Mr. WHITE: I should like to call attention to the fact that when my hon. friend did me the honour of referring to me, he himself referred to a passage in a previous debate, the debate upon the Address.

Mr. CLARK: Last session.

Mr. WHITE: This session. My hon. friend referred to the fact that I had, in connection with the reciprocity agreement, stated that it involved the fiscal independence of Canada. Now my hon. friend is objecting to my doing precisely what he did a few moments ago with reference to myself. Let me appeal to my hon. friend. My hon. friend is a true Briton, believing in fair play. I ask him if he is unwilling that I should refer to certain utterances of his in the previous debate on this question of trade. I ask him, and I appeal to his sense of fair play, as to whether he thinks it quite in accordance with that British fair play, that he should challenge me here as to a matter that I referred to in a previous debate, that he should quote what I said in a previous debate, and then object when I get up to defend myself in connection with that and reply to his argument.

Mr. CLARK: I think I was saved from being out of order by the fact that it is perfectly notorious to every one of us who listened with the closest attention to my hon. friend's maiden speech in this House, that he elaborated his great argument about his fiscal independence in the speech which was delivered last session. The rule applies to a reference to a debate which has taken place in this session. I am not unwilling to meet anywhere any argument that my hon. friend can make. I do not rise for my own protection; I rise for the protection of the House of Commons and its members.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend objects, I will not refer to the previous debate; I will put it this way: During recess my hon. friend has been speaking in the West on the naval question. I saw reports of his speeches from time to time, and unless I am very much misinformed, my hon. friend took the view that the ships should be built in Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is wrong with that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the hon. gentleman himself think of it?

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman will find out what I think about it a little later, when I will have something to say to my hon. friend. I have not the slightest objection to anything being done in Canada that can be done in Canada. When I speak upon the naval question, I shall endeavour to demonstrate that in this particular instance it is against the interests of the Empire that we should waste precious time in experimenting in the attempt to build dreadnoughts in this Canada of ours, in time to serve the needs of the Empire as they exist at present.

Mr. MACDONALD: Might I ask the hon. minister whether he is going to argue that it is against the interests of Canada that these ships should be built in Canada?

Mr. WHITE: I like to be courteous to my hon. friend. Let me say this to him. When I come to deal with this question, I think I shall be able to deal with any arguments advanced by my hon. friend.

Now, in regard to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), to whom I say I always listen with the greatest pleasure, during recess my hon. friend took part in a campaign in the West and, as I have said, took the view that these ships should be built in Canada. My hon. friend is an apostle of free trade; the motto of free trade is, 'Buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest.' Does my hon. friend claim for a moment that ships can be built in Canada within thirty-five or forty per cent of the cost of building them in Glasgow, where labourers and artisans receive nothing like the remuneration or wages that they do here, to say nothing of the extra time that would be required?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I say yes.

Mr. WHITE: I will answer my hon. friend later. As regards my hon. friend from Red Deer, I think that is an apostacy from the tenets of free trade of which he is an apostle. When I read the reports of his speeches in the West, I thought it was the greatest case of apostacy since the days of Daniel Webster. I do not know what we will have to call my hon. friend if he persists in the protectionist heresy according to Adam Smith and Cobden. In view of his previous record, it seems to me that his name shall always be Ichabod, because his free trade glory has departed. With regard to reciprocity, so much has been said about reciprocity in this House that I for my part do not propose to take it up here. To be frank with my hon. friend, I do not discuss reciprocity because I think it is disrespectful to speak lightly of the dead, and I believe that reciprocity is dead.

Mr. TURRIFF: Preferential trade is dead.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend from Red Deer has had a great deal to say about reciprocity, and has blamed this Government for their rejection of it. This Government did not reject reciprocity. Reciprocity was rejected by the people of this country. I have very great respect for hon. gentlemen opposite, but I think that reciprocity has got on their nerves and on their minds; they have become obsessed with the idea of reciprocity. Why do they not admit that they have 'got in wrong,' to use a common expression, and have made a mistake and say: 'We have made a mistake; we are going to make a fresh start.' That is what they ought to do politically and in every other way. They made a mistake; the country said so, and the country would say so again.

Mr. TURRIFF: Give it a chance.

Mr. WHITE: There is no sentiment in the country in favour of reciprocity. You may find it in certain localities, but you will not find it generally. My hon. friends made a serious political mistake, and they will not admit it. The sooner they admit it the better for them as a party, although they do not want any advice from me. The people of this country believe that their fiscal independence would be jeopardized by concluding a trade arrangement with their great neighbour to the south. There they have a hundred million people; here you have eight million people. In 1866, when Messrs. Hay and Howland went to Washington, as I said in the last debate on this subject in which I took part, the Hon. George Brown, the founder of the Globe, said that he was against any reciprocal agreement such as was recently proposed, terminable on six months or a year's notice.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about 1874, when he went down?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend sometimes is curiously impatient. In 1866 George Brown took that view. He said: 'We should not be kept dangling upon the legislation of Washington.'

The people of Canada are quite willing that the people of the United States should control their own tariff. If they need our products, agricultural or manufactured, we are quite willing they should arrange their own tariff with respect to them. The people of Canada by their decision of the 21st of September, 1911, announced that Canada desired to continue to have the right of also controlling her own tariff, and if we decide to have a high tariff, or a low tariff, or an intermediate tariff, we can control it ourselves. But, the people of Canada were unwilling we should enter into an agreement with our powerful neighbours to the south, which would, in effect, give them control over our tariff legislation and to that extent jeopardize our fiscal independence. That was the verdict of the Canadian people. The Liberal party simply made a mistake in appealing to them on that issue, and that mistake seems to hang over the Liberal party to-day as a sort of obsession, and occasionally men like my hon. friend from Red Deer tell us about the benefit which would accrue from this reciprocity agreement. Well, the reciprocity agreement is dead; reciprocity is dead; the people of Canada have decided against it. It was not this Government, it was the people of Canada whose servants we all are who decided against the reciprocity agreement. What has my hon. friend from Red Deer to say of the statement made by President Taft in his letter of April of last year to ex-President Roosevelt. Mr. Taft is the head of the neighbouring republic and we all highly respect him and President Taft's idea of what reciprocity would do was, he stated in a short but telling sentence; it would transfer to Chicago and American points Canadian bank credits and everything else. These are the words of President Taft: 'everything else.' What has my hon. friend from Red Deer to say to that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the Minister of Finance agree with those remarks of President Taft?

Mr. WHITE: Well, 'everything else' is a fairly sweeping term, and it might include even transferring the House of Commons and a great many other things to the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman agree that the effect of that agreement would have been to transfer the business of our great cities, such as Montreal and Toronto, to Chicago and New York?

Mr. WHITE: It would have had a very serious adverse effect upon all our great Canadian cities. You may have an unsound judgment given by a people on the spur of the moment, or in the height of passion, but when you get a people intellectually and morally sound as the Canadian people are, to consider such a question as reciprocity, not for one month, or two months, or three months, or six months, but for two years, and when you get the judgment of that people on that issue, after such consideration, I think I can say that you get a pretty sound and well-reasoned judgment. I would submit, for the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, that when we have got that judgment as we did get it on the 21st of September, 1911, we ought to bow to it and accept it. That is the position to-day so far as reciprocity is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto): I want to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that there is a Bill before the House, and we have had by gentlemen on both sides a pretty wide discussion, which has been a long way off from the Bill. From this time forward, I shall have to press the point of order against everybody, that we should consider the Bill before us.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY: Before the Minister of Trade and Commerce asks the House to give this Bill a second reading, he should have informed the House as to what has been done in regard to what I consider a most important section in the treaty. That section is:

> The Government of Canada may provide that, to be entitled to the concessions granted in section 2, the products of any of the above mentioned colonies shall be conveyed by ship direct without transhipment from the said colony or from one of the other colonies entitled to the advantages of this agreement into a sea or river port of Canada.
> Provided that should the discretion herein granted be at any time exercised by the Government of Canada, provision shall be made in all contracts entered into with steamships subsidized by the Dominion plying between ports in Canada and ports in the colonies, which are parties to this agreement, for an effective control of rates of freight.

Now, one of the reasons which might fairly influence this Parliament to approve of that agreement is the fact that it provides, that just as soon as the Government can secure effective control of the rates of freight of steamships between Canada and the West Indies, it may by proclamation declare that the benefits of this treaty, so far as Canada is concerned, shall only apply to goods which are brought direct from the West Indies to a Canadian port. The hon. gentleman has not given the House the slightest information as to what has been done in respect to that important clause of the treaty. I am satisfied that it is the feeling of the people of Canada that in making treaties with any foreign country, or with any of the Overseas Dominions of the Empire, or colonies of the Empire, it should be provided as far as possible that the preference which is given to such countries should only apply to goods coming direct to a Canadian port, so that we may build up the ports of Canada. I repeat what I said earlier in the session: that it is a discredit to this great and growing country, this country of vast resources, this country with a magnificent revenue which has quadrupled since 1897 when the fiscal policy established by the Liberal Government was inaugurated and under which the foreign trade of this country has grown with marvellous rapidity; I say that a country with such wealth, such resources, such a rapidly increasing revenue, ought to be able to provide that the goods from our sister colonies in the West Indies should come direct to a Canadian port. It is a discredit to Canada that the great bulk of the trade and travel between Canada and the West Indies should be carried on through the port of New York. It does seem to me that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) owes it to this House to inform us as to whether the Government is in a position, if this treaty is ratified by Parliament, to bring into force the provisions of this very important clause. My hon. friend may say as he said before that we must first get a good steamship service. That may be true, and perhaps it is only fair to the West Indies that that should be arranged for. But surely my hon. friend should have told the House what has been done by the Government in that regard; he should have told the House how near we are to a realization of what we believe is in the best interests of Canada and in the best interests of the West Indies. I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) when, in speaking of this treaty with the West Indies, he took occasion to criticise the Minister of Trade and Commerce for certain remarks he had made in London to the effect that but for the rejection of the reciprocity arrangement with the United States, the bringing about of this treaty would not have been possible. I do not think my hon. friend is ordinarily carried away by the exhilaration usually attendant upon dinners in the city of London; but, had it been anybody else but my hon. friend himself who made an observation of that kind I should have thought the surroundings of the occasion had had an influence upon him. Nothing, certainly, could be further from the truth or less justifiable than a statement of that kind. My hon. friend and other members of the Government are open to the charge of having during the last season, given a vast deal of wrong information to the people of the Mother Country. My hon. friend is reported to have said on one occasion that the people of Canada, on the 21st of September last, emphatically declared their intention of remaining a part of the British Empire. I represent a province, the majority of whose electors voted in favour of what we thought an arrangement most beneficial to the people of Canada; and on behalf of those people I hurl back upon my hon. friend the sentiments he expressed in London. The majority cast in the last election in favour of the party now in power was only 40,000. If that majority is held to have emphatically declared in favour of Canada remaining a part of the Empire, does not that mean that those who voted for the reciprocity arrangement were in favour of separation from the Empire? My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who is not in his seat, was as great an offender, or even a greater offender, than my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He too is reported to have declared at some of these dinners that the people of Canada on the 21st of September made up their minds that they would never separate from the British Empire. By such statements these hon. gentlemen gave the public to understand that the question of separating from Great Britain and becoming a part of the United States was the question at issue in that campaign. I say these hon. gentlemen cast that insult upon the people of my province, and upon a majority of the people in three of the great provinces of Canada, people who are just as loyal, just as firmly attached to the Empire, just as determined that Canada shall for all time remain a part of the great British Empire, as the people who voted against the reciprocity arrangement. Is it any wonder that gentlemen like Mr. Walker Long and others who come from Great Britain to visit Canada go about making the absurd and unwarranted statements they have made?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman of the rule concerning the confining of speeches to the subject under discussion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what I am endeavouring to do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is wandering from the principle of this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) is not in his place, but might I, before I depart from this subject, relate an incident that recently took place in this city. One of these Unionist gentlemen was in Ottawa and was introduced to a gentleman who he thought was a member of the Government. The visitor said: 'I am delighted to meet you. I beg to assure you that you and the members of your Government occupy a warm place in the hearts of the people of England. We look upon you as the saviours of the Empire; and it is a matter of great gratification to me to meet you.'

I use that merely as an illustration to show that people will receive an erroneous impression through the statement made by my hon. friend when he told the people that but for the determination of the people of Canada to remain irrevocably a part of the Empire, it would not be possible to make treaties of this kind.

Let me ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has given any thought to the statement his leader made in the city of New York a few months ago, after the last general election. He told the people there, as explaining why Canadians had rejected the arrangement of reciprocity, that the Government was opposed to making any fiscal arrangement with any country, whether colonies of the Empire or not; that it would lead to entanglement and dissatisfaction, and for that reason he and his Government were opposed to any such arrangement. Is the hon. gentleman aware that his leader told the people of New York that arrangements between the colonies in South Africa had led to dissatisfaction and that on that broad ground this Government was opposed not only to the arrangement of reciprocity with the United States but even to fiscal arrangements with parts of the Empire. How does he square the present arrangement with the West Indies with the sentiments publicly and deliberately expressed by his leader on that occasion?

I hope I have not wandered too far from the point. I do not often do so, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that if I have erred you will pardon me. I have no particular objection to this treaty, except on the grounds that I have stated and that we are not in a position to discuss it as it ought to be discussed. As I have said before the hon. gentleman asks the House to adopt this Bill he ought to tell us what arrangement he has made for improved steamship service. If he has not made such an arrangement he ought to be able to tell us that he is going to do so. The Government proposes to send away $35,000,000 to be used in paying labouring people outside of Canada. My hon. friend, surely, ought not to allow $20,000, or even $50,000 a year of subsidy to stand in the way of getting a steamship service between Canada and the West Indies which will prove benefical to the freight and passenger traffic of this country.

I find that schedule B of the treaty provides that certain articles of the British West Indies shall be admitted at four-fifths of the duty of similar articles coming from the Mother Country. In this list are a number of articles which are not produced in Canada, articles of food, such as sweet potatoes and yams. It seems to me that these ought to be made absolutely free. I think when my hon friend had an opportunity of making an arrangement which will lessen the taxes on the food of the people of this country, he ought to have provided that these articles coming from the islands with which we have made an arrangement should be free. This may not have been a wide opportunity, but it was an opportunity, and I should have been glad if my hon. friend had availed himself of it, instead of picking out one or two articles and raising the duty on these so far as the rest of the world is concerned. Instead of placing on the dutiable list any article now free he ought to have selected articles now dutiable and, so far as these colonies are concerned, made them absolutely free in order, as I have said, even in small measure, to lighten the burdens of our own people.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I do not wish to delay the House at any great length, but I desire, on the second reading of this Bill, to emphasize the importance of a matter alluded to by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) as concerning the principle laid down by and contained in this Bill. It is suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this is one of a series of such arrangements he hopes he will in the future be able to make throughout the Empire. This being the case, if the principle is not satisfactory I think now is the time to say so, in order that the minister will be under no misapprehension when he comes to negotiate treaties with other parts of the Empire. It was certainly with a great deal of surprise, I am sure, that the people of Canada learned that one of the conditions upon which Canada secures an extension of her trade with the West Indies is that articles of food now imported into Canada free are to be made dutiable; in other words, that, as the price of the further extension of Canada's trade with the West Indies, the cost of living to the consumers of this Dominion is to be increased. I admit that in amount the matter is trivial, but I maintain that the principle involved is absolutely objectionable, and that such a principle embodied in future arrangements will certainly be objectionable, and proportionately so as relating to the amount involved.

If I understood the hon. minister aright when introducing this Bill, a considerable number, if not all, of these products of the West Indies which are to be permitted to come into Canada at a preferential rate, are entering Canada at the present moment under a preferential rate of 33⅓ per cent, as against the rate of 20 per cent proposed by the Bill. In other words, the West Indies are being guaranteed for a term of years a preference of 20 per cent, while at the present moment they are enjoying a preference on the same articles to the amount of 33⅓ per cent. I have no doubt the hon. minister will say that he made a good bargain because he is getting access to the West Indian market for Canadian products, while not increasing the preference given by Canada. He may even go further, and say that the late Government was remiss in its duty, in that, having given a preference of 33⅓ per cent to the West Indies, it did not, at that time, secure access on favourable terms of Canadian goods to the West Indies. Let the matter of what the late Government did or did not do rest for the moment. What I say to the minister on this occasion and in this connection is, following what the hon. member for St. John has said, that what the people of this country want in the negotiation of any treaty is such action as will tend to reduce the cost of living. That is one great object that we have in giving sanction to any trade treaty, and when the minister was negotiating with the people of the West Indies to secure access of Canadian products to those islands, his business was to secure for the products of this country more favourable terms in the West Indies by giving still more favourable terms to West Indian products coming into Canada. This is to say, it was his business to abolish the duty on these articles which Canada does not produce, thereby reducing the taxation on the consumers of Canada, and, at the same time, securing expansion of Canadian trade in the West Indies. When this proposition was placed before the House, and I saw that the mutual preference was a matter of 20 per cent when we were already giving them a preference of 33 1-3 per cent; when I saw that a principle of the agreement was that the tariff on certain articles of food used by the people was to be increased, I could hardly believe that these were the terms of a commercial treaty negotiated by the Government of which the hon. minister is a member. The principle that it is wrong or dangerous to reduce the burden of taxation upon the people of Canada when the opportunity arises is one to which I wish to register on this occasion my absolute dissent. I would point out to the minister and those who support him that the radical difference in principle between his reciprocity arrangement and that negotiated by the Minister of Finance of the Government is that under the Liberal proposal, absolutely in accord with Liberal principles, there was an actual reduction in the burden of taxation upon the people of Canada, accompanied by an opportunity for the expansion of Canadian trade; whereas the principles underlying the present proposed reciprocity arrangement with the West Indies is that the consumers of Canada shall by carrying an increased burden, pay for such expansion of trade as Canada will be able to secure under this arrangement. I hope I have established that there is in principle the widest difference between the reciprocity arrangement of the late Government with the United States and that now proposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to the West Indies. Truly, I understand that in regard to the West Indies the matter is not one of serious importance, but I do want to say that when the minister goes to some other dependency of Great Britain, the trade of which is possibly of much greater importance than that of the West Indies, and undertakes to carry out a similar principle, the result is liable to be materially injurious to the people of Canada. In any case, let it be distinctly understood that there is a difference as wide as the Poles between the trade policy of the late Government and that of the present Administration; that the trade policy of the late Government was one of reduced taxation accompanied by expansion of trade, whilst the policy of the present Government is one of securing expansion of trade at the price of increased taxation upon the Canadian consumer.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Before this Bill goes through its second reading, there are one or two matters in regard to which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce ought to enlighten the House. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce might be said to be the extra plenipotentiary of the Ministry. The other members of the Ministry deal with the various affairs that pertain to their particular departments, but when it comes to Imperial questions, to our relations with the Mother Country or with the other colonies, I think everybody in the Ministry and in the House will agree that these subjects are under the particular control and special guardianship of the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That being so, and considering the fact that my hon. friend spent quite a long period during last year in England, and discussed publicly and privately this question of Imperial preferential trade, the status of Canada within the Empire, or her relations with the other colonies, and the aspirations of himself and of his friends as to the future of preferential trade, I think that before my hon. friend asks this House to adopt this child of his he ought to tell us something about the relations of himself and of his Government to the people who are particularly interested in that wide question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had relations and discussions, no doubt of a close character, with Mr. Bonar Law, the leader of the Unionist party in the Imperial House of Commons. I am quite sure that Mr. Bonar Law never made that speech at Ashton-under-Lyne without having had some previous discussion of his Imperial preferential trade scheme with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Starting with the original proposition laid down by Joseph Chamberlain some ten years ago, when he proposed that there should be a system of free trade within the Empire, and tariffs as against the rest of the world, we have had a general and peculiar gradation, until to-day we have a policy which changes with every whim of the English people. One day it is proposed to tax the bread of the English people; another time it is proposed that the colonies shall be called into consultation and that they shall say what tariff is to be imposed within the Empire. On other occasions and under other circumstances, we have had declarations upon this question. For my part, I am rather inclined to believe that there is a very large section of people in Canada who have hitherto supported my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but who are not very anxious to see any arrangement made with the Mother Country whereby entrance into Canada shall be given to the manufactured products of the Mother Country. I am quite sure that a large number of these people would like to know just how far the Minister of Trade and Commerce has gone with Mr. Bonar Law and Mr. Chamberlain and the other leading lights on this question, how far he he has committed himself, and what assurance he has given as to what his party and Government are prepared to do with regard to this wide question of preferential trade.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid I shall have to remind the hon. gentleman that he is rather wandering from the discussion of the principle in this Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are dealing here with a question upon which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, his Government, his party, and his press in this country have been congratulating them-in a very great degree as being the first step in the solution of the wider question. If this measure is not and is not to be any part of the solution of the problem of Imperial preferential trade, then I am going beyond my rights, although I think your ruling is a little strict. But I believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he has not already done so in this House, will be prepared to say that he has the right to congratulate himself upon the fact that this arrangement with the West Indies is a step in the direction of the attainment of the wider aspiration. That being so, I think I have a perfect right to discuss this question. I have the right to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, before he asks this Bill to be given a second reading, to tell us whether he himself or his Government has made any arrangement with the men who in other parts of the Empire are the particular exponents of the wider scheme.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is going too far. I have given him what I regard as a ruling upon the matter, and I do not think it is competent to question that ruling without the usual recourse to an appeal to the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: If your honour pleases, I have the greatest possible desire to keep myself within the rules of this House. If I had the slightest idea that in the discussion of this question I was going beyond what was my perfectly legitimate right in asking my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to tell us whether or not this is part of the wider scheme, then, Mr. Speaker, I would at once bow to your ruling. But I may be permitted to say with all deference—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not permissible to discuss the ruling of the Chair. The only alternative is an appeal to the House. In my judgment a discussion of the abstract question of trade with the Mother Country is outside the principle of this Bill. In my judgment the hon. member is not confining his remarks to the principle involved in this Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that you have not, with your manifold duties, read the details of the Bill. I direct your attention to section 7 of the Bill:

> The advantages or concessions granted by this Act to the colonies parties to the said agreement shall extend to the United Kingdom and such of the other British colonies and possessions as may be admitted thereto by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette.

And so on. I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that I have the right under the terms of this measure to discuss on its second reading the principle involved in it, as to how far its terms—

Mr. SPEAKER: I admit the hon. member has a right to discuss the principle of the Bill, but when he wanders off and discusses what took place in England on abstract questions of Government antecedent to the framing of this measure, it seems to me rather a departure from the strict principle of the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the lines upon which you have laid down the limits of the discussion of this Bill seem to me somewhat narrow. I propose, however, without indulging in any speculations upon abstract problems, to discuss practically the effect of the agreement in regard to the United Kingdom and to the other colonies. Section 7 of the Bill says that the advantages under this measure shall extend to the United Kingdom and to the other colonies, so that there is a very wide question involved in this Bill. Let me direct your attention to the fact that section 6 of this Bill, schedule D, says that the Bahamas, Bermuda, British Honduras, Grenada, Jamaica, and Newfoundland are all to have the advantages and concessions provided under this agreement for a period of three years. Let me suggest a contingency which seems a proper subject of discussion. I noticed in the press this morning that the Bahamas and Bermuda are proposing to negotiate a reciprocity agreement with the United States. I would like to know from the hon. minister whether or not the effect of such an arrangement, if made, would be to create new conditions with respect to Canada. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has, I am sure, advices upon the subject. No doubt he has considered it, and it seems very important that the House and the country should know just what the status of Canada would be if, as a result of that agreement, Bermuda and the Bahamas made a reciprocity treaty with the United States, while they have a reciprocal arrangement with us under this Bill. Let me point out that that is information which the House should have and should consider in discussing the second reading of this Bill. It is a very important matter. The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce in moving the second reading of the Bill gave us some very interesting details, but with regard to the principle involved in the measure, his information was somewhat crude. For example, where do we stand as regards the United Kingdom in reference to this Bill? Did my hon. friend tell Bonar Law that he could make his statement at Ashton-under-Lynne, and was that statement of the English Unionist leader made as the result of conference with the Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce? This country has a right to know whether its chief representative in the making of this treaty, when he goes beyond the limits of Canada, should undertake to make arrangements with the Mother Country and its public men who happen not to be in the Government for the time being, as to what Canada's attitude is going to be with regard to trade questions. The people of the United Kingdom and of the British Empire were interested a short time ago in a sudden volte face by the leader of the Unionists with regard to this question, and we know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been over there. He has ambitions, and I do not think they are unworthy ambitions, to go to Australia and conclude a trade arrangement with that country, and let me ask him if he has made any preliminary arrangement with the Mother Country in regard to that, and if he can tell us what is the attitude of the British Chancellor of the Exchequer on that question?

Mr. FOSTER: I am afraid I cannot.

Mr. MACDONALD: Of course, the hon. gentleman did not confer with Lloyd-George the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, but perhaps he can tell us what Bonar Law has to say about such matters. Canada would like to know, England would like to know, this House would like to know these things when he comes before it with an agreement which affects our tariff relations with Great Britain and with the West Indies, and which he and his friends will go up and down the country congratulating themselves upon as being the first step in a scheme of Imperial preferential trade. This House also has the right to know what the effect on Canada would be of a reciprocal trade arrangement made between such important British possessions as the Bermudas and the Bahamas and the United States. Are there any restrictions in this treaty which would prevent the islands included in it making an arrangement with any other country which might be our competitor, and which would result in letting goods into Canada which would compete with our products. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce should take us into his confidence and tell us what he has arranged with the preferential tariff people in the Old Country and what he purposes doing.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House in Committee on the Bill (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

On section 1—short title:

Mr. MACDONALD: It is due to the House that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should now give us explanation of the matters I have placed before him.

Mr. FOSTER: I purpose taking up these several points on the sections as we come to them.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the larger question?

Mr. FOSTER: We will get it wedged in somewhere before we finish. In reference to the momentous questions solemnly put to me by my hon. friend, I would like to have the advantage of the dinner hour for cogitation.

On Section 3—Duties on goods in schedule B.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Most of these articles are not produced in Canada, and why is the preference stipulated for here only one-fifth or twenty per cent, when the British preference rate is thirty-three and one-third per cent?

Mr. FOSTER: You will notice that there is an alternative stated. The exporter from the West Indies, sending his goods into this country, gets the lower rate of duty. If the duty set out in our tariff is at any time lower than four-fifths of the duty levied upon the goods coming from any foreign country, then that is the rate under which the West Indian goods come into this country. If four-fifths of the duty levied upon goods from a foreign country happen to be in any case less than the British preferential rate as it stands under our tariff at the time, he gets the benefit of the latter or lowest duty. It works out that the preference as it is to-day on the statute-book is given under this arrangement to the goods from the West Indian Islands that are parties to this arrangement. It does so happen that in a number of cases four-fifths of the duty leviable upon the goods from a foreign country are a lesser rate than the full British preferential tariff, and in that case the West Indian exporter gets more than he would under the British preferential tariff. In the majority of cases, of course, the British preferential tariff gives a better entrance to West Indian goods into our market than would the four-fifths' provision. In that respect, we have not heightened the duties upon the West Indian goods, so far as the participants to this arrangement are concerned. In making a trade arrangement for a period of years, something like finality was necessary. We are not bound to say that the British preference of to-day shall be the British preference of next year; we may make a larger British preference on certain articles; there have been already several changes made in the British preference. The West Indies said to us: If we are going to give you for ten years a certain stated preference in our market we want to be sure that we can get an equivalent stated entrance into your market for that same period; as it is within your power to change the existing preference, there is no guarantee of uniformity; we say we will always give you a certain preference below which that preference shall not go, and we wish you also to guarantee a certain stated preference below which your preference to us shall not go.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have for a great many years been giving a preference to the West Indies in our markets of 33⅓ per cent, and I suppose we shall continue to give them that preference. The West Indies, on the other hand, only agree to give us a preference of twenty per cent, which is a very low preference as compared with that which we have been giving them under the British preference. Why did not the hon. gentleman succeed in getting the West Indies to give Canada a preference of thirty-three and one-third per cent, as we have been giving them?

Mr. FOSTER: The British West Indian Islands are differently situated with regard to revenue capabilities from the Dominion of Canada. Their revenue comes to them from their taxation alone, largely on food products, and they felt it was impossible for them to give a greater cut than one-fifth. That was the highest limit the West Indian Islands thought they could set. We would have been glad in a way to have obtained more, but when you take the whole matter into consideration, the preference of one-fifth which the West Indian Islands undertake to give to Canada and the Mother Country is pretty generous.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then I am to understand that it is the West Indies which refused to make the preference larger?

Mr. FOSTER: I would not like to say refused, but they did not feel they could go beyond that. The report of the British Commission seems to have set the rate to which the Commission were trying to bring the people of the West Indian Islands to a unanimous agreement. Some of the islands might have been able to give something more but there would be manifest confusion to have different rates given by different islands; the aim was to have it uniform for all the islands.

Mr. TURRIFF: It would seem that the West Indies apparently had the idea, knowing the well known protective proclivities of the present Government, that it was necessary for them to have a saving clause and not to depend upon the British preferential tariff, fearing that in all probability, it would be cut down to less than twenty per cent. Apparently, they have taken this means to guarantee to themselves, that at all events they will not have less than twenty per cent. It looks very much as if the intention was on the part of this Government to reduce the British preference, and the West Indies apparently took that view of it. Of course I would not ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to say now whether it was the intention of his Government to make any reduction in the British preference, but the whole thing conveys that impression.

Mr. FOSTER: If my hon. friend did not wish to make a political argument, he would hardly take that ground. The West Indian delegates were entering into an agreement for ten years by which they guaranteed Canada a certain reduction for that period, and, as the hon. gentleman would do himself, if he were entering into a bargain, although he might have perfect confidence in the man with whom he was dealing, he would like to have in black and white a definite statement as to what the other party should do. If he binds himself, he naturally would think that the other party should be bound as well. Then again, the delegates had to return and report to the different West Indian colonies what they had done, and it would not be considered a businesslike proposition if there was not some definite guarantee given on one side as well as on the other. I do not think that showed any lack of faith in the continuance of the British preference, and if it is any gratification to my hon. friend to know anything about it, I may tell him that the Government has not at this present moment any intention of reducing the British preference.

Mr. OLIVER: I have had occasion already to say that it appears to me the treaty is seriously ineffective as being beneficial to the people of Canada, nor does it appear that it is seriously beneficial to the people of the West Indies, in the matter of reducing their taxation. The point has been raised that this treaty was entered into by the people of the West Indies rather under compulsion or expected compulsion than through good-will. Had my hon. friend made this treaty with the West Indies, rather from the standpoint of good-will than from the standpoint of compulsion, both Canada and the West Indies might have benefited to a much greater degree; that is to say, we might have had more substantial reductions in duty upon the different products that we buy from the West Indies, and they might have had more substantial reductions in duty upon the goods they buy from us. As to the benefit there is to Canada in a twenty per cent reduction in duty on Canadian goods going into the West Indies, I need not bring to the attention of those members of the House who are at all familiar with the matter, that at the present time other countries hold in those West Indian Islands an advantage of trade over Canada, that in all probability a twenty per cent preference to Canada will not overcome. As a matter of fact, in order to actually get into the trade of the West Indies, we need a very much more drastic treaty than we have, under the administration of my hon. friend, been able to get. In my humble opinion, the reason we have not been able to do better was because it was a question rather of fear on the part of the people of the West Indies, that, having in some way lost their market in the United States, they were in danger of losing their market in Canada. That was why they were willing to enter into the agreement; and therefore they were doing so in a strictly defensive attitude, rather than with the idea of trying to do the best they could for themselves, and with Canada trying to do the best she could for herself. I have taken the liberty of criticising the treaty of my hon. friend from the point of view as I understood it. When I first saw the critics of the treaty point out that under it foodstuffs coming into Canada would come in actually under an increased rate of duty, and that there was a possibility under the treaty of increasing the rate of duty on the large majority of products going into the West Indies, I must say I thought it was a joke. But now I find that if it was a joke, it was a joke on the part of my hon. friend and his colleagues. The treaty is very disappointing to the people of Canada who are looking for a reduction in the cost of those articles that we get from the West Indies.

Mr. FOSTER: I must try to disabuse my hon. friend of the idea he has in his head that this matter was brought to the West Indies along a line of compulsion. Certainly no compulsion was exercised by Canada in any way, shape, or form. For fifteen years we have been giving in Canada thirty-three or thirty per cent preference to their goods coming into this country, and we had made no intimation that that would be taken away from them. It was a British preference which had been gradually extended to other British countries, until at the present time it embraces very much the larger part of the British world. I cannot tell all the motives which were present in the minds of West Indian people in making this agreement; but I am quite sure that good will and good feeling was the primary thought and the primary feeling in the minds of the delegates who came here representing their different dominions. They felt that they must do the very best they could in the way of preference in return for the preference which had been, as they say, generously given to them by Canada. There was no compulsion in the matter. I believe it sprang from real good will, good feeling and an idea that if we could keep a permanent connection between us in that way, it would be very much to the benefit of the West Indian Islands as well as to the benefit of Canada. The subject must be looked at in both ways. My hon. friend makes a great deal of the increased cost to articles of consumption by Canada because of this agreement. There are two sides to the agreement; there is not only a benefit that Canada may derive because under such an arrangement she gets articles of food or of use in at a lower rate of duty; but there is another benefit, in the opening it gives, and the opportunity it gives for the products of the toilers of our country to find their market in the other country. Up to the present time for fifteen years there was no compensation possible so far as tariffs were concerned in that respect. The West Indies now give us one-fifth preference over foreign nations. Does my hon. friend think that is a very small thing? It is not looked on as a very small thing in the West Indian Islands, and it is not in itself a small thing. It will be absolutely Canada's own fault if under that preference she does not get the markets of the islands which are parties to the agreement.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In what particular might I ask the hon. gentleman will it be the fault of Canada if she does not extend her trade? I wish to point this out to my hon. friend that perhaps in answering my question, he might answer this one. Nearly all the articles mentioned in schedule A are articles which are sold direct to the West Indies by British exporters, who have the same tariff concessions there as we would have; they have this further advantage that their shipping facilities are very much better than those existing between Canada and the West Indies. If Canada fails to extend her trade to any great extent in the West Indies, it will be rather due to the severe competition she will have with the British exporters who enter the market on the same terms as she does.

Mr. FOSTER: If my hon. friend has looked over the trade returns, as I have no doubt he has, he will see that the great competitor of Canada in the West Indian Islands is the United States. The competition takes place between their products and our products. It goes without saying that, if there is a fair preference of one-fifth, and I think that is a fair preference, it will be the fault of Canadian producers themselves if they do not in that competition make good their case in the West Indian Islands. So much for that side of the benefit. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) seemed to think this was increasing the price of articles of consumption in Canada. From what does my hon. friend draw that idea of his? If you look at schedule C, you will find three articles: cocoa beans, lime-juice and limes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are they free at present?

Mr. FOSTER: Cocoa beans are free; limes are free; and lime-juice in the raw and concentrated form is free.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are all made dutiable under this arrangement?

Mr. FOSTER: They are all made dutiable under this arrangement. On nothing else is there any larger duty than at present exists. Count what it amounts to. There are three articles; to what extent will they raise the cost of living to the people of Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Cocoa is very largely used.

Mr. FOSTER: Cocoa is largely used; but it is a cheap article, and the amount of duty put on it, seventy-five cents per hundred pounds, is very small. You are face to face with people with whom you are trying to make a fair and generous arrangement. You come to some of the islands whose chief products are in these articles; and if these islands do not get some preference on these products they get practically no preference at all.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The hon. gentleman is hardly correct in that statement. The island to which he refers is Trinidad, which island is the greatest producer of cocoa in the West Indies. But, according to the returns furnished the House by the hon. gentleman, the exports of sugar from that island alone amount to $1,592,309 last year, and I think that that is in excess of the total export of cocoa. So that the hon. gentleman's statement is hardly correct.

Mr. FOSTER: The cocoa business in Trinidad is the largest individual business Trinidad has.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What are the total imports of cocoa into Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: Between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 pounds.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Valued at how much?

Mr. FOSTER: I have not the figures at hand at the moment, but I will give the hon. gentleman the information in Committee. Take the case of Trinidad and two other colonies, and unless we gave them some preference on the staple article of cocoa, it was very problematical whether they would have come into the arrangement. As hon. members will see if they read over the negotiations, Trinidad had positive instructions not to sign the agreement unless they could get some fair preference on this large staple of their produce. Sugar produced in Trinidad goes largely to England. The sugar industry in that colony is carried on by people in a large way of business, of whom there are comparatively few, while the cocoa industry is a more extended farmers' industry and takes in a far larger class of people. Consequently, that interest is a large and important interest in Trinidad. So, if you take limes, lime-juice and cocoa-beans, these are the only articles in which there has been any increase in the duty, and the duty is very light in respect to these.

Mr. MACDONALD: As to the articles in schedule C, are we to understand that the rates of duty when imported from other countries are to be as provided in that schedule, but coming from these islands they are to be free?

Mr. FOSTER: They are now free in Canada. But under this Bill they will come in under preference, and the duty was put on foreign importations for the purpose of giving a preference on these goods from these islands.

Mr. MACDONALD: I notice that schedule C says: 'Duty when imported from any foreign country into Canada.' But they come in free from the islands?

Mr. FOSTER: Under schedule C there is to be duty on cocoa-beans of seventy-five cents per one hundred pounds on foreign imports. But they come in free from these islands. That makes the preference.

Mr. DEVLIN: I speak as representing a large farming community. I find under schedule A, if our farmers wish to sell hay, horses, cheese or butter to the West Indies, the West Indies allow a preferential tariff of thirty-three and one-third per cent. Then, under schedule B, if a Canadian farmer wishes to buy copra cocoanut oil, turtle shell, tamarinds, pea-nuts and kola nuts, bay-leaves, or papine, he will get them at a reduction of thirty per cent, is that right?

Mr. FOSTER: The man who buys turtle shell, pea-nuts and so on will get them as he gets them now, free.

Mr. DEVLIN: But if he wishes to buy lime-juice, or limes or cocoa which is greatly consumed in Canada, he will have to pay a duty where formerly he got them free.

Mr. FOSTER: He will get them free if he gets them from these islands. My hon. friend can put pea-nuts and lime-juice together and make a nice concoction for his farmers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister made some reference to the negotiations preceding this treaty. Who negotiated on behalf of Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), and the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid)—three worthy gentlemen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As things go—yes. Were these negotiations carried on publicly or in secret?

Mr. FOSTER: In secret so far as was possible with some fifteen gentlemen in the room. Then, the minutes were taken and set down as a record, and a report was given out by the chairman after each session—a summary of what had taken place. And all the negotiations, as a matter of record, and what resulted therefrom, have been printed and are in the possession of hon. members.

At six o'clock, House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock, and again went into Committee.

On section 3—Duties on goods in schedule B.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would like to ask the minister a question in connection with clause 3, because the query was put to me by a business man of Halifax quite recently. If West India sugar, entered under the present tariff, was warehoused at Halifax and taken out of warehouse after the new tariff came in force, what duty would it pay?

Mr. FOSTER: Do you mean raw sugar?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. FOSTER: It would pay exactly the same as it pays now.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before recess the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) was discussing the effect of sub-section (b), which fixes the rate of duty to be paid in future by relation to the British preferential tariff. I notice that this sub-section provides for a variation in the tariff by the use of the words: 'and in any amendment thereof,' and the effect of the last words: 'whichever shall be the lower rate' may be taken as applying to the whole of the two preceding sub-sections or to the last part of sub-section (b). It is open to two constructions.

Mr. FOSTER: That was the Act of 1907, and it was amended in 1908. The two together make the Act of 1907 and the amendment.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are those words used in contemplation of some amendment to the British preferential tariff to be made in the future? I understood the minister to say to the member for Assiniboia that the Government did not contemplate any reduction of the British preference. I would like to know what the effect of that would be in case there was an increase.

Mr. FOSTER: The tariff that would hold would be whatever the tariff was after amendment. It would be the tariff and any amendment thereto.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the hon. minister ought to be able to tell us whether the possible attitude of the Government in regard to British preference—whether there would be an increase or decrease or a permanency—was discussed at the conference. What assurance did the minister give the representatives of the West Indies as to the policy of his Government in this regard ?

Mr. FOSTER : The question did not necessarily arise; the representatives of the West Indies guarded themselves by the four-fifths clause.

Mr. MACDONALD: The four-fifths clause would not be much good if you went on increasing or decreasing the British preference.

Mr. FOSTER : If we went on increasing it, section (b) would give them the British preference if that were lower than four-fifths of the foreign duty.

Mr. MACDONALD : If the preference we give to England should become less than it is now, the extent of advantage to the West Indies would also become less, would it not ?

Mr. FOSTER : To whatever extent the British preference varied from four-fifths of the duty on the imports of any foreign country.

Mr. MACDONALD : Then sub-section (b) is put in as a check to sub-section (a) in case the Government should make up their minds to deal with the British preference, one way or the other ?

Mr. FOSTER : No. This is to give them a chance for a better rate.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did the representatives of the Government discuss with the West India representatives what their policy would be with reference to the British preference?

Mr. FOSTER: That was not germane to the discussion, and it did not come up. What the delegates of the West Indies were assured and what, I think, they expected was that to whatever extent the British preference was greater than four-fifths, they would have the advantage of it, although they could not claim it under the agreement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This section may perhaps afford an opportunity of considering for a few moments the question of the British preference, because the continuance of the preference of 33⅓ per cent as against the 20 per cent for which this agreement provides is contingent upon the British preference continuing at 33⅓ per cent. I had inferred, from statements reported in the newspapers to have been made by the ministers who visited Great Britain during the past year, that the giving on the part of Great Britain of a quid pro quo for the British preference granted by Canada was essential to the continuance of this preference. Certain Unionist statesmen in England have taken the ground that Canada has made sacrifices in the past in extending the preference to Great Britain and cannot, according to their opinion, be expected to continue that preference unless Great Britain should impose a tax upon foodstuffs, so as to give to Canada, and other dominions granting the preference, an equal degree of benefit in return. It is evident that some British statesmen have the impression that the British preference is merely of a temporary character, and will not last unless Great Britain gives in return a preference on foodstuffs from Canada.

Mr. FOSTER: I think the hon. gentleman is quite as capable of following the British press as I am. Whatever may have been said in the newspapers of Great Britain or any other country is not germane to this discussion. It seems to me this is not the proper time to discuss the British preference; the matter before us now is this agreement between Canada and the West Indies. My hon. friend will not draw me to-night into the discussion of this broader question, but if the time comes when the Government brings before the House a tariff revision measure, and the hon. gentleman is then as eager for information as he is to-night, I have no doubt he will be satisfied.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does it not seem to my hon. friend——

Mr. FOSTER: It does not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister should not anticipate my remarks. Does it not seem that this is germane to the question under discussion ?

Mr. FOSTER: I think not. What we want to do is to get through with this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: So do we, but we should not be forced to rush through the consideration of a Bill of such importance as this.

Mr. FOSTER: We do not want it rushed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister found fault with his colleague the Minister of Finance because he went out of his way this afternoon to discuss what he thought was important in regard to the reciprocity question. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce did not like that, and he rebuked the Minister of Finance almost immediately upon his resuming his seat. He said there was a Bill before the House, and he wanted hon. members to apply themselves to that Bill. I thought it was rather unkind of my hon. friend, as an experienced member of this House, to rebuke his younger colleague, the Minister of Finance, who would hardly be supposed to look at the matter from the narrow standpoint from which my hon. friend desires that this Bill be discussed.

Mr. FOSTER : I am sure the Minister of Finance is very thankful for the sympathy of my hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY : The Minister of Finance must have felt very badly about it, as he has not since returned to the House. The reason I consider this subject to be germane to the present discussion is this: paragraph (b) says that the duty on goods from the West Indies shall remain at the several rates of duty, if any, set opposite to each tariff item respectively in the column, 'British preferential tariff' in schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and in any amendment thereof, whichever shall be the lower rate. Now it seems to me that in the discussion of this question we have a right to know whether, during the next few years, we are to give to the West Indies a preference of 33⅓ per cent or of 20 per cent; and it is important for us to know whether my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce shares in the views, which are reported to have been expressed in England by Canadian ministers during the past summer, that England could not expect to have the preference given by Canada continued unless she gave a preference in return. That was the inference left in the minds of the British people, that the continuance of the British preference would depend on Great Britain granting preferential trade to Canada in return for the preference which is granted to the Mother Country. Now we, on this side of the House, do not believe in that idea at all. We do not believe there should be any bargaining with the Mother Country. We think that the right thing for Canada to do was exactly what she did when the British preference was voluntarily conceded to the Mother Country; and we think that those statesmen, whether they be Canadian or British statesmen, who go about seeking to induce the people to believe that it is imperative in the interests of the Empire that the British public should have their breadstuffs taxed for the benefit of the overseas dominions, are doing a vast injury to the Empire. I think we ought to know from my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether it is intended to continue the British preference, and whether these duties on goods from the West Indies will be based on a preference of 33⅓ per cent or on a preference of only 20 per cent. We have a right to know that in considering the benefits which are to be conferred by this arrangement upon our brethren in the West Indies, as well as upon the people of Canada. We are interested, of course, in having the duties upon West Indian goods as low as possible for two reasons. The first is that it means reducing the cost to the people of Canada of those West Indian products which they consume. That is of enormous importance. It is of enormous importance to our people to understand at this time when they are paying into the revenues of this country by way of taxes from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 more than is required to carry on the services of the country, whether there is to be a substantial reduction of taxation upon the foodstuffs which they obtain from the West Indies. On the other hand it is important with reference to our exports to the West Indies, because the larger our imports, the greater necessarily will be our exports, because to carry on a profitable trade you must have traffic both ways; the vessels which bring goods from the West Indies must go back to the West Indies with Canadian products in order to carry on a profitable business and to enlarge the trade between the two countries. Therefore, does not my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce think he ought to inform the House——

Mr. FOSTER: What about?

Mr. PUGSLEY: As to whether or not the preference voluntarily given to Great Britain by Canada against the protests of my hon. friends opposite is to be discontinued if Britain does not give us a preference in return, or whether it is to be continued so that we may confidently hope that while we are getting our products into the West Indies at a reduction of 20 per cent we will be able to get our goods from the West Indies at a preference of 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend looks at me as if he expected an answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Clearly.

Mr. FOSTER: If anything in the wide world could draw an answer from me, it would be the mellifluous persuasion of my hon. friend so attractively exercised. I feel inwardly, if the proprieties were not to be too much outraged, that I ought to give him the information he asked for in such seductive tones. My hon. friend has been a member of a Government. What does he mean by putting these questions to me? He says he wants to know as an importer of goods from the West Indies whether he is always going to get them at the same rate as at present. He wants to know if the British preference is going to stand, or if the schedule is going to be changed. Does not he see that if I answered these questions I would be giving him in advance information with reference to our tariff? What purpose has my hon. friend in putting these questions? Is there some trading concern behind him anxious to get a tip during the next two or three years in regard to certain tariff schedules, whom he might be able to advise? I trust that that is not his motive. It would be most improper for me to answer his question. If a tariff Bill was before the House, then he could put his question. Why chase all these unreal shadows? If my hon. friend will put before me any speech that I made, I shall try to justify it. But when he asks me to take up his time, my own time, and the time of the House in order to say what I think about certain airy statements that might have been made or might not have been made, he must see that he is asking me and the House to do something that is very wasteful of their time, besides being unbusinesslike.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is making use of his great abilities to throw dust in our eyes. For a great many years I have followed at a long distance my hon. friend along intellectual lines. I have been trying to learn from him, and I have learned enough to know when he is really speaking right out from the heart, and when he is making use of his great ability in handling words to convey a meaning perhaps different from that which in other circumstances he would convey. Does my hon. friend think it is wrong for us to ask him as the Nestor of his Government, as one who ought to be and who, I think, is, one of the most influential, if not the most influencial member of his Government in trade matters, and who stands head and shoulders above any other man of this Government in ability, political knowledge and experience—and I say that without any disparagement to other members of the Government——

Mr. HENDERSON: I think that will surely bring an answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have great respect for my hon. friend from Halton.

Mr. MACDONALD: He is not saying much about preference now, although he used to say a lot about it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, and I have also in my eye the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain). I am surprised at the way in which his thirst for knowledge has been completely extinguished since this Government came into office. His terrible horror at newspapers friendly to the Government getting advertisements, his horror that patronage committees should recommend appointments and all that sort of thing—these have all passed away, and my hon. friend appears as a different character altogether. But he is not singular in that respect, for we find the change in many other hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend could take a little of that to himself.

Mr. FOSTER (N. Toronto).

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would my hon. friend elaborate that a little bit?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I apologise to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce for allowing myself to be diverted from the subject.

Mr. FOSTER: It is very amusing; go on.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I have said before, this Bill provides in paragraph 3 that the preference to be given to the West Indies is to be thirty-three and one-third per cent, so long as the British preference lasts, but that then it is to be immediately changed to twenty per cent. Surely, Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of an important matter like this, this House has the right to know whether the Government is in favour of doing away with the British preference unless the British Government give Canada a preference in return. My hon. friend says that I am trying to get information about tariffs and that this House has no right to any information upon the tariff until His Royal Highness the Governor General submits some recommendation upon the subject. Let me say to my hon. friend that that rule does not seem to have prevailed in the Department of Public Works recently; because we find that, on the occasion of a by-election in the province of Nova Scotia, not very long ago, there went out from the Department of Public Works, in anticipation of the Estimates to be laid before the House, a statement of the amount which had been placed in the Estimates for this year, and not only what had been placed in the main estimates, but what had been placed in the Supplementary Estimates for next year. I am prepared to admit, Mr. Chairman, that this is something which has been unheard of in connection with the Government of this country in the past. This Government seems to have adopted a different rule. I think this Government have come to the conclusion that they ought to give information to the public in advance of what His Royal Highness the Governor General might recommend to the House. I will give my hon. friend another example. In the past it has always been deemed proper that any communication between the home Government and His Royal Highness the Governor General should be submitted to Parliament before that information was submitted to the people of the country, yet we know that only two or three weeks ago there came a dispatch from the Colonial Secretary to His Royal Highness and that, before that dispatch was submitted to Parliament, it was published broadcast in the Conservative newspapers. I take it that this Government have adopted, and in some way have induced His Royal Highness to adopt, a different rule from that which has hitherto prevailed, and in view of these precedents I do not think that my hon. friend would deem it improper that he should take the opportunity of telling this House as to whether it was intended to adhere to the British preference. It is important that we should know in order to determine whether we are to give to the West Indies a preference of 20 per cent or one of 33⅓ per cent. Surely, my hon. friend ought to tell us whether the 33⅓ per cent is to be only temporary, whether it is proposed to do away with it unless the British Government give us a preference in return, or whether it is intended to continue that policy under which Canada has prospered so greatly during the past fifteen or sixteen years. Does my hon. friend think that it is unreasonable that that information should be given to the House?

Mr. FOSTER: According to my hon. friend's argument just now, I should regard it as improper.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then the Government of my hon. friend intends to revoke that example which has been set on the two recent occasions to which I have referred?

Mr. FOSTER: My right hon. friend scarcely gets himself out of it in that way. I was watching very carefully the tenor of his remarks. To what purport did he introduce these two examples—that he approved of them or that he disapproved of them? My reading of his argument would be that he entirely disapproved of that sort of thing and yet he has been trying for half an hour to get me to do the very thing that he disapproves in others. Surely my right hon. friend does not want to lead me into temptation in that way!

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I ask my hon. friend why he persists in calling me his right hon. friend? I hope before long to see an addition to the hon. gentleman's title, and nothing would rejoice me more than to see him honoured by being made a K.C.M.G., or something of the kind.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend must give me credit for having as good an opinion of himself as he has of myself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend's foresight may be longer than mine, or perhaps he realizes that the handwriting is upon the wall and that there may be a change of conditions before very long.

Mr. FOSTER: Yes, it has not all been rubbed off yet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well, if it gets nearly rubbed off it does not take long to rub the remainder off. I said to my hon. friend that there are these two examples and that I entirely disapprove of them.

Mr. FOSTER: Then do not lead me into the same sort of thing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the majority of the members of this House do not take advice from me. The Government has set the example in these two cases. The Government, one would suppose, has determined if this is the proper course to pursue, that information should be given to the House in advance of His Royal Highness submitting a recommendation for the consideration of the House. If my hon. friend agrees with these precedents which have been mentioned—and I assume that he does because otherwise he would rebuke his colleagues for having taken the course that they have taken—surely my hon. friend can advance no reason for not giving us information as to whether the British preference is likely to be maintained or whether it is to be wiped out unless Great Britain gives us taxation upon foodstuffs, which recent events in England show is not likely to take place in the near future, or whether we are to go back to a preference of simply 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER: Carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend answer my question?

Mr. FOSTER: I am afraid I must be excused.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall this clause be adopted?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not while I am waiting for an answer from my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried, carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is silent—all right.

Mr. MACDONALD: I must say that I am at a loss to understand the attitude of the hon. gentleman whom we must call hereafter the master of the Administration in regard to certain lines of policy. Before dinner he assured me, when I ventured to say a word or two to him asking for some information which I regarded as being of the most important character in order that we might intelligently consider this Bill, that after dinner he would give us this information. Then the minister said to my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that there was to be no lowering of the British preference. I heard him say so distinctly. My hon. friend gave us the assurance that he would deal with this question and he not only gave us that assurance but he went on to deal with it and declared that the policy of this Government was not to lower the British preference. But the hon. gentleman displayed an unusual amount of caution after dinner. I do not know what could have occurred in the meantime. There is no necessity for him to adopt such unusual reticence. His frankness has usually been one of his qualifications and why he should become so exceedingly reticent when he is submitting to the House for approval the first of what he would like to be a succession of arrangements with the different colonies of the Empire is something I cannot understand. If he wants to carry out a trade policy by which Canada will make arrangements, not merely with the West Indies but with Australia, where, I understand, he is going very shortly, why should he draw himself within his shell and say: I am not going to say anything at all, I am not touching this British preference and I do not dare to mention a word about it, although his whole arrangement is based on this British preference idea. It is impossible to understand the reticence which he is now displaying.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is afraid that it will be cabled to Bonar Law.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not see why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) should not tell this House whether he and Bonar Law had a discussion over this question.

Mr. FOSTER: Over the West Indian question?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend certainly discussed the West Indian question with Bonar Law; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. FOSTER: There is no doubt about that?

Mr. MACDONALD: I assume that the hon. gentleman assents to that?

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend says that there is no doubt about that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend assent to that?

Mr. FOSTER: I am making no assent.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is getting to be so superlatively cautious that I do not know why he should expect to secure any legislation from this House. We all remember the vociferous demands that the hon. gentleman used to make on previous occasions for information that was required before any proposition involving the fiscal relations of this country should be considered by the House. But my hon. friend has so changed that he has become but a strange semblance of his former self. When the responsibility of government is put upon him he absolutely declines to even discuss the very basis of the proposition that he is submitting to the House. My hon. friend cannot get away from this question by any theory of state secrets. The hon. minister asks us to embody this trade agreement with the West Indies in an Act of Parliament, and the rates of duty specified in the Bill which he submits are dependent upon what the British preference is to-day and what it is going to be during the continuance of this arrangement, and when we ask him what he and his colleagues have to say about it, he tells us that it is some horrid state secret about which nothing can be said. We have the assurance of the hon. gentleman that there is to be no lowering of the British preference by this Government; and being so cautious about everything else, I am surprised that he should have been so incautious as to make such an admission. He tells us he can say nothing about the tariff policy of the Government until it is brought down to this House after a tariff commission has been appointed and has reported. Are we to understand that there is to be nothing done about the tariff or about the British preference until a tariff commission has enquired into and dealt with the matter, and that in view of the fact that there is no attempt by the Government so far to ask Parliament to institute such a commission. Then, the hon. gentleman declines to tell us whether he consulted with prominent men in England, as to this scheme of preferential trade that he has inaugurated with the West Indies, and that he proposes to establish with Australia and I presume with New Zealand. This agreement with the West Indies in effect, leaving out all unnecessary verbiage, says:

3. There shall be levied, collected and paid, after the said agreement is in accordance with its terms brought into operation and so long as it remains in force, on all goods enumerated in schedule B.

(a) At the rate of four-fifths of the several rates of duty, if any, imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

If it were left at that, there would not be so much difficulty; but there is this alternative proposition which has to be carefully considered before anyone can conclude what the agreement really is:

(b) or, at the several rates of duty, if any, set opposite to each tariff item respectively in the column 'British Preferential Tariff' in schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and in any amendment thereof.

In order to ascertain what the proposition is, you have to consider both these sub- clauses, and in addition to that there is the third proposition.

Whichever shall be the lower rate.

So that under subsection (b) of the agreement what the British preference may be, what it is now, what it was at the date of the agreement, what it is going to be next year, what it is likely to be at any time during the currency of this agreement, is at the very basis of this whole proposition. When my hon. friend from St. John was discussing this matter, the Minister of Trade and Commerce endeavoured to escape responsibility by jocularity.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Which was very unfair.

Mr. MACDONALD: When I find two old associates like these gentlemen exchanging compliments across the floor, it must be understood that those of us who are not within the sacred circle are not to be affected in the slightest degree by these pleasantries. Here is a business proposition the basis of which is what this preferential tariff is now, and is going to be, and when we ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce for information, he simply says he cannot tell us, or that he will not tell us. I might remind the hon. gentleman that when he sat in Opposition, he never allowed the Government to put any kind of proposition through this House without knowing what the full meaning and effect of it was. He tells us there is to be no lowering of the British preference, and apparently there is to be no discussion of the tariff permitted in this House until a tariff commission has been appointed and has reported. It will be a great disappointment to many people in this country if tariff legislation is to be postponed until that late period. The Prime Minister has evidently committed to the hon. member the task of dealing with the question of preferential trade, and the hon. gentleman has no doubt in his mind a well thought out line of action for not only the West Indies but for other colonies and for the Mother Country as well. Why should he not frankly tell us what that policy is now that he is initiating it in this treaty? We should be told now whether the Government purposes not merely to lower the British preference, but whether, so long as they are permitted to remain in office, and this agreement continues, they intend to maintain the British preference as it is. Those of us who were here last Parliament remember how the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) was accustomed to declare that the British preference was not in the interest of a large portion of the people of Canada. Where does that hon. gentleman stand now upon this question of preference? Where does the Minister of Finance stand upon it? Is it to be the permanent policy of this country, while the agreement remains in force, or is it to be diminished or increased? I can hardly believe that my hon. friend, when negotiating with these West Indian gentlemen, never ran up against this question or that these men, who based their whole tariff, as well as this agreement, on what that British preference was to be, never obtained some assurance from this Government as to what its policy was. If any assurance was given, my hon. friend should give it to this House and to the country.

Mr. FOSTER: I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend; so I will have to take a little of the time of the House to explain it to him, in order that he may see clearly what has been explained already two or three times. My hon. friend has made some assertions which go far beyond any assertions which I made; he has added something to my assertions in the way that irresponsible commentators do. I do not recollect making a hard and fast statement that there was to be no interference with British preference; what I meant to say and what I believe I did say, was that there was no present intention of lowering British preference. I did not say, until a commission had been appointed, made its investigation and its report, and the Government had considered it, that there would be no rearrangement of the tariff. I do not remember having used the words 'Tariff Commission' at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: You certainly did.

Mr. FOSTER: What I stated was this, as has been stated in this House before on several occasions in connection with this Bill, that there are some tariff adjustments that have to be made, therefore we will have a tariff Bill before this House in order to make those adjustments, and until the Act which deals generally with the tariff and not with this special agreement is brought down, my contention was, and I think it is perfectly fair, and I intend to stand by it, that the questions at present put before me are not germane.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend mean that when the tariff Bill for this session comes down, it will provide further changes than are contemplated in this Act, and that then the statement can be made which he cannot give us now?

Mr. FOSTER: I think my hon. friend understands thoroughly what I stated to my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that at that time it would be proper for the questions to be put and answered.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why can you not do it now?

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend is also a little at fault in another assertion he makes regarding dependence on British preference. I do not think he is right in that idea. If my hon. friend looks over the agreement made between the Canadian delegates and the delegates from the West Indies, he will see that the proposition in sub-section (b) does not come into that agreement at all. The agreement made between the West Indian Islands and Canada was for a ten-year period continuance of a certain preference, which was four-fifths of the duty falling upon goods coming from any foreign country. That was all in so far as preference is concerned, and relates to what is included in the agreement between Canada and the West Indies. What is in sub-section (b) is simply what we have put in by way of good will, by way of grace, if you wish to put it that way; we had no idea of depriving them of the British preference in so far as it had heretofore applied and might hereafter apply to the goods coming in from the West Indian Islands, we say so and there in a section of the Bill, for which there is no compulsion at all, and for which there is no claim in the agreement itself. My hon. friend says: how can we tell what is to be the preference that the West Indian Islands get unless you tell us more about this British preference? Let my hon. friend look at sub-section (a). Why does he not make the same claim there? There is a four-fifths duty, defined in exactly the same way that the definition is made in sub-section (b), defined in the only way in which it can be defined.

Mr. MACDONALD: Except that if you lower the preference—

Mr. FOSTER: If you are going to take the standards of duty as they exist for British and foreign countries, in may have varying rates of duty. A change may take place a year from now or two years from now, but four-fifths will be the proportion of that rate, whatever the changes are; this is the only way you can fix it, unless you go to work and fix your foreign tariffs as well as your British preferential tariff for every year of the succeeding ten years, and then put in definite figures; that is the only way you can do it except by this way. Why does not my hon. friend say: we want to know what you are going to put on goods coming from foreign countries in the next ten years; are you going to change those duties or keep them the same as they are at present? One demand is just as strong as the other, and neither of them can be admitted. I think my hon. friend sees that quite well. All this discussion that has been going on between my hon. friends and myself may be very excellent fooling, or it may be very foolish fooling; but when you come right down to common sense I think both my hon. friends see that they have been asking what they have a perfect right to ask, but which I do not think is germane to this at all. If we were putting through at this time a tariff measure which affected Great Britain herself, then with reference to the preferential tariff these questions would be germane. We are not doing so; that question is not raised in this at all, in any way, shape or form. Sub-section (b) is simply put in by way of good will to the other part which fixed the duty as regards foreign duties; both of them are indefinite in amount, but clear and fixed in proportion. Take the tariff as it exists to-day and you can define it in definite terms. As to how it may stand five years from now, you have got to wait to see what that tariff is before you can define the preference in sub-section (a) or sub-section (b) in actual figures.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that my hon. friend has given an absolutely good reason why he should answer the questions.

Mr. FOSTER: I am afraid by trying to give information I am getting into further trouble.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend has said, if this was an agreement affecting our trade with Great Britain, then he would be obliged to give the information as to the policy of the Government regarding British preference. When you bear in mind that this country does not necessarily give to the West Indies the preference which is given to Great Britain, that we can give a preference to Great Britain if we like, without giving it to the British West Indies, then surely, when we are making an agreement with the West Indies and when we propose to give to them a preference of thirty-three and a third per cent, it is just as proper that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should give us information with regard to the continuance of that preference or as to the policy of the Government with regard to the continuance of that preference, as if this was a treaty direct with the Mother Country. My hon. friend must see this.

Mr. FOSTER: I do not see it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my hon. friend take it that we are bound to give this preference of thirty-three and a third per cent to the West Indies because we give it to Great Britain? That is not the case. We can give it to Great Britain without giving it to a single one of the British colonies. This Parliament gave it to the colonies, because it was thought advisable to do so. Here is an agreement where there was no agreement before; it is an agreement to which the West Indies and Canada are parties. Under that agreement the West Indies give to Canada a preference of twenty per cent and twenty per cent only; but by that same agreement we not only give to the West Indies a preference of twenty per cent, but my hon. friend, as he has informed this House stated to the commissioners of the West Indies that so long as the British preference lasts, they will have a preference in our country not of twenty per cent, which is the preference which they give to us, but of thirty-three and a third per cent. Surely, that being so, we have a right to know what is the policy of the Government in regard to the British preference. Is it intended to discontinue it unless Great Britain gives us a preference in return? Is it intended to increase it? Is it intended to lower it? Surely the Government must have some policy on the question. It is not a new question; it has been discussed both on this side and on the other side of the Atlantic; it has been discussed at gatherings in the Mother Country at which Ministers of the Crown were present and took an active part and one likely to affect public opinion in the Mother Country. It is a question on which this Government should have a policy, and they ought to be able to state what that policy is. My hon. friend admits that if this were a ratification of an agreement between Great Britain and Canada it would be his duty to tell the House what is the Government's policy with regard to the British preference. When we bear in mind that the preference to the West Indies does not follow the British preference but rests with the discretion of this Parliament, what applies to one case applies to the other. I do think my hon. friend upon reflection, will see that he is not taking the course which will best advance his Bill, if he merely draws himself into his shell and tells us he will give us no information. As suggested by an hon. friend near me, he seems to emulate one of his younger colleagues, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) whose delight seems to be to keep from this House information to which members are entitled. We wish to assist in this legislation, and I think the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce would act more wisely in giving us the information for which we reasonably ask.

Mr. FOSTER: I almost fail in the hope of convincing my hon. friend, for I am afraid he does not want to be convinced. Why does he not ask me what our policy is with regard to imports from France or Germany, basing that question on the arguments he has just used? Why not say: You have an arrangement with the West Indies which you propose to enact into law, providing that their goods shall pay only four-fifths of the duty paid by goods coming from Germany. What is your policy with regard to goods coming in from Germany—what will it be next year or the year after? Surely, the hon. gentleman will see the illogical position in which he places himself. Any information germane to this arrangement between us and the West Indies that can be given I am glad to give, but we are not legislating now with reference to France, Germany or Great Britain, and consequently the discussion is not germane.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman has asked me a question. We are not, he says, legislating with regard to goods coming from France. Germany or any other country with which we have a preferential arrangement. But we are legislating as to goods coming in from Great Britain. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that our treaty with France places the goods from the West Indies affected by this treaty in the same position with regard to our preference to France as our preference to Great Britain places goods from the West Indies in comparison with goods imported from Great Britain? If so, how is the Minister of Customs going to fix the four-fifths of duty to be paid? I think the hon. gentleman ought to enlighten us upon that. Are we to have a variable scale of duty? Is the four-fifths to be estimated on the duty of similar goods from France, or on the duty on similar goods from the United States?

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend surely can read the clause: it is as plain as can be.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me read it, then. I will read it to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and I should like to get his interpretation of it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just suggested what strikes me as a difficulty which this section does not get over, and which, it seems to me, must be overcome, if he is to have any certainty with regard to the duty. Let me read this to the Minister of Justice who can understand things a good deal better than most people:

It is agreed between the Government of the Dominion and the governments of the above-mentioned colonies severally that:

1. On all goods enumerated in schedule A, being the produce or manufacture of Canada, imported into any of the above-mentioned colonies, the duties of customs shall not at any time be more than four-fifths of the duties imposed in the colony on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

That relates to goods imported into the colony. Now we come to goods imported into Canada.

2. On all goods enumerated in schedule B, being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies, imported into the Dominion of Canada, the duties of customs shall not at any time be more than four-fifths of the duties imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells me that this treaty affects our relations with France as to the goods coming in under preference. Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that we import molasses both from France and from the United States. We have no treaty with the United States, but we have a treaty with France. Now we are asked to ratify a treaty with the West Indies fixing duties at four-fifths. Do goods coming from the West Indies pay four-fifths of the duty on similar goods coming from the United States, with which we have no treaty, or four-fifths of the duty on similar goods coming from France with which we have a treaty? Would the Minister of Justice give us an opinion on the question?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have to confess that my powers to or ability to 'understand things better than most people' does not enable me to understand the hon. member's misunderstanding of that provision.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Justice has given a clear and easily understood opinion. If, in the opinions which he gave before he left the bar, he took equal pains to elucidate the points on which his opinion was asked, I can well imagine the large fees he must have received for his advice. Is that not worthy of consideration? In reading the clause at first I was of the opinion that the four-fifths duty would be four-fifths of the highest duty which would be paid on goods coming from any country in the world with which we had no arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER: Where did you get the idea of highest?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If you did not view it from that standpoint, you would make the duty absolutely uncertain.

Mr. FOSTER: Would not you make it equally uncertain if it was the highest?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. FOSTER: There is only one highest and one lowest.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): There is an intermediate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Take the case of the United States; I presume goods coming from the United States pay the highest duty exacted by the Customs Department of Canada from those of any country in the world.

Mr. FOSTER: Not at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not?

Mr. FOSTER: We would have a tariff for each country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have an intermediate tariff applying to France, and an ordinary tariff applying to the United States, and those countries with which we have no treaty. Now, is this four-fifths——

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend should not get away from the question. He made a very strong assertion a moment ago, to the effect that goods coming from the United States paid higher duties than those coming from any other country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They do pay a higher duty than those coming from some other countries.

Mr. FOSTER: They will not pay higher than those that are not under the most favoured nation or preference treatment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then they are among the highest; they belong to the highest class.

Mr. FOSTER: They are among them. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the four-fifths to be four-fifths of the duty on goods from those countries with respect to which there is the highest tariff?

Mr. FOSTER: Does it say so?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I asked my hon. friend the question.

Mr. FOSTER: The hon. gentleman can read English.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Which is it?

Mr. FOSTER: It is plain and simple enough. Goods coming from the West Indies, under that clause, pay four-fifths of the duty imposed on similar goods imported from any foreign country.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the several rates?

Mr. FOSTER: If there are several rates, they get the lowest.

Mr. MACDONALD. The statute says several rates; there should be some clearer definity.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend forgets that by this clause he has fixed a tariff with the West Indies at four-fifths of the tariff that is imposed on goods coming from any other country. Now we will take a certain article. The duty on that article —say a ton—coming from the United States, is $100. If goods coming from the West Indies pay four-fifths of that, it will be four-fifths of $100—$80. Similar goods coming from France will pay on the ton, say $80, and four-fifths of that amount would be $64. Are goods of similar character coming from the West Indies to pay $80, or $64? The hon. minister says that our treaty with France is in some way concerned with this——

Mr. FOSTER: I did not say our treaty with France was concerned with this; I said nothing about our treaty with France.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did not my hon. friend say we might just as well ask him to tell us whether the tariff of France is to be continued as it is, as to ask him if the tariff with the Mother Country is to remain as it is? Did he not say the treaty with France was just as applicable to this as the arrangement with Great Britain?

Mr. FOSTER: I referred to the duties on goods coming from all countries.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the clause mean that the four-fifths which is to be paid is four-fifths of the duty paid on goods coming from those countries in regard to which there is the highest tariff?

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend has been told that over and over again. I told him in plain English not more than five minutes ago, that the duty imposed was four-fifths of that imposed on goods coming from any foreign country.

Mr. PUGSLEY : Then would it be four-fifths of the duty imposed on similar goods coming from France ?

Mr. FOSTER : Certainly, if that were lower than the duty on the goods coming from the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY : I understand my hon. friend to say that as we have a preferential arrangement with France under which goods come in at a lower rate than from other countries with which we have no such arrangement, similar goods coming from the United States are to pay four-fifths of the duty upon similar goods from France. But is that the meaning of this Bill ? It does not say so; the matter is left in absolute uncertainty notwithstanding the efforts of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to give an opinion upon it.

Mr. EDWARDS : Sub-section (a) says:

> At the rate of four-fifths of the several rates of duty, if any, imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

Would not the West Indies have the right to ask that the four-fifths apply to the lowest rate of duty from any of these foreign countries ? Supposing a customs officer says to an importer: that four-fifths is four-fifths of the highest. But, the importer says, there is a country where it is lower, and I think I am right in asking that it should be four-fifths of that lower rate. I ask my hon. friend if that is not a reasonable deduction to make, and if the West Indies would not have the right to make that deduction ? It seems to me that this is implied in the last words of sub-section (b): 'whichever shall be the lower rate.' My hon. friend will say that refers to sub-section (b), but I say there is only one conclusion to be drawn from those words, taken together with the words 'any foreign country'—that it must be a four-fifths of the lowest rate of duty from any of those countries not coming under the preferential tariff.

Mr. MACDONALD : The point raised by the hon. member for St. John is one which has not been made clear by the explanation of my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards); the matter should be expressed in the Bill in more concise language. I would like to call the attention of the minister and the committee to a statement the minister made a short time ago, to the effect that if this Bill was one dealing with preferential trade with England, there would be no reason why he should not discuss the policy of the Government in that regard. There is no question as to the fact that this is a Bill which deals with the preferential trade with England in the most direct and positive way, and that there is a clause here under which the Government have power, by the mere publication in the Canada Gazette of an Order in Council dealing with this proposition, to materially affect our trade with England. In paragraph 7 of the Bill it is stated:

> The advantages or concessions granted by this Act to the colonies parties to the said agreement shall extend to the United Kingdom and such of the other British colonies and possessions as may be admitted thereto by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette so long as the colonies parties to the said agreement continue to be entitled to such advantages or concessions.

What does that clause mean? I do not propose to discuss it in detail at this stage, for we will have to come to it later. But that clause clearly indicates what the Government may take power, by publication in the Canada Gazette of an order dealing with the question, to in some way affect the present preference so far as the Mother Country is concerned. Now we come back to the proposition which I made earlier in the evening in regard to this matter. I apprehend the position of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be this: He is ambitious to carry into effect trade agreements with the Mother Country perchance, and certainly with the colonies. We shall assume that for the moment his ambition in regard to the Mother Country is quiescent, though I am not sure that he was not very active when in England, or that he did not confer with the men proposing the policy as to what the colonies are to say and do when the Mother Country comes to provide for the preferential idea. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not very far away when some such idea was talked over among those who occupy the seats of the mighty in the Old Land. But under this Bill my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce takes powers which would enable him to make an arrangement with Australia and New Zealand without coming to Parliament at all. If he goes out to Australia he could make an arrangement under the provisions of this Bill, and include a schedule, which he would publish in the Canada Gazette embodying an arrangement with that country, and he need not come to Parliament at all. What is my hon. friend's policy in regard to England? He takes the power in this Bill to change the preference in some way, although I am bound to say that I cannot see very clearly what it is. Having drawn the attention of the Committee to the presence of this clause in the Bill, surely my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot refuse to tell us what he means.

Mr. FOSTER: I think we may take the Bill through regularly. We are now at section 3, and when we come to section 7, I shall be very glad to give any information to my hon. friend. But we are in Committee, and we must take the Bill section by section.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no desire on my part to obstruct the minister in any way. We are dealing with a very big proposition which is one of the hon. minister's peculiar subjects. If my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not going to tell us what his policy is, to whom shall we go? Who among his colleagues is going to give us the slightest glimmer of light upon it? I would not expect my hon. friend the Minister of Customs to give us any enlightenment on the question of preferential trade. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that I would be disappointed if I depended upon his colleague in the Customs Department. I cannot go to the Minister of Railways whose penchant for not saying anything and for declining information respecting his own department is recognized not only in the House but in the country. To whom are we to look for information except to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce? He knows that this whole question is his own peculiar child. Section 3 of the Bill, notwithstanding anything he may say, contains the kernel or the basis of the arrangement which he made. It contains the check or minimum which he and the delegates from the West Indies placed upon the tariff that was to be imposed under this Bill. My hon. friend knows that the question raised by my hon. friend from St. John is a question of verbiage which will have to be discussed by itself, and which I think calls for some amendment in order to make it clear. But sub-section (d) of section 7 is a limitation which my hon. friend the minister and the men from the West Indies have introduced, a criterion of what the minimum duty shall be. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not tell us what the policy of the Government is to be in regard to British preference. He tells us that if we were dealing with a measure in some way affecting our relations with the United Kingdom, he would inform us, but I call his attention to a section in the Bill under which the Government takes power to grant a British preference, if they see fit, without coming to Parliament. I submit that he ought to be frank and tell us what his policy is in dealing with the other colonies, whether he made any arrangement when in England with regard to the future, and, generally, where he stands on the whole question of preferential trade.

Mr. DEVLIN: I feel very keenly upon the subject of the high cost of living in this country. I had occasion the other day to ask the Government what steps they were taking to lessen the high cost of living. I find that one of the steps taken by the Government is indicated in this very section 3 and I wish to call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the point. I think it must have escaped his attention, and when he reconsiders section 3 perhaps he will not press this arrangement. The people of Canada will not stand for anything that will tend to increase the cost of food and drink in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Especially drink.

Mr. DEVLIN: The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told us before six o'clock, if I remember his words, that we imported about 3,000,000 pounds of cocoa into this country per annum. Since then I have had occasion to look up the Trade and Commerce reports, and I find that of that article we import from the British West Indies 679,819 pounds. At all events we imported that amount last year. Now by this arrangement the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce is going to force Canada to bring from the British West Indies the cocoa that has hitherto come into this country free. I do not think that this arrangement will change in one iota the trade channels. What then will be the result of the act of the hon. minister? I simply take the one item, a very important item, cocoa. We will be allowed to bring into this country under this arrangement 679,819 pounds, but under the tariff prepared by the late Government we brought into this country all cocoa free of duty, independent of the country from which it was imported. According to the hon. minister, 3,000,000 pounds of cocoa were consumed by the people of this country free of duty. What does the Government intend to do? It intends to allow the people of Canada to bring in 679,000 pounds free of duty from the West Indies but upon 2,320,181 pounds, upon which the people of Canada previously paid nothing at all, they will now have to pay a duty of 75 cents per 100 pounds. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce think that that will lessen the high cost of living? I content myself with calling the attention of the minister to this most important item, and as a representative of the people interested in the labour element in this country, and as one who sees the advantage of articles coming into Canada free of duty, I ask why it is that he is making this arrangement and taxing the food of the people of Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: I will not forget my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would like to say, in connection with the matter raised by my hon. friend from St. John with respect to the exact meaning of clause 3, that it strikes me that the objection must be considered by the minister. In answer to a question by my hon. friend from St. John, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce informed us that this four-fifths preferential rate would be four-fifths of the general or intermediate rate whichever should be the lower. That was never my construction of this agreement and I do not think it was the intention of the parties to the agreement that it should be so construed. I do not think that was the idea of the negotiators at all at any stage in the proceedings leading up to the agreement. The hon. gentleman will remember that, in the first instance, the British preference was a flat reduction of 25 per cent. Later it was increased to 33⅓ per cent. In the tariff revision of 1907 there was another change made in the application of the tariff under the preferential rate. Therefore, I say that I do not think that clause 3 of the agreement bears the construction that the minister thinks it does. I do not believe that that was the intention of the parties to the agreement and I think he should allow this clause to stand and give it further consideration. I notice in paragraph 99 of the report of the Royal Commission, which will be found on page 24, this statement:

> There was a general agreement that the rates of duty in the preferential tariff should be 20 per cent less than those in the general tariff.

That is the statement contained in the written report of the Royal Commission upon whose report this agreement was made. I think the minister will find upon reflection that it was clearly never intended under this agreement that that four-fifths should be four-fifths of the intermediate tariff, or the preferential rate, whichever was the lower. Again, I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the word 'direct' in line 6 of clause 3 of the Bill, which reads thus:

> When such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada, &c.

The word 'direct' is not used in the clause of the agreement which establishes the four-fifth rate. There is another clause in the agreement and there is another clause in the Bill which gives the Governor in Council power to proclaim that the four-fifths preference shall only apply when there is a shipment direct from one country to another. I think there might be a little danger in leaving that word 'direct' there and I suggest that the minister might take it into consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think that the point taken by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr Maclean) is important because, if you take the agreement, you see that the words are as follows:

> On all goods enumerated in schedule 'B' being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies imported into the Dominion.

It does not say imported 'direct' into the Dominion; therefore, these goods might be brought into the United States, placed in a warehouse there and then sent by merchants in the United States to various parts of Canada and come in under this preferential clause.

Mr. FOSTER: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend shakes his head at that but it is true nevertheless. For some reason the hon. gentleman, I presume, or his technical officers, has sought to get over that in section 3 of the Bill which, in that respect, makes a variation of the treaty. If my hon. friend had embodied the same words in the treaty, which his legal adviser had put into this Bill, it would have been all right, but in the treaty it is provided by section 2 that:

> On all goods enumerated in schedule 'B,' being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies imported into the Dominion of Canada, the duties of customs shall not at any time be more than four-fifths of the duties imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

There is an express provision by which these goods from the West Indies may be imported into the United States, kept there in warehouses and then sent into Canada at a rate of duty four-fifths lower than that charged on similar goods imported from foreign countries, as provided for in the treaty. It is true that in the Bill the word 'direct' is inserted, because it says that:

There shall be levied, collected and paid, after the said agreement is in accordance with its terms brought into operation, and so long as it remains in force, on all goods enumerated in schedule 'B' to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies, parties thereto, when such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada.

Those words 'direct from any British country into Canada' are not in the treaty at all. Would the hon. gentleman explain how the word 'direct' came to be left out of the treaty and is now in the Bill?

Mr. FOSTER: I think the difficulty that my hon. friend sees is not at all a real one.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not?

Mr. FOSTER: The Bill, as in section 3, is this:

When such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein, if imported as aforesaid, duties of customs——

Shall be so and so. This clause in the Bill is simply necessary to meet the requirements of the customs law and administration. You can send goods from the West Indies via New York or Boston, but they must go through in bond. If they break bulk in any way they are liable to duty when they come to our frontier. The word 'direct' does not mean that these goods come from a British country direct by ship into a port of Canada but it means that they shall not break bulk. The clause was arranged by the commissioner of customs and the law clerk to meet the necessities of the case and that is what it does do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not meeting the treaty but it is altering the treaty.

Mr. FOSTER: It is not altering the treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not? The law clerk has evidently seen the difficulty in the treaty and has tried to meet it and make it right, but can this Parliament change the treaty?

Under the words of the treaty the goods might be kept in the United States for ten years, but so long as they are the produce of the West Indian Islands they are entitled to come into Canada on payment of four-fifths of the duty, and the law clerk sought to change the agreement by requiring these goods to come direct from the West Indies or from a British country, and he inserted in the Bill the word 'direct,' which is not in the treaty. The West Indian delegates evidently insisted on that clause being drawn as it appears in the treaty, and not until it comes to the law clerk and the commissioner of customs is it seen that it would operate injuriously to Canada. These gentlemen sought to correct the error by inserting in the Bill the important word 'direct' which does not appear in the treaty. I submit, Sir, that this Parliament has no right to alter the agreement. If the British West Indian delegates stipulated that these goods could be warehoused in the United States and kept there, and distributed by the wholesale men there to the retailers in Canada, as the agreement provides, I suppose they would not consent to te change.

Mr. FOSTER: There was no intention, no thought, no agreement, that the West Indies should have warehouses in the United States keep and sell goods for years in these warehouses and then send them in driblets into Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not say that. I said that under this treaty wholesale merchants of the United States could import West Indian goods, warehouse them in the United States, sell them to the retail merchants of Canada, and these goods would be entitled to come into Canada on payment of four-fifths of the ordinary duty.

Mr. FOSTER: You could not do that under the customs laws of any country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But this is a treaty and the terms of the treaty ought to be carried out.

Mr. FOSTER: Section 2 of the agreement refers to goods imported into the Dominion and they can only be imported into the Dominion under our customs laws, which regulate imports.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Apart from what the customs laws may be, there is not a word in this agreement itself to say that the goods are to be imported to Canada direct from the West Indies. If it be shown that these goods are the manufacture or the product of the British West Indies, then the collector of customs has to admit them under the preferential tariff provided, no matter how long they may have been warehoused in the United States.

Mr. FOSTER: Is the hon. gentleman serious in that proposition?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I never was more serious in my life. I leave it to any business man or lawyer in the House if I am not correct.

Mr. FOSTER: It surpasses my understanding that the hon. gentleman can keep a solemn countenance when advancing such a theory.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then why did the Law Clerk put in the word 'direct' thus changing the terms of clause 3 of the agreement?

Mr. FOSTER: The Law Clerk and the Commissioner of Customs, when this clause was being framed, had for their purpose the putting into effect of the agreement which agreement was that articles from the West Indian colonies, when imported into the Dominion, should bear a certain duty. These goods could only be imported into the Dominion under our customs laws. The contention of my hon. friend is the most absurd I have ever heard. Under his contention you could have all countries of the world bringing their goods into certain other countries, warehousing them there, distributing them amongst merchants, and when they went into another country, claiming that the same customs rates should be applied as though they were the products of a country which had a preferential rate, even though they were imported into the other country ten or twenty years before. Surely the hon. gentleman does not think that the delegates from the West Indian colonies ever contemplated any such thing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend's argument goes to show the absurdity of making the agreement contained in clause 2. I am not responsible for what the commissioners did. It may be that they had in their minds to do certain things, but they have not done them. When the commissioner of customs comes to consider the meaning of this agreement, he is not to interpret it by what the Minister of Trade and Commerce may have said, or what the Minister of Customs or some other ministers may have said; he is to interpret the agreement as it stands. The words in the agreement are:

On all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies imported into the Dominion of Canada, the duty or customs shall not, &c.

The law clerk has followed those words:

On all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto.

But he does not stop there; he says:

When such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada.

These words have been left out of the treaty. The Law Clerk and the Commissioner of Customs have undoubtedly seen that if those words are not put in the Bill, in order to change the terms of the treaty, then the effect would be that United States merchants could import goods into their own country, keep them in warehouses for one month, six months, one year or two years; then send them into Canada to retail merchants throughout the country, and upon those goods under the terms of the treaty they would only be liable to pay four-fifths of the ordinary duty. That is what the Law Clerk and the Commissioner of Customs have sought to remedy; but they cannot do that.

Mr. FOSTER. Goods could not be sold out in parcels.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why not?

Mr. FOSTER. In bond?

Mr PUGSLEY. Sold out in parcels; any quantity can be released.

Mr. FOSTER. If you are shipping in bond from the West Indian Islands to Canada, you cannot break up the shipment.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think so.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all. They go through under seal.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Very well. Supposing it were necessary to keep them in bond, they could keep them in bond for a year or more, and then send them to Canada. Is that importing direct to Canada? That is what the Bill says. I think that means by a continuous journey to Canada. I want to call the attention of my hon. friend to this fact that the Law Clerk and the Commissioner of Customs have sought to remedy a defect which is contained in the treaty. It is no use my hon. friend saying what he understood or what someone else understood with reference to it; it is absolutely clear under that agreement. I will leave it to any lawyer on either side of the House, and I am sure that their opinion will be to the effect that such goods sent from the United States to Canada will be entitled to come in under the definition, upon payment of four-fifths of the duty. Can you alter the treaty by the Bill?

Mr. FOSTER: The agreement is not altered by the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it is not altered, then why not make the words read exactly as in the treaty? Why not say just as the treaty says:

Being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto.

And leave out the words:

When such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada.

If those words are not needed, why put them in, if you say the treaty is to the same effect? My hon. friend knows very well that those words are put in in order to remove a defect which is contained in the treaty; he must know that as a gentleman of ordinary intelligence; he must know, if you leave the treaty as it is, that it does not provide that these goods from the West Indies must be imported direct to Canada. That is the object of changing the words of the treaty. Can this Parliament do that? I submit it cannot. If my hon. friend says this treaty makes the provision he intended it to make, then let the treaty speak for itself; do not let us after having made a solemn agreement with the West Indies, try to alter that agreement but let us pass it just as it was signed, sealed and delivered by the various parties thereto. Then let the Minister of Customs under the advice of the Minister of Justice decide what the treaty means; but do not let us by statute seek to alter the terms of the treaty.

Mr. EMMERSON: It seems to me it is a well-recognized principle of international law that the terms of treaties are paramount over mere matters of internal enactments. A good method, and perhaps the only method of testing this question, which has been raised, would be to admit for the sake of argument that this Bill had been enacted into law as it stands, that some individual from the West Indies, or I care not where, some American citizen, had procured from any one of these countries certain produce or articles, brought them into the United States under bond and kept them there for any period of time, and then sought to bring them into Canada free of duty, the question would be when he came to the border, is he entitled to the provisions of the treaty as such, or would he be confronted with the terms of this Bill itself? The phraseology of the Bill is one thing; the phraseology of the treaty is another. I am sure it would be recognized that the treaty was paramount and must prevail, as a matter of right, as a matter of international right. We have already, as I understand it, approved of section 2 of this Bill, and we have said what the law is in respect to the point in question. We have said, so far as this country at this moment can say so, that:

> On all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto, when such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein if imported as aforesaid, duties of customs—
> (a) at the rate of four-fifths of the several rates of duties, if any, imposed on similar goods when imported by any foreign country.

We propose to enact this section as drafted by the Law Clerk, which entirely changes the paragraph which I have just read; it puts an entirely new meaning upon it. The question for this Committee to consider is: was it arranged between the delegates from the West Indian Islands and the representatives of the Government of Canada

Mr. PUGSLEY.

> That there shall be levied, collected and paid, after the said agreement is in accordance with its terms brought into operation, and so long as it remains in force, on all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto, when such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada.

Was that a part of your agreement? It does not appear in the agreement which we approve in the schedule of this Act. Yet it must be apparent to anyone that what will prevail with regard to the importation of such articles after the enactment of this law must be the terms of the law itself. It may not have been so intended. If it was intended that the goods should be shipped direct from that country to this it should be so stated in the treaty itself. I submit there can be no other interpretation given to it and that the interpretation sought to be given by the law clerk or by whomsoever drafted this Bill is not in accord with the agreement entered into by the delegates.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): For my part, I do not see how there can be danger of misunderstanding of the two clauses mentioned. The whole trouble seems to be that, under clause 2 of the agreement, the hon. gentleman says, goods may be shipped from the West Indies, put in bond in the United States and afterwards, in a few months or years, brought into Canada; and that they would have to be entered at the rate for West Indian goods. I think the hon. member understands that, according to the Customs law, when goods are shipped from the West Indies to Canada they may go through the United States, and when unloaded from the vessel they may be put in cars and shipped through to Canada. A manifest is made out and they do not go through the books of the customs in the United States except to manifest them. But if they are placed in bond in the United States, they are put in the warehouse and a customs entry is made out, just as if duty were to be paid. If, afterwards, they are shipped from the United States to Canada, they have to pay the duty not only on the value of the goods as coming from the country of origin, but also on the United States duty.

Mr. MACDONALD: Goods in bond—to pay two duties?

Mr. REID: Let me give a case in point. Suppose goods were bought in England by an American and entered in bond in New York. If those goods were afterwards brought into Canada and sold here, the owner would pay the duty on the English price plus the duty in the United States, because the very placing of them in bond makes them, so far as the customs are concerned, American goods. They are placed in bond because the owner wishes to pay duty on them only as they are sold. If they are merely shipped through the United States in bond, they come through on a manifest.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that my hon. friend is only explaining the practice. But that does not affect the treaty. It appears that this Bill has been prepared by the Commissioner of Customs——

Mr. REID: I was going to explain the other part of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask an explanation of the insertion in the Bill of these qualifying words with regard to direct shipment when these words are not in the treaty?

Mr. REID: I have not consulted the Law Clerk but I would explain it this way: This states that when the goods come from the West Indies the duty shall be four-fifths the duty on similar goods imported from a foreign country. This is for the purpose of determining what the rate of duty shall be.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend has not understood my question. He is aware that under Section 2 of the treaty it is provided that on all goods enumerated in schedule B, being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies, imported into the Dominion of Canada, the duties of customs shall not at any time be more than four-fifths of the duties imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country. Now, why has the Commissioner of his department chosen to change that clause of the treaty and add the qualifying expression: 'When such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein if imported as aforesaid.' Bear in mind, these words of qualification are not contained in the treaty, though they are inserted designedly, with a view to making qualification that is not in the treaty. What I ask you is this: Why has the Commissioner of Customs thought it necessary to add these words of qualification to the words that have been agreed upon between the contracting parties which are contained in clause 2 of the Tax Treaty?

Mr. MACDONALD: I have read the treaty in connection with this matter, and I cannot find in it anything about the limitation of the British preference. The first part of section 3 provides:

> There shall be levied, collected and paid, after the said agreement is in accordance with its terms brought into operation, and so long as it remains in force, on all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto——

I would ask either of the two ministers who have been interested in the negotiation of this agreement whether in any clause of the treaty there is anything that provides for that being in the Bill?

Mr. REID: For what being in the Bill?

Mr. MACDONALD: Anything about the limitation of the duty to be paid in connection with the British preference.

Mr. REID: I am not referring to the British preference at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am raising this point in addition to the one submitted by the hon. member for St. John, who has shown something in the Bill which is not in the treaty. I cannot find in the treaty anything regarding this provision for limitation in respect of the British preference.

Mr. REID: In what clause?

Mr. MACDONALD: Clause 3, the one we are now discussing. I am asking the two ministers if they can show me what clause of the treaty provides for the inclusion of any such section relating to the British preference.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In order to show that every commercial treaty is binding, let us remember the occasion of the French treaty, which had to come back to the House because it happened that the Minister of Customs had given to the French authorities blue-books which did not contain the name of one of the countries receiving the benefits on some of the articles of the most favoured nation clause.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just one word pertaining to the discussion of the point raised by the hon. member for St. John, to the effect that the words 'when such goods are imported from any British country into Canada,' do not appear in clause 2 of the agreement itself, but do appear in clause 3 of the Act under discussion. Last summer I saw in a New York paper a statement to the effect that it was probable that New York merchants could take advantage of the terms of the proposed agreement. The article contained the further allegation that trade agents, either of some government or some large trading house, had visited the various legislatures of the West Indies with a view of defeating the Bills which were proposed for the purpose of carrying out the agreement. A good deal of interest was manifested by the papers in New York at that time, and I remember that statement in particular, I think it must have been some time in July or August. I do know, however, that in the Barbadoes the question came up for discussion on the 16th of August, 1912, and this very point raised by the hon. member for St. John was brought up. In the official report of the proceedings in the Legislature of the Barbadoes on the 16th of August, I find the following:

The PRESIDENT said there was a long discussion in the other branch of the legislature as to the construction to be put upon the words 'when imported direct from any British country.' 'Imported direct' would seem to imply that these goods must not pass through any foreign country on their way to their destination. There was some difference of opinion as to the meaning of the words. If the words meant that the goods of Canada must come direct to Barbadoes then that was not the intention of the legislature or the present wish of Canada. If hon. members looked at section 4 they would find that it read:

On and after any date to be named by the legislature and published in a proclamation in the Official Gazette the British preferential tariff shall apply only to goods brought into this colony by ship direct without transhipment from the country of production or by way of any other British country.' He thought the word 'direct' was a very unfortunate word to use.

Hon. J. O. WRIGHT: Section 4 says the articles must come direct.

The PRESIDENT continued: Section 4 said that was to be so at some time in the future, when there were steamships and proper arrangements to meet these requirements. There was no intention on the part of the Government of Canada, nor was it the intention of the Government of this colony to prohibit at once the importation in bond through New York of goods from Canada. The Canadian minister said in effect that a change of the present system could not be brought about until proper steamship communication between Canada and the West Indies had been provided, and it was therefore understood as being absolutely necessary to the trade of the two countries that Canadian flour and other produce and manufactures of that country should pass through the United States as heretofore in bond, and be shipped to the colonies from New York. There was a long discussion at the conference on this point, and the Canadian representatives said in terms that they hoped the time would come when there would be such a linking up of the West Indies and Canada through the development of the Canadian ports and the establishment of subsidized steamship lines that there would be no need for any through trade via the United States. It was hoped that at some time in the future the benefits to be derived by both sides under the agreement would be restricted to direct shipments from Canada to the West Indies, and vice versa. But it was practically admitted that the time had not come yet, and it would be some time before it came, when all shipments could be made direct. It would greatly interfere with the Canadian trade if the shipments of that country's produce and manufactures through New York were stopped, and Canada would not like to be placed in that position, because the Canadians were not ready to make all shipments direct from their ports. There was a great deal of discussion as to what should be done with the Canadian goods, to prevent, say, American flour from coming down here and perhaps getting the benefit of the preferential duty. When he went to New York he visited the business house of Messrs. Strauss & Company and there he had the whole thing explained to him. There was no need for warehouses to store flour coming from Canada via New York. He was told that the goods were all taken to the Central railway depot in cars sealed by the customs authorities where they were kept for a very short time before shipment. So that now really the trade between Canada and Barbadoes and Demerara was for the most part done by way of New York, and neither the Canadian Government nor these colonies for the time being desired to have that altered. He thought it would be beneficial to have it made absolutely clear in section 2 (a) that the words 'imported direct from any British country' should cover the transmission of Canadian goods as at present via New York.

After a conversational discussion the council resumed with leave to the committee to sit again, and the further consideration of the Bill was postponed in order to afford an opportunity to consider the point.

It appears to me that if the words 'when such goods are imported from any British country into Canada' have any meaning at all, they should be struck out if the Act is to conform with the treaty. If they have no meaning, I do not see any very great objection to them if they merely permit importations through the United States. The word 'direct' is certainly a most embarrassing one, and I would think a customs official, in interpreting a section with such words in it, would at once say that the importations was not a direct one. We have, then, the discussion which took place on that very point in the Legislature of the Barbadoes, as well as the president's recollection of the discussion which took place at Ottawa. It seems to have been the opinion of all parties that direct importation was one thing, and importation from the United States another, and that direct importation would be the best method of dealing as between the two countries, and in the meantime, until steamship lines have been established, that the shipments should be made via New York as before. The words in question—and particularly the word 'direct'—are the most important in the section, and if the minister wants to have his Bill conform with the agreement I would suggest that the words be deleted, or that it be made clear in some other way that these words shall not in any way alter, limit or restrict clause 2 of the agreement.

Mr. FOSTER: When I was listening to my hon. friend reading that, the idea I got was in regard to direct shipment by vessel, a shipment which leaves the West Indies and goes direct to Canadian territory without passing through any foreign territory. That was the question, and a discussion arose because of that clause, which might be availed of, in order that when shipping facilities became well established there should be no more shipping in bond through a foreign country, but that the shipments should come direct. That was what gave rise, I imagine, to the discussion; that is the meaning I take from the report read by my hon. friend. Doubt was expressed whether or not, the word 'direct' being there, they would have, when they did not get proper communication by vessel direct to Canadian ports, what they always have had, the privilege of shipping in bond through New York, say, and of paying the Canadian duty upon their goods. I think the discussion went on to show that the word 'direct' was not meant to confine goods to shipment by vessels which came directly, we shall say from the Barbadoes to St. John or to Montreal, but that it had a different meaning from that, that until the two parties were agreed that the shipping facilities were sufficiently well established to allow of the policy of direct water shipments being adopted, that is to say without passing through foreign territory, the facilities of direct shipment through New York, Boston or any other American port in bond, which had obtained for many years previous, should be still be open to them. That was the only point discussed by the delegates in conference. That was undoubtedly the meaning, and in that sense, that was all that was meant by the word 'direct,' namely, that the goods should get from the West Indian colonies into Canada as imports of the West Indian colonies, and vice versa, in order to be eligible for the preference. Now, they are eligible for that preference when they go in bond through New York, we shall say, either from Canada to the West Indies or from the West Indies to Canada, that is when they go in bond through New York and are not broken in bulk, when they are sealed, go through under supervision.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have only a partial report here, but did the Barbadoes legislature in their final consideration retain the words, when imported direct from any British country?

Mr. FOSTER: I have not seen the latter part of the discussion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is dated 10th August, and it says that matter was postponed for further consideration.

Mr. FOSTER: I think from reading that, that what they were discussing then was not whether their goods could go through United States territory or not.

Mr. PARDEE: Then do the words expressed in clause 2 of the agreement carry out what was intended by the agreement at the conference.

Mr. FOSTER: Yes, with this addition. My contention is that the legislation we are discussing does not vary the import of the agreement. Those goods imported into Canada would be eligible to a certain preference reduction in the duty. To be imported into Canada they had to go either direct, meaning not passing through foreign territory, or if they did pass through foreign territory they had to go direct by shipment under bond. That was all that was contemplated, and that is all that is made necessary by this legislation.

Mr. PARDEE : It may be the import of the agreement, but I think the hon. minister will admit that it is not the letter of the agreement.

Mr. FOSTER: I think it is not different in effect.

Mr. PARDEE : If that is so then, is it necessary from any standpoint, say from the legal standpoint, to add the words 'imported direct' at all ? If I understand my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, his argument is that the agreement and clause 3 of this Act with those words interjected, mean one and the same thing. Then why change them at all so as to make clause 3 of the Act not conform exactly to clause 2 of the agreement?

Mr. FOSTER : They mean exactly the same thing.

Mr. PARDEE : Then was the agreement of the other colonies that were parties to this agreement the same, and will their legislation, or the import of their legislation, be the same as that which is before this Parliament ?

Mr. FOSTER : I cannot say literally whether the Acts which they have passed are exactly in that verbiage or not. But let me give again my view of the case. Those delegates who sat together were not framing Customs Acts. They were sitting down together as a number of business men, and were making an arrangement, one with another. They knew the previous course of trade, and they knew the course of trade which in certain contingencies might be taken. The course of trade had been and is to-day that the exporter from the colony can send his goods into Canada by two different routes, by water to Halifax or to St. John or to Montreal, in which case they do not pass through a foreign country, or by shipping via New York, bonding them through, and having them come to the Canadian Customs house, paying exactly the same duty. That was the importation which the business men, sitting around the table, agreed should be between them. When you come to the enactment of an Act and get a lawyer or a Customs officer on it, he understands all about these things. He says it may prevent any discussion and any trouble if we put the word 'direct' in, that no importations can come in at the same rate of duty unless they come direct through bond. The moment you put them into a New York warehouse, you make them liable to the United States duty. So long as they are kept in that bonded warehouse and kept sealed in bulk the duty imposed under the Customs regulations of the United States remains unpaid, but the moment they are broken in bulk and distributed, the importer has to pay the United States duty on those articles. When those articles, being dispersed, come to the Canadian border, they are taxed as goods coming from the United States, and the cost of them, if it is traced through, is added to by the amount of duty that has been paid into the United States treasury. There is no difficulty either in the colonies, that are parties to this agreement, or in Canada itself. It is simply legislation in the line pursued for years. Did any person from the West Indies suppose that a privilege was to be given to the West Indies exporter on goods to Canada which was not at the time, and had not been for previous years, been his? The West Indian exporter could not therefore send his goods to New York, put them into a New York warehouse, distribute them, send them into Canada and avoid the duty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Because there was no treaty.

Mr. FOSTER: There is no treaty now, it is an agreement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The statute says they must come direct.

Mr. FOSTER: I must be allowed to get through with my argument, which I think is a perfectly fair and reasonable argument. It is that what was in the minds of the delegates, and what would be in the minds of business men, was what had taken place during the last 20 years and what is taking place at the present time. An import into Canada was an export from that country into this country when it came direct in bond through an intervening portion of foreign territory. The same thing goes on in different parts between our country and the United States where the bonded system is in use. It is an import when it gets into a country under the proper forms, laws and customs regulations of the country into which it is imported.

Mr. PARDEE: With all due deference to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, his argument, in so far as I can understand it, is that these words are put in for the purpose of making it clear. Then he goes on to say that an import is an import and that those who carried on the trade and those who were parties to this agreement so considered it. If that reasoning is good and logical there is all the more reason to contend that the interpretation of this word 'direct' does not make it more clear, but makes it less clear than it was, and it emphasizes the fact that an import such as he describes is not the same kind of an import as that which is provided for under clause 2 of the agreement. It makes no difference to me, there is no factious opposition being offered, but it does appear to me that, as clause 3 of your Bill must be founded upon clause 2 of the agreement, if such a vital change is made in the Bill when compared with the agreement, the Act, if passed, cannot possibly stand. It appears to me that the insertion of the words 'imported direct' involves such a vital change from the terms of the agreement that even a customs officer or anyone else would be more likely to be misled by it than he would be by the plain words of the agreement if incorporated in the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER: Does my hon. friend apprehend a difficulty in this respect that a customs officer might refuse to allow goods to come through foreign territory?

Mr. PARDEE: If the goods are imported from the West Indies to Canada they must come direct if you put the word 'direct' in the Act. But you add to the possibility of their not being construed as having been imported direct by reason of breaking bulk or transhipping.

Mr. FOSTER: The word 'direct' may be used in two ways. It may be direct as the crow flies in a geographical sense, or it may be a direct shipment inasmuch as it comes through the proper channels without breaking bulk or being separated.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is telling us what these business men thought when they met together and discussed this proposition and he is very captiously trying to find some explanation for the curious anomaly that has been brought out during the present discussion of the agreement saying one thing and the Bill another. Clearly my hon. friend will have to allow this Bill to stand over in order to have it reformed. My hon. friend says that the use of the word 'direct' in this Bill does not in any way interfere with the clause in the treaty, that the use of the word must be interpreted in the light of the information in the possession of these people when they got together. The word 'direct' means what a dictionary says it means, and the language of this Act would mean what it would be interpreted by a court to mean. If my hon. friend wants the word 'direct' to mean something different from what it means in this Bill he should provide an interpretation clause in the beginning in order to make it clear that the word 'direct' means something different from what it would mean under ordinary circumstances. Let us look at its meaning from the standpoint of the English language and we are to interpret this treaty not by what these gentlemen thought they were talking about but by what was put into actual language. We are to interpret this Bill not by what anyone, whether it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Commissioner of Customs or the Law Clerk, may say is its meaning, but we are to interpret it in the way in which a court would interpret it, and the only way that a court would interpret such a law as this is by what it says. It says that duties shall be levied, collected and paid when such goods are imported direct from any British country.' What does that mean?

Mr. PARDEE: Could not an American importer import them?

Mr. MACDONALD: It means that the goods must leave that country to come to Canada and that they must come direct because the Act says that they must come direct. It does not mean that there is any intermediate country through which they may come but it says that they must come direct.

Mr. FOSTER: That is not the meaning that the customs put upon it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not care what the Commissioner of Customs or the Law Clerk says. I venture to say that there is not a court in this country, if it considered that Act, but would say that it meant that the duties were to be collected on goods that came direct. If we are going to have any different interpretation put upon this Bill, this House should hesitate in regard to the matter. Are we going to adopt a trade arrangement between Canada and the West Indies and then be told that this specific preferential arrangement is to be extended in the future to the trade that comes through the United States? What will my hon. friend from St. John have to say to his constituents, what will the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries have to say to his constituents, if they go back to St. John and say: We have concluded a treaty with the British West Indies by which we give them an extensive preference in order to encourage trade, but this preference does not mean that you are going to have the advantage of this trade on your Atlantic seaboard as they are going to import through the United States, just as they have always done because, although this statute says that the goods must come direct into this country, another person, some gentleman in the customs, is of the opinion that it does not violate the law to say that the Act means what he thinks it does and not what the statute says. There never came before the House of Commons any trade arrangement submitted in such a condition as this proposition is. My hon. friend is in this unfortunate position—and I do not blame him for it personally—that he has come before Parliament with an Act drawn in such a ragged, incomplete way that he is inviting the House to adopt something that was never agreed upon by the parties to the agreement. Not only is he asking us to violate the ordinary meaning of the English language by the insertion of a phrase that can only have one meaning in order to comply with the request of the Commissioner of Customs, but the agreement is further violated by subsection (b). Subsection (b) says that the duties shall be levied and collected—> —at the several rates of duty, if any, set opposite to each tariff item respectively in the column 'British Preferential Tariff' in schedule 'A' to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and in any amendment thereof, whatever shall be the lower rate.

These words are not found in the treaty at all. I do not know where the Commissioner of Customs or the Law Clerk found them, but they are being put in the statute, while the treaty with the West India islands which has been solemnly drawn up and signed by the representatives of these different islands contains this provision and this provision only in regard to the limitation of duties

> On all goods enumerated in schedule B being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies imported into the Dominion of Canada, the duties of customs shall not at any time be more than four-fifths of the duties imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

There is not a word in the whole treaty with regard to the British preference and the application of the British preference to this matter. Where my hon. friend, or the Law Clerk, or the Commissioner of Customs, found that, I would like to know. It is not in this document. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) announced eloquently earlier in the evening that this whole thing was so clear that he who ran might read. The whole committee is now seized of the fact that the statute is in such a mess that no one can understand it. Whoever heard of a statute being proposed to Parliament, to ratify an agreement between two countries, and that statute having incorporated in it terms and proposals which were never included in the treaty? The minister must hold this Bill over until it is made to conform with the treaty which he made with those delegates from the West Indies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it is necessary to insert these words with reference to the goods enumerated in schedule B, why have they not been inserted with reference to the goods in schedule C? Why is it provided that the goods in schedule B, upon which a duty is to be paid, should only be entitled to the preference if they come direct to Canada, and that the free goods enumerated in schedule C need not be imported direct. It would be a disgrace to the records of this Parliament to allow the Bill to go through in its present form. You would not only have a Bill altering the terms of the treaty, but you would have a Bill providing one law for one class of goods, and another law for another class of goods, which, in the treaty, should come under the same regulations.

Mr. REID: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to take it for granted that the goods must come from the West Indian colonies to Canada direct, and that they cannot come in bond through the United States?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just now, I am asking why, in respect to goods which are enumerated in shedule B, it is provided they must be shipped direct, and that with respect to the goods enumerated in schedule C, there is no such provision in the Bill?

Mr. REID: The goods enumerated in schedule C are free of duty and there is no necessity of stating any rate of duty on them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then according to the Minister of Customs, it means that in order to come in at a reduced rate of duty the goods must come by direct shipment, but in order to come in absolutely free, they need not come direct at all, but may be brought into the United States, can be there placed in warehouses and then shipped into Canada and distributed to the retail merchants of Canada by the wholesale merchants of the United States. The Minister of Customs is absolutely correct as to the facts, but the reasons he gives are not sound:

Mr. REID: The goods in schedule C are free. If goods are placed in bond in the United States, and brought from the United States to Canada, and taken out of bond, and if they are dutiable under our general tariff, they would have to pay the duties.

Mr. MACDONALD.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I say, with all good feeling to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that if this Bill goes through as at present worded, it will be a disgrace to this Parliament. I wish it to go through in proper form, so that it may ratify the treaty, but if I am right in my contention, and I believe I am, would it not be a disgraceful anomaly that the Act should provide that dutiable goods, upon which there is only a preference of twenty per cent, must be shipped direct to Canada from the West Indies, or from a British country, and that goods upon which there is no duty at all, need not be shipped direct? The answer given by the Minister of Customs as to the reason for this omission in the Bill is the most absurd answer ever given in this House; it is no explanation at all. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce approve of the reason given by the Minister of Customs for making one provision for dutiable goods and another provision for goods which are to come in free? Let me hear whether my hon. friend approves of that or not.

Mr. FOSTER: Go on and make your speech.

Mr. NESBITT. If goods were bought by a New York merchant from one of the West Indian Islands, shipped to New York, placed there in bond, and then shipped on to Canada in bulk, would the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce consider that a direct shipment of West Indian goods under this Bill, and entitled to the preference?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not a customs manager; but I am quite willing to give the House my view in reference to it. If a New York merchant buys a lot of goods in the West Indies and takes them to New York, he has to enter them and pay United States duty, or he may put them in a bonded warehouse and keep them there for a certain length of time; but when he takes them out of that bonded warehouse and sells them to anybody whatever, he has got to pay the United States duty; if thereafter they come into Canada, they are met there by the Canadian customs and duty is imposed upon them as United States goods, on the usual basis of assessing the duty, taking into account the original cost and what other costs are necessary. The only way, to my mind, that you can make a direct shipment is that whoever buys the goods in the West Indies shall ship them direct to a port in Canada, I mean by that a geographically direct shipment; or a direct shipment under the meaning of the customs laws is, when the goods are consigned via New York, Boston or Portland in bond, and are kept under seal until they arrive at the Canadian customs house. When they arrive at the Canadian customs house, they are for customs purposes a direct shipment. You may confuse the thing as much as you like geographically and otherwise; you may argue that if the word 'direct' is used there, that you cannot bring goods from the West Indies through foreign territory, that territory being the United States. That is not the the case; in the customs vernacular and in the meaning of the customs laws, the word 'direct' indicates that the shipment must come through from the country of production without breaking bulk, under the regulations which must govern the mode of entry. If you desire to confuse the thing with a geographical idea of directness, you can argue it for a night and a day or longer; but I think simple minded men, and men who look at it from a business point of view, quite understand the work and practice as it has been for years as to what we call direct shipments from a customs point of view.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the hon. minister propose to put in an interpreting clause to define what it means?

Mr. LOGGIE: Assuming that I am a commission merchant in Montreal, I buy a carload of sugar from the West Indian Islands, and I have customers for sugar in Canada and the United States as well, when the car of sugar arrives in New York, I tell my broker to put it in bond; then I find that I can make more profitable sale in Montreal then I can in New York, and I order my broker to forward the goods from the bonded warehouse on to Montreal. May I ask the minister if I shall only have to pay the duty less the twenty per cent, which reduction I would be entitled to providing the shipment came direct to Montreal?

Mr. FOSTER: If my hon. friend had bought those goods in the West Indian Islands, and shipped them through by way of New York in bond——

Mr. LOGGIE: Placed them in a bonded warehouse?

Mr. FOSTER: The bonded warehouse might be a car or anywhere else. Supposeing in this case you put them into a bonded warehouse under bond and seal, and kept them there for transmission to Canada; if you did that and they came through to Canada in the end, under the time restrictions that the customs law imposes—I do not know whether they allow six months or a year or two years, but they must adhere to the law—then I think you would be perfectly entitled to the reduction in duty of one-fifth. If you take them into New York, enter them at the New York customs house, and put them in a New York bonded warehouse, then when you take them out, you have got to pay the duty on them as United States goods if you distribute them in that way.

Mr. GERMAN: I would like to know where the hon. minister gets that interpretation in clause 2 of the agreement. I am not particularly interested in the word 'direct.' If the word 'direct' in the Bill makes any change in the agreement, then that word is ineffective, because this Parliament cannot change the terms of this agreement; that is very certain. I think the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce will agree with that, and I think the Minister of Justice will bear me out in that, that this Parliament cannot change the terms of this agreement, or the interpretation. The hon. gentleman says that if the duty is paid on a consignment of goods coming from the West Indies to New York, that those goods then cannot come into Canada under this four-fifths arrangement. There is nothing in the agreement which says that, or, in my opinion, which means that. It says, 'Goods enumerated in schedule B being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies, imported into the Dominion of Canada.' It does not say, 'imported from the West Indies,' but, 'imported into the Dominion of Canada.' Suppose a merchant in the West Indies sends a consignment of rubber the produce of one of the islands enumerated in the treaty, to New York, and pays duty on it there, expecting to sell it. But he finds he cannot sell it profitably in the United States and wishes to send it to Canada. Will the Minister of Justice, or will any legal gentleman on that side, say that under the agreement he cannot send it in in the basis of four-fifths the duty? The rubber does not become United States goods because it goes into the United States. Under this agreement the owner can send it here under four-fifths duty. I venture to say that that is the interpretation the Exchequer Court would put upon this agreement if the matter were referred to it for its decision.

Mr. LALOR: As I understand the hon. member for Welland, he contends that if these goods go into the United States and are there taken out of bond, they still remain goods of a foreign country.

Mr. GERMAN: It does not say 'goods of a foreign country.'

Mr. LALOR: Well. goods of one of the West India Islands covered by this agreement. Surely, when goods go into the United States and are taken out of bond and the duty is paid on them, they become American goods, just as, when a citizen of this country goes to the United States and takes the oath of allegiance there, he becomes an American citizen. Of course, where goods are shipped in bond and bulk is not broken, that is a through shipment and the goods do not become goods of the United States. I have shipped carload after carload to foreign countries through the United States, held them in bond in that country, and, at the proper time, shipped them to their intended destination, and these were regarded as direct shipments and duty was not collected in the United States. I ship goods to Germany in that way every year. So long as they are in transit, and continue in transit within a due period, they are regarded as being shipped through. But the moment bulk is broken, the moment you take them out of bond and pay the duty, they become American goods. The argument of hon. gentlemen opposite seems to be that an American citizen cannot ship goods to the West Indies and get the benefit of this treaty. It makes no difference who ships the goods, so long as the goods come through. But, the moment bulk is broken in the United States and the goods are taken out of bond and duty paid, they become American goods.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my hon. friend has not quite apprehended the point which is made. The point is that under clause 2 of the treaty there is no requirement that the goods shall be shipped direct from the West Indies.

Mr. LALOR: But I would ask the hon. gentleman: Is it not the case that the interpretation of the law by the Canadian customs is that it makes a difference whether goods are shipped direct to Canada or shipped through an American port?

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the collector of customs could not alter the terms of the treaty, and what the treaty provides is plain. All that is necessary in order to entitle the goods to come in under the preference is that they shall be the goods of any of these British West India colonies. As to the goods enumerated in schedule B, the Minister of Trade and Commerce asks this Parliament to put a qualification on that agreement and declares that these goods must not only be the produce or manufacture of one of these islands, but they must be imported direct. I submit that Parliament has no right to make that qualification. I have argued that point, and do not wish to detain the House upon it. But there is a point that the Minister of Customs has not answered. I do not raise it for any technical reason but for substantial reason. I would like my hon. friend from North Grey to look at this Bill. I repeat what I have already said that, while this qualification is made in regard to goods under schedule B, no such qualification is made in regard to the goods under schedule C. Surely, that is a serious proposition and one to which we are entitled to an answer. I should not be doing my duty as a member of this House if I assented to this Bill going through in this form. Will the hon. gentleman give us an answer to the question as to why there is not the same provision regarding the goods enumerated in schedule C as has been made in regard to schedule B? I think, as a matter of courtesy, that I am entitled to an answer to this question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This matter is of too great importance to be treated with the silent contempt evidenced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by hon. gentlemen opposite. I think if the Minister of Justice would give us his attention for a few moments we might draw something from him as to the reason for the peculiar piece of legislation which is now before the House. I am sure anyone who considers the matter will agree with my statement that the Bill is not now in correct form. If the hon. member for North Grey, the hon. member for Kingston, and the hon. member for North Ontario will give the matter serious consideration for a moment, I think they will quite agree with the statement that there is a discrepancy in the Bill regarding the language of the clause as applying to goods entitled to come into Canada on a preferential scale of duty. There is another discrepancy, and that is that the words 'direct importation,' do not, in the language of the Bill, at all apply to free goods. To my mind it will be a simple matter to amend the section under discussion, but there seems to be no disposition on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Customs to assist in the matter. They sit in their places and say nothing; they do not give reasons for the language of the Bill, or for the distinction which hon. gentlemen have pointed out. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce has a reason; if he knows of the distinction, it would settle the whole discussion in a few moments if he would tell us what it is. From the report of the proceedings of the legislature of Barbadoes one can only conclude that the President realized the importance of the point when he used the words:

> Direct importation would seem to imply that these goods must not pass through any foreign country on the way to their destination.

The President of the Barbadoes Legislature gives that as his opinion, and states that the word 'direct' is most unfortunate language, and when they came to this identical clause they adjourned in order to take time to consider the matter. Would the minister be good enough to say how the matter was finally settled; whether they dropped the words or amended the clause, and in what form it went through the legislature of the Barbadoes or any of the other colonies affected? I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce might treat the matter with great courtesy and with more seriousness and give a fair answer to the questions which have arisen.

Mr. FOSTER: I have endeavoured to give the reasons and answers requested, but sometimes I group two or three together, as it is easier to get at them in that shape than to answer each one separately, in view of the fact that the same question is asked over and over again. We are now on section 3, and I have given the reasons why section 3 should go through as it is here, and why the word 'direct' is used. A great deal of argument has been put forward with reference to the fact that in the agreement the word 'direct' was not in, but that the word 'import' only was used. It does not seem to me that this is at all important. The fact that the word 'import' is used means that it must be an import under the customs laws of the country into which it comes. If goods exported from Canada into Holland bear a certain duty, and it becomes a Canadian import into that country, it follows the laws and regulations of the country into which it goes. A man might purchase some goods, and, without going through any regular customs formula, carry them in his pocket or in his wagon, but he would find that he could not make an importation in that way. An import into a country has to follow certain channels; it has to be governed by certain regulations, and unless those regulations and conditions are fulfilled, it is not, in the law of that country, an import. So you are not taking away one single iota of the breadth of the word 'import' in the agreement when you make it conform to the customs regulation, and the law upon which the regulation is based, to enable it to come into Canada as an import.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why not strike out the words?

Mr. FOSTER: I have been trying to impress upon my hon. friend the fact that we are not limiting what is really meant by the word 'import,' but we are making it more directly to conform with our customs laws, and as is done by every other country in the world. The hon. member for Welland has advanced the argument that West India goods remain West India goods, and are able to claim the privileges of this agreement, even though they are bought by a United States man, the United States duty paid on them, and then packed up and sent into Canada. The idea that such goods could be called imports in the legal sense of the word, that they could be called goods of the West India Islands under the customs laws of the country to which they come——

Mr. McKENZIE: The agreement does not say goods of the West Indies—it says the produce or manufacture of the West Indies.

Mr. FOSTER: Produce and manufactures are goods; and the tariff applies to all goods, whether they are natural products or mechanical products, and as imports they are to come through the proper channel laid down by the customs laws of the country to which they come. My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) asked the reason why in schedule C the same word 'direct' is not inserted. I have been thinking that over, and I do not see the exact reason why. There may be a reason, and I shall talk with the customs officers about it and find out whether or not it is necessary. According to the reasoning of my hon. friends, they should have no fault to find with that, for they are arguing against the word being put in the preceding section.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It should be out of both.

Mr. FOSTER: That criticism is quite fair, and I am not taking exception to it. I shall look into the matter, but I cannot deal with it fully at present. It may be that it should go in as it is, or it is possible that the word 'direct' should be added.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The same reason applies to both.

Mr. FOSTER: That does not prevent us from passing section 3, about which there is no doubt, in order that we may go on with the others.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has not dealt with the point I ventured to make—and which I consider to be an important one—that there is nothing in the treaty which says anything about the British preference playing any part in the fixing of the duty. There is no warrant for sub-section (b) of section 3, so far as the treaty is concerned.

I may say to the hon. minister that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have no desire except to have this Bill put through in proper shape. The principle of the treaty is one, which, I understand, my hon. friends here as well as myself, are anxious to see ratified with the proper precautions in the interests of Canada. I wish to put this view before my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it is very largely at the basis of this legislation. The popular view in Canada has been that as a result of this arrangement we would be able to import into Canada through Canadian seaports, and export to the West Indies through our seaports, the products of both countries under conditions which would be more favourable than they have been hitherto. There will be great disappointment if it is found that no preference is shown to Canadian seaports. Having looked at this section and other sections of the Bill, I am quite sure the hon. minister would make more substantial progress if, in regard to the legal effect of some of the questions that have been raised or may be raised, the Minister of Justice were consulted about the matter, because the Bill has not been drafted with that care which should be given to a measure of this importance. I am satisfied that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce would make greater progress if he would allow it to lie over for a little and come back and speak on those points that have been raised.

Mr. CLARK: I have not left my seat for one minute while this Bill has been in Committee, and I rise now to endorse the appeal which has been made to the hon. minister by my hon. friends from Pictou and South Wellington. I must say there seems to be very great ambiguity in this Bill. I am not a lawyer, but very little has been made clear so far as my humble capacity has permitted me to follow the discussion, and I have followed it very carefully. My hon. friend the minister did not seem to be clear about the word 'direct,' and I am not clear as to whether the four-fifths of the duties are to be reckoned according to the duties collected against French goods or against United States goods. Then there was a point raised as to whether the duties collected under subsection (d) were contingent on the British preference. We have had no declaration of the policy or standing of this Ministry in regard to British preference. This Bill is to stand for ten years, but it will not stand as it is now if the British preference is to be altered. At any moment commercial dealings affected by this Bill may be thrown into confusion by an alteration of the British preference. The only clear point that has been brought home to me in the Committee was that referred to by my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin). I must say that he has made that one point perfectly clear, and I think it is one that should be made clear to the people of this country. This is the first time I have assisted in Committee such a preferential Bill, or tried to study empire-building from this point of view. Before the recess my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave my hon. friend the assurance that the farmers in Wright county would be able to get certain of their produce into the West Indies under this treaty more easily than they have hitherto, hay for example. Since the recess, my hon. friend has made it equally clear that cocoa will come into this country with more difficulty. So there is one thing clear to me, and I repeat, I hope it will be made clear to the people of this country, that under this Bill, preferential empire-building means that West Indian horses will get hay more easily by Canadian human beings getting cocoa with more difficulty. As I do not want to get my cocoa with any greater difficulty for the sake of the West Indian horses, I the more readily and more emphatically endorse the appeal which has been made by my two hon. friends, that we should let this thing stand, and that the minister, who looks very tired, and others should take some fresh air and be better able later on to clear up the points other than this one which has been made perfectly clear.

Mr. DEVLIN: May I ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce why he did not follow the procedure adopted in 1907 when the Parliament of Canada ratified the treaty between Canada and Japan? There could not possibly be any conflict of opinion as to the interpretation of that Act, there could not be any conflict of opinion between the law passed by this Parliament and the treaty itself, because under the Act 6 and 7 Edward VII, chap. 50, the very simple procedure followed was to have two clauses, the first 'that this Act may be cited as the Japanese Treaty Act of 1906,' and secondly, 'the Convention of the 31st day of January 1906, which is set forth in the schedule of this Act is hereby sanctioned.' That would have covered the whole point, and I do not think my hon. friend the minister would have had to go into all the explanations that he has given of the different clauses of this Bill if he had followed out that procedure. He would certainly have obtained exactly what apparently he seeks to obtain, the ratification of the treaty purely and simply.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have some sympathy with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce because there have been times when I thought I had bright ideas in my head but when the lawyers got through fixing up the Bill containing them, it did not seem to be what I meant at all. I think that if instead of replying to us in the way he did to-night, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice had taken this Bill and whipped it into shape, and, as head of the legal department of the Government had become responsible for its accuracy, we would not have had all this trouble. May I be permitted to say this while I am on my feet—and it ought to be plain to every person in this country—hon. gentlemen opposite who have in the past expressed a different view should remember that under our British system the making of a treaty is practically a secret arrangement between the parties affected, until it comes before Parliament. In this country people have been led to believe at times that there was something wrong when members of the Government met members of the Government of another nation and made a trade arrangement on their responsibility before telling all the people of the country its contents. We did not know the contents of this arrangement until it came before the House, and if hon. gentlemen opposite want to follow in the line that some of them have taken in the past in criticising that method of making treaties, they must go to the United States for their model, instead of to the mother of parliaments or to the British Constitution. I want to point that out, so that we will have no more difficulty in the future in that respect, no matter what party is in power. It is the most utter rubbish for members of Parliament or other public men to go through the country trying to raise prejudice because the Government have entered into a trade arrangement and the details are kept secret until the arrangement is placed before the representatives of the people. That is our system, and so long as it is in vogue, that is the method they must follow, no matter what government is in power.

This side of the House believes in this arrangement. We cannot do otherwise than believe in an arrangement of this kind, because the late Government was sympathetic towards it, and took active steps towards bringing such an agreement into operation. But it is a more important thing than making a trade arrangement with the West Indies simply, far more important. It is laying the foundation of what the Government think ought to be the policy of all the overseas dominions and of their relation to the British Empire. That is the further development of inter-Imperial, intercolonial arrangements and this arrangement, the letter of it as well as the spirit, will be taken as the foundation for future agreements which the Minister of Trade and Commerce wishes to make. He will go to Australia, he will go to New Zealand possibly, and discuss agreements. The basis of his discussion there will be what we did with the West Indies. The circumstances will be different, the conditions will be different, but the basis will be this treaty which we are now putting through and consequently it is of far more importance than if we were just making a single arrangement because this will be the model upon which the others will be based. The minister, therefore, will not think that we are factious on this side of the House in arguing it at some length and trying to get it in as perfect form as possible. We admit gladly that the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows more about this agreement than any member of the Government. It is his progeny, so to speak, and we want the Bill so framed that there will be no conflict over any word or any difference between it and the treaty. When a resolution is brought into this House on which a Bill is based we are not allowed to depart from that resolution one iota. The Bill must be based on the terms of the resolution. Here it is equally obligatory that there shall be no deviation, or anything that can be interpreted by any person as a deviation, from the contract signed with the West Indies. This is a contract entered into and this Parliament has no right to make any deviation therefrom. We must either approve of what the Government has done or disapprove and no change can be made in the contract any more than it can be made in any other contract without both parties to the contract consenting. So, we must be very careful because I contend that absolutely, technically, literally, the document in existence must control if there should be a dispute and not any Act that we may pass. We find something in clause 3 of the Bill about the British preference. It is not in the treaty. It may not do any harm but should we put anything about the British preference in the Act when it is not in the treaty? Is it necessary? Will the West Indies put something in their Act that is not in the treaty binding themselves to do something that the treaty does not bind them to do? I do not say that there is anything wrong in it but it is altogether unnecessary. The Department of Customs have interjected several things into this Act, perhaps to make it more workable from their standpoint, but these interjections should not have been made by the Minister of Customs, because they are not in the agreement. We cannot make the interpretation of this agreement; the two parties must make the interpretation and not this Parliament. My hon. friend from Welland raised a point that was partially answered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member for Haldimand gave a good business view, but he had not, I fear, caught the point of my hon. friend from Welland. Take clause 2 of the agreement:

> On all goods enumerated in schedule B, being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies, imported into the Dominion of Canada, the duties of customs shall not at any time be more than goods when imported from any foreign country.

That is from the agreement. We cannot change that agreement one iota.

Mr. LALOR: Does not that cover the point at issue? The point was raised by the hon. member for Welland that these goods could be brought into the United States and then exported to Canada. Does that clause not cover it? It says 'On similar goods when imported from any foreign country.' When they are imported from the United States they are imported from a foreign country.

Mr. GRAHAM: It may mean just what my hon. friend says but the agreement is very badly worded if it does. If we are to read it by deduction, as the hon. member for Frontenac said, we may be compelled to say that goods coming from any place where they are manufactured, or goods which are the produce of the West Indies, should come in under this preference because it does not say that they should be imported from the West Indies but only manufactured or produced there. We cannot change that even although it is somewhat bungled without a conference with the West Indies. I do say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that I desire to assist in this Bill and when we find in clause 3 something not in the agreement I would suggest that he refer it to the Justice Department to give him its best legal advice as to the construction of this Act, what ought to be put into it and what left out. My own view is that there should be nothing in this Act but the provisions of the agreement signed by the two countries.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does clause 3 in any way conflict with the agreement in the working of this Act?

Mr. GRAHAM: It might.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman has advanced a very strange doctrine with regard to the making of treaties. There are two classes of treaties—treaties dealing with peace and war and general matters of that kind, and trade treaties. There is a wide distinction between these two classes of treaties. It has always been held in England, where we are supposed to find our model, that Parliament must pass upon a trade treaty and that it has a perfect right to amend that treaty. It has exercised its right to do so. The hon. gentleman says that there cannot be a Bill that modifies or changes a treaty. Why is a treaty presented to Parliament at all for ratification by Parliament unless it is subject to the control of Parliament?

Mr. GRAHAM: It may be rejected.

Mr. CURRIE: As a rule treaties made between Great Britain and other countries are not subject to parliamentary consideration at all. They are simply presented. But a trade treaty is presented to and discussed by Parliament as a matter of business and as a matter that involves supply. If the hon. gentleman can show me any single case or authority for his contention I will be very glad to acept it; otherwise I would strongly advise him to go home and read the matter up.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has given the fullest answer himself against the argument in favour of this Bill. He did not catch what I said or he did not understand it.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman has never read up the matter of trade treaties at all or he would not advance the proposition that he does with regard to this question.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am sorry for my hon. friend's ignorance of the subject but I cannot help it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As the minister has stated that he intends to consider the question as to whether there should be some provision in regard to the goods enumerated in schedule C as also in regards to goods enumerated in schedule B, would it not be reasonable that the Committee should rise and let my hon. friend consider that? As far as I am concerned I think there should be some provision. My hon. friend will see that if schedule C is to be left out altogether then the same argument would apply to schedule B according to our view. Time would be saved if the minister were to allow the Committee to rise and have this matter carefully considered.

Mr. FOSTER: I am very anxious to make some progress with this Bill. We have had a very thorough discussion on section 3, and I do not see that we can make very much change in it. It may be a fair question for discussion as to whether or not anything else should appear in the Bill except approval of the mere wording of the agreement. However, this has not quite the solemnity of a treaty; it is an agreement. I do not say that an agreement should not be observed strictly, but I merely mention that there is a difference between a treaty between sovereign nations and an agreement such as this.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the difference?

Mr. FOSTER: This is not so cast-iron. I do not want to consent to the suggestions made with reference to sub-clause (b) because we have been giving to the West Indian Islands up to the present the benefit of the British preference for fifteen years and they have not been sacrificing anything to give a return for that benefit. It may be they could have gone on for many years more getting the same benefit and giving nothing in return, but they propose here to give something in return, and I want to say that these islands have pinched themselves in some respects in order to give us that return. They have gone as far as it is possible for them to go. under their conditions, to give us a preference in return, to show their goodwill and to occupy the position of being manly traders one with the other. At the same time they may say: we came to Canada to mae an agreement and we gave you twenty per cent and we have never given you anything before; you give the British preference uniformly to every other British country, except Australia; you give it to all other colonies and other dependencies, and so long as you do it sends us back to our homes in rather an odd position if we say we went up there to make an agreement, and having made the agreement the result was that we cut down the preference given to us in Canada below that given to every other country. They did not ask for sub-section (b). It is not in the agreement but it was well understood that so long as we kept the British preference it was to be given to them. You may cut that out but if you do you will do rather an injustice to the people of the West Indies as compared with every other British colony and dependency which enjoys the full preference. That was put in as a piece of good-will.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was it not put in the agreement?

Mr. FOSTER: It was not put in the agreement because the agreement contemplates an enduring thing on both sides, but it was not meant to interrupt the action of common good will which is extended to almost every British community in the world so far as our British preference is concerned. I do not think the House wants that to go out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think there would be any objections to sections 6, 7, 8, and 9 passing and that would only leave sections 3, 4, and 5 to be considered when the Bill is next taken up. If section 3 is to be there at all I would like it to make the same provision in regard to schedule C as to schedule B, and it could be amended by adding words so as to read: 'In schedules B and C' instead of in schedule B alone. Why not take up sections 6, 7, 8, and 9 and leave the others for consideration.

Mr. FOSTER: Very well.

On section 6, extension to other colonies in schedule D.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where would Canada's interest be under this arrangement, assuming that a trade agreement was made between the Bahamas and the Bermudas and the United States?

Mr. FOSTER: This agreement lasts for three years. I do not understand that these colonies are seeking any such agreement.

Mr. MACDONALD: I so saw it stated in the press.

Mr. FOSTER: My information is different There is a tariff hearing at Washington and there has been a proposition that limes shall come into the United States at a lesser duty, and that various other tropical fruits shall be free. Those interested in lime culture and other fruits in the Bahamas and other West Indian Islands have representatives before that committee asking that the duty on limes be removed or reduced, but that is not a question of the administration of the Bahamas or the Bermudas making a reciprocity treaty.

Mr. MACDONALD: Suppose for example British Guiana should make a trade arrangement with the United States in regard to any article included in this arrangement would we not be compelled to accord some privilege to the United States?

Mr. FOSTER: Not in the least by any arrangement we have made with British Guiana.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Has the minister taken into consideration the point I raised when the resolution was first presented to the House? The Government of Newfoundland intimated to the Royal Commission that they would like to be considered as a party to this agreement, if any arrangement were concluded between Canada and the West Indies. I suppose that it was in consideration of that request that the negotiators of this agreement added Newfoundland to the schedule. At the time the resolutions were presented to the House, I suggested that Newfoundland should not appear in schedule D. The minister treated the objection rather lightly at that time. I do not propose pressing it very much beyond calling his attention to the fact, that it clearly should not be in schedule D; it should be in a separate schedule. I do not know how we can amend it very well; but on a strict interpretation of that agreement now, all that Newfoundland could send into the West Indian Islands would be West Indian Island products which they do not produce.

Mr. FOSTER: They could send them into this country.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes, send into this country articles which are mentioned in schedule D, and which Newfoundland does not produce. It is an error, and it might be worth while considering, although it does not affect Canada.

Mr. FOSTER: It really does not amount to anything one way or the other, in a technical sense or in a theoretical sense; but there is to a certain extent a practical side to it; there may be a practical sympathetic side which may work out into something better. Newfoundland wished to be recognized with reference to the agreement, that is to have its rights safeguarded or something like that. Newfoundland was not a party to the agreement, did not sit with the parties to the agreement and consequently neither we nor the West Indian Islands could make understandings which would bind Newfoundland. A very kindly feeling existed between ourselves and Newfoundland, and between the West Indies and Newfoundland; and some of their delegates gave free expression to the idea that when they were making their customs regulations and their laws with reference to this, they would be as friendly towards Newfoundland as they possibly could be. My own impression is that they will treat Newfoundland very much as they will treat the other British Colonies, although I am not able to say that they will.

Mr. MACDONALD : We give Newfoundland the preference now, do we not ?

Mr. FOSTER : No.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—extension to United Kingdom and to other colonies.

Mr. MACDONALD : What does that clause mean ?

Mr. FOSTER : It means that in some few cases very unimportant, in the variations of duties upon foreign goods, there might be more extensive changes; and the West Indian colonies get four-fifths of the duty imposed upon foreign goods coming in. If in any case that would give to the West Indies a lower entrance than the British preference gives to the British countries, the British countries would also get the advantage.

Section agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, January 24, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following message from the secretary of His Royal Highness the Governor General:

Ottawa, 24th Jan., 1913.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the right hon. the Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Royal Highness the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at 4.30 o'clock for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
H. C. LOWTHER, Lt.-Col.,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Civil Service Commission for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Coderre.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAY CLAIMS.

Mr. MACDONALD moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 95, to amend chapter 26, of 9-10 Edward VII, entitled: 'An Act to provide for the adjudication of small claims arising in respect of the operation of Government railways.' He said: Mr. Speaker, some few years ago the Government of the day introduced a measure bearing the title which you have had some difficulty in reading a moment ago, intended to provide for dealing with the numerous small claims which are continually arising along the line of the Intercolonial railway. The difficulty which gave rise to the necessity of such legislation was this: The extent of the railway and the numerous questions arising which occasioned a right of action meant that there were a large number of claims continually being pressed upon the department which could not very readily be disposed of. The same machinery for dealing with claims as existed in the usual company railway was not found and I do not think it exists upon the Intercolonial railway. The effect of that legislation was to provide that these claims could be referred to the county court of the respective provinces where the county court existed, or, in the province of Quebec, to the court of competent jurisdiction and could there be disposed of locally. Originally all these claims which required to be adjudicated upon, went to the court of exchequer which, in dealing with some of these questions, is naturally a cumbersome court, sits but very rarely in these provinces and is not a proper tribunal to deal with such matters. The difficulty with that legislation, however, was that the extent of the jurisdiction of these various courts was limited to $200. There was no logic or reason in fixing $200 as the limit of the jurisdiction of these courts in this particular instance. All these county courts in these various provinces had jurisdiction up to $500 involving claims of a similar character between individuals. I pressed upon the Minister of Justice at the time the desirability and common sense of the proposition that the county court should have jurisdiction to deal with claims of this character to the extent that they could deal with other claims and I have been unable to see why $200 was fixed as the limit. The object of this legislation is to provide that the county courts, or the courts that have jurisdiction in such provinces as do not have county courts, shall have jurisdiction up to the extent of $500 instead of $200. That is the only provision in the Bill. I hope the minister will take up this question and treat it as a Government measure. So far in this session of Parliament I do not think that any Bills have reached their second reading, but the present system of disposing of matter must occasion a lot of difficulty to the department and its officers and therefore this proposed legislation ought to be welcomed, I think, by the minister.

Mr. BORDEN: Is it already provided that claims of not over $200 can be decided by the county court?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes. In Nova Scotia the jurisdiction is conferred on the county courts to deal with such claims up to $200, and in numerous cases that provision of the law has been taken advantage of. Once the principle is recognized that these claims may be submitted to a court of competent jurisdiction in a particular locality, there seems to be no reason whatever why that same court should not have jurisdiction in these claims to the extent of its jurisdiction in disputes between parties. The Bill proposes to increase the amount from $200 to $500 in these departmental cases. It will relieve the department from having to deal with a number of these claims, and it will afford a ready method to enable the parties who have these claims to have them disposed of. I would be much pleased if the Minister of Railways would take this up as a Government measure, so as to facilitate its passage this session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Bill No. 101, respecting patents of Frederick Jacob Newman and others.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 102, respecting the Niagara, St. Catherines and Toronto Railway Company. —Mr. Wilson (Wentworth).

EXAMINATIONS IN SEAMANSHIP.

Mr. BELAND: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Minister of Marine if he has received a report as to the examinations in seamanship which were held in London, England, on the 13th January last; can he say what has been the result of said examinations with respect to the young Canadians who wrote in them?

Mr. HAZEN: No formal report has yet been received by the Naval Department, but I understand unofficial information has been received to the effect that the Canadians have all passed, and, as I understand, they have nearly all passed in the first class. I will send the information to my hon. friend.

STRIKE AT PORCUPINE.

Mr. VERVILLE: Has the Minister of Labour any information to impart to the House with reference to the case of the labour leaders who were arrested in connection with the strike at Porcupine and fined $300 or three months' imprisonment?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have seen the press despatch referring to the matter. That, while announcing the fine or in the alternative imprisonment, also stated that an appeal against the judgment had been or was about to be taken, in which case, of course, the proceedings would be stayed until the appeal had been determined. I have taken the matter up with the Attorney General of Ontario in order to ascertain the facts, and to see what steps should be taken, if any, with regard to the matter.

WEST INDIAN TRADE AGREEMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 28, respecting an Agreement between Canada and certain of the West Indian Colonies.—Mr. Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce). (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On section 3—duties on goods in schedule B:

Mr. PUGSLEY: When we were considering the Bill last evening, it will be remembered that sections 6, 7, 8, and 9 were passed; but sections 3, 4, and 5 were left over for consideration. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was going to decide by to-day as to whether the Bill would be amended so as to make the same provision in regard to goods enumerated in schedule B as in schedule C. While the Bill alters, as we contend, the terms of the treaty by limiting the preference on goods in schedule B to those goods which are shipped direct either from the colonies named or from any British country, there is no similar provision in respect to goods enumerated in schedule C. My own view is that we have no right to alter the treaty at all; if we pass the Bill, we are changing the treaty entirely so far as goods enumerated in schedule B are concerned, but are leaving the treaty just as it stands in respect to goods enumerated in schedule C. I think there should be the same provision in regard to both classes of goods.

Mr. FOSTER: I remember stating to my hon. friend, when he made that criticism with reference to goods in schedule C, that I did not see just at the moment why there should be a difference between the two; I am of the same opinion yet. I propose to add a new section 4 after section 3 which will place the imports under schedule C in exactly the same position, as by this Bill it is proposed to place the goods in schedule B. I have not altered my mind at all with reference to what is necessary and best with regard to section 3 as it now stands. I might remind the House of one or two things, which were probably well discussed yesterday, but which will no doubt come up again. I will give my views with reference to them so that we can commence the discussion de novo, if it is necessary to do so. The whole question arises, as my hon. friend contends, as to whether or not it is posible for this Parliament to alter, in the legislation it passes, the letter or the spirit of the agreement entered into and embodied in the document which is before the House, and as to whether the legislation proposed is in accordance with the spirit and the intent of the agreement which was entered into, or whether it alters the spirit and intent of that agreement, either to the disadvantage of ourselves or to the disadvantage of the other party. I wish to say that this legislation embodies absolutely the understanding of the Canadian delegates in that conference as to what was agreed to between the two parties, and what is embodied in the treaty itself. I gave some statements last night as to why I thought that was so; I will repeat them briefly, but a little more in extenso from the first. In the first place, the delegates from the West Indian islands never in the whole process of negotiations, as will be seen by my hon. friend if he reads the record, raised the question that they stipulated for or expected anything different in the way of customs entry through foreign territory from what they were at that time receiving, what they are now receiving, and what they have been working under during the last fifteen years, to go no further back. What was the understanding that all the delegates in that conference had? We were negotiating primarily and almost entirely with reference to the customs imposts upon articles and products from the one country going into the other. It was not a conference called to consider Customs Acts or regulations under Customs Acts; what we were considering was what advantage could be given by one side to the other in the way of preference, that advantage to be expressed by the customs rate to be affixed to the articles themselves. That being true, what was the idea of the delegates from both countries? The delegates from the West Indian Islands were business men, men engaged in trade themselves, men who knew the course of trade and who were cognizant of the channels which trade takes; they knew well that goods coming from the West Indies during the last fifteen years, to go no farther back, had two channels by which they could come. Their goods were subject to the British preference which was the best tariff preference that we gave to any country. For fifteen years, the West Indian Islands had been carrying on trade between their country and ours. Their goods could come by direct shipment in vessels from ports in the West Indian Islands to ports in Canada; or they could come and did come in large quantities by another route which involved a certain amount of transit in a foreign country; they could only come through that country in transit and get the advantages under the provisions of the British preference by adhering to and complying with certain laws and regulations; they were to be consigned from the West Indians Islands to whatever port in Canada they were destined for; they could then go to the American port, where they were put in bond and sent through in bond; then they would be accepted at the Canadian place of consignment. That is to all intents and purposes absolutely the same in the effect upon the tariff on the goods as though they had come in direct from the port in the West Indies to the port in Canada as far as all advantages were concerned in the British preference which the West Indies were receiving during these fifteen years. In no way could they get their goods through the territory of the United States, except through the channel provided by the customs laws and regulations of Canada. That fact, of course, was in their minds. The point was not raised as to their getting further advantages, for instance, having the privilege of making New York, Portland, or any other port in the United States a jobbing place for American merchants who could bring goods from the West Indies, warehouse them there, and job them out, some to one place, some to another, and send them in parcels as they pleased to this country, and then say that because they had their origin in these islands, they could come in under the British preference.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I ask my hon. friend, is he saying that the present condition is direct shipment through the United States or the condition of jobbing that he speaks of?

Mr. FOSTER: The hon. gentleman is asking as to the condition which now exists and has existed for fifteen years? I say it is absolutely direct shipment under the regulations and within the meaning of the Customs Act. I was going on to say that, with that idea in their minds, the delegates came to their conclusions. With that knowledge, they made no stipulation for any wider privileges. I do not believe they wanted them; certainly they did not ask for them. Under this legislation, they get exactly what they have had for fifteen years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under the treaty, they apparently get wider conditions, even if they did not ask for them.

Mr. FOSTER: They do not get wider conditions so far as customs duties are concerned, and the channel by which goods come in and the regulations and laws they must obey.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then why does not the hon. gentleman simply ratify and approve the treaty? Does he think to put in a qualification that is not contained in the treaty?

Mr. FOSTER: That is another question, which I will take up later. But I have nailed this part down. Do hon. gentlemen agree that under this legislation, we accomplish absolutely what I have said—that they have the same privilege in relation to direct shipment cut through New York or any other port in the United States that they have had for fifteen years?

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should you want to bring them there?

Mr. FOSTER: Let us first agree on what we agree upon.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not read it as the hon. gentleman has interpreted it. If I understand it correctly, it expressly excludes all possibility of bringing goods by way of New York. I am not questioning the right or wrong of it, all I say is that I do not agree with this reading. The Bill provides:

> The goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement shall only be entitled to the advantages or concessions provided for by this Act when such goods are conveyed by ship direct without transhipment into the sea or river port of Canada from any one of the respective colonies to the said agreement.

Mr. FOSTER: Where does the hon. gentleman find that?

Mr. OLIVER: In section 5.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend is discussing something quite different from that which I am discussing. Section 5 speaks of a contingent power which may be developed and called into action. I will explain that. We are not discussing the shipping clause, or direct shipment as a condition of preference.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood we were. Will the hon. gentleman say what section is under discussion?

Mr. FOSTER: Section 3, as my hon. friend should know. That is quite different from section 5, which takes up another branch of the subject which we shall come to a little later.

Mr. OLIVER: Just on that point: The word 'direct' is used in section 3?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it not a fair and reasonable conclusion that the word 'direct' in section 3 has the same significance as it has under section 5?

Mr. FOSTER: No, it is not reasonable to suppose that, because it is not true; if the hon. gentleman will allow me——

Mr. OLIVER: I will allow my hon. friend, if he will explain why it is not true.

Mr. FOSTER: I did not know that I should be under the necessity of explaining to a former minister of the Crown so elementary a proposition as that.

Mr. OLIVER : With all due respect, I will insist on the explanation.

Mr. FOSTER : If I must, I must; and I will. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and will read section 3 of that Act which has been in operation since 1907, and the principle of which has been in operation for the last fifteen years, he will find exactly the same wording.

(1) The rates of customs duties, if any, set forth in column 1, 'British Preferential Tariff,' shall apply to goods the product or manufacture of British countries when imported direct from any British country.

And in that tabulation are included: Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Turk's Island, Leeward Islands, Windward Islands, Barbadoes, Trinidad, and British Guiana. Now, under the tariff law as it is to-day, direct shipments are not confined to shipments by vessel from port to port, but 'direct shipment' is defined in the Customs Act. I refer to that Act and read section 50, part of which is as follows:

The Governor in Council may provide that in the cases and on the conditions to be mentioned in the Order in Council, goods bona fide exported to Canada from any country, but passing in transitu through another country, shall be valued for duty as if they were imported directly from such first mentioned country.

This is, a direct shipment cut as defined under the customs law may be direct from the port in Barbadoes to St. John, or may be direct from the port in Barbadoes to Montreal coming through New York or any other portion of the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY : Will that allow the goods to be placed in warehouse in New York, as the Minister of Customs stated yesterday? Must not the goods be in transit practically constantly?

Mr. FOSTER : Just what we said yesterday.

Mr. PUGSLEY : Then, will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask——

Mr. FOSTER : Not just yet. I will read the rest of this, and I will touch on the point the hon. gentleman has raised. Here is the proviso:

Provided that goods that have been entered for consumption or for warehouse——

That is, in the United States.

—or which have been permitted to remain unclaimed, or which have been permitted to remain for any purpose, in any country intermediate between the country of export and Canada, shall not be considered as in transitu from such intermediate country, but shall be treated as goods imported from such intermediate country, and be valued and rated for duty accordingly.

To make a specific instance. A consignment is made from Barbadoes to Montreal via New York. It is taken by ship to New York. It is unloaded from the vessel upon the car on the wharf and is sent by that car in bond through to Montreal. That is a direct shipment. But if the man who takes it to New York enters it under the United States regulations and puts it into warehouse—

Mr. PUGSLEY: In bond.

Mr. FOSTER: In bond, double bond, if you like ; as much bond as you like. When that shipment starts again from that place it then is a direct shipment under the Customs Act from New York into Canada and not from Barbadoes into Canada and therefore the duty is assessed on the value in New York and the duty is paid on the same scale that American goods coming in would pay.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend propose to put a section in this Bill that would make that section of the Customs Act applicable to this particular section?

Mr. FOSTER: In regard to what?

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it proposed to put in this Bill a section which would make section 50 of the Customs Act apply to this particular Act? Otherwise it would not be deemed to apply.

Mr. FOSTER: I have that in section 3. That is what the whole controversy has been about for eight or ten hours.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend seems to think that because he uses the words to be found in the Customs Tariff Act which are interpreted by the accompanying Customs Act that the accompanying Act applies to this without any reference to it. I question whether it would. The minister uses the words 'imported direct from any British country.' In the Customs Tariff Act the additional words 'into Canada' are not found and he reverts to the Customs Act in order to interpret the Customs Tariff Act and says that therefore clause 50 of the Customs Act must necessarily apply to this Bill. He should put in an additional clause to make it apply he would then have his argument complete.

Mr. FOSTER: I think the argument is complete when this legislation is passed. I take exception to the statement that in the Customs Tariff Act in 1907, there are not the words 'into Canada.' It says in section 6 'when such goods are imported into Canada.'

Mr. MACDONALD: I thought the minister was quoting from sub-section 1.

Mr. FOSTER: Sub-section 1 is simply a schedule as part of section 3 and defines the different countries that have British preferential treatment. Section 3 applies to that and all that are scheduled under that. I think I have made that pretty clear——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not think the minister has made it clear. In our legislation 'direct' in the Customs Act means direct; it means shipment from one port to another port. If an article exported to Canada does not come directly to Canada but passes through another port it is not a direct shipment, and section 50 gives to the Governor in Council the power of causing certain shipments passing through another country into Canada to be treated as direct shipments. The Act says:

> The Governor in Council may provide that in the cases and under the conditions to be mentioned in the Order in Council, goods bona fide exported into Canada from any country but passing in transit through other countries shall be valued for duty as if they were imported direct from such first mentioned country.

That is to say, the Governor in Council has the power, by Order in Council, to give to certain goods which do not come direct to Canada permission to be treated as though they had come directly. That is an exception, it is not the law. The Governor in Council has simply the right to give to an indirect shipment the same privilege as are given to a direct shipment.

Mr. FOSTER: If my right hon. friend has any argument, it amounts to this: You are passing legislation now with reference to this agreement. By the law, if this becomes the law, the word 'direct' is put in and it must come as a direct shipment. That is the statement of my right hon. friend and that it is not a direct shipment when it comes through New York. That is my hon. friend's contention.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Mr. FOSTER: And he says it can only be made a direct shipment coming through New York when the Governor in Council has acted on the authority given in section 50.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Mr. FOSTER: The Governor in Council has acted on the authority given in section 50. The Order in Council allowing for, making valid the carrying out of that kind of direct transfer or shipment has been in operation for almost innumerable years in this country, ever since we had a bonded system, and whatever change is made in the tariff, whatever change is made in a piece of legislation as regards duties upon goods, the Order in Council covers everything, it is the general Order in Council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Mr. FOSTER: Does my right hon. friend contend that we have got to sit down now and make another Order in Council covering this before they can get a direct shipment?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will call my hon. friend's attention to that. I understood my hon. friend a moment ago to say that shipments under such circumstances, coming through New York, were equivalent to direct shipment. I point out to him the fact that it is not the law, but that the Governor in Council may give to certain shipments, under conditions to be determined by him, whether shipped by New York, by Boston, through the whole of the United States, or by any other country for that matter, the same privileges as are given to direct shipments. But that is an exception to the law. It is a special power vested in the Governor in Council. But under the general law a direct shipment is a direct shipment. As I understood my hon. friend, the Governor in Council had long ago given to shipments coming from the West Indies through the United States the privileges given to direct shipment.

Mr. FOSTER: I do not want my hon. friend to confine that to the West Indies. That is a general part of our customs system which has its power under the law, and which is carried out through regulations designed to conduct properly business under the law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Governor in Council decided that when certain shipments came through the United States, under certain conditions defined by him, those shipments should be given the privileges of direct shipment and also the British preference. That is the power of the Governor in Council. This bill is to ratify an agreement made between two parties, and it has to be ratified as it is. If we were to depart by legislation from the agreement which has been made, our own legislation would have to be ratified and accepted by the other side. This is the way the bill reads now:

> There shall be levied, collected and paid, after the said agreement is in accordance with its terms brought into operation, and so long as it remains in force, on all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto, when such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein if imported as aforesaid, duties of customs.

Does my hon. friend believe that when this has been ratified by this Parliament, and also by the legislatures of the West Indies, the terms of this statute can be amended thereafter by Order in Council? That is the point, and it is a very dubious one.

Mr. FOSTER: To my mind it is as clear as possible. I am inclined to think that my right hon. friend does not exercise his usual perspicacity of judgment in this case or he would see that when this bill goes into effect, and goods begin to come into this country by the machinery of the customs legislation of the country, these Orders in Council being germane and necessary parts of the customs legislation have full force in respect of such goods. They exist, the system is in operation. You do not have to call it into operation for this particular purpose, when this legislation is passed. It is there, and this legislation comes under it and goods go through the channels already provided, channels which have been well used for the last 30 or 40 years, ever since, in fact, we have had the transit bonding system.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not exactly understand this matter. This legislation, I presume, is brought before this Parliament with the view of carrying into effect the terms of the agreement entered into by the Government of Canada with the several colonies. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated last night that the people of the West Indies, whom he did not think were so affluent as the people of Canada, had pinched themselves in order to secure from the Government of Canada certain privileges. They pinched themselves to secure the right to export to Canada all the goods enumerated in schedule B:

> Being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto, when such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein if imported as aforesaid, duties of customs——
> At the rate of four-fifths.

And so forth. For that right they pinched themselves by making certain concessions upon their part. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce by his legislation is, in my judgment, seeking to further pinch them in limiting and restricting the rights given to them under this second paragraph of the agreement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Changing the agreement.

Mr. EMMERSON: Changing the agreement, limiting and restricting it to importations direct. Now, I can quite understand an extension of the law of the customs with respect to the preference given under the Fielding tariff. It must be understood that that preference was given voluntarily, not as the result of an agreement or of an arrangement, by Canada to Great Britain, and to the other colonies. It permitted them to export into this country certain goods with certain privileges and preferences, and in order to make them fully understood there were certain enactments at that time governing the methods of such importations under the provisions of that tariff Act. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has read the law which thus applies, but he goes further and now seeks to say that the word 'imported' in the second paragraph of the agreement means imported subject to the conditions of that former Tariff Act which applies to the preference granted to Great Britain and to her colonies. I do not understand the word 'imported' to have any such restricted meaning. I hold that those colonies have the right to import into this country with those preferences attached regardless of whether they come directly or indirectly. Therefore, when my hon. friend introduces these provisions into the third paragraph of his Bill limiting such importations to direct importations, he is travelling beyond the agreement which he solemnly entered into. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if this Parliament puts in these restrictions, we are breaking faith with those colonies; we are travelling beyond our right and our privilege. We have complained of the manner in which the United States have treated agreements solemnly entered into. They have been charged as a nation with breaking faith with all other countries, and yet to-day in Canada we propose to treat the people of the West Indies in the very same way. I know my hon. friend is in a very humiliating position with respect to this matter. He neglected apparently to secure those limitations when he entered into this agreement, and now he comes before this Parliament and by legislation seeks to withdraw from the people of the West Indies privileges which are theirs under the agreement into which he entered. It is a humiliating position. I think it would be better for my hon. friend to say this: We will submit to the law, we will ratify the agreement, and that is all that this Bill is called upon to do. My hon. friend has attended to his part of the duty. He has secured the concurrence of the delegates from the West Indies to a certain trade arrangement. He, on his part, offered to do certain things for them and they on their part, undertook to do certain things in order to secure from him these concessions. They gave us these concessions in their markets in consideration of our offering to give them certain rights. Yet, after all that has been done, my hon. friend comes down to Parliament and asks the support of Parliament for his proposal to incorporate a provision in this Bill which is not contained in the treaty arrangement to which he was a party on behalf of Canada. The people of Canada do not desire that we shall in the slightest degree break faith with the West Indian colonies. Under the agreement, if we simply ratified it, the goods enumerated in schedule B, which were the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies named, would have certain preferential rights when brought into this country, no matter how they were brought in, no matter from whence they came, whether they came direct or otherwise. My hon. friend solemnly agreed to that on the part of Canada at the conference which was held in Ottawa last year. Now, he seeks to withdraw from that and he seeks to have this Parliament say: No, the privileges which were granted to you under section 2 of the treaty cannot be conceded by Canada unless you ship direct into Canada. I certainly think my hon. friend has not given an explanation that will be found satisfactory. He has given an explanation that harmonizes his proceeding with the law of the country, but it is not in harmony with the well-understood interpretation that should be given to international agreements or treaties. He is seeking now to take advantage. My contention is that this committee should not seek to change, or modify, or restrict, or alter, even to the crossing of a t or the dotting of an i, the agreement into which Canada solemnly entered.

Mr. BORDEN: It seems to me that the matter under discussion by the committee can be summed up in a very few words. This is a Bill to approve of an agreement between Canada and certain of the West Indian Islands, and it is necessary under the terms of that measure to make certain arrangements in connection with the customs law of the country. At the present time goods imported from the West Indies are regarded as direct importations if they are landed in a foreign country, but not warehoused there and when shipped into Canada. The Bill now before Parliament must be construed in regard to the customs laws of this country as they exist at present, and the Orders in Council made under the provisions of the Customs Act and having the force of law. The position, therefore, at present is, that, under the laws of Canada, including Orders in Council having the force of law, goods coming from the West Indies to New York, for example, brought direct to Canada, without being put into warehouse, are regarded as direct importations. The object of this agreement is to vary the rate of duty to be imposed upon goods coming from the West Indies to Canada. The object is not to vary the law in any other respect. Goods coming into Canada at the present time under a certain rate of duty in the past have been regarded as direct importations. Goods coming into Canada in future under the rates of duty and arrangements provided by this agreement shall equally be regarded as direct importations. These acts are all cognate to each other and must be construed together. I therefore respectfully suggest that the Bill means exactly the same thing as if, after the word 'direct' in the seventeenth line of the Bill, you had included the words 'under the customs laws and regulations of Canada as at present existing.'

Mr. DEVLIN: Then what becomes of section 9 of the Bill?

Mr. BORDEN: It remains part of the Bill.

Mr. DEVLIN: Exactly, but it is inconsistent with what my right hon. friend is suggesting.

Mr. BORDEN: I think it is not inconsistent; at all events, I am not up to the present time aware of any reason why it should be regarded as inconsistent, excepting what my hon. friend has urged.

Mr. DEVLIN: If my right hon. friend will allow me, section 9 reads in this way:

> The operation of all laws inconsistent with the giving to the provisions of this Act and of the said agreement their full effect shall from time to time be suspended to the extent of such inconsistency.

My right hon. friend has just said that if there is any provision inconsistent with the tariff law, the tariff law remains in force. That is a direct contradiction of section 9 of the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN: I was not aware that I had used any such expression as that which my hon. friend has mentioned. I simply said that if we imported goods from the West Indies as direct importations under the statute and under regulations that have the force of statutes, this legislation does not change the law or usage in that regard.

Mr. DEVLIN: But if it does?

Mr. BORDEN: But it does not. If it did we would consider it, but, as a matter of fact, it does not.

Mr. DEVLIN: Why put in section 9 at all?

Mr. BORDEN: There are changes which make such a provision desirable, but there is no change in this respect. I am dealing with section 3 at the present moment.

Mr. EMMERSON: If this Bill simply contained a clause ratifying and confirming an agreement, such as the Japanese treaty, and then set forth the agreement, does my right hon. friend contend that under section 2 of the agreement the produce or manufacture of these respective colonies imported into Canada would be imported without any reference to the agreement, but subject to the laws and regulations of Canada with respect to tariff matters? I want simply to understand my right hon. friend's contention.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not know that there is any very great advantage in dealing with a case that we do not have before us. The agreement relates to a particular customs duty, and the existing law changed in this respect, and would apply.

Mr. DEVLIN: If the tariff laws must apply, the agreement would only have such effect and force as would be consistent with the tariff laws of Canada, and that being so, section 9 is in contradiction when it says, that the tariff law shall be inconsistent if it is not consistent with your arrangement.

Mr. BORDEN: A clause is very often inserted for greater certainty; but this has quite sufficient application under the first eight clauses of the Bill, without seeking to give it any such application as my hon. friend would.

Mr. LOGGIE: Assuming for argument that Musson & Company of Barbadoes ship a cargo of sugar to their New York branch and place it in a bonded warehouse. If Musson & Company take out one-half of that cargo for United States consumption, according to the law of the United States, and forward the remaining half to Canada, if they were called upon to pay any greater duty on that one-half cargo than if it had been sent originally to Canada, does not the Minister of Trade and Commerce think that the Government of the Barbadoes would consider it a grievance, because by section 50 you limit the ordinary rules of bonding goods?

Mr. LALOR: What objection would there be if they did break bulk and leave half the cargo in the United States and sent half of it to Canada?

Mr. LOGGIE: By section 50, they would not then be entitled to the four-fifths rate of duty. Would not the people of Barbadoes consider that was breaking the terms of the agreement which says that these goods can come into Canada, without the word 'direct' being inserted as it is in this Bill? The treaty refers to goods imported into Canada and that sugar would be imported into Canada, even though it were entered in a bonded warehouse in New York and afterwards sent to Canada.

Mr. BEATTIE: They could ship half of the cargo to Canada and half of the cargo to New York in the first place.

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to be as uncommunicative to-day as he was last evening. A question is put him by the hon. member, who speaks as a business man for the business men of this country who import from the West Indies, and that question is entitled to an answer. The hon. gentleman remains dumb when such an important question is put, and he asks us to pass blindly through this House a Bill which we say alters the terms of a solemn treaty. The only answer given by my hon. friend is, that the gentlemen from the West Indies never thought of raising the question. Perhaps these gentlemen thought that if they raised the question the Minister of Trade and Commerce would consult his expert officers, who would tell him that we could only agree if the goods were brought direct to Canada, and so these astute gentlemen from the West Indies said nothing about it, and they have to-day a trade arrangement under which they are entitled to warehouse their goods in New York or Boston and send them forward to Canadian customers, upon the payment of four-fifths of the regular rate of duty. That right the Minister of Trade and Commerce seeks to take away from them in violation of the terms of the treaty. Does the hon. gentleman think he ought to do that without going back to the West Indian representatives and asking them if they would consent to the terms of the treaty being altered? My hon. friend learning from the Department of Justice that that would be contrary to the privileges which the West Indian colonies enjoy today under the British preference, has drawn a Bill which would alter absolutely the terms of that agreement, and without consulting the representatives of the West Indian colonies he is asking this Parliament to alter the agreement into which he solemnly entered. I do not think we ought to do that. The terms of the agreement are:

> This agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada and of the legislature of the above-mentioned colonies.

All that we should do, so far as this treaty is concerned, if we are going to ratify it, is to be delare that we do ratify and approve of it, just as we did in the case of the treaty with Japan. If the treaty does not meet with the approval of this Parliament or of the Minister of Trade and Commerce after he has considered the matter, let him say so and ask Parliament to reject it, and then enter upon negotiations for the purpose of getting the treaty amended in this particular; but do not let him come to Parliament and tell us in one breath that he is asking Parliament to approve of the treaty, and then ask us a little later on to alter in most material respects the terms of the treaty which the representatives of the British West Indian colonies have entered into with representatives of this Government. I wish to discuss for a few minutes the word 'direct' which is included in section 3 of the Bill. The extent to which the treaty goes is:

On all goods enumerated in schedule B to the said agreement, being the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties thereto.

These are the words which my hon. friend has had inserted in the Bill:

When such goods are imported direct from any British country into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein if imported as aforesaid, dutes of customs—— —shall be so and so, as provided by the treaty. Am I right in understanding my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to say that under section 50 of the Customs Act, the Governor in Council has given a definition to the words 'direct importation'?

Mr. FOSTER: That is the section which relates to importations through foreign countries, and it is in carying out the powers conferred by the section that Orders in Council have been made as to regulations.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite so. I think the minister will agree with me that that gives absolutely no power, where goods do not come directly, but through a foreign country, to the Governor in Council to give an interpretation of the words 'direct importation,' reducing duties in consequence; it simply applies to the valuation of the goods which may be made for the purposes of duty. Let me read section 50:

The Governor in Council may provide that in the cases and on the conditions to be mentioned in the Order in Council, goods bona fide exported to Canada from any country, but passing in transitu through another country, shall be valued for duty as if they were imported directly from such first mentioned country: Provided that goods which have been entered for consumption or for warehouse, or which have been permitted to remain unclaimed, or which have been permitted to remain for any purpose, in any country intermediate between the country of export and Canada, shall not be considered as in transitu through such intermediate country, but shall be treated as goods——

Committee suspended and House resumed.

ROYAL ASSENT.

A message from the Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

Mr. Speaker,—The Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this House in the Chamber of the hon. the Senate.

Accordingly Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to report that the House having attended His Honour the Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, His Honour was pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the Royal assent to the following Bill:

Respecting the purchase by the Government of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company's three per cent bonds.

WEST INDIAN TRADE AGREEMENT.

House resumed in Committee on Bill repecting an agreement between Canada and certain of the West Indian Colonies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was saying a few minutes ago that section 50 of the Customs Act does not allow the Governor in Council to give a definition of the term 'direct importation' except for the purpose of valuation. It may be said that the late Government was in error in allowing shipments from the West Indies to be brought in through the United States under the preference. I am obliged to admit that. I always took a different view. It was done long before I became a member of the Government. But, now we are dealing with the treaty, and we ought to consider just what powers the statute gives, and ought to govern ourselves accordingly. The matter is of a great deal of importance to the Maritime provinces, more especially because we believe the only way in which we can build up in the near future a satisfactory service between Canada and the West Indies is by requiring that the goods shall be shipped direct to Canadian ports. And, when the statute says that goods must be imported direct, it means, I take it, that the goods shall not be imported through a foreign country. As I have said, section 50 simply provides that the Governor in Council may pass an order providing that if the goods pass in transitu through a foreign country, they shall be valued for the purposes of duty as though they were imported direct. The statute draws a clear distinction between what is directly imported and what is indirectly imported—the direct importation is one that comes direct to Canada, and the indirect importation is one that comes through a foreign country. All that the statute provides is that the Governor in Council may order that goods imported through a foreign country shall be valued for duty at their value in the country of origin, and not their value in the United States. It does not say that for the purpose of fixing the rate of duty they should be treated as a direct importation; it is confined strictly to the point of valuation. I do not think that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he interprets that clause, will say that I am in error. I do not think that any lawyer in this House will say that I am in error. The Department of Customs, perhaps in order to encourage West India trade through the port of New York pending the establishment of proper steamship connection with Canadian ports, has allowed these indirect importations. That is no reason why we should continue to wink at this practice now that we are seeking to get a direct service between Canada and the West Indies. But, as I have said, this Bill, if it becomes law, will entirely alter the arrangement made between Canada and the West Indies. While I am on my feet, let me call attention to another anomaly in this Bill. It provides that these goods from the West Indies are to be entitled to this preference, not merely if imported direct from the West Indies, but if imported from any British country. Why is that? Suppose that goods are taken from the West Indies to England, warehoused there, and then brought from England to Canada, why should they be entitled to the same rate of duty? Why is it not limited to goods coming direct from these colonies? Why, for instance, might the wholesale merchants in Newfoundland, which colony is no party to this agreement, be allowed to import goods from the West Indies, thereby encouraging that trade, and then send these goods to Canada under the reduced duty? If the non. gentleman is going to qualify the terms of the treaty in the manner proposed, why extend it to other British countries which are not parties to the agreement? Evidently the language has been taken from the statute relating to the British preference and extending to the West Indies, without having any regard to the altered circumstances arising out of this being a specific agreement made with these West Indian colonies. There is another extraordinary feature of this Bill that, when the time comes, under section 5——

Mr. FOSTER: Might I suggest that my hon. friend should confine himself to the question under consideration? Surely, after having used up so much time as we have, when we come down now to a simple discussion, and with a view to passing this clause, he cannot jump from clause to clause.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to meet the hon. gentleman's view. He ought not to complain about two days being spent in the discussion of these matters, more especially when he to-day is coming in with an amendment of a most important character, made in view of the objections which have been raised on this side of the House, an amendment to make provision in regard to goods which would come in under schedule C, in regard to which the Minister of Customs, who is supposed to look after this matter, gives a most extraordinary explanation, and gave this Committee to understand that the omission had been made deliberately and professed to give a good reason for it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce comes to-day and says that after thinking the matter over he agrees with the observations made on this side of the House and finds it necessary to amend the Bill. The hon. gentleman's impatience should not lead him to rush the Bill through, because, as I have said, it is of great importance and ought to be considered carefully. If it is the hon. gentleman's desires that I should confine myself just now to the section under discussion, he will not complain if, later, I deal with the phases which will arise on consideration of section 5. Then, I will just refer very briefly to paragraph (b) of section 3. I do suggest that my hon. friend, having had a night to consider the matter, and having determined to amend the Bill as he has indicated, and has to provide that, so long as the British preference continues, goods from the islands which are parties to this treaty shall come in under the terms of that preference, he ought to state to this Committee whether it is or is not, the policy of the Government to continue the British preference. I think it desirable that the people of this country should know whether it is intended to continue the policy which was inaugurated by this country fifteen or sixteen years ago. It is important because of the fact that one of the great political parties in England has been making the assertion that they learn from Canada and the other overseas dominions that have granted a preference that it cannot be expected, speaking particularly of Canada, that Canada will continue to give this preference unless the Mother Country gives a preference in return. That statement is made by English statesmen and they profess to give as their authority the views of Canadian statesmen. Surely we have a right to know, when asked to consider the advantages or otherwise of this treaty, whether or not Canada is going to barter with respect to this question of British preference or whether we will continue what we gave voluntarily fifteen years ago to the Mother Country. That policy has been to the advantage of Canada as well as of the Mother Country and it will continue to be to the advantage of both countries. The people of Canada, the people of the Empire have a right to know the intention of the Government.

Mr. EMMERSON: I raised the point as to our bona fides in attempting to legislate as proposed by my hon. friend in this Bill. It is a matter of supreme importance. As I understand it this is the initial movement in an attempt to have mutual preferential arrangements between the overseas dominions and in so far as the attempt has been successful in this instance I certainly would desire to congratulate my hon. friend, but in our empire-building of tariffs it would be desirable that we should start right and that there should be at least bona fides in any arrangements that may be entered into. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has adverted to the fact that the West Indian people pinched themselves in order to enter into this agreement, in order that they might promote intercolonial trade between their colonies and Canada—a very worthy aim and no doubt worthy of some sacrifice. But if in addition to that we seek to pinch them further by our legislation it certainly would be unfair and if we are to have tariff arrangements, mutual preferences among the oversees dominions of the Empire and with the Mother Country, what we agree with them, what we undertake to do for them we should fulfil to the full letter and spirit of the law. I remember a few years ago when under the Washington treaty we thought a boon had been secured for Canadian exports to the United States, particularly with reference to fish. Under the terms of that treaty we had hoped and we expected to have certain fish admitted free or at least on favourable terms in the United States market, but the Americans, by certain tariff regulations and enactments, imposed on the cans and packages which contained the fish heavy burdens which absolutely nullified the benefits that we thought we had secured under treaty. We in Canada to-day are practically doing the same thing with respect to the imports from the British West Indies. The ordinary exporter in any of these West Indian Islands, reading this agreement, would interpret it as meaning that no matter from what country they were shipped or under what circumstances the goods which were the product or manufacture of these islands could come into Canada with certain preferential privileges. That is in accordance with the terms of the agreement. He is told that the agreement gave him that privilege, but the tariff laws and enactments of the Canadian Parliament restrict and limit it and the boon for which he made a sacrifice and for which he pinched himself is not the boon he thought it would be, it is something else, it has a string to it, it is limited. It is left uncertain whether the four-fifths is to be four-fifths of the maximum tariff of the country or of the minimum tariff; that would very materially affect the duty necessary to be paid on that importation and so affect the advantage of this market to the exporter of that product from these islands. I submit that the people of the West Indies would be justified in howling if you will, as we howled some twenty-five or thirty years ago with regard to the attitude of the Americans in connection with our fish exports into their country. It was a matter of serious grievance and as a result we were led in this country to believe that the Americans as a nation did not recognize or observe their treaty obligations—and the greatest imputation that we make against the people of the United States is that they do not fairly and honestly observe their bond agreements. I believe that the result of the elections of 1911 was largely due to resentment against the people of the United States for the treatment which they had accorded to Canada in the past.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar): Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend says hear, hear. I am glad he does. Let us not then place ourselves as a Canadian nation in the same attitude and let us not go down to the same level in the observance of our agreements. I think my hon. friend would act wisely if he amended the Bill so as to read that this Parliament approves of the agreement which he has solemnly entered into and let that become law and then the rights of the West Indian people can be determined under that agreement, determined as they expect them to be, with certainty. They would then have whatever privileges the laws of Canada gave them, and I venture to say the Exchequer Court of Canada would determine that any importation of the products or manufacture of any of these colonies would have the privilege of being imported into Canada no matter whence they came or how or why or by what method they appeared on Canadian soil. But if this legislation is passed, then the rights which were created under this agreement or treaty are shrivelled, and are restricted to mean that the goods must come direct and be subject to certain limitations to be found in our tariff regulations. It goes beyond this particular case, because, if Canada is to establish for herself a reputation of that kind, it will only lessen the possibilities of entering into relations with other countries. I can well understand Australia and New Zealand making answer to my hon. friend to the effect, 'Oh, it does not make any difference what agreement we enter into with you; you go back to the Parliament of Canada and pass a law which restricts our privileges and curtails the advantages granted to us under such an agreement.' I think it is placing Canada unfairly before the Empire and before the world. We talk about Empire rights and privileges, about the advantages of having Empire trade and mutual preferences, but surely we are making a sad beginning when, such an arrangement having been entered into, we seek by legislation here to withdraw in the slightest measure any privileges which, for a consideration, we have granted to the colonies named in that agreement. I submit, Sir, that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce should amend this Bill in the way indicated, and if afterwards he wants to make a further arrangement with the West Indies, if they are willing, he can approach the respective governments of those colonies and have the arrangement carried out in accordance with what he terms the law in connection with the regulation of the tariff in Canada.

If those tariff regulations and tariff laws were well understood by the delegates of those colonies, as my hon. friend says they were, why was there no reference to them in that agreement? It would have been easy for my hon. friend in framing and agreeing to paragraph 2 to have said: 'Imported subject to the tariff laws and regulations of Canada.' But the use of the mere word 'imported' does not imply that the importations are subject to any conditions. It is unrestricted, and means that they are not subject to any regulations of which the delegates were not advised, nor to any internal enactments of the Parliament of Canada with which they were not familiar and to which they had not assented. It means that importations into Canada are entitled to have the benefit of a preference to the extent of four-fifths of the duty that is paid by any foreign country on like goods. I ask this committee to hesitate before they stamp this legislation with the mark of their approval, because it is not bona fide legislation; it is a breach of faith, and it is wrong as against ourselves as well as against those West Indian colonies.

Mr. McKENZIE : When the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce began his explanations at the opening of the House to-day, he put a question to himself which I thought he was going to answer. But I noticed that in the course of his observations he forgot to answer it. He asked 'can the legislature change the agreement?' That is the question he put to himself. Now there is in the agreement itself a provision which would to some extent answer the minister in that regard. The seventh clause of the agreement says:

> This agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada and of the legislatures of the above-mentioned colonies, and of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and upon such approval being given it shall be brought into operation at such time as may be agreed upon between the contracting parties by a proclamation to be published in the Canada Gazette and in the official gazette of each of the said colonies.

It would have been interesting to hear the minister give his own view upon that point, but as an answer to the question which he put to himself I would submit that all that is contemplated by that agreement is that the West Indian legislatures following this legislature shall ratify the agreement. In the strictest sense of the words this is not an international agreement. It does not come within the terms of international law as we understand it, because in the application of that law we can hardly say that Newfoundland and the West Indian Islands and Canada are nations within the meaning of the terms of international agreements. It seems to me that though each one of those countries is under the one Crown, the powers of this Parliament representing the Crown are just the same in regard to this agreement as if the powers of a different Crown were represented by the legislatures of the West Indies. Therefore, putting a proper interpretation upon international law, we must approach the confirmation of this agreement as if it were an agreement between ourselves and the United States of America or France or any other foreign country. If then, that question were put to me, I would say at once that this legislation cannot in the slightest degree change the terms of that agreement without the agreement going back to the original contracting parties to have those changes ratified, and when the changes are made, it could come back here for ratification. It is a well-known rule of international law that the terms of a treaty must over-rule all laws of either of the parties to it, and that the terms of an agreement will prevent any parliament or legislature of the countries that are party to it from making any laws which will conflict with the agreement or take away any of the rights of the parties. This, as international law, is going to a very great length, but it is the condition that prevails in this world. We have a very recent and striking illustration of the application of this law as between the United States and Japan. I mention this as being well-known to most lawyers, and, I am sure, well-known to the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill. A treaty of comparatively recent date has been made between the United States and Japan and one of the terms of the treaty was that the children of Japanese coming into the United States should be educated as pupils of the common schools of the different states of the American Union; that is that the children of Japanese were to be dealt with in that regard the same as the children of Americans. The state of California passed a law, during the currency of the treaty, making it obligatory upon the children of Japanese to attend separate schools of their own and providing that separate schools should be furnished for them, an enactment which was in contravention of the terms of the treaty. It is a well-known fact that a great deal of disturbance was caused in Japan and the United States over this law and negotiations and diplomatic exchanges took place between the two countries with the result that the treaty prevailed, the state of California was obliged to allow its law to remain inoperative or to repeal it—I forget which—and the terms of the treaty were permitted to have full force and to be fully carried out by the United States. This is the most recent case, it is a matter of which we all have knowledge and the principles involved in it establish the paramount rights that are obtained under an international agreement of this kind. While we are not different nations, a treaty here is exactly the same as it was between the United States and Japan. I therefore, submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce as an irresistible conclusion that the question which the hon. gentleman put to himself must be answered in the negative; that is that this legislation cannot in the slightest change the terms of the agreement. If we cannot change this agreement in any way, are we attempting to change it by the legislation before the House? I shall take the privilege of reading clause 2 of the agreement to see whether or not this Bill changes it. But, before reading that term of the agreement, I wish to point out the correctness and force of the question that was put to the minister by my hon. friend from Northumberland, New Brunswick (Mr. Loggie). It is a question which is right in point, practical, and must of necessity be answered satisfactorily one way or the other before this Bill goes through. My hon. friend from Northumberland pointed out that under clause 2 of the agreement goods could be imported into New York, for instance, under the rules and regulations for importations into that state, part of the goods could be sold in the United States and such of the goods as the owner thought proper to tranship could be sent on to this country and still be within the provisions of the Bill as it now reads. But under the construction put upon the agreement by the minister and the construction that he put upon the Act, that freedom of trade would be denied to a West Indian merchant, for, under the agreement as construed by the minister, the moment he takes fifty cents worth of goods out of a car or box, or whatever it may be, he loses the right to come into this country at less than the full duty. That condition arises under section 50 of the Customs Act upon which the minister relied. The minister and the Prime Minister say that the customs and tariff laws of Canada automatically apply to this case. If they automatically apply then section 50 of the customs law, being chapter 48 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, applies here, and under the proviso of section 50 it would be impossible to forward these goods to the United States and a part of the goods to Canada without paying the full duty. Section 50 provides that:

> The Governor in Council may provide that in the cases and on the conditions to be mentioned in the Order in Council, goods bona fide exported to Canada from any other country, but passing in transitu through another country, shall be valued for duty as if they were imported directly from such first mentioned country:

Then comes the proviso:

> Provided that goods which have been entered for consumption or for warehouse, or which have been permitted to remain unclaimed, or which have been permitted to remain for any purpose, in any country intermediate between the country of export and Canada, shall not be considered as in transitu through such intermediate country, but shall be treated as goods imported from such intermediate country and be valued and rated for duty accordingly.

Now, keeping that in mind as the law, according to the interpretation of the minister and of the Prime Minister, and reading the agreement in the light of it, I would like to know what understanding the West Indian people had with respect to the rights which they thought they were obtaining under this agreement. Leaving that law out and considering it as being a part of this agreement let me read clause 2:

> On all goods enumerated in schedule B, being the produce or manufacture of any of the above-mentioned colonies, imported into the Dominion of Canada, the duties of customs shall not at any time be more than four-fifths of the duties imposed on similar goods when imported from any foreign country.

There is nothing in that to say that you must not break bulk on the way. There is nothing to say that if a man ships two or three carloads of oranges to New York, he cannot keep one of these cars in New York and send the other on to Canada. The way these business men understood it was that they would have full freedom under this agreement as it was written and as it should be plainly understood. The minister said a great deal about the deductions that are to be drawn from this agreement and he laid a great deal of stress on what the conditions were before the agreement was written, and on what the practice and the law were. I need not tell my hon. friend that, in connection with the construction of statutes and agreements, we are never allowed to go back to data of that kind until we exhaust the proper understanding of the writing itself. If an Act of Parliament is dubious we are permitted to obtain such assistance as we may from the statements made in Parliament when the Act was being considered. For instance, if a section of the Criminal Code is doubtful, we are permitted to see the statements of the Minister of Justice in Parliament in explanation of it. But if an instrument is in clear-cut English, no matter what the intention of Parliament was, the interpretation has to be according to the meaning of the language used. If this clause 2 can be taken by itself and if its meaning is clear, any customs officer and any court must interpret its language according to the ordinary rules of interpretation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce took great pains to tell us that there were no technical officers present at this conference; that it was a case of business men sitting around a table to discuss business matters and to come to a conclusion, and therefore it is plain that this language has to be taken in its ordinary meaning. We have the authority of the ministers that this was a guileless, honest, unsophisticated gathering of men sitting around a table, trying to arrange a business agreement, and after this prayerful and ingenuous gathering had reached a conclusion they put it down in plain English. But the minister seems to think that it was not after all safe to let these gentlemen from the West Indies have everything their own way and he thinks he can come to this Parliament and obtain by the intervention of a statute something that was not stipulated for in the agreement. The minister could very well have stopped this Bill just at the end of the last word of clause 2 by saying that the Bill approved of the agreement as appended to the Bill. That was all that was done to confirm the treaty between this country and Japan, and that is all that is really necessary in this case. I submit that the language of this agreement is the law and the contract, and that we cannot in the slightest change it by any enactment of this Parliament, unless it be that the changes are sent back to the other parties to the contract and concurred in by them. We must act in good faith there. I suppose the minister has found that inadvertently he granted concessions which he should not grant, and it is natural he should desire to rectify his mistakes by this Bill so as to put the matter in a better light before the Canadian people. But if this Act varies in the slightest from the agreement into which he has solemnly entered, he cannot now rectify his mistake. It is of much more importance to us to carry out our undertakings in good faith than it is to gain some slight advantage by changing the agreement. I am pleased the minister has agreed to some amendments which we have suggested, and I have no doubt that on further consideration and consultation he will come to the conclusion that this agreement solemnly entered into with the West Indian delegates cannot be changed by legislation but must be ratified by us in every particular. Any conditions that we impose on the other parties to this agreement, contrary to the agreement itself, would be, I believe, ultra vires of this Parliament.

Mr. NESBITT: To what extent, if any, will this agreement affect beet sugar manufacturers and beet growers in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: Under a section in the tariff, a certain concession is made to the refiners of beet root sugar in Canada, and the Act passed several years ago gave to them the liberty of importing foreign sugars under preferential rates to the amount of a certain proportion compared with what they refined out of the beet sugar. That proportion was large at first and diminished afterwards. At the present time I think it is an equal portion to what they refine; at first I think it was a double portion, but that is not material. That legislation runs out in 1914, and a stipulation of this agreement is that that legislation shall not be continued after 1914. The beet root sugar refiners are then left without whatever advantage they may have in the right now to import, under preferential duties, a certain proportion of foreign sugar; and an adjustment will have to be made in the tariff if it is found necessary to meet that condition. The same thing occurs with reference to the refiners of cane sugars; under the present Act, they also have the right to import a certain amount of foreign sugars at preferential rates, proportioned to the total amount they refine in a year. That also will drop when this legislation is passed; and a certain adjustment may have to be made with reference to it. I think that covers the point.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Schedule B contains such articles as fresh fruits, sugar, coffee, coal, kerosene oil and other articles, which I understand at present are dutiable. This agreement is to last for ten years, once it is made. Will it then be within the power of this Parliament to put any of these articles in schedule B on the free list?

Mr. FOSTER: Certainly. Neither the colonies, nor ourselves, as far as schedule A and schedule B are concerned, curtail themselves of any rights of tariff legislation; the guarantee of each country is that at least one-fifth preference shall be given, whatever the duty may be.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand in schedule C we tie ourselves up for ten years, so that we cannot put any article in that schedule on the free list?

Mr. FOSTER: With reference to schedule C, the position is as my hon. friend has stated, during the continuance of this agreement, with reference to cocoa-beans, lime-juice and limes, there is a stated minimum impost upon foreign countries.

Mr. MACDONALD: Since the treaty was agreed on in April of last year, has the minister gone into the matter of better steamship service with the West Indies? I am disappointed to find that while it is contemplated that at some future time power will be taken to pass Orders in Council for this purpose when you have steamers, still you go on in disregard of the fact that we have on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of this country a maritime condition which ought to be especially guarded and looked after. We are providing for goods coming from and going to every other country without paying any attention to these matters. My hon. friend was very strong two years ago about trade being East and West, instead of North and South, but still we go on trading North and South; we are making special arrangements with the West Indian islands, and are bringing in the goods through the United States. This North and South, and East and West business is all very well at election times; but it does seem to me, when the opportunity came to my hon. friend to make this bargain, he should have gone into the matter of better steamship service. Of course, there are contingent clauses here, but what has my hon. friend been doing since April last in the way of providing steamship connections, and when are we going to have this service?

Mr. FOSTER: I have no objection to making the statement now, if the committee would rather have it now. I was trying to carry out the general rule of debate that we take clause by clause, and not jump from one to the other. My hon. friend has put a question which was asked before, when the resolution was under consideration, as to the desirability of having improved steamship communication between the West Indies and Canada. I do not think that my hon. friend believes for a moment that I am not as anxious as he is to see improved steamship connection. It is of very great moment to the country as a whole; it is especially of great moment to the Maritime provinces which lie contiguous to the West Indian islands, between which this communication by direct steamship would be carried out. I think I brought down to the House the papers embodying all the correspondence that had taken place up to a short time ago. That has been before the committee; and I have no doubt that my hon. friend has seen and read it, and knows exactly the course of the negotiations up to the present time. Tenders were called for which were due about October 1. When these tenders came in they were not satisfactory; they did not propose to give the kind of service that it was thought was best suited. In fact, there was but one tender. That was not satisfactory; and the period for tendering was lengthened, and everything was done that could be done to induce others to tender for those services On the 15th of December, I think it was, those tenders were due, and they have been under consideration since. I am not able to say yet what conclusion will be come to with reference to them. All I can say is that for the last three or four weeks, I have been giving personal attention almost every day to that matter. I hope to be able, within a short time before I go away, to give to the House the conclusion which has been arrived at. There are various difficulties, and no difficulty is greater just at the present time than that which is induced by shipping conditions. Every shipping man knows that at the present time freights are high, vessels' charters are high, vessel building is high, shipping and shippers are engaged almost to their limit; and it is almost impossible to get strong reliable firms to enter into a competition at present for the West Indian business. There is the greatest difficulty that confronts me, and the House will appreciate the difficulty when I bring the matter before it, as I expect to do within the next few days. My own conviction about this service is that we do not want a long-drawn-out, slow service. In some way or other, we must get fairly rapid communication between Canada and the West Indian islands. We do not want a service which does not compare favourably with any service carried on from United States ports to the West Indies. Contrasts are very inconvenient when they tell against us in the eyes of the travelling and shipping public. So, we are trying to get a service which, in speed and in general makeup so far as comfort and conveniences both for freight and passenger traffic are concerned, shall be the best possible. I am not telling any secrets, and I am not going into figures; but I must tell the House that if it wishes an up-to-date service of that kind, it must make up its mind to pay well for that service. We are probably on the crest of expense in ship-building and shipping transactions, and in trying to make an arrangement for a contract at the present time, the conditions tend to probably the largest cost for the service to be given. My hon. friend and other hon. members may rest assured that I am doing everything I can to facilitate the conclusion of this matter, and just as soon as it is brought about I shall submit to the House the results.

Mr. OLIVER : Before we leave section 3 I want again to express my disappointment at the small advantage that can possibly result to either Canada or the West Indies under this trade arrangement. Yesterday we discussed the amount of reduction in duty—a 20 per cent advantage as to Canadian trade going to the West Indies, and no advantage at all, as compared with the present conditions, as to West Indian trade coming into Canada. When I read the section yesterday, it did not strike me that there was a variation in that section from the terms of the agreement which again loaded the business coming from the West Indies to Canada with disability and therefore with expense. I did not realize at first that the rate which appears on the face of the agreement is not to be the rate in fact under the law as we are asked to enact it in this section 3. Looked at from the point of view of the Canadian consumer, the thing may be summed up in this way: The consumer pays more on free articles of consumption than he did before the treaty was made: on no article of consumption does he stand to pay less than before the treaty was made. Not only so, but so far as the treaty is concerned, he may be obliged to pay more on a large number of articles, to the amount of the difference between a reduction of twenty per cent and a reduction of thirty-three and a third per cent. He is going to be in a worse position so far as the importation of West Indian products is concerned than he is now, and to compensate him for that he gets a twenty per cent reduction from the ordinary duties on certain of his goods going into the West Indies. Now, I am prepared to assert that a twenty per cent advantage to our goods entering the West Indies, is not sufficient to give Canada access to that market. Take the instance of Great Britain in the case of the preference given by Canada. Would a 20 per cent preference give Great Britain a practical advantage in the markets of Canada in those articles in which the United States competes with Great Britain? It is a well-known fact that until the British preference was made 33 1-3 per cent it was not effective. Now, if that was the case in regard to British trade with Canada, is it not much more the case in regard to Canada's trade with the West India Islands, which trade has been going on for the past twenty or thirty years directly with the United States, and which is held to-day by the United States to the greatest possible degree? The whole purpose of this arrangement, so far as the expansion of Canada's trade is concerned, is to allow Canada to cut under the United States in West Indian trade. If my hon. friend had come here with a substantial preference to Canada, he would have been doing a good work. But when he comes with a trade arrangement that lays an increased burden on the Canadian consumer, and does not, as a matter of actual fact, give the Canadian producer access to the West India Islands, I say he comes with a proposition by which—I do not wish to be offensive—it seems to me he is trifling with the House and the country. The hon. gentlemen has told us that the delegates from the West Indies would not agree to give Canada more than 20 per cent preference in their markets. Why would they not agree? That was a matter of bargain and sale, a matter of value for value. If they would not agree to give more, it must have been because my hon. friend would not agree to give them more. Now, may I suggest: There are certain products of the West Indies quite extensively used in Canada which are not produced in Canada. Would it not have been in the interest of Canada, in the interest of the Canadian tax-payer and consumer, if my hon. friend had offered to the West Indian Islands to place these articles on the free list in consideration of the West Indian Islands giving to Canada what would have been a substantial preference on her products in their market—say, a preference of fifty per cent? Was such a proposition ever made and if made was it made in good faith? I cannot imagine that if such a proposition had been made it would not have been acceded to in a large degree. Yesterday, speaking of Trinidad, my hon. friend said that its products being chiefly cocoa and sugar, the chief export being cocoa, we were compelled to put a duty on cocoa from countries other than the West Indies in order to secure Trinidad's adhesion to the treaty. But Trinidad has an important export of asphalt, and I would think that it would have been a matter of consideration to Trinidad if asphalt had been put upon the free list. Possibly we might have made such an arrangement with Trindad by putting asphalt upon the free list, as would have saved us from the imposition of the duty on cocoa, which after all, is a matter of some importance to a very large number of our people. A trade arrangement that has in it no more element of benefit to the people of Canada than this arrangement has is not one that is deserving of the commendation or endorsation of Parliament.

I would like to know why when Canada is to-day-giving the West Indies a 33⅓ per cent preference, it was necessary in the negotiation of this agreement to provide for an apparent limitation of 20 per cent. We now import these goods at a 33⅓ per cent preference, and we hope to continue doing so. Is it because we have in power a Government so wedded to the idea of higher tariff that in making this arrangement they were bound to protect their principles so that whenever they saw fit to remove that 33⅓ per cent advantage which the consumer now has they would be free to do it without violating the agreement? It is a protection of protection. Is it in the minds of our hon. friends that they are going to establish a limit of Imperial trade preference of 20 per cent, and that this West Indian agreement is the forerunner of an Imperial preference of 20 per cent instead of 33⅓ per cent? If there is no such purpose behind this 20 per cent arrangement, for what reason has it been placed upon the statute-book? If it is not merely a declaration that has no effect it must indicate an intention on the part of the Government to constitute 20 per cent the limit of preference that will be given under our customs tariff hereafter. Is that the reason why this very remarkable treaty has been made in such a manner that it is ineffective to benefit the trade of Canada but effective to lay additional burdens on the people of Canada?

On section 5—Restrictions, control of rates:

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is stated in the New York papers that the Government have come to an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific railway for a West India service for a sum of $400,000 a year. Has such an arrangement been concluded with the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. FOSTER: I have already stated that no conclusion has been come to. If a conclusion had been arrived at I would have been able to announce it this afternoon.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would be important that the committee should have a statement of the terms which the Government propose to exact from the steamship companies. What are the services in regard to which tenders have been called for? Before we dispose of this matter and before the Government enters into an agreement this committee ought to have some information. After the bargain is once made and an agreement entered into with a steamship company for a number of years it will be too late for members to express their views, it will be of no advantage to do so, whereas if we had the information beforehand we might be able to make some suggestions that would be entitled to some consideration. I would like my hon. friend to inform the House, not now, but on the third reading, as to the proposed requirements of the service. I think that a great mistake has been made in the past in insisting upon a combined service to St. John and Halifax. The only way to make this service a success is to have it direct from Halifax and direct from the port of St. John. It is utterly absurd to my mind to require steamers to make both ports. You will never have a satisfactory service under those conditions. May I ask my hon. friend, if, on the third reading, he will give information to the House as to the conditions of the proposed service in respect to which tenders have been called.

Mr. FOSTER: I shall try to do that, though I cannot say positively. I want to settle that matter before I leave, and I shall give all the information to the House that I can. If I am able to give it on the third reading I shall be very glad.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is one other matter. Under this agreement the Governor in Council is to have the power to issue a proclamation providing that, in order to enjoy the preferential rates contained in the treaty, the goods must be brought by steamship direct to a Canadian port. I want to know whether my hon. friend is prepared to hold out an expectation to this House that that proclamation will issue at an early date, or whether it is simply put there with a view to providing something that may be brought into effect in the distant future. Is it bona fide intended to issue that proclamation in the near future? What the people of St. John, Halifax and the St. Lawrence ports want to know is whether it is intended to go on conducting this business between Canada and the West Indies through foreign ports, or whether at an early date there is to be a bona fide and energetic determination to limit this preference to goods brought through Canadian ports.

Mr. FOSTER: Many years ago, I find, there was enacted such a provision as this in the Customs Tariff Act. It reads:

> On and after a date to be named by the Governor in Council, in a proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, the British preferential tariff shall apply only to goods brought into Canada by ship direct to a Canadian seaport.

All these years there has been that same longing for information in the breasts of my hon. friend and others, but the longing has not been satisfied. When my hon. friends opposite were in power, why was it not satisfied?

Mr. MACDONALD: That is no answer. What about you?

Mr. FOSTER: I merely mention that to point a moral and adorn a tale. At this time I cannot say just when that proclamation under the agreement will issue. It depends absolutely, first, upon the facility with which we get proper communication. I am absolutely opposed to imposing direct shipment between the West Indian islands and Canada with steamship arrangements such as we have to-day. I am opposed to it personally until we get a fairly good and effective steamship communication. So far as I am concerned, personally, I would be very glad to see direct shipments. At the same time I think we have something to consider with the West Indian islands as well. It is true we have absolute power to make that a condition with regard to imports coming into Canada, and they have the right to make it a condition in regard to imports going into their country. Either of us could do it, and the other need not. But it would be much better if both did it at the same time, because it would give a greater impetus. My reading of the mind of the West Indian islands, as reflected through the delegates was that as soon as satisfactory arrangements are provided they would be favourable to that line of policy, and I myself am very favourable to that line of policy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the Government also favourable?

Mr. FOSTER: I think the Government is favourably disposed to that.

PRIVATE BILLS.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC BRANCH LINES.

House in Committee on Bill No. 16, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company.—Mr. McKay.

On section 1—time for construction of railways extended:

Mr. OLIVER: This requires the company to commence construction within two years and to complete within five years after the passing of this Act, I understand?

Mr. LANCASTER: Perhaps I should explain the effect of the section. They were not using the standard clause that we generally use. There is no change whatever in the result except that the legislation is made consistent with the clause that we always use. We left out what was printed:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of chapter 83 of the Statutes of 1911—— and inserted what appears in the section as amended. This is merely a secondary way of repealing a section which is afterwards repealed. The last clause of this Bill repeals this section as to the previous limitation of renewal and we would only have been here repeating if we had left these words in. Therefore we started the section by saying:

> The Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company may, within two years after the passing of this Act, commence the construction of the lines of railway which have heretofore been authorized.

etc. The effect is exactly the same as it was intended to be in the first place.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

ALGOMA EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 39, respecting the Algoma Eastern Railway Company.—Mr. Smyth.

On section 2—extension of time for contruction of portion of railway:

Mr. LANCASTER: This charter was first granted in 1900, and with respect to the clauses that are now added, I might explain that since then there are standard clauses which are inserted in all these Bills, controlling the exercise of the powers of the company, compelling them to submit their rates to the Board of Railway Commissioners instead of to the Governor in Council, as formerly, and providing that they shall not erect poles on streets and highways, without obtaining the consent of the municipality. The added clauses to this Bill are with the idea of placing the company on the same basis as other similar companies, which have obtained charters during the last three years.

Mr. OLIVER: There are certain regulations by Order in Council for the control of electrical power; are these regulations brought into this Act?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes. We bring in section 247 of the Railway Act which contains a good many salutory provisions, and we also bring in certain other provisions such as that the company shall not have power to expropriate against the consent of the owner, and generally speaking, what are known as the standard clauses.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CAMPBELLFORD, LAKE ONTARIO AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 41, respecting the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Smith.

On section 1—issue of securities:

Mr. LANCASTER: In this Bill the standard clauses are also added, and we have increased the capital.

Mr. OLIVER: The bonding privileges allowed on this road seem very large. I assume the committee has some definite rule in regard to granting permission to impose liabilities upon a road?

Mr. LANCASTER: In one of their Acts they had power up to $25,000 a mile on part of the line and another Act gave them $35,000 a mile. They constructed part of the road and found they could not possibly build it for less than the sum which is now allowed them. The Railway Committee were satisfied on the explanation given that the company should have that additional amount.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

MANITOBA AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill No. 44, respecting the Manitoba and North Western Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Cash.

On section 1—time for construction of railways extended:

Mr. LANCASTER: I may say that when the Bill was before the Railway Committee it proposed to give the company the right to make a terminal on ranges 16, 17, 18, or 19. The Committee thought this was too wide, and concluded finally to strike out sixteen and seventeen, and the promoters were satisfied to be limited to eighteen or nineteen.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 18, respecting the Ontario Michigan Railway Company.—Mr. Pardee.

Bill No. 19, respecting the Ottawa Terminals Railway Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 14, respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Currie.

Bill No. 15, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Currie.

Bill No. 37, respecting the Alberta Central Railway Company.—Mr. Clark (Red Deer).

Bill No. 42, respecting the Guelph and Goderich Railway Company.—Mr. Morphy.

LA BANQUE IMMOBILIERE.

Mr. BAKER moved second reading of Bill No. 72, to incorporate La Banque Immobilière. He said: This is a Bill to incorporate a real estate company. Some objection has been taken to its name, and this question can be dealt with in the Committee. The promoters do not insist upon the name, but an objection to the name held the Bill up when it was before the House the other evening.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is real estate the primary object of the concern?

Mr. BAKER: Yes. The objection is to the word 'banque' in the name.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 77, to incorporate the Calgary, Edmonton and Fort McMurray Railway Company.—Mr. Armstrong (Lambton).

Bill No. 78, to incorporate the Canada Hail Insurance Company.—Mr. Aikins.

Bill No. 79, respecting the Cariboo, Barkerville and Willow River Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 80, to incorporate the Huron Lake Shore Railway Company.—Mr. Baker.

Bill No. 81, to incorporate the Quebec, Portland and International Short Line Railway Company.—Mr. Cromwell.

Bill No. 82, respecting the Shuswap and Okanagon Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 83, respecting the Southern Central Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Sharpe (Lisgar).

Bill No. 86, to incorporate the British Northwestern Mortgage Company.—Mr. Aikins.

Bill No. 87, respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 91, respecting the Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 93, to incorporate the Quebec Rapid Transit Railway Company.—Mr. Gauthier (Gaspé).

AID TO AGRICULTURE.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding $10,000,000 be appropriated and paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada during the period of ten years, beginning with the year ending March 31, 1914, for the purpose of aiding and advancing the farming industry by instruction in agriculture, including the work carried on by veterinary colleges.

He said: I know, Mr. Speaker, it is customary in a case of this kind for a minister, on moving that you do leave the Chair, to make a statement of the purposes of the measure. But I do not wish to detain the House on Friday night by speaking at length. My only object now is to introduce this Bill so that it can be printed and distributed amongst the members. I would appreciate it if the House would leave the discussion for a later stage of the Bill after it has been distributed. I wish to express to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition my appreciation of his consent to this course to-night, and to say to the individual members of the House that I would be very glad if they also would allow the resolution to go, pro forma, through committee, and allow me to give full explanation of the Bill on the motion for leave to introduce it.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee on the resolution, which was reported and agreed to.

Mr. BURRELL thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 103, for the granting of Aid for the Advancement of Agricultural Instruction in the Provinces. He said: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman who now leads this House (Mr. Borden) stated to the people of Canada on August 14, 1911, that if he were placed in charge of the Government of the country he would provide for 'the granting of liberal assistance to the provinces for the purpose of supplementing and extending the work of agricultural education, and for the improvement of agriculture.' The Bill which I am asking leave to introduce is intended to be a prompt and complete fulfilment of that promise.

When introducing a measure for the assistance of agriculture last session, I pointed out that it was impossible to move wisely in such a matter without first having a thorough investigation of the whole subject made by a competent man, and in appointing Dr. C. C. James for this purpose the Government felt they were taking the right step in the direction of a constructive agricultural programme. Since that time Dr. James, whose long experience in agricultural matters and whose wide acquaintance with the men who in Canada are solving agricultural problems peculiarly fitted him for the work, has freely and fully consulted with the various provincial governments and with the men in charge of the various agricultural institutions of the country. His task has been to ascertain in what way the federal authorities could best assist the provinces in strengthening and developing Canada's great basic industry. I have been in constant touch with Dr. James during the past year, and I gladly here bear testimony to the valuable character of his services. It has been customary to follow investigations such as this, or of other kinds, by elaborate reports, more or less valuable, which too often have found a long resting place in the pigeon hole of a department—unacted upon, 'unwept, unhonoured and unsung.' There is a homely old proverb that 'the proof of the pudding is in the eating,' and the result of the work which has been carried on and of the careful thought given to the study of this whole question will be found in the terms of the Bill which I have the honour to introduce to the House.

There has been in the Speech from the Throne a reference to the form which such a measure should take, viz., such assistance to agricultural education as would involve continuity of action, and already there have come to me from the principals of the leading Canadian universities, from the heads of agricultural institutions, and from men holding office in various provincial governments, both Liberal and Conservative, many expressions of sympathetic interest in and approval of the suggested line of action.

It is not necessary in this day and hour to defend or justify generous assistance to agriculture. We all recognize the soundness of such a doctrine. To increase the farmers' output; to improve the conditions of rural life; to swell the numbers of those who till the fields,—to do these things, even in the very attempting of them, we are doing something to solve the greatest problems and avert many of the manifest evils that face us in modern life.

Two problems especially confront us to-day, as they confront other nations: the ever-increasing cost of living, with its heavy burdens, and the increase of urban as against rural population. To analyze their cause is not less difficult than to provide their remedy. Free trade England is not less afflicted in this respect than countries with protective tariffs. The two things are intimately related. Congestion in cities is both an economic and a social menace. The swelling of urban population with a diminution in the ranks of the producers has its sequence in the added cost of living, in the increase of squalor, hunger and crime, and,—in a country to which thousands of immigrants come—in the concentration of large masses of the foreign born, who, when unassimilated and unrelated to our national life, constitute both a political and social difficulty.

In the United States prior to the civil war the urban population was twelve per cent. In 1900 it rose to 31 per cent. To-day it stands at the ominous figure of 46 per cent. In Canada we take a natural pride in our great and growing cities, but we should be poor citizens if we did not try to mitigate and avert the attendant evils which follow undesirable expansion in this direction.

As this question is so intimately related to the purposes and objects of the Bill, I shall venture to give the House the facts and figures as they relate to Canada.

Total population—

1911..	7,204,838

Increase, 34·13 per cent.

	*Eastern Canada.	†Western Canada.
Total population—
1901..	4,725,798	645,517
1911..	5,463,941	1,740,897
Increase	738,143	1,095,380
Per cent	16·	170·
Urban population—
1901..	1,813,832	207,967
1911..	2,599,228	681,216
Increase	785,396	473,249
Per cent	43·3	227·
Rural population—
1901..	2,911,966	437,550
1911..	2,864,713	1,059,681
Decrease	47,253	Incr'se 622,131
Per cent	1·6	149·

It will be noted that the significant fact in these figures is that in spite of the great increase in the rural population of Western Canada there is still a much greater increase in the urban population.

If this process goes on indefinitely where will it land us? Into what danger shall we be plunged? Hunger and want in big cities are tragic enough, but neither so tragic, nor so pitiful, as would be deserted fields and a barren countryside. There can be no health in the cities without corresponding health in the country. To put it in George W. Russell's words: 'Our princes and captains of industry with all they control—the high built factories and titanic mills—might all disappear without man disappearing, but cut away men from the fields and the fruits of the earth and in six months there will be silence in the streets.'

We, then, in this Parliament who are making the laws of the nation may well ask ourselves: in what way can we best solve these questions of great national concern? It will not be denied that the safeguarding of its producing classes is a matter of primary and fundamental importance to the nation. But in regard to the agricultural life of our country it is not alone a betterment of economic conditions that we should aim at, but something finer—the creation of a rural civilization which will at once ensure a fuller and happier life to those in its midst, and prove a source and fount of strength to the state itself.

In so far as this federal Government is concerned, we have come to the conclusion that we can best help on this great work by freely and generously assisting the cause of agricultural education. If we are told that this is an innovation, we answer that it is the people's money, drawn from them, and that it is not only defensible but desirable that such money should be spent in what we believe to be the most efficient way to attain the objects referred to. In choosing education or instruction as a desirable line which federal expenditure should take we are following the best methods of the most progressive countries. Practically no advance was made in agriculture in the great German nation until the system of secondary and elementary agricultural instruction was organized during the second half of the last century.

At the present time in Germany there is no branch of agricultural production for which special facilities for instruction are not provided, and the world knows the results. As to Great Britain the House is aware of the marvellous work of regeneration carried on in Ireland through the Board of Agriculture organized in 1899. Sir Horace Plunkett was its moving spirit. Instruction for the farmers and co-operation were the means then adopted and still carried on so successfully. In 1909 the British Parliament set aside £500,000 a year for five years to give further assistance in England, Scotland and Ireland to agriculture, roads and fisheries. With these funds the Development Commission has been assisting agricultural colleges, encouraging many lines of direct instruction and providing for agricultural research. Denmark is frequently referred to as the most progressive and most prosperous of purely agricultural countries. After being shorn of her rich southern provinces by Prussia, the Danish people determined to make a supreme effort to regain their former position and they have done so through two allied lines of work—co-operation and education.

In Belgium, depletion of soil and emigration of rural population became so serious that the Government in 1885 decided to appoint agricultural supervisors or district agricultural instructors. What has been the result? Briefly it may be summed up thus—increased values of farm lands, remarkable improvement in crop production and a steadying of the rural population. The Belgian Minister of Agriculture reports that since 1885:

Wheat has increased per acre from..	24.54 to 28.55

* Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

† Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, &c.

bushels.

Rye has increased per acre from.. .. ..23.86 to 36.69

Oats has increased per acre from.. .. ..49.79 to 81.48

Barley has increased per acre from.. .. ..38.25 to 57.57

Mr. R. B. Greig in a special report to the Board of Education in England points out that:

Belgian farms produce 10,000,000 pounds more annually than they did twenty-five years ago at a cost for every kind of agricultural education of not more than 40,000 pounds a year. What is now the densest population in Europe is almost supported by the product of its own farms, which yield an average of 20 pounds per annum per acre as compared with less than half from British land.

France for many years has been carrying on a well planned and comprehensive plan of agricultural instruction. I cannot sum up the results better than in the following words from a recent issue of a Canadian weekly journal, the Weekly Sun of the 20th of November, 1912:

Value of Agricultural Education.

If anyone doubts the value of agricultural education when carried directly to the home, the barn and the field of the farmer, he should consider the case of France. Since that country established a practical system of agricultural education fifteen years ago the value of the annual crops has increased by five hundred million dollars.

I would like to point out to the House a notable advance made recently by the United States, and especially because their problems of federal and state jurisdiction are not unlike our own.

Since 1862 Congress has passed six Acts providing for grants to the states for agricultural colleges, experiment stations and various lines of agricultural instruction. During the past fifty years no less than $68,000,000 has been turned over to the states for agricultural investigation and instruction. These grants still continue but they are now inadequate for the demands of carrying instruction direct to the farms and increased appropriations are required.

Last year the introduction of the Page Bill marked a new departure in their attitude to the national question of agriculture. The Page Bill, now in its final stage, provides appropriations approximating twelve million dollars per annum to be apportioned among the states largely for agricultural work but including also technical training. In dealing with this Bill the New York State authorities remarked:

It is recommended that in the development of federal efforts to promote agricultural education the autonomy of the States should be preserved; that established state policies should not be reserved by federal legislation: and that a single centralized control over all states which would lead to bureaucratic regulations should be avoided.

It is added that in the policy adopted, of providing federal funds for agricultural work in the states, the different states should have the same liberty in the application of these funds to the purposes named as they had in the use of their own funds. In the working out of their proposals there is to be co-operation between the state, the state colleges and the federal authorities.

In Canada it is equally desirable that there should be somewhat similar co-operation. We, of course, propose to develop what we may call the direct work of the federal department by assisting and developing the live stock, dairying, fruit growing and other industries along lines of investigation, research, improvement in transportation, markets, and so on, but in respect to funds applied to education we propose to follow what may fairly be termed contitutional lines, using and strengthening the machinery already existing in the provinces, or by them properly established.

The crying need in this country is for men—men who are eminently fitted and trained to teach others. At present in our search for such men we are pursuing the old plan of 'robbing Peter to pay Paul' and there is a continual transfer of the good men from agricultural colleges to departments of agriculture and from the departments back again to the colleges or to other departments. The harvest is plenteous but the labourers are few. It is in a sense one of the great encouragements and one of the proofs of the earnest spirit animating our people at the present time that for every trained, efficient, first-class agriculturist there are half a dozen first-class opportunities for service. There was a time when such men left us for the great republic to the south. We are now drawing such back, and what we have we hold.

It is proposed by the Bill to strengthen all lines of instructional and educational work. The scientific researches of the past half century have revolutionized agriculture, but the full benefits of those researches have not reached the great multitude who to-day till the fields in Canada. Too often the spectacle is witnessed, pathetic and pitiful, or ceaseless, honest, laborious toil, bringing distress of mind and body, and, even after long years, bringing no reward, solely and simply from lack of knowledge and misdirected energy. It has been finely said that:

Where mind co-operates with muscle we get a new kind of man, as compared with the empirical drudge who digs and digs from childhood to death without an idea to redeem his labour and without a hope to realize the solvency of his life. The soil is a great educator. Let men know the reason governing their effort upon it, and every morning breaks brighter; a new motive power enlightens life and the community moves to a higher destiny.

Help given in an educational direction will not only mean better farming, but better farmers and better and happier men and women. The particular form such assistance may take may vary with the special needs and conditions in each province. It will embrace the increasing of the efficiency and equipment of our agricultural colleges; the establishment of agricultural schools, of dairying and horticultural schools of short courses in agriculture; the initiation of agricultural teaching in the public schools and work by travelling qualified instructors. It might well include the valuable educational work carried on by means of demonstration trains, training of teachers in nature study and the invaluable work of domestic science concerned with the women and girls of our communities, whose influence will always constitute one of the most potent forces in solving the problems we are considering.

We restrict the purposes of the Bill to education because by so doing we get at the true basis of successful production. As any educational work to be effective must be continuous, we propose to make the policy cover a period of ten years. From the Consolidated Revenue Fund it is proposed to set apart the sum of ten million dollars to be expended over the period mentioned. $700,000 will be allotted the first year and this amount will be increased by $100,000 annually until 1917, from which year until 1923 $1,100,000 will be provided yearly. The gradual expansion and growing equipment of the provincial organizations will be met in this way more helpfully than by starting at the million mark.

Speaking broadly, we have adhered to the principle of division on a poulation basis. The slight modifications of this principle which have been adopted will, I trust, meet the approval of the House. Thus, in the first place, we set apart $20,000 a year to be divided between such veterinary colleges as grant degrees and come up to a required standard. We do this on the ground that from the character of our federal veterinary work, and for the reason that students to these institutions are drawn from all provinces in Canada, they may be regarded as having a fairly national complexion. On this I shall speak further when the Bill is before the House.

In addition to this $20,000, we propose to allot to each province, regardless of population, the sum of $20,000. It has been urged—not without some reason, that special consideration should be shown to those provinces whose rural population is of large proportions, whose sources of revenue are limited and whose agricultural development greatly needs stimulation.

I might take the far eastern and far western provinces as examples: Prince Edward Island is purely agricultural with no lands, minerals or timber to draw on for revenue. The incessant call of the West has resulted in a continual drain on its population and agricultural development is a matter of the greatest importance. In the case of British Columbia we have a new province of immense area, small as yet in population, only just starting to develop her resources, and where the cost of living is perhaps higher than in any other portion of our Dominion. I might touch the case of other provinces, but the arguments will suffice for the present and we feel there is justification for the step proposed.

With the exceptions mentioned, the amounts allotted will then be divided in proportion to the population and on the basis of the Bill the provinces will share as follows:

	1913.	Yearly Increase.	1917-23.
Prince Edward Island	$26,529 85	$1,306	$31,753 73
New Brunswick	44,509 93	4,902	64,117 87
Alberta	46,094 95	5,219	66,970 91
British Columbia	47,334 76	5,467	69,202 57
Manitoba	51,730 05	6,346	77,114 09
Nova Scotia	54,288 45	6,858	81,719 21
Saskatchewan	54,296 29	6,859	81,733 32
Quebec	159,482 40	27,896	271,068 32
Ontario	195,733 32	35,147	336,319 98

It is provided that if in any year any province is not prepared to use all its grant the unused remainder shall be held by the Dominion for future use by that province, or until such time as it can make a good claim, or show good cause for its payment. If from lack of educational machinery, or for any other reason, any province is not able to submit a satisfactory scheme the Federal Government would be prepared to formulate one for such province's assent.

When at Confederation the Dominion Government took over the main sources of revenue from the provinces it was deemed right to pay to the provinces such cash subsidies as would fairly enable them to carry on their internal administration in respect to education, construction of roads and other matters of local concern. These subsidies have, as the House knows, been increased in recent years and their expenditure has been left entirely to the provinces. In this case we propose a further step, and, while observing a proper constitutional relationship, we propose to exercise a reasonable Dominion supervision over the expenditures which are made possible by a grant voted by Parliament through this Bill. There will be a careful consideration of the agreements to be entered into, and inspection of the work done, and a full report made to Parliament of the whole matter.

We have in mind a general conference each year with representatives from the provinces in order that the work may be co-ordinated, and so avoid duplication between federal and provincial departments. We have in mind also development of a publications office by means of which the people of Canada will be kept continually informed as to agricultural work in progress in all parts of the country. In these ways something like a real co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces will be achieved, provincial rights will be safeguarded and sufficient control will be exercised by this Government over the federal grants. As we earnestly desire to treat this whole matter from an economic and national standpoint, eliminating party politics and party advantage, so also we look to the governments of the provinces to take the same stand and to work with the same ends in view. It is obvious that the success of the whole scheme is dependent on the spirit in which it is approached and operated.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, although the sum provided for under this Bill may at first seem large—and perhaps is sufficiently large for the initiation of the work, it is none too large for the work to be done. If the provinces co-operate with us, as we hope and as we have every reason to expect, it is my conviction that, considering the magnitude of the task, its nature, and considering also the growth of this country, it will be found in a few years that this appropriation will be unequal to the demand. While that may be left for future consideration, I would like to state clearly at this time that I believe this House will, in the not far distant future, be prepared to supplement this appropriation by still larger amounts and that when that time comes the House will consider it from the same standpoint that I ask you now to consider it, viz., that by such a measure we are providing funds for effective and lasting development along right lines of our greatest national asset.

On this side of the House and on that are many men who either know by experience the farm life of our country, or whose fathers or forefathers have toiled on the land. It is well for all to keep in vision that solitary figure in the distant furrow, that stooped form tending the hearth of the isolated home—symbols and types of our national necessities, our national virtues, and our national strength. Here between these four walls we sit year by year making the laws of our country. We do it, amidst much strife, sometimes ill, sometimes well, too often attaching importance and permanence to that which is neither permanent nor important. Our laws would be better—there would be less bitterness in our strife—if we were oftener moved by a sincere desire to lighten the work and brighten the lives of those who, in the silence and solitude of the fields and woods, are doing the foundation work of our common country.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I do not wish to speak on the Bill until I have the pleasure of seeing it. I should like, however, to congratulate the hon. minister on the excellent spirit in which he has introduced his Bill. Those of us who know anything about farming know that, if it is possible to reach the vast majority of farmers with an education, we can vastly increase the product of the land. The difficulty is to reach the farmers; we are not reaching them through the agricultural colleges to any great extent. When a young man comes back from the Agricultural College in Ontario, which is the best we have in Canada, and which is probably as good as there is in any country, he benefits his community, let alone himself. We can see the benefit he derives from the education he receives there in better farming. I do not know what my hon. friend proposes in the way of education to reach the farming population; but I have had an idea that the best way to reach the farmers of this country is by illustrative farms in their immediate neighbourhood. They will not go to the agricultural college except on an excursion once in a while; when they go there, they do not see anything practical except the agricultural college; and they do not learn anything there of a practicable nature. The young fellows who go there do not come back to the farm for some reason; perhaps they take up the teaching profession. A great many of them are town fellows. I want to impress upon the hon. minister that this money will be practically wasted, unless he can reach the agricultural people with that education. We want to catch the ordinary old farmer like myself, the fellow that has to work, and give him some education. Do not go into a lot of theory, but teach him how to make the hens lay better; teach him how to grow a hog up to two hundred pounds in six months; teach him how to make a cow produce ten thousand pounds of milk a year, in place of thirty-five hundred, with practically the same feed; teach him how he can raise fifty, sixty or seventy bushels of barley in place of twenty; and teach him how he can raise thirty bushels of wheat as easily as he can raise fifteen. Compare the average wheat that is produced in Western Canada and the United States with what is produced in England; the farmers in England have been working their land for four or five hundred years, and they beat us nearly double although some of our land is nearly new. If we can teach the ordinary old farmer these things, then we will do some good by the expenditure of this money; if we do not, it is wasted.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I also should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture on his presentation of this Bill. I quite agree with him, as everybody must, as to the importance of the agricultural industry and the desirability of improving the conditions of that industry in so far as can be done. That duty, as he has already said, rests upon hon. members of this Government and of this House as well as on members of provincial governments and legislatures throughout the country. There is a point he mentions that I wish to endorse very strongly; that is the principle of division of this grant amongst the various provinces as an addition to their subsidies and upon the same grounds as their subsidies are based. The revenues of this country have increased very greatly during recent years. Canada is made up of her provinces. It is the people of the provinces, in their capacity as people of the provinces as well as people of the Dominion, from whom these revenues are gained. It has been found in operation to be unfair to the provinces that the fixed subsidy, agreed upon years ago and under former conditions, should be all the share that the provinces severally receive to-day out of these rapidly growing revenues of the Dominion. I think that the principle is good under existing circumstances, when we have the swollen revenues that we have, that there should be means of giving to the provinces some share of that larger revenue, because the very fact that the revenue is larger is evidence that the needs of the several provinces in their administration is greater. I congratulate the minister particularly on that feature of his Bill in which he intends to divide his proposed grant amongst the provinces to some extent in proportion to population and on much the same principle as the provincial subsidies.

In regard to the amount of the grant, I do not think that anyone will quarrel as to whether a million more or a million less is spent, if it is, as my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has suggested, of advantage in improving the condition either of the agricultural industry or of the people who are engaged in that industry. At the same time, I may bring forward the point that the proposal of the hon. minister is not a proposal to grant $10,000,000 in aid of agriculture for use in this present year; it is a proposal, as he has said, to grant $700,000 in aid of agriculture during the coming year. And when he argues against politics being brought into this discussion, I am forced to think—not that I complain in any degree—that my hon. friend has been moved somewhat by political considerations in bringing forward a spectacular proposition to provide $10,000,000 when he is only going to spend $700,000, in the coming year. I hope he will forgive me for taking that view. But when he exhorts us so eloquently to keep politics out of this discussion, I may be permitted to have the opinion that politics had something to do with the form in which this proposal has been submitted to the House. However, that is a detail we certainly will not quarrel about. If my hon. friend is desirous of introducing his resolution in a spectacular manner, I can only say I think it is well that it should be done that way, in order to better attract the attention of the agricultural community and the country generally to the possibilities that may arise out of this increased expenditure on behalf of agriculture. But, having sought that advantage himself, he must not complain if we also take, perhaps, a political view of that feature of the question. My hon. friend and the House are aware, of course, that a proposal of some importance to the agricultural community of Canada formed a part of the policy of the late Government and was an issue in the late election; and he will pardon me, I am sure, if I point out that the agricultural community of the three prairie provinces —I state facts within the knowledge of the country and of members of this House —would have profited by the success of that policy on last year's operations alone to the amount, not of $1,000,000 but of $10,000,000, the amount that is proposed by this spectacular proposition to appropriate for the benefit of agricultural education throughout the whole Dominion during the period of ten years. The amount that it is proposed to appropriate to the benefit of agriculture throughout the whole Dominion for a period of ten years would have been secured and enjoyed by one section of that agricultural community by the operations of one year under the proposal to give them access to their adjacent and then open markets.

Mr. WILCOX: How does my hon. friend figure that out?

Mr. OLIVER: It was figured out last year. My hon. friend will find it in 'Hansard.'

Mr. HENDERSON: The people did not figure it out that way.

Mr. OLIVER: The people immediately concerned did. Give them a chance, and you will see.

Mr. HENDERSON: They did not show it in Macdonald.

Mr. OLIVER: The man who said he was in favour of reciprocity in Macdonald was either put in jail or threatened to be put in jail. However, referring to the argument as to the importance of the agricultural community and the importance of improving the conditions of that community so eloquently and ably presented by the Minister of Agriculture in support of his proposal to appropriate the sum of $700,000 for expenditure on agricultural projects for this year, I would draw attention to this further matter for the purpose of emphasizing the point—and I wish to bring it very strongly to his attention—that the duty of the Government of Canada to the agricultural community of Canada is not discharged in full even by this appropriation, no matter how well he may expend it. I have every confidence that under his Administration it will be a useful expenditure. But the Government of Canada, this or any other government, has a duty and responsibility to the agricultural population that is not discharged by a grant of $700,000 or, if you like, of $7,000,000 in any single year. It is their duty to see to it that the producers of Canada have opportunities to reach the best market that can be secured for their products. And if the Government will do that, if they will secure to the producers of Canada access to their best markets under all circumstances, the producers of Canada can afford to dispense even with the liberal and desirable aid that my hon. friend is proposing under this Bill. I agree entirely with the terms my hon. friend has used in speaking of the agricultural population of the country as an important part of the country. But, knowing this population very well, I would like it to be understood on their behalf that they are not people to be carried on the back of anybody or of any proposal; that the agricultural population of Canada, speaking at large, is Canada. And it is not a matter of supplying even veterinary colleges, it is not a matter of teaching the people how to fatten hogs; it is a matter of giving the intelligent, industrious, enterprising, persistent agricultural population of Canada opportunity for their own development to benefit themselves by their own business; that is the first and greatest duty of this or any government of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, January 27, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

Mr. BURNHAM moved:

That in pursuance of the resolution of the House passed 10th December last authorizing the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the old age pension system, the following named members constitute such committee: Messrs. Bradbury, Buchanan, Burnham, Carroll, Crocket, Currie, Guthrie, Jameson, Macdonald, Mondou, Verville, White, (Leeds).

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand this motion is rendered necessary by some oversight which omitted the names that were intended to be embodied in the motion when it passed the House.

Mr. BORDEN: Are these the names that were in the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—REPORTED.

Bill No. 13, to incorporate the General Loan Company of Canada.—Mr. Knowles.

CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe) moved second reading of Bill No. 90, respecting the Central Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend kindly explain the nature of the Bill?

Mr. BENNETT: The Central Railway is a railway for which a charter was granted a good many years ago, and is now held by the present promoters. It is intended that the road shall run from Montreal to Midland on the Georgian Bay. The president of the company is Senator Owens, and Mr. C. N. Armstrong is, I think, one of the active members of the company. These gentlemen have, I understand, an assurance of capital in the Old Country, and hope to continue the work of construction at the earliest possible date.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has any construction been begun?

Mr. BENNETT: Some construction has already been done.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 85, respecting the Board of Management of the Church and Manse Building Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, for Manitoba and the Northwest, and to change its name to The Church and Manse Board.—Mr. Sharpe (Lisgar).

Bill No. 92, to incorporate the Metropolitan Mortgage Corporation.—Mr. Meighen.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INVESTIGATIONS OF POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. What commissioners, if any, appointed by the Government are holding investigations into acts of political partisanship?
2. How long will such investigating commissioners continue?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Department of Customs: There are no investigations into acts of political partisanship being now held by any such commissioner, so far as customs officers are concerned.

Department of Inland Revenue: Zephir Normandin, Esq., investigating charge of political partisanship against Joseph Omer Bousquet, excise officer, in the Montreal division.

Department of Marine and Fisheries: Mr. H. P. Duchemin, 8 outstanding; Mr. W. F. H. Carvell, 4 outstanding; Mr. E. T. C. Knowles, 1 outstanding.

Post Office Department: The work of these investigators is not permanent. They are specially appointed in each case, and required to act from time to time when an investigation becomes necessary.

Department of Public Works: J. G. H. Bergeron, W. F. H. Carvell, H. P. Duchemin, P. J. Jolicœur, E. T. C. Knowles, N. U. Lacasse, C. W. Lane, J. W. G. Morrison, Geo. C. Wright.

Department of Railways and Canals: Chas. W. Lane, James McDonald, E. T. C. Knowles, H. P. Duchemin, Hazen Adair, Victor Allard, H. Tucker, N. Marceau, W. L. Shurtleff, G. H. Pettit, H. H. Ferguson, H. Carvell, W. H. Moore, J. G. H. Bergeron, Zephir Normandin, J. V. Payette.

1. Department of Public Printing and Stationery: W. J. Code.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery: Until all charges presented are investigated.

2. Department of Customs: The continuance of investigating commissioners for the customs will depend on circumstances, as cases arise.

Department of Inland Revenue has not yet reported.

Department of Marine and Fisheries: The continuance of investigating commissioners for the Marine will depend on circumstances, as cases arise.

Department of Public Works: As long as their services are required.

Department of Railways and Canals: Their services will be continued until such investigations are no longer required.

HOUSE OF COMMONS MESSENGERS.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. What are the names of the messengers of the House of Commons?
2. What is the date of their entry into the service respectively?

Mr. BORDEN:

Permanent messengers:—Boutet, A., 1901; Ebbs, T., 1905; Fortin, L. D., 1909; Hugg, C., 1885; Moreau, L., 1905; Morin E., 1908; Stewart, T., 1896.

INVESTIGATION RE JOSEPH L'ETOILE.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Does the Government know that an inquiry held at Ste. Louise, county of L'Islet, in July last, regarding Joseph L'Etoile, then a watchman on the Intercolonial and since removed, is said to have been held without notice given said Joseph L'Etoile?
2. That the latter, as alleged, protested and demanded a few hours to find a defender, that this privilege was refused him and that the inquiry was held without an hour's delay or notice?
3. That the said L'Etoile was not allowed to cross-question the witnesses?

4. Was Doctor Paquet, member for L'Islet, present at this inquiry?

5. If so, does the Government know how he had been informed, that the inquiry would take place on the day when it was held?

6. Can the Government explain how it happened that the witness for the prosecution against L'Etoile had been reported as notified that the inquiry would be held on the above mentioned day, while L'Etoile, it is said, had received no notice of it?

7. Has a successor to L'Etole been officially appointed since that time?

8. Does the Government know, that there is said to be kept regularly in his place since July last a person named Charles Castonguay, who, as alleged, had no experience of the work to be done, that the said Castonguay is above the age fixed by law or the regulations, that he cannot either read or write, and that he is said to be absolutely incapable of passing an examination?

9. Does the Government know that no representative of the Association of the Employees of the Intercolonial Brotherhood was present at the said inquiry on account of the failure of notice?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Inquiry was held, in the case of Joseph L'Etoile, by divisional superintendent McDonald, for L'Islet on July 11, last and report sent to general superintendent on the 17th of the same month. L'Etoile was notified two days ahead by telegram through agent at Ste. Louise and again by telephone the day previous.

2. L'Etoile protested and wanted the investigation postponed for eight days and to await the return of Hon. J. E. Caron, from Magdalen Islands, to defend him at the inquiry. This was refused, as instructions from general superintendent were to lose no time in proceeding with the investigation and be thorough.

3. L'Etoile was not refused permission to cross question witnesses, but he wanted to prevent them from speaking, which he was not permitted to do. He was told he would be given fair play, and to bring his witnesses, but he would not do so.

4. Dr. Paquet, member for L'Islet, was present at the inquiry.

5. As requested by general superintendent, divisional superintendent McDonald informed Dr. Paquet of the day on which the inquiry would be held.

6. Dr. Paquet gave the names of the witnesses, and it was he who informed them to be present at the investigation. L'Etoile was notified by the agent at Ste. Louise, as stated in No. 1 above.

7. Charles Castonguay was employed on probation in the usual way.

8. Charles Castonguay has been employed in the place since July last. The position which is one of track labourer, does not require experience. The limit of age for employment of inexperienced persons is thirty-five years. Charles Castonguay attained the age of thirty-five years in July last. He is able to read and write and passed a satisfactory medical examination.

9. There was no representative of the brotherhood present at the investigation.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Has the Government been made aware of the following article appearing in the Ottawa Citizen on the 24th day of October, 1912?

Montreal, October 23.—It was announced to-day that plans are being prepared for a mass meeting to be held in the Monument National or some other large hall, the object of which will be to draw the attention of the Federal Government to the necessity for immediate action to reduce the high cost of living in the country generally and in Montreal particularly.

Alderman Blumenthal declared to-day that investigation which had been quietly carried out lately by a number of those who are behind the proposition, have disclosed extraordinary revelations in connection with the storage of food in the cold storage plants of the city.

In one refrigerating plant alone, it is said, there are 15,000 tons of meat, while in other foodstuffs have been accumulating for the past three or four months until now there is hardly room between the ground floor and the roof for a case of eggs.

There is enough food in the cold storage houses and refrigerating plants of Montreal to feed the whole population of Canada for six months, was the declaration of Alderman Blumenthal.

In every storage plant in the city there is hardly space left for another ton of goods. Eggs, cheese, butter, meat, fish, practically every foodstuff is being held by a huge trust which controls the various plants. The goods are being hoarded until there is a scarcity during the winter months when they will be put on the market at high prices.

2. What steps, if any, has the Government taken to inquire into the increased cost of high living and reduce the same?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. No.

2. It was thought that perhaps the hon. member asking this question desired to learn 'the steps if any, the Government had taken to inquire into the increased cost of living.' But as he insists upon an answer to the question in its present form, it must be said that the term 'increased cost of high living' is too indefinite to permit of a definite answer.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—SPUR LINE AT DORCHESTER.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. How many steamers have been loaded or unloaded with freight at the railway wharf, so-called, at Dorchester, N.B., in connection with the spur line of the Intercolonial railway at that port, since the opening of navigation in the spring of 1911, to the present date, and how many schooners, ships, barges, scows or other vessels during the same period?

2. What quantity of freight, and how many carloads of such freight, has or have been shipped to and from said wharf over the Intercolonial railway in connection with the shipments by or from said steamers or other vessels, and what amount of money in the way of freight rates was paid to the Intercolonial railway in connection therewith during that period?

3. Was the work in connection with such shipments under the supervision and charge of the station agent at Dorchester, and did he have any assistant to aid him in connection therewith? If so, whom and what did it cost the railway for such assistance during that period?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Three steamers; twenty-nine schooners and three scows have been loaded. Unloaded twenty-four steamers; ten schooners and thirty-two scows. Total one hundred and one.

2. Freight shipped 84,817 tons; 2,048 carloads, freight charges were $24,272.39; freight received 15,712 tons; 370 cars; freight charges, $4,189.17.

3. The work in connection with such shipments was under the supervision of the agent at Dorchester and he did not have any assistant to aid him in connection therewith.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CARS AND LOCOMOTIVES.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. How many box, refrigerator or other freight cars were in use on the Intercolonial railway on the 31st day of December, 1912, and what was the number of each particular class or kind?

2. How many of these cars, with the number of class and kind, were Intercolonial cars belonging to the railway?

3. How many Intercolonial freight cars, with the number of each particular kind and class, were in use on that date on other Canadian railways, or railways in the United States, or were on such date in possession of such railways, respectively?

4. How many freight cars of other Canadian railways, with the number of each class and kind, and the railway which owned or claimed them, were in use on or in the possession of the Intercolonial railway on the 31st day of December, 1912?

5. How many freight cars in the United States railways, with the names of the railways which owned or claimed them, and the number of each class and kind, were in use on or in the possession of the Intercolonial railway on the 31st day of December, 1912?

6. What was the number of freight cars, with the number of each particular class and kind, owned by the Intercolonial railway on the 31st day of December, 1912, and how many of each kind respectively, were in commission and in use, or fit to be used, on that date, and how many of each, respectively, were disabled or undergoing repairs at that date?

7. Have any new cars been constructed at the Intercolonial railway shops during the year 1912? If so, how many, with class and kind, and are any now under construction there? If so, how many?

8. Have any new locomotives been constructed at the railway works in Moncton during the past year? If so, how many?

9. Are any now under construction at said works? If so, how many?

Detailed statement filed by the Minister of Railways with the Clerk of the House.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—TRAIN TICKET AGENTS.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. How many ticket agents or train agents, so-called, are in the employ of the Intercolonial railway, engaged in collecting tickets and fares or attending to a portion of the work formerly performed by the conductors of the railway, on the trains of the Intercolonial, on what divisions of the railway, on what trains are they so employed, what are their names and what salary is paid each respectively, and what was the occupation of each such train agent respectively, previous to their employment by the railway in this particular work?

2. What salaries or wages are paid per month to the conductors employed and engaged, respectively, on the trains where such train agents are also so employed?

3. What have been the results secured by the employment of such train agents, and what advantage has accrued to the railway by reason of such train agents on the Intercolonial?

4. Have any particular results been thereby demonstrated on the eastern division of the railway? If so, in what direction, and has there been, as a result, any financial gains in the matter of passenger fares or earnings on that portion of the railway? If so, to what extent?

5. Can any particular details be given or results set forth as to the financial or other gains and benefits accruing to the railway, or to the conserving of its receipts and earnings, by reason of the creating of these offices of train agents and the engagement of such officials, in addition to the conductors necessarily employed on the same trains?

6. What has been the total cost of the engagement of such train agents, since the inauguration of the system to the present date, or what is the total amount paid to these officials in wages and in expenses to the present date respectively?

2. If so, what are his duties and what is his salary?

Mr. REID:

1. Auguste Desjardins, of St. Denis, P.Q., is employed as an acting preventive officer of customs.

2. His duties are to aid in the prevention of smuggling. His salary is $400 a year.

WALL BOARD IMPORTATIONS.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew):

1. How much, if any, of Sackett plaster board, or other manufactured wall board, having gypsum as a base, has been imported into Canada each year during the past ten years?

2. How much, if any, manufactured hollow tiles or partition blocks, having gypsum as a base, has been imported into Canada each year during the past ten years?

3. How much, if any, hard wall plaster or plaster cement, manufactured, having gypsum as a base, has been imported into Canada each year during the past ten years?

4. How much, if any, scagliola or imitation marble manufactured or prepared, having gypsum as a base, has been imported into Canada each year during the past ten years?

Mr. REID: The information asked for in this inquiry is not available in the classified reports of imports. The articles mentioned are not specified in the customs tariff, and are not classified by themselves in the customs statistical returns, being included with other manufactures covered by a common tariff item.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY OFFICIALS.

Mr. RHODES:

1. Is the Government aware that proceedings have been taken in the State of New York against the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, for failing to extend their lines in New England or in other parts of the United States?
2. What is the nature of such proceedings?
3. When is it expected that they will be brought to a conclusion?
4. What are the obligations and responsibilities of the said two railway companies under the contracts and statutes providing for the construction of the National Transcontinental railway?
5. To what extent, if any, will those obligations or responsibilities be probably affected by the pending proceedings in the courts of the United States?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. The Government is informed that proceedings have been taken in the state of New York but understands that such proceedings are against officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

2. The Government has no exact information but understands that the proceedings have been taken by way of indictment for alleged contravention of the laws of the United States respecting the regulation and control of railways.

3. The Government has no information on the subject.

4. The obligations and responsibilities of the companies are set forth in the contractual and statutory provisions which are embodied in chapter 71 of the Acts of 1903 entitled 'An Act respecting the Construction of a National Transcontinental Railway' and chapter 24 of the Acts of 1904 entitled 'An Act to Amend the National Transcontinental Railway Act.' Both companies are also subject to the provisions of the general statutes of Canada relating to railways under federal jurisdiction, that is to say, chapter 58 of the Acts of 1903 entitled 'An Act to Amend and Consolidate the Law respecting the Railways' and the various Acts since passed by Parliament in amendment thereof. By the contract and amending contract which were ratified by the Acts of 1903 and 1904 above mentioned the Grand Trunk Railway Company assumed obligations in respect of the construction of the western division of the National Transcontinental railway; and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company undertook the construction of that division within a stated period, which has since been extended. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company also undertook to operate the eastern division of the said railway under lease from the Government for a period of fifty years upon the terms set forth in the contracts and confirming statutes. Among other important obligations of the company are those contained in sections 42 and 43 of the contract of 1903, which are as follows:

42. It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the Government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

43. The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely,—the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

5. The Government has no information at present that they will be in any way affected. The Grand Trunk Railway Company holds the capital stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and controls the undertaking of the last named company. The Government recognizes its duty to take all appropriate and available steps for the purpose of preventing any violation or disregard of the provisions of the above mentioned contracts and statutes, whether by diversion of traffic from Canadian ports and routes or by any such undue or improper diversion of the companies' resources as would delay or interfere with the completion and operation of the National Transcontinental railway in accordance with the companies' obligations to the people of Canada.

OTTAWA FEDERAL DISTRICT.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Has the Government considered the proposal of making a federal district out of Ottawa?

Mr. BORDEN: Memorials have been presented to the Government advocating such proposals, but the subject has not been considered by the Government.

FUR FARMING.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to have prepared and issued in the near future by some one of the departments, of the Government, a pamphlet or treatise relating to the propagation of fur bearing animals in captivity in Canada?

2. Is the Government aware that a pamphlet or treatise bearing on the same subject has recently been issued by the Quebec Government through its Department of Colonization?

Mr. BORDEN: The Government has not yet given consideration to this subject, which seems more especially to appertain to the provinces. The Government will be glad to co-operate in any reasonable and proper way for the purpose of disseminating useful information on this or any other important subject of general concern.

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY.

Mr. PROULX:

1. How many tenders were received by the Post Office Department for the proposed rural mail delivery service between L'Orignal, Cassburn, Henry, McAlpine, Caledonia Springs and Ritchance?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

1. Has Mr. Lemay, postmaster at Hebertville, Ste. Croix du Lac à la Croix, been dismissed?

2. If so, for what reason, on whose request and on what date?

Mr. PELLETIER: 1 and 2. A re-arrangement of the mail service giving an improved services to this district having been directed by the Postmaster General, it was considered advisable to change the location, also changing the names of the Lac Sec and Lac a la Croix post offices. Changes in the postmasters of both these offices were made, therefore, at the same time. The transfer of the Lac Sec post office from Mr. A. Lemay to the new postmaster took effect on the 21st June, 1912.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

1. Has Joseph Hébert, postmaster at Normandin, county of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, been dismissed?

2. If so, what date, at whose request and for what reason?

Mr. PELLETIER: 1 and 2. Mr. J. B. Herbert was not postmaster at Normandin. His appointment was at one time contemplated, but was never carried out.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

1. Has Mr. S. Larouche, postmaster at St. Henri de Taillon, county of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, been dismissed?

2. If so, for what reason, on what date and at whose request?

Mr. PELLETIER: 1 and 2. No, the postmaster of Taillon, not St. Henri de Taillon, was dismissed. He tendered his resignation, which was accepted by the department.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

2. If so, what was the reason, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. For political partisanship, on recommendation of Postmaster General.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Has Miss Josephine Rodrigue, of Portneuf, county of Portneuf, been dismissed as lightkeeper? If so, for what reason?
2. Who has replaced her, what is his name, his age and at what salary?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes; intemperate habits and inattention to duty.

Mr. ROGERS.

2. Mr. Edmond Paradis, 36 years, $320 per annum, rising by annual increments of $15 to a maximum of $380.

ALGOMA STEEL COMPANY.

Sir WILFRD LAURIER moved:

For a copy of all applications addressed to the Government by the Algoma Steel Company for remission of duties on rails imported by the said company at Fort William; of all correspondence on the same, of all evidence sought and obtained by the Government and supplied by the company in support of its application; and of all Orders in in Council ordering such remission of duties.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): May I ask the hon. Minister of Finance if the return required by the statute in connection with any remission of duty has been laid before Parliament? I think that such a report must have been made within fifteen days after the opening of Parliament.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I am unable to say at the present moment, but I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC RAILWAY, LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER COMPANY.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence in connection with the issue of letters patent to the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat, and Power Company, Limited, and also of said letters patent.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the French financial papers have been stating freely that a loss of 17,860,000 francs has been incurred by the unfortunate French investors who have put their money into this undertaking. I state now what the financial papers in France have been repeating from week to week for many months; I am not myself taking the responsibility for these statements. The Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company, better known as the Quebec merger, was organized, I believe, in December, 1909. Its object was to absorb the several companies which had been engaged for some years in the exploitation of the various public utilities in Quebec, such as the tramway service in the city and suburbs, the light and heat service, and the generation of electrical energy in Quebec and its immediate vicinity. The companies which were to be absorbed by the Quebec merger were: the Quebec-Jacques Cartier Company, the Frontenac Gas Company, the Quebec Gas Company, the Quebec Railway, Light and Heat Company, and the Canadian Electric Light Company. These various companies were bonded to the extent of $3,959,000 and there was standing as common stock for these companies $4,612,500, making a total of $8,571,500. The Quebec merger took hold of these various concerns, but did not absorb them, legally speaking; the Quebec merger being what is termed a holding company. However, the companies were floated at a capital in the neighbourhood of $10,879,100, which was an inflation of $2,307,600 on the $8,571,500 which represented the bonds and common stock of the companies named. The issue for the Quebec merger was launched on the French market. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have at various times said in this House, notably at the end of last session, that if we cannot expect a large immigration from France because the French people do not emigrate, or, if they do, they emigrate to Argentine or some of the Southern countries, we can at least expect from France, which has been called the banker of bankers, a large amount of capital for the promotion of Canadian undertakings. There is an enormous amount of money in that French reservoir, and, provided the schemes are legitimate, provided honesty is at the basis of each enterprise, we can expect to have the good will of the French financiers and their participation in Canadian development. Not long ago, one of the most distinguished statesmen in France, Mr. Gabriel Hanotaux, who for many years—no, not for many years but for many months, because the ministries do not last long in France—was minister in the Government of France, speaking at a dinner of the Comité-France-Amérique, said: 'As regards the financial relations of France with Canada, give us the maximum security and you will receive in return the maximum of confidence on our part.'

The Quebec merger was launched on the French market, and various subsidiary enterprises were also launched, all under the auspices of the Quebec merger. There was not only the Quebec merger proper, but there were various enterprises launched under its auspices, such as the Quebec and Saguenay railway, the Quebec and Eastern railway, to mention only two of the issues which were taken up unfortunately by the French investors. The result has been simply appalling; the name of Canada has been besmirched in France, and it will take years and years before the good name and reputation of the Dominion stands as high among the financial men of France as it should stand in the eyes of the financiers of all countries. The French Government has ordered an investigation, but before I reach that point, let me say that the French bondholders—they bought the bonds of the Quebec merger to the extent of 17,860,000 francs on false representations made in the various prospectuses for the different enterprises that were launched—these innocent victims, formed what I might call a vigilance committee, and they sent here one of the most experienced engineers, Mr. Paul Gaudin, who came to Canada last year and made a lengthy report to the bondholders on his return to France. I cannot read the whole of that report; because it is too long and I cannot even analyse it, because it is too intricate. I believe, knowing as I do the honesty of purpose of the Prime Minister, that he will conclude that justice can be meted out only after the fullest investigation by a special committee of this House has been obtained. In my opinion, special accountants and auditors should take hold of the whole matter and report to the Government. Let me quote just one paragraph of that report:

> The Quebec Light Heat and Power Company has not absorbed its subsidiary companies, as published, in spite of the specifications of its charter. It has only, in its quality of holding company assumed the control of these controlled companies in conformity with the terms of its charter. In view of that fact, the Quebec Railway Light Heat and Power Company has placed with the trustees a stock of these bonds not in exchange of the old titles—which is unrealizable—but to cover the initial bonds which fact—according to Mr. Gaudin—has given quite a different classification to the two groups of bonds.

This, according to Mr. Gaudin, has given quite a different classification to the two groups of bonds. In a word, the unfortunate French bondholders have a moral guarantee that the titles they hold are good for something; but the original companies have covered their mortgages on their various holdings of Quebec. As a matter of fact, the French investors ranked only in second order; they have no other guarantee. This explains why the stock, which was inflated on the French market during a little breeze, has fallen down to practically nothing in the last few months.

Mr. Gaudin in his report condemns a series of works which was undertaken by the board of administration which controlled the Quebec merger. He says that this series of works was partly undertaken during the last Dominion elections, and he condemns the works as being utterly futile, to use his own words. Besides that, he condemns a series of private speculations which took place out of the money of the unfortunate French bondholders. He says that dividends were declared which were not earned, as is clearly established in his report. He also arraigns the Quebec merger, which originally was simply a tramway company exploiting the public utilities of Quebec, for having extended its field of operation to the river Saguenay, and from the river Saguenay to the lake St. John district, by the construction of the Quebec and Saguenay railway which had nothing to do with the Quebec and Eastern railway. On the prospectus of one of the bond issues at least, the name of a minister of the Crown appears. I am quite sure that the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) and the Prime Minister would certainly not condone such an action on the part of a Minister of the Crown. Engineer Gaudin made his report on the 26th of August, 1912. The bondholders decided to refer the whole matter to an organization which exists in every European country, the National Association for the Protection of French Investors in Foreign Securities. This association has an international character; it works at times conjointly with a similar organization in Great Britain; it is organized with the object of protecting the French investors, the British investors, the German investors against foreign schemes. This Association would not take up a matter of that kind unless it were amply justified in doing so. On the 7th of December, 1912, a meeting was held in France at the Hotel Continental; 1229 French bondholders who had been mulcted in this Quebec merger were represented. Mr. A. Machart, president of the National Association, made a lengthy report, which I expect has reached my right hon. friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. BORDEN: No report has reached me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No report has reached the Prime Minister. I have read the report three or four times; it is published in every financial paper of France; it has been reproduced in some of the Canadian papers. This matter constitutes one of the darkest chapters of frenzied finance in Canada. Mr. A. Machart's position in France and in Europe is equivalent to that of a minister of Finance, equivalent to that of the governor of the Banque of France. He generally works under the orders of the French Government. I will read only the conclusion of the report of Mr. Machart, and I sincerely hope the right hon. gentleman and the Minister of Finance will take cognizance of that most important report. After having analyzed the frenzied finance of the Quebec merger, he says:

The National Association will not fail to call the attention of the Canadian Government to the importance of the French interests involved in this transaction in case the bondholders will be compelled to ask its intervention.

Since this report has been published, the French Government—a friendly government. I may say, and even if it were not friendly it should be treated in a friendly way—has appointed two judges to investigate the various undertakings launched in the French financial market under the auspices of the Quebec merger. I have nothing more to add, Mr. Speaker, and shall await the production of the correspondence and documents mentioned. In the interests not only of the investors who have lost money in these undertakings, but of the poor widows and orphans who met in September last asking the French Government to intervene, and requesting the French ambassador in London to see that the proper authorities would take action, for the sake of decency and the honour of Canada and the province of Quebec, I sincerely trust that the Government will investigate the whole matter.

Mr. BORDEN: There is no reason whatever why the documents asked for by this motion should not be brought down, and this will be done in due course. I cannot see for the moment, however, that they will throw very much light on the matters referred to by my hon. friend. I have not seen the reports he has alluded to, nor do I know anything of the circumstances under which the investments he mentions were made. If any representations are made to us by the association or committee he mentions, or by the French Government, they will receive such consideration as is possible in view of the position of this Government in relation to such an undertaking. It is, of course, manifestly impossible that any federal or provincial government can undertake to guarantee investments made in Canada by the people of our own country, and I do not see that they are in a position to go further in that regard in respect of investments made in a foreign country. Apart from that, however, there may be features inviting the attention of the Government, and, should they be placed before us, they will receive such attention as is proper under the circumstances.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to thank my right hon. friend for the manner in which he has received this motion. Might I be allowed to read what I said last year at the end of the session in discussing with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce the question of the appointment of a commercial agent in Paris to succeed Mr. Poindron, who had acted for the Canadian Government for several years. I had directed the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that there were some good reasons why an agent should be appointed, and I said on that occasion:

Now, I come back to the point at issue. If we cannot expect to get the large immigration from France that we receive from other countries, we can reasonably expect to participate in its enormous wealth. The French capitalist is satisfied with a low rate of interest, lower than he can get in Canada. The rate of interest the French capitalist can obtain in Canada, is a revelation to him. That explains why, during the last few years, so large an amount of French capital has been invested in Canadian business enterprises. I find that the total investments of French capital in Canada amount to $70,750,000 invested in manufacturing, industrial enterprises, mines, lands, mortgages, railways, sesurities, municipal and school bonds, as against Belgium, $811,673,000, as against Germany, $30,725,000, and as against Holland, $11,000,000. Now, I repeat that although we cannot expect to have a considerable French immigration into Canada, nevertheless we have during the last fifteen years been able to capture our small share of French immigrants. During the last ten years 17,000 Frenchmen have voluntarily left their country to settle in Canada. They belong to the high class of immigrants, they are men of means.

I think we can confidentially expect to receive yearly a still greater amount of French capital when our business men have become better acquainted with the peculiarities of the French trade, when our business enterprises become better known in France, and our country generally has been better advertised in Paris and the other large French cities. From that point of view alone we should seek to have in Paris a commercial agent who would be for the French people what I might call—perhaps the expression is too classical for the subject—a financial mentor, a man who will give ample and reliable information to the French business men, a man who would put himself and keep 'au courant' with the French financial interests generally. The other day I remember, in a lecture given in Ottawa by my hon. friend Mr. Wallace Nesbitt, he pointed out that the great trouble in Europe to-day, and especially in Great Britain, is that there are too many adventurers who are actually injuring the good reputation of Canada in foreign financial circles. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are too many fakirs on the financial market of Great Britain. Any promoter can finance an enterprise in London—and it is very strange to find John Bull, with his keen business ability, being so easily entrapped and snared by these fake promoters.

I did not then anticipate, Mr. Speaker, that Jacques Bonhomme—not John Bull—would be snared and entrapped by the sharks who went from Canada to Paris, and who have caused the French investors to lose the enormous sum of 17,260,000 francs.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all correspondence and other papers in connection with a proposed guarantee of bonds to the Quebec and Saguenay railway.

He said: Unfortunately my tale of woe is not completed. The Quebec and Saguenay is a dear child—not of mine—but it has often filed an appearance in the House during the last few weeks. I have kept on putting questions to my genial friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), asking him if he intended to guarantee the bonds of the Quebec and Saguenay railway. My hon. friend, with his usual courtesy, has always answered that nothing had been done, until lately I was informed by him that a party of engineers had been sent on the uncompleted portion of the Quebec and Saguenay, and that an oral report had been made to him. I shall not anticipate what that report is because I have a motion on the paper which will give the minister an opportunity of filing that report, but I know that the gentlemen who are behind this Quebec and Saguenay are hard at work; they are surrounding my hon. friend, I shall not say day and night but very late at night in order to obtain that guarantee of bonds which, under present circumstances, would help them so much. I presume my hon. friend has resisted so far, although I am not sure. I hope he has resisted, I hope he will be moved by the spirit and will evict those who are trying to lead him into temptation. If, perchance, my hon. friend does not know the history of the Quebec and Saguenay, I shall try to educate him in that respect and in that respect alone. The Quebec and Saguenay railway is an off-shot of the Quebec merger. The bonds of the Quebec and Saguenay were issued, of course, in France—too many people in Canada knew that the enterprise was risky, but with a brilliant prospectus and with what we call a tour de passe-passe, or what you call in English, a léger de main, the Quebec and Saguenay became quite an important affair on the French market not so very long ago. It is, as I stated, issued under the auspices of the Quebec merger—and remember that the Quebec merger is a little tramway in the city of Quebec and its suburbs. This line covers a distance of fifty-six miles from St. Joachim to Murray bay. Twenty-six thousand bonds were sold on the French market as part of the merger system itself. The French people, reading the prospectus, were led to believe that the bonds were guaranteed by the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company, a good enough enterprise by itself. According to the prospectus issued, the line is supposed to run from St. Joachim, in the county of Montmorency, where during the last election were displayed long streamers with the words, 'Long Live the Quebec merger.' It runs from St. Joachim to Murray bay, a distance of fifty-six and a half miles. The estimated cost, according to the prospectus, was to be $31,197 per mile, a very respectable cost. As a matter of fact, the cost of the part of the road that has been built is $52,000 per mile and according to the very eminent engineer who was sent to Canada last summer to investigate quietly how the investments of the French people fared in Canada, it will cost in the neighbourhood of $62,000 per mile, so there is quite a margin between the figures advertised in the prospectus and the bill that somebody will have to foot in the long run. There were also other inaccuracies in that prospectus. By the way, I am not sure if on that prospectus the name of my hon. friend, my bosom friend, the Postmaster General, appeared. It did appear, however, on the prospectus of the Quebec Eastern railway, did it not?

Mr. PELLETIER: Oh, no, I never heard of it appearing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, I shall read it in a moment. There were other inaccuracies in the prospectus. For instance, the French capitalists were told that this beautiful railway, starting from Quebec and skirting the rugged coast of the county of Charlevoix, would reach the famous spot, Murray bay, where President Taft has his summer residence and also ex-President Roosevelt. If there ever was a parting of the ways between truth and lies this is the case. I have been myself a summer resident at Murray bay for many years. It is quite true that Mr. Taft, before he was President, had a very modest villa on the coast of Murray bay, but when this issue was placed on the French market, the villa had been sold, and Mr. Taft as President of the United States was living in that other villa, the White House at Washington. As regards ex-President Roosevelt, we know where he had his summer villa; it was at Mombasa, when he was lion hunting in Africa, and not on the rugged coast of the river St. Lawrence. However, the French people are quite impressionable, and a prospectus in which they read the names of President Taft and ex-President Roosevelt, would immediately strike their imagination. There were other inaccuracies. It was stated that the line was going to pay, and, according to the prospectus, the probable revenues were estimated at $482,350 a year. Now, everybody knows, and no one more than my hon. friend the Postmaster General, that the coast of Charlevoix county is practically a barren coast. There is a very small population, and, except in summer, there are very few travellers, tourists at that, who do not travel on a railway, but desire to be away from railways. They travel on board the steamers of the Richelieu and Ontario Company. It is part of their sport to take a jaunt on the river St. Lawrence on board a steamer, and not to travel on the cars of any railway company. I know many tourists who spend the summer at Murray bay, and last year they raised a row because the municipal council had erected poles for electric light. They said they did not visit the shores of the St. Lawrence in summer to see poles and electric light; they even did not want to see automobiles in the lanes or on the highways. They came there for rest, and they were flying as far as possible from all the luxuries which modern civilization affords in American cities. Therefore, when one considers the character of the population in the county of Charlevoix, the revenues of the company, as stated in that prospectus, so far as the travelling public is concerned, were simply ridiculous. In winter time the people who are mostly farmers do not travel, and, if they do travel, the Government has provided for them the steamer Champlain, which plies between Rivière Ouelle, on the south shore of Murray bay. They are transferred to the Intercolonial railway, and if they desire to go to Quebec they are retransferred at Levis to the Quebec ferry.

The receipts of the company were also to be exceedingly large because of the important freight in pulpwood along the line. It was stated that 150,000 tons of pulpwood were to be carried by the railway. I was about to say shipped, because in another prospectus there was a contradiction. They insert a lie on one prospectus and a lie on the other. In one prospectus the pulp mill was described as being on the shore and in a position to ship by water the products of its industry, while in another prospectus it was stated that 150,000 tons of pulp could be carried by the railway. The 150,000 tons were to be taken from the East Canada Pulp and Paper Company, from the Baylis Lumber Company, and from the Baie St. Paul Lumber Company. Now, let us see, Mr. Speaker, how far this prospectus represents the facts of the case. It was issued in 1911. The Baylis Lumber Company is still a name only; its mill is not yet built, but the prospectus stated that so many tons of pulp could be taken from that mill. The Baie St. Paul Lumber Company is a lumber concern, and not a pulp concern, while the East Canada Pulp and Paper Company is insolvent and in the hands of the receiver to-day. It was represented that the East Canada Pulp and Paper Company could give the railway something like 30,000 tons of pulp a year. Now, the mill at its utmost capacity could not give more than 14,000 tons of pulp. I know the facts, because, as I stated a moment ago, I have spent the summer at Murray bay for many years, and that fact is known by every business man in Quebec and below Quebec.

Well, what happened after the issue of the prospectus? It is quite true that once, twice, thrice and a fourth time dividends were paid, but as you will see, Mr.

Speaker, in the report of Engineer Gaudin and in the report prepared by Mr. Michaud, the dividends were not earned; they were paid just to keep up the stock and the bonds on the financial market and to allow some very ingenious people to unload their stocks and bonds on the unfortunate investors. I have stated that the Quebec and Saguenay Company was practically in the hands of a receiver. The line is not completed, and I do not believe that half of the rails have been delivered. Perhaps my hon. friend the Postmaster General would be good enough to tell me whether the rails are there ?

Mr. PELLETIER : I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX : At all events, they have obtained $2,500,000 from the French people, the money has been spent, and the rails are not there. Part of the embankment has been graded, but instead of being started at Mile 30 in the county represented by my hon. friend the member for Montmorency, the road was started at the other end, in Charlevoix, in order to facilitate some private speculators, a proceeding which was very sternly rebuked by the engineers who inspected the road. In round figures, $800,000 are due. A judgment was entered the other day in the court of Montreal for $381,000 and the balance is due, but at the request of the defendant's attorney, judgment was allowed to be postponed. As I have said, in round figures, there are $800,000 due by that company. The Quebec and Saguenay is an offshoot of the Quebec merger. The Quebec merger does not pay any more dividends; hard times have come. The promoters of the Quebec merger would be very pleased to unload this Quebec and Saguenay on the shoulders of the Government. That would perhaps give the Quebec merger a chance to pay dividends, to pay interest to the French bondholders and, therefore, they have made a dead set on my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. They have surrounded him day and night and since the beginning of this session there have appeared in the financial columns of the Montreal and Toronto papers inspired paragraphs announcing that—oh, the Quebec and Saguenay question will soon be settled; the Government has practically promised to guarantee the bonds of the company! If these bonds are guaranteed the people of Canada, the good people of the county of Grey, the good people represented by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), the good people of the province of Ontario and of the provinces of the West, will pay for the liabilities of the sharks and the priests of frenzied finance in the cities of Quebec, Montreal and Toronto. That is why I have given a friendly warning on many occasions to my hon. friend, the genial Minister of Railways and Canals. I have told him that I was so happy to see him occupying the very high position of Minister of Railways and Canals in this country, that I wanted to see him there a very long time, but that if he gave in, if he fell into the scheme, if he succumbed to the temptations of the sharks, he might perhaps find it awkward some day. I again give him a warning, I again tell him that if the Government of Canada should attempt to guarantee the bonds of that railway company, the Government of Canada is participating in an act which has been called in most respectable financial papers of Europe something worse than bank looting and safebreaking. I have the papers in my possession. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister says that he is unaware of the existence of such remonstrances on the part of French investors. Might I send him some of these papers? Even more than that, Mr. Speaker, the press of this country, friendly to the right hon. gentleman, has published time and again the facts which I have this afternoon apparently but only apparently, revealed to the right hon. gentleman. At all events, I accept the word of the right hon. gentleman but I hope that he and his colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals will think twice before giving a guarantee of bonds to this fraudulent enterprise.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is no objection to the papers in this case being brought down and when they are brought down I do not think they will reveal anything of which my hon. friend has spoken. I found when I came to take charge of the department that the usual bonus has been granted by our predecessors in office to this road. I understand that the distance from St. Joachim to Murray Bay is 56 miles, and to the mill at Nairn, 8 miles. I may say to my hon. friend, for fear he might lose some sleep over it, that the company have not made any application to me for a guarantee of bonds.

Mr. BORDEN: I would like to reassure my hon. friend also in regard to this matter. He speaks of this road as not being a mere child of his, although I think he has some dear children in the way of railway lines in the past.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not ashamed of them.

Mr. BORDEN: No, I was not suggesting that my hon. friend was; my hon. friend is speaking too quickly. I merely want to point out that this road, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman which I accept, seems to have remarkably similar features to the National Transcontinental railway for which he, among others, is responsible. He tells us that, in a certain prospectus, the road was estimated to cost, $31,957 per mile and that it has actually cost $52,000 and will probably cost $62,000 before it is completed. I would like to point out to him that even if all these statements are accurate, the cost does not come up to that of the railway for which he is responsible—the National Transcontinental railway. As he and his colleagues issued what might be called a prospectus to the people of Canada in that regard I trust that he will attach the same importance and the same responsibility to his own statements and suggestions in that connection as that which he attaches to the statements in the estimate that I have alluded to. He also speaks of this road having been commenced at the wrong end. There has been the same criticism also in regard to the railway for which the hon. gentleman is responsible. Some portions have been completed and cannot be put to very good use until other portions have been completed. I merely mention this to show my hon. friend that even so wise and distinguished a person as himself might make mistakes of that character. With regard to the statement of my hon. friend as to the surrounding of the Government by persons on behalf of this railway, let me assure him that he has given very loose rein to his imagination. The Government have not felt themselves embarrassed or incommoded by any representations which up to the present time have been made in that connection. I do not find it necessary to dwell upon the real estate transactions referred to; I do not think that matter very much concerns the question. I understand that work has been done on this railroad, that it was subsidized by the late Government, and that the work is at a standstill. I do not know what the hon. member suggests. He complains very much on behalf of the people who put their money into the enterprise and he ends up with an appeal to the Government to do nothing to assist the road. I certainly do not know what he suggests or what he intends. Perhaps a little later on the hon. gentleman will make it clear, but up to the moment I do not quite understand what his idea is.

Mr. SPEAKER: We have apparently drifted from one notice of motion to another. The remarks of the hon. member for Rouville were, I thought, intended for his motion in regard to the Light, Heat and Power Company, and the hon. member, in moving a substantive motion had the right to reply; but he seemed to drop that, and to take up the consideration of the next notice in his name, which deals with the Quebec and Saguenay railway. Let me put the first motion with reference to the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company.

Mr. BORDEN.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought the first motion was disposed of.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has not yet been put by the Chair.

Motion of Mr. Lemieux, in reference to Quebec Light, Heat and Power Company, agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The other motion now having been disposed of, we come to that which we have been really discussing; this is, indeed, a comedy of errors. The Prime Minister says he does not understand the object of my hon. friend in making this motion, and I will tell him that the object of the hon. member was to put the Government on its guard as to many rumours which have come to members of this House, and which apparently have not come to the ears of the Prime Minister. That simply confirms the truth of the adage that the person most interested is sometimes the last to be informed. There have been rumours filling the press and filling the atmosphere of this House, that this Quebec and Saguenay railway is seeking to obtain a guarantee of its bonds. The object, as I say, of the hon. member for Rouville was to put the Government on its guard and to inform the Government of the rotten character of this enterprise. The Prime Minister made the point that the late Government had subsidized this railway, which is true to the extent that we subsidized it as a local enterprise, and as a local enterprise it might do some good. It would connect the city of Quebec with parts of the county of Quebec, and the county of Montmorency, and the county of Charlevoix, and, as a local enterprise it would have been of service. We had no hesitation at all in granting the usual subsidy which has been given to local enterprises by the Canadian Government for more than thirty years past. My hon. friend said that this road had cost much more than was anticipated, and I was not surprised when the right hon. gentleman countered immediately by stating that this was also true of the National Transcontinental railway, but there is a difference between this local enterprise and the National Transcontinental railway, in that while I admit the latter railway cost more than was anticipated, yet the country has value for the expenditure. If we could say as much for the Quebec and Saguenay railway, it would not be bankrupt to-day, and sued in the courts by its creditors. The resources of the road, as a local road, might justify the local subsidy we gave, but we never would guarantee the bonds of such a company. The late Government of Canada guaranteed the bonds of certain enterprises, but these enterprises were of a national character, and whenever we came to Parliament to obtain a guarantee of that kind, we never met with any opposition, the character of the road being such as to justify the bounty of Parliament. No such reason can be adduced in favour of guaranteeing the bonds of the Quebec and Saguenay railway. I am delighted to hear from the Minister of Railways, and his statement is corroborated by the Prime Minister, that there has been no application up to this time for this guarantee of bonds. I understood that to mean that there has been no official application by the company, but I would like to be informed, if the Minister of Railways would be good enough to do so, that there has been no informal application, that this is the first time he has heard of it, that he never knew anything about the matter until to-day. We should be much more relieved if the Minister of Railways would be kind enough to stand up and give us his word that he never heard of the matter before now. We know better. If the Minister of Railways stands up in his place and tells us that there has been no informal demand for this guarantee, the whole country—I will not say the whole country because the whole country has not heard of it yet—but that part of the country which has heard these rumours will be relieved. I would be still further relieved if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) would be good enough to tell us that he has never heard of this question of guaranteeing the bonds of the Quebec and Saguenay railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: There are some more members of the Cabinet here; you might include them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Well, I will be satisfied to get an assurance from the Minister of Public Works; if he does not know I will not be troubled about the other members of the Cabinet knowing anything. If the Minister of Public Works tells me he knows nothing of this, the people of the country will sleep more soundly.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not yet put the motion with regard to the Quebec and saguenay railway. Had I known that the hon. member for Rouville was referring to another motion on the Order Paper when he was speaking, I would have called him to order, because he was transgressing the rule which prevents and hon. member anticipating a motion already on the paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are so many traps and snares in this whole thing and they are so netted in one with the other that I mixed them up.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would seem to be infectious.

Mr. SPEAKER having put the motion:

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): I do not intend to go into this matter at length, except that I would like to object most strongly to the representations made to this House by the hon. member for Rouville as to the propriety of or the necessity for having this railway traverse the county of Charlevoix. I represent the district of Quebec in the Government, and I think it is my duty to endeavour to rid the House of the wrong impression which the language of the hon. member may have created in that respect. My hon. friend says that this is a barren country, that the people have no use whatever for a railway, that if they want to communicate with the rest of the world they have a ferry-boat at Murray Bay which takes them over to the other side. Does my hon friend think this is a fair way of representing the position of that country? I say no. The barren country about which we have been told here is the only county through which this Quebec and Saguenay railway is going. My hon. friend to-day tells us that there is no use of a railway there, that the ferry is all that the people need. On the other hand the right hon. the leader of the Opposition tells us that a subsidy has been voted and properly voted by his own Government for the building of a railway. Why this subsidy if the country is barren and there is no need for a railway?

Mr. LEMIEUX: You are dragging a herring across the trail.

Mr. PELLETIER: Did not my hon. friend say this is a barren country?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: Did not my hon. friend say these people had a ferry from Murray Bay to the south shore?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

Mr. PELLETIER: I heard the words myself.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I spoke of the tourists.

Mr. PELLETIER: You said the tourists did not go by rail; they went by boat.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, then.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is only the people of Charlevoix who would use the ferry, and then cross back to Quebec. Why then, did my hon. friend vote a subsidy for that line of railway. I really think that if the county of Montmorency at the last election had not elected the present member for Montmorency (Sir Rodolphe Forget), and if the Hon. Mr. Parent, the man who provided so much of the ready goods for the election of my hon. friends on the other side, had not seen his son defeated in Montmorency, probably there would have been much less fault found with all these enterprises. This is made a political question and a matter of political revenge. My hon. friend from Rouville has in the corner of his heart a good deal of venom for his political opponents who have carried the counties from his party, and he does not hesitate to come before this House and open that corner of his heart against his political enemies. He may have his own opinion about the way this enterprise is financed. I am not going to discuss that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why?

Mr. PELLETIER: Because I think it is not fair to pre-judge this question, to which, after all, there may be two sides, as I know there are. This House should not be called upon to pass judgment on representations or statements made without hearing the other side as well. With regard to this railway, I think it is a great mistake to treat this country and the county of Charlevoix in particular in the way in which my hon. friend from Rouville has treated it. There are great prospects in that country. The railway which has been built from St. Joachim to Murray Bay is going to be a very productive railway. This railway has a great future before it. I know the country pretty well; and I shall be very much surprised if, in the disposition which is made of that railway, we do not find that people will not be of the same opinion as my hon. friend from Rouville as to the value of that railway. My hon. friend has spoken about the paper mill interests; if my hon. friend does not know, I am going to tell him that the paper mill interest is a very big interest in the county of Montmorency and on the border of the county of Charlevoix. These people have an immense area in timber limits; they have not only in view but have actually placed a contract for the building of a big pulp and paper mill with a capacity of one hundred tons a day. As regards the eastern Canada pulp mills, a branch of that railway is going over there. In that country there are two ports of the greatest importance to this country, Murray bay and Baie Ste. Catherine. We may have there a great deal of help for winter navigation. Before many years are over, I venture to-day that my hon. friend, young as he is, and with the future he has before him, will have to take back those words that he has pronounced to-day about this country being barren and this railway being useless, because I think there is a very great future for that part of the country. This part of the province of Quebec is one of the oldest settlements which is to be found. Everyone knows that it is full of historic places; it was there our forefathers came in the first place. The people of that country have been deprived of a railway year after year, while almost every other part of Canada had railways built. As for the member for Montmorency he has represented the county of Charlevoix for some years. He may have made some mistakes—everybody makes mistakes—but I am not going into that. Seeing that these people have been deprived of a railway for years, he devoted all his time and energy in order to have a railway built for them; he began a railway, I am told it is almost finished; with six or seven hundred thousand dollars it could be finished. Under the circumstances we should not look at this question from the point of view the hon. member for Rouville has chosen to look at it, but we should see to it that justice is done. As regards the question put by my right hon. friend as to whether an application for a guarantee of the bonds has been made verbally or unofficially, I may say I have heard it in this House from the hon. member for Rouville so many times since the beginning of this session that there is no doubt that we have heard of it unofficially.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As I stated a moment ago, my hon. friend the Postmaster General is simply drawing a red herring across the trail. Whether or not the county of Charlevoix, the county of Montmorency or the county of Quebec is part of the most beautiful section of Canada, is not in question. The point is whether we can afford to let the name and honour of Canada be besmirched in foreign markets for the sake even of those counties. I am from the province of Quebec, and I am pleased to know that railway construction is going on there. We live in an age of progress, and I grant that, to as great an extent as possible, every county should be afforded the necessary transportation facilities, but not at the expense of the other fellow. My hon. friend says there are two sides to every question; this I know full well. There is a good side and a bad side, and I am discussing the bad side of this particular question. The county of Charlevoix contains an intelligent population, and the people would reprove the very action alluded to by my hon. friend, if they knew their railway was being built with the money of orphans, widows and retired soldiers and officers in France; people who have been deluded by false representations made in prospectuses concocted in Canada—not published on this side of the water, but in the little towns of France. That is what I denounce. My hon. friend knows that I have no objection to the construction of a railway in the county of Charlevoix; on the contrary I am in favour of such a railway, but built with honestly-earned, not stolen money.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend should have been the last one to laugh, because I am sorry to say he was a director of the Quebec Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, which is the parent of the Quebec and Saguenay and the Quebec Eastern Companies. The name of the Hon. Louis Philippe Pelletier—unknowingly, I am sure; unwittingly, I am sure; unconsciously, I am sure—has been the means of deluding thousands and thousands of poor French investors. Does not my friend know that his name was lavishly used in the prospectus of the Quebec Eastern railway, issued in France, and that the following words appeared therein:

The Postmaster General of Canada, the hon. Mr. Pelletier, who is one of the directors of the Quebec Railway Company, has just disclosed in his speech the program of the new Government, which consists first in making of Quebec a free port, and second, giving to Quebec an immense dry-dock, and all the machinery necessary to receive the new Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway.

Mr. PELLETIER: What is the date of that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was issued just a year ago—in January, 1912. My hon. friend had just then delivered in Quebec one of his great speeches, indicating what would be the policy of the Government towards the city of Quebec and surrounding districts, and the people who promoted this enterprise in France used the name of my hon. friend in order to induce the French people to invest their money. My hon. friend was one of the directors—

Mr. PELLETIER: Oh, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend deny he was one of the directors of the Quebec merger?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Very well, I accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend suggests that I was director when this prospectus was published?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have been director of the Quebec Light, Heat and Power Company——

Mr. LEMIEUX: When did you resign?

Mr. PELLETIER: The moment I was elected to this House and became a member of the Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend say to this House that he did not know his name appeared in flamboyant letters on the prospectus issued in France?

Mr. PELLETIER: I hear that to-day for the first time; I never saw that paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The prospectus was not circulated in Canada, for many obvious reasons. It was published in France, and my hon. friend has been in France since—he was in Paris last summer. Will he tell me that he, the Hon. Louis Philippe Pelletier, Postmaster General of Canada, whose name appeared in flamboyant letters in this prospectus, was not, when in Paris, made aware by some of these unfortunate bondholders that he was held responsible—although I cannot believe he really is responsible?

Mr. PELLETIER: I met in France many people who spoke to me about this, but they never mentioned the fact that my name had been used in such a way. They never showed this prospectus to me, and I hear of it now for the first time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend does not deny his name appeared in the prospectus?

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend has read it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman is too cute—too intelligent—but he cannot fool me that way. The name of my hon. friend——

Mr. PELLETIER: What does the hon. gentleman mean?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I mean this: That the name of the hon. gentleman appeared on that prospectus. I have said he knows it; he says, he hears it now for the first time. I accept his word, Mr. Speaker, but I pity him for his innocence, and I say to the Prime Minister that the sooner the Postmaster General quits the Cabinet the better for the Government of Canada. He really is too innocent. My hon. friend tells me that he never heard of this before to-day, I will put to him another question. He went to Europe last summer, he went first to London, then to Paris. Did he go to Brussels?

Mr. PELLETIER: I did.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was not the name of my hon. friend published in Brussels on a prospectus of the Stadacona Power Company?

Mr. PELLETIER: What has the Stadacona to do with this?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It has the whole world to do with it.

Mr. PELLETIER: It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Because it is the same piece—I will not say the rest. It is all with the Quebec Light, Heat and Power Company, it is the Quebec merger projecting here and there its tentacles for high finance.

Mr. PELLETIER: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Rouville has no right to say that the Stadacona Power Company is an off-shoot of the Quebec Light, Heat and Power Company. It is not. I do not think my hon. friend should make those statements before the House. The Stadacona company is quite distinct from the other. My hon. friend has no right to make these imputations and suggestions. They are not fair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that is exactly a point of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I may say that the report made by M. Gaudin, the engineer, and the report made by the president of the National Association for the protection of French bondholders of foreign securities, M. Machart, both state that the Quebec merger, which was to get a monoply of the public utilities in Quebec—in fact it was an inducement to the French investors, that it would be protected from competition. But then there appeared the Stadaccna Power Company and instead of working in the interest of the bondholders —the directors went on the market and offered for sale that other issue in competition with the poor French bondholders who had been induced to join in the Quebec merger. That is how the name of the hon. gentleman comes in.

I sincerely hope an investigation will be ordered by the Government in order to sift the whole matter to the bottom.

Motion agreed to.

LA BANQUE INTERNATIONALE DU CANADA.

Mr LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all minutes of the Treasury Board, all Orders in Council, and all other papers or documents in any way relating to the issue by the Minister of Finance of the license to La Banque Internationale du Canada.

He said: This is the third chapter, and I may say that it is not my pleasure at all to bring these questions before the House. If I had not been threatened by some of the gentlemen connected with this business. If I had not been threatened through one of the members on this side of the House, I would simply have let the motion pass and awaited the documents. but I am not going to be deterred by threats and that is why I accompany the motion with the few remarks that I intended to make. This is the third chapter of a very interesting novel.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Does the hon. gentleman refer to threats?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WHITE: No, but by whom?

Mr. LEMIEUX: If I am allowed by the hon. member for Temiscouata I will give the name of the gentleman who made the threats to him that if I dared to make these charges in the House, although I have named no one, I would pay for it. It was confided to me by the hon. member for Temiscouata and I repeat I am not going to be deterred by threats from any one or from any source. I wish to vindicate the good name of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the good name of the province of Quebec. I do not want to be told in the Old Country that in the province of Quebec or in the Dominion we condone such schemes as those that have been launched within the last two or three years. I moved for the papers concerning the issue by the Minister of Finance of the license of the Banque Internationale du Canada. Much dissatisfaction has been expressed by the public concerning the affairs of this bank, especially in France, of course. Of the losers there are many in Canada but most of them, unfortunately, are in France.

Let me give, in a few words, the genesis of this institution, the Banque Internationale. During the session of 1911, before the elections, a Bill was introduced for the incorporation of a bank, La Banque du Canada. We, the members of the Government and several members of the House on both sides, strenuously objected to any one taking the name of La Banque du Canada for any such institution because we suspected that the capital would be subscribed in Europe and we know that in France La Banque de France is a state institution, just as in England the Bank of England, is a state institution. We therefore objected strenuously and succeeded in having the name changed to La Banque Internationale. The Bill was passed by the House but another phase had to come. The provisional directors, came before the Government in order to obtain from the Treasury Board the certificate which is necessary before any bank goes into business. That certificate was refused and there are reasons contained in the refusal as it appears in the documents which are in the hands of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. We feared that some of the foreign shareholders in the bank were unaware that in Canada there was a double liability, and we were also suspicious of a certain gentleman who, a few years previously, had been running a lottery in Montreal, and whose name appeared amongst the shareholders as representing $2,000,000 worth of shares. So, Mr. Fielding very wisely stated his objections to the issue of the certificate, but the elections took place, another government came into office, and the license was issued. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance did not know the agreement that had been made between the head of the bank and the shareholders, for I am sure that if he had known he would never have agreed to issue the certificate. Let me read the agreement which was made between each shareholder and the head of that institution.

Agreement entered into this 24th day of June, 1911, by and between——

So and So,——

—hereinafter referred to as 'the manager,' party of the first part, and the undersigned, hereinafter referred to as 'the shareholder,' party of the second part.

It is very important now, when we are revising our bank laws, that the Minister of Finance should be very careful in regard to what takes place in connection with the organization of such institutions. If there is to-day in the financial world and amongst the plain and common people objection to the measure introduced the other day by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance it is due chiefly to the fact that a certificate was issued to that institution.

An hon. MEMBER: The Farmers' Bank.

Mr. LEMIEUX (reading):

Whereas it has been deemed advisable to form a syndicate for the resale in a proper and suitable manner of the shares of the Banque Internationale du Canada held by the shareholders of said bank who wish at a later date to dispose of all or part of their holdings. Whereas it is imperative that such operation be conducted by a manager of experience. Now, therefore, agreement witnesseth:

1. The shareholder agrees to be a member of the syndicate formed by the present for the resale of the shares of the Banque Internationale du Canada now standing in his name.

2. Those shares will stand pooled for the purpose of said syndicate for an irrevocable period of eighteen months.

3. The manager will have the right and will use it in his own discretion to dispose of the pooled shares,——

Which is a huge speculation,——

—in all or in part at any time during the above-named period to the best interest of the shareholders providing that a net profit of at least ten dollars a share be obtained for said shareholders.

4. The manager will render account to the shareholders from time to time of the sales made for the syndicate account and same shall always be made pro rata to the shares of all shareholders.

5. Any shareholder will have the privilege at any time to withdraw from sale the part of his shares which would not have then been disposed of, but said part of his shares will stand pooled until the liquidation of the syndicate and shall not be sold or disposed of by said shareholder during the life of the syndicate under penalty of having his shares forfeited for the benefit of the members of the syndicate.

Now comes the important paragraph:

6. The manager binds and obliges himself during the life of this agreement to advance in the name and for the account of the members of the syndicate all and every calls, except the first one already paid, which might be made by the Banque Internationale du Canada on the shares pooled in virtue of the present.

I said that if my hon. friend had known of the existence of such an illegal agreement as that he would never have issued the certificate. It is, in its very essence, a huge speculation. A guarantee of ten dollars per share to the Canadian shareholders means a profit of 100 per cent, because they paid only ten per cent, and they are, so to speak, debarred from any other calls. Did the French shareholders know that? Were they made aware that in Canada there were some shareholders, and I see some of them before me now, who would be given 100 per cent profit, that their shares would be pooled, and that no more calls would be expected from them. Did the French shareholders know that? No, Mr. Speaker, they did not know.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): How much was subscribed?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Ten million dollars, the capital stock of the bank. There were two groups of shareholders, a French group and a Canadian group. The French group subscribed $8,000,000 and they paid 10 per cent. The Canadians subscribed two millions. On September 3, 1912, the annual meeting took place in Montreal. The French had subscribed $8,000,000 and let us see how our dear cousins from France were treated by their fellowmen in Canada. The French shareholders sent to the annual meeting two representatives accompanied by a young Canadian lawyer, the son of Mr. Justice Archibald, who is practising law in Paris, and with the proxies representing the $8,000,000 in their possession. What happened, Mr. Speaker? They were simply evicted just as the tenants of old in Ireland were evicted. Some fault was found with the way in which the proxies had been prepared. There were some irregularities, and those shareholders who represented $8,000,000 worth of stock were ejected forcibly from the room where the deliberations took place. Now, there were some ugly rumours about the management of the bank, and the French had become exasperated. I mentioned a moment ago that when they applied for the issue of the certificate we noticed that a certain gentleman and his wife had subscribed $2,000,000 worth, and that gentleman I had prevented a few months previously from running a lottery in Montreal by means of the post office. I was surprised to find him a shareholder representing $2,000,000 worth of stock. The prospectus of the bank stated very positively that no commission would be paid.

Mr. CODERRE: Could my hon. friend give the name of that hon. gentleman?

Mr. LEMIEUX: E. B. D'Aoust.

Mr. CODERRE: Is he living in Montreal?

Mr. LEMIEUX: He lived in Paris until lately, but since the French Government has ordered those investigations he has been in Montreal.

Mr. CODERRE: Is he not considered a French shareholder?

Mr. LEMIEUX: His $2,000,000 worth of shares are part of the $8,000,000 worth of French stock; but I was surprised to see him in the list, although I am not surprised to see him in Montreal to-day. It was stated, when that prospectus was issued on the French market, that no premium would be paid on the subscription stock. If my hon. friend will read a certain judgment which was rendered in Montreal a few days ago he will see that there has been some trouble in the bank of late, that a certain note amounting, in round figures, to $200,000 was discounted in favour of that same man, named D'Aoust, representing exactly ten per cent. of his shares. The note for $200,000 was discounted without the knowledge and against the orders of the directors. A return was made to the Government and that note so discounted was represented in the return as a current loan.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had just read the famous agreement, by which it was understood that the shares of the Canadian shareholders in the Banque Internationale were to be pooled, and that a payment of ten dollars per each paid-up share would be subscribed, and that no more calls would be made on the shareholders. I was stating that if the Finance Minister had known that such an agreement existed, he surely would not have issued the certificate of license to that bank. I stated that this agreement was absolutely illegal and that it was not known to the French shareholders. Had they known it, they would certainly not have invested their money in an organization of that kind. I was explaining that the French shareholders, hearing of the manner in which the bank was managed, and especially hearing of the discounting of a note for $200,000 in favour of one Mr. D'Aoust, had sent from France representatives to see that the management of the bank should be changed. As I stated, they held $8,000,000 of stock out of a total of $10,000,000, and surely they were entitled to some say in the management. I explained also that the gentlemen connected with the bank who met at Montreal so managed things as to exclude the French representatives from the meeting and from the reorganization of the bank. Irregularities were invented for the occasion, and the French shareholders were once more made the victims. As a result of the discounting of that extraordinary note for $200,000—one-quarter of the paid-up capital of the bank—proceedings were taken by the representatives of the French shareholders. This will be better explained if I read what was published last week in the Toronto Globe, under the suggestive title 'The Lesson of the International':

> The publication of a part of the evidence as to the circumstances under which the International Bank struggled through its brief and unfortunate career once more directs attention to the necessity for stringent amendments to the Banking Act which will prevent promoters from securing an undue amount for 'organization.' It appears that one of the causes of the International Bank's troubles was an unpaid account for organization expenses and commissions amounting to $200,000. Mr. O. B. D'Aoust, one of the French promoters of the bank insisted that this huge sum was due to him. Mr. Bird, the general manager, under pressure from the president, Sir Rodolphe Forget, paid it, as he stated in evidence, 'against his better judgment.' Instead, however, of making a straight payment the sum went through the books as a 'loan' to D'Aoust, who gave notes for $200,000, payable on demand, it being understood that premiums on stock to be thereafter paid in should be used to retire the notes.
> By this piece of 'financing' what was really a debt paid by the bank appeared in the statement to the Government as 'a current loan in Canada.' When Vice-President Bickerdike learned of the sort of banking that was being done without the knowledge or consent of the board he protested most vigorously. Mr. Bird, in a written reply, said that if any error was made in not bringing the matter before the board he much regretted it, but the account rendered was one the bank would have to pay, as it covered the obtaining of subscriptions for capital of $10,000,000, the expense of which cost considerable money. Other organization expenses were paid, such as heavy legal fees, expenses at Ottawa in connection with obtaining the charter and licenses, advertising, travelling expenses, cost of bringing clerks from Europe, salaries for ten or eleven of the staff for nearly six months while the bank was waiting for its license, and also the expenses during that time of an office on St. James street, including rent, taxes, light, &c.

The Minister of Finance has evidently been in touch with the circumstances under which the International's liabilities were transferred to the assets column, for in his draft Bank Act he puts in a new clause that makes such concealments hereafter impossible. The clause provides that 'at the time of the application for the certificate there shall be submitted to the Treasury Board a statement setting forth the several sums of money paid in connection with the incorporation and organization of the bank, and such statement shall, in addition, include a list of all the unpaid liabilities, if any, in connection with or arising out of such incorporation and organization. Prior to the time at which the certificate is given no payments on account of incorporation and organization expenses shall be made out of moneys paid in by subscribers, except reasonable sums for the payment of clerical assistance, legal services, office rental, advertising, stationery, postage, and expenses of travel, if any.'

This bars absolutely any payment for commission until after the facts are laid before the Treasury Board. Had the D'Aoust account gone before the board the International Bank might still have been granted the right to begin business, but its directors at all events would have known the facts and would have been enabled to withdraw had they been so minded. The proposed amendments are evidently necessary to protect those taking part in the organization of new banks from the manipulation of insiders. There should be added a specially stiff penalty for concealment of knowledge of deferred accounts on the part of officers or directors of banks in process of organization.

I may state, entre parenthèses, that this Mr. D'Aoust, who is referred to in this article as one of the French promoters was a resident of Montreal for several years. He is of French origin, but when the organization of the Banque Internationale was started, he left Montreal to open an office in Paris. Since the judicial investigation of the French Government has been commenced into these various Canadian enterprises launched on the French Market, Mr. D'Aoust has come back to Montreal and is now in Montreal.

The French representatives, hearing of this extraordinary discounting of $200,000 in favour of Mr. D'Aoust, took legal proceedings. They laid a complaint before the police magistrate in Montreal; but before issuing his warrant, Mr. Justice Leet, before whom such complaint was made, held a preliminary investigation in camera. This preliminary investigation took several months; several witnesses were heard, and Mr. Justice Leet in his judgment said that he would have been justified in issuing a warrant on the evidence placed before him; but that in the interest of the bank and the shareholders, knowing that the merger was to be made as between the Banque Internationale and the Home Bank, he thought he should also hear some witnesses for the defence. Accordingly, after several months he gave notice to the parties, and other witnesses were heard, namely, Mr. Knight, the secretary, I think, of the Bankers' Association, and a Mr. Muir. After having heard Mr. Knight and Mr. Muir, Mr. Justice Leet declared in his judgment that, though he would have been justified in issuing the warrant, yet he thought, in the interests of all, after what he had heard, that he should not issue the warrant.

Mr. McKENZIE : Whom was the warrant against ?

Mr. LEMIEUX : Against Mr. Bird, the manager of the bank. This matter has attracted considerable attention among the public, and especially among the financial people in Canada. I hold in my hand a number of the Monetary Times, published in Toronto, a very important paper, which under date of Saturday, January 18, 1913, contains the following:

> At last Judge Leet speaks—Says it is useless to continue case against La Banque Internationale Officials Transactions stated to be of ordinary banking nature.
>
> Judge Leet, of Montreal after considerable delay, has, according to the daily newspaper despatches from Montreal, said that it is unnecessary to proceed further with the Banque Internationale case, as he does not think a conviction would follow. A sworn affidavit was brought to the judge, stating to the best of the knowledge of the signatory, officers of the bank had made and signed a Government return which was to his knowledge untrue. Partly because the information was second-hand, and partly because of the important result that might come to pass from the institution of the proceedings, especially if it were found that the information was not correct, Judge Leet suggests that before a warrant is issued evidence be taken, and that it be taken in camera.
>
> Witnesses were heard, but the judge thought he would not have warrants issued, although he would have been thoroughly justified. He was asked also to withhold his judgment to the case for a while, in view of the negotiations proceeding for the transfer of the bank's business to another institution.
>
> The Monetary Times contends that while this procedure may have been legal, it was none the less extraordinary. It has seemingly had the effect of keeping most of the details of the case in secret. The judge is one of the few who have had an opportunity of examinating the evidence. Why should not that evidence be made public? Why was it heard in camera? Why should the judge deem it advisable to withhold his decision because some one suggested such a course? And are we to understand that the plaintiff's case was heard in camera, and evidence for the defence in public.

The Monetary Times is digusted with the entire conduct of the case and with the official silence of the Department of Finance. Instead of such serious accusations having the full light of publicity, much appears to have been done to make the judicial inquiry a secret investigation, with just enough publicity to give it a brave look.

We would respectfully ask Judge Leet to make public the evidence which was given in camera. We contend that it is a matter of public importance. We are glad to know from Judge Leet's remarks that the accusations would not bring a conviction, but the hearing in camara of such a case in setting a very undesirable precedent. The Monetary Times has always fought for legitimate publicity, as it has done for nearly three months in this case, and as it proposes to do.

Judge Leet's remarks respecting La Banque Internationale officials accused of making false returns to the Government, indicated it would be unnecessary to proceed further with the matter as he felt assured no conviction would follow. His judgment was to be given at Montreal late yesterday. Judge Leet said:

Considering the importance of this case, the public persons involved, and as a necessary consequence the public interest aroused, I think it proper that I should make a statement, part of which may be regarded as a personal explanation. Representatives of two of the leading legal firms of the city came to my chambers with a Mr. Ducout, who is the representative in Canada of the French shareholders of La Banque Internationale du Canada, and Mr. Ducout made a sworn affidavit stating that to the best of his knowledge and belief, Mr. Godfrey Bird, the general manager of La Banque Internationale, had, with other officers of the bank, made and signed a Government return which was to his knowledge untrue.

Partly because Mr. Ducout's information was second-hand, and partly because the important results that might come to pass from the institution of these proceedings, especially if it was found that Mr. Ducout's information was not correct, I suggested that before a warrant was issued, evidence be taken, and that it be taken in camera.

This procedure was followed and certain witnesses examined. I came to the conclusion that the facts disclosed were quite sufficient to justify the laying of information, and I feel I should have been thoroughly justified in giving instructions that a warrant should be issued, not only against Mr. Bird, but all the others who signed the returns.

That would not have meant that a commitment would have resulted, much less a conviction, but it would, no doubt, have been the easiest and simplest thing for me to have done and thus have disembarrassed myself of the matter.

Judge Leet went on to explain that he had been informed that negotiations were under way for the transfer of the business of the bank to a Canadian institution, and that if it were possible he should withhold his judgment for a while. He, therefore, held it until the present time. Recently he had been requested by a counsel for the bank to reopen the enquete. He did not see that criminal procedure would not allow him to make an investigation before issuing the warrant.

It is the right, however, of the accused after a warrant has been issued and the evidence for the prosecution adduced, before a commitment is signed, to examine witnesses for the defence, for the purpose, of course, of so explaining the case that no commitment will follow. I see no reason why an accused, if he desires, should not have the same privilege in a case like the present.

I have, therefore, acceded to the request to allow evidence to be adduced by the defence.

Judge Leet then stated that he was ready to proceed with the hearing. Among the witnesses heard were Mr. H. P. Knight, secretary of the Canadian Bankers' Association, and Mr. J. Gillespie Muir, of the Merchants Bank, who were asked for their opinion, as experts, of certain transactions of La Banque Internationale. After hearing these two witnesses, Judge Leet decided that it would be useless to continue the case, because Mr. Knight and Mr. Muir said that the transactions complained were of the same nature as they, or any other bank, would carry on.

I have nothing to say against the judgment of Mr. Justice Leet, except to note the apparent contradiction that in the first instance he states he was amply justified in issuing the warrant, and secondly he thought that in the best interests of the merger to take place between the International Bank and the Home Bank, he should, perhaps, not issue that warrant.

Mr. ROGERS: Who signed the returns he speaks of?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Godfrey Bird, manager of the International Bank.

Mr. ROGERS: Who else?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no one else named here—I am quoting from the Monetary Times, of Toronto. I have here a letter from a citizen of Montreal, and I am sure that many members of this House have received letters of a similar nature, having regard to what is being said by the ordinary citizen on the street, to the effect that if we wish to have socialism in Canada, the best way of bringing it about is by protecting those bank managers who represent as current loans what are, in reality, liabilities of the bank. This letter reads as follows:

Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Lemieux,—I find that there is a lot of dissatisfaction among business men in Montreal over the International Bank case, and thought perhaps you would deem it of sufficient importance to question the Minister of Finance in regard to the way this matter has been handled. The Hon. Mr. White went in as a great purist, but is evidently not working very hard at the job.

I believe that in the forthcoming revision of the Bank Act, some provision will be made for outside inspection. This is not likely to prove a success if all guardians of the depositors money are as indifferent as Mr. John P. Knight, Secretary of the Bankers' Association. In giving evidence, Mr. Knight explained that he had been bothered by two men who had come to him with a tale of woe concerning the bank, till finally he told them to go to the lawyers. Under the present Banking Act, one would think Mr. Knight's duty would be to investigate any tales of woe brought to him.

In dismissing the case, Judge Leet made the following comments: I am bound to say that some of the officers of the bank made a great mistake, and perhaps they are suffering just as much as if a warrant had been issued. I cannot see why the matter in question should not have been brought to the attention of the directors at once.

This sentiment is shared by a great many people—

Mr. PELLETIER: By whom is the letter signed?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I cannot give the name, but I have no objection to showing it to my hon. friend privately, if he so desires.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know that that is quite fair.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has generally been the practice, when a paper or letter is quoted from, to lay it on the table.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a private document, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PELLETIER: Does not the hon. gentleman think, if he does not give the name, that the letter should be withdrawn?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not intend to be detracted from what I intend to say. After the judgment was rendered, we were informed through the press that the Home Bank of Toronto had decided to take over the affairs and business of La Banque Internationale, and that an amalgamation is to take place. To this I have no objection, but here the Minister of Finance can exercise his honest judgment, and can weigh the pros and cons of the matter, as the amalgamation of two such institutions cannot take place without his consent. From the judgment I have read, he knows that the Hon. Mr. Fielding was warranted in refusing to issue the certificates of the bank; He knows, he, the Minister of Finance, has been the victim of the false representations of the organizers of La Banque Internationale, as, in the new Bank Act, he has inserted provisions which cover exactly the state of things I described a few moments ago. Something should be done not only for the sake of the Canadian shareholders, but on behalf of the French shareholders. I am told their shares were sold at $5 although they paid $12.50 for a share of $100, and the total loss to the French shareholders in this proposed amalgamation is $580,000. Does my hon. friend not believe that he owes to the unfortunate French shareholders a very careful investigation of the circumstances which brought about this financial disaster? In the case of the Farmers' Bank there has been a long investigation. It has now been in progress for nearly two years; witnesses are heard and sittings convened nearly every month by Chief Justice Sir William Meredith, in the endeavour to assign the responsibility to those who brought about the failure of the Farmers' Bank. This is a similar case, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, having been deluded by the organizers of La Banque Internationale, should, before the amalgamation is effected, see that a thorough investigation of the whole circumstances of the case takes place; he should see that the $200,000 paid to Mr. D'Aoust, by the discounting of his note, as a commission for the subscription of the capital of $10,000,000, when it has been stated on the prospectus that no commission would be paid—he should see that the $200,000 are returned to be applied to the assets of the bank for the benefit of the depositors—if there are any, for nobody ever had any confidence in that bank from its inception. This money should be returned to recoup the shareholders for the terrible loss they have sustained; moreover the minister should thoroughly investigate the whole case, and find out what recourse remains to the shareholders of the International Bank. He should see what is being transferred to the Home Bank. Small shareholders of the Home Bank do not know what recourse the shareholders of La Banque Internationale may have against them. He should see that no privilege of amalgamating, of merging the two institutions is granted until the audit which is provided by the new Act, at the request of the shareholders at the annual meeting, takes place. I am not asking too much in the interest of justice, in the interest of fair play. I know it is very disagreeable to bring these facts before the House and very annoying but shall we, who belong to the highest tribunal of the land, allow the fair name of Canada, which until lately stood so high on the European market, to be besmirched? Shall we be silent while by these various undertakings launched in the European market ruin and desolation are brought to so many families? I say it is the bounden duty of the Government to investigate the whole case and to see that justice be done to those who have suffered.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I have listened with very great interest and attention to the remarks of my hon. friend. He has made some very serious and grave charges with regard to the incorporation and administration of this bank. As a member of Parliament and as a former minister no doubt he is seized and aware of the responsibility which he assumes. For my own part I will speak with a very great deal of restraint, the more so because I am speaking of an institution, and especially a financial institution, carrying on its business in Canada to-day.

Now, I will not say that my hon. friend has deliberately made an untrue statement, I will not say that, but I will say, and I will prove to this House, that he has made a recklessly untrue statement, a statement that he should never have made, and that there was absolutely no justification whatever for his making it. He stated—and I could not believe that I had heard him correctly until I had got a report from 'Hansard' which I have in my hand—that the Treasury Board of the late Government, that Mr. Fielding, had refused the certificate. And he said:

There are reasons contained in the refusal as it appears in the documents which are in the hands of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

That is the statement that he made before six o'clock. Within the last five minutes he has supplemented that statement, and has said that the Hon. Mr. Fielding was warranted in refusing that certificate. I deny absolutely that the Hon. Mr. Fielding refused the certificate, and I will prove that to the satisfaction of the House. I shall prove also that the Treasury Board did not refuse the certificate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did he grant it?

Mr. WHITE: Not only that, but at the meeting at which the matter was dealt with by the Treasury Board of the late Administration—and I have the minutes of that meeting before me—the matter was deliberately left over for the consideration of the incoming treasury board.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: More than that, at this meeting my hon. friend was actually present.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: And yet he has the temerity——

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not play on words.

Mr. WHITE: And yet he has the temerity to get up in this House to make, as I have said, not a deliberately untrue statement, but nevertheless a recklessly untrue statement, because what is more reckless than for a man to be present at a meeting and then subsequently make a misstatement as to what occurred at that meeting without even taking the trouble to inform himself as to what actually transpired? I shall read to my hon. friend the minute, and leave it to the House and to my right hon. friend to judge as to whether my hon. friend was justified in saying that the Hon. Mr. Fielding and the late Treasury Board had declined to issue that certificate. I will show that great care was taken by the previous Administration, as by this one, because we ought to be fair. My hon. friend sometimes, it seems to me, is not capable of being fair. There is no more specious and plausible speaker in the House, who gives a greater semblance of fairness than my hon. friend, and yet underneath there is always, it seems to me, the under-current of political animus which warps his judgment and makes it almost impossible for my hon. friend to make an absolutely correct statement where a political situation is involved. My hon. friend is no Nathaniel, he is not wholly a man without political guile. I have discovered that on more than one occasion and on this occasion he has even excelled himself. This is the minute of the meeting of the Treasury Board of the late Administration at which were present my hon. friend among others, Mr. Fielding, Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Paterson, Mr. Fisher and Mr. Mackenzie King. This is the last meeting, the date being 27th September, 1911. It was only six days after a certain happening to which I am sure I need not direct the attention of the House. The 27th September was six days after an event which I have no doubt is indelibly inscribed on the tablets of the memory of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. EMMERSON: Take it as read.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend would like me to take it as read, but I am going to read it.

The Board having had submitted to them the further papers——

Continuing their investigations——

—the further papers in connection with the application of La Banque Internationale for a certificate under the provisions of the Bank Act to enable it to commence business, is of the opinion that the matter requires more consideration than can be given to it in the present state of affairs, when a change of administration is about to take place.

The board therefore without expressing any opinion——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: Did Mr. Fielding reject the application? Did the board decline it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Read it all.

Mr. WHITE: I will take my own time to read it. I am going to rub it in a little bit. Did Mr. Fielding decline the application? Did the Board reject it? Did the Government say, 'we won't issue this certificate'? Did they say that the Bank Act had not been complied with? (Reading):

The Board therefore, without expressing any opinion on the merit of the application, desire to leave the papers for the consideration of the new Treasury Board.

Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to very many matters, and has made many charges. Personally I propose to deal only with his assertions and statements in so far as they may, by implication,—because he does not make the express charge—have any bearing whatever upon the propriety of the issue of the certificate to the Banque Internationale by the Treasury Board.

At the outset I desire to make this comprehensive statement, and I shall be a great deal fairer than my hon. friend, I hope. I say that very careful and diligent consideration was given to this question of the issue of the certificate by the late Treasury Board, and that the same character of diligence and the same care and full consideration, were given to this application by the present Treasury Board. In the first place, I desire to go back to the incorporation of the Banque Internationale. As my hon. friend has stated, the bank was incorporated in April 1911, and that incorporation was of course under the late Government. My hon. friend, therefore, can cast no imputation, upon this Government, if the matter is at all in question, in regard to the incorporation of the Banque Internationale. In July the application was made to the Treasury Board in the usual course, under the existing Bank Act, for the certificate required by the Act. For the information of the House I may say that in order to comply with the provisions of the Bank Act, at least $500,000 par value of subscriptions must be received. I ask the House to keep these figures in mind, that at least $500,000 of subscriptions must be received, and $250,000 in cash must be paid in to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada. In other words, in order to ensure that, before commencing business, a bank shall have a substantial subscribed capital, and a substantial amount of cash with which to commence business, the Act contains these two provisions that $500,000 of subscribed stock and $250,000 in cash must be paid in to the credit of the Receiver General. Now in connection with the Banque Internationale there was a subscribed capital of $10,000,000 instead of $500,000, and of that $10,000,000 10 per cent had been paid, not quite 10 per cent, a total of $936,000. The bank had $936,000 in cash at the time the certificate was issued by the Treasury Board. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars had already been paid in, I think in the preceding July, but at all events when the previous Treasury Board was in existence, to the credit of the Receiver General in the Bank of Montreal. Another provision was that the subscriptions amounting to $500,000 of capital stock must be bona fide. I submit that the best evidence of bona fides is payment. If a man has paid ten per cent on his subscription, no one can say, I think, that his subscription was not made bona fide; so that, apart from any other evidence as to bona fides, there is no question whatever that each of those subscribers had paid ten per cent. Now, in view, no doubt, of the episode of the Farmers' Bank, of the fact that notes of farmers had been discounted in order to raise the money paid in to the credit of the Receiver General, and of the criticism which had been evoked in connection with that, the preceding Treasury Board had taken the precaution to make very careful and confidential inquiries as to the financial standing of the foreign shareholders. They were found to be entirely unexceptional, being a very high class of subscribers indeed. It was a splendid list of subscribers that the Banque Internationale had, both in Canada and in France.

Let me point out further to my hon. friend—because he has, by implication and inuendo, cast some doubt upon the propriety of the issue of the Treasury Board certificate on account of the foreign shareholders, that if you throw out the subscriptions of foreign shareholders altogether, and consider only the Canadian shareholders, you have subscriptions amounting to over $2,000,000, as against $500,000 required by the letter of the Bank Act. In other words, if there had been no foreign shareholders the bank would have been entitled to its certificate. I doubt if there has ever been a case in which the statute was not only so literally, but so abundantly complied with as that of the Banque Internationale. My hon. friend talks about this as if it were some huge stock jobbing swindle. I am not referring to the character of the subscriptions, for any other purpose than to show that they were bona fide, as required by the Bank Act. Who were the subscribers in Canada? Some of the most influential and prominent men of this House were amongst the subscribers at the time the application was before the Treasury Board.

An hon. MEMBER: On both sides.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend has given the impression that the application should not have been given favourable consideration. Who were the subscribers? I must name the men in this House, because no doubt they will rise and say what they think of the manner in which my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) has characterized the promotion of the Banque Internationale. What has my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to say in regard to what my hon. friend has said of the Banque Internationale? What would my hon. friend from St. Lawrence division of Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike) say, if he were here and able to defend himself, as to the inuendo of my hon. friend? And what would my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) have to say to my hon. friend for characterizing the Banque Internationale in the manner he did? What about the promoters of the Banque Internationale at the time the application was before the Treasury Board? Four of the most representative Parisiens, men of high standing, were on the board, and five Canadians. Who were the five Canadians? They were Sir George Garneau whom my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) thought worthy to appoint head of the Battlefields Commission of Quebec; the hon. Mr. Taillon, now postmaster of Montreal, Mr. Bickerdike, the hon. member for St. Lawrence division, Montreal, and Mr. J. N. Greenshields, K.C., one of the leading lawyers of Montreal. We know what the hon. gentleman wants to do, we know that, in a subtle way and by innuendo, he wants to bring this into politics. He wants to take an application like this before the Treasury Board and make it the basis of a political attack. Knowing this, I appeal to any man sitting in this House, I do not care where he is, and I ask my hon. friend, if, in view of the provisions of the Bank Act to which I have referred, in view of the character of the shareholders of the bank, Parisian and Canadian, in view of the men of standing I have mentioned amongst the shareholders and in view of the high character of the directors, any Treasury Board if any government would be justified in withholding that certificate? There is no provision in the Bank Act against a foreigner, whether he is French, German, Austrian or Russian, acquiring bank shares in Canada. If any of my hon. friends is a shareholder in a bank and he desires to sell his shares to a Frenchman, the transfer may be made and it is not illegal. It is exceedingly desirable that capital from abroad, whether French or German, should be invested in Canadian bank stock. There is not enough capital invested in Canadian bank stocks and that is one of the questions we will have to meet in future. We must consider the question of where the money is to come from for subscriptions for further shares in Canadian banks. Is a government to say that, because there are a number of French subscribers to the stock of a bank, no certificate is to be issued even although they are reputable men who have subscribed for the shares of the bank and who are willing to put their money into it and to engage in the banking business? It is absurd on the face of it and nobody knows it better than my hon. friend.

The late Treasury Board took care and exercised diligence in connection with this application and the incoming Treasury Board exercised a like care and diligence before they issued the certificate. One question to which my hon. friend has adverted, and this was also within his knowledge, was the question of the subscription of Mr. D'Aoust of Paris. My hon. friend knows very well, or should know because he was a member of the Treasury Board, that the question of the validity and propriety of the D'Aoust subscription was passed upon by the Deputy Minister of Justice who advised the Treasury Board of the late Government of which my hon. friend was a member, that the D'Aoust subscription was a valid, binding, legal subscription. Another matter that they took up most carefully, I admit, was the question of whether a certain election of directors had been proper, they interposed certain objections and in consequence of that another meeting was called and the defect was remedied. I have no fault to find with the course pursued by the previous Treasury Board. After having held three meetings and having, as I have said, obtained the report of commercial agencies as to the standing of the subscribers and after having obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice as to this particular subscription in issue and as to the election of the board of directors at that time, they carried it down to the 27th day of September, just before the Government went out of office, and then they said: we are not in a position to deal with this question thoroughly and we will leave it for the incoming board. I leave it to both sides of this House to say whether my hon. friend was justified in making the statement that Mr. Fielding had refused a certificate to the bank and in characterizing the bank and the reputable men who formed its list of shareholders and directors in the manner he has.

There are two other matters to which my hon. friend referred. As I have said, his criticism is not based on direct statement, but upon innuendo. He referred to the pooling agreement, brought it in, wanted to get it in, wanted to talk about it. He said that the Minister of Finance did not know about the pooling agreement, but, nevertheless, here it is and I will read it. He says that the agreement is illegal and that the Government never saw the agreement until last fall; It is an agreement between individuals; any set of men can get together to-morrow and make a pooling agreement without the knowledge of any one in this House. At the time when this matter was before the Treasury Board nobody had ever heard of this pooling agreement, no member of the late Government, no officer of my department and no member of the incoming Government, so far as I know. At all events, the pooling agreement is an agreement between individuals. Whether it exceeds the contractual ability of the parties, I am not prepared to say. It is a question of law, and it has no bearing upon the question of the propriety of issuing the Treasury Board certificate. It had never been brought to the attention of anybody until we saw it in a paper published in the city of Montreal some time last fall, a year after the issue of this certificate. It has no bearing on the question of the requirements of the Bank Act which call for $500,000 in subscriptions and $250,000 paid in cash.

My hon. friend has quoted from the Globe. The Globe also has the same faculty as my hon. friend of making plausible and specious statements and at the same time making what is in substance a mis-statement by innuendo. I do not accuse the Globe, however, of doing that in the article to which my hon. friend refers. I believe that the Globe, upon that occasion, pointed out one of the provisions which I have introduced in to the Bank Act for the purpose of proving that commissions shall not be paid out by directors except with the consent and approval of the Treasury Board as to their reasonableness. But my hon. friend sought to convey the idea that it was because of some knowledge I had of this transaction before Judge Leet in the court at Montreal that I had incorporated that in the proposed Bank Act. Those provisions were inserted in the draft Bank Act long before Judge Leet had ever had this matter under his consideration. In order to elaborate a little further, let me tell my hon. friend precisely why these provisions were inserted. The Monarch bank was a stillborn institutions, a bank incorporated by Parliament, but which had never obtained its Treasury Board certificate, as it could not raise the $250,000 required by the Bank Act. Between the time of the Parliamentary incorporation and before the receiver had been appointed, because it went into the hands of a receiver, the promoters had collected about $70,000 from subscribers through the country. Out of that $70,000, there was paid for commission and for legal expenses something over $40,000, nearly all of which has been lost to the subscribers, and no certificate having been issued, of course they are not shareholders in the bank. The bank was a stillborn institution, it never was able to open its doors for business because it never obtained the certificate of the Treasury Board.

An hon. MEMBER: What bank?

Mr. WHITE: The Monarch Bank. In the case of the Farmers' Bank, between the period of its incorporation and the issue of the Treasury Board certificate, $40,000 or $50,000 went for commission, directors' fees, and other expenses. I put the provision in the new Bank Act to meet these cases. It is provided there that the provisional directors of the bank, under heavy penalty—the penalty for an offence against the Act is five years' imprisonment—shall not pay out any sum of money for subscriptions of or other large expenditures—as the Act is worded: they shall make expenditure only for certain purposes of minor consequences which would involve small expense—until the issue of the Treasury Board certificate, and the Treasury Board certificate shall not issue until the Treasury Board has decided that all expenses, which must be verified by affidavit or otherwise, are reasonable. If there is a commission, it must be a reasonable commission; if, there are legal expenses, they must be reasonable legal expenses. That is the provision in the new Bank Act and it had no more to do with questions arising out of the Banque Internationale than it had to do with anything that is not at all cognate to the subject. The D'Aoust note was brought to my attention, and I have no doubt it was brought to the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux), by a report that proceedings of a criminal nature were being instituted in Montreal, in which the question arose as to whether the return made to the Government was a proper return; in other words, as to whether this note entered among the assets of the bank should not appear among the liabilities of the bank as an item representing liability for these commissions. The questions involved were questions of law and questions of fact. The courts of this country deal with legal questions, and where better could the matter have been tried out than before the courts? Is the Minister of Finance to step in and prejudge a case pending in the courts? I do not know whether I am correctly informed or not, but I have seen in the newspapers that that note has been paid.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why?

Mr. WHITE: I do not know; my hon. friend may know. I am not reflecting in any way upon my hon. friend for any observations he has made as to anything outside of the conduct of the Treasury Board in issuing the certificate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Minister of Finance know with what that note has been paid?

Mr. WHITE: I saw the statement in the newspapers that it has been paid and I believe I read that it was paid from the sale of shares held by the maker of the note. Whether that is true or not, I cannot say. As I have said, proceedings which involved questions of fact and of law were instituted and were pending before a judge, and I would like my hon. friend to point out to me how, under the Bank Act, the Minister of Finance or the Finance Department could interfere under such circumstances? There is no such power given in the Bank Act, and all the minister had to do was to await a decision on the proceedings pending before the court. I have confidence in our courts, and it would appear to me that any argument which the hon. gentleman may found on the inactivity of the Finance Minister in regard to such a case, must necessarily fall to the ground. I think I have shown conclusively that the late Treasury Board did not refuse the certificate, but by reason of their going out of office, left the question of the granting of the certificate for the consideration of the incoming Treasury Board. I have shown that the law was not only complied with in spirit and in letter, but abundantly complied with; that the subscription of stock was many times that required by the Act; that there was a good list of shareholders presented; that the subscriptions were bona fide; that the amount required to be paid to the department was paid in cash, and, if the intention of the Bank Act is to be observed at all, that the certificate must issue. I say further, that the intention of the Bank Act is, that when its requirements are complied with, the certificate will issue, unless there is evidence of fraud or impropriety of some kind, which of course were absent in this case. That generally, is my answer to the hon. member. I must again express my surprise that the hon. member for Rouville should make such unfounded statements, recklessly—not wilfully but recklessly—without taking the trouble to inform himself on a matter in which he, above all persons, should be well informed because he was a member of the former Treasury Board. I am surprised that a former minister and a member of this House should make such an attack as he has made upon a foundation so unstable; in other words, that he should build up an attack upon a tissue of—I will not say wilful—but nevertheless misrepresentations.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is in these words:

Address for a copy of all minutes of the Treasury Board, all Orders in Council, and all other papers or documents, in any way relating to the issue by the Minister of Finance of the license to La Banque Internationale du Canada.

My hon. friend from Rouville, in making the motion, was careful to say that he did so in order to call the attention of the House to the case of this bank, which in his opinion ought to be investigated, and that the papers when brought before the House would not only justify, but compel an investigation into the transactions of this bank.

He quoted the president of the Farmers' Bank to the effect that for the protection not only of the bank, but of the public generally, full light should be thrown on the matter; that the same reasons would apply to this bank as to the Farmers' Bank, and that there were as much reason to compel an investigation of this bank as to compel one in the case of the other bank. He proceeded to give some of the facts which in his judgment showed that the same reason prevailed in the one case as in the other. He first dealt with the granting the certificate by the Treasury Board, stating that in the late Administration, the Treasury Board, at the head of which was the predecessor of my hon. friend, declined to issue the certificate. My hon. friend jumped upon this expression and——

Mr. PELLETIER: He said refused.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Call it 'refused' if you will. He jumped upon this expression. I believe my hon. friend interjected that we had been quibbling in this matter. I think that, on reading the evidence, he will agree with me that that expression was not justified. He has read to us the report of the Treasury Board. If I had it, I would read it again. It stated that the granting of the certificate had been under consideration since the month of July, but that the Treasury Board would not grant it, but would leave it to be dealt with by the coming Administration. This is what the report says:

The Board having had submitted to them the futher papers in connection with the application of La Banque Internationale du Canada for a certificate under the provisions of the Bank Act to enable it to commence business, is of the opinion that the matter requires more consideration than can be given to it in the present state of affairs, when a change of administration is about to take place.

The Board therefore, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the application, desire to leave the papers for the consideration of the new Treasury Board.

In taking this course it is desirable to state that apart from and in addition to the questions usually engaging the attention of the Board in connection with an application for the granting of a certificate to a new bank to enable it to commence business, there are some matters which call for special consideration in connection with the present application.

While the amount of capital subscribed is much greater than the amount of subscribed capital in connection with any preceding application to the Board, it also appears that, out of the total allotments of stock amounting to $9,239,400 made by the Provincial Directors, $7,156,000 thereof has been allotted to subscribers residing and domiciled in a foreign country. The amount of stock allotted to subscribers domiciled in Canada is $2,083,400. Foreign subscribers number 191; subscribers in Canada number 183.

The large amount and large proportion of capital subcribed abroad, in its relation to the provisions of the Bank Act, with regard to the enforcement of the double liability, is one of the matters referred to.

There is another feature connected with the foreign subscriptions to which attention may here be drawn. One of these subscriptions is for 10,000 shares—$1,000,000 of the capital stock. The subscription is made 'in trust.' The person or persons for whom the trust is held are not disclosed. In the absence of such disclosure the subscriber for this large amount, apparently in ordinary financial circumstances (being in charge of the Paris office of Mr. R. Forget, the President of the Bank), is alone responsible, so far as the records of the Bank afford information as to persons liable, for the double liability should occasion arise for enforcing the provisions of the Act in regard thereto. There is a further subscription of $250,000 by the wife of the same party.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That was not read.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The application of the provisional directors of the bank for the certificate had been before the Treasury Board of that day. Then and there this application had been 'refused,' as my hon. friend states, for two specific reasons, if I remember rightly. One reason was that one of the directors who had been elected was not qualified. The Act requires that there shall be at least five directors. Nine directors had been elected, but it turned out that one of the directors was not qualified, I think, because his subscription had been made not by him but by his firm, and we were advised by the Department of Justice that it was better to be on the safe side, and to hold that this director was not qualified unless he subscribed personally. It was, however, pointed out that nine directors had been elected, although five would be a legal number. The final decision was that, as the shareholders had seen fit to elect nine directors, every one of them must be qualified, and therefore Mr. Fielding declined to issue the certificate. This difficulty was got over, as I understand, by electing another director or the same director after he had been properly qualified. There was another technical difficulty with regard to the subscriptions of the directors in France; they had subscribed by proxy only; but I was advised that this defect could be cured, and it was cured. When the change of Government took place, the matter was still under consideration, and the Government of that day declined—I repeat my hon. friend's statement—refused to issue the certificate. My hon. friend quibbles upon that word. The matter of issuing a certificate of a bank is a technical one, largely ministerial. The Treasury Board has to see that all the formalities are observed, that the law is carried out in every particular. The Treasury Board of that day would not issue the certificate pending the settlement of the difficulties to which I have alluded. The fact that there were foreign shareholders, the fact that the question of the double liability had to be considered, and similar considerations at that moment were such that the late Government declined—refused to issue the certificate, but left it to my hon. friend and the coming Administration to deal with the matter. They dealt with it and they issued the certificate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At what date?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know the date, but it is of no material moment. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance pleads to-day that he acted in good faith. No one says that he did otherwise.

Mr. WHITE: Rightly, under the Bank Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The question is whether he exhausted all the precautions he might have taken. To-day my hon. friend spoke of pooling the arrangement or agreement which took place between the president of the board and certain Canadian shareholders, whereby a contract was made with these shareholders that, having paid ten per cent of the capital stock, they would not be called upon to pay another cent. If such an agreement as that had taken place, I doubt very much, had it been known to my hon. friend and the members of the Treasury Board, whether they would have issued a certificate under the circumstances. My hon. friends say that such an agreement might have been legal, but, if so, would they say it was right and proper that such an agreement of this kind should be made by the president of the bank? My hon. friend says the shareholders were honest and reliable, and in this connection he mentioned the name of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). But what has this to do with the present matter? If ninety-nine were honest and the hundredth dishonest, the blame should be placed upon that one, and the others be vindicated. My hon. friend says there are matters to be investigated involving the protection of the shareholders and creditors of the bank, but I think he has not properly comprehended the spirit of the statement made by the mover of the present address He simply said there were, in connection with the issue of the certificate, transactions of an irregular nature which demanded an investigation.

Mr. WHITE: Does my hon. friend understand that the pooling agreement was not in any way before the Treasury Board?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have said I never knew the pooling agreement was before the Treasury Board, and I further believe that if it had been, my hon. friend would have taken a different course. Certainly the certificate was issued in the absence of important information. I do not blame my hon. friend at all because the matter did not come before the Treasury Board; I do not even say he did not take all the precautions he should have taken, but I do say that the subsequent facts which transpired were circumstances in regard to which, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Rouville, there should be an investigation.

Referring to the matter which came before the courts, my hon. friend made an argument upon this point which was entirely aside from the question. He said the courts have to decide this matter, and we, therefore, have nothing more to do with it. But the matter which came before the court was a criminal information laid against Mr. Bird, manager of the bank, and the court came to the conclusion that Mr. Bird was not liable to prosecution, and that, in its opinion, he had not acted criminally. From this does it necessarily follow, even though it is established, that Mr. Bird did not act criminally, that he acted prudently, or even in accordance with his duties? I think my hon. friend will agree with me in the statement that the manager of an institution may act altogether contrary to his duties without making himself liable to a criminal charge, and, even in view of Mr. Bird's vindication by the court, I doubt very much whether he was free from blame. I was rather shocked at the evidence given by Mr. Knight, secretary of the Bankers' Association, who saw nothing wrong in the conduct of Mr. Bird. The press reports deal as follows with the case in question:

In closing the case, Judge Leet said that the charge was one of a serious nature, and the circumstances arose out of a transaction, which was subject to criticism, made by two officers of the bank and kept secret from the board.

I may say that the charge made against Mr. Bird was that of having made a false return to the Minister of Finance with regard to a note for $200,000. That note was reported in Mr. Bird's statement to the Minister of Finance as a current loan, and it was charged that it was not a current loan, but a payment made to Mr. D'Aoust, who had discounted the note for services rendered. The judge held that he was not liable to prosecution; but, in my humble judgment, Mr. Bird's action was absolutely contrary to the Bank Act. The report referred to proceeds as follows:

'After hearing the evidence of Mr. Knight,' said Judge Leet, 'whose opinion carries conviction both in Canada and throughout the world, and Mr. Muir connected with one of the oldest and most conservative banks in the country that the returns had been made out as they would have done it, I could not let the matter go further as there would be no practical result.'

'Up till the present,' said Judge Leet, 'I have conducted the hearings in camera and this has given rise to some criticism, all of which has not been favourable, but I do not care about that. I feel that important things like this could not be stifled. Our financial institutions should be above reproach and also the manner in which they are managed. For my part this matter should not go further and I will not issue warrants.'

The first action in this matter was taken on October 14 last when Mr. Henry Ducout, of Paris, France, laid a complaint alleging that during the months of April, May, June, July and August, 1912, one James Godfrey Bird, general manager of the International Bank of Canada, while acting in that capacity did knowingly and wilfully make false and deceptive statements in certain written returns to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada. These alleged statements the complaint outlined consisted in omitting to insert among the liabilities of the bank a considerable amount of liabilities which should have been inserted.

The evidence was to the effect that Mr. Ducout, representing the French shareholders and Mr. De Senn, who had been brought from Paris to enter the bank, went to Mr. Robert Bickerdike and told him that a loan of $200,000 had been made to Mr. D'Aoust. Mr. Bickerdike, vice-president of the bank, said that the report could not be true, and expressed the opinion that everything was going on in the bank as it should be. The two gentlemen still insisted and finally Mr. Bickerdike communicated with his brother director, Sir George Garneau, and they went to Mr. Bird, the manager of the bank, who admitted that this had been done against his own better judgment, and when asked why he had done it, he said that it had been done under the orders of Sir Rodolphe Forget, the president. When asked what he had done, Mr. Bird said that he had discounted a note for $195,000 or $193,000, and he brought out and read an acknowledgment signed by himself and the inspector of the bank, Mr. F. G. Ramsden, which read as follows:

March 7, 1912.

O. B. D'Aoust, Esq.,
Montreal.

Dear Sir,—Herewith we beg to enclose your our cheque for two hundred thousand dollars, being the proceeds of two notes for one hundred thousand dollars each, signed by you, and payable to the order of this bank on demand, with interest at four per centum per annum, and dated this seventh day of March, 1912. It is understood and agreed between us that payment on account of premiums on the capital stock of this bank, up to the extent of the amount of two hundred thousand dollars hereafter received are to be applied in liquidation of the above-mentioned two notes for one hundred thousand dollars each, until the same have been fully paid and satisfied.

The interest at the rate of four per centum per annum payable on the said notes is to be paid to the bank at its head office in Montreal on the last day of every month so long as any balance on said notes shall remain unpaid.

The said sum of two hundred thousand dollars is now advanced to you in consideration for and payment in full of all commission, legal expenses, organization expenses, and any other disbursements whatsoever in connection with and on account of the subscription to or sale of the shares of the capital stock of this Internationale Bank of Canada and the organization thereof.

Yours truly,

(Signed) Godfrey Bird,
General Manager.
F. G. Ramsden,
Inspector.

I leave it to my hon. friend—here is a note which is given for consideration. The consideration is the payment for the services of Mr. D'Aoust; and yet the gentleman who discounted the note, who gave the proceeds to the man who is the signer of that note, tells him that this note is in payment for services rendered. Was this, I ask my hon. friend, a note to be reported as money loaned? Was the statement of the manager of the bank to my hon. friend that he had loaned to Mr. D'Aoust $200,000 a true statement? Is that a transaction which is to be allowed in a bank of this country if the name of our financial institutions is to be held above reproach? Here is a note discounted on March 12, 1912, at the instance of the president of the bank. His co-directors never knew a word of it until they were told of it by one of the victims of the bank, Mr. Henry Ducout of France. Yet Mr. Knight, the secretary of the Bankers' Association, said it was a correct report which he made. The secretary of the Bankers' Association gave his imprimatur to this transaction. My hon. friend said a moment ago that it was not in consequence of these disclosures that he introduced in the Bank Act which he has presented to this House the new provisions to protect the shareholders, the creditors of the bank, and the public; he had never heard of the transaction. I believe that if he had heard of it he would have amended the Bill to prevent the repetition of such transactions; because, Sir, this is a payment, this is not a discounted note, and the very words uttered by my hon. friend a moment ago, that he understands that the note has been paid since, show that after all there was something to be looked into further. And how was the payment made? Look at the letter here. How was it to be made? As an ordinary note? Is the note without any conditions? No. The note was to be repaid to the Bank in this way:

It is understood and agreed between us that payment on account of premiums on the capital stock of this bank up to the extent of the said amount of two hundred thousand dollars hereafter received are to be applied in liquidation of the above-mentioned two notes of one hundred thousand dollars each until the same have been fully paid and satisfied.

The premiums to be received out of the sale of the stock to D'Aoust were to go towards the payment of the note. Was there ever such a farce as to suppose that the capital stock of that bank would sell at a premium? I have seen myself in a newspaper since that this note has been paid out of the proceeds of the premium. There is another thing in that to be investigated, aggravating the offense. Who believes, knowing what we know of this bank, that anybody ever paid a dollar premium to get a dollar of stock in it? I see some bankers and astute business men on the Government side of the House. I wonder if any of them will rise and say: I paid a premium to become a stockholder in that bank. The thing is a farce. Ten per cent premium, I understand, was paid by the French shareholders. The stock averaged $12.50, and the stock for which $12.50 was paid has since been sold, as I understand, to the Home Bank for $5. In other words, this colourable transaction of paying a premium was put upon the books of the bank in order to cover the payment of that note. My hon. friend to-day read a statement that there had been a resolution of the bank that there should be no commission paid to anybody for subscribing to stock, and yet Mr. D'Aoust received the sum of $200,000, according to the letter I have just read.

The said sum of $200,000 is now advanced to you in consideration for and payment in full, of all commissions, legal expenses, organization expenses and any other disbursements whatsoever in connection with and on account of the subscription to or sale of the shares of the capital stock of this Banque Internationale du Canada and the organization thereof.

These are the facts which have been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) to-day, asking for the production of these papers, which, when they are brought to the attention of the House, will justify, as he thinks, an investigation of these facts. My hon. friend will agree that there is in connection with this bank a condition of things which is not satisfactory, and which requires further light to be cast upon it. The motion of my hon. friend does not go further than that, and everything he says justifies the conclusion that the matter cannot rest where it is. It was not satisfactory for my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to take my hon. friend to task for an expression of his which, after all, was quite justified by the event. This is not the time to come to a conclusion, but enough has been placed before the public to show that the papers should be brought down immediately, and later on we shall probably hear more about the matter.

Mr. BORDEN: Throughout the observations of the right hon. gentleman there seems to have been a singular failure to realize that this bank is a going concern, and the same curious failure to realize the situation was observable in the remarks of the hon. member for Rouville. In fact, my hon. friend from Rouville, who is supported in that respect by the leader of the Opposition, made an appeal in the concluding portion of his remarks to the Minister of Finance to see to it that $200,000 out of which, as he alleges, this bank has been defrauded, should be restored to the bank. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who does not know that the Government of Canada has absolutely no power to take proceedings on behalf of or in the name of that bank to recover that money? Is there any hon. member of this House or any man in this country who does not know that the Bank Internationale, being still a going concern, has the most absolute power to go into the courts of this country and recover from any persons money owing to the bank? The Government of Canada has no more power to use the name of that bank for recovering that money than my hon. friend the member for Rouville. It would be just as sensible a thing for the Minister of Finance, standing in his place in Parliament, to appeal to my hon. friend from Rouville to institute proceedings for the recovery of that money owing to the Banque Internationale. The circumstances are absolutely different from those which were presented to this House in relation to the Farmers' Bank of Canada. That bank had become bankrupt, had gone into liquidation, and its assets were in the hands of the receiver, and an investigation was very properly demanded in this House as to the circumstances under which the treasury certificate had been issued. But the Banque Internationale is not in that position to-day. It is a going concern, and if anyone of the gentlemen, whose names have been brought into question in connection with this bank, have received commissions or any other moneys to which they are not entitled, it is not only the right but the duty of the bank to go into the courts of this country and recover that money. Either my hon. friend from Rouville was endeavouring to mislead the House when he made that statement, or he is very much less conversant with the law of this country than I would take him to be from his experience at the bar.

Now let us look at one or two of the other suggestions that have been made. Does my right hon. friend or the hon. member for Rouville suggest that from beginning to the end of the Bank Act there is one single line which prevents the transfer of shares to persons living out of Canada, or which makes subscriptions of stock any less valid because the man who subscribes for it does not live in Canada?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not say that.

Mr. BORDEN: Does my hon. friend from Rouville make any such contention?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

Mr. BORDEN: Then, let us eliminate once and for all any argument based on the consideration that a considerable portion of the capital stock of this bank was subscribed out of Canada. That is out of the way, once and for all, by the admission of my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It was not in the way at all.

Mr. BORDEN: If it was not in the way, my right hon. friend took up too much time in alluding to it. There was a proposal placed before the late administration, and passed upon by the Treasury Board. The Treasury Board of the late Administration took reasonable precautions—I do not know precisely what they were, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance regards them as entirely reasonable and proper—to see that the provisions of the Bank Act had been absolutely complied with in every respect. There was some question about the election of one of the directors, and they were informed that the certificate could not issue until that defect had been cured, and it was cured.

Mr. WHITE: In their time?

Mr. BORDEN: And in their time, before they went out of office, so that when the matter came before them, between the 21st day of September and the 10th of October, for further consideration, they were face to face with this position, that an application had been made to the Treasury Board of Canada for the issue of the certificate upon evidence as to which there was no dispute. Ten million dollars of capital stock had been subscribed, and $936,000 had been paid-up in cash upon that subscription. The only suggestion, barring one, that I have heard from beginning to end—indeed the only one that I have heard of in this debate—was that $8,000,000 had been subscribed by persons who were not resident in Canada, and my hon. friend the member for Rouville, and the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, have absolutely removed that objection by admitting formally across the floor of the House that there is absolutely nothing in it.

Under these circumstances, there is only one other consideration, and that is, if I understand the memorandum left by the former Treasury Board, that one of these subscriptions amounting to $1,000,000 had been made in trust. Anyone who has any knowledge of stocks in banks and other companies in this country knows that stocks are often held in trust, without any statement whatever of the persons for whom the trust exists, and subscriptions to the capital stock of banks and other companies are made precisely in the same way. But if you absolutely put to one side that $1,000,000 of stock in trust, so described according to a very common practice in this country and in other countries, if you absolutely eliminate that from consideration, you have still left the fact that, $9,000,000 had been bona fide subscribed beyond question, and that upon that, $936,000 had been paid-up in solid cash, and was then at the credit of the Receiver General of Canada beyond peradventure.

Well, we have wasted a good deal of time to-day in discussing objections in which, after all, there is very little, according to the admission of my hon. friends on the other side of the House. My right hon. friend Sir Wilfrid Laurier is distressed because some of the stock was subscribed at a premium. Surely he is not so absolutely non-conversant with subscriptions to the stocks of banks and other companies as to fail to understand that very often they are subscribed at a premium. I myself had an unfortunate experience in subscribing for some stock at a premium of 25, and about three years afterwards I would have been very glad to get the 25 for it, and to let the principal go.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : In this case my right hon. friend would not have bought the stock at a premium.

Mr. BORDEN : My right hon. friend seems to know a great deal more about the affairs of the bank than I do. I do not know whether I would have subscribed for it at a premium or not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : I know my right hon. friend too well for that.

Mr. BORDEN : I know it is not an uncommon practice to subscribe for the shares of insurance and trust companies at a premium. The stock of the Metropolitan Bank of Toronto was subscribed for at a premium of $100. For every $100 of stock in the bank the subscriber paid $200 in the first instance and that is not an uncommon thing. I do not know why my right hon. friend should say that I would not have subscribed for this stock at a premium. If one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House of great business experience, of the highest integrity, one in whom I would have reposed the highest confidence, had come to me and given me the opportunity I would have been very much inclined to have gone out, borrowed some money and subscribed for some of these shares. Then, I would have been strengthened by the fact that other gentlemen on the other side of the House were connected with this bank and, reposing the confidence I do in the good business acumen of these gentlemen, having more confidence in their business acumen than in their political acumen sometimes, I would have been very much inclined indeed to have bought this stock at a moderate premium of ten per cent, and I think that my right hon. friend, after consideration of the gentlemen on the other side of the House connected with this bank, will be inclined to recall his rather rash assertion that neither he nor I would have taken this stock at a premium. We would have been very glad to have got it at a moderate premium, but it would have been regarded as so valuable an acquisition that I suppose it would not have been offered to either one or the other of us.

As far as the pooling agreement is concerned, it is not before us and I do not propose to discuss it. As I understand the observations which were made with regard to it, it does not seem to me that it would affect the validity of the incorporation of the bank or bar the issue of the Treasury Board certificate. What would it have amounted to in the end ? What would it have amounted to if this bank had gone into liquidation ? It would have amounted to this, that when you came to settle the list of contributors, those names would have been placed upon the list as contributories, liable for calls upon that bank, but they would have had the right, if the practice in the other provinces is the same as that in the province of Nova Scotia, to come in under the liquidation proceedings and to ask for indemnity against the persons who had agreed to indemnify them with respect to these further calls. So far as the public interest and so far as this bank are concerned, any agreement of that kind would not weigh for one moment. The liability of these men would be absolutely the same as if no pooling agreement had been made, but they in turn would have had the right to call upon the persons who had undertaken to indemnify them against any further calls, to perform their agreement.

What else was there in the observations of my right hon. friend ? He calls in question the judgment which has been delivered by Judge Leet. Does not my right hon. friend call it in question?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : I say I do not call in question what Judge Leet says, that Bird was not liable to criminal prosecution, but that the action of Bird was contrary to the Bank Act.

Mr. BORDEN: I may not understand the proceedings properly and I speak as to this matter subject to correction. But if I do understand the proceedings correctly they were directed against Mr. Bird, or whoever the person was, for the reason that he had been guilty of an infraction of the Bank Act and the judge, whom I do not know and whose name I have never heard until these proceedings came into question, who was appointed by the authorities of the province of Quebec and not the Federal authorities, but who, as far as I know, is a reputable and capable man, has said that this man is not guilty, or rather he has said that no such case has been made against him as would justify him in issuing a warrant. That is as I understand it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is it.

Mr. BORDEN: Then, what are we discussing? The subject has been under consideration by an upright and capable judge, he has heard evidence at very great length, he has considered that evidence and, in the end, he has announced publicly his conclusion that no case has been made against this man for the issue of a warrant. What is the suggestion? Is the suggestion that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance should have come to the conclusion that Judge Leet is incapable or dishonest and should have proceeded to deal with the question upon an assumption of that kind? The question was in the court, considered by the court, dealt with by the court and the court has come to the conclusion that no case has been made out. In dealing with the case my hon. friend has acted, I suppose, upon the evidence of Mr. Knight, of which I never heard until my hon. friends opposite mentioned it, that according to the ordinary usage of bankers the course which Mr. Bird had adopted in the matter was not an unusual or irregular course.

Under these circumstances I can only say in conclusion that I regret that my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), should have made the statement he did of the action of the Treasury Board of the late Administration. He stated distinctly in my hearing—and if he had not been corrected by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, the impression would have gone all over the country, and he must have intended that that impression should be created—that there had been, in the first place, a case laid before the Treasury Board under the late Administration, that the case had been heard and considered and that there had been a deliberate refusal by the late Treasury Board to grant that certificate. The minute of the very meeting which he himself attended contains these words:

> The board, having submitted to them the further papers in connection with the application of La Banque Internationale du Canada for a certificate under the provisions of the Bank Act to enable it to commence business, is of the opinion that the matter requires more consideration than can be given to it in the present state of affairs when a change of administration is about to take place. The board, therefore, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the application, desire to leave the papers for the consideration of the new Treasury Board.

It is not to the credit of my hon. friend for Rouville to tell this House and the country, in the face of that statement made by his colleague and himself, that there had been a refusal by the late Administration to grant this certificate. There was no refusal by the late Administration to grant this certificate. The action of the Board was for the purpose of having some further evidence adduced and for the purpose of correcting a defect to which attention had been drawn. That further evidence had been adduced, the defect had been corrected, and then they left it to their successors, as they themselves stated, without expressing any opinion upon the merits. My hon. friend calls that a refusal, and, I think, did himself no credit in seeking to create such an impression. In conclusion, I can only say that there is not the slightest objection to bringing down every paper of record with regard to this matter or to any further discussion of it that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House may desire.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I was not a member of the House when the issuance of the certificate to the Farmers' Bank was discussed, but I of course from time to time read the criticisms in the Conservative press made on the Government by hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches who were then sitting in Opposition. In view of the course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in that matter, it is strange indeed to observe to-night the supersensitiveness of the Minister of Finance, and the violent indignation of the Prime Minister and other hon. gentlemen opposite at the remarks made by the hon. member for Rouville on this motion. The Prime Minister endeavoured to thrust aside the argument of the hon. member by indulging in banter and irrelevant remarks, such, for instance, as, that the Banque Internationale is a going concern. It may be a going concern, but it is in the sense of the auctioneer's 'going, going, gone.' The Prime Minister ridiculed the idea that some effort should be made to secure restitution for the French shareholders who have suffered heavy financial loss, and that investigation should be made in connection with the $200,000 paid to D'Aoust as commission for securing stock subscriptions. What the hon. member for Rouville suggested was that there should be a commission appointed to enquire into the whole matter, and if this commission should report that this money was improperly paid to D'Aoust, then there are many ways by which restitution to the bank might be compelled as against D'Aoust, or those associated with him. The Prime Minister further said that this institution is not bankrupt, and, technically I assume that is correct. It is fortunate that he is able to make such a statement. But it is nevertheless a fact that over $300,000 has been lost by French stock subscribers. I believe that no certificate should have been issued to the Banque Internationale, but no doubt there are hon. gentlemen in this House who may honestly entertain another opinion. Speaking for myself, I do say that the judgment of the Treasury Board of the late Administration, refusing the issuance of a certificate, was sound. At any rate, subsequent events proved their judgment to have been sound.

The Minister of Finance has urged that no refusal was made by the late Treasury Board, but such a conclusion is absolutely unwarranted. Speaking from personal knowledge I know refusal was made. I heard, early in October, 1911, one of the directors of this bank told by the late Minister of Finance that the certificate would not be issued. It was common knowledge at the time, that the issuance of the certificate was more than once refused. The memorandum issued by the Treasury Board just before leaving office set forth some of the reasons which moved it to refuse this certificate. It was natural that they should leave some memorandum upon the files referring to this matter, but it would hardly have been proper for the late Treasury Board to have stated in such memorandum any facts further than we find there. Anything else would have been unfair to the applicants. The fact that the certificate never was issued by the late Treasury Board is ample proof of its having been refused.

The Minister of Finance avers that because some of the shareholders and directors of the bank were then and are now members of this House and politically friendly to the late Administration, that therefore the issue of a certificate must have been meritorious. But I point out that notwithstanding that fact the application was absolutely refused by the late Minister of Finance. But after September 21, 1911, the situation changed and another Administration was at the head of public affairs and very little difficulty was met by the applicants in securing the certificate with which to commence business. It would appear that this certificate was issued within two or three days after they were sworn into office. I think I may safely venture to state that practically no investigation was made by the Treasury Board before issuing the certificate. I may safely assume that they did not make any investigation whatever, but that the demand being made for the certificate it was promptly issued.

At the beginning of my remarks I made the statement that this was a case in which the certificate should not have been issued and repeat it. There must have been reasons in the minds of the members of the late Treasury Board justifying a refusal of the application and subsequent events have proven this, and I think the present Treasury Board could easily have learned these reasons.

Perhaps some lessons are to be learned from this incident inasmuch as a revision of the Bank Act is now under consideration by this House. In a few remarks I made the other evening upon the second reading of the Bank Act, I made the statement that in the last analysis the success or failure of the banking system of this country will be determined by the men controlling and directing the management. When the Treasury Board of this country is called upon to issue a certificate to a bank for the commencement of business, the personnel of the directorate should be carefully considered. If respecting any portion of that Board of Directors there is anything justifying adverse suspicion the certificate should be withheld until a change has been made in the directorate. The Treasury Board should be granted a much wider discretion than possibly it now has under the Bank Act. It was very unfortunate indeed for Canada that matters connected with the Banque Internationale have ended as they have. The French shareholders subscribed for about $8,000,000 of the stock of the bank, owning, I believe, something like 60,000 shares. They were apparently dissatisfied with some of the directors of that institution, and believing that it was necessary for its preservation that some changes should be made they sent out to this country an attorney representing about fifty-two per cent of the total stock of the bank, duly fortified with proxies, and for the purpose of voting the proxies at a general meeting then about to be held. On his arrival in this country and on attendance at the meeting of the bank, the validity of the proxies was questioned and they were held invalid. Litigation followed, and briefly told the result in the end was that the French shareholders were obliged or deemed it prudent to sell their stock at a reduction of fifty per cent. Some lessons, I say, are to be learned from this incident in connection with the approaching revision of the Bank Act. What are the provisions necessary to constitute valid proxies should be made clear. It should not be possible to repeat the treatment accorded the majority of shareholders represented by proxy, at the meeting I have referred to.

I think further that the Bank Act should contain provisions for a careful and almost continuous supervision of a bank in the early years of its operations. Whatever form of inspection may be provided, I submit that the Act should contain such stringent provisions that it would be impossible for the directors to do anything which might threaten any bank in the early stages of its career.

In conclusion, I say that the suggestion made by the mover of this motion, that an investigation should take place in respect to the career of the Banque Internationale is quite a proper one. There are many incidents in connection with this bank's career which demand investigation. Hon. members opposite are very much interested in the investigation in progress in connection with the Farmers' Bank failure. In connection with the Farmers' Bank failure there were incidents certainly demanding investigation. This is also true of La Banque Internationale. Inasmuch as the Treasury Board of the late Administration had refused the issuance of the certificate, I must express surprise that the certificate issued with such haste and with such little consideration by the present Treasury Board. They should have assumed that there was some objection, obvious or concealed. Events which followed have clearly shown that a careful inquiry and investigation should have preceded the act of the Treasury Board. They did not I submit give the matter that consideration it deserved. The issuance of a certificate to a bank to commence business is a serious matter and what I have said will always apply no matter who the applicants are.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): I do not wish to discuss this question at any great length, but I think it is my duty to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that it seems to me most unfair that this matter should be treated in such a way as it has been dealt with by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). The object of the motion, as has been suggested by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, was to get the papers on the subject; but a great many of the remarks of the hon. member for Rouville have been directed to an effort to humiliate a political opponent who holds a seat in this House. Fortunately all hon. members who have spoken on this question have not indulged in these personal attacks which are so dear to the heart of the hon. member for Rouville. I have noticed in the press recently an intimation that the people of the province of Quebec could not deal with politics without indulging at the same time in personalities. While regretting the statement, I think the hon. member for Rouville will admit that it is, to a certain extent, justified by the fact that he so persistently makes attacks in this House upon the hon. member for Charlevoix and Montmorency (Sir Rodolph Forget).

Mr. LEMIEUX: I never mentioned his name.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let us look at this matter seriously. The hon. member for Rouville, in attacking these three companies as he did this afternoon, knows the objects he has in view and the ends he seeks to accomplish. In order to accomplish his object he has gone so far as to read a letter to this House, and, after tearing a part of it off, puts it on 'Hansard,' refusing to give the name of the gentleman who had written it. If this letter is worth anything at all the name of the man who signed it should be given. If the letter is worth the paper it is written on, the hon. member for Rouville should not decline to disclose its author. I ask hon. gentlemen if this is a fair and open way of dealing with a public matter in this House? If I should choose, Mr. Speaker, I could adopt the same kind of argument as that followed out by my hon friend and if I were to deal with some of the banks of this country, I could connect the names of certain members of this House with the names of certain banks. It is very easy to throw mud about, but when the hon. member stands up and can make assertions which are contradicted by the Minutes of a Board of which he is a member, I tell him that, regardless of the frequency of these attacks, nobody in this country, and particularly in the Province of Quebec, will heed them, and under such circumstances they will take such remarks for what they are worth. Our people will know now what the statements of the member for Rouville are worth.

We have been told by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that it is true the Minutes of the Treasury Board declared that that Board has expressed no opinion. The hon. member—who, I understand, is a lawyer of great experience, and has been Attorney General of his province—while admitting that the Minutes of the Treasury Board make a certain statement, says that in Ottawa it was a matter of notoriety that this application was to be refused by the Treasury Board. Surely my hon. friend did not wish to go as far as that. Were I to attempt to follow him in the matter of public notoriety, I would tell him that it was a matter of common notoriety that this certificate of the International Bank was not issued by the late Government because Sir Rodolphe Forget was a Conservative candidate in two counties of the province of Quebec. Has anything been suggested as a good and valid reason for the refusal of that certificate? Nothing! Can it be suggested that the pooling agreement referred to by the hon. member for Rouville was a reason for refusing the certificate or license? Let us take the argument as made by that hon. gentleman. A certain number of shareholders in the bank entered into an agreement that they would not dispose of their holdings or stock except on certain conditions. Was that a bargain entered into between the bank and the shareholders? No; it was a bargain entered into between Sir Rodolphe Forget and some of the shareholders. These people subscribed for the whole amount of their holdings; could they tell the Board of the International Bank that they refused to pay the amount of their subscriptions, because, forsooth, they had a private bargain with Sir Rodolphe Forget?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not the point.

Mr. PELLETIER: We have been told by the hon. member for Rouville that this pooling arrangement was one of the reasons why the certificates should not have been issued, and I am following up that argument. If the matter had been investigated as suggested by the hon. member for Rouville it would have been found that those men were quite able to pay the amount of stock for which they had subscribed, and therefore the fact that a private understanding existed between Sir Rodolphe Forget and some of the shareholders was no reason for the refusal by the Government of a license or certificate.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not the point at all.

Mr. PELLETIER: I know my right hon. friend did not make that point, but it was referred to by the hon. member for Rouville, and I am answering it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The point made by my hon. friend was not that the pooling agreement made by the president of the bank with the Canadian shareholders had a legal effect, but that an agreement of that kind should debar the bank from obtaining its certificate.

Mr. PELLETIER: It has been suggested that this should have been inquired into by the Treasury Board before issue of the license.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not say that, the suggestion is that it should be inquired into now.

Mr. PELLETIER: What for?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does my hon. friend approve of such practices as that, that the president of the bank should make an agreement behind the back of some of his shareholders?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not say I do, but hon. gentlemen are trying to make the point that this certificate should not have been issued, and to establish that point certain reasons are given, certain lines of argument are adopted and amongst them I find this one which I am happy to say the right hon. leader of the Opposition now says is not one of the reasons why a certificate should be refused.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That reason which my hon. friend says could not be urged because it had no legal effect against the bank, but that is not the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member for Rouville said the Minister of Finance should have inquired about the pooling agreement. It is suggested by one of the followers of the right hon. gentleman that an inquiry on that point should have been made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The agreement should have been looked into, not because it was illegal against the bank, not because it would have affected the bank, but because it was a discrimination between shareholder and shareholder and should not have been allowed, especially to the president of the bank.

Mr. PELLETIER: Surely my hon. friend will agree that this matter which is known now was not even suggested at that time. How was it made known? By the papers which the hon. member for Rouville has quoted. Some Liberal papers in Quebec have made a good deal of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was public long before that.

Mr. PELLETIER: But long after the certificate was issued. It is an absolutely safe and sure conclusion to say that this pooling agreement was no reason why this agreement should have been refused. If the certificate was all right in that respect I should like to hear from the leader of the Opposition his reason why the certificate should not have been issued.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am quite sure if this pooling agreement had been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance he would have said to Sir Rodolphe Forget: You will bring it to the attention of all your shareholders, the French as well as the Canadians.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not an answer, it is admitted now that this pooling agreement was not known at the time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was notorious.

Mr. PELLETIER: It was not notorious at that time. How could it be known? At all events we have the admission here that the matter could not have been investigated then. If it could not have been investigated what reason is suggested in that respect that a certificate should not have been issued before this matter was investigated? The two things do not go together. I discard that when everybody seems to admit that this is no valid reason for an investigation, and when further it is admitted that even if that pooling agreement existed it was no reason to refuse the certificate because the men who had formed the pooling agreement were responsible all the same toward the bank for the amount subscribed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I assert that if it was known the certificate should not have been issued until it was brought to the knowledge of the shareholders.

Mr. PELLETIER: The shareholders in France as well as in Canada had an underwriting signed by Sir Rodolphe Forget to the same effect and that is one of the reasons they objected. My hon. friend must know that, it has been alluded to in the courts in Montreal that there was such an agreement.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In what case?

Mr. PELLETIER: In the injunction suit before Mr. Justice Lafontaine. My hon. friend knows that when the meeting took place in Montreal an injunction was taken in order to prevent the proceedings which they complained of and the judge before whom it was argued refused the injunction. One of the reasons which was alleged in that respect was that there had been a second call made for something of that kind, and the shareholders said a second should not have been made because an undertaking had been given that there would be no second call. Is that not equivalent of the poooling agreement entered into in Quebec?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend approve of the organization of a bank where no second call should be made?

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not here to approve or disapprove of what the shareholders of the Banque Internationale did, but to discuss whether the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is right in saying that this Government is right or wrong in having issued a certificate to the Banque Internationale. We are told that there was a most unfortunate state of affairs, that these people in France have lost money on account of that and there should be an investigation. When the hon. member for Rouville brings out this matter of the two $100,000 notes in connection with the issuing of the certificate of the banque, he is mixing up matters, not because he is mixed up himself, but because he wants to mix them up for the public at large. These notes were not discounted before the certificates was issued by the Government, the bank was not organized before the license was issued, and the notes of D'Aoust were only discounted by Bird after the issue of the certificate by the Treasury Board. Why is that brought up here? We are told it was an ugly, bad transaction. Are we here to sit in appeal of the judgment of Judge Leet in this matter? It may be right or wrong, but surely after a judge appointed by the political friends in Quebec of my hon. friend on the other side of the House has rendered judgment, we are not called to sit in appeal of that judgment. There are other means of taking that judgment to appeal than to come to this House. I regret very much the unfortunate position of the International bank and its shareholders, but it is entirely due to the fact of this most unfortunate misunderstanding, I do not want to pass judgment upon it, which took place at the meeting of the shareholders. My hon. friend and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) have said that this was a most discreditable proceeding, to ignore the votes of the majority of the stockholders of the bank. I take issue with my hon. friend on that, not to disagree with him on the principle he has laid down but to tell him that this matter is before the courts, that the fact that those proxies have been eliminated is the subject matter of a trial before the Superior Court of Montreal, and that it is not for us to pass judgment on this before it has been adjudicated in the proper place. I was sorry, I do not hesitate to say, to see all this misunderstanding which has caused all the bad results which we have before us to-day. It is not the issuing of the license or certificate by the Government which has been the cause of this trouble, it is the trouble between the shareholders themselves and their unfortunate quarrel which resulted in this bank becoming, to a certain extent, discredited and the people not having much confidence in it. Well, Sir, this bank would have been one of the most successful banks in this country, starting, as it did, with $10,000,000 at its back, if this unfortunate occurrence had not taken place.

An hon. MEMBER : Whose fault was it?

Mr. PELLETIER : I do not know, but I think the members of this House ought to be very cautious about passing condemnation in a matter of this kind before they have all the facts before them. What the members of this House say goes broadcast throughout the country, and it is taken for granted that this, that, or the other thing is very crooked because members of Parliament say so. I think it is a most unfair way of dealing with a matter which is before the public courts of this country for investigation. We have been asked, why do you not investigate this ? Investigate what, Sir ? Investigate the fact that the Paris people have lost money ? It is true that they have lost money, but why ? Is it because the bank is bankrupt that they have been obliged to accept so much on the dollar for their investment ? No, Sir. On account of this unfortunate trouble, they have chosen of their own volition, to sell their holdings at a price which they thought fit and proper to accept. They have said: ' We have only paid 10 per cent, and they are willing to lose 5 per cent of it rather than face lawsuits.

Mr. LEMIEUX : I understand they have accepted twelve dollars out of fifty.

Mr. PELLETIER: They accepted exactly 50 per cent of the amount they paid in, and it was a very small amount that they paid in. I sincerely regret for the credit of Canada, and for the French money which is pouring into this country for our great benefit, that this unfortunate occurrence has taken place. I shall not pass judgment on it, but I claim that no member of this House, be his position as high as that which the right hon. leader of the Opposition occupies, has the right to tell this House that the matter should be investigated when there is nothing to investigate, and when we know that those French people, acting as they thought best in their own interests, have chosen to sell their holdings. If we held an investigation, what would be the result ? We would find, not that those people had lost money on account of the depreciation of the assets or of the standing of the bank, but that they had sold their holdings at the price which they saw fit to accept, and that they are perfectly satisfied to be out of it rather than face the litigation in sight. That is the whole matter, and are we to be made responsible for that ? Surely the right hon. the leader of the Opposition will not suggest that. Is it our fault that this trouble has arisen between the shareholders and the bank in connection with the appointment of the directorate, that proxies have been set to one side, or that the majority were told that a certain board should be elected. The bank has suffered in consequence of this difficulty, but surely, Mr. Speaker, public credulity has a limit somewhere, and the people draw the line somewhere. In the circumstances, I do not see that there is anything to do other than to suggest to my hon. friend the member for Rouville that he try to find a fourth chapter when he might perhaps succeed better than he has done in the three with which he has dealt to-day.

Mr. J. A. SEVIGNY (Dorchester): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, this is my second session in this House. I have witnessed some bitter, and at times exceedingly bitter, discussions, and in every case, Sir, I noticed that the subject matter of the debate was the province of Quebec and the political men hailing from that province. I noticed also, to my regret, I must say, that every one of these discussions had been started by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). That is his own business, and I have no advice to tender him; but, in my humble opinion, it seems to me he is doing very poor work for his province and his fellow people, by thus continually showing them up before the representatives of the Dominion.

As all other hon. gentlemen in this House, I have seen the beginnings of the International Bank of Canada. They were very promising indeed. Branches were opened in the leading towns of the province of Quebec. The head office, as we know, is in Montreal, where there are several very prosperous branch offices; similar branches have been started in the cities of Quebec, Three Rivers, Sherbrooke, and elsewhere. I understand that in all these places the bank was doing a very good business.

The certificate allowing the bank to open its doors was granted in November, 1911, I understand. Parliament has been in session once already in the meantime, and during that session it never occurred to the hon. member for Rouville that he should attack the Government for having granted a license to that bank, whose business was in a most prosperous condition. But there was a man who was very successful in the province of Quebec, not only in business, but also in politics. One of the great victories won in the province of Quebec during the last election, was the return of Sir Rodolphe Forget in both counties of Charlevoix and Montmorency, in Montmorency especially, where Sir Rodolphe had to contend with the allied forces of the Transcontinental, the Dominion Government, the Provincial Government and the Quebec city council. Now, against all these forces combined, he succeeded in capturing the county of Montmorency as well as that of Charlevoix. Heretofore Mr. Forget had been a great factor in the business world, and now it seemed as if he would loom up large in the political arena. It was thought desirable to run him down.

Fire was opened in Paris, under instructions forwarded from Canada. I do not wish to suggest that the hon. member for Rouville was one of those who sent out word to start the onslaught. Sir Rodolphe Forget was attacked in the first place because he was a tower of strength in Canadian politics, and the Liberals were averse to the idea of allowing a man of his parts to reach the top, and that is why unrelenting war was waged on him. He was blamed in connection with the Banque Internationale because a report, it appears, was made to the Government which, according to the member for Rouville and those who are of his opinion, is not in compliance with the regulations.

The hon. member for Rouville stated this afternoon that he had not mentioned Mr. Forget's name. That is so. But it would have been better if he had done so, it would have been fairer. He referred to a report which was made to the Government by Mr. Bird and other directors. And Mr. Justice Leet says in his judgment: I would have been justified in issuing a writ against the general manager and directors who signed this report.

Let us speak out openly. The truth of the matter is that when this report was made, Sir Rodolphe was away in Europe. So he could not sign it. That report was signed by the vice-president of the bank, Mr. Robert Bickerdike, member for the St. Lawrence division, of Montreal. I am not trying to insinuate anything against Mr. Bickerdike, far from it, he is entitled to the greatest respect from all, and no one is more willing than I am to testify to it.

There are other prominent political men connected with this bank, among others the Hon. Sir George Garneau, the friend of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: (Translation.) He was not informed of what was going on.

Mr. LEMIEUX: (Translation.) And he protested in consequence.

Mr. SEVIGNY: (Translation.) What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of the director of a ten million dollar bank who would state that he was unaware of what was going on at the meetings of the board of directors? I must say that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has of his friend, Mr. Garneau, a less favourable opinion than I entertain myself. I for one consider Messrs. Bickerdike and Garneau as highly honourable men.

Neither do I wish to make any insinuations against those who have had to do with the management of the Quebec electric railway and the Quebec and Saguenay railway. There are among them men for whom I have great respect, such as Senator Casgrain, a political friend of the hon. member for Rouville, the Hon. Mr. Dubord, member of the Quebec Legislative Assembly, and Senator McKay, all of them sturdy Liberals. Are we to say that all those gentlemen are dishonest men? Are we by means of insinuations to heap discredit on those gentlemen? I for one shall not do so. I will leave that to the hon. member for Rouville to do.

The hon. member for Rouville sheds tears on the misfortunes of the Frenchmen who, he says, lost $580,000 in the Banque Internationale. And he stated this afternoon that the French are the bankers of bankers; that is a fact, but had one of those bankers listened to the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman this afternoon, would he not have been tempted to say, and rightly so: The member for Rouville has a very poor opinion of the business ability of the French.

Are we to suppose, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen, before making up their minds to invest money in Canada, did not seek information in regard to investments and the standing of the promoters.

As stated a moment ago by the hon. Postmaster General, if losses have occurred, that is owing entirely to the fact that the Frenchmen who have invested money in that bank would not respond to a second call.

They had been assured that everything would turn out well, and that assurance was given in good faith. The same thing occurred to me; having invested some money in business ventures, after being told that I would not be called upon to pay up more than 10 per cent, I had later on to pay 20, 30 and even as much as 50 per cent. So it is with all who take such a risk, whether they hail from Paris or anywhere else. When those French shareholders were called upon to resume paying up, they refused. That was their business, but it should not be made a matter of reproof for the Government or the bank's president, Mr. Forget. That is unfair.

It seems to me, as stated a moment ago by the hon. Postmaster General, that the province of Quebec would not fare any worse if the practice was given up, in this House at least, of ventilating our petty squabbles before the representatives of the people.

The hon. member for Rouville may smile at that, but we never see our fellow citizens who speak another language, whether on the Opposition or on the Government benches, indulge in personalities as we do. It seems to me that we would be the gainers by following their example. The hon. member is free to follow his own inspiration, but if a warfare of insinuations is decided upon, that may lead us pretty far. That puts me in mind of what occurred three years ago, in connection with a bank undertaking also, in which not French capitalists, but labourers, widows and many poor people lost their savings, the result of much privation. I refer to the failure of the Charing Cross Bank, in London. That was a sensational occurrence in Canada. The hon. member for Rouville knows that he has not been spared in the province of Quebec; he has been attacked oftener than was to be expected.

Mr. LEMIEUX: (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. SEVIGNY: (Translation.) I am glad to say that I was not one of those who attacked him; I was unable to indulge in treacherous insinuations such as those he levelled at me when I interrupted him in this House last week. But here is what happened in connetcion with the facts I have just recalled. While the failure of the famous Charing Cross Bank was being discussed, an old-time opponent of the hon. member for Rouville suggested in my presence to start a campaign of insinuations against that hon. member in connection with that failure.

Mr. LEMIEUX: (Translation.) That did not prevent them from doing so.

Mr. SEVIGNY: (Translation.) I am glad to say that on that occasion I helped with whatever influence I had in preventing that campaign from being carried on. On the grounds pointed out a moment ago, I wonder why we should ventilate our mutual grievances in such manner, especially when there is no direct proof of wrong-doing. However, should that campaign of insinuations be persisted in, I believe the hon. member for Rouville would be the one to suffer the most.

Voltaire has said: 'Lie on persistently, there will always be found some one to believe you.' He was right. Mudslinging will inevitably soil the clothes of the victim. I do not propose reviling the member for Rouville who is a talented French Canadian; but if he has made up his mind to carry on a warfare of insinuations against Sir Rodolphe Forget, the hon. Postmaster General and the member for Dorchester, we are able to meet him on that ground, but the province of Quebec will suffer thereby, and the member for Rouville as well.

I was anxious to make these few remarks in connection with that matter of the Banque Nationale. I was glad to do so, because I believed I was at the same time vindicating the good name of a fellow countryman who has distinguished himself in the province of Quebec, and who it will not be possible to replace neither by the hon. member for Rouville, neither by the humble member for Dorchester. He is a leading French Canadian. His ventures may not all have been successful, but on the whole, if we consider all that the hon. member for Charlevoix has done in the province of Quebec, we realize that he can bear this testimony to himself: 'I feel proud when I compare myself with those who hurl insults at me.' He has been a benefactor of this country, of his fellow people, and men such as those I am always willing to defend.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal said on both sides of the House on this question and there has been a great deal of warmth, of temperament, shown by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) by the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) and by the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). I do not think that, upon this question, there should be any display of warmth whatever. This question requires fair and honest inquiry and the fullest investigation that the House and the country can afford. Corporations of this character, holding the very large powers which banks do hold and which are given to them by this Parliament, must always be the creatures of this Parliament and when any hon. member asks that an inquiry be made into the conduct of any bank which appears to be inconsistent with the great powers which have been conferred upon the institution, it must not be supposed that he is doing so from any sinister motive or indeed from any motive whatever except a proper one. The unfortunate thing in this case is that a certificate to do business as a bank has been given to a certain institution in the province of Quebec and it is perfectly evident that the bank is not doing business in a proper way, that its finances are in a very unsafe and unsatisfactory condition, that honest, capable business men who have paid $12.50 for shares in this bank, are to-day tumbling over each other to get clear of these shares at $5. We were told by the hon. the Postmaster General that this is only a repetition of something like Majuba Hill, that there was a panic, that these French gentlemen lost their heads, that they do not understand the situation, that they are scared. I understood him to say that this bank is in a first-class condition, that it is doing business in the ordinary way, that everything is all right and that these Frenchmen who have been struck with this panic and who are selling their stock are mistaken.

Mr. PELLETIER: What I did say was that the bank was flourishing and all right before the unfortunate difficulty between the shareholders and directors.

Mr. McKENZIE: I, to some extent, misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I thought he had reference to this trouble and the matter being brought up in the House today or the notice of motion being given.

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: At all events, the Government are responsible—I do not say wrongfully or criminally responsible—for the launching upon the financial world of this business institution. They are responsible for whether or not it was in proper shape to have received the credentials which they gave it. It turns out that it was not, that there was something wrong, that there must have been something wrong, that there must have been something concealed which they did not discover and which they say they have not discovered yet. We have had the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General storming the citadel in order to try and prevent an inquiry to discover what is wrong with this institution. Why should it not be brought to light? It was said in this House last year that there was something wrong with the Farmers' Bank which should have been discovered. It has not yet been discovered but I hope that if there is anything wrong it will be discovered. We should profit by experience and we have had the experience of the Farmers' Bank. But all the experience of that bank, all the fault finding in connection with the unfortunate failure of that institution was not enough to teach the incoming Government that there was something the matter with the application that was before them, for I am told that within three days of their coming into office they granted a certificate. That statement was made by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and it was not contradicted. I take it therefore, that within three days after this Government took office they granted the certificate. The document that was read as the minutes of the last sitting of the Treasury Board of the outgoing Government suggests upon the face of it that there were serious matters being investigated and they left these serious matters to the incoming Government. I think the Government should court the opportunity of presenting to this House and Parliament evidence to show that during those three days before they granted the certificate they went fully into every possible circumstance that to the ordinary mind could suggest itself, that they found everything all right and that upon finding everything all right they granted a certificate. If there is nothing to conceal they should court inquiry. If they simply took the documents on their face as they found them and granted the certificate without further inquiry I do not think the Government did their whole duty and if something turns out to be wrong to-day they must take the responsibility.

I was rather surprised to hear my hon. friend the Prime Minister waxing eloquent about criminal investigations that took place in Quebec. The Prime Minister may be excused for waxing eloquent although he is improperly informed on the bank question. He knows a good deal more about banking than I do for I understand he has been a director of a bank, which is one of the most respectable financial institutions of this country, but I can readily understand him being mistaken about the details of the banking business and the intricacies that surround it.

Mr. BORDEN: I beg to correct the hon. gentleman; I am not a director of a bank.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has been.

Mr. BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not saying that the right hon. gentleman is a has been in every other respect, but he has been that.

Mr. BORDEN: Has been in that respect —yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: But I was saying that I will not and cannot excuse my right hon. friend when he waxes eloquent upon a question of law, and causes the House to believe that a matter is being tried in a court of law, that the record is before us, the decision is given, the thing is conclusive, and that is the end of it and that we are not in a position to review the decision of the High Court of Justice which dealt with this matter. That, coming from a distinguished lawyer like the Prime Minister, will be received in Nova Scotia, or wherever his capacity as a lawyer is known, but it may be a surprise to some to know that this thing was never before a court at all. Does my hon. friend know of any criminal case ever having been disposed of without some process being issued? Where thieves have been brought before a court, where theft of a very serious character was charged, does my hon. friend know of any case where proceedings were instituted and that charge tried, and a final tribunal of the country passed upon it without a scratch of a pen on any paper in regard to it? I never heard of it. That is the case. This man, Mr. Leet, is paraded to this country as a judge. He is not a judge; he is an ordinary J. P. or police magistrate; that is all he is. He is not any judge of a high court of record of the province of Quebec; he is a police magistrate, a J. P. as we understand it in Nova Scotia. The Prime Minister will readily understand what would be the force of his argument anywhere on a hustings in Nova Scotia if he were to tell the people that some magistrate in the province failed to send a man up for trial, against whom there was a serious charge. He would be simply laughed at. If one magistrate would not do it, he could go before another magistrate; there is no finality at all about that. That is all this thing is. And we are told forsooth that in connection with this very serious crime involving fraud in connection with millions of money, involving fraud that is not only dealing hard and serious at the heart of the finance of our own country, but dealing hard and serious, and criminally I may say, at the heart of our reputation in a foreign country; we are told that a magistrate, an ordinary magistrate, can refuse to issue proceedings and simply say: well, I am rather of opinion that a jury would not find this man guilty if I sent him up. That is not his business. If he finds there is something to try all he has to do is to send the man for trial. That magistrate could not hear the other side at all.

Mr. PELLETIER: Oh, yes, the Criminal Code provides for that.

Mr. McKENZIE: The same Criminal Code is in vogue in the province of Quebec as in Nova Scotia and elsewhere in Canada, and this is an indictable offence, and the other side cannot be heard before the magistrate.

Mr. PELLETIER: Oh yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is bad law.

Mr. McKENZIE: The other side can be heard but if a case is made out against the accused, he cannot be tried before the magistrate. I stand by that and I submit to the Prime Minister that the law is that a magistrate cannot try the case and that the moment it is shown to him there is something to try he has to send it up to be tried by the proper tribunal. This man says in his judgment: I would be perfectly justified in issuing a warrant; there was plenty shown before me on which to issue a warrant. If that was the case it was his bounden duty to have issued the warrant, to bring this man before him and to deal with him as the criminal law directs and send him up to be tried. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that without issuing a warrant, and without this man Bird being in some shape before him, the magistrate had no jurisdiction whatever, not a particle of jurisdiction; I submit that he was never seized of jurisdiction over the crime or over this man; that the investigation was a mere farce, and that it does not lie in the mouth of so responsible a personage as the Premier of this country to tell the Canadian people that the accusation was fully investigated and the party discharged. That is what the people of this country are asked to believe when the party was never put in custody; when he was never put in a position where he was subject to be tried; when the magistrate had no control or jurisdiction over him whatever. In face of this we are told by high authorities in this House that there shall be no more investigation, that the thing has been already inquired into, and that there is to be not another word about it. The people of the French republic who are noted for their ideas of fair play and justice and thorough investigation, will not have a very high opinion of this Government, and this Parliament, and this country, when they will be told that there was a hole and corner investigation, that a few bank officials were interested in this matter and wanted it hushed, and that the Government of this country accept that as a full and final investigation of the whole business. I submit that it was no investigation at all. I submit there are a series of irregularities about this matter; that there is something rotten, because the people are losing their money and there is a fraudulent transaction admitted in connection with returns to the Government, and yet no one is held responsible. Surely if there was nothing else but that fraudulent return to the Government, in view of the burning of hands a government had in connection with this matter before, and the burnings and difficulties and trials that the poor people who invested in this institution had, that is a sufficient demand why this should now be fully investigated and the people given to understand that whatever the Government can do to clean up matters of this kind will be done. The money institutions of this country should be given to understand that they have no shelter to expect from the Government, unless the franchises which are given to them by the laws of the country are fully lived up to by honest dealings and honest transactions. I submit that the inquiry before this magistrate is worse than if there was no inquiry at all. It is a mere farce and the thing stands just exactly as it stood before that quasi inquiry took place. I make these observations so that, as far as they go, they will show the people of the country that I do not agree with the eloquent appeal made by the Prime Minister in support of this magisterial investigation when it really is not deserving of any support from him or any gentleman who understands the procedure in criminal cases in this country.

Mr. PAUL E. LAMARCHE (Nicolet): I feel somewhat embarrassed in defining what a judge is, speaking as I do after my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), who has had the honour of sitting on the bench long enough to know what definition to apply to a judge. Nevertheless, in the province of Quebec as well as in every other province of the Dominion of Canada where the Criminal Code applies, a judge is a man who has the power to hear and determine charges in criminal cases and the right to impose a penalty and send a man whom he finds guilty to prison. There is no trouble in finding in the Criminal Code a provision that there are certain offences which can be brought before two justices of the peace, and the Criminal Code also says that a magistrate in the province of Quebec has the same power as two justices of the peace, and that the offence to which my hon. friend has alluded can be brought before two justices of the peace, can be investigated by them, and if the accused chooses to be tried by these two justices and is found guilty, they can send him to jail. It is also provided in the Criminal Code that if the accused does not elect to be tried before two justices of the peace or a magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace, it is the duty of that magistrate to send him to be tried by twelve of his peers. My hon. friend has judged the trial before Judge Leet with too much levity when he calls it a farce. I am not discussing now the time which elapsed between the laying of the complaint and the rendering of the judgments, for that is not within the scope of my present argument. What we can learn from the records is that the case has been laid before Judge Leet, who has full powers to investigate it; that Judge Leet, before issuing a writ, has brought before him all such witnesses as could enlighten him on this question; and after examining more witnesses than would be examined in ordinary cases, he has decided that there can be no trial because there can be no accused, and therefore there can be no signing of any warrants. He has so decided, not only upon the testimony of an ordinary person, but after calling before him Mr. Knight, secretary of the Bankers' Association of Canada. After Judge Leet had put before that witness all the circumstances of the case and asked him whether these facts came under the offence laid down in the complaint or not, Mr. Knight answered, and I think he is the best authority in the case, that the procedure did not differ from that of any other banking institution. I conclude, therefore, either that Mr. Knight does not know his business, and I do not want to pass such a judgment on a man who has been appointed by the best bankers and the best financial men in this country, or that all the other banking institutions are similar to the Banque Internationale, and in the opinion of my hon. friend should send all their directors to jail. Although my hon. friend has been on the bench for a certain time, I think that Mr. Knight, who enjoys the confidence of all the financial people of this country, knows perhaps enough about banking to give an opinion upon which a competent magistrate—if you do not allow me to call him a judge—like Mr. Leet could render a decision. If Judge Leet is not competent, there are means in our precedure to go to another tribunal. The judgment has been: 'There is no criminal offence. Therefore, according to my duty laid down in the Criminal Code, I do not think I am justified in signing the writ.' Judge Leet had no right to send an accused to a jury where he was satisfied that there were no grounds for any indictable offence. My hon. friend has also gone pretty far in saying that the Government, only three days after they assumed office, had no right to issue a certificate to the Banque Internationale of Canada. Does my hon. friend contend that the Government had power only after two or three weeks or that they had power the day after ?

Mr. McKENZIE : My hon. friend is mistaken; I did not say that.

Mr. LAMARCHE : I think my hon. friend's words are these: 'only three days after they were in office, they have issued a license without going into the matter any further.' If I am not correct, my contention is subject to my hon. friend's correction.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I said was that they could not make very much inquiry within three days, which was the only time at their disposal. I did not say they had not any power to do it at all.

Mr. LAMARCHE: I will point out that the preceding Government had deliberated upon the question for some months. Perhaps that was why the present Government could make the decision, with the aid of the officers in the department, within three days. My hon. friends were about to give that license if they had stayed in power any longer. My hon. friend says that the Government is responsible for any faults of an institution which goes beyond its powers. I shall not join issue with him on that point; but I think that the powers of a bank lie in its charter and in the Banking Act. All Acts which are not prohibited either by its charter or by the Banking Act are allowed provided they are not against the law of the land. In the latter case the procedure is pointed out either in the Banking Act, the Criminal Law or the Civil Law of the province. My hon. friend knows that very well. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), who seems to know from the first to last the story of the banking institutions, in which I discovered many of his political friends are interested, could to-day, if he wished, lay a complaint before any of the courts of justice of the province of Quebec. I am not here to defend anybody; I am not here to defend Sir Rodolphe Forget; he can defend himself, and he is well able to do it; I am not here to defend the Banque Internationale, because I have no interest in that bank at all; I am not here to defend the French shareholders; if they consented to sell their stock below par, it is their own fault; but I speak because the state of the bank is held to be due to some political schemes, which would have put the Bank of Montreal or any other institution in the same state. A bank is like Caesar's wife; it must be above suspicion, no matter what its capitalization is If in any paper, no matter whether it is small or big, you should to-day insert news that some theft, some larcency has been committed by the directors or the higher officials of the institution, I say that by tomorrow that bank will go under, that there will be a run on the bank unless the bank is one of the strongest institutions in Canada, even perhaps without exception that bank will go bankrupt. Therefore in a few days we will have in a measure to say: surely by some political scheme, helped by the Liberal party, the Banque Internationale was put in suspicion, first the depositors and then the shareholders, and especially those who are in foreign lands, put their cases in the hands of some attorneys who make some investigation and the trouble came along; they went into litigation and after all they said the best thing to do was to get what they could sell the stock at. The old shareholders or some other financial people of courage bought in their stock for what they had paid for it, which is wellknown; and to-day the bank is not bankrupt at all, and is about to merge with another institution which is far from being in a state of bankruptcy. I think our only duty is to see whether the public is safeguarded or not. I say the public is safeguarded by the reports that we have seen, by what the reports that are before us, by what we have seen even in the reports of the judicial trial, criminal or civil in the province of Quebec in Montreal. If there has been trouble between the directors, the shareholders, and the officers, it is not because that bank is to be merged; it is not because a certificate has been issued that trouble arose, and that such rights as were possessed by shareholders, directors or officers were lost. These people will always have their recourse, under British rule, before the tribunals of the land, either criminal or civil. We have to look at this matter in a public spirit, and to discontinue frightening the people, rather endeavouring to help these institutions no matter whether they have been Liberal or Conservative; no matter whether they are friends or enemies of the hon. member for Rouville. If an unjust request is made, it is our duty to refuse it; if it is just and within our scope, it is our duty to grant it. When we view this matter in a light free from those political difficulties which have had their sources not in the formation or promotion of the institution, but from political questions evolved years before the bank was ever thought of, it will be our duty to give to the people what is their due—an appeal to the tribunals competent to give justice to whom justice is due.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to detain the House at any greater length after the elaborate debate which has taken place on this motion. I desire to say, however, that I resent the very strong language used this evening by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance when he stated that I had made reckless statements in my presentation of the case. I have made no reckless statements; I have spoken the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. I have stated that the provisional directors of this bank approached the late Administration with a view to obtaining their certificate, and that their request was refused. Let me say that I never had in my mind by that statement the thought of any political interference. I have stated this afternoon and this evening that I did not for one single moment question the good faith of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in the granting of that certificate after the resignation of the late Administration; I stated most positively that I considered the hon. gentleman was acting in good faith in the matter. I simply related the history of the negotiations between the directors and the Government, stating that after the ate Administration had refused to issue the license—an assertion which I repeat —my hon. friends should, perhaps, have been more careful in considering the issuing of the certificate. It is possible that the English word 'refuse' does not convey the exact meaning I had in my mind. The application was made in July; the late Administration resigned in October, and, from July until the period of the election, we were asked persistently, I should say daily, by the provisional directors to issue the certificate, but we persistently and I should say daily, refused to grant it. My hon. friend should not quibble in the discussion of such a serious question as to this; he is too distinguished a lawyer, and besides he occupies in this House and this country too high and exalted a position to do so. I say the meaning I contended to convey was that the late Administration had refused to grant the certificate, and I will go further. My hon. friend is daily in contact with the officers of his department; let him grant an investigation when this question comes up later—for it will come up—and I make bold to say that the officers of his department will swear that the Treasury Board under the late Administration refused to grant the certificate. As my hon. friend the Prime Minister knows, it is a very delicate and serious matter to say nay to the requests of provisional directors, but it lies within the power of the Treasury Board to do so. These people were refused from time to time, until after the elections, still persisting on their requests, they were finally told by the Hon. Mr. Fielding what my hon. friend read this evening from the minutes of the Treasury Board. I was there Mr. Speaker, and I know whereof I speak. I did not give out any secrets when I stated this evening we had refused to grant that license. My hon. friend then granted the application, and I do not blame him for that; I would rather blame others not far from him who knew it was notorious at the time that the pooling agreement was in existence, discriminating as between the groups of Canadian and French shareholders. It was notorious at the time. Also it was very well known, by myself at least, that Mr. D'Aoust, who was a shareholder to the extent of $2,000,000 had been stopped by myself in Montreal from running a lottery. I certainly could use my judgment as a member of the Treasury Board and state that I had too grave doubts as to the financial substance of this gentleman to grant him a license. I repeat that I resent the remarks which were made by the hon. gentleman this afternoon. Does he believe, forsooth, that I am doing this for pleasure, that I am enjoying the sad duty of telling the House of the unfortunate circumstances in which this bank and the foreign shareholders find themselves today? I am harbouring no hatred, I have named no one, I am discharging a public duty, nothing less and nothing more, and I fail to understand the warmth of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden), or of my friend the Minister of Finance in discussing this matter. They seem to think that this is a political question as between Liberals and Conservatives. As the right hon. gentleman stated a moment ago, there are shareholders in this bank on both sides of the House and therefore it is not a political question, and to give my hon. friend a plain and unvarnished statement as to my own position in the case, I am far from being interested in bringing this matter before the public. Names have been given, the name of the hon. member for Pictou, the name of the hon. member for Centre Toronto, and that of my dear friend from the St. Lawrence division of Montreal.

Looking over the list of Canadian shareholders I find the name of my own law partner in Montreal for a $10,000 subscription. Therefore, perhaps it would better serve my own personal interest if I said nothing. I care not, this is a public duty and I say to the hon. member for Nicolet, who has just spoken, that it is not a question of race or of province, it is not a question of personal friendship. The duty of the Government, the duty of Parliament is to see that justice is done not only towards our own people in Canada, but also towards the foreigners who have invested their money in such enterprises.

Mr. CODERRE: Do they complain?

Mr. LEMIEUX: They do, bitterly, and my friend the Secreary of State, who has ample time to read, will receive from me the complaints of the French shareholders as they have been published in the press there. I shall send the letters which the ight hon. gentleman has receeived and which I have received from French shareholders of La Banque Internationale. My friend need not go so far, let him read the Toronto Monetary Times, a paper of fifty years existence; let him read the last two or three numbers, before the judgment of Mr. Justice Leet and after it. But my hon. friend lives in Montreal; he surely reads the Montreal press. Let him read what has been said in papers friendly to the Government for months and months.

An hon. MEMBER: L'Action.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In L'Action articles nave been published week after week. I do not take L'Action as a standard paper, but I will take the statements published in a well-known paper of Quebec, Le Soleil, over the responsible signature of the editor-in chief, Mr. D'Hellencourt.

Mr. CODERRE: Is he a British subject?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not know.

Mr. CODERRE: A Liberal?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend knows that L'Action is certainly not friendly to me. It was friendly to the Government during the last election, but I do not wish to obscure the issue with politics. There are Conservatives and Liberals losing thousands of dollars in this undertaking. Over the responsible signature of Mr. D'Hellencourt, for months, this whole question has been exposed. My hon. friend asks if he is a British subject. I do not know, I presume he is. He has been living in the country for twenty years, he has been in the West, he is known by the Minister of Public Works, I am quite sure. He is a respectable citizen and enjoys the confidence and respect of the public in Quebec.

Mr. PELLETIER: No, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He has been on many occasions the president of the Press Gallery in Quebec. However, I mean to say that the question has been discussed for months in Canada and in Europe. My hon. friend the Postmaster General stated that I had made personal attacks. I have named no one. He said I had brought this matter before the House in order to humiliate somebody. I do not wish to humiliate anyone but if somebody places himself in a humiliating position I am not responsible for it. I have named no one and I would be the last man to trample on my political foe. I have nothing against the hon. gentleman whose name has been mentioned this afternoon. My hon. friend has stated that I brought up these different matters this afternoon in order to humiliate him, let me tell him this: On the return of Sir Rodolphe Forget from France last spring or summer, I forget exactly the date, but perhaps my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) who accompanied him to France could tell me——

Mr. SEVIGNY: And Sir Rodolphe was very well received.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In what month did he come back?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The end of May.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I happened one day to be at a restaurant and Sir Rodolphe was at one table while I was at another with my law partner. One of his guests the former member for Berthier, who is also a shareholder in this bank, came to me and said, 'Sir Rodolphe is under the impression that you are the author of the articles which appeared against him in the Canadian press.' It was a most extraordinary statement because the paper which published those articles has been most bitter against me for many years. and all the campaign of vilification which, according to my hon. friend from Dorchester, had been carried on against me, really took place in the columns of that paper L'Action. When I received that information from the former member for Berthier, I went to my office and wrote the following:

Dear Sir Rodolphe,—I learned with regret that you are under the impression that I may be the author or the inspirer of the campaign which is now waged against you in France and in Canada. Let me assure you that neither directly nor indirectly am I the inspirer or the author of such a campaign. I have never practised blackmailing,——

I considered at the time that the articles against Sir Rodolphe were of a blackmailing nature—

—I have never practised blackmailing in my life and I shall not begin now.

Yours truly,

Rodolphe Lemieux.

That was the statement I made in writing to Sir Rodolphe Forget. He was under that impression. Who put him under that impression?

Mr. LAMARCHE: Did you convince him by your letter?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I might not convince my hon. friend, but others will be convinced when I give them my word of honour. I know my hon. friend is keen about this, but I may say that a day or two afterwards I met Sir Rodolphe and I said to him: 'I am surprised that you have not acknowledged receipt of my letter.' 'Well,' he said, 'I thought it was not necessary. You said it was not you. I am satisfied.' And he shook hands with me. I have met him several times since, and he has shaken hands with me. He never believed the story, but perhaps the same element which, according to the statement of my hon. friend from Dorchester was willing to start a campaign of lies and calumnies against me, may have persuaded him that I did not speak the truth. I do not believe he is under that impression to-day.

Mr. Speaker. I have no interest to serve but the public interest, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada, know full well that public opinion will not stand for the explanations they gave this evening. At the time when the hon. gentleman, who is the keeper and guardian of our Dominion exchequer, is asking Parliament to revise the Bank Act, he knows perfectly well that public opinion will insist that that Act must stop such shady proceedings as characterized the affairs of the Banque Internationale. I put it to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, will he for one minute countenance the discounting of a note in order to pay Mr. D'Aoust commission on the subscription of the stock of the bank? Will he countenance the entering in the returns made to the Government of such a transaction as a current loan when it is a direct liability? I say he will not, but if he should countenance such a transaction, the public, investors, depositors, and shareholders in Canada would protest. My hon. friend the Postmaster General said there had been litigations. Who started the litigations? it is most unfortunate that there have been litigations, but my hon. friend knows the old French lines:

Cet animal est méchant
Quand on l'attaque il se défend.

The Frenchmen came to Canada accompanied by Mr. Archibald, a brilliant young Canadian lawyer, the son of Mr. Justice Archibald. He has been teaching law at the university in Cairo, Egypt, and is now practising in Paris. They came to Canada with the proxies in their possession and on reaching the meeting where they wanted to rectify what had been done, they were simply ejected. Will my hon. friend the Minister of Finance say that men representing a majority of shareholders should be ejected from a regular meeting in that way? The Frenchmen resented that, they went to court, and if, after litigation following litigation, they accepted fifty cents on the dollar, they should not be branded, as they have been by my hon. friend from Nicolet, as practically the guilty parties, the artisans of their misfortunes.

Mr. LAMARCHE: I did not say that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend insinuated it, at least I inferred that from his remarks. I understood him to say that it was their own fault that they accepted fifty cents on the dollar. Why did they do so? They accepted fifty cents on the dollar on the same principle as a man accepts half a loaf if he cannot get the whole loaf.

Mr. LAMARCHE: I said that the fact that they had accepted that price did not take away from them the right to go before any tribunal in our province.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is too intelligent, and has too high a sense of his duty as a public man, to stand by such a statement. Does he say that it is a good reason to give to the French shareholders, who have gone to one court and have not succeeded, that other courts are open to them? It costs money to come from France to Canada. My hon. friend will remember that the French shareholders were not all subscribers to the extent of Mr. D'Aoust. There are widows and orphans and poor French officers pensioned and retired, who have placed their savings in the Banque Internationale. It is in the name of the widows, the orphans and the retired officers and soldiers that I am asking the hon. Minister of Finance to be careful before giving the Banque Internationale the right to merge with the Home Bank.

One more word and I am done with this question. My hon. friend from Dorchester stated that he was sorry that a member belonging to the province of Quebec should attack another member from the province of Quebec. He had in mind Saturn, devouring his own children, and he felt very sorry that such attacks should be waged against one of ourselves. I repeat that this is not a question of race, that it is not a question of nationality. Money has no nationality, money has no religion; it is purely and simply a question of duty. Sentiment is a sorry substitute for sound finance. It is not because La Banque Internationale has been organized in the province of Quebec that I, as a public man, will be deterred from doing my duty towards the shareholders in Canada and in France. If the same thing happened in the province of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia, I would do my duty just the same.

When the Farmers' Bank case came before this House my hon. friend was not then a member. I remember that my friend, Mr. Fielding, the then Minister of Finance—and if there ever was an honest man in Canada it was William Stevens Fielding—was taken to task, was bitterly attacked; in fact, insinuations were made against his personal integrity, and, from platform to platform, from hustings to hustings, during the last campaign, his name was insidiously associated with those of Travers and Beattie Nesbitt. This is not a question of race, not a question of nationality. I remember that the hon. member for Algoma who was of the same nationality and probably of the same religion, though not of the same intellect, attacked him very bitterly during one whole afternoon in spite of the honest statement which had been made on the floor of this House by Mr. Fielding justifying his conduct in connection with the affair. No, it is not a question of race or province. Let not my hon. friend start in public life on the principle that because something wrong is done in his own province he must condone it. We belong to the minority in this Dominion and it seems to me that our first duty towards that province, towards its institutions, towards our own selves, is to prove that we know what honesty is, that we are ready to defend it and at the same time to stigmatize dishonesty when dishonesty is found to exist. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says: 'Oh, but Sir Rodolphe Forget was not alone; he was chairman of the board, but the vice-president was Mr. Bickerdike, an honoured member of this House, and that one of the directors was Sir George Garneau, ex-mayor of Quebec and president of the Battlefields Commission.' There are no more respected citizens in Canada than Sir George Garneau and Mr. Robert Bickerdike but I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to pay a visit to Mr. Robert Bickerdike and ask him what he thinks of what was done by Mr. Bird without his knowledge. When the papers come before him he will discover that Mr. Robert Bickerdike protested loudly at the first meeting of directors against the irregular transaction entered into by Bird and D'Aoust, a transaction which may not have been criminal but which certainly was irregular, and which my hon. friend will not and cannot condone. As to Sir George Garneau, he was the first man to know of that shady transaction from Mr. Robert Bickerdike. Mr. Bickerdike expressed surprise, as the judge said, and he immediately sent for Sir George Garneau as his mainstay and support in the Banque Internationale. Sir George Garneau came to Montreal and met Mr. Bickerdike; they both went to Mr. Bird, they remonstrated with him, they condemned him for his action, and he admitted the irregularity of the transaction. When the people of Canada know these facts, in spite of the warmth of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and in spite of the warmth of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in answering the very modest remarks I made about the whole case——

Mr. WHITE: Too modest.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, far more modest than the remarks which he read himself, I am sure, in the Monetary Times, which I would say is a Conservative paper.

Mr. WHITE: I do not think it has any politics.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, it is a financial paper and it must be a Conservative paper. Any way it is an old landmark and if my hon. friend compares my remarks this afternoon with the reports published in the Monetary Times I have no doubt that he will say to himself: Is it possible that I forgot myself to the extent of saying to the House that my hon. friend from Rouville exaggerates, insinuates, proceeds by way of innuendo, when he has only stated the plain unvarnished facts? My hon. friend is in better humour now; he is smiling. The shareholders are not smiling; they are crying. The Postmaster General is not smiling because he is partly responsible for this last chapter; not that he was directly a party to it, but, as I stated this afternoon, he paved the way in the two other transactions that I exposed to the House.

Mr. PELLETIER: In what way? Is that fair?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend the Postmaster General admitted himself that he did not know that his name had been in the prospectus but his name appears on the prospectus, not his name personally but his name officially as the Postmaster General of Canada.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is that my fault?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend stated and he states again that he did not know it until he learned it from me.

Mr. PELLETIER: We are speaking now of the Banque Internationale, was there a prospectus of that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let us have it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have not got it. I am now moving for the papers. The hon. the Secretary of State is too fresh. He will soon know a little more. Instead of chewing gum in the House he will know, after looking into the records in the Department of the Secretary of State, that there was a prospectus.

Mr. CODERRE: You do not know and yet you say it; it is different with me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, my hon. friend, is not aware of what is going on in the House; otherwise he would not say that. The motions I have made this afternoon will call for the attention of my hon. friend in the records of the State Department, and the documents I have moved for will be looked after by the Minister of Finance at the Treasury Board. I have said what I had to say, and nothing more. I have performed a public duty towards the people of Canada. I only regret one thing, and that is the spirit in which my motion was received by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance. But I know that to-morrow from every part of the country, and especially from Ontario, inspired no doubt by the Monetary Times, the hon. gentleman will hear enough to think seriously about this and will grant the investigation that the public of Canada demands.

Motion (Mr. Lemieux) agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31, 1912, Vol. II.—Mr. White.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: I rise to a question of privilege. On reading over 'Hansard' of yesterday, I consider that by the speech made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) my honour and character as a Canadian citizen and as a member of this House have been attacked. The member for Rouville yesterday spoke about an hour and a half in reference to the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company, Quebec Saguenay and Quebec Eastern railways and La Banque Internationale. He said that the Quebec merger as it is commonly called, of the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company never, legally speaking, absorbed the stock of the subsidiary companies. I may say that this company was incorporated by letters patent from this Government and acquired all the stock of every company which it absorbed, the same as occurred in the case of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company or any similar holding company in this country. He also said that an issue of this company's stock had been made in France. I may say that not one five cent piece of that issue was made out of Canada; every dollar of stock was taken up in Montreal, Quebec and Toronto. About a year afterward there was an issue in France of $4,600,000. The member for Rouville says that after that there was a loss of 17,860,000 francs to the French people. This was the total issue. These bonds' interests are regularly paid, they are quoted on the Paris Bourse; and I do not see how he can make out that the French people have suffered a loss on these bonds. The bonds of course rise and fall like any other bonds quoted on the market.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the hon. member speaking to a question of privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member rises to a question of privilege. It would be his right to read those portions of the speech which refer to him or which he claims were derogatory to his character; and then either make such explanations as would refute them or deny them.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. member for Rouville says:

> The result has been simply appalling; the name of Canada has been besmirched in France, and it will take years and years before the good name and reputation of the Dominion stands as high among the financial men of France as it should stand in the eyes of the financiers of all countries.

If the name of Canada was besmirched, it was by that Liberal organization of the province of Quebec, which has centred its attacks on me since the last general election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: I have been attacked all through the province of Quebec as I was attacked yesterday by the hon. member for Rouville. I have been attacked by papers in Montreal.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the hon. member in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member is now exceeding the question of privilege. He is quite within his rights in reading the particular portions of the speech which referred to him personally and giving his answers to them; but not when dealing with what newspapers outside say. He must deal with what a member of this House has said.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. member for Rouville says that a certain gentleman of the name of Paul Gaudin came to Canada last year and made a lengthy report to the bondholders on his return to France. This is true; that man was sent by the French administration of the Quebec railway in Paris; he took 25,000 francs out of the cash box in Paris and never made a report to the directors in Montreal. This man was one of those conspirators and I simply would not qualify—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. member for Rouville says that this series of works was partly undertaken during the last Dominion elections. These works were begun fourteen months ahead of the Dominion elections and were kept on during the elections just as the building of a railway continues. He speaks of the appointment of a commercial agent in Paris to succeed Mr. Poindron. Mr. Poindron was one of those who attacked me; he came to Canada; he was dismissed by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce; and after he got through with his money, he committed suicide.

Mr. PROULX: Who recommended his dismissal?

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: In regard to the prospectus which was issued in Paris stating that President Taft had his summer residence at Murray Bay, President Taft had a house at Murray Bay, was there every summer, and the newspapers say he is going back there next summer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: On the ten millions of dollars of bonds that were issued in Canada, the company is earning its interest and paying its coupons regularly. In regard to the bonds, they are quoted in Paris, the coupons are being paid and all the money realized was spent on the railway. The directors were not paid; they did not receive even travelling expenses. The hon. member for Rouville says:

There is a very small population, and, except in summer, there are very few travellers.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no desire on the part of anybody to prevent my hon. friend——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I should like to know if the hon. member is rising to a point of order.

Mr. OLIVER: My point of order is that what the hon. member is reading from 'Hansard' has nothing to do with his personality and does not require a personal explanation. Therefore, he was not within the rules of the House. I was going on to say, if I might, that there is no desire on anybody's part to prevent the hon. gentleman from saying whatever he pleases. But there are certain rules which have been laid down, and which have been enforced against hon. members on this side of the House——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. OLIVER: We merely ask that they be enforced against the other side.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think a demonstration of this nature is exactly becoming in this House. The hon. member desires to state his point of order and to give his answer. As I understand it, the hon. member was referring to a prospectus which was put out by one who was president of a company referred to, containing certain allegations which are denied, but which he declared to be correct. The first, as I understand it, is in reference to the fact that Mr. Taft had his summer house there. And there are other things stated in the prospectus, and, as I understand it the hon. gentleman was defending these statements as being correct.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. gentleman said also that in the speech of the hon. member for Montmagny—I suppose he means Montmorency——

Part of the embankment has been graded, but instead of being started at Mile 30 in the county represented by my hon. friend the member for Montmagny.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET.

I suppose he means Montmorency——

—the road was started at the other end, in order to facilitate same private speculators.

The road was started at the proper place—beginning from the end of the Quebec, Charlevoix and Montmorency railway at St. Joachim and on to Murray Bay and Nairn's Falls. The hon. gentleman refers to the report of Mr. Gaudin and says that this gentleman:

—condemns a series of private speculations which took place out of the money of the unfortunate bond French bondholders.

I deny that in toto, so far as I am concerned, inasmuch as I never sold a share or a bond of the Quebec and Saguenay railway, the Quebec Eastern, the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company. Of this $4,000,000, as I have said, every dollar was spent on the road. There is still due in round numbers $855,000, and about $600,000 will complete the road—and it will be completed.

As to these French financial papers which are mentioned in the speech of the hon. member for Rouville, they are nearly all blackmailing papers in Paris. One of them, the one taken over by Quebec politicans, is Le Marche. This is one which goes under the name of C. Ferriers, chief editor and managing director. His real name is Krolikoski. He is nothing but a jailbird, as I can prove. I may say also that the man who runs the paper L'Action in Montreal, is also one Fournier, who is a jailbird, a morphine fiend and a drunkard.

The hon. member for Rouville further says that the dividends which were paid on the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company were never earned. Every one of those dividends was earned, and the accounts were passed by the firm of P. S. Ross & Sons, one of the best firms of accountants in Canada.

Now, I come to La Banque Internationale du Canada. In his speech, the hon. member for Rouville said that the north shore of the province of Quebec was a poor country, that the road could never earn dividends. Sir, such a statement was made by the Liberals with regard to the Canadian Pacific railway that it would never earn enough money to pay for wheel grease. Now, as to the Banque Internationale, I must say that no bank in Canada could have stood what that bank stood without closing its doors. The bank was incorporated in the spring of 1911. Some French people came over from France and wished to start a bank with $10,000,000, in Canada. They came to me and said they could have about $7,000,000 subscribed in France, if we could get $3,000,000 subscribed in Canada. They agreed to get this money subscribed for a forfeit of $200,000. They would pay the expenses of the bank, incorporation and everything else, until the bank was opened, and they would pay the $10,000,000—fifty million francs—in Montreal with exchange at par in Canada, I considered that $200,000 for a $10,000,000 institution was very cheap. The stock was subscribed at 102½—two per cent to go to cover the $200,000 and the other one-half per cent to go for expenses. When all this was done, the bank took offices in Montreal, engaged clerks, and for six months these people had to pay all the expenses—salaries, rental, taxes, charter, lawyers, everything. But they never expected it would take so long to get a license. An office was opened in Paris—I wish the hon. member for Rouville to listen to this—with four French directors, men of the best character, and a manager named Mr. Laurette. This office in France had not been going on very long, when we found in Montreal that the statements were not made according to Canadian banking law. We found fault with that. There is where the trouble began. We wrote to Paris and said that they had to send their statements according to Canadian banking law. This they refused to do. I went to Paris and remonstrated with them, and they agreed that they would do as required in the future. I came back. But a month later I found out that they were not conforming with the law. We told them that if they did not conform with the Canadian law we would have to close the office in Paris. They were doing business as it is done in France. They discounted notes, which never passed through the books and rediscounted them in the Bank of France, and there was only one-half of one per cent commission, whatever it was. We found fault with that. Later, the hon. gentleman for whom the hon. member for Rouville shed tears, sent over for $50,000 of the bank circulation to be given to the immigrants coming to Canada, as is done in Liverpool. Of that $50,000, $5,000 was put on the Niagara boat of the French line, and the other $45,000 was sold with the seals unbroken in Germany, and sent to Montreal. When we found these people doing such a thing, we instructed them to close the Paris office. Immediately, they sent out a circular to the French shareholders, which is as follows:

Banque Internationale du Canada.
Paris, July 25, 1912.
60, rue de la Victoire.
Paris Agency,

Gentlemen,—We have the honour of reminding you that at the general constitutive meeting of the shareholders of the Banque Internationale du Canada which took place in Montreal on the 28th of August 1911, it has been decided that the general annual meetings of our institution would take place on the second Tuesday of August of each year. The first meeting to take place on the 13th of August, 1912.

The shareholders could not then forsee the delays experienced in obtaining the charter granting us the right of beginning operations.

The Banque Internationale du Canada having been unable to open its wickets to the public before the 17th of October, the Canadian directors then had to change the date of the date of the closing of the books for the fiscal year from June 30th to the 30th November.

We had therefore thought that the 13th of August 1912, could not be maintained, but we hear that our Montreal colleagues had to abide by the resolution passed at the general meeting on August 28th, 1911, and that general annual meeting will take place on the 13th of August, 1912.

Under these conditions, it is our duty to furnish you with the means of being represented at this meeting, and to this end we are sending one of your co-shareholders.

We would therefore be much obliged to you for returning us the two power of attorney forms, duly signed, which you will find under cover, and we will take the liberty of calling your attention to the necessity for the European shareholders of retaining the majority at the meeting which is to take place so shortly. All omissions or delays in returning these enclosu es would prevent the representatives, chosen by the French directors, from accomplishing that for which he was sent.

In the meantime, we beg you will accept the assurance of our high consideration.

BANQUE INTERNATIONALE DU CANADA.
S. V. Chomereau-Lamotte,
President of the Paris Committee.
Stanislas Bacel,
Director,
Raoul Sautter,
Director.

I wish to read the following letter from Bordeaux:

A copy of my letter which you will find under cover should leave you no doubt in this regard. It was in reality sent to you, since you have given your representative the right of opening all letters of this kind addressed to you; therefore you cannot blame me for giving this power of attorney. Since you had the right to do as you chose with it, the name of the party to make use of the said proxy was not entered, and the fact of your representative sending it to the Paris agency, rue de la Victoire, was a proof that you approved of the choice of the French representatives. What more could I do than leave things entirely in your hands?

If I have written at length on this matter, it is because you probably know nothing about the matter if you do not read the correspondence addressed to your Paris agency.

Believe me, with kind regards,
A. CLAVERIE.

I have here also a letter from Paris, which reads as follows:

I have signed, and I regret it now, the power of attorney in favour of the French representatives. I did not know who was to go to Canada, in that capacity, nor what they would do when there, but in face of the bad work done by these gentlemen, it is impossible for me to share in their views, I would therefore be very grateful to you if you would either pay the second call, as you had bound yourself to do as per syndicate agreement, or take back my shares.

I know several members of the syndicate who would, I believe, be quite wil ing to dispose of their shares in your favour.

Hoping to receive a favourable answer, I beg you will believe me,

Your respectfully,

L. HESSE.

Cashier of your Paris Agency.

I wish also to read the following letter.

After what I have learned from Mr. de Richecour, on his return from Canada, concerning the Banque Internationale, I consider it contrary to my interest to be in any way associated with a transaction which will result in stopping the operations of the bank. I therefore beg you will take note that I have not given my power of attorney with the view of having the actual president set aside, and I wish to make it clear in this letter, that I will have nothing more to do with the group whose intention, it seems, is to attack the president. Furthermore, I will add that I am ready to give up, in favour of Sir Rodolphe Forget, my 200 shares at the initial price of $2,000.

Please accept, Sir, my kind regards,

Vte. de SAINT-ANGEL.

The letter following comes from a big banking house in Paris, representing 12,000 shares, and is signed by Jacques Duboin:

Sir Rodolphe Forget, President,
Banque Internationale du Canada,
Montreal.

On account of the events which have just taken place, it has been impossible for me to write, but you must have learned through Mr. Chouillou, what my attitude has been, from the start in the strife over the bank matters.

The majority of the French shareholders have not been kept posted as to the intentions of the French directors, and you know how the greater number of proxies were obtained.

The circular, which came under same cover as the blank proxy form, and signed by three of the French directors, still on the board, said that its object was to make sure that a representative be sent, but gave no details whatever as to what his mission would consist in.

You have seemed surprised, Mr. Chouillou told me, that none of the shareholders afterwards cancelled proxies that had been used in such a dangerous manner. The answer is quite simple. These proxies asked for by the directors, in the name of the Banque Internationale du Canada itself, had been signed, as one signs proxies that are asked for by a large number of foreign companies, when about to have their annual meetings. Not one shareholder in a hundred (and we amongst them) could remember the exact wording of the proxy, and the majority thought that this proxy would have no more value the day following the meeting for which it was given. Why then cancel a proxy that was valueless?

I hold at your disposal a number of letters from shareholders, all of which confirm what I have written above.

It goes without saying that no one in France, except perhaps the directors, have given any one power to represent them in any lawsuit or to enter any such proceedings. The representative which went to Montreal was sent by the directors, and not by the shareholders.

The shares which I represent figure in the list of shareholders as follows:—J. d'Anchald, de Lavaux, de la Fressange, C. Cheron, Baronne Hoquetis, Eloi Duboin, Jacques Duboin, de la Chapelle & Cie.

These shareholders have shared, in every respect, my way of thinking and regret exceedingly that grievances, of which we know nothing should have been made the cause of such a campaign against the bank.

After having obtained the proxies, these three persons left Paris and came to Montreal. The meeting was to take place at 12 o'clock noon on the 13th of August, and they arrived about fifteen minutes before that time. At the meeting they were the only two shareholders present, and they asked for an adjournment until the 10th or 13th of September, and that adjournment took place. Many of the proxies deposited in the bank about ten days afterwards were not dated, and, in some cases, not duly authenticated, and many of them were women's proxies not authorized by their husbands. I consulted the best solicitors in Canada in regard to the matter—Messrs L. T. Marechal, K.C., and J. L. Perron, K.C., and J. N. Greenshields, K.C., and Hon. L. O. Taillon, K.C.; moreover, I asked also the opinion of Judge Mathier the Dean of Faculty of Law of the Laval University, and, having regard to the opinion of these five gentlemen, when the meeting took place, I ruled the proxies out.

The hon. member for Rouville has stated that the gentlemen referred to were physically ejected from the meeting; that statement is unfounded and untrue. They immediately took out an injunction to prevent the bank from further proceeding, but this was thrown out by Hon. Judge Beaudin. Later on a quo warranto was taken out to put the directors out of office, and this also was dismissed. The supposed mandataires before leaving Paris, were given by the French directors the sum of 50,000 francs out of the bank funds. I would direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that some of the French shareholders are now going to sue for the recovery of the 50,000 francs. The hon. member for Rouville has said these people were losing $568,000. They sold 53,000 shares, for which there was paid not $12.50 but $10.25, and they sold them for $5, making a loss of $265,000. The bank did not lose one cent in Canada, and in Paris the amount lost was about $150,000. The office is now closed, and we will have the last statement very soon. When hon. members opposite make the statement that these people lost their money, I may remind them that all the capital except this $150,000 is in the Bank Internationale, and that the syndicate which takes over the affairs of the bank will be making a good bargain. The member for Rouville said that he knew that this bank was never going to be a success. Never did any bank succeed so well until the French people, deceived by a clique of Quebec Liberal politicians, made up their minds to close the bank so as to hurt me. Without any publicity, not $500 worth of it, within six months the circulation of the bank was at its maximum, and the deposits amounted to $2,300,000.

Now I come to that famous note of D'Aoust. Mr. D'Aoust is the man who received the $200,000 for incorporating the bank, but he was not to get that money until the $10,000,000 had all been paid up as well as the premium and that money transferred into Montreal. It is said that I pressed on Mr. Bird, the manager of the bank, to do this. I was not in Montreal at all. It was said that I signed that report for April or May. I was then in Paris. It was the hon. member for St. Lawrence division, the vice-president of the bank who signed that report. Had I been in Montreal myself I would have signed it; I am not shirking the responsibility. When I came back I signed it for the following month. I considered the transaction perfectly legal, absolutely legal, and the day when it was decided not to call the further money we simply told Mr. D'Aoust that the premium on the $9,000,000 had not come in he would have to pay his note and he paid his note. As far as signing the bank statement is concerned, I want to know what does the president of a bank, take the Canadian Bank of Commerce for instance, which has over 380 branches from Halifax to the Yukon,—what would the president or general manager in Toronto, who signs that statement, know about these ? I consider that everything that was done in connection with the bank was perfectly and absolutely legal. There was not a dollar lost, not a cent lost, and as I said the whole trouble was due to the fact that under the leadership of my hon. friend from Montmagny I decided to run in Montmorency to break up that clique that they have ever since been making a set at me through all their newspapers.

The hon. member for Rouville said that he does not take much stock in certain papers which were blackmailers. He said that in his letter to me. But he referred to Le Soleil. Le Soleil is edited by a deserter from the French army who came to this country knowing nothing of the marriage law. And these papers were sent by the thousands to France and the French papers were sent by the thousands into Canada against me. But notwithstanding all that I do not feel ashamed of what I have done. I am not ashamed of the men with whom I am associated, Senator Casgrain, Sir George Garneau, the hon. member for St. Lawrence division and the hon. the Postmaster General. I do not feel ashamed of them and if the hon. member for Rouville is anxious for an election, I am willing today to resign my two seats, let him resign his own, and I will give him the choice of one out of the three and run against him in whatever constituency he chooses. Is this fair play?

Mr. OLIVER: I rise to a point of order. I wish to ask if in your judgment my hon. friend is within his privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: I assume that hon. member thought it was necessary in vindication of his character. As it was single passing remark I did not think it worth while to rise and interject.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. member may choose Montmorency, Charlevoix, or Rouville. I think it was the right hon. the leader of the Opposition who gave a good many reasons why the license was not granted. I may say that the principle reason was that I was running in Montmorency against the son of the president of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, the bosom friend of the leader of the Opposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I deny that altogether.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: You deny the bosom friend?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I deny that a certificate was refused on any such consideration as that just mentioned by the hon. member. The certificate was refused because one of the directors had not been duly qualified when he was elected.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Eight directors out of nine were elected. I remember that objection was taken because one of the directors had his shares in his firm's name, but let me say that the Hon. Mr. Parent came to me in the Chateau Frontenac and offered that if I would not run in Montmorency he would get me the license.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I know nothing of what Mr. Parent may have done, and moreover I do not believe that Mr. Parent ever said anything of the kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The offer was made at 2 o'clock in the morning in the Chateau Frontenac, and he added a rider in offering to have me elected by acclamation in Charlevoix. I told him that I knew we would get the license because we had done more than the law required. The law requires that only $500,000 should be subscribed and $250,000 paid in. There was very close to a million dollars paid in and $10,000,000 subscribed.

I saw in the Montreal Gazette this morning that the hon. member for Rouville said his partner had lost $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I said he had subscribed $10,000.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Well, he is not going to lose $10,000. He has $1,025 paid, and if he gets $5 he will lose $512.50, which he can well afford to lose, considering the amount of money he is making otherwise.

As to the charge that was made against the manager of the bank, I consider that there is no more honest man or better qualified manager that Mr. Bird. He was for twenty-seven years with the Bank of Toronto. Again, there was nothing but a political game in that, and judgment would have been given, I am sure, much quicker if it had not been for some pressure brought by somebody whom I shall not name.

Mr. OLIVER: I again rise to a point of order, I ask you if there is any limit to the privilege of this gentleman in addressing the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is rather reflecting on the Chair. I have been exercising my best judgment as to the limit to which the hon. member may travel in vindication of his own character, and, so far as my judgment enables me to say, I think that, with the exception of an occasional observation that might very well have been left out, he has been quite within his rights.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to say, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order; sit down .

Mr. OLIVER: I wish—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I did not intend any reflection on the Chair.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. member for Edmonton says that there has been no limit to my privilege, but there has been no limit for the last year to the attacks against me. I have been accused of everything but murder and all this is due to the fact that the toll gate in Quebec has been abolished. The hon. member for Rouville also said that these bonds had been offered in Paris with the promise of a guarantee from the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company which promise had not been carried out. The Quebec and Saguenay debentures were never sold in Paris. All these bonds were bought by the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company, and they issued their own bonds against them and therefore there was no guarantee necessary. As far as the vigilance committee is concerned, of which the hon. member for Rouville spoke, I will produce proof, if the hon. member wants it, that these same people have been trying to do me up. I will produce proof to show that they have been again trying to blackmail me. I have telegrams and letters telling me that if I would pay them 40,000 francs they would not make any complaint in Paris and that request being refused, they came down to 30,000 francs and then to 10,000 francs. We have refused every proposition of that kind. They said that they proposed to send another engineer to Canada and we said: Send on the engineer; the light is shining, everything is open for inspection, the road is earning about $2,000,000 a year and the engineer will be well received. The hon. member for Rouville asks the Government not to do anything to assist the construction of a railway on the north shore of the St. Lawrence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member is going beyond his rights in discussing that question.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: The hon. member for Rouville says:

> That is why I have given a friendly warning on many occasions to my hon. friend, the genial Minister of Railways and Canals. I have told him that I was so happy to see him occupying the very high position of Minister of Railways and Canals in this country, that I wanted to see him there a very long time, but that if he gave in, if he fell into the scheme, if he succumbed to the temptations of the sharks, he might perhaps find it awkward some day.

I understand from this that the hon. gentleman wishes to imply that the people who built the Quebec and Saguenay railway and all those who were associated with me in the enterprise, were sharks. He also said that there was a judgment, not against me, but against the Quebec and Saguenay railway. There has been no judgment,—not one. Our lawyer, who is a good lawyer, through some mistake, did not appear, and that was all; next day he appeared and the case went on. I think I have given all the explanation necessary to the House on this subject. I will just say that if an inquiry is granted I will be delighted to have it because I will there demonstrate the truth of every word I have uttered to day, as I will also show conclusively that there is no truth in what has been said by the member from Rouville. The hon. member for Rouville referred to a meeting and asked if the Government had received a report of it. In that connection I may say that out of 100,000 shares the people to whom my hon. friend referred managed to collect 12,000. Any letters or papers that I have I am willing to show the hon. member for Rouville. Before sitting down I again extend this challenge to the hon. member for Rouville, that I will resign my seats for Montmorency and Charlevoix if he will resign in Rouville and contest any one of the three counties with him on this issue.

Mr. LESPERANCE : As I have been and still am connected with the company, the directors of which have been attacked by the hon. member for Rouville, I also beg to be allowed to speak to a question of privilege. I shall not be very long; I know that the patience of the hon. member for Rouville has been very much tried today and I shall endeavour to keep my remarks within one or two points which have been mentioned in the course of this discussion. One of these points has reference to the famous meeting of shareholders where certain people were represented by proxies. The hon. member for Rouville said, in speaking of that meeting:

The French group subscribed $8,000,000 and they paid 10 per cent. The Canadians subscribed two millions. On September 3, 1912, the annual meeting took place in Montreal. The French had subscribed $8,000,000 and let us see how our dear cousins from France were treated by their fellowmen in Canada. The French shareholders sent to the annual meeting two representatives accompanied by a young Canadian lawyer, the son of Mr. Justice Archibald, who is practising law in Paris, and with the proxies representing the $8,000,000 in their possession. What happened, Mr. Speaker? They were simply evicted just as the tenants of old in Ireland were evicted. Some fault was found with the way in which the proxie had been prepared. There were some irregularities, and those shareholders who represented $8,000,000 worth of stock were ejected forcibly from the room where the delib rations took place.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you have in that statement a sample of the nature of the campaign that is being waged in the province of Quebec by some hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House. I cannot, and be within the rules of Parliament, describe this statement in the language in which I would like to describe it, but I will say that that statement is recklessly untrue. I was present at the meeting as a shareholder, and at that meeting I was made a director of the Banque Internationale for the first time by the unanimous vote of the shareholders present there. At that meeting, the question of the proxies came up. I think it well that I should tell the House the names of the men who were then elected directors of the Banque Internationale, and leaving aside myself, I say these men to-day who form the board of directors of that bank, are among the most representative men in the province of Quebec, both as regards their financial standing and their position in the community. I give their names: Mr. Paul Galibert of Montreal, whom everybody connected with commerce in the province of Quebec knows is one of the most independent and progressive, and most honest business men in the whole province; then, there is J. M. Fortier, who is to the front in every industrial movement and who bears a high reputation in the city and district of Montreal; then there is Sir George Garneau, whom the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) well knows, and I am sure he will not question Sir George Garneau's motives when he accepted a directorship in that bank and shared in the responsibility of its management; then, there is Mr. Bickerdike, the hon. member for St. Lawrence in this House, who, I think the member for Rouville will admit is a man of high standing in the province of Quebec; then, there is the Hon. L. O. Taillon, who, although opposed to the hon. member for Rouville in politics, the hon. member will not deny has a high standing in the province of Quebec and in the whole Dominion; then, there is Mr. Trefflé Bastien, the well known capitalist of Montreal, whom the hon. member for Rouville knows well, and I am sure he will not question Mr. Bastien's qualifications. Before I consented to become a director of that bank, I knew there were some rumours; I knew the French people wanted to create trouble at that meeting, and consequently occasion was taken to have the best legal advice that could be given on the matter of the proxies. There was read at that meeting a letter from the Hon. Judge Mathieu who, not only in the province of Quebec but in the whole Dominion is considered one of the best legal lights in the magistracy. The Hon. Judge Mathieu not only said that he believed the proxies were not regular, but he went further and said in that letter that he could not see how they could be accepted at that meeting of the shareholders. Other famous lawyers, Mr. J. N. Greenshields, K.C., of Montreal, Mr. Marechal, K.C., the Hon. L. O. Taillon, K.C., and Mr. Perron, K.C., also expressed the same opinion. After having heard the opinions of these eminent counsel the shareholders present decided unanimously to support the president's decision that the proxies should not be accepted. It would seem to me to be due to the dignity of this House that the hon. member for Rouville, before he brings up in this House a matter which involves the credit of a bank and the reputation of gentlemen of high standing in this country, should have acquainted himself with the true facts. I trust that the hon. member for Rouville will take advantage of the present occasion to correct his statement; I think he owes it to this House and to the gentlemen who have been attacked that he should do so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to answer in one sentence the remarks which have been made?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see anything in the rules which would justify me in allowing a debate on this without a motion properly before the Chair.

THE FRUIT INDUSTRY.

Mr. SEXSMITH moved:

That that part of the report of the Minister of Agriculture for the year ending March 31, 1912, relating to the fruit industry be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

He said: The proceedings of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization in the past have been to a certain extent irregular, and after consultation with the Minister of Agriculture, in order to get the committee on a better working basis, it was decided that this motion should be presented to the House. I think if it is passed we will be able to make investigation into the fruit industry and get information before the country which will be of decided value.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Government notice of motion:

That on Wednesday the 29th January, instant, and all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the House will meet at 3 o'clock p.m., and that the sitting on such days shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days, and that on said Wednesdays Government orders will have precedence immediately after notices of motions for the production of papers.—Mr. Borden.

Mr. BORDEN: I have discussed the matter with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and I am prepared to modify the motion in a manner which I trust will be acceptable to hon. members on both sides of the House, and by which it will be provided that on and after February 12 Government orders shall have precedence on Wednesdays, immediately after notices of motions for the production of papers, and that on and after Wednesday, February 19, the House shall meet at three o'clock on Wednesdays and sit in the evenings as on other days.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In so far as we are concerned on this side of the House, we have no objection that the sittings on Wednesdays should be the same as the sittings on other days, that is, from three o'clock to the adjournment, instead of from two to six. My right hon. friend suggests that this should take place on and after the 19th of February. If that suits the convenience of the House, of course we have nothing to say in the matter. With regard to the other parts of the motion, that is to say, that on said Wednesdays Government orders will have precedence immediately after notices of motion for the production of papers, I would suggest to my right hon. friend that he do not press that part of his motion to-day. The Order Paper is heavily charged with Public Bills and Orders. Some of the Bills on Public Bills and Orders have been called only once during the present session, if my information is correct; none of the Bills on that occasion were printed, and therefore could not be taken up. There are many Bills on the Order Paper; there is the Bill of my hon. friend from Selkirk, respecting the Pollution of Navigable Waters, which is a question of great importance. I shall be sorry if he cannot have the privilege of a discussion on it during the present session; but I doubt if it can be taken up if the Government is to take Wednesday as a Government day. On the other hand there are on the Order Paper at the present time 162 motions. It is true that three or four of these motions have been called more than once; but at least half of them have not been called at all. I believe that a good many of these motions are not debatable; and if they were passed, would be disposed of. A good many are debatable and before the Government deprives the private members of Wednesdays, I think it would be well to see what progress we can make with the disposition of the Notices of Motion and the Public Bills. If my hon. friend will accept my suggestion, he will not press that part of the motion to-day.

Mr. BORDEN: I think my hon. friend is not correctly informed as to some of the matters he has mentioned. As regards the motions on the Order Paper of yesterday, numbers 1 to 8 inclusive have been called three times; numbers 36 to 40 inclusive have been called eight times; numbers 41 to 44 inclusive have been called seven times; numbers 45 to 47 inclusive have been called six times; numbers 48 to 53 inclusive have been called five times; number 54 has been called four times; numbers 55 and 56 have been called three times; numbers 57 to 60 inclusive have been called twice; numbers 61 and 62 have been called once. I realize that in addition to these there are a number of motions on the Order Paper which have not been called at all. Probably most of them might very well have been put on the Notices of Motion for the production of papers. Therefore there is not really so much on the Order Paper which would interfere with that part of my proposal. As far as Public Bills and orders are concerned, I think my right hon. friend is substantially correct, although they have been called twice; once on Thursday, December 5, and again on Tuesday, December 10. There was no opportunity to go on with some of them at that time; but there was opportunity to go on with others. I agree with my right hon. friend in reference to the importance of the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Selkirk; I think it passed through the Senate about two sessions ago. I shall be prepared to give an opportunity for the consideration of that Bill, because it is proper that the House should consider it. We shall have all Mondays, we shall have to morrow and it is important that the necessary business of the country should be proceeded with unless we are to remain here for a very long time during the present session. I should not like to press upon my hon. friends on the other side of the House a proposition which they strongly oppose so far as the business of the House is concerned. I should be very glad if the right hon. gentleman would reconsider the matter, and come to the conclusion that Government business might have precedence after the 19th of February at least. I have asked for it from the 12th, but I will be willing to meet him and say it shall only have precedence from the 19th. That is a very considerable compromise, because Wednesday the 12th will be a whole day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As Wednesday February 5 is a holiday, before the 19th of February you will have only three Mondays and two Wednesdays to dispose of the large number of motions on the Order Paper.

Mr. BORDEN: I am not going to take Mondays at present.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, no. What I wish to say is that it is impossible in five days to dispose of the whole of the Order Paper. I must say frankly to my hon. friend I do not think we can dispose of it. I know that every session some sacrifices have to be made and some have to suffer. There are some very important discussions, some very important motions and some very important Bills; and I think before members are deprived of the privilege of discussing these matters, that my hon. friend should try to give them an opportunity of doing so. On the 12th of February or later he can renew his motion, and if we have made reasonable progress I shall impose no opposition on my part.

Mr. BORDEN: I shall be willing as the right hon. gentleman suggests to let it stand to-day in that way, that on Wednesday, the 19th February, and all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the House will meet at 3 o'clock, p.m., and proceed as on other days; but I must not be regarded as having given up the idea that by that time it will be necessary for the Government to take Wednesdays.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Possibly.

Mr. BORDEN: I think it will. I am willing not to press the matter to-day, and to have further conference with the right hon. gentleman in regard to it.

Mr. CURRIE: Before the motion is disposed of, would it not be advisable to appoint a committee to revise the rules in order to provide for the meeting of this House at two o'clock. The sessions are getting so very long that I think that we ought to work a few hours longer during the day and especially during the daytime. In the British House of Commons, it is provided that a member cannot put fifteen or twenty motions on the Order Paper and let them stand there all session, or practically what is called blocking motions. We have several matters in our rules which date away back to 1867, such as that no member can bring in a Bill referring to trade without approaching it with a resolution. These rules have been amended in the British House of Commons. And I, as one of the members of this House, would like to see some amendments of the rules which would provide for greater expedition in the work of the House.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PILOTAGE ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have seen it stated in the papers that on acount of the many accidents which have taken place recently on the St. Lawrence route, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries intended to appoint a commission concerning pilotage systems in Canada, and especially on the St. Lawrence. May I ask if that is the case?

Mr. HAZEN: The information of the hon. gentleman is in the main correct. An Order in Council has been passed authorizing me to appoint a commission to investigate matters connected with pilotage on the St. Lawrence. That commission will be confined to the St. Lawrence; I thought it best not to complicate the matter with other questions, as these could be investigated, if it were found desirable, later on. In the course of a day or two, I hope to announce the names of the commissioners. On appointment they will at once enter upon their duties.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): May I ask the Prime Minister about an order of this House that was passed twelve months and four days ago. The case of my hon. friend from Red Deer is a little one compared with nine. It is all very well to have the rules of his House revised as suggested by my hon. friend from Simcoe, but I think it would be better to obey the rules that are already in existence. This order was passed on the 24th of January, 1912. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister made the remark that it was a comprehensive order and said there would be some delay in filling it. I renewed my question last session and further delay was asked for. At the end of the session the right hon. gentleman said he would send me the papers during the long vacation. The vacation has been over for some time. I know the right hon. gentleman was busy in England—I understand that. We know the result of his work; it was a case of 'emergency.' He came back to Canada and we resumed our duties here in November. I again renewed my question and received no answer. More delay was asked for. Before the Christmas recess I asked the question, and the same answer was given me. I do not suppose the right hon. gentleman is serious in trying to make the House believe that over a year is needed in order to make the report I have asked for. That report could be made in a couple of days by an officer going through the reports of the Auditor General.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What was it about?

Mr. WILSON: The motion was for a list of the dismissals—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Oh, that is too long.

Mr. WILSON: It must be very long indeed. I asked for this return to cover only the time from the first of October, 1911, to the tenth of January, 1912. We are still waiting for our answer. But this was an order of the House, duly passed, and it is to be respected and complied with.

Mr. BORDEN: I will again direct the attention of the Secretary of State to my hon. friend's motion. I entirely agree that he is entitled to precedence over my hon. friend from Red Deer, and I will see that precedence is given. I understand that the hon. gentleman asked for a very comprehensive list covering the position, the nationality, the past career and, for all I know, the probable future career, of all the people to whom he referred. This has involved a good deal of research. I have no desire to withhold this return from my hon. friend, and I do not supposed that the officials of the department have any such desire. I think we must give the officials credit for endeavouring to expedite the report as much as possible

RECIPROCAL TRADE TREATIES.

Mr. DEVLIN: As the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is on the point of leaving for Australia, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, in the absence of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he thinks any further information will be given in this House than appears in the press of Canada, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, upon his return from Australia, is to proceed to China and Japan to negotiate closer trade relations with those countries.

Mr. BORDEN: I will direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to my hon. friend's question. I may say that I do not know of any definite arrangements having been made.

CANADA GRAIN ACT.

Mr. KNOWLES: A few days ago I addressed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to which question he gave an answer. The question was whether there would be an amendment to the Canada Grain Act this session. The hon. gentleman replied that he expected that there would. I desire to ask more specifically whether there will be any amendment to the Grain Act in connection with the matter of where sample markets may be located, and further as regards where inspection points may be created. Under the law they may be created anywhere, but this is feasible only where there is a survey board.

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order. A question of that kind, I understand, is not admissible under the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: As to the point of order, it seems to me that it is scarcely proper at this time to put questions of that nature without some notice being given to the ministers in the usual way.

Mr. KNOWLES: Am I out of order, Mr. Speaker, or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that the giving of a notice would be proper, but I do not regard the hon. member as being out of order in putting the question.

Mr. KNOWLES: My question is whether the Government proposes during the present session to amend the Canada Grain Act so that it will be possible to have sample markets established at Moosejaw, and whether legislations will be enacted so that it will be possible for the Board of Grain Commissioners to establish an inspection district at Moosejaw, where a company is now ready to go on with the work. I strongly recommend that such legislation be enacted.

Mr. BORDEN: I am not in a position just at the moment to say whether or not these matters are included in the powers invested in the Grain Commission, but I may say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have his attention directed to the hon. gentleman's inquiry.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. White (Leeds) for second reading of Bill No. 36, respecting Banks and Banking resumed from January 21.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): It is not my purpose to take up the time of the House at any great length with the remarks I desire to make on this subject. I understand the minister intends to send the Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I will therefore make my remarks as brief as possible. At the outset I may say that I am in absolute accord with the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in his statement that money is very scarce at all times and in all places, and I partially agree with him—though possibly from a different motive—with reference to the appointment of commission to take action before bank charters are renewed; I would have no objection to the appointment of such a commission, to consist of an experienced banker and a capable business man, with the usual lawyer to regulate the balance of power between the two, but I would disabuse the people of the country, and even of this House, of the impression as to what is being done in foreign countries with reference to banks and banking. Many hon. members seem to think that in some European countries the bankers loan money practically for nothing, at the same time making payments to the government. I cannot see how that can be, and I think anybody who follows the doings of the commercial world more or less closely will realize that money is like any other commodity, and conforms to the principles of supply and demand. Although it may be done to a certain extent, I cannot very well see how any government can entirely regulate the price of money. I do think, however, they might so regulate it as to provide that no greater rate of interest would be charged by banks in one section of the country than that charged by those in another section. If the legal interest of the banks of Canada is 7 per cent, I do not quite see why they should be allowed to charge 8 per cent, and even 10 per cent, in the West. In western Canada both farmers and merchants are struggling, I think, to a great extent, and there is no part of the country which requires cheap money. Although I am not entirely familiar with this phase of the question, I am sure the eastern merchants and manufacturers carry financially, a great many people in the West. But, to come back to my original contention, I say it is a difficult thing for the Government to definitely fix the price of money. In New York the price of call money is, I suppose, about 2 per cent on an average, and I have known of its going up to 20 per cent and even 60 per cent on the New York market. It must be remembered that if men want it and are willing to pay for it, it is a difficult matter to prohibit them from doing so.

There have been many references in this debate to general conditions in Germany. We hear every now and then of the German war scare and the German naval scare, but greater than these, in my opinion—and, indeed, of more frequent occurrence—is the scarcity of money in Germany. Some hon. gentlemen the other day stated that the German people loan money at 3 per cent and 3½ per cent, and pay a certain amount to the government as well, but it is well known that German banks charge as much as 6 per cent and 7 per cent. I do not know anything that is a greater scare to the banking interests, and the money interests of Europe, than the German money scare. So I do not think my hon. friends have got quite the right notion of the German banking system or some of these other banking systems. As a matter of fact, if the governments of Switzerland or Germany or Denmark or some other countries in Europe are willing to loan to certain interests in those countries, such as the agricultural interest, money at a certain rate rate of interest for a certain purpose, it is no more than we do, or perhaps not quite as much as we do when we continually make grants for nothing to many interests. Only the other night a proposition was introduced by the Minister of Agriculture to make a free grant to agriculture for a certain amount of money without any interest. A commission such as was suggested the other night by the hon. member for South York, might do away to a very large extent with the erroneous views held by many of us on these questions.

In reference to section 88 of the present Banking Act which was severely attacked by the hon. member for North Ontario, I am in favour of section 88 being retained. I doubt if any of us realize the amount of benefit to the manufacturing world of Canada that the bankers do under section 88. There are few manufacturers in this country who have means enough of their own to carry on their own business. Some old established and well regulated and rich concerns are in that position, but very few. Under section 88 of the Bank Act, a great many manufacturers are practically carried by the bank and no harm is done. So far as my knowledge is concerned, a great many of them do not owe to anybody else except the bank; they pay absolute cash as they go along and borrow their money from the bank. There are, of course, instances where people are beaten when they have trusted people who are covered by section 88 of the Bank Act, but how many instances of that kind are there in proportion to the number of cases where no trouble arises? We cannot pass legislation that will cover all cases. As to the extension of the provisions of that section to farmers, I have sufficient faith in the bank managers to think that they will be careful when they lend under section 88 of the farmers either on grain or stock. My experience is that the farmers in my section of the country can get money from the banks cheaper than the merchants or manufacturers; that there is no trouble for the ordinary farmer, if he has the least bit of character, to get what reasonable money he requires for his purposes. The minister very properly said that banking, after all, is carried on largely as a matter of faith. If a man has not a reputation for responsibility and honesty it would be very dangerous to force a banker to supply him with money and if the banks will not loan to a farmer—I am now only speaking of my own experience in my own section of the country—I do not believe anybody else will. I do not think we can force any banking system to loan money to people who are not worthy of credit and the farmers in my section are not imposed on by any manner of means, either as to the interest charged them or the amount of money loaned.

My hon. friend from North Ontario spoke of the smaller banks. His complaint was that the banks are becoming a monopoly. In how many cases have banks been amalgamated within the last ten years that it was not a benefit in place of an injury to the community? If you can name one I will be satisfied that I am wrong in thinking that every case of amalgamation within the last ten years has been a benefit. The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick, told us of one case of a bank that could not possibly have lived unless the Bank of Montreal had come to its rescue. We all know the case of the Ontario Bank. One hon. member suggests that banks should be required to come to Parliament for sanction for an amalgamation just as they do to get a charter. In the case of the Ontario Bank, if the Bank of Montreal had not taken it over that morning there might have been great loss to the people of Canada. The Bank of Montreal took it over root and branch and the morning they took it over had their notices out saying they would pay everything that came.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much did they pay for it?

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know, I have no doubt they lost money. I do not think any investigation would show that the Bank of Montreal did not lose in the transaction from a purely money standpoint. I am not supporting mergers unnecessarily, but I am saying that we should be careful in our views of these things, we should not be prejudiced. It is all right to say I am hard-up and the bank should give me money. I started by saying that I was in great sympathy with the hon. member for South York when he said that he found money always scarce in every place.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I did not say that.

Mr. NESBITT: Then I will take that back immediately, but personally I have always found money very scarce in every place I have ever gone.

Mr. MACLEAN: I think I did say that was the experience of the country.

Mr. NESBITT: But that does not prejudice me on the main question that the banks should be forced to loan money to everybody who wishes it.

Mr. MACLEAN: The hon. member asks for an instance in which an amalgamation of two banks was not in the public interest. I do not think it was to the public interest of Canada or of Ontario that a great bank like the Traders Bank should be merged as it was with the Royal Bank, of Montreal. If more of these took place it would be inimical to the whole country.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the hon. gentleman know absolutely that it was not a good thing for this country that the two were merged?

Mr. MACLEAN: It was not a good thing. It lessened the banking competition in the country.

Mr. NESBITT: How does the hon. member know it was not a good thing?

Mr. MACLEAN: It lessened the opportunity of the public to get money and the hon. gentleman has already admitted that that is the great need of the country. There is one less place to go for money.

Mr. NESBITT: I was a customer, with one of the institutions with which I am connected, of the Traders Bank and it did not lessen our opportunity of getting money one particle, in fact, they were a stronger, a larger institution and they could carry institutions and manufacturing industries that they could not possibly carry before.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario): What about the agencies that have been closed up?

Mr. NESBITT: Well, what about them? It just threw three or four clerks out of employment, may be, and I have no doubt that every one of them is employed somewhere else. The places where they closed their offices down lost nothing because there were probably more banks at these places than there was any necessity for. I do not think that it was necessary to have three or four banks in a place in order to have competition any more than it is necessary to have three or four railways. We hear of towns scrambling about and making great exertions to pay a bonus to bring three or four railways into a town and when they have them do the railways lessen the freight rate?—not at all; they dare not lessen it.

Mr. SHARPE: Why?

Mr. NESBITT: Because there would be a rate war.

Mr. MACLEAN: Bring on your war.

Mr. NESBITT: You people who want to live by war are very brave but you cannot do business on war principles. It has to be on a peace basis.

I want to say a word about what the hon. member for North Ontario said with reference to a bank doing business with a capital of $100,000. If you will read the history of the failures of banks in Canada and the United States you will find that there have been less failures and very much smaller losses in Canada than in the United States. They are not all private banks in the United States but there are certain banks attached to a certain town. A bank may have local sympathies and do the best it can to support the town in which it is located but I have been told by many persons who were interested in many industries which have been brought over from the other side that there is no comparison as between the way the banks of Canada carry their customers along, no matter how far they are from the centre, and the way the banks carry them along in the United States. I have known several men who have come here and who would not believe that they could be carried by the banks as they are carried by them in the manufacturing business. With reference to a bank with a capital of $100,000, we all know that the tendency of banks is to do business up to their full capacity, including their capital and their deposits. Supposing there was a bank in a town with a capital of $100,000 and deposits of $100,000 and it was carrying two or three industries, it would carry these industries, which would naturally want to expand, to the full extent of its ability. But when the pinch comes the bank has already invested in these industries and it is utilizing all the money that it has control of. Then to whom has the industry to go?—to the large corporation. These large banking corporations are very much like the large insurance companies in one respect. If it were not for the fact that the great English fire insurance companies are doing business all over the world they could not carry the risks they do in this country for the simple reason, that while they are losing money here, they may be making money in England, Australia or Egypt. It is the separation of their interests, the general average, that allows them to carry these risks. A bank might have a large amount in deposits in Woodstock and loan it in Toronto, or Red Deer; but deposits are greater in other places and in this way you have a general average. I do not believe in the small bank principle.

Another question is that of inspection. I hesitate to discuss this Bill or to make any suggestions because it is a most important thing in this country. The banks of Canada have done a great deal of good. They may have squeezed some people. I know that many times I have cursed them when I could not get any money out of them but it was probably for my benefit, therefore, I approach this inspection question with a good deal of hesitation. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that before a bank is given a certificate, greater care should be taken to satisfy himself as to the bona fides of the parties. I know that he has amended the provision with reference to the issuing of the certificate, that he has taken a little more power to the Treasury Board, but while the law contains a good many more words there is not a very large extension of the powers of the minister under sub-clause 3 of section 15. I would recommend to the minister that there should be, in connection with the department an inspector who had been a very highly trained banker and that no certificate should be given till the bona fides of all subscriptions had been carefully looked into and not only that but that no certificate should be given until the character of the men who asked for the charter had been carefully investigated just the same as a banker looks into the character of a man who is asking for a loan. Then, if the minister and his inspector were not satisfied as a result of this inquiry he should be empowered to refuse the certificate. I will leave that inspector there for a moment because I want to bring him in again a little later on and go into the question of the inspection of banks.

A word or two with reference to the inspectors. My hon. friend from Middlesex the other day made what I thought a very admirable speech on this Bank Act and he recommended that, as with the currency issue, the banks should put up a certain amount of money for the security of depositors. There is an average of $650,000,000 of deposits. Those are what are known as savings bank deposits, and there are in addition sufficient current deposits to bring the amount up to a thousand million dollars. I do not suppose that anyone would ask that depositors on current account should be secured, because, as a matter of fact, the depositors simply place the money in the bank for their own convenience. But as to savings bank depositors, there is a good deal to be said in favour of their having absolute security because, as will be seen if you compare the current loans with the deposits, business is largely conducted on the strength of these deposits. It is quite possible, as the minister says, that if the security of all the banks is put up, that might lead to reckless lending by some of the banks. I have had a number of representations made to me, urging that the Government should charge the banks for their issue and I do not think any very great hardship would be entailed on the banks if we require them to put up with the Government an amount equal to five per cent of their deposits as a guarantee fund. It is not likely that a bank such as the Bank of Commerce or the Bank of Montreal, would fail to the full amount of its deposits, and the thirty millions or thirty-five millions thus secured would, in my opinion, be ample guarantee. I would not ask that this guarantee fund should be put up in gold and the amount withdrawn from circulation; I would be satisfied with the depositing of securities satisfactory to the Treasury Board. I doubt very much if an inspection such as that provided for in the Bill by the Minister of Finance would be at all satisfactory. Everyone who has experience of board meetings knows that three or four people absolutely control the proceedings at a board meeting, and that a great many of the shareholders really do not know what is going on; motions are made and everything done in a cut and dried fashion and most of the shareholders leave without really knowing what has been done or how it has been done. I am thoroughly convinced that some solution for a proper inspection will have to be found other than that provided in the Bill. I would suggest as a better plan that the Bankers' Association should appoint an inspector and that the inspection be done on the instruction of the association. I believe that by this means the Bankers' Association would take good care that there was no wildcat speculation with deposits on the part of any member of the association. This may not be the best plan and some may be opposed to it, but it certainly is a better plan than that contemplated by the provision in the Bill. Then if the general inspector appointed by the Bankers' Association made some ruling which some particular bank was not satisfied with, that bank would have the right to appeal to the Department of Finance and the government inspector would step in and give his decision. When the Minister of Finance was speaking I put a question to him about government bank inspection and his answer convinced me that it was almost an impossibility for the Government to undertake this inspection with any hope of success. You may send your government inspector to the head office, and after he has got through you do not know whether your inspection is sufficient or not; if there is anything that wants to be hidden they can easily send it to the branch offices. My hon. friend from South York advocates a national bank and that the currency should be issued by that bank. That, of course, is a complete change from our banking system in the past, and for my part I have not been able to consider it sufficiently to pronounce an opinion upon it, although, it may be, that it would be a good thing. In Germany they have a national bank, and they are allowed to issue a certain amount over and above their capitalization, but my study of German finance for the last 15 or 20 years has not caused me to be a worshipper of the German system; quite the contrary. I have a similar opinion about the United States banking system; their currency issue is not elastic enough, and they are frequently in serious trouble. Taking the Canadian system all around, I have yet to learn of any system, that in cases of great money crises has stood up any better than the Canadian system; although there are little things that probably could be greatly improved.

Mr. MEIGHEN : What defect does the hon. gentleman find in the German system?

Mr. NESBITT: It would take me all afternoon to explain that system, but, when we are considering this Bill in Committee,

I will be ready to present my views on it. No country in Europe has as many money crises as Germany has. No country in Europe has such scares in the money market as Germany has every few months. There must, therefore, be something wrong with their system, because we do not have such scares here. That is one answer to the people who want money, volumes of money. We all want volumes of money; but the easier it is to get it, the less it will buy. Some scientific man in the States is now advocating the putting of a fixed value on gold; he says that gold has got too plentiful; he is like my hon. friend from West Toronto who said the other day that everybody had lots of money. He is only judging by himself; he has got lots of money; but a great many people have not, and there are more who have not than there are who have. With reference to deposits, I have thought seriously over that question for a long time, and I really think we have got to find some means of protecting the depositors. We must also find some means of satisfying the people as to inspection. If the present Minister of Finance and his successors in office will use their right to properly investigate a bank's organization before issuing a charter, they will prevent the crises that may occur in the first part of the life of a bank. We talk about the money banks make, and they do make a great deal of money; that is why I think they will not be bearing any great burden, if they do put up a certain amount of money for the security of the depositors. Although banks make a great deal of money, no bank that I know of made any dividends during the first three or four years of its existence. Some of those banks, which have been recently organized and which are paying dividends, perhaps should not be doing so. I know that banks are very conservative and I think properly so. Banking is a serious undertaking; a good many people think they are born with a special dispensation from Providence to be bankers; but Providence sometimes does not agree with them, according to our experience. As regards the interest, in spite of what has been said by my hon. friend from Toronto, for whose views I have the very greatest respect, it seems to me as though bankers could pay more interest on deposits. If there is elasticity with respect to what they charge for loans when times become hard, then there should be elasticity with respect to what they pay for deposits. That is the simplest thing in the world to fix; if the Government is satisfied that the banks are not paying enough at three per cent, all the Government has to do is to pay three and a half per cent; that will fix the matter in about a minute. Money has been very tight during the last three months. I am not speaking of my own experience alone, because everybody knows that that is so, except some of my hon. friends on the other side, who have got money to burn. I know of no place where you can get money for less than five per cent and only a few places where you can get it at less than six per cent. I think in some of the banks they are charging seven per cent for small loans. Of course a bank has a proper right to charge a little more on petty loans than they do on large loans. Where a man borrows a large sum of money, I think he should get that money somewhat cheaper than a man who wants to borrow $50 once a year or once in two years, and that only for a few months, because the banks have to make entries in their ledgers, which take up clerks' time and ledger space. As to the interest charged by banks, I must once more reiterate that if the legal interest is seven per cent, it should be seven per cent. I do not think that the West should be charged any more than the East. That is a grievance I have against the banks which I see no way of remedying. If a man is a manufacturer in a small town, he may be just as big a manufacturer as some of my hon. friends in the cities, but he has invariably to pay one per cent more interest than his city competitor, who is close to the headquarters of the bank. That I think is absolutely wrong. It gives his city competitor who is in touch with the head office of the bank, an advantage over the town man that he should not have, because those banks gather together their great loaning facilities from all over the country.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is not that a contradiction of your former statement that small loans should pay more interest?

Mr. NESBITT: No, I do not think so. I may be wrong you know; I am generally wrong; I mean to say that when I try to buy stock I am generally wrong. I do not think there is any conflict there. A vast difference exists between petty loans of $25, $30, or $50, which people often have to get, and big loans of a regular borrower. I am quite sure my hon. friend can see that. If my hon. friend is manufacturing in Toronto a certain line of goods, no matter what that line of goods is, and has occasion to borrow $2,000 from the bank; and I am engaged in the same line of business in Woodstock and I have occasion to borrow $2,000 from the bank, if he can borrow that money in Toronto at one per cent cheaper than I do, he is getting an advantage over me. I do not see how it is to be prevented; but I say that it is unfair.

In hard times like 1907 and 1908, when a man went to a bank and said he wanted $50,000, the bank said that he could not have $50,000, but would have to take $25,000 or $30,000. I give the banks all credit for wisdom during that crisis, but it is the city fellow who gets the loan first. Even when money is tight, a city man is allowed to go on with his business and buy his supplies just as freely as he was allowed to do so when times were better; but the town man is cut off to a large extent. I am not saying that the banks throughout the length and breadth of this land do not carry their customers. I think the big institutions like the Bank of Montreal or the Bank of Commerce and others carried their customers through the crisis of 1907 with credit not only to themselves but to this country. I think they deserve credit for doing it. They did not give them all the money they demanded, but carried them through to a great extent. In some cases, of course, they cut their heads off. And that is another thing in which I do not agree with the banks. Say a man has a line of credit from a bank, and the bank happens to change officials—it may be the inspector, it may be the local manager, or the general manager. The new official does not agree with the policy of his predecessor with regard to this client. But the man who has been given the line of credit has bought accordingly, has made his calculations based upon this line of credit and has arranged his business, it may be extending throughout the whole Dominion, upon that condition. The new official says to him: You must reduce your account. He cannot very well do that especially if this demand comes at a time when money is scarce as it was this fall when the banks were keeping their money to move the crops. How is a man going to move his account to a sister bank when that bank also is saving its money to move the crops. There is an undoubted grievance against the banks. I do not know how the Minister of Finance can rectify that. But at the same time, some day, it will re-act upon the banks, because this is a real and a serious grievance. The banks have no right, in my judgment, after having given a line of credit, after having let a man believe that he will have it running a year or so, to order him to make up his overdraft. Such a thing may place him in a very dangerous position.

Now, I have a word to say which, I am quite aware, will seem like party politics. We have no right, I suppose, to apologize for party politics here. But at the same time, this banking legislation is a subject in which party politics should appear as little as possible. Speaking of the depositors, I would like to ask the Government one question: What are they going to do with the depositors of the Farmers Bank? During the election campaign of 1911, certain candidates, including members of the House and the Government, promised the people that if their party was returned to power they would pay these depositors. There is no doubt about that. The gentleman who ran against me was one of these. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, for whom I have the greatest respect, and also the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, were in that riding; I do not say that these gentlemen made the promises, but I do say that their candidate made such promises at every place at which the Farmers' Bank had been established. And, of course, as gentlemen of such high standing being there to back up their candidate— though the candidate may have had no more authority from them to make the promise than had that pillar—the people took it for granted that these gentlemen endorsed what the candidate said. I am not complaining of people who voted against me on this ground; people have a right to vote as they please. But there were cases of great hardship. There were men who had put every dollar they had in the world, practically, on deposit in that bank. And there is where the one difficulty of this banking question comes in. If I may be allowed to digress for a second, I would like to say that I think we should take pains to inform the public by newspapers or in some other way, that the Government does not guarantee chartered banks any more than they guarantee any other institution. It ought to be possible to do away with a good deal of false thinking on this subject and show the people what banks really are. I have talked with people who believed that if they put money into a chartered bank the Government was responsible for that money, and you could not make them believe anything else if you talked to them from then until now. If these men who were candidates throughout that section had no authority for making that promise, then it was a piece of cruelty to these people to let them believe that if the party now in office were given power they would pay back these deposits. I am not talking now for party advantage; I am telling what I absolutely believe. But here another question arises. If the assets of a bank are not sufficient to retire circulation, then the deposit of five per cent must be called upon. Seeing that there is this money for the retiring of the circulation, would it not be better in a case like the Farmers' Bank to allow the other assets, if it could be done, to be used to pay the depositors? Of course, I do not know what the assets of the Farmers' Bank will yield, nor will the Government know until the report of the liquidator is made. For my part, I think that, though it may be contrary to the usual procedure, if the Government instructed their candidates to promise that these depositors would be reimbursed, they should be reimbursed.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario): I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nesbitt) to say that certain members of this House representing constituencies where branches of the Farmers' Bank were instituted made promises to their constituents. Does he refer to me as in that category? Because I wish to say to the hon. gentleman and to this House that I made no promises, directly or indirectly, to my constituents that they would be reimbursed if the Conservative party were returned to power.

Mr. NESBITT: No, I did not refer to my hon. friend (Mr. Sharpe, Ontario). I knew nothing about his campaign.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the hon. gentleman make it plain also with regard to myself? I had a branch of the bank in my county.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not wish hon. gentlemen opposite to consider me discourteous to any of them. I was not referring to these gentlemen particularly.

Mr. SHARPE: You said they were members of this House who had promised.

Mr. NESBITT: I have so understood, and the newspapers so reported. Certainly, as to one member of this Government, every newspaper, on the other side of politics and on his own side, reported him as having made that statement.

Mr. MORPHY: I desire to ask if the hon. gentleman referred to me, as I represent the adjoining constituency to his.

Mr. NESBITT: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish any of these hon. gentlemen to think that I intended to be discourteous to them. If they did not make any such promises as I have referred to, they will not have guilty consciences. As a matter of fact, these hon. gentlemen who ask me if I included them, were members of a deputation to Judge Meredith, at the investigation of this bank, and asked that this be done.

Mr. SHARPE: The hon. gentleman is absolutely mistaken. We did not recommend a reimbursement.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman certainly did when he was on this side of the House.

Mr. SHARPE: All the motions were for an investigation.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to have a direct answer to the question I put to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman need not worry; the people of his constituency know whether he promised it or not.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. gentleman vote for the repayment of these unfortunate depositors of the Farmers' Bank if the vote comes up in the House.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman, I understand, asks me if I will vote for the repayment—

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman is sparring for wind.

Mr. NESBITT: I would ask the hon. gentleman, in the words of the schoolboy, not to get gay. The hon. gentleman asks me if I would vote for the repayment, and I tell him I certainly will. Will my hon. friend vote for it?

Mr. MORPHY: I would certainly be so inclined, if there is negligence proven in connection with the issue of the certificate.

Mr. NESBITT: I did not expect to become involved in a controversy in connection with this matter, and I apologize for its occurrence. Any further remarks I desire to make with regard to banking I shall reserve for the Banking and Commerce Committee, but I would like to suggest to my hon. friend, the minister, who is responsible for this Bill to consider my suggestion regarding inspection, so that he may arrive at something with reference to the matter. We are, after all, but representatives of the public at large, and should see that the bankers accommodate the public to the best of their ability, and that the public is protected in every possible way.

Mr. BORDEN: I desire to say a few words with regard to the very important Bill which is now under discussion. I entirely agree with my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that it is the duty of this House to give every possible protection to the shareholders, the depositors, and the general public, in the measure which the House will be called upon to pass after it has been referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. A great many of the questions which have been under discussion in this debate can be more effectively considered there than upon the second reading of the Bill.

The banking system of Canada since 1867 has, on the whole, been a successful one, and it has been so regarded by men of high standing and ability who have come here from abroad for the purpose of studying it. Some three years ago, when the commission from the United States which investigated the banking systems of the whole world, with a view to the possible establishment in the United States of a great central or national bank, came to Ottawa and other Canadian cities, and made an investigation of our system, I asked the opinion of two of the gentlemen composing the commission with regard to the Canadian system as adapted to the conditions of our country, and the stage of our development. I found them very appreciative of our system. It commended itself to them for the reason that with a minimum amount of capital we were doing a maximum amount of business. The system encourages elasticity and fluidity, it enables the national capital to be utilized in different parts of the country and for different purposes as the needs of our national development from time to time demand. In a country like Canada, where the first essential to progress and development is a sufficient amount of capital, the utilization, in the most economical, efficient and elastic manner, of the available capital is obviously a matter of the greatest importance. The modern business system, as everyone knows, is largely conducted by means of credit, and not through the actual use of ready money. The banks of Canada, as well as those of other countries, being very largely the instrument by which the credit of the country is made available, the success of their use as such instrument depends very largely upon the confidence of the people in the stability of our financial institutions. Banking is a business carried on for the purpose of affording a reasonable return for the money invested in it, and it cannot be expected that people will invest money in banks unless they get at least a reasonable return. A good deal has been said about the enormous profits the banks in Canada have made, and I think it would be well if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would have a statement compiled which would make clear the actual facts in that regard. I am not prepared to give them at this moment, but I do know something of one institution with which I was at one time connected—a bank which has been making very considerable issues of capital stock during the past ten or twelve years, and which has a reserve fund of about $8,000,000. I venture to say, without having made any careful investigation into it, that about 80 per cent of that sum of $8,000,000 has been paid in by the shareholders themselves in cash during the past ten years, and yet hon. gentlemen in this House have repeatedly alluded to the supposed fact that $106,000,000 of bank reserves in Canada have been built up out of the profits of the banks. Any such statement is quite inaccurate. I was alluding to a bank of which I have some knowledge and I venture to say that out of the reserve fund of that bank, $6,000,000 have been paid up in the last twelve years in hard cash by the shareholders themselves. I further believe that no shareholder in that bank during the past twelve years has received on an average more than four and a half or four and three-quarter per cent on his investment. It is therefore idle for hon. gentlemen to make the statement made, I have no doubt in good faith, that persons who have invested money in banking institutions in Canada have been receiving a return of ten per cent and even fourteen per cent. The facts do not bear out any such contention. I think it would be well for the Minister of Finance when the Bill goes to the Committee on Banking and Commerce to have a statement prepared showing how much of the $106,000,000 of reserve now standing to the credit of the banks in Canada has been paid in actual cash by the shareholders themselves and how much of it really does represent profits made by those banks in the course of their business.

I shall not deal with many subjects that have been brought up in this debate because, as I have said, I think these questions can be discussed and decided in the Committee on Banking and Commerce more effectually than on the second reading. Reference has been made to the desirability of establishing in Canada some great central bank formed by uniting three or four of the larger banks in Canada. I am not inclined to believe that there is any present necessity for that. We have, on the one hand, suggestions of large amalgamations of that kind carried on under national auspices and on the other hand we have the suggestion that there is too much amalgamation of banks. It is possible that the amalgamation of banks in Canada might be carried to excess while it is obvious, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), that you may gain competition at the expense of strength and security. We must proceed carefully in dealing with that important consideration.

Then with regard to the inspection and auditing of banks and more particularly of the head offices, it has been said with truth, that the frauds that have been committed in connection with the banking system of Canada have largely arisen in the head offices. I agree that every reasonable means which can be taken for the prevention of these frauds and, further, to ensure the absolute observance of the Act by the banks of Canada ought to be taken by Parliament. Various suggestions have been made and I think it would be desirable to get a clear idea of what has been suggested and the methods by which the suggestions might be carried out. Suggestions have been made which would point to the control by the Government of this country, through the Department of Finance or the Treasury Board, of the actual operation of the banks so far as the management of their business is concerned. It has been suggested that some such control should be exercised as would dictate to the bank as to whether it should lend any amount, and if so what amount to a particular person or whether it should lend to that person at all, or whether it would call in its loan at a partcular time or make a loan to a particular person upon security of a certain character or without any security. Everyone who has considered the subject of banking knows that in respect of the granting of credit a great many considerations come into play. It might be safer for any bank in Canada to lend $100,000 to a young enterprising man of excellent character and ability, endeavouring to make his way in the world without capital or with very little capital, than to lend it to a man of a very different character who might be assumed to be worth $150,000 or $200,000. These matters must, in the ordinary course of affairs, be left to the judgment of those who have been placed in charge of the operations of the bank by the shareholders, the men who have provided the capital to carry it on; and it would be casting an impossible burden upon those responsible for the administration of public affairs in Canada to ask that they should undertake the management and control of the banking system of Canada in any such sense as that. One cannot see where any such control should stop or even where it should begin. It seems to me that following the practice and usage of English-speaking people from time immemorial, the management of the affairs of the bank, so far as it concerns the interest of the shareholders themselves, must be left to the directors and officials of the bank, subject to the qualification that there ought to be some reasonable precautions taken in the interest of the general public, of the depositors, to prevent frauds so far as they can be prevented by legislation and also to ensure the carrying into effect in every way of the provisions of the Bank Act.

I do not know whether I have been able to express very accurately what is in my mind, but it is along that line, it seems to me, that this House and its committee ought to consider any amendments to the Bank Act. My friend the Minister of Finance has already stated in presenting this Bill to the House that he did not understand that this measure, to which he has devoted a great deal of time and thought, is the last word on the subject. On the contrary, he has asked that this House shall refer the Bill to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for the purpose of having all these matters thoroughly considered and debated as they ought to be considered and debated in respect to so important a subject. I have spoken of the purpose. The purpose on the one hand might be the undertaking by the Government to manage, in effect, the affairs of all the banks of the country, or to sit, through its officers and experts, as a court of appeal which would over-ride the judgment of the directors or officials of the bank. That seems to me an impossible task. But the other purpose is entirely reasonable and feasible; it is to conduct such an examination of the affairs of the bank as would prevent fraud and would insure the thorough carrying out by the bank of the provisions of the Bank Act. Those are the two purposes and it seems to me that the purpose I have last set forth is the purpose to which the efforts of the House and of the committee ought to be directed.

There has been a good deal of debate as to whether the examination or audit should be by auditors or experts appointed by the shareholders or by officers appointed by the directors. The expression, 'Government inspection,' has been used very often in the course of this debate. It is desirable to have a clear conception of what we mean by that. Do we mean the purpose to which I called attention, in the first place, or do we mean the purpose to which I last called attention? Obviously it would be idle for the Government through any officer it might appoint, to attempt the first purpose. Coming to the second purpose, it is desirable, in regard to a subject of this importance, to leave that inspection, more particularly the inspection at the head office of the banks, which most thoughtful men in this country agree to be desirable, to the action of the shareholders themselves, or is it of infinitely greater advantage that that particular examination, or inspection, or audit, whatever you call it, should be conducted by officers appointed by the Government? There is at the present time, in various countries of the world, something that is called government inspection. I am not as familiar as some hon. gentlemen in this House with the methods by which that inspection has been carried on in Germany, France and Sweden. I think these countries have been referred to. The example of the United States has been alluded to, but I do not think the experience of the United States in that regard has been a very reassuring one. My hon. friend and colleague from Halifax (Mr. Maclean), who has looked into this subject with a great deal of care, mentioned in debate the other day that during the years from 1890 to 1907 more than 350 national banks in the United States had gone into liquidation, notwithstanding the government inspection.

Mr. BRODER : Does he mean state or federal banks ?

Mr. BORDEN : The hon. gentleman was alluding to federal banks. I will give the exact figures which he gave and I assume they are accurate, because the hon. gentleman informed us that he had made an investigation of the subject. He said that from 1800 to 1909, 369 National banks closed, of which only 18 were restored to solvency, giving an average of over 19 a year. During the same period 1,376 state banks closed their doors, or an average of over 72 a year. Of course, many of these banks are very small, but my hon. friend went on to state that the average annual loss to the depositors from the failure of these banks had been no less than $11,000,000. It is abundantly evident therefore, from the figures which my hon. friend gave, that the system of government inspection which prevails in the United States does not offer a very complete safeguard to depositors in the national or state banks of that country. These figures speak for themselves, and I need not urge that point. I endeavoured to make a little independent examination with reference to what my hon. friend said. I am informed by the officers of the Department of Finance that from 1863 to 1912 at least 500 national banks in the United States have failed, and that a very large number—I think it ran up to 2,000—state and private banks had closed their doors.

What is proposed by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance? He proposes what, in effect, Mr. H. C. McLeod, at one time general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, proposes—that there should be an external audit of the head offices, more particularly because it really would be impossible, under our banking system, to make an audit or examination of all the branches of the Canadian banks as they are so very numerous. He proposes an external audit and he proposes that the auditor shall be appointed by the shareholders and that they shall not be appointed by the directors. The objection is made that shareholders do not attend meetings in this country, that they attend meetings less frequently and less carefully in this country than in other countries . There may be something in that, they may be more scattered, but I venture to think that the proposal that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has submitted to the House could be so moulded if necessary as to absolutely ensure that men above reproach, and without any suspicion whatever of collusion with the directors of the bank, would be appointed at the annual meeting for the purpose of inspecting the head office during the then ensuing year. If you can ensure an efficient external audit by legislation it seems to me more desirable that the external audit, which everyone admits to be necessary, should be made by the persons who themselves are, in the first place, responsible, and, in the next place, interested. The shareholders of the bank supply the capital. The public make their deposits; it is true that the public have an interest, but the shareholders in respect of the safety of the moneys of the bank have surely not only the first interest but the chief responsibility. The practice and theory of banking institutions in this country, in the United States and Great Britain, from which we derive our practice in that regard, has been to impose the responsibility and the control upon the individual himself except in so far as the public interest might otherwise demand. Every bank in Canada has a pretty thorough system, in so far as I am aware, of examination and audit of its branches. The large banks in Canada have an army of inspectors who are continually engaged in no other activity than the examination—the very thorough examination of the branches of the bank. It would be impossible for the banks to carry on their business very successfully unless some system of this kind prevailed, but there has been a difficulty which has been pointed out on many occasions during the past six, eight or ten years that while this thorough examination of the affairs of the bank at each branch has been going on, there has been practically no audit at the head office. The directors themselves are supposed to make an examination of the bank's affairs at certain stated periods during the year, but the examination by the directors, even where it carried on with the utmost possible diligence and with the greatest capacity, cannot always achieve the proper results. I remember that one bank director, a man of very great ability, of very great business experience, told me that at the annual investigation by the directors into his bank he spent more than a week in an endeavour to satisfy himself that the statement by the bank to the public was correct and that no fraud had been committed. He gave his undivided attention to it for a week or ten days; he said in the end he could not be absolutely sure about it. Having regard to the enormous number of branches and to the opportunity given for collusion between the head office and the branches, an absolutely effective examination of the affairs of the bank at its head office, would, I should imagine, be a pretty difficult task. I do not believe there is any examination or audit, whether by Government or by private individuals, or any legislation that this House or any other House can pass, which would absolutely guarantee the public, or the shareholders, or the depositors, against fraud. We have had experience of the ingenuity, the new methods, which have been applied from time to time for fraudulent purposes, and I do not think you can get any absolute guarantee. But it is the duty of this House, and it will be the duty of the committee, to see that the best possible guarantee shall be secured, and that the best possible safeguards shall be provided.

So far as government inspection is concerned, it would be very unfortunate indeed if we should establish in this country something called government inspection which, after all, would not be a thorough inspection of the head office as well as of the branches. The Minister of Finance has pointed out the false security which would be created by an inspection of that character. If reasonable security can be obtained, and I believe it can by imposing this duty upon the shareholders themselves and by seeing that they perform it, that it seems to me would be the most desirable course. To relieve the shareholders from responsibility in respect of such a matter and to have it go through the length and breadth of Canada that the Government were undertaking an inspection which, after all, could not be the thorough and complete inspection which it would be understood to be throughout the country, would be a false legislative measure and would in the end, be productive of not good but of bad results. It is impossible, so far as I understand it personally, for the Government of this country to undertake a thorough examination and inspection of the head offices and of the branches of the banks in Canada. We must depend upon the banks themselves for some of that. So far as their head offices are concerned, let us have that inspection and audit which in the past has been wanting, but it is my suggestion, subject to such argument as may be brought to convince me to the contrary, that it would be far better to impose that duty and responsibility upon the shareholders themselves, so that, not only the branches of all the banks in Canada but the head offices of every bank shall be examined by thoroughly independent auditors, who shall have not only the right but the duty of reporting to the shareholders, and not to the directors, anything which they may find wrong in the affairs of the bank. It is along these lines I would suggest that the Bill be sent to the Committee at an early date, in order that all these questions may be carefully considered, and I trust a wise conclusion arrived at.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Mr. BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, there are just one or two words I would like to add to my former remarks with regard to the present stage of this Bill. There seems to have been a misapprehension in the minds of some of the members of this House, that the banks enjoy some special privileges by reason of the decennial extension of their charters. It was observed that the banks had their charters extended for a definite period of ten years, during which they are not amenable to Parliament in any way. That is quite a misapprehension. If we should compare banks with other corporations, the distinction is this: the ordinary corporation has its charter absolutely for all time to come as long as it sees fit to exercise the franchise which Parliament has given it; banks are not in so favourable a position in that regard; their charters are extended for a definite period of ten years, and at the end of that period their charters cease to exist unless Parliament sees fit to extend them. It seems to have been considered by some hon. gentlemen that during the decennial period the banks in some way and for some reason cease to be amenable to the control of this Parliament. That is a complete misapprehension. Parliament during the present session, may extend the charters of the banks for ten years, and may, as it usually does, make certain amendments to the law under which the banks exercise their franchise. There is nothing to prevent Parliament in such a case from amending the banking law the next year, or the next year after that. As a matter of fact, on many occasions during the past fifteen or twenty years the Bank Act of Canada has been amended at periods other than those at which the franchises of the banks were extended. For example, during the past fourteen years, the banking law has been amended in 1899, 1904, 1905 and 1908, on none of which occasions were the charters extended. I make these observations in order to remove the misapprehension alluded to, and for the further reason that some inquiry has been suggested into the banking systems of other countries and also into the method of state or government inspection which is said to prevail in other countries. My hon. friend from North Oxford observed, for the purpose of dispelling what he thought were illusions in respect to this subject, that it might be advisable indeed to have such an inquiry. There is no reason in the world why we should not inquire into the systems of inspection which prevail in other countries, if we should eventually come to the conclusion that something can be learned from the experiences of other countries in that regard. Any such consideration as that, however, would not interfere in the least with our extending the banks' charters at this stage; and would not interfere with our establishing a system of inspection by means of experts appointed by the shareholders, as the Minister of Finance has suggested. If that system were established and were carried on for a certain limited period, and, in the meantime we learned, by inquiry through a Royal Commission if necessary, or otherwise, into the experience of other countries, that some better system could be devised and brought into force in Canada, there would not be the slightest difficulty, in two or three years' time, or at any other stage, in amending the banking law of Canada, and so profiting by the experience thus gained.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina): This is an important question, as has been remarked by previous speakers. I do not believe that more important legislation could possibly come before this Parliament in any session. The Bank Act of Canada affects, perhaps, more of the plain, everyday people of Canada than any other law we have to deal with in this Parliament. I do not believe, however, in approaching the subject of the Canadian Bank Act in any revolutionary frame of mind. The banking system of Canada is one which has been developed from an experience, I suppose I am safe in saying, of forty or fifty years, or perhaps more. We have had at the head of our various banking institutions men whose names in the financial life of Canada, and probably in the financial life of the world, are beyond reproach. Many of these men are known to members of this House personally, and I think I am safe in saying, that, as a general rule, the Canadian banking system has been a credit to Canada. It has been a misfortune for us, however, that bad men have crept into banking, just as bad men have crept into all walks of life. And, as has been well said by the Minister of Finance and by other hon. members of the House, it is impossible to make legislation of such a nature that crooks cannot find a hole in it, cannot find a way to make it a means to defraud the people. I do not know what bank the right hon. the Prime Minister had reference to when he was speaking but I surmise, perhaps, he referred to the Bank of Nova Scotia. I do not believe that any member of this House should approach this question of banking on the basis that banks, properly managed banks in Canada, are not making money. If it was the Bank of Nova Scotia to which the right hon. the Prime Minister referred, it seems to me that the instance was rather unfortunately chosen from the standpoint of profits. There can be no doubt, from what I have heard from our Canadian banking institutions, that the Bank of Nova Scotia occupies a very high position. It has been a well managed concern, like the Bank of Montreal, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Imperial Bank and others I could mention. None of these banks are poor; all are making money as a matter of fact. I have here the statement of affairs of the Bank of Nova Scotia for the year 1912. I find that in that year the bank made a profit of $970,544 on a total capital of something over $4,700,000, an average profit of twenty-three per cent on its capital. I find also that the bank declared a dividend of fourteen per cent on its paid-up capital and put some nine per cent to reserve, which reserve now amounts to $8,700,000, as compared with the paid-up capital of $4,700,000.

Mr. RHODES: How about the reserve?

Mr. MARTIN: I thought I mentioned that. But to be exact the reserve amounts to $8,738,140.

Mr. BORDEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. The bank I had in mind was the Bank of Nova Scotia. What I said was that it was an error to imagine that the reserve of all the banks had been largely built up out of profits. The Bank of Nova Scotia has made vary large stock issues during the past twelve years. These stock issues have been taken up by the shareholders at 240, at 260, and even as high as 278. I was endeavourng to point out in this way that the reserve had not been built up out of profits but had largely come out of the pockets of the shareholders. As to the profits, if my hon. friend will take the capital actually invested, which is nearly $14,000,000 and not $4,700,000 as he suggests, he will find that there has been no such rate of profit as he states.

Mr. MARTIN. I realize the truth in the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister in regard to the reserve of the Bank of Nova Scotia,—and, I suppose, the same applies to every well established bank—that a part of the reserve is realized by the sale of stock above par. I do not intend to argue that proposition. But the fact is that upon the paid-up capital they made a profit of 23 per cent and declared a dividend to stockholders of 14 per cent on the paid-up capital. While part of the reserve is realized from selling the stocks above par, there is also a large surplus which has gone into reserve. Practically every bank in Canada has huge reserve funds, and you must take into consideration, the fact—and it is a fact, if I am correctly informed---that a large amount of these assets of the various banks, their buildings and real estate holdings, are estimated in their annual statements at less than their actual value, and if you will allow for this it will probably offset everything realized from the sale of their stock above par. However, the point I desire to make is that the banks are making money. There is no use of any man coming here and saying they are not. And it is a good thing for Canada that they are making money; it would be a very poor indication of our business condition if our banking were not profitable. But, so far as making profits is concerned, a bank should not come before this House by means of men who are interested in the bank, and who seek to convince the people that the banks are not making a reasonable profit upon the money invested. The Canadian Bank of Commerce last year declared a dividend of 11 per cent; the Dominion Bank, 14 per cent; the Bank of Hamilton, 11 per cent; the Bank of Montreal, 12 per cent; the Merchants Bank, 10 per cent; the Molsons Bank, 11 per cent; the Imperial Bank, 12 per cent; and the Bank of Nova Scotia, 14 per cent. In view of these figures, I think the time has arrived when the depositors in these banks might well ask for more than 2½ or 3 per cent on the hard earned savings that they deposit in these banks throughout the Dominion.

There is another matter to which I wish to call attention. It has been mentioned in a rather vague way by some other members on either side of the House. I refer to the provision of the law with respect to the rate of interest that may be charged legally by the banks. I do not suppose one man in a thousand knows that the banking law of Canada contains, and has contained for years, a provision on this subject. I refer to section 91 of the existing Bank Act which also is incorporated in the Bill now before us:

> The bank may stipulate for, take, reserve or exact any rate of interest or discount, not exceeding seven per cent per annum, and may receive and take in advance any such rate, but no higher rate of interest shall be recoverable by the bank.

That section is absolutely inoperative in that part of Canada in which I reside.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): What is the rate in other places?

Mr. MARTIN: It would be impossible for me to say what rate is charged in any other city in the province of Saskatchewan, but the rate of interest charged by the banks in Regina very often exceeds the seven per cent permitted by law. I would not venture to say what percentage of the money loaned in Regina is loaned at a greater rate of interest than seven per cent, but I know that the current rate to the average borrower is eight per cent, and this is because we have competition in banking. It has been argued on both sides of the House that competition in banking is not desirable, but I am rather inclined to agree with the hon. member for South York when he says that competition in banking is a good thing—and I will tell you why. Supposing a borrower obtains money in the city of Regina at seven or eight per cent, and the same borrower goes into one of the small towns in the province of Saskatchewan; what rate of interest is he compelled to pay? Eight per cent, nine per cent, yes even twelve per cent; for the reason that in these small places there is no banking competition.

Mr. CURRIE: Does the hon. gentleman speak from personal knowledge when he stated that the banks are breaking the law in the West, or does he speak from hearsay?

Mr. MARTIN: I may say that I have acted as solicitor for chartered banks in the West, collecting a rate of interest as high as twelve per cent per annum. If the banks can show to Parliament that seven per cent is not a sufficient rate to enable them to carry on their business in Western Canada, let us amend this law so that they will get a sufficient rate to enable them to carry on their business and pay expenses. Until this is provided I submit this section should be put in such form as to cause it to be adhered to by all the Canadian banks. The last clause of that section says that no higher rate of interest shall be recoverable by the banks, but it does not say that no banker shall obtain or ask for a higher rate of interest. What is the result? The borrower goes to one of these banks to obtain such money as he may require for business purposes; he is asked nine, per cent, ten per cent, or even a higher rate of interest, and he must pay it, not having the opportunity of going to some other bank in the neighbourhood to carry out the transaction. In my opinion, that section should be to the effect that no banker or banking concern shall demand, ask for, or receive a higher rate of interest than seven per cent, or whatever rate it is decided to establish. As I have said, it is desirable that the banks should be in a position to safely carry on business, and it is important that they should be properly protected, in order that they, in turn, may properly protect the depositors.

I wish to refer for a moment to section 88. I know this is a controversial matter, but it does seem to me that when a bank is allowed, as under section 88, to take warehouse receipts as security, they should register them in the proper office in the registration district in which the business is transacted. An amendment extending this privilege is being added to the clause:

> The bank may lend money to a farmer upon the security of his threshed grain (of any kind) grown upon the farm.
> The bank may lend money to a rancher upon the security of his cattle.

That is a provision that will work out in exactly the same way. If a farmer in Western Canada gives a warehouse receipt as security for the advance of money, surely the bank, like any private individual, should be forced to register that warehouse receipt, or chattel mortgage, in the proper way. I do not anticipate that the banks, by reason of this use of the bill, will lend any more money to borrowers than before. Every farmer in Western Canada to-day who has cattle in his barn and grain in his granary, and is considered responsible by the banker, can get as much money now as he will be able to obtain after the passage of section 88 of this Bill, as amended, and I think those hon. gentlemen are labouring under a mistaken impression who consider this section is going to be a panacea for all the ills of the farmers of the West.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina).

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): Is my hon. friend in favor of dropping the clause?

Mr. MARTIN: I merely expressed the opinion that it would of very little benefit.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds): I understood my hon. friend to say it would be of no advantage whatever.

Mr. MARTIN: I would like to see this section tried, but I am expressing the opinion that the presence of this section in the Bank Act will not cause the bankers doing business in western Canada to advance money to any men to whom they would not make advances under former conditions.

Mr. RHODES: In advocating that these liens should be registered, does the hon. gentleman look at it from the standpoint of the bank, or of the borrower?

Mr. MARTIN: Neither from the standpoint of the banks nor the borrower, but from the standpoint of other creditors who may deal with this particular farmer. In the case of a loan made to a manufacturer in Eastern Canada, the manufacturer gets from the bank a line of credit to the amount of say $100,000. This month he obtains $15,000, and gives a warehouse receipt for that amount; next month he gets another $15,000, and gives a receipt for additional goods that have, perhaps, come into his warehouse since the time he got the last advance. The banks say it would be practically impossible on the payment of each amount, to go to the registry office and register the receipts. However, the difficulty I desire to point out, is that subsections 2 and 3 of section 88 of this Act are creating a bank security which did not exist before. A bank will advance money to a farmer on a warehouse receipt; some other creditor will deal with that farmer, and when the farmer's affairs are found to be subject to liquidation, the bank is able to step in and say: we own all this grain and all these cattle.

Mr. RHODES: Would not the condition of the bank be stronger if these receipts were registered?

Mr. MARTIN: If I understand the Bank Act as it exists to-day, the banks are not obliged to register these warehouse receipts. The registration of a public document is but a notice to the public of its existence, and, before giving credit, it is the duty of the people to search the registry offices and find out what kind of men they are dealing with.

Mr. BARKER: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that as solicitor for one of the regular chartered banks of Canada, he had collected loans made by that bank at 12 per cent per annum. Have I understood him correctly?

Mr. MARTIN: I referred to my acting as solicitor for certain banks—more than one bank. I said that, acting as solicitor for certain banks, more than one bank——

Mr. BARKER: Did I understand the hon. gentleman correctly that he said he was a solicitor for one of the chartered banks of Canada and as such had collected 12 per cent per annum on loans made by that bank?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not know why my hon. friend needs to worry so much about this. I have acted as solicitor for more than one chartered bank, and for more than one chartered bank in western Canada I have collected notes bearing interest as high as 12 per cent per annum.

Mr. LANCASTER: Perhaps the rate of interest was fixed by the person who sold the notes to the bank; it may not have been a loan by the bank.

Mr. MARTIN: I am considering cases where the bank charged this rate of interest, direct loans from the banks to the individuals.

Mr. CURRIE: Were there two names on the notes, or one?

Mr. MARTIN: I am not here to be cross-examined by all the representatives of the banks sitting on the other side of the House.

In referring to the question of bank inspection the Minister of Finance, at page 1901 of 'Hansard,' set forth two difficulties which he said were in the way of Government inspection. He said:

> As to these difficulties, the chief are the two I have mentioned: in the first place, the impossibility of government auditors pronouncing upon the character of current loans and discounts; in the second place, the immense number of branch banks which would have to be inspected, necessitating not only a very large staff even for audit but, to be absolutely effectual and scientifically correct, an audit practically upon the same day. I may say that the branches of the chartered banks in Canada have increased since 1900 at the rate of about three or four a week. In 1890, the number of chartered banks in Canada was, I think, only three or four hundred. That was the position upon the occasion of the last revision.

And then further on, at page 1903, he said:

> In the bank failures that have taken place in Canada, it will be found that the inspection system of the banks—that is, their internal audit system—has worked fairly well, because the fraud and dishonesty which have wrecked Canadian banks have been generally—always, so far as I know—not at the branches, but at the chief office of the bank.

I submit that the last statement made by the Minister of Finance that the fraud and dishonesty always occurred at the head offices of the bank, almost defeats his argument when he said it would be almost impossible to conduct a proper audit or inspection of the banking system in Canada. I believe the proper course for Parliament to pursue is not the audit provided by the Minister of Finance in section 56, but some kind of government inspection of the chief offices of the banks in Canada. We have at present only 25 chartered banks, or, leaving out the Banque Internationale du Canada, we have 24. Some system of Government inspection of the head offices of 24 banks in Canada could surely be devised. I recognize that the chief difficulty would be to get properly qualified men with a sufficient knowledge of the banking system of Canada to take hold of the work. I do not know how many would be required but I do not think very many, with a proper staff. If the minister had three or four of the most expert men some proper system of government inspection of the head offices of Canadian banks might be devised. What would be the effect? It is useless to deny that there is among some of our people a feeling of lack of confidence in our banking system. We have always been lead to suppose that the inspection of the branches by the banks has been satisfactory, and if we had some government inspection of head offices it might restore a feeling of confidence throughout Canada in our banking system. We know that certain things do occur in banks if we can believe rumours, that should not be allowed to occur. I believe that some form of proper government inspection of head offices might remove the feeling of lack of confidence which I believe exists among certain sections of our people.

Since the discussion on the Farmers' Bank many of us have been interested in following the statements in the press in regard to government inspection of banks, and I myself clipped from some of the papers circulated in Western Canada a number of the extracts quoted by the hon. member for North Ontario. Until a short time ago many papers kept saying that we must have some kind of government inspection or audit of our banking systems in Canada, some saying that it might be confined to our head offices. During the last few days I have looked through our papers and I find a wonderful sparcity of material on the question of government inspection. At the very time when the question is before Parliament the newspapers seem to have fallen down on government inspection of banks. If we had any kind of government inspection or outside inspection of the head offices of banks in Canada I do not believe that the bank failures which have been so disastrous in Canada for the past two or three years would have occurred. Take the Ontario Bank. In that case the manager, Mr. McGill, sent to New York, for purposes of speculation, millions of money and the account still stood in the head office of the bank as an asset of the bank. That could not have occurred with any inspection of head offices. The same thing occurred in connection with the failure of the Sovereign Bank where Stewart lent money in Chicago on foreign securities and lost it. I need not refer to the Farmers' Bank case, where it has been said the money was lost by investing in a hole in the ground, the Keely mine. None of these things could have occurred with outside inspection because, apart from the efficiency of the inspection, the mere knowledge that the books were subject to inspection would deter the officials of the head office from doing things of this kind for fear that their methods of doing business might become known to the outside world.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Does the hon. gentleman think that if there had even been a verification of the sworn returns as published in the Canada Gazette better protection would have been afforded to the public?

Mr. MARTIN: If I understood my hon. friend's question correctly, any outside examination of the returns of a bank would perhaps have been of some assistance in discovering irregularities. Notwithstanding the fact that we have only 24 chartered banks actually doing business at the present time, during the past twelve years there have been seven bank failures. I do not know how many banks have been merged in the meantime, but I do not suppose we have had more than 35 banks during the period to which I have referred and seven failures out of 35 banks in existence is a very large percentage,—25 per cent—in comparison with the failures that take place in other lines of business in Canada. It is all right for us to say that we are proud of our Canadian banking system. As a Canadian I am proud of our banks, I believe that some of them represent the strongest banking institutions there are in the world, but at the same time we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that we have had this percentage of failures. The banks which have failed are the Bank of Yarmouth, Ontario Bank, Sovereign Bank, Bank of St. John, Bank of St. Hyacinthe, Farmers' Bank, and, last but not least, La Banque Internationale du Canada.

Mr. EMMERSON: St. Stephen's Bank.

Mr. MARTIN: St. Stephen's Bank, making eight. Some will say that the Banque Internationale du Canada is a going concern. It is a going concern to this extent that those who paid $10.25 for their holdings will get back $5 per share. We have heard statements in regard to that bank but these statements have not satisfied me that everything is all right. I will still think that there was something wrong with the organization and management of the bank until somebody explains where that $5 went. It is due to the people that some investigation should be held in connection with the incorporation and management of that bank just as much as it is due to the people that some investigation, such as that which the government has provided for, should take place in connection with the Farmers' Bank. I was a member of this House during the existence of the Parliament from 1908 to 1911. I never heard a man blackguarded on the floor of this House as Wm. S. Fielding was in connection with the Farmers' Bank, a man whom no one in Canada has been able to point the finger of scorn at in connection with the public service and a man who gave good service to his country. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not agree with him on political questions, but no fault can be found with his honour as a public man. I heard men in this House, for whom I had more respect before they blackguarded that man than afterwards, who actually suggested that part of the $100,000 that was presented by the leading Liberals of this country to Mr. Fielding had come from the Farmers' Bank. Is it any wonder that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House should demand an investigation in connection with the incorporation and business management of the Banque Internationale du Canada. Any unbiased man, taking into consideration the facts in connection with the incorporation of the Farmers' Bank and in connection with the Banque Internationale du Canada, cannot fail to come to the conclusion that there would be just as much reason for me attempting to blackguard the present Minister of Finance as for hon. gentlemen opposite attempting to blackguard Mr. Fielding in connection with the Farmers' Bank.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that the word 'blackguarding' is scarcely appropriate in Parliament.

Mr. MARTIN: Do you wish me to withdraw that expression, Mr. Speaker? I do not know that I have anything further to say in regard to this matter at present, I only hope that the Government will investigate the incorporation of that bank. It is due to the people, it is due to the shareholders that some investigation should take place. We cannot afford to have men, connected with the frenzied finance of this country, forming these large financial institutions and then allowing them to go to the wall as has been done in connection with the Banque Internationale. There are one or two other matters that I wished to mention, but they are merely amendments in connection with the Bill and I will reserve any further remarks that I have to make until the Bill comes before the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we are all anxious to get on with the second reading of this Bill and place it as rapidly as possible before the committee where we can take evidence and discuss the question more freely than on the floor of this House. It is perhaps very unpopular for a member of Parliament to say anything in favour of the banks at the present moment. All kinds of insinuations will be made that the man who speaks in favour of the present banking system must be tied up by the banks, must owe the banks large sums of money and be virtually a bankrupt. Before I enter into a discussion of the question I want to make the personal statement that I do not owe the bank any money at all. I have no note in the bank, the bank owes me and so I am absolutely free to criticise the action of the banks. When I speak on this Bill I hope to speak in the interests of the people as a whole, not in the interest of those who have tried to borrow money from the banks and could not—nor of those who have lost money on bank shares. Let us look at this question soberly. One would imagine from the discussion that the banks were huge institutions owned by millionaires. The return as published by this Government every year shows the lists of the shareholders of the various banks, and if we examine those lists we find that virtually the majority of the shares of the banks of Canada are held by women and for estates—that is to say, for widows and orphans, and that the men who are amongst the wealthy in this country very seldom hold large amounts of bank stocks. If the banks are as those returns show then the banks are, in every sense of the word, the people of Canada. The banks do not represent the interests of any single individual or any single money power. After making that examination we must look upon our own banking system in comparison with the banking systems of other countries. It is very easy to raise a cry against banks and banking. I can assure hon. gentlemen that if we did not have any banks the country would be very poor indeed. Banking is one of the greatest advantages that civilization has given to mankind and no country is better served by her banks than Canada. Take any other country that you wish, compare its banking system with ours in the light of, we will say, panics or disasters and you will find that there is only one other country that can at all compare with us in that respect and that is France. Within our own memory we know of many world-wide financial depressions. It has been said with truth that the grain crops of the United States have been moved by the Canadian banks. Not so many years ago, the railway wages of the United States were paid in Canadian currency and while these great waves of depression were sweeping over the world, and when in other countries, everyone was reaching out for a dollar, business in Canada proceeded at the old stand, uninterrupted and comparatively prosperous. Credit was to some extent limited, sail was taken in, but nobody suffered; the workingmen who in times of financial panic are thrown out of employment, continued in their ordinary avocations in Canada, while all the rest of the world was in financial turmoil; that fact in itself is ample answer to all criticisms that are levelled against our banking system. The Canadian banking system is not the growth of a single day; it has not been just projected out of the mind of any individual; it would seem that the atmosphere of Canada gives to men a clearer insight into the true methods of carrying on business than is to be found among the older civilizations of Europe. Compare for a moment our ideas of political economy with those existent in European countries, and what will you find? You will find that in a cycle Canada passes through the same transition which it took European countries thousands of years to achieve. First, we have the hunter; he is followed by the rancher, who is followed by the extensive farmer, who is followed by the intensive farmer; then the pedlar, the bagman as he is known in the Old Country, the small shop-keeper, the jobber, and, following him, the manufacturer. We have seen our banking system grow from nothing to its present proportions. Hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that these economic questions which face us to-day are matters of history, in other countries, and the people of those countries pass judgment upon them in the light of history, while we, in this country can pass judgment upon them from the standpoint of living experience. We have erected a banking system that serves the whole country, that has an elastic currency, that supplies all the money necessary for all the operations of the country, and which is not lacking in any essential except some petty detail such as the matter of inspection, or of the amount that should be paid as interest to the depositors or charged to the customers of a bank. I therefore say that when we undertake to discuss our banking system in this House, we should do so with deliberation and calmness, and without belittling the ship that has carried us safely through so many storms. Credit is a very timid thing. It is true, I believe, that in view of Canada's present prosperous position we do not receive the amount of foreign money we should, but, I warn hon. gentlemen, that credit will take to itself wings the moment any criticism is levelled against it, especially so far as banking is concerned. Start a rumour down the street about a bank being in difficulty, and in a moment the rumour has spread miles away and people are hurrying to the bank to get their money, and at once you have a panic, sometimes local, sometimes far-reaching. It reminds me of the story of the old Quaker who found that a dog had broken into his larder, and, not wishing to kill the dog, he being a man of peace, took the animal outside, started him down the street calling: mad dog, and in a short time a horde of people were chasing the unfortunate animal until finally a policeman ended its days. And so, if we start this criticism of our banking system as some gentlemen in this House have done, we are going to cause needless alarm, and we are going to prevent people from depositing in our banks with consequences injurious to the general business of the country.

Let me discuss for a few moments the question whether we should have a higher rate of interest. Some claim that we ought to pay more than three per cent in our Government savings banks, and others claim that we ought to fix by statute the interest that should be charged. These questions have long absorbed the attention of parliaments. In the reign of Queen Anne, the amount of interest that could be charged was limited to five per cent, and, as late as 1854, experience had taught the people of England that to fix a rate of interest of any kind by statute was a useless and dangerous experiment. All the experience of the past goes to teach us that it would be unwise for this Parliament to fix a rate of interest as some have contended. The interest to be payable on deposits is fixed by the post office savings bank at three per cent, and if we increase that interest rate the banks will also have to increase the interest rate in order to attract money to their vaults. I claim, Sir, that there is ample protection afforded in Canada for the small depositor, because the small depositor can go to the post office savings bank and he can get his three per cent interest there, just as he can from any of the chartered banks. As a matter of fact, there are today millions of dollars deposited in these post office savings banks, the fact being that the amount to the credit of each individual depositor in Canada is greater than that to the credit of the individual depositor in any country in the world. I may mention that the average rate paid on deposits in England is 2.05 per cent. The Bank of England pays no interest on any deposit, and neither does the Bank of France. In face of these facts, would it not seem foolish for us to endeavour to fix by statute a rate of interest for deposits? I think it will strike most members of this House as a common-sense view when I say that so far as the duty of this Parliament is concerned to provide a safeguard for the money of the smaller depositor, we have done so by establishing the post office savings bank system which gives absolute guarantee. A great many fallacious notions have been expressed during this discussion; for instance, some hon. gentlemen seem to think that the currency is a very large source of revenue to a bank. In the United States the banks deposit bonds with the Government, and these bonds bear interest at five or six per cent, the banks deriving interest from the bonds and also getting interest for loaning of the currency which they get from the country in return for these bonds. In 1883, there was an inquiry held in the United States into the earnings on the currency given the banks by the Government, and at the conclusion of that inquiry, the Controller of Currency in the United States reported that the earnings of the banks on currency was only $46 on each $100,000 of currency. There is no reason to say that that is false. This inquiry was made with full knowledge that all the facts extended over a term of years, and shows distinctly that the currency of the banks is not such a large source of revenue as many people would imagine. We will come again to the question of earnings. The earnings of the Canadian banks have been referred to. From the statements that have been made here, one would imagine this was the golden age for banks and banking in Canada. Hon. gentlemen in this House may be surprised to know that the dividends paid by Canadian banks are exceedingly modest; and that one of the chief reasons why English capitalists do not invest in banks in Canada, as was suggested by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), is that the English capitalists can get far more interest on the money they invest in the bank shares of their own country. I do not desire to exhaust the patience of the House beyond giving a few facts with reference to what the rate of dividend is in other countries as compared with Canada, so far as bank stocks are concerned. I will give the dividends paid by some of the foreign banks first.

Let us bear in mind that there is no double liability on the shares of national banks of the United States. When we come to consider the ample returns on capital invested in these foreign banks and compare them with the meagre returns from the banks in this country, we are inclined to feel a trifle ashamed of our banks, in spite of all the statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I have here a statements of the dividends paid by the Canadian banks, taken from the Canada Year Book of 1911:

Compare these with returns from Canadian banks and bear in mind that everyone who has a dollar invested in a Canadian bank must be at all times prepared with another dollar to back it up. He has virtually got two hundred dollars invested for every hundred dollars in reality that appears in his name in the banks list of shareholders. You will see, therefore, that the dividend returns, so far as banking in Canada is concerned, are less than those of almost every other country in the world.

With reference to the question of inspection, four kinds of inspection, so called, were mentioned in this debate. The first kind of inspection was called an audit; an audit could be an external audit or an internal audit. There was inspection, so-called, which is altogether different from an audit; an inspection is supposed to go into the quality of accounts. There is an external inspection and an internal inspection. This question has attracted the attention of the wisest minds engaged in the banking of the world; and the unanimous opinion of the best bankers of the world, not only to-day, but in the past, men who have served as bankers and died virtually poor men, men who were bankers first, foremost, and all the time, is that 'internal' inspection is the only remedy. I will give the House a quotation from a letter written by the late Mr. Thos. Fyshe, whom we all admire, a gentleman of high standing and whose views on banking should bear weight. Mr. Fyshe wrote several letters and he was very strong on this point. I desire to quote his remarks to the House, and to show how closely his ideas were followed by those of foreign bankers, as far as inspection is concerned. Mr. Fyshe says in a letter to the Montreal Witness of October 29, 1906:

This proposition (bank inspector) has been under discussion at every renewal of the bank charters, extending back for over thirty years, with the result that the opinion of the bankers is almost unanimously opposed to it. It is a simple matter of fact, that the legislation upon our admirable banking system is founded, was the work almost entirely of the bankers, who have had many strenuous fights with the politicians to prevent the introduction into Canada of American banking ideas, which would have been fatal to our system and disastrous to the country. The Americans are to-day cursed with a banking and currency system which is a disgrace to them, and which the united wisdom of the country seems unable to cope with. If we had been guided by our politicians we should probably have reached a similar situation. On the contrary, our bankers convinced the politicians that so far as banking was concerned they knew better than the Yankees, with the result that we have now a banking system second to none in existence, the advantages of which to the nation are everywhere conspicuous. Owing as much as they do to the bankers of the country for this great service, it is to be hoped that the people of Canada, before tinkering with the Bank Act, with the view of establishing Government inspection, will take counsel with our bankers, and be guided by their judgment, as being a matter which they thoroughly understand, and which the public do not.

It has become too much the habit to appeal to the Government to regulate everything that goes wrong, forgetting the tremendous seriousness and significance of making a new law which may work a hundred times more mischief than it is designed to remedy.

Now, Sir, this proposal for a government inspection must be judged in view of the call made on this Parliament to reimburse the losses of the depositors and shareholders of the Farmers' Bank, simply because it is claimed a mistake was made in the granting of their certificate. Many hon. members on both sides of the House have acknowledged that that question is, to some extent, a burning question in some parts of the country, and that the proposition has been made in the House and in the newspapers that the Government should consider the advisability of paying back to the depositors in the Farmers' Bank, and also to its shareholders, the money they lost because some error was made, either intentional or unintentional, in the granting of the certificate of that bank. Let me ask you how much more would the depositors and creditors of a broken bank come to this House demanding their money back if we had placed a government inspector to look over the accounts of that bank. Bear in mind the fact that a fraudulent banker can destroy his bank inside of twenty-four hours. It is a fact that these irregularities have almost always occurred in exchanges of money from banks in Canada to banks in the United States. That is to say a transaction involving exchange, and a bank has to depend so much on the honesty of its employees in matters involving exchange, that if a banker wishes to take every dollar in the bank he can do it inside of a week as well as inside of a year by a simple process of bills of exchange; and you cannot keep a government inspector sitting over him all the time. The House cannot legislate morality and honesty into bankers. If the Government appointed an inspector of this kind, and during his absence the manager of the bank wished to take the funds of the bank and transferred them to New York, to Mexico or to some other country, he could do it in less than twenty-four hours under the system of exchanges which now exists all over the world. If that were done, everybody would who lost money through that transaction come to the House and would say: 'You put an inspector there and the inspector is responsible, and the Government is responsible, and I want my money back.'

There is a system of 'outside' inspection of the national banks in the United States. Has that prevented American national banks from becoming bankrupt? Is it preventing them from going to the wall to-day? Statistics have been produced to show that it has not. The Comptroller of Currency of the United States was, giving evidence the other day before the so-called money investigation committee which has been referred to, this committee of inquiry in Washington, into the 'money trust.' I read in the newspaper report of that investigation that Mr. Laurence O. Murray, Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, before this committee, declared that the bank law was 'inadequate,' that the present system of examination was 'superficial and ineffective.' Hon. members will find him reported in the New York Evening Post of January 28. And I would ask hon. members to procure copies of the Comptroller of the Currency's report on 'inspection.' If we desire to discuss the question of American banks, we can do so very well in the light of this interesting volume. We find according to the report of this gentleman, that, since 1865 and up to 1909, which is the last report I have, 508 national banks of the United States have been liquidated. Another very surprising fact is that 14 banks were put in the hands of a receiver in 1909 and at that time in process of iquidation in the United States, there were no less than 68 national banks. I have taken the trouble to figure out from the statement of the comptroller, the losses through these failures. I do not wish to occupy too much of the time of the House with these figures, because any hon. member wishing to examine them can find this work in the library. I think if some hon. gentlemen would look over these figures they will think a little better of the Canadian banking system than they have hitherto done. The aggregate capital stock paid in these banks at the time of failure was $83,495,920, and the additional assessments collected from shareholders amounted to $21,293,162, a total payment on the part of the shareholders since 1865 on capital account $105,799,082. The sums refunded to shareholders after the banks were liquidated aggregated $3,011,763, leaving a total loss to the stockholders of $102,677,319. The public claims against the banks amounted to $179,280,953 and the claims paid were $131,763,421. The loss to the creditors of the bank—that is to the creditors, not to the shareholders—was $47,517,532. If we add the losses of the shareholders and the losses to the creditors, we shall get the total losses to the public through these banks. This aggregate was $150,194,851: In other words, in forty-eight years this loss averaged annually $3,129,006. I think if there is any difference my figures are a little later than those of the hon. junior member for Halifax. Adding the losses from State banks will bring the annual losses through banks—over eleven million dollars. Thus it will be seen that the losses to the people of the United States through bank failures have been far greater per capita than those of the people of Canada who have no outside bank inspection at all.

I have here the figures of the total bank losses in Canada. They were given in this House a year or so ago by the hon. member for Argenteuil. I do not know whether he is going to speak on this question, and I hope I am not trespassing on his time, but he has given a very interesting table, which has been published in 'Hansard' and I think it should again be placed on 'Hansard' by him. I have his speech here, and it shows that the total loss to the people of Canada through banks since Confederation is $6,694,665, an annual loss of $155,220. We have therefore, been comparatively modest as regards losses, and for that reason we should congratulate ourselves and not start tinkering with an Act in any way which has been declared by Government officers to be useless. Sir, I am not uttering one word against a system of internal inspection; I believe that the law should provide that banks should have internal inspection, not only of the head offices, but of the branches and the foreign agencies, because in the case of the Ontario Bank, the subject of the loss was shown on the books as an asset or bill of exchange on New York, and no one who inspected the head office of the Ontario Bank could, by merely examining the books, ascertain whether or not there was a loss. In fact there was no money in New York. The reason why so many of the small banks fail in the United States is that, in isolated sections of the country, the bank manager, if he is crooked, he is able to 'kite,' drafts as it is known in banking parlance. He will make a draft on New York and the inspector cannot tell whether these drafts are against deposits or credits and are correct or not. Our system of branch banks avoid this, and enable money to be transported from one part of the country to another with very little expense, and that is one of the great faults of the national system of the United States. If you wish to transfer money from New York to Texas a large premium is paid for doing so, and if the bank manager is crooked, not only can he hoodwink the inspectors, but his own stockholders and directors as well. In connection with the reference made to Germany, I might call attention to a man in Germany named Raiffeisen, a great philanthropist. He has devoted his whole life to the organization of a system of small co-operative credit and of agricultural banks all over Germany. He would take half a dozen farmers or tradesmen or labourers, and would start a little co-operative bank amongst them, and teach them what Earl Marx, the great socialist, calls the 'capitalistic system of production'—that is the use of credit. Here we have savings banks in small towns with half a million dollars in them, and if our farmers took that money, utilized it under the system prevailing in Germany, they would be enabled very easily to realize a large credit, and be enabled to build up their farms, and increase their production the same as manufacturers. Every manufacturer knows it would be impossible to carry on the business of the country if the banks did not provide credit. There is not enough currency or coin. The banks do not provide money in the shape of gold or currency, but in the form of what is known as 'money of account'—that is credit. They will say: 'we will lend so much money, and that amount is based on the amount of the deposits. But they can easily lend an amount much in excess of the deposits, because they know the money is continually coming back and they can meet their daily demand for currency with about thirty per cent of cash reserve. This man Raiffeisen, who has created all these small banks in Germany, which are to-day lending over a million a year, says distinctly that the small bank must be inspected by itself or by its own union. He decries state inspection altogether. Mr. Wolfe, a well known writer on this topic in England, has written possibly one of the most interesting books on co-operative banking that has been published in the English language. In discussing this matter, expressing Raiffeisen's views says, on page 205:

What title, so I should like to ask, has the state to interfere at all in the private affairs of a bank? That is not a public concern. And what business has it to make the taxpayer pay for the inspection which it imposes for the supposed benefit of the bank? The plea ostensibly put forward is, that it is to the public's interest that the bank, at which the public is invited to deal, at any rate to the extent of depositing money—for all other business is restricted exclusively to members—should be kept sound. We hear that argument now strongly put forward in Italy. However, the public is very well able to look after its own interest. It may withhold its deposits. And, really, that would be a far more effective way of bringing home to the bank the necessity of keeping things safe than inspection by a government officer.

That is the opinion of Mr. Wolfe also, who is the recognized authority in England on co-operative banking. Another great European banker is the present prime minister of Italy, Mr. Luzzatti. He established his life work by starting a small co-operative bank in Milan following the German system. At the time of a great commercial panic in Italy, this small bank in Milan broke the law by issuing tokens like our currency, thus saving the financial situation. This made the bank and it is now doing a business of over a million dollars a year. This man Luzzatti established banking on a firm basis in Italy, and was raised from a very humble position to that of prime minister of Italy. Mr. Wolfe in his work entitled 'People's Banks,' referring to the question of the inspection and the prying of the state into the affairs of a bank, says:

M. Luzzatti, who had in the meantime become Minister of Agriculture, Industry and Commerce, has foreshadowed in Creditoe Cooperazione a Bill, which he expects to see passed with little opposition, making inspection obligatory, by preference of unions, but, failing that, by the state, M. Luzzatti at the same time declares that in his opinion inspection by the state, where there is a union, is worse than no inspection at all.

Last year's report shows that these banks had lost not one cent in Germany. The condition in Italy is the same. It is a fact that the great percentage of humanity is honest. The percentage of rogues even amongst the poor is very small. The experience of bankers in this country is that the small farmers are the ones who pay their accounts in full. The benefits of credit should be wisely extended to the farmers and poorer classes.

I have given the opinions of four of the foremost bankers in the world. Luzzatti does not represent the money trust; he is to all intents and purposes a state socialist. Raiffeisen was not a money power representative. Neither of them benefited a cent from the establishment of banks. There is also Mr. Fyshe and the Comptroller of Currency of the United States. These men all give the one answer to the question, they are against state inspection. Is it not right for us to decide that these bankers know best? Luzzatti further provides in a new Bill, that if the bank does not provide proper inspection itself the state can step in and appoint. I think that is perhaps the solution and a fair way out of our difficulty. That is the way it stands in Italy, they leave the bank to its own resources, they believe in self help, they think that the only people who can help the shareholders are the shareholders themselves and I have given the result not of a fancied opinion, not of my own thought, but the ideas of the coolest-headed men who have had the public interest in their mind and they are standing by the amendment proposed in this Act. For these reasons we, as intelligent responsible men, who realize the benefits of this banking system of Canada, who must recognize that our banks have been very modest in their dividends as compared with the dividends paid in other countries. So we should deal fairly and honestly with our present banking system and should be very careful not to amend the Act in order to seek some idea of a false security which does not exist.

But suppose we have bank inspection as asked; then the credit of the worst bank in the whole lot will be just the same as the credit of the best bank and after all the only and the great asset of a bank is its good name, its credit and its honor. If a man does not wish to deposit in a certain bank, if he distrusts it, he can go to another bank, and what is more the state has provided that a man can go and put his money in the post office savings banks guaranteed by the state. The hon. member for South York said that the postmasters ought to be able to mark post office savings bank cheques, so that a man could have a cheque of that kind cashed. That is another fallacy that will not work out in practice. What would happen if a postmaster could mark cheques for every Tom, Dick and Harry? We might have defalcations without number. Some postmaster would issue four or five hundred of these 'marked' cheques on the Post Office Department, send the boys out to get them cashed and away he would go, and the Government would have to pay the money. The Government has established a wise system in the Post Office Savings Bank. The only thing is that it locks up too much money now. Forty odd millions are now locked up in that way. After all it is better to keep gold as against deposits of all kind, as is done by our Government at present. This Government has more than a fair proportion of gold in the Treasury, and compares favourably in that respect with any other country.

Should we have a national system of banks? That is another question. We have never had any necessity for a national system of banks. National banks have been organized invariably by other countries for what reason? Not to benefit the people, but to benefit the state. They were established, in the first place, to lend a lot of money to the state. Was not the Bank of England so established? How much of its original capital did the state take, and has not the Bank of England had to suspend payments in gold? Time and again it could not pay gold, and all the legislation and everything that they have been able to do so far has made it impossible for them to say with absolute certainty that at all times the Bank of England will never need to suspend specie payment. That is what our banks do—when they fail. They suspend specie payment, and they are promptly put in the hands of a receiver or liquidator and that is the last you hear of them. The Bank of France had a narrow shave in 1848, and the greatest monument of French genius is the Bank of France, greater than all the campaign of Napoleons, greater than all the victories of Louis, for its work endures. The Bank of France has been the greatest work of the French people. In spite of the revolution of 1848 it never suspended gold payment. The Bank of Germany is in virtually the same position. These national banks were all intended in the first place to give the profits of banking to the state. They were intended to lend money to the state. Now, we do not need to borrow money for the state, from our people, so we do not need to establish a national bank. Gentlemen say: Why does not the state step in and print a lot of paper bills, issue them and make money plentiful? Everyone knows that economists have said from John Stewart Mill down, if you issue currency that is redeemable in gold and the currency is not needed, people will exchange the currency for gold and ship the gold out of the country and money will reach its own level; it is altogether a case of supply and demand. In certain periods of the year when we need extra money, the state has always seen that our needs are provided for, our currency has been elastic, but not unduly inflated. But suppose the state said: we will issue another hundred million dollars of currency, and issue notes. Then what will we do with this money? Who will accept it? Will the Government ask the banks to hold it as deposits? Suppose we put so many millions in this bank and so many in another bank to the credit of the country. The bankers are then holding the money of the country without security, and who is going to hold the bankers? Is it not a danger? After they have got all that money what happens? Suppose you double the currency of the country—I should like to read a paragraph from John Stewart Mill written fifty years ago. Hon. gentlemen of a scholastic turn of mind will always give better credit to what a man wrote fifty years ago than to what a practical man of to-day says. Mill says that if you double the currency of the country you double prices. Might not I suggest that we have a little too much money in this country now, and that the reason prices are so high—the high cost of living—is because currency and money is too plentiful in Canada? If you read all the books on banking, and I have read some of them, you must come to the conclusion that the reason prices are so high here is that there is too much money. If you make money scarce, prices will automatically come down. That is the history of banking all over the world.

I have gone over nearly all the objections to the Bank Act. I have endeavoured to meet them with a few facts, and where I have not met them with facts, I have tried to interject an argument or two.

Mergers! I can hear that cry when I am going home at night; I can hear the news boys crying 'Mergers.' We have mergers on the brain. The process of merging has been going on from time immemorial. The history of England shows that

When all property was in land, they had mergers. A man's son married his neighbour's daughter and they merged the two farms.

Now, we will take banking mergers. The Bank of England is the product of the merger of a number of banks. It is the final analysis of the banks in England up to a certain date. The Bank of France is the result of a merger. It is not many years since the Bank of France took over all of the provincial banks. The Bank of Germany is the result of a merger. There were something like 36 banks when the Reich's bank was established and now there are only about seven. They gave up their currency and became amalgamated. That is a process of transition that we cannot stop. Is it injurious? One difficulty in doing business with a small bank is this: a business man goes to a bank for a credit; the bank will sometimes say: we cannot give you $150,000, but we will give you $100,000, we can't spare the credit. If there were a merger of two or three banks the resulting bank would gladly give the larger amount of money that is required. It would have the credit and as a result people would be able to go on with more business. Great companies require vast sums of money. Even the great Canadian Pacific railway, rich and all as it is, found in days gone by that it had to go to the bank and get money. The steel companies have had to go to the bank for money to handle their product. Every manufacturing concern in the country in its earlier stages has had to borrow freely from the banks and they all owe a debt of gratitude to the banks. The benefit of bank credit extends all over Canada. A little merchant buys his stuff from the jobber in Winnipeg and gives his note for it. He sells goods to the farmers of the Northwest on six months' time, and in this way he is using the banks of the East about which we have heard so much. There are many times when the western jobber has to rely on the eastern manufacturers and the eastern manufacturers have to rely upon the banks. There is no use of casting any reflection upon the East or upon the West; we are all on a common footing. The banks have always endeavoured to do their duty and I hope they will do it in the future as they have in the past.

There is one thing that I would like to see in the Bank Act and it is an innovation. In some countries I notice there is a provision that, if a man deposits his money in the bank, he can leave a document with the bank, signed by himself and a witness, stating that in case he dies suddenly without a will, some person designated, his wife or child, may cheque that money out. If a man dies suddenly in Canada and he has $500 or $600 in the bank, his widow and children have to go to the expense of administration before they can get the money. In the meantime they may starve. That is done in foreign countries, and I am quite sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance could easily frame a provision of that kind.

Now, there is the question of whether we should, if we are going to loan to farmers, ask that all these loans be registered in the county registry office. They have a banking system in Madras that applies to small farmers. When a farmer pledges his crop in India, a notice is posted up in the local post office to the effect that his crop is pledged to the bank and they have also criers who declare certain things with sound of trumpets. It is the old-fashioned way of crying down credit. My friend the Colonel (Mr. Clarke, South Bruce) here knows that if he were on service and he marched his regiment into any city or town, the first thing he would do would be to send his sergeant and bugler to the post office to cry down credit so that he would not be personally responsible for the debts of his men. They adopt a system something like that in India. We cannot very well do that here. To register every bank loan would mean larger fees to the registers and heavy legal expenses to people who can ill afford them. Who is going to be injured, who is going to suffer, with the present system? There is nobody demanding the imposition of undue restrictions upon the bank. If I have money in an estate that becomes insolvent I do not begrudge that the bank should get its money ahead of me. I realize that we must have this necessary evil, that it is necessary to have banks and preference in order to carry on the business of the country. Banks lend millions of dollars on demand notes to industries and corporations, it is through the banks that the thousands of men employed get their salaries, and millions of dollars are tied up in drafts representing goods stored in warehouses for six months at a time. We have to provide all safeguards for the banks because the banks, as I said at the beginning of my observations, are the people, not the property of the money trust but that of the widows and orphans. Therefore, it is the duty of the members of this Parliament as level-headed men to discuss this Bank Bill in the light of experience rather than try new experiments with the Bank Act.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) who has just sat down as to the desirability of considering this question soberly, and also that it is not a matter that should be experimented with for the sake of experiment. The question of the finance of the whole of Canada, is, as has been said, the most important question with which this Parliament has to deal. It is the more important in that it is only brought to the attention of Parliament once in ten years in the ordinary course of events. The fact that it is a matter of such stupendous importance to everybody in Canada and that it only comes up for consideration once in ten years is, I assume, a sufficient reason for every member of the House giving his best opinion in regard to the Bill before the House. No member shows any desire to make partisan politics or to make political favour for himself when he brings to the attention of the House his views and opinions in regard to this important question.

I am sorry to say that I am not as well equipped for dealing with this question as many other members of the House. I have never had intimate relations with banks; that is to say, I have no banking knowledge. Therefore. I am not able to speak as an expert in regard to those features of the Bill that relate to the management of banks. But, I am one of those who stand in the capacity either of a lender to or borrower from the bank. I am one of those who furnish the $1,100,000,000 to the banks in deposits, or am one of those who borrow from the banks a part of the $900,000,000 which are borrowed from time to time by the people of Canada. It is in that position and from that point of view that I would like to consider this Bill. From that point of view the position of the shareholders and directors of the banks is of secondary and not of primary importance. The interest of the shareholders of the banks amounts in shares to a matter of a little over $100,000,000. They have besides another $100,000,000 that belongs to them under the name of rest or reserve, The shareholders have an interest in $200,000,000, roughly speaking, in this Bill, whereas the public have an interest of over $1,000,000,000. It is, therefore, unnecessary I hope to apologize for considering the Bill from the standpoint of the billion-dollar interest as compared with the two-hundred million-dollar interest.

I was much interested in the remarks of my hon. friend from South York when he insisted strongly upon the desirability of taxing the banks, but, so far as I can see, I do not at all agree with him in that view. If a tax is to be imposed on a bank it must come in the end from either the borrower or the lender or both. If it is to be taken out of the depositors who have that billion dollars in the bank I say they are getting too little for their money at the present time, while the men who have borrowed $900,000,000 from the banks have at present sufficient burden to bear in the rate of interest they are charged. So that, in neither case, from my point of view, should there be a tax levied upon the business of the banks, unless the interests of the country make it absolutely necessary from a revenue standpoint. My view is, that if at the present time it can be assumed that the banks are making an undue profit, and I am not saying they are, then that profit should be reduced, either by giving a larger rate of interest to the depositor, or by giving the borrower his money at a lower rate of interest. I am not one of those who is in favour of government sharing in the profits of business, simply because business is profitable. My view is that the Government of the country should properly look for its revenue in fair proportion, equalizing the burden on all productions of the country, and that where there is an undue profit arising out of any particular business, the Government should see that that profit is properly distributed amongst those from whom it has been drawn.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I pointed out two things—first, that the state might in a sense share in excessive profits—but my main argument was for state limitation of excessive profits as the hon. gentleman is now arguing.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not so much arguing against the views of my hon. friend as I am trying to get my own views before the House, and I merely used the reference to his remarks in order to bring out my point clearly: that in no case would I consider it a desirable proposition to levy a tax upon the banking interest of this country, unless in the estimation of the Government of the day it was necessary for the purpose of raising revenue to make such a levy, and, that the effort of the Government should rather be to reduce the cost of banking so far as it can be reduced.

Mr. MACLEAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: I am merely stating an abstract principle; I am not making any suggestion as to policy in connection with the Bill before us. There is another point as to which I cannot see eye to eye with my hon. friend from South York, in his general objections to the banking system of Canada. I am rather inclined to agree with my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that the banking system of Canada has served the interests of Canada during the past many years with very good results. It has to be admitted, of course, that there have been flaws and failures in the system, but there are flaws and failures in everything in this world. I do not know that on the whole the banking system of Canada has shown itself to be at a disadvantage as compared with the banking systems of other countries. At the same time the fact that this Bank Act comes up for revision at the end of each period of ten years is all the evidence that is necessary to prove that in the minds of those who framed the Act and in the minds of those who have amended it from time to time even down to the present, it is essential that as the conditions of the country change so the conditions surrounding the system of banking in the country have to change if the public interests are to be properly protected as it is the duty of the Government and of Parliament to protect them. Therefore, I make no apology for supporting changes which are proposed or for suggesting changes in the Bank Act. So far as my experience goes, it seems to me that the Canadian banking system by which a single organization has branches throughout the Dominion makes for and not against the best interests of the country. I know that some years ago the branches of the chartered banks established in the West were loaning money at approximately the same rate of interest as was being charged in eastern Canada while across the line, in the state of Dakota, under the banking system and conditions prevailing there, the people were paying approximately twice as much for their money as were we on the Canadian side of the line at that particular time. The conclusion I drew was, that under our system it was possible to tide over a period of difficulty in certain localities under circumstances much more favourable than under the system of isolated local banks prevailing in the United States.

Having said so much then on behalf of the banking system of Canada and of its administration, I think it is also necessary to say that the importance of this great question requires that it shall be dealt with very frankly; and that where there are or are thought to be shortcomings in the administration of the system or failures on its part to do the work that is expected of it in the public interest, here and now is the time to say so. I have some information to give the House in regard to the administration of banks in the West, not so much by way of criticism, not so much with a view to suggest amendments to the Act, but I think it is absolutely desirable that the House should be made aware of certain conditions so that the House can draw its own conclusions. If we are to consider this banking system as my hon. friend from North Simcoe did, as something that was in itself perfect, that nothing required change or alteration either in the system or in its administration, and that it was one of the very few perfect things that were granted to the sons of men, then there would be no use of our considering it here. I think, however, as it is a finite institution, having something of the earth and being earthy, it is desirable that we should deal frankly with it; and if there is information to be given dealing with the question or touching upon the subject, we should have the information. I want to say this with a full sense of responsibility. In the Northwest we have had a very rapid advance in the price or value of real estate, particularly in the cities and towns. In the city of Edmonton each advance in the price of real estate was directed and established and, in my judgment, created by the action of one or another of our chartered banks. To come right down to particulars, about the year 1912 we had three banks doing business in Edmonton, the Imperial, the Merchants and I think the Union. The Bank of Commerce, wishing to establish there, decided to acquire a site for a building. At that time property in the part of the city the Bank of Commerce desired to establish in was worth $100 per front foot; it had stood at that figure for some time. The Bank of Commerce wanted a particular site; the owners did not care to sell; but the Bank paid $200 per foot for that particular lot for the purpose of putting their building upon it, and forthwith all the property along Jasper Avenue on each side of this locality was worth $200 per front foot. Property stood at $200 per front foot for some time. Later on the Bank of Montreal, desiring to establish in Edmonton, wished to get a particular lot and paid $300 per front foot; forthwith property on Jasper Avenue was worth $300 per front foot. I need not continue the story; but there are now some thirteen or fourteen banks in Edmonton and each bank as it came in, in its purchase of property, raised the value of real estate in the city until the last, the Bank of Quebec, paid, I think, $3,000 per front foot for the property it acquired on Jasper Avenue; it is true that there were buildings upon the property. What has occurred in Edmonton I verily believe has occurred in every other town and city throughout the prairie provinces.

Mr. BORDEN: How much had the population of that city increased in the meantime?

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, it had probably trebled. I could not give the figures exactly, but it would have perhaps more than trebled. The population had not at all increased in proportion to the increase in the cost of real estate. I am not suggesting that real estate values in Edmonton have not every right to be as high as they are; I do not wish to be understood as suggesting that. I am not detracting from the foresight of the bank that comes in and, for the sake of getting the site that it wants, pays a higher price than the current price of property along that street; but I want to point out that when the banks have done this, as they have done in Edmonton and everywhere else in the West, it does not lie in the mouths of the managers to read lectures to the people of the western cities and towns in regard to real estate speculation. It is a matter of fair consideration on the part of this Government, when dealing with this revision of the Bank Act, as to whether the banks were properly justified in entering upon these purchases as they have done. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister may say that it is none of the business of the public whether the banks buy at a higher price or at a lower price, that it is the business of the shareholders of the bank, and that they have just as much right as anybody else to buy high or to buy low. That is where I do not altogether agree with him.

Mr. BORDEN: I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood that was your line of argument, that was your point of view.

Mr. BORDEN: No.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to press the point on the Prime Minister; but I want to point out that the importance of the banks and the business that they do are dependent, not upon the money which is provided by the shareholders, but absolutely upon the amount of money that is in their hands that belongs to the people of the country at large. It is the billion dollars of deposits of the people at large that make the banks important, and not the money that is put into the banks by the shareholders. The idea is in my mind that the banks in some of these cases may be buying these high priced properties with money that belongs to their depositors and not to their shareholders. Now, I may be wrong; that idea may be correct in regard to some of the banks and not correct in regard to others. But it is a point upon which I think the people of Canada should be informed. I spoke about the matter before; I suggested it to the hon. Minister of Finance when the Bill was brought in; and I say it is a matter upon which the public of Canada ought to be informed. It is not enough to tell the people of Canada that this is the business of the shareholders and not of the public. Any business of a bank that is doing ninety per cent of its business on the money of the public and ten per cent of its business on its own money is of interest to the public in the proportion of nine to one. The public are entitled to know, and should know, and means should be taken in this revision of the Bank Act to let them know. That is my humble suggestion upon that subject.

There is another thing that I think should be brought to the attention of the House. During the present session, that is since last fall, money has been very tight in western Canada. The banks have curtailed their loans; they have drawn in their credits very considerably. I find no fault with their doing so; it is their right and it is their duty if the business circumstances call for it.

Mr. PELLETIER: That has happened all over Canada, not alone in the West.

Mr. OLIVER: I only know of the conditions in the West. I assume that it is the same in the East. At any rate, it is a well known fact so far as the West is concerned. I am not asserting or suggesting that the banks were not wise in doing this; I am not suggesting that they had not a perfect right to do it. But I want to point out that this particular time of the year is the time of the marketing of the crops of the West, and also that in this particular year the market prices of the crops of the West are lower than usual. That is to say, wheat to-day in the West is worth approximately ten cents a bushel less than it was last year. If I am wrong, my hon. friends will correct me, but I think that that is generally admitted. Under these circumstances it is the desire of the farmer who is able to do so to hold his grain for an advance in price. He has hopes that by the coming spring the prices may be advanced, and he does not wish to send his grain forward. But if the merchant is pressed by the bank, the merchant must press the farmer, and the farmer must sell his grain at what must be considered at sacrifice price. The returns to the business of the West are reduced by a corresponding amount. Now, as I said before, I am not saying—for I do not know—whether the bankers were compelled by circumstances that they could not control and there are circumstances which even banks cannot control—to take this action. But I do say that the action they have taken is a stupendous injury to the people of the West, particularly to the farmers of the West at this time, and inflicts an injury upon every line of business throughout this whole Dominion. It will be recalled that a provision exists in the Bank Act of to-day, and it is being continued under the Bill now before the House, enabling the banks to enlarge their accommodation at this particular time of the year, that is to say, in the fall of the year, for the express purpose of handling the crop. I do not want to get into deep water, because I am not a financial man, but it looks to me very much like a breach of faith that this great financial organization of the banks should be given such special advantages by legislation for this special purpose, and at the very time when that purpose is to be served they take such action as prevents it from being served and inflicts a very serious hardship upon the people whom that legislation was especially intended to protect. Of course, it is something that may be explained away, but on the face of it, it does seem to me to be something that requires explanation from the heads of these great banking organizations, the banks of Canada.

Some other points I took note of, and these points I wish to refer to briefly. First I would mention the proceedings to be taken in regard to an application for a bank charter. I listened to the discussion of yesterday, and I quite appreciate what appears to have struck the Finance Minister—that it is desirable that there should be safeguards surrounding the granting of a charter to a new bank. Very good so far as it goes. But I want to say and to say very earnestly, and I shall try to emphasize it further before I conclude, that no amount of legislation, and no amount of automatic supervision will meet the requirements of the case. I was somewhat disappointed yesterday—I do not wish to get into a controversy at all—when I heard my hon. friend the Minister of Finance take the position that, because the letter of the law had been complied with in the case of the organization of a bank, thereupon the responsibility of the Government had ceased. In the name of that $1,100,000,000 of deposits, I want to protest against the view that it is right or proper, or in accordance with the duties and responsibilities of the Government, that a bank be placed before the people of Canada, with the stamp of authority of the Government upon it, to enable it to do business, unless and until the Government has, not automatically or mechanically but effectively discovered, so far as it is possible to discover, the possibilities of the bank doing business as it is intended to do business. I do not know what has been the rule in the past; it is not material to my argument. We are dealing with conditions as they are to-day, not with conditions as they were years ago; and the discussions of yesterday show that an automatic granting of a bank charter is not a sufficient protection of the public interest.

In section 33, providing for increasing the capital of the bank, I notice that the terms upon which the new stock is to be allotted are to be fixed by the directors. As I have already suggested, I would be getting into deep water if I went into that matter very closely, but I am going to ask the Finance Minister whether this form of words covers the possibility of melon cutting by the shareholders of the bank? That is to say, is it possible for the bank to allot to its shareholders the new shares at a fixed price which shall be below their market value?

Mr. WHITE: 'Market value' is a rather ambiguous term. When directors are making a new issue of bank stock, they desire, of course, that it shall be taken up. You might have a quotation of bank stock—that is for the few shares that might be asked for on the market from time to time—at, let us say, 200, and yet it would be out of the question for each block of shares to be put upon the market at 200. The directors are given discretion, subject to limitation, in regard to the fixing of the price of the stock to the shareholders, and no doubt they would take into consideration the price at which the shares would be taken up. I would hardly describe this as melon cutting, as that term is usually applied to franchise holding companies. The shareholders supply money for the bank, and the directors would naturally try to get as much as they could for the shareholders in placing their stock. Bank stocks in this country are not very readily taken up, for the reasons which have been given.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman has answered my question very fully, and has demonstrated by his answer that this form of words does cover the possibility of melon cutting by the shareholders and directors of the bank.

Mr. WHITE: Subject to the limitations.

Mr. OLIVER: That is admitted. I think that this is objectionable, and I would respectfully suggest to my hon. friend that, on further consideration of the Bill, provision be made that this melon cutting, which has only recently come into the public eye, although long in practice, be prevented; that is to say, that the directors shall be entitled to place the stock upon the market in such blocks as they may be expected to sell, and shall sell it at what it may bring on the market—just exactly, may I suggest, as section 35 provides for the closing out under certain circumstances of the holders of shares of over $50. Provision is made that where bank shares are in $50 lots, they may be made $100; that is, every holder of two $50 shares shall get one $100 share, but, in the case of a single $50 share, that share is sold at the market price and the owner gets whatever it brings. I do not desire to unduly criticise this provision, but I think it may be a little hard on the $50 shareholder. It does strike me that what is sauce for the goose—the little $50 shareholder—ought to be sauce for the gander—the big shareholder who is able to take advantage of a possible cutting of the melon. Whatever is fair in dealing with the $50 shareholder would be just as fair in dealing with a group of shares proposed to be added to the capital of the bank, and of which the big shareholders might be expected to get the advantage.

Section 56 provides for a shareholders' audit. This matter has been discussed at some length, and I shall not now make any extended remarks upon it. The right hon. the Prime Minister seemed to be fully satisfied that in giving the shareholders the right to select an auditor, their interests were sufficiently protected. The hon. member for North Simcoe told us that the greater part of these shareholders were widows and orphans, or estates the money of which was held in trust, and I submit that shareholders of that character are not in a position to protect themselves by electing or selecting an auditor. The directors of the bank are the brains of the institution, and if the directors want a certain man or group of men elected as auditor, they will see to it that the shareholders will elect or select that man or group of men. The theory may be very good, but I submit that the privilege of allowing a group of shareholders to select an auditor is of absolutely no value except in a case where the bank has got into difficulty, and the shareholders have become alarmed; then, it is true, they can get together and elect or select an auditor against the wish of the directors. The desire of Parliament in dealing with the Act however, is to prevent such a condition from arising, and I say that if there is to be an outside audit, that audit cannot be effectively secured by the terms of the Bill as it is before us. I have read reports of meetings of shareholders of banks, railway companies and loan companies and have seen how the unfortunate shareholder who wanted explanations or information was simply sat upon and and did not get a show on earth although his money was in the institution, and it is not to be presumed that under ordinary circumstances the ordinary shareholder would have any serious influence in selecting an auditor to protect his interest in the bank. In regard to the alternative of government audit I do not know why the Government of Canada is not able to secure men and give them the authority that would enable them to properly audit the business of the bank. It is elementary that any government of Canada must be presumed to be able to protect the interests of the people of Canada from any mishandling of their business by any institution that is under the legislative control of the people of Canada. It is unthinkable that we can, by our legislation, create an organization which after it is created can do as it pleases and defy regulation by statute or by administration of this Government.

Would the minister explain the meaning of ' cash reserves ' in section 60?

Mr. WHITE: Cash is actually Dominion notes or gold; that is to say legal tender in Canada. The forty per cent clause referred to here has been practically a dead letter for a long time as the banks hold considerably more than forty per cent. They hold something like seventy-five or eighty millions of Dominion notes and forty or forty-five millions would be in excess of the forty per cent. The origin of this clause is that in the early days when they needed money in Canada more than at present the Dominion made an issue of $30,000,000 of notes. Instead of securing that all by gold they secured to the extent of twenty-five per cent by gold and left $22,500,000 unsecured. If they had enacted no further legislation any part of the $22,500,000 might have come in for redemption and the Dominion had not the gold to redeem it. The result was that they compelled the banks to hold out a certain amount of this so as to prevent it all being put in for redemption. I have thought it better to retain the clause.

Mr. OLIVER: Are the bills of a chartered bank legal tender?

Mr. WHITE: No, they are payable in gold at the bank, but they are not legal tender.

Mr. OLIVER: In section 61 there is provision for an issue and circulation of notes. When they issue these notes increasing their circulation are they compelled to maintain their securities in the same proportion?

Mr. WHITE : The only increase given is against the deposit of gold. They must deposit dollar for dollar in gold. They have the same power under this Act as at present, plus the additional power of issuing notes as against gold deposited.

Mr. OLIVER: The banks now issue circulation up to the amount of their paid-up capital and an emergency circulation as well. This circulation is redeemable in gold or Dominion notes. If the banks issue up to their limit and they have not the equivalent in gold or bills they are taking long chances

Mr. WHITE: Or a proper reserve. A bank never carries an amount in gold quite equal to the amount of its demand liabilities in deposits and notes. On the principles of sound banking it has been found that a certain degree of liquidity, which is the technical term, is sufficient, but the bank must be prepared, as my hon. friend has said, to pay in gold its notes and its demand liabilities if asked for.

Mr. OLIVER: I would be getting into very deep water if I were to deal very closely with this matter but, as it strikes me as one of the billion dollar depositors, this proposal is one to enable the banks to increase their circulation and reap whatever profit there is to be attached to that, without having a corresponding increase of gold or Dominion notes in support of that circulation.

Mr. WHITE: The bank, pursuing sound methods of banking, must always keep, as it does to-day, against its outstanding note circulation and its demand liabilities, a certain percentage of gold and Dominion notes and other liquid securities. Unless the bank gets in a greater amount of gold than is required in accordance with these principles of sound banking to meet these liabilities it would not avail itself of this power of issuing notes because it would be violating the rules of sound banking. It is only as against the additional gold that it may have that it will issue these notes because these notes are instantly redeemable. The great check upon any impropriety in connection with the issue of notes is the fact that through the clearance they come back almost daily. Each bank, when it gets the notes of another bank, hastens through the clearing house to get payment in gold. I would like to be able to reassure my hon. friend that the banks must keep, as against their note circulation issued, irrespective of their gold reserve and their liabilities, precisely the same percentage of gold as they have to-day under sound principles of banking, and if they issue any notes in excess of that against this gold then the gold must be in excess of the requirements which, under sound principles of banking, they would have to hold as against their other note circulation and demand liabilities. Under the present system the banks may at any time deposit gold and get Dominion notes. Instead of taking this gold, depositing it with the trustees and issuing their notes, they may take it under the present system and get $5 or $4 bills, as they did last fall, and issue those, so that, in that sense, the banks make no money out of issuing their notes against this gold reserve as compared with the system of to-day under which they can deposit gold and issue Dominion notes.

Mr. OLIVER: I appreciate everything my hon. friend has said provided the banks all do their business according to sound principles of banking and providing that all do, as a matter of fact, hold gold or Dominion notes as against their current liabilities. But there is nothing to show us, there is nothing in this Bill to assure us, that they will live up to these sound principles of banking. I submit that it is not good enough to tell us that the banks, according to sound principles of banking, will do thus and so for, unfortunately, as we know, within the past twelve years, we have had seven or eight banks that have not lived up to sound principles of banking, the result of which has been a tremendous loss to their shareholders and the public. I will go so far as to say that possibly a good many more of our banking institutions have more by good luck than good guidance, got through when others went down as a result of not observing the sound principles of banking. I am here to say, Mr. Speaker, that our banks are finite institutions, that they are of the earth earthy and that when we hear, as we heard yesterday, of a responsible statement rendered to the Government, I think, on oath—if not it ought to have been—that a certain $200,000 was an asset when it was a liability, or was a liability when it was an asset—I do not know and I do not care which—and when two of the leading bank men of Canada come forward and on their oath declare that that was a proper transaction, I think we are warranted in questioning as to whether or not our banks are living up to those sound principles of banking. It is for us to see that they do live up to them. That is our business and we should not take any chances on it at all.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend misunderstands. If my hon. friend eliminates this clause altogether all I said with regard to sound principles of banking still applies. The banks could deposit gold and issue Dominion notes. The only difference is that instead of issuing Dominion notes, which the Dominion prints and which impose no expense on the banks, the banks would issue their own notes against the gold. There is no enlargement of the power of the banks to circulate currency only they are circulating their own notes instead of Dominion notes.

Mr. OLIVER: Let me point out to my hon. friend that at the present time there is no temptation for a bank to put gold into the coffers of the Dominion and take out Dominion notes for circulation. There is no profit in that. But there is profit to the bank in putting gold into the central reserve fund and issuing its own notes against that gold.

Mr. WHITE: I beg to dissent from my hon. friend. The two situations are precisely on all fours. The banks deposit gold to-day with the Dominion Government and get out, let us say, $5 notes which they hand out to their customers. The banks, under this clause, deposit gold and hand out their own notes to their customers. The Dominion note goes out on the one hand and the bank note on the other. If permission were given to a bank to circulate its notes without being secured by gold then there would be a profit to the bank of five per cent or whatever the bank could loan these notes out at while they were outstanding, less the cost of printing. Gold can either be used as a medium of circulation or changed into Dominion notes and put out over the counters, or in bank notes issued against a gold deposit. It is not a source of revenue to the banks and does not increase the earning power of the banks.

Mr. OLIVER: I am aware of what my hon. friend has said, provided sound principles of banking are maintained, or the bank does not take money that it should have in its own vaults against these outstanding liabilities and put that gold into the central reserve fund. The Minister of Finance has used the term 'sound principles of banking' in relation to the gold and notes held to redeem current liabilities of the banks, but I say we have no security that sound principles of banking are going to be observed and I ask the hon. gentleman has he no proposal whereby we shall be sure that sound principles of banking shall be observed and whereby this provision shall not be used as a means of kite-flying by the bank.

Mr. WHITE: I used the term 'sound principles of banking' to explain to my hon. friend what the banks should do, but the power of the banks, so far as proper banking is concerned, on their note issue, is not enlarged in the slightest degree by this proposal. Istead of issuing Dominion notes which they get by depositing the gold at the present time, they issue their own notes against the deposit. I hope my hon. friend will come to the committee and hear that discussed.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to delay the House at this point and I may be dead wrong, but I put it to my hon. friend this way: is there a profit to the bank on the circulation of its own notes?

Mr, WHITE: If not secured by gold, yes.

Mr, OLIVER: Precisely. Now then, a bank has $100,000 in gold; it has a right to issue $500,000 of bills of its own, its capital being $500,000; it has only $100,000 in gold and Dominion notes; we will assume it does not dare to issue the $500,000 in bills and only dares to issue $400,000; under this provision it can take its $100,000 in gold and put it into the central reserve fund and get another $100,000 in bills put in circulation among the people.

Mr. WHITE : Will the hon. member just stop there—it could take $100,000 also, under the present system, go into the Assistant Receiver-General's office and get $100,000 in Dominion notes and hand them out just the same way, and it has not the gold any more than under the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER : If there is no difference from the present conditions, then why this provision in the Bill ?

Mr. WHITE : In the first place, there is a very great expense to the Dominion in printing these notes. It was never intended that the Dominion should print notes beyond the denomination of $2. On account of the great pressure one year ago last fall my predecessor had to issue several million dollars' worth of 4's, and last fall $10,000,000 worth of 5's were issued. My hon. friend will find when the estimates come down, a very large sum for engraving these Dominion notes. Apart from that, there is the further consideration which my hon. friend will be surprised to learn, namely, that there have been runs on banks by reason of the circulation of Dominion 4's and 5's. It is not rational, but it is a fact. The public have come to the conclusion that the bank is up to the limit of its own note circulation and has to pay over the 4's and 5's of the Dominion, and the bankers would rather circulate their own notes than Dominion notes over their counters for that reason. There is no reason why the Dominion should bear the expense of printing notes for the banks to circulate against gold deposit in the Receiver-General's Office. At the present time, the accommodation in all the Receiver-General's office is much congested by reason of the supply of gold we carry for the banks and which the banks should really carry themselves, and I am considering a Bill to provide that the banks shall pay for that accommodation, because they practically make us warehousers of their gold. There is no reason why the Dominion in the first place should pay for the notes which the banks circulate, and, in the second place, there is the objection which the banks have to paying out Dominion 4's and 5's over the counter, because the public do not understand it.

Mr. OLIVER: I see I cannot convince the Minister of Finance and I regret to say that he has not convinced me, because I submit it costs the bank as much to print the bills as it does the Government, and unless there is something for the bank in it they would not print the bills.

As to section 88, I support what my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Martin) has said in regard to the necessity of some notice being given to the ordinary creditor if this lien is to be taken by the bank upon the farmer's grain or cattle. It is very desirable that advances should be made as contemplated by the Bill but I think that in the Committee the Minister of Finance would be well advised to consider all the circumstances surrounding this proposal and make further provision than is contained in the Bill at present if it is proposed that it shall be an actual benefit. I am sorry to say that under the circumstances at present in the West with the banks absolutely restricting their lines of credit, there would be small chance even under this provision for a farmer to get the accommodation it is hoped he would get under this provision of the Bill. In any case there ought to be provision that will look to the protection of the interest it is intended to protect because as the clause stands at present I would be afraid that in its working out instead of its adding to the credit of the farmer it would detract rather from his credit. I quite agree with the desirability of the principle contained in this section of the Bill, but I think it should be worked out in detail carefully in order that the advantage expected from it may result.

In regard to section 99 providing for banks amalgamating, I wish to say that in my humble judgment it is in the last degree undesirable that there should be legislation, no matter whether it exists now or whether it is going to exist, contemplating the merging of banking institutions. It must be evident that we need competition in banks as we do in every other line of business, so far as we can get it. If in our legislation, we make provision for the absorption of one bank by another, we are giving the opportunity, we are giving a reason to the large bank to squeeze out the smaller bank, because by taking the right action at the right time, it will be possible to acquire the assets and the business of the smaller bank. While it might seem to be a contradiction of terms, I do say beyond any question that above everything, each bank, as chartered by this Government of Canada, should stand absolutely on its own feet until it comes to its own finish. There should be no amalgamation by any authority short of the Parliament of Canada. In the interest of preserving the weaker bank and in the interest of competition in banking as opposed to the principle of provision being deliberately made, in case the big bank gets the small one into a corner, for the easy absortion of the smaller bank, it is very desirable that there should be no amalgamation.

It is desirable that we should have more banks and not fewer banks. While we should be careful about the security of our depositors and our note-holders, I do not think we can afford to depend upon the care and consideration and philanthropy of rival banking institutions to protect the public in the interests of the public. The criticism I want to make of this Bill as it stands, and as it appears to me, is this: We are recognizing these banking institutions as a stupendous organization. We are recognizing them as having an independent authority. We are delegating to them authority that this Parliament should not delegate to anybody except the Government that exists by reason of its will. It is our business to do everything possible to protect the interests of our depositors, to protect the interests of our note-holders, but we cannot do that effectively by delegating our authority to the existing banking organizations. My criticism of this measure, and I say it without prejudice, is that it tends to create an empire within an empire. It is an indication that the people of Canada—I do not say the Government—are afraid that they are unable to protect their own interests on their own responsibility. It is above everything desirable that the Government of Canada should do its duty in regard to this matter, which is of the greatest importance of all the subjects that come before us for our consideration. It is absolutely desirable that we should take the full responsibility for our actions and that we should act in the interests of the people who sent us here. There was a time when people looked at railroads as this Bill looks at banks, as something that was a beneficence come down for the benefit of the people. The country has got past that stage in regard to railways; and we have provision in Canada for taking care of the public interests where they come in contact with those of the railways. In my humble judgment, the time has come—when our banks are making the money that they are making, when our population has increased to the extent that it has increased, and when we have the knowledge of what has been done in other countries as well as our own—when this Parliament of Canada should deal with the banking question as it has dealt with the railway question, not in a spirit of hostility to our banking institutions, not in a spirit of hostility to the capital invested in them, but with a due regard to the interest and the safeguarding of the interest of the people whose business depends on the circulation of the money and on the credit business that is transacted through those banks. It is for this Parliament of Canada to say that the banks are not the masters but the servants of the people of Canada.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): When the hon. Minister of Finance moved the second reading of his Bill, he invited criticism on it. Several of the members of this House, in the discharge of what they believed to be their duty, have criticised the Bill pretty fully. As this criticism went on, according to my way of looking at the subject, some erroneous opinions were advanced. Perhaps it will be well if some explanation or answer was given to those opinions. At this late hour of the evening I will not attempt a criticism of the Bill that is now before us, because that could be done better in the committee stages of the Bill. The observations I have to offer will be along more general lines. I think they will remove some of the misconceptions which I believe are held by some of the members of this House. Modern banking as we have it in this country may be described as the handmaid of industrial and commercial life. The banks are so interwoven with our commercial system that without the assistance that the banks have given, and are giving our industrial and commercial life these activities would not and could not prosper. I think that we who are living now in Canada have every reason to be proud of the men who organized and established this Canadian banking system. It is a system that has so strengthened and developed the industrial, and commercial life of our country, tht the business men of this country, as compared with the business men of other countries, particularly those of the country to the south of us, scarcely know what commercial panic means. I say, then, we have much reason to be proud of the business ability of the men who organized and established this system. And I will go further and say, we have reason to be proud of the men who have managed this system from the beginning down to the present day, nothwithstanding the fact that some unworthy men have entered the profession, men who fell in the hour of temptation, men who by their unworthy conduct brought ruin upon themselves and great loss and inconvenience upon many other people. But this loss and inconvenience, so large and so hard to bear in individual cases, is exceedingly small compared with the troubles that have arisen under the banking system in other countries and particularly in the neighbouring republic. And the losses, so great to the individuals who may have suffered them, are exceedingly small, as has been pointed out by the Minister of Finance, when compared with the whole amount involved at any one time.

There are two leading functions in banking as we have it in Canada. The first is to gather up small sums of money, the savings of the people whether large or small but generally speaking the small savings of the people—savings that would remain unused and unproductive in many cases—and to loan these savings to the business community to be used in the various trade activities in which the people may be engaged. And the second function is to give safe, easy and economical transportation of money from one point of the country to another and easy, cheap and absolutely safe transmission of money from one country to another. For these two functions the branch bank system is the best that has yet been devised. There is another feature of banking, and that is the issue of the notes or circulating currency that passes from hand to hand to enable the people to carry on the multitude of transactions that go on all over the country every hour of the day. This is an important function of banking, but not essential. There does not appear to me to be anything abstruse or in any way technical in these different functions. The loaning of money, the giving of credit in any form, but the lending of money particularly—and more particularly still the lending of money belonging to other people—requires a great deal of prudence and a great deal of judgment. Therefore, the banker should know when, and where, and how, and to what amount, to lend money; and he should know—it is almost equally desirable that he should know—when, and how, and under what circumstances to refuse to lend it. He should therefore have a general business knowledge, a general knowledge of the value of the commodities in which his customers deal, and of the trend of the markets.

It has been suggested in this debate that the present system of banking draws away the money from the villages and towns and the rural districts of the country and concentrates it in the large centres, to be loaned in large blocks to great corporations and industrial concerns, and perhaps to the stockholders, thus impoverishing the outlying portions of the country by draining their resources and making it difficult for the small manufacturer and retail merchant, and perhaps the farmer, to carry on his business or occupation. Even if that be true, it is a charge against the management and not against the system. I do not know whether it is true or not. It may be true to some extent; certainly it is an opinion that is widely held. If true, I do not see how legislation can prevent it. I am inclined to think that the bank managers of the country as a whole would not wish to enrich any part of the country at the expense of any other part; and I believe that if this evil exists to any serious extent, strong public opinion must be able to regulate it. I believe that the bank managers as a whole would not care to have public opinion aroused in regard to the management that would bring about such results as this. Therefore, discussions of this kind, discussions such as we have had in this House and such as will take place before the Banking and Commerce Committee, if carried on seriously, will and should have the effect of making some improvement along this line.

It has also been stated in this debate that the banking capital of this country is too small. That has been stated I think by the hon. member for South York and other hon. members. It would be a surprise to me if it were otherwise. In a young country like Canada, where development is going on very fast, in which the commercial needs of the country are increasing from day to day, it would be a surprise indeed if the savings of the people---for four-fifths of the banking capital and perhaps more, is made up of the small savings of the people---should keep pace with the demands of another portion of the people. It seems to me the suggestion made by hon. members who complain of the want of capital would have the effect of accentuating the grievance. The hon. member for South York called attention to the fact that there was a very small proportion of foreign capital invested in the banks of this country. The inference I would draw from that is that, in the estimation of the capitalists of Great Britain and other countries, banking does not offer returns as profitable as do other forms of investment in this country. I think, therefore, it would be very unwise if by legislation we add to the burden of the banks, or make their business more unprofitable than it has been in the past. I think it would have the effect of driving capital away rather than attracting it.

Reference was made by some hon. members who complained of the want of capital, to the small proportion of the savings of the people that found their way into the government savings banks, and it was suggested that the regulations of the government savings banks should be changed so that a much larger proportion of the saving of the people would find their way into these institutions. The savings of the people are limited, and if a larger proportion is put into the government savings banks, this must necessarily reduce the deposits in the chartered banks, which constitute four-fifths of their loanable assets. In my opinion this would bring about a great injury to Canadian commercial interests. The chartered banks of the country are prohibited—and wisely—from locking up their funds in real estate and real property; the successful banker is always trying to keep his funds in the most liquid form possible, so that he will be able to serve the needs of the business community to a much greater extent. Another feature of the matter is that the savings of the people, in going into the government savings bank, therefore go out of circulation to a certain extent, as they are used for the permanent public works of the country. I consider it highly undesirable that the Government should make any regulations in regard to the government savings banks which would tend to detract a large proportion of the deposits from the chartered banks. It would be very much better that the Government, if money is required for the permanent public works of the country, should obtain it from the foreign market, allowing the money accumulating in the savings banks of the country to be used for current requirements.

Reference has been made in this debate to the large reserves that are held by the banks, and the statement was made by some hon. gentlemen that the one hundred odd millions of dollars held by the banks as accumulated reserve is taken out of the people of the country. This statement was received with commendation by some hon. gentlemen, though I think it was untrue—untrue in the sense in which it was uttered, and the sense in which it was understood. The reserves of the bank are the result of long years of careful, prudent and economical management on the part of the banks; they are the result of long years during which the shareholders were content to accept very low dividends, and allowed the earnings to accumulate; they are also the result of the premiums that were obtained by the sale and allotments of new stock from time to time, and cannot therefore in any sense of the term be said to have been taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada. Moreover, these reserves practically double the working capital of the bank, and thus meet the needs of those who are interested in seeing more financial capital in the country. Of course, if the reserves were in the shape of actual capital, it would enable the banks to have a larger circulation and perhaps relieve the wants of the business community to a greater extent; but the reserves are an indication of sound, safe, prudent and conservative management, and when we hear of the large earnings made by the banks, we must in all cases take the reserve into consideration. I think the hon. member for West Toronto (Sir Edmund Osler) was misunderstood when he spoke on this subject the other evening. He stated that the Dominion Bank had earned on its capital during the last year eighteen per cent, and I noticed at the time several hon. gentlemen accepted that as an indication that the bank's earnings were too large. But it will be seen that the eighteen per cent which the bank earned upon its capital, is less than eight per cent of its capital and reserve—surely not an undue rate of interest, considering the value of money in other commercial enterprises. It was stated at that time that the earnings of the banks on the free money, that is the capital of the bank proper, the reserve, the note circulation and the non-interest-bearing money on deposit, were not over four per cent, which is surely not excessive.

It has been suggested that all the banks should in some way guarantee the deposits of each. That seems to me most unreasonable, it would be unjust and unsound in principle and would soon become unworkable. To make any body of men responsible for the business of another body of men in the management of which they had no voice would seem to be so unjust that it need only be stated to be rejected. The suggestion was made that as all the banks guarantee the circulation of each other they should, in the same way guarantee deposits, but the two things are entirely different; the men who hold the notes of the bank are forced creditors of that institution, the money is in circulation in the business of the country and people are practically obliged to accept that money. The depositors, on the other hand, can select where they will place their money, they are not forced creditors, and so are in a different position. Any system by which the banks would be compelled to guarantee the deposits of other banks would be unworkable.

There appears to be quite a strong public feeling in favour of some sort of government inspection of banks. The Minister of Finance has pointed out what appears to him to be a better method than government inspection, but as has been said, wherever trouble has arisen in banks it has not taken place at the branches but rather at the head offices, and it would therefore seem to be possible to have some government inspection which would satisfy public opinion which has to be considered and that might be acceptable to the banks and made workable by them. A Minister of Finance should be able to secure competent men to carry on this inspection; they would of course need to have considerable banking experience, but there should be no real difficulty in establishing a government inspection that would satisfy the public requirements and would be a real aid and guarantee to the Government that the management at the head offices of all the banks was along proper lines. Many things might be said in favour of a government inspection, one argument being that it would give the public greater confidence in our banking system and so unlock money that is now stated to be lying idle in some parts of Canada, which would be to the advantage of the whole business community.

A good deal has been said in favour of an external audit of banks by the Government. Much can be said in favour of the principle that the shareholders and directors who are largely interested in the banks and who ought to be responsible and take the greatest interest in their management should not be relieved of their responsibility by the Government assuming a part of it. I have presented these remarks in a general way because they have reference to the main features of a system which has been admirably adapted to the needs and requirements of a country like Canada. No better system could be devised than the branch system in a new country like this of immense area and limited population where we have to gather up the small deposits of the people and distribute them again to those who need them. It has worked well in the past and it will be a most unfortunate thing if, because of some local disturbance occasioned by the mismanagement of the Farmers' Bank or any other bank, any radical change should be made.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie and Napierville): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the House is taking an increasing interest in the discussion of this Bill and also that hon. members who have spoken hitherto have expressed themselves in favour of a general overhauling of the system. I think it is in order to congratulate the hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers), who has been the first to draw the attention of the House to this matter. Unfortunately our bank system has worked disastrously in this country, and especially in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House. I refer to the failures of the People's, Villemarie and St. John's banks. Through these three failures, the people in Laprairie and Napierville lost close on one-half million dollars. Mr. Speaker, who were the heaviest sufferers in these three bank failures? Small depositors, mostly belonging to the farming and labouring classes, who eked out a living in the county and had succeeded in laying aside part of their earnings. For the whole Dominion the total amount of such savings reaches 700 millions. Those who profit by such savings are the large business men, merchants and traders generally, not the depositors themselves.

In the election which followed the failure of the St. Johns' bank, my opponent was Mr. Siméon Beaudin, now a judge of the Superior Court at Montreal. I may point out that the election took place a few months after the bank had failed. What stand did Mr. Beaudin take? He promised to the electors of Laprairie-Napierville that, should he be returned on October 26th, he would introduce a Bill providing for the appointment of bank inspectors under the control of the Finance Department. That was the first plank in his platform. Mr. Beaudin was defeated and I was returned on October 26th, 1908.

However, previous to Mr. Beaudin being a candidate in the constituency, I had taken the same position and pledged myself before the electors to ask, when the revision of the Bank Act would come up, the appointment of inspectors, and in a general way to work, as in the past, for the furtherance of their interests.

So I propose fulfilling to-day the promise which I made to my electors, and I call upon the Minister of Finance to provide for the appointment of inspectors under his department.

I only wish the hon. Finance Minister had followed the electoral campaign which was carried on in 1908 in my constituency. He would have heard that eminent lawyer, Mr. Beaudin, discuss that question with ardor and conviction. I believe that the House as a whole—there may be a few exceptions—is in favour of changing the law so as to bring about some improvement and safeguard the interests of the labouring classes.

You will have some idea, Mr. Speaker, of the injury resulting from those bank failures, when I tell you about two particularly sad cases occurring in the county where I reside. The first has reference to an old man eighty-two years of age who had sold his property with a view to settling for the remainder of his life in one of the towns of the county. The amount received in exchange for his property, he deposited in a branch office of the bank of St. Johns, at St. Remi. Four months later, the bank closed its doors, never to open them again. This old gentleman, who was a friend of mine, lost all he possessed, that is the sum of $5,000. Worry and grief ended his days, and when he died he was dependent on public charity for his maintenance. The second instance is that of an old seamstress who for thirty years had been doing work in the town of St. Remi. She also lost the whole of her savings which she had deposited in that same branch office.

As yet no dividends have been paid to depositors, the winding-up of the bank's business being still unfinished, but I do not think depositors will receive 5 cents on the dollar. As you see, Mr. Speaker, these poor people are not in a very enviable situation.

It is now proposed to appoint inspectors, but I am satisfied that bankers will not have it, as they are opposed to let inspectors pry into their business. I had occasion to talk the matter over with a bank manager who is an intimate acquaintance, and he made clear to me why bankers were averse to the appointment of such government inspectors, who would thereby be in a position to size up the liabilities of their patrons. He instanced the case of a patron who, he said, after doing for a period of ten or fifteen years a prosperous business, finds himself on a sudden cramped for funds, owing to heavy losses resulting from a slump on the market or some other cause, without any fault of his. In such a case, should not some discretion be shown in reference to that man's business? The bank manager is the only man in a position to say whether or not a loan is advisable to enable this man to continue his business. Of course, there is a good deal to say in favour of such a view.

But just think what kind of management they had at the bank of St. Johns, when a single patron, who was quoted at three or four thousand dollars at most, could borrow as much as $397,000. Had there been a government inspector, he would have reported that the manager was acting in bad faith, and in collusion with that patron. Had an inspection taken place at the proper time, such a thing could not have occurred.

I am pointing out to that circumstance as the counterpart of the views expounded by the bank manager to whom I have just referred and who contended that a system of inspection was not desirable as it would make known the financial circumstances of the bank's patrons. My conclusion is that inspectors should be appointed under the control of the Department of Finance, who would be expected to keep posted on the bank's business, and more particularly that carried on through the head office. As a general rule, it is not through their branch offices that banks lose money, as was pointed out by a previous speaker; it is well known that banks open branch offices in the country merely with a view to secure funds, which are then forwarded to the head office. That is what happened in our district.

I may state in passing that banks might carry on a splendid business with farmers and with the assurance of being reimbursed; but they refuse to deal with farmers worth ten, fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, and the money supplied by the rural districts is sent to the large cities for the benefit of high financing. Some of it is even sent across the border. The Act, I say, should be amended so as to put the farming community in a position to take advantage of the capital supplied by the country people, instead of putting the whole of it at the disposal of the big city speculators. I believe farmers would make as good use of it as they do.

Many a time have I discussed this bank question with constituents of mine of either party. The thought suggested itself to me one day to tell them that, to my mind, all banks should be mutually responsible; that is to say that should one bank close its doors, all others should be expected to come to its rescue.

I stated further that the Government of the Dominion should be called upon to assume part of the liabilities. I think there is evidence showing that the bank of St. Johns has inflicted on its depositors a loss of $700,000. Should my suggestion be accepted, that is, should the Government assume one-half of the liabilities, and the bankers—who are averse to inspection—assume the other half, as there are in the Dominion about thirty banks, that would mean an average contribution of $11,666 towards making up a total contribution of $350,000, in addition to a contribution for an equal amount forthcoming from the Government. After all that would not represent more than the thirty-fifth part of a super-dreadnought. I believe my constituents would prefer that the Government should pay such an amount rather than construct three dreadnoughts.

Let us now take the case of the Farmers' Bank. The losses are estimated at $1,100,000. The associated banks would be called upon to pay $550,000, which would mean for each one of them an average contribution of $36,666, that is the 22nd part of the cost of a dreadnought; and the Government's share would also be $550,000. I believe that the farmers of Ontario, especially those who have lost money with the Farmers' Bank, would be as happy as the farmers of the province of Quebec should the Government reimburse them that money, instead of building dreadnoughts.

As it is getting late, and as we shall be given an opportunity to consider this Bill later on in Committee, when further remarks will be in order, I shall refrain from saying anything more just now.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): I wish to address a few observations to the House on what are in my judgment defects in the present Bank Act. We have heard general praise as to the model bank system which we in Canada possess. We have been told that we have the best banking system in the world, but in my view there are other systems that might be of greater benefit to a new and growing country like Canada. I do not know that I would go so far as to advocate a very radical change in the present system, but at the same time I see some defects in it which should be pointed out. The question as to whether centralization of banks is a good thing for a new and growing country is a question which to my mind requires a great deal of study. The Western part of the United States was largely built up through the state banks, and the result of that system was that the men at the head of those smaller banks knew the local conditions and were in a position to judge whether a loan was of value and whether the improvement of a particular district would be beneficial. Under our centralization system, the difficulty is that every loan of any account must be submitted to and passed upon by the central office, and so it all comes down in the end to a question as to whether or not the local manager is big enough for his job. Very often if we get a local manager who has backbone and is a man of sound business judgment the branch system works out to advantage because he has the nerve and the ability to put the case before his head office in such a way that the loan is granted. A question has been raised here as to the ease with which farmers get money from the banks. I have a good deal of experience in dealing with farmers in western Canada and my experience has been that, in western Canada particularly the farmer is not easily granted credit by the bank. I know for a fact that in the West it is impossible for a farmer to get money at the bank, no matter how much his assets may be unless he has an endorser, which in itself is a very crude method of compelling borrowers to put themselves in the humiliating position of having to get their neighbour or a business man in the town to endorse for a small amount. The question of the rate of interest is, in my opinion, not one that we can effectively legislate in reference to. The present Bank Act states that banks shall loan money at the rate of seven per cent but, as a matter of fact, the prevailing rate of interest throughout western Canada is, at the very lowest, eight per cent, and in some cases it is as high as nine and ten per cent. If a clause were inserted in the new Bank Act prohibiting the banks, under penalty, from charging any more than seven per cent it would be a step in the right direction. I had occasion to meet a man recently who wanted to borrow two thousand dollars for the very laudable purpose of putting stock on his farm. Under our banking system the banks could not advance him that money and the loan companies would not and he was forced to borrow from a private individual and pay nine per cent, giving a first mortage on a farm worth $20,000. That is not a healthy condition of things in a rich and growing country like ours. One thing that I object to very strongly in our present system is the practice of the banks taking the money of their shareholders and their depositors, and when it suits their purposes loaning that money on Wall Street, although it is greatly needed for the development of our own country. The fact that when money gets tight the banks of Canada immediately transfer an immense amount of their capital to loans on the New York Stock Exchange, getting as high as sometimes twenty per cent, is to my mind very reprehensible. If a clause were put in the Bank Act prohibiting the banks from loaning more than ten per cent of their capital in foreign countries, it would, I believe, go far towards stopping this sort of thing. I do not know whether we can pass such legislation but at all events something should be done to prevent legitimate enterprises in Canada being crippled through the manipulations of our banks in foreign countries. The Minister of Finance has stated that government audit of banks is not a reasonable form of audit, and he makes the contention that on account of the great number of branch banks it would be a cumbersome process and would not be efficient. It has been stated in this House that a great number of defalcations have taken place in the head offices and that being the case it would not seem to be very difficult to supervise the head offices from the Finance Department. As a matter of fact, in the branch offices, everything depends on the capability and character of the branch manager, and his recommendation is what the head office accepts. I think it would be quite feasible to leave the branch offices out of the government audit. A great deal of compaint has been made in western Canada as to money conditions and among the farmers we have heard a great deal as to the feasibility of the Government establishing a system of loaning on lands similar to the Australian system. In a country requiring such rapid development as ours, that system, if it could be evolved here, would, I believe, be of great benefit. In Australia the government lends to farmers on the security of their lands, a liberal amount for certain purposes, such as the improvement of the land, fencing, breaking up and putting under cultivation, buying machinery, and placing stock on the farms. That system has been generally discussed in farmers' organizations in the West and it has met with universal approval. This, of course, is going a long step ahead and although it may flavour of paternalism in government, it is a question which the Government would do well to consider seriously. I am in favour of the provision in clause 88 of the Bill, which enables the farmer to borrow on his live stock and grain, but I am afraid that this provision is not going to be of very material benefit to the farmer, because, in my judgment, the bank manager will only loan to men to whom he would loan under the present system. A man's character largely determines whether he is going to get any money from the bank, and on account of the long distance and the difficulty of overseeing whether the man has the stock and grain, and the danger that he may have already borrowed on it, the bank manager is not going to take chances. However, the clause is a step in the right direction, and I am glad to see it inserted in the new Bank Act. There is one question which perhaps does not bear very directly on the Bank Act but still I would like to touch on it for a moment, and that is as to the salaries that bank clerks are paid in western Canada. The low salary paid to these employees has become almost a scandal, and in view of the good dividends which the banks are earning I think it is only right that they should increase the salaries and in that way secure the services of young men who, when the time came for promotion, would be more capable of managing branches than some who now hold these positions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On account of the lateness of the hour, is it not the intention of my right hon. friend that we should adjourn the debate?

Mr. BORDEN: I would not have begun the debate to-day, except on the understanding that we would get through to-day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I simply told my right hon. friend that I expected we would get through to-day, but I understand several hon. members on both sides of the House wish to speak yet.

Mr. BORDEN: I am not aware of any gentleman on this side of the House who wants to speak at this stage. It is to be borne in mind that we have not only the proceedings in Committee, to which it is proposed to refer the Bill, but we have also the Bill in Committee of the Whole House and the Bill upon the third reading after that, so that there is abundant opportunity for the expression of opinion by every hon. gentleman. I should like very much to get this Bill into Committee. If it does not go through the second reading now, it will probably have to stay in the House for four or five weeks.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I also think the Bill should go as quickly as possible into Committee, but it so happens that the debate is not yet exhausted, and I think the time has now come when we should adjourn. Besides this debate, part of the afternoon was consumed by another question.

Mr. BORDEN: I would not have brought on the Bill except that I thoroughly understood, whether rightly or wrongly, from my right hon. friend that there would not be the slightest difficulty in getting through the debate to-day, so that the Bill might be got into Committee. I may have misunderstood my right hon. friend; but I certainly understood from him that we could get through with the Bill to-day.

Otherwise I would not have brought in the Bill, but would have gone on with some other business.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If we had not proceeded with the Bill to-day, we would not have got on so far as we have now. In the conversation I had with my right hon. friend he asked me if he thought we could finish the Bill to-day, and I said that I did not see why we could not come to a conclusion; but I certainly did not bind myself that we could come to a conclusion. If my right hon. friend so understood me, I did not intend to convey that impression at all. I did not say so.

Mr. BORDEN: Well, we will go on for a little while.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): There are only one or two aspects of the Bill which I desire to discuss in particular, as the hour is so late. If I might offer my own opinion in regard to the Bill now under discussion, I would say that, having regard to the magnitude of the subject to which it refers, one would almost assume that one day or two days further would be permitted for discussion on the second reading of the Bill. I think it was my hon. friend the member for North Ontario when speaking on this Bill when it was last before the House, who stated that the discussion on the second reading should be prolonged; I think he said for a week or two. From the applause with which that remark was greeted by hon. members who heard him, I quite thought that a great many members on the other side of the House wished to take part in the discussion on the second reading. We seem all to be agreed that it is one of the most important Bills that has come before this House. While there seems to be considerable uniformity of opinion in regard to the general principle of the Bill, as enunciated by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I fancy that when the Bill does reach the committee stage, many amendments will be offered. I was glad to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Finance state that he was approaching the question with an open mind, and would seriously consider amendments as they should be proposed. I do not quite view the proposal as it is viewed by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, if one might judge from the remarks which he offered to the House this afternoon. I think in all probability he views it from the standpoint of those who are engaged directly or indirectly in banking as proprietors. I would rather view it from the standpoint of those who deal with the banks, either as borrowers or depositors, because to my mind a banking Bill, such as the one before us now, creates or rather carries forward what is more in the nature of a public utility than purely a matter of private concern. We look on our great transportation lines in this country as public utilities; we prescribe rather strict laws in regard to their organizations and their management, and we prescribe a special court of independent people to pass laws or make regulations in regard to utilities such as the railways, the express companies, and the like. In regard to the great banking institutions of the country, there is practically no court of revision, if I may so put it, at least for a period of ten years at a time, unless the revising body be the bankers themselves under that association known as the Bankers' Association of Canada, incorporated by public Act in the year 1900. Having regard to the fact that this law when enacted will be practically unaltered for a period of ten years, I think the House should have the very fullest information at the time of the second reading as well as when we go into Committee, as regards the general scope of the Bill. I gained considerable information to-day from the remarks of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. One difficulty which the vast majority of the members of the House experience, is a feeling that we have insufficient knowledge, that most of us in regard to the matter of banking are, comparatively speaking, laymen, we have not a sufficient amount of accurate information. I must say that I shared the view, expressed by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), that the reserve or the rest fund of the banks of Canada was, so far as the greater portion of it is concerned, money which was not directly paid in by the stockholders. The opinion throughout the country is almost universal that the reserve or rest fund carried by the various banks is created out of profits. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister placed the matter very clearly before me, at least, this afternoon, in regard to one bank; I assume it was the Bank of Nova Scotia with regard to which he was speaking when he stated that out of the eight millions approximately which constitutes the rest fund of that bank, about eighty per cent is money paid in by the shareholders of the bank itself, and about twenty per cent is contributed out of the profits of the bank. Had it not been for the statement of my right hon. friend, I should have reversed the figures. I was under the impression, and I think it was the prevailing impression in this House and throughout the country, that a small proportion was contributed by the stockholders but by far the greater proportion came out of the profits of the institutions accruing from year to year and not required for payment of the dividends. The approximate amount of rest funds which the banks now doing business in Canada have accumulated, I believe, is $106,000,000. In addition to this there is about $114,000,000 of capital actually contributed by the shareholders; or a total amount say, of $200,000,000 in round numbers contributed by shareholders leaving a balance of $20,000,000, the estimated amount which is taken from the profits of the banks. I hardly think that the statement of the Prime Minister with regard to the Bank of Nova Scotia could be borne out in the case of the other banks. I do not think the other banks have followed on lines quite so conservative as those which my right hon. friend intimated had been followed by the Bank of Nova Scotia. I think a much larger proportion than the right hon. gentleman stated will be found to have been contributed, so far as other banks are concerned, out of their profits. I think I should be within the mark if I were to say that between fifty and sixty per cent of the rest or reserve fund of the various banks is made up of money produced from the profits of the institutions and the balance from the contributions of the shareholders. That is only of importance when we consider what is the real banking capital of these institutions, as viewed by those who own the institutions. It was stated here by my hon. freind from South York (Mr. Maclean) that the total available money for banking purposes at the present time in Canada was about $1,400,000,000, and only ten per cent of that vast sum had really been contributed by the shareholders. I think, now, having the further information supplied by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, that the statement of my hon. friend from South York is probably an incorrect statement. At the same time I think I should be quite within the mark if I were to say that twenty per cent of the total available money used by the banks of Canada was contributed by the shareholders and eighty per cent contributed by the general public who use the bank. Assuming that the total deposits of the people of Canada are approximately $1,100,000,000, and that that amount is made up of current deposits $376,000,000 which do not bear interest, and savings bank deposits $635,000,000 which do bear interest at three per cent, one will see that the free money is equal to about fifty per cent of the interest-bearing money—that about one-third of the total amount of deposits in the banks is left there by the people as free money. These people use the banks for their convenience, and the banks certainly afford them great convenience. But the banks have the use absolutely free of cost of that enormous sum of $376,000,000, upon which they earn, I think, I am safe in saying, from 6 to 7 per cent annually. And when one considers that they pay to the savings bank depositors only three per cent, and also that the Government of Canada cannot borrow money at three per cent, but, as I believe I am correct in saying, must pay from 3½ per cent to 4 per cent for its loans, it does appear that the savings bank depositors of this country are not receiving a fair return for their money. I know it will be said that you cannot very well legislate in regard to the rate of interest. I know it will be said, and with some force, that you should not legislate in regard to the rate of interest. I believe there is a great deal of force in that saying; and, while we may and do pass laws on usury, and though we may have a clause in the Bank Act which is being re-enacted in this Bill to regulate the rate of interest, yet these enactments are of little or no avail. Competition is really the factor which regulates the rate of interest, where competition is allowed. But under the system of banking at this time in vogue in Canada and authorized by law, there is practically no competition in regard to the rate of interest allowed on savings bank deposits. I believe that it is not incorrect to say that the rate of interest is practically arranged by the Bankers' Association themselves. I have heard it said by bankers that they were not permitted by the Government of Canada to increase the rate of interest allowed on savings bank deposits, for the reason that the Government itself only allows in its savings banks 2½ per cent. That is the excuse I have heard given on more than one occasion by bankers themselves. I have urged upon them the propriety of allowing 3½ per cent or even 4 per cent in their own interest, because I believe that it would result in their having larger and more permanent deposits. But there is always this fact which can be urged against any argument which one can use with the banks—that the Government in its Government and Post Office Savings Banks only allows 2½ per cent. I do not believe we can make any satisfactory enactment which will regulate the amount which banks must allow on savings banks deposits, but I believe the Finance Minister and Government have it in their own hands to regulate it in another way. All the Government has to do is to increase the rate allowed in the Post Office and Government Saving Banks to 3½ or 4 per cent and the chartered banks of Canada will be obliged instantly to respond to that increase. This is important in this aspect of the matter. I know men who have heavy savings bank accounts, but it is not so much in regard to such men that I make this argument as in regard to the small savings bank depositor. There are innumerable deposits of sums ranging from $10 to $1,000. I would like to know for my own satisfaction the proportion of the whole sum of $635,000,000 which consists of deposits of less than $2,000. I know that in my own city—and I believe it is the same in every city in Canada—the mechanic, the artisan, the labourer, and the clerk in the store use the savings bank. I know that the farmers use it almost universally, and I believe they are not receiving a fair return for their money. Why not change the present government regulations in regard to post office and government savings banks in such a way as to enable the mechanic and the farmer, in utilizing these banks, to obtain for their money just as good a rate of interest as the Government pays for the money it borrows from other countries? I do not believe that a hard and fast rule with regard to the rate of interest would be practicable, but I do believe that this proposal would be decidedly in the interests of the savings bank depositors in this country.

In the province of Ontario the people are following with a great deal of interest the discussion in this House with reference to the Bank Act, and there are many other matters in relation thereto with which I would like to deal on this occasion, but at twenty-five minutes to one in the morning one cannot go as thoroughly into the matter as one would wish. The Prime Minister states this matter will go before the Banking and Commerce Committee, but, in view of the fact that this committee is composed of less than one-half the members of the House, that its meetings are attended by but from thirty to forty of those members, and sometimes even less, I think it is necessary, if one wishes to have one's view placed before the House, that one should take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the second reading of the Bill. However, the clause to which I desire particularly to call the minister's attention is section 88, in regard to the privileges extended to the banks to deal in securities known as warehouse receipts. I am aware that a very large proportion of the business of this country is conducted under section 88 of the Bank Act, and that it is of great importance to many of our large banking concerns that the principle of that clause should be adopted. I am aware also that there are very grave objections to creating what are known as secret liens or secret preferences, and we must at once acknowledge that a warehouse receipt does give a secret lien or preference to the bank. I would not like to go so far as to suggest that those liens should become registered documents as chattel mortgages, bills of sale or the like, as I believe that very great inconvenience would result to the business of the country if such a requirement were made by law. On the other hand the clause has operated so adversely to a very important section of the community that I believe, unless some amendment is made to the clause as it now stands, the wages of a large number of the mechanics and artisans of the Dominion will be placed in serious jeopardy. In order to emphasize this statement, I wish to cite two instances that occurred in the city of Guelph within the last couple of years, both arising under section 88 of the Bank Act, and both operating very satisfactorily for the bank, but very injuriously to the unfortunate workmen in the factory. One was the case of a large furniture factory, and the bank in question was the Dominion Bank, which had made loans under the authority given it by the Bank Act, on the furniture in the course of construction, as well as the finished product of the factory. These liens were, under the law, perfectly good, and none but the bank and the company knew of their existence. The workmen went on from week to week improving the security of the bank, putting their labour on the goods from day to day, not knowing that the company was involved or that the warehouse receipt existed. Suddenly the bank closed down upon the company, and the company went into liquidation. All the material of the factory and the goods in the process of manufacture were covered by the bank's warehouse receipt, aside from the office furniture, which, I believe, was hardly sufficient to pay the costs of liquidation. The real estate was mortgaged, and for two or three weeks previous to the assignment, the men had not been paid their wages. In the province of Ontario—and I think in all the provinces of the Dominion—the legislatures have for many years recognized the wage-earner as a preferred creditor, and as being entitled to a preference for the amount of his wages running back as far as three months. But, through the operation of section 88 of the Bank Act, the bank simply cleaned up everything, and at the liquidation there was no recourse left to the men for obtaining the wages they had justly earned, and which was due to them to the amount, I believe, of fifteen or sixteen hundred dollars.

I should add that after a good deal of pressure and a great deal of waste of time, after the men had become more or less scattered, the bank was induced to pay $500 on the amount due as a sort of compromise to proceedings which were threatened to test the validity of their warehouse receipts. Following that, within a couple of months, was another case, that of a planing mill on all fours with the furniture factory, but in this case it was the Bank of Montreal. A large amount of wages was due to the men, the manufacturer made an assignment, and then, for the first time, the workmen found that all the manufacturer's goods, all his lumber, doors, windows, sashes, etc., were covered by the warehouse receipt, and not a dollar left to pay the workmen. Those men have to take what is left over. I must say that on that occasion, after a good deal of negotiation and waste of time, after the men had scattered more or less and been put to great inconvenience by not receiving their weekly pay, the Bank of Montreal did advance something by way of compromise and the workmen did receive a portion of their wages. But I do not think workmen like to be placed in the position of receiving favours from banks or anybody else, they want their own provincial law enforced, but they cannot have it enforced so long as section 88 of the Bank Act prevails against them.

I think I have only to point out this enormity to the Minister of Finance to have him find a remedy for it. To my mind it is nothing short of an outrage. We recognize in every province of Canada the preference which a workman should have, and I would suggest that a clause be inserted, making special provision that the laws of each province of Canada which give a preference to the wage-earner shall be continued, notwithstanding the provisions of section 88. That as against the wage-earner the bank's claim shall not prevail. That, I fancy, is not going any too far and I make this suggestion trusting that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance will seriously consider it. I have discussed it with some bankers and some of them have gone so far as to intimate that so far as they were concerned no great objection would be taken to it.

Mr. BORDEN: It was taken for granted and I suppose there is no doubt that the preference created by the federal statute over-rode the preference created by the provincial statute.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a point that has never yet been decided and in the case I have cited it was considered but there was no money to test such a case.

Mr. WHITE: I am very much impressed with what my hon. friend has said. I would ask him whether in his judgment it is clear law that the Dominion statute over-rides the other? The matter to which he has called attention is well worthy of consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am inclined to think it does. The Dominion Parliament has passed an Act in regard to matters upon which this Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction and I think our provision directly authorizing the bank to make advances on certain securities would over-ride any preference the workingman has under provincial legislation. The question is not free from doubt and it was upon threatened proceedings to test the validity of the Ontario Act or the Dominion provision that compromises were reached but no proceedings were actually taken in either case because workingmen who are not only out of a job but out of their pay cannot as a rule, carry on litigation which may have to go to the Privy Council before it is satisfactorily adjusted. But in the meantime no harm could possibly result if a provision were inserted to preserve absolutely the rights which are given by the various provinces to that class of people which we describe as workmen or wage-earners in the various factories. I understand that the section now applies only to manufacturers and certain classes of warehousemen, but does not apply to the ordinary wholesale dealer. I do not know if I am correct in that or not. I think the former Act did apply to any wholesale merchant because I have information of alleged hardships which have taken place under that provision in regard to wholesale dealers. At present my plea is only in regard to that body of men, comprising thousands and hundreds of thousands of our citizens who are daily earning wages and weekly or fortnightly being paid by their employers. Their claim should be protected absolutely, and it is the same men who are depositing earnings in the savings bank. The Government should so arrange the Post Office Savings banks that these men will receive as much for the loan of their money to the Government as the Government is paying to the people of foreign countries.

On motion of Mr. Emmerson the debate was adjourned.

On Motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 12.50 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BERTHIERVILLE WHARF.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Who has been appointed superintendent of the construction works of the wharf at Berthierville, county of Berthier?
2. By whom was he recommended and where is his residence?

3. By what Government was the sum appropriated for these works originally voted and in what year?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Pierre Dumontier.
2. By Dr. Jos. Comtois and Ferdinand Lamy, St. Barthélemi, Quebec.
3. The original vote of $15,000 for this work was taken in 1910. In 1912 a sum of $19,500 was voted.

BONAVENTURE CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. On what date did the Department of Justice receive certain bonds of indemnity given by census enumerators of Bonaventure in connection with the payments of fees for work performed during the last census?
2. When were the said bonds returned by the Department of Justice to the Department of Agriculture or to the Census and Statistic Office of the Department of Trade and Commerce?
3. What was the reason of the delay, if any?

Mr. DOHERTY: The bonds referred to were received from the Department of Agriculture on the 15th of May, and on the 17th of that month they were returned, some of them approved but most of them were defective, and were returned for correction. And the bonds as returned for correction were received again from the Department of Agriculture, some on the 17th June, of others on the 20th of that month, and others on the 6th of July and the last group on the 20th of July. They were examined without delay and returned to the Department of Agriculture, the last of them about the 20th of July, marked approved. The delay was due to the defective form and execution of such instruments, some of them having been returned two or three times before they could be approved.

MONTREAL BRIDGES.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Government received a copy of the following resolution adopted at a meeting held by the citizens of Montreal, on Monday, the 20th ultimo:—

That it is of the greatest interprovincial importance and necessity that bridges be constructed at the earliest possible date, one from Ste. Anne de Bellevue to Ile Perrot, and another from Ile Perrot to Vaudreuil, so as to connect the island of Montreal with the mainland and establish a highway connection between Montreal and Toronto and with that end in view, that this meeting undertake at once to solicit the support of the federal and provincial Governments, as well as the co-operation of the municipalities and counties.

2. What action does the Government intend to take concerning the proposed construction of bridges?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Received by the Department of Public Works.

2. The matter has not yet been considered by the Government.

W. T. R. PRESTON.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. Is Mr. W. T. R. Preston, a former commercial agent of Canada in Holland, Denmark and Germany, still in the employment of the Government of Canada?
2. If so, in what capacity and what is his salary?

Mr. CODERRE: Mr. W. T. R. Preston is not in the employ of any department of the Government.

FUR FARMING.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to have prepared and issued in the near future by some one of the departments of the Government, a pamphlet or treatise relating to the propagation of fur-bearing animals in captivity in Canada?
2. Is the Government aware that a pamphlet or treatise bearing on the same subject has recently been issued by the Quebec Government through its Department of Colonization?

Mr. BORDEN: This question was answered the day before yesterday. I would like, however, to say for the information of my hon. friend, that since that time, I have been informed by the Secretary of the Commission of Conservation that that commission have had prepared a report on fur farming in Canada, which is now in process of publication. I was not aware of that when I gave the answer to the question on Monday. I desire also to say that the commission informs me that they are aware of the publication of a pamphlet on this subject by the Quebec Government through the Department of Colonization of that Government.

MARITIME PROVINCES INLAND REVENUE INSPECTOR.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has any appointment been made to the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of T. Bourke, inspector of Inland Revenue in the Maritime provinces? If so, who is the appointee?
2. If not, has any appointment been determined upon, and has the person to be appointed now been in training for the position? If so, who is he?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. Yes, John McDonald.
2. Answered by No. 1. The department is not aware of any person being in training for the position.

ARISAIG POSTMASTER.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

Who is the postmaster at Arisaig, Antigonish county, N.S., and what is the date of his appointment?

Mr. PELLETIER: Reverend D. L. McDonald; appointed 23rd December, 1912.

ANTIGONISH COUNTY ESTIMATES.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

1. Referring to the documents or letter which appeared in the Casket newspaper, published at Antigonish, of date the 9th day of January, 1913, as follows:—

Office of the Minister of Public Works of Canada.
Ottawa, December 28, 1912.

Senator Girroir.

My dear Sir,—Your letter of the 24th instant addressed to the Minister of Public Works received, and in accordance with your request, I am enclosing you herewith a list of the items which have been placed in the Supplementary Estimates for Antigonish county for 1913-14.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) GEORGE BUSKARD,
Minister's Secretary.

To E. L. Girroir,
Barrister,
Antigonish, N.S.

Main Estimates.

Arisaig—Complete extension to wharf..	$3,000
Bayfield—Repair to wharf breakwater..	2,500
Blue Rock—Repairs to breakwater.. ..	8,200
Breen's Pond—Construction of breakwater..	1,400
Harbour au Boucher—Repairs to wharf	1,000
Malignant Cove—Repairs to breakwater	800

Supplementary Estimates.

Cribbons Point—Wharf and dredging .	15,000
Delorey's Beach—Breakwater repairs and extensions..	14,700
Malignant Cove—Extension of piers and dredging..	4,000
McArra's Brook—Extension of boat landing..	1,700
McNair's Cove—Extension to wharf ..	5,500
Ogdens Pond—Sand grain and extension of pier..	2,800
South Lakevale—Extension of channel pier..	3,000
Auld's Cove—Protected channel..	15,000
Tracadie Harbour—Improvements.. ..	27,000
Harbour au Boucher—Warehouse.	1,200
Breen's Pond—Extension to breakwater..	14,500
Georgeville—New wharf..	90,000

There will also be placed in the general rate for dredging amounts for Lakevale and Bayfield, and an amount for repair for old wharf at Georgeville, will be placed in estimates when exact amount of damage is ascertained.

2. Did the Minister of Public Works or his secretary send, or authorize to be sent, to Senator Girroir, of Antigonish, N.S., the said letter and enclosure?

3. If not, did the minister or his secretary send, or authorize to be sent, any letter to Senator Girroir in the month of December last, respecting the estimates, or proposed expenditures for Antigonish?

4. If so, what was such letter and enclosure?

Mr. ROGERS: The Minister of Public Works had no knowledge whatever respecting the matter referred to. Senator Girroir, who from time to time had interested himself in making requests that certain work at different points should be carried on during the coming year, asked to be supplied with a memorandum of the applications which he had so named, in answer to which request the following is a correct copy of the memorandum sent:

List of amounts for Antigonish county, Nova Scotia, noted for estimates, 1913-14.

Main Estimates.

Arisaig—Complete extension to wharf	$3,000
Bayfield Harbour—Repairs to wharf and breakwater..	2,500
Blue Rock—Repairs to breakwater..	1,200
Breen's Pond—Construction of breakwater..	1,400
Harbour au Boucher—Repairs to wharf..	1,000
Malignant Cove—Repairs to breakwater..	800

Supplementary Estimates.

Cribbins Point—Wharf and dredging	15,000
Delorey's Beach—Breakwater repairs and extensions..	14,700
Malignant Cove—Extension of piers and dredging..	4,000
McArra's Brook—Extension of boat landing..	1,700
McNair's Cove—Extension to wharf..	5,500
Ogdens Pond—Sand grain and extension of pier..	2,800
South Lakevale—Extension of channel pier..	3,000
Auld's Cove—Protected channel.. ..	15,000
Tracadie Harbour—Improvements ..	27,000
Harbour au Boucher—Warehouse ..	1,200
Breen's Pond—Extension to breakwater..	14,500
Georgeville—New wharf..	90,000

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that the second part of the question has not been fully answered. The question as to whether the minister or his secretary sent or authorized to be sent the letter referred to has been evaded.

Mr. ROGERS: The Minister of Public Works did not authorize or send any such letter. I understand that the words 'or his secretary' appear in the question, but I did not know they had any bearing upon the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is exceeding his rights in this matter. He has a right to ask for an answer to that part of the question which has not been fully replied to, but he cannot debate it or criticise the answer given.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I do not mean to say the hon. gentleman intentionally evaded the question, but the question is whether the Minister of Public Works or his secretary did send, or authorize to be sent, the letter referred to, and this part of the question is not adequately answered.

Mr. ROGERS : I shall be glad to supply any information my hon. friend may ask for.

GEORGE ORANGE.

Mr. DOUGLAS :

1. Is the Government aware that Mr. George Orange, an organizer in the employ of the Conservative party, is said to be occupying rooms in the public building lately erected in the city of Wetaskiwin?
2. If so, under whose authority was he accorded this privilege?

Mr. ROGERS : No.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

How many postmasters have been dismissed in the county of Rimouski since the 21st September, 1911, and what are their names?

Order for return agreed to.

Mr. GUILBAULT :

1. Who are the postmasters in the county of Joliette who have been dismissed from 1896 to September, 1911, what are their names, their respective parishes, the dates of their dismissals, and the reasons alleged?
2. Was there an inquiry in each case?
3. On whose recommendation in each case were these dismissals made?
4. Who were their successors in each case, and on whose recommendations have they been appointed?

Order for return agreed to.

*Mr. DESLISLE:

1. Has Mr. Emile Houde, of Grondines, county of Portneuf, been dismissed as lightkeeper. If so, for what reasons?
2. Who made complaints against him?
3. Has an inquiry been held?
4. Who has replaced him, what is his name, his age and at what salary?

Mr. HAZEN :

1. Yes. Political partisanship.
2. Mr. Honoré Grenier and Mr. J. E. Blais, through Hon. L. P. Pelletier, who concurred.
3. No.
4. Mr. Fortunat Hamelin; 39 years; $140 per annum, rising by annual increments of $10 to a maximum of $180.

Mr. DESLISLE :

1. Has Mr. Eugène Mayrand, of Grondines, county of Portneuf, been dismissed as lightkeeper? If so, for what reasons?
2. Who made complaints against him?
3. Has an inquiry been held?
4. Who has replaced him, what is his name, his age and at what salary?

Mr. HAZEN :

1. Yes. Political partisanship.
2. Mr. Honoré Grenier and Mr. J. E. Blais, through Hon. L. P. Pelletier, who concurred.
3. No.
4. Mr. J. E. Blais; 40 years; $220 per annum, rising by annual increments of $10 to a maximum of $260. Mr. Blais resigned 18th October, 1912, and was succeeded by Mr. Adolphe Rivard; 35 years; $220 per annum, rising by annual increments of $10 to a maximum of $260.

*Mr. DESLISLE:

1. Has Mr. Joseph Sauvageau, of Grondines, county of Portneuf, been dismissed as lightkeeper? If so, for what reasons?
2. Who made complaints against him?
3. Has an inquiry been held?
4. Who has replaced him, what is his name, his age and at what salary?

Mr. HAZEN :

1. Yes. Political partisanship.
2. Mr. Honoré Grenier and Mr. J. E. Blais, through Hon. L. P. Pelletier, who concurred.
3. No.
4. Mr. Ovila Rivard; 38 years; $140 per annum, rising by annual increments of $10 to a maximum of $180.

PILOTAGE COMMISSION.

Mr. SEVIGNY : Would the Minister of Marine kindly inform the House if the Pilotage Commission has been appointed ?

Mr. HAZEN : It has been agreed that the personnel of the commission shall consist of Captain Lindsay, wreck commissioner of the Marine and Fisheries Department, Mr. Lachance, of Quebec, president of the Corporation of Pilots, and Mr. Thomas Robb, of Montreal, treasurer of the Shipping Federation of Canada.

THE MAYFLOWER DISASTER.

Mr. GRAHAM : I understand there was a gentleman appointed to investigate the appalling disaster in connection with the Mayflower on the Madawaska river some time ago, and I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if that gentleman has made his report ?

Mr. HAZEN : Mr. Pringle, K.C., of Ottawa, was appointed to investigate the matter. I have not yet received his report. I will at once make inquiry regarding it, and as soon as it is received, it will be laid on the table of the House.

UNIFORM BRITISH NATURALIZATION.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou) moved:

For a copy of all despatches, letters, telegrams and other documents, including any reports of interviews had by ministers with the Imperial authorities with reference to a uniform plan of naturalization of aliens as British subjects in the United Kingdom and throughout the Empire.

He said: I desire to make this motion for the purpose of obtaining all information in the possession of the Government since the last session of Parliament in regard to this important question, and with a view of ascertaining what progress has been made in the meantime in the direction of obtaining the passage of legislation whereby the anomaly which exists with regard to the naturalization of aliens, not only in Canada but throughout the Empire, may be removed. Last session I made a similar motion and I then found that no progress had been made towards dealing with the subject since the meeting of the Imperial Conference in 1911. I understand that while the members of the Government were in England during the past summer this question received some consideration in conference with the Imperial authorities. I may remind the House of some of the questions which are involved. The question of naturalization is one which occasionally, but only very occasionally since Confederation, has received the attention of this Parliament. It is only within the last few years that this anomalous condition of affairs has engaged the attention of either the Parliament of this country, the Parliament of Great Britain, or the Parliaments of the colonies. When we consider the peculiar condition of affairs, we see that some remedy is desirable, and becomes immediately necessary. Two questions are involved in this problem of naturalization. The first is what is the status of British subjects, who go abroad and take upon themselves allegiance to foreign countries? The second is: What is the status of aliens who come into Canada or any other part of the British Empire and become naturalized? With regard to the first question, the original theory and principle of the common law was that a person who was once a British subject, was always a British subject, and that a person born in His Majesty's dominions, whether in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, was from the moment of his birth a British subject, no matter what his parents' nationality might have been. The question of the status of British subjects who go into foreign countries is one which for the moment we need not discuss. That is a matter largely of international arrangement with the country into which they may go and where they assume their new allegiance. What we are concerned about is, what is the status of the alien who comes into Canada or goes into another part of the Empire, takes the oath of allegiance, and receives a certificate of naturalization from the authorities of the particular country to which he may happen to go? We have this anomaly, that, although during the past ten or twelve years a tremendous number of people have come from every part of the globe, have settled in our country, and have become Canadian citizens, and although we give them a certificate of naturalization after they have complied with the conditions set out in our Naturailzation Act, that certificate does not entitle and never has entitled them to be considered as British subjects in the worldwide sense. All that we have been able to do, and all that we are doing now, is to give to a man who comes to Canada a certificate of naturalization that he is a British subject while he is within Canada. Unless there is an international arrangement, by which that certificate of naturalization is recognized in the country from which he comes, he never throws off allegiance to the land which he left and never becomes a British subject in the widest sense. A very large number of American citizens have come to Canada, have become naturalized here after a residence of three years, and have received a certificate in the regular way from our Canadian courts; but they are not, in the opinion of those who have considered the matter with a great deal of care, British subjects in the wider understanding of the term. They have not become naturalized as British subjects so as to entitle them to be recognized as such all over the world or in the country from which they came. They are still American citizens; they can return to their own country, and their own country can have the same control over them that it always had; they are entitled to whatever privileges and rights accrue to them by virtue of their American position and status, nothwithstanding the fact that in the meantime such a certificate has been given them in Canada. The reason is that that certificate has been limited in its nature. We are not able to certify that the person who has taken the oath of allegiance and complied with our law has become a British subject and is entitled to everything that that status involves. This peculiar condition of affairs attaches to every part of the Empire. The man who goes to England and becomes naturalized there, is only a British subject so far as the United Kingdom is concerned; he is not a British subject when he comes to Canada. The laws of the United Kingdom do not purport, and never have purported, to give him any greater status other than that. I would call the attention of the House to that fact, as it is set out in the statute which was passed in 1870. Previous to that, the question of naturalization had never received the consideration of the Parliament of the day to any great extent. The legislation of 1870 followed a report of a committee specially appointed for the purpose of considering the whole question. That committee proceeded to obliterate the old common law theory that once a man was a British subject, he was always a British subject, and to provide the lines within which a person who wanted to be naturalized could be naturalized in the United Kingdom. To show that a limited naturalization is the only one which can be obtained under the law, I will read the third sub-section of paragraph seven of the English Naturalization Act of 1870, which says:

An alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall in the United Kingdom be entitled to all political and other rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject in the United Kingdom, with this qualification, that he shall not, when within the limits of a foreign state of which he was a subject previously to obtaining his certificate of naturalization, be deemed to be a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject of that state in pursuance of the laws thereof, or in pursuance of a treaty to that effect.

Previous to this Act of 1870, the Imperial Parliament had divested themselves of their sovereignty in regard to this question of naturalization by giving to the Canadian Parliament, under section 91 of the British North America Act, the power to deal exclusively with legislation in regard to the naturalization of aliens. As to how wide the effect of that power may be, the question has formed a subject of discussion in the legal journals and in other quarters, to which I will afterwards refer. All the rights that the legislation of the United Kingdom purports to confer upon the persons who may be naturalized in that country, are rights which are not extra territorial, but are confined to the limits of the United Kingdom. The exact status of a large number of people in Canada from an international standpoint is a matter of very great doubt. True, the domicile is the test of a man's personal status with reference to a very great number of his rights, and the question as to where a man's domicile is at the time of his death is the testing question to determine the disposition of his property and a great many other matters which arise in the ordinary course of business and in the ordinary affairs of life. In regard to the questions of marriage, and the rights which arise in consequence of marriage, divorce, and other questions of that character, in which the nationality of the parties is resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining what their status may be, the law to-day in Canada and throughout the Empire is in a most confused state and demands immediate attention, and should be receiving the attention of the authorities. Take the anomaly, which is a striking one, of my hon. friend who sits in the Government without portfolio, and whose name has been mentioned as a representative in the Mother Country on the Imperial Defence Committee, whatever that representation may amount to. I look at the Parliamentary Companion, and I find that that gentleman was born in Lebanon, New Hampshire. So far as I can learn of the hon. gentleman's career, while he is a British subject in Canada, he is, outside of Canada, an American subject—certainly an American subject in the United States.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And in England too.

Mr. MACDONALD: And in England too. That we have so conspicuous an illustration of a man in the public life of this country who has passed his life in Canada and is in all respects identified with Canadian interests; yet, because he was born in the United States, is not a citizen of the Empire in its widest terms, is an anomaly which ought to be removed, and it seems strange to me that it was not removed long ago.

What has been done to deal with this question? Apparently, matters remained without very much discussion of this subject until the period immediately preceding 1902, when an English departmental committee was appointed for the purpose of inquiring into questions of naturalization. This committee made a very full and comprehensive report which occasioned the bringing of the subject before the attention of the Imperial Conference of 1902. It was pointed out that the proper meaning of naturalization was the status which should be granted to a British subject which would entitle him to recognition everywhere, and was not merely the giving of the rights and privileges of a British subject in a particular territory. The statement which was made by these gentlemen, some of whom were jurists of repute, is a matter of interest when one comes to consider what the exact powers of the Federal Parliament of Canada may be under section 91 of the British North America Act. That report was considered in a very incomplete way by the conference of 1902. But the interest which was evoked in the subject at that time led to further discussion; and the result was that a Bill was prepared previous to the conference of 1907. This Bill was discussed fully by the representatives of the several portions of the Empire who assembled for that conference and it was decided that the matter should be referred for consideration to a subsidiary conference of members of the larger conference. The anomalies which existed, the peculiar position in which the citizens of the different nations within the Empire stood as a result of the law, commanded a great deal of attention. The discussion disclosed a peculiar state of affairs as existing throughout the different nations of the Empire. For instance, a person must reside in the United Kingdom for a period of five years before he can be permitted to take the oath of allegiance there and receive the certificate which can be granted under their law. In Canada, the residence period was found to be three years, and I think it is the same in South Africa. In Australia the residence period is two years. And in New Zealand they have a provision of law under which no time is necessary in order to enable a person to become a subject. A man can arrive in New Zealand to-day, and in a week, if he does not belong to one of the races against which there is some restrictive legislation in that colony, if he can produce a certificate of good character and can show that he is possessed of certain educational qualifications, he is entitled to receive from the courts a certificate which entitles him to be regarded as a British subject in New Zealand, no matter where he came from or what his nationality was before he came there. So, we have within the Empire these differences of necessary qualifications running from five years residence in the Mother Country to practically no time at all in New Zealand.

The question is: How can all these conditions be reconciled, how can a solution of this problem be worked out? Following the discussions of the conference of 1907, there was another departmental committee which met in England and which dealt with this question again. That committee drafted a Bill which was submitted to the different colonies previous to the assembling of the conference of 1911. There is a clause in this Bill which proposes a solution in terms of the problem. Section seven of this draft Bill reads as follows:

An alien who, within such limited time before making the application hereinafter mentioned as has been under any Act hereby repealed or may be allowed by the Secretary of State, either by general order or on any special occasion, has resided in His Majesty's dominions for not less than five years, or has been in the service of the Crown for not less than five years, and who intends, when naturalized, either to reside in His Majesty's dominions or to serve under the Crown, may apply to the Secrtary of State for a certificate of naturalization.

Provided, that if during the qualifying period of five years the alien has resided in more than one part of His Majesty's dominions, he must immediately before his application have resided for not less than twelve months in that part of His Majesty's dominions in which he applies for naturalization.

That Bill was the one which formed the subject of discussion in the conference of 1911, and the several representatives there had conflicting views as to whether that clause should be agreed to or not. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the Opposition in this House, in that conference took the view that the aim to be attained was that legislation should be had so that a British subject anywhere might be a British subject everywhere, and that the fair way would be to recognize the terms and conditions that were imposed by each one of the nations within the Empire, so that a certificate from any one of these nations should entitle an alien to recognition as a British citizen. The representatives of the United Kingdom, however, took the ground, in the strongest possible way, that nothing short of a residence of five years in any part of the Empire would be satisfactory to them as a condition precedent to the right of naturalization being granted. And it was found, after the presentation of views by the different gentlemen there, that the home authorities would not swerve in any way from that attitude. The result was a statement made by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, who was at that time the Home Secretary, as to the attitude of the Mother Country. He read the memorandum that was prepared descriptive of the terms upon which the home authorities thought the matter should be dealt with. They regarded this condition as being essential to any legislation that might be passed to settle the question:

1. Imperial nationality should be world-wide and uniform, each dominion being left free to grant their local nationality on such terms as its legislature thinks fit.

The effect of that proposition, of course, would be to maintain a sort of dual nationality—Americans, for instance, who come to Canada would still be British subjects so far as Canada is concerned, but might not be British subjects in the wider sense. It seems to me that an anomaly exists there which ought to be removed. For my part, I can hardly realize the exact significance and status of a British subject in Canada. The desires of those who are anxious to have established a favourable condition in regard to this matter will never be met in the slightest degree if this varied condition of nationality is permitted to go on throughout the world.

2. The Mother Country finds it necessary to maintain five years as a qualifying period. This is a safeguard to the dominions as well as to us, but five years anywhere in the Empire should be as good as five years in the United Kingdom.

3. The grant of nationality is in every case discretionary, and this discretion should be exercised by those responsible in the area in which the applicant has spent the last twelve months.

4. The Imperial Act should be so framed as to enable each self-governing colony dominion to adopt it.

5. Nothing now proposed would affect the validity and effectiveness of local law regulating immigration and the like, or differentiating between the classes of British subjects.

The last clause was put in on account of the attitude taken by the representatives of Australia and New Zealand, who have legislation of a restrictive character with special reference to Asiatics, and who take the ground, in the strongest possible way, that no legislation on this subject would be passed with their consent if it in any way interfered with that restrictive legislation. It was pointed out, however, by the Home Secretary that the provisions of the Bill, which would be prepared according to the suggestions made by him in this memorandum, would not in any way conflict with the right of these colonies who desire to maintain their restrictive legislation. It was understood that as a result of the discussion at the conference at that time, a Bill embodying these principles would be prepared and sent out to each of the colonies for consideration by their respective parliaments, and that was the stage which matters had reached when I addressed the House upon this matter last year. The question which arises at the present moment is: What has been done in the meantime by hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches, and by the home authorities. I noticed in the press the other day a despatch stating that Mr. Buxton had introduced in the Imperial House of Commons a Bill dealing with this question, and I assume that is a Bill based upon the interchange of views of the representatives of Canada and the other parts of the Empire. Its provisions will be well worthy of the consideration of every member of this House, for it is desirable that a proper solution to the question as to the removal of these anomalies that have existed—apparently without attracting the active attention of the people of this country—should be arrived at.

Closely allied with the broader question I have just alluded to, is the consideration of a proposition of a purely legal character presented in an article in the Canadian Law Times of November, 1911. It was asserted—and the proposition was laid down with some considerable force—that Canada was supreme on this question, that we really had the right not only to legislate and declare that a man could be a British subject within the bounds of Canada, but that by virtue of our legislation we could declare he was a British subject anywhere. The ground upon which this view was taken was:

That as the right to legislate in regard to naturalization and aliens was a right that has been given to each one of the selfgoverning colonies long ago,——

The Imperial Parliament, therefore, possessing the power of sovereignty in that regard, specially delegated such power to the various dominions which alone had the right to deal with it, and it was further pointed out that all the legislation with regard to naturalization that had been passed in the different portions of this country previous to 1867, through the legislatures of Upper Canada and the other provinces, had been approved of and assented to by the Sovereign, and that in some of these Acts there was a declaration by certificate providing that a man should become a British subject in the widest possible sense, and not in a limited territorial sense. It was further urged that the only action necessary to effect that naturalization was the assent to the legislation by the Governor General, the direct representative of the Crown, who has the right to reserve for the consideration of the Imperial authorities any question of doubtful legality, or any matter tending to trespass on the powers of the Imperial Government. The fact that these assents had been made in the past was an indication that all we had to do was to make the necessary legislation, no Imperial statute being necessary. It was further suggested that as authority had been given in 1867 to legislate generally in regard to naturalization and aliens, the result was that there was given to the Canadian Parliament the power to create a status in regard to a British subject in an unreserved way; that the word 'naturalization' was interpreted by the various committees who have dealt with the matter in the Mother Country to mean a declaration of the right of a person to be a British subject in the widest sense of the term, and did not involve limitation of this right in a territorial sense. This being the case, in order to establish the fact that a party was a British subject in the widest sense, it was only necessary to strike out of the Canadian statute the words contained therein by which the territorial effect of the certificate is limited to Canada. This matter is dealt with on page 77 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, section 24:

The alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall, within Canada—

These—within Canada—are the words which could be struck from the Act, as they limit the status of the naturalized subject, under our Canadian law, to Canada only.

—shall within Canada be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations to which as natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada—

The words 'within Canada' could be struck out also in this case.

—with this qualification, that he shall not, when within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject previously to obtaining his certificate of naturalization, be deemed to be a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject of that state in pursuance of the laws thereof or in pursuance of a treaty or convention to that effect.

It was pointed out that in order that an alien could divest himself of all rights and privileges in the nation from which he came, the matter should be the subject of a general treaty or understanding on the basis of international law between the nation from which he came and the country in which he at the time resided. Consequently that limited clause is put in, because this whole question of naturalization depends, in regard to the divesting of the status of a person with reference to the country which he has left, on agreement, the comity of nations but there is the power which rests in the country to which such a person comes of declaring that having complied with their laws, he shall have all the rights and privileges which pertain to a person who is a subject of that country. The argument is put forth, and I am sure the Minister of Justice is familiar with it, that we have in the Dominion of Canada the power to deal with that whole question. It does not appear that at the Imperial Conference the representatives of the colonies urged that view. It was taken for granted that the Imperial authorities had to do something, and that, to a certain degree, that power rested with them. It was recognized that each of the different nations had in the past been dealing with the question, and had been dealing with it on the assumption that they were limited in their power by virtue of the general principle of law that no legislative body can deal with anything that is extra-territorial, or confer any rights or privileges upon any person that go beyond the limits of the country in which they affect to exercise their power. In a very clever paper, prepared by Mr. Mulvey of the State Department, which contains a very interesting resume of the question, it is urged on various grounds that the view asserted in the Canadian Law Times is not the correct view; and by quotations from decisions of the Privy Council and various other courts on kindred questions—because of course the point involved in this particular legislation has not been determined positively by any of the judicial bodies—it is urged that the doctrine that no legislation can have any effect beyond the boundaries of the country of the legislature, would limit the power of the Canadian Parliament, so that they could not declare that any one was entitled to the privileges or status of a British subject anywhere outside of the bounds of Canada. It is true that the English Act of 1847 and the subsequent English Act of 1870 expressly provided that the naturalization power which was exercised by the different self-governing governments was one which was limited in its extent to the country with which it proposed to deal. There is a section in the English Act of 1870 which deals with that. It may be remarked, however, that the Act of 1870 was passed after the British North America Act of 1867 had been enacted, and that the question would turn upon the point as to whether or not the power to deal with the naturalization of aliens as given in section 91 of the British North America Act was an absolute power. Of course, in order to limit the extent of the application of those words, it is urged that section 91 expressly states that the Dominion Parliament has to do with the peace, order and good government of Canada, and that those words are limited and binding so as to include the implication that when classified subjects are mentioned specifically later, they are to have no wider effect than what is necessary for the peace, order and good government of Canada. To that, again, it is urged that what would be for the peace, order and good government of Canada, so far as naturalization is concerned, would involve the right to declare that the parties who had become naturalized under our laws were British subjects in the widest sense, because we were one of the component parts of the Empire.

The effect of the statute of 1870 would be, if it were interpreted as limiting the power conferred by the British North America Act, to expressly state that our own naturalization laws were to have effect only within our own territories. It is evident, however, whether the view that has been urged in regard to our wide powers in this particular be well-founded or not, that an Imperial statute is necessary in order to remove the limitation clauses that have existed in past naturalization acts. There would, of course, be necessity for Canadian legislation in striking out the words, 'within Canada,' where they occur in section 24 of our own Act, where the status of the alien when naturalized is declared. The question, therefore, is: how can this difficulty be removed? It would seem to me to be most desirable that in any legislation passed upon this subject the anomaly of local naturalization should be removed. Personally I can see no advantage whatever in the idea that aliens are to have limited political rights in a colony while by birth they are subjects of another country. If the United States, for instance, do not recognize under any treaty arrangement which they have with the British Empire to-day the status of a person who had been an American citizen and had been naturalized only in a limited way in Canada, and if they still claim that naturalization does not divest him of his status as an American citizen, then what use is there of our going on in Canada giving certificates of naturalization? The local naturalization would then have no particular advantage or significance other than that any one coming to this country and residing for three years and willing for the time to take an oath of allegiance to His Majesty, would be entitled to the privilege of voting and to such political rights as would attach to other residents of Canada who were born here, and would, for the time being, not have any of those provisions of the law applied against him which do apply to aliens. If from this peculiar situation we could work out within the Empire some arrangement by which, as the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition said so well at the conference, ought to be the aim to be attained, a man who was a British subject anywhere would be a British subject everywhere, that ought to be the final solution of this question. Anything that falls short of that seems to me to be entirely inadequate.

We sometimes hear a great deal about this Empire and the status of the people within the Empire. When we find hon. gentlemen within the Empire who are not British subjects—and there are other hon. gentlemen besides the Minister of the Crown to whom I have referred whose parents were born in other countries, and who still, in the country from which their fathers came, are really subjects of that country—and, if we are going to talk about Empire building and cementing the ties that bind the Empire while we have this peculiar and anomalous legal status of hundreds of people in this country remaining as it is, we are leaving untouched and unremedied one of the most important and essential elements which should go towards the proper cementing and binding of the Empire.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: I venture to say that throughout the length and breadth of this country the percentage of men who really understand what the status of the law is on this subject is infinitesimally small. Numerous gentlemen whom you see discussing with the utmost freedom Empire problems are really not citizens of the Empire at all, and have no business to be considered so; and the sooner we get rid of this anomaly, in order that, no matter whence we come into this free Empire, we may all claim that we are citizens of the Empire, the better. This is the third time that I have mentioned this matter in the House. I was assured by the Prime Minister last year that it would receive his full consideration and I hope to hear that some substantial progress has been made in the interval. I would, however, suggest that in the settlement of this question we should move along such lines as will ensure its settlement upon the wide basis which alone will ever settle it.

Mr. MORPHY: I was much interested in the hon. gentleman's argument; but will he tell me whether he distinguishes between the United States form, whereby a new subject is compelled to forswear his allegiance against, say, the country of his birth, and our form of naturalization oath which does not go so far as to compel a subject to forswear his native land? I would like to hear what the hon. gentleman has to say on that particular point. It seems to me that our law would bring about the same result without the forswearing clause being in the oath.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think my hon. friend is right. When a man takes the oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain and Ireland in the form which is prescribed by our Canadian law, he is, so far as the effect of the oath of allegiance is concerned, declaring his allegiance to the King of Great Britain to as full an extent as though by other words he declared that he was giving up allegiance to another country. But when we get down to first principles, the proper theory is that a man should owe allegiance to but one country The settlement of this question, however, does not turn upon what may be the particular oath of any particular country. In any discussions on the subject, that does not seem to have been the determining point. The matter depends upon what may be the treaty between the two countries, and I used the United States only as an illustration. I could have referred to any other country in the same way. The point is as to whether or not a foreign country recognizes a certificate of naturalization which is only local in its effect, and whether or not it is given the full weight and significance of the certificate of a British subject in the widest sense.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am sure we have all listened with a great deal of interest and profit to the observations which the hon. member has made in supporting his motion. I think we can all perfectly agree on the importance of removing the anomalies to which he has called attention, and of bringing about a situation whereby a person, becoming a British subject under the laws of the United Kingdom, or of any of the self-governing dominions, Canada in particular, so far as we are concerned, shall become a British subject throughout the Empire, and entitled, in consequence, to such recognition from outside countries as is accorded, either by comity or by virtue of treaties, to British subjects in the fullest sense of the term. We have not lost sight of this very important matter, and I think I shall be able to satisfy the hon. member and the House generally that we have made very considerable progress towards attaining the desired result since the last time he had occasion to call the attention of the House to the matter.

In the settlement of this question we have to bear in mind, not only the result sought to be obtained, but also the means whereby it may be attained; and in that connection we have to carefully see to it that the constitutional rights of Canada, as regards our legislative competence in respect to the subject of naturalization, are safeguarded. I may say that such delay as may have occurred since last session in bringing about a final settlement as regards the method by which the desired object is to be attained is due to the desire to reach an effective means of bringing about the result without in any way affecting or diminishing the right of Canada under the British North America Act to deal with this question. Nobody, I think, would dispute, as a pure proposition of law that the Parliament of the United Kingdom could legislate upon the subject, and declare its legislation to be effective and applicable throughout all the countries of the Empire; because I suppose it would have to be conceded that the Parliament of the United Kingdom which enacted the British North America Act could, as a matter of law, repeal that Act. But it does not necessarily follow from that that the Parliament of the United Kingdom could constitutionally legislate upon that subject and on its own authority make its legislation applicable and effective within the Dominion of Canada. As the late Sir John Thompson said in dealing with a very similar situation which arose in connection with a discussion upon the copyright laws, it was undoubtedly true that the Parliament of the United Kingdom could, notwithstanding the power in that regard conceded to this Parliament by the British North America Act, legislate for this country on the subject; but, he added, that is true as a matter of law, eliminating limitations and considerations of national honour and good faith. The serious question that arises in connection with the power to deal with this sujbect is therefore a question, not of the existence of legal power on the part of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, but a question whether that power can—in view of the dispositions of the British North America Act, and more particularly that section which has given control of legislation regarding naturalization of aliens to this Parliament—constitutionally legislate upon the subject and make that legislation effective within the Dominion. That is the most important question in my judgment to which it was necessary to give attention in determining the manner in which the result sought to be brought about was to be attained. The hon. gentleman has discussed the question of the extent of the power conferred on Canada in regard to this subject, from the point of view of whether or not the legislation of Canada upon the subject can or cannot produce extra-territorial effect. That, no doubt, is a very interesting question, and I think it is well for us in dealing with this matter to endeavour to form a clear idea as to what is the proper conclusion upon that question. But it did not seem to me to be the paramount question. The object to be attained being the bringing about of such a condition of the law both in the United Kingdom and in the different self-governing possessions as will result in the conferring of naturalization either in the United Kingdom or in any of these self-governing possessions upon the individual, having the effect of making him a British subject, not merely either in the United Kingdom or in that one of the dominions in which he might be naturalized, but throughout the Empire; the question that necessarily has to be solved is: how are you going to get a law bearing upon this subject which shall be an effective law in the United Kingdom, and which shall be an effective law in each one of the self-governing dominions, and how are you going to get that without trenching upon the right of the United Kingdom on the one hand and the dominions on the other to determine—assuming that they have that right and for the moment we need not question whether they have or not—who shall and who shall not be entitled to recognition as a British subject by naturalization within their respective limits. It seems to me that the position as it stands to-day is, that constitutionally each one of the self-governing dominions, and Canada in particular, has the right to determine what alien, and under what conditions any alien, shall become entitled to recognition as a British subject in Canada. That much, I think, is quite capable of being demonstrated, and is not from a constitutional point of view disputable. On the other hand, I need hardly say that the Parliament of the United Kingdom has undoubtedly the exclusive right of determining who shall be recognized as a British subject within the United Kingdom, and that as well from the constitutional as from the legal point of view. From the legal point of view I do not think it can be disputed that the Parliament of the United Kingdom could pass a law which would be effective throughout the Dominion, but I do not think the Parliament of the United Kingdom could constitutionally pass such a law without the asent of the legislative power within the different dominions. It is well to point out that whatever may be the rights or the powers of the Parliament of the United Kingdom with regard to this matter of naturalization, and whether that Parliament has or has not constitutionally the right to pass laws upon the subject effective within the different dominions, as a matter of fact the Parliament of the United Kingdom never has exercised such a power. That fact is, I think, of very considerable bearing in determining the two questions: first, whether that Parliament can to-day constitutionally exercise such power, and, second: in determining what was the extent of power that was conferred upon our Parliament by section 91 of the British North America Act when the power of legislating in regard to naturalization was conferred upon the Parliament of Canada. I have said that the Parliament of the United Kingdom never has exercised the power of legislating to create a naturalization effective outside of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Could we not petition the Government or pass a resolution here?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, I think we might petition the Government to pass a resolution here; and I think such legislation passed with the consent properly expressed of the Parliament of this Dominion, would even without that consent be legal and with that consent would be constitutional. I do not think there is any impossibility of obtaining the result by reason of what I have been saying, nor even that there is any very great difficulty. It seems to me a little remarkable and I was surprised to find when I came to look into the matter, that general legislation for the purpose of naturalization is comparatively a new thing in the United Kingdom; that the first general law that was passed upon the subject was passed in 1844, and that prior to that people were naturalized either by getting a special Act to naturalize the individual, or they had resort to a denization which the King could confer and which did not give all the rights that are now attached to naturalization. That legislation from the outset, unquestionably in the intention of Parliament, did not purport to give to the person naturalized under it any status or any right, or subject him to any obligation as a British subject elsewhere than in the United Kingdom. I have not before me the text of that statute; but I make the statement without any hesitation, and I do so because it appears that under that statute doubts did arise as to whether or not that statute was effective in the British possessions outside of the United Kingdom, and the result was that by a statute enacted in 1847 to which the hon. member has already referred,—the verbiage is very great and I might perhaps shorten it—two things were expressly provided. In the first place, all previous legislation by legislatures of British possessions with regard to naturalization were declared valid and effective, subject only to the condition that the naturalization was to produce its results within the limits of the possessions in which the legislation was passed. Then the legislation went on to point out that doubts had arisen as to whether the legislation of 1844 was effective in these outside possessions, and goes on for the purpose of removing those doubts to declare that that legislation never was and was not effective in any of the possessions outside of the United Kingdom. Furthermore, that law enacted that all future naturalization Acts which might be passed—I am of course not pretending to give the words of the statute—by the legislatures of the different possessions should be valid and effective, provided they were limited in their effect to conferring rights upon persons within the limits of the possessions whose legislatures passed them. I think that that enactment, interpreting as it does the very first legislative Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom upon the subject, enacted as it was before the enactment of the British North America Act, and containing as it does this clear-cut division. this clear-cut partition I might say, of the power of dealing with naturalization, has a most important bearing upon the question of interpretation of the word 'naturalization' used in the British North America Act. I think we may safely say that that Parliament had settled this question before the British North America Act was passed, in the sense not only that naturalization was the proper subject matter of legislation effective exclusively within the different possessions, but had furthermore laid down itself the rule that, in its judgment at that time at all events, the proper function of the Parliament of the United Kingdom in legislating in regard to naturalization, was to determine who should be entitled to be naturalized within the United Kingdom. So that we find ourselves in this position at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, namely that naturalization had in the eyes and by virtue of the enactment of the Parliament, that passed the British North America Act, a well understood meaning.

Naturalization by that Parliament was, as evidenced by its own legislation, the proper subject matter to be dealt with in each possession which had a legislature of its own by that legislature, and the laws enacted by that legislature upon the subject created rights only within their limits. And equally so in the judgment of that Parliament, when you come to deal with naturalization enactments of that Parliament itself, the proper effect to be attached to such legislation was that the naturalization should be effective within the United Kingdom. Therefore I think it may be said that from the outset, from the time that the Parliament of the United Kingdom began to deal at all with naturalization legislation, it dealt with that question on the assumption that naturalization was in itself a local thing. We have travelled very far from that idea to-day; and I think we have travelled in a right direction; but I do not think it can be disputed that the Parliament, which enacted the legislation I have referred to, looked at naturalization as a proper subject matter for local legislation, and that the Parliament of the United Kingdom when enacting that legislation, considered that it was dealing with a local matter. In that state of affairs, it does not seem to me that we can seek to give to the word 'naturalization,' as used in the British North America Act, any wider meaning than 'naturalization producing effect within the territory of Canada'; that is the sort of naturalization that the Parliament which conferred that power knew of when it conferred it. For my part therefore, I do not find it necessary, for the purpose of determining whether a naturalization law enacted by us could produce ex-territorial effect, to take upon myself to determine as between the author of the article in the Law Times cited by my hon. friend and Mr. Mulvey, what the effect of legislation by Canada would be, looking at the question from the point of view from which those two gentlemen discussed it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the Home Rule Bill passed in the Old Country, is the question of naturalization one for the local Parliament to deal with?

Mr. DOHERTY: I confess I cannot give the information. It does not seem necessary for me to settle the question as discussed between those two gentlemen in order to arrive at a conclusion as to what the meaning of the word 'naturalization' is in our statute. I think we have got to read it in the face of this legislative settlement as to what the extent of 'naturalization' was at the time the Parliament enacted the British North America Act. For me the conclusive reason why the legislation of our Parliament cannot be effective beyond the limits of the Dominion on that question, is that such a limitation was an incident to naturalization laws at the time of the passing of our Constitutional Act, and had been determined to be so by the British Parliament, in more than one enactment at the time that Act was passed. As evidence that that view was persisted in, we had the provision cited by the hon. gentleman from the Naturalization Act of 1870. In 1870 after the passing of the British North America Act, the Parliament of the United Kingdom still persisted in its belief that the proper subject matter of its legislation upon naturalization was naturalization effective within the United Kingdom. In this condition of affairs our Constitution was passed, and there was conferred upon us the power to deal with the subject of naturalization, that power being, at that time, recognized as well in the United Kingdom, as wherever it existed in a colony or possession outside of the United Kingdom, as being limited, as regards the extent of territory it would cover, to the territory of the United Kingdom or of such colony or possession, but as being at the same time a power to be exclusively exercised by the legislature upon which it was conferred. I take it, therefore, that, on the one hand, we have no greater power than would provide for a naturalization effective within the Dominion, but that, on the other hand, we exclusively have power to deal with that matter. If I am right in the last statement, then the Parliament of the United Kingdom—and I would point out that I am always speaking of the constitutional question—is without power to enact a law in virtue whereof, without legislation on the part of the Parliament of Canada, a person who was an alien yesterday shall become a naturalized British subject in Canada to-morrow. And if that view be correct, then it follows that you cannot attain the result we are aiming at except by co-operation in legislation; and, if we are going to have a naturalization that shall be effective throughout the Empire, we must have it in virtue of co-operation between the legislative bodies in the different self-governing countries that constitute the Empire. That does not mean that each must pass an act perfectly identical and pass it concurrently,—though I am perfectly free to say that, speaking my own personal view, that would be the most desirable way to bring about the result,—but it means that we cannot get the result unless we can agree that certain dispositions are to be law in the United Kingdom and throughout the different dominions. That may be attained by an Act passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and adopted or assented to by the Parliaments of the different dominions. But if the Parliaments of the different dominions are prepared to adopt or assent to an Act of that kind, I entirely fail to see what difficulty would be involved in each Parliament enacting its own legislation, and providing for recognition of that of the others. I say this because at the different conferences, and I think particularly at the Conference of 1911, it seems to have been considered that there were insuperable difficulties in the way of attaining that result by concurrent legislation. It was said: You could not make any of the Parliaments pass an Act in the ipsissima verba of another Parliament. There is no doubt about that—you could not make them do it. But we are proposing to do something that everybody has agreed shall only be done if all these different countries assent to its being done. And, if they are ready to assent to its being done, I confess, as I said a moment ago, I have great difficulty in appreciating that there would be insuperable difficulties in getting them to do that thing which they are willing to assent to being done. However that may be, I was going on to point out that, in my opinion, if the view I have expressed is well founded, you can only attain the result sought by co-operation in legislation; and it is because we—I think I may say—entertain that view and feel that that view ought to be recognized and acted upon in the enactment of the necessary legislation that we have thought it proper to discuss the question with the Imperial Government in connection with the Act drafted by that Government and forwarded to the different dominions for their views since the last session of the House. That Act, I understand, has been accepted or assented to by the dominions other than Canada—assented to without their deeming it necessary to point out what we thought it proper to point out and make a suggestion with regard to an amendment which we thought it desirable to make—a suggestion which, I may say, was at once accepted in principle by the Home authorities, there remaining at the present moment but the settlement of the wording in which the suggested amendment shall be couched. The Act so prepared, which I take to be the Act that the hon. member for Pictou stated that the Right Hon. Mr. Buxton introduced in the British House of Commons the other day, purported to do two things. In the first place, it purported to make provision for naturalization in the United Kingdom, which naturalization, when granted, would, under the provisions of the Act itself, be effective throughout all the dominions. In the second place, it purported to confer upon the parliaments of the self-governing dominions, the power, provided they adopted certain sections of the Act, to create a naturalization which would be recognized in the United Kingdom and likewise in such of the other self-governing dominions as adopted the sections referred to. Thus, under the Act as prepared, naturalization under its provisions in the United Kingdom would make the person naturalized, unconditionally and without action on the part of the Parliament of Canada or the parliaments of the different self-governing dominions, a British subject, not only in the United Kingdom but throughout the dominions. But, on the other hand, while that Act empowered the parliaments of the dominions to provide for naturalization which would be effective in the United Kingdom and in the other dominions that adopted the conditions, this was conditional upon the adoption by the parliaments of the different dominions of the sections referred to in the Act. Now, that did not, as we looked at it, put these parliaments—each of them supreme upon the question of who should be a naturalized subject within its own territory—on a footing of equality. Moreover, it did not carry out one of the conditions which had been laid down in the conference of 1911 as being essential to the legislation to be prepared. The one I refer to is the condition to the effect that the Act should be so drawn as to be susceptible of being adopted by the parliaments of the dominions. That form was finally adopted as being the equivalent of the same condition expressed at an earlier stage of discussion by Mr. Winston Churchill—a form which, to my mind, more correctly expresses what seems to have been desired. As first stated, the clause read:

The Imperial Act would not apply to the self-governing dominions until adopted by them.

That was modified—but very clearly, with no intention of changing its effect—to read:

The Imperial Act should be so framed as to enable each self-governing dominion to adopt it.

The Act departed from that condition in so far as provisions were made for a system of naturalization in the United Kingdom to become effective throughout the Dominion; that was not subject to our adoption. The only thing subject to our adoption was the power to create a naturalization which would be effective in the United Kingdom and in the other possessions which adopt that section. I may say that did not seem to us to be carrying out the condition, or to be consistent with our views of our constitutional right. It is quite clear, from the discussion in the conference of 1911, that the result intended to be obtained was that set forth in the conditions which have just been referred to, and that there was absolutely no intention on the part of the Imperial authorities of legislating in such manner as to make naturalization in the United Kingdom effective in the Dominions without action by the Parliaments. I may add that when I called the attention of the home authorities to the effect of this legislation, the first answer I got was that I was mistaken; that the Act did not produce such a result. It was found upon examination, however, that my statement as to the effect of the provisions contained in the Act was correct, and it was at once stated that there was no intention of producing that result, and that the Imperial Government would be prepared to so amend the Act as to make the effect in Canada of naturalization granted in England dependent upon the adoption by the Canadian Parliament of the sections of the English Act providing for that naturalization in England. With that amendment the objection disappears. The United Kingdom provides by legislation for a system of naturalization under their law, prescribing certain conditions essential to that naturalization and the manner in which it shall be granted; attaching to that naturalization the general effect, without expressed limitation, of giving a man all the rights and subjecting him to all the duties of a natural-born British subject. The restriction contained in the Act of 1870, as it had been set forth in the Act of 1847, is omitted; that is, that the person naturalized should have all these rights and should be looked upon 'within the United Kingdom' as a British subject. The Parliament of the United Kingdom, then, legislates in absolutely general terms when dealing with the effect of this legislation. But, while the exact terms of the amendment to be made have not been settled, it is to be, in effect, that this provision attaching effects to naturalization granted in England shall not be operative in any of the self-governing dominions unless the Act providing for such naturalization be adopted by the respective parliaments of such dominions. In the same way, any naturalization law passed by the Canadian Parliament shall be effective in the United Kingdom, provided we adopt the sections under which the power of creating such an effect is conferred upon us. A man naturalized in the United Kingdom under the law of the United Kingdom will, therefore, be a British subject in this country by virtue of our law, and in the same way a man naturalized in Canada will be recognized in the United Kingdom by virtue of their law, because they are making a provision that if we adopt these sections they will recognize our naturalization.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : What is the difficulty now ?

Mr. DOHERTY.

Mr. DOHERTY : There really is no difficulty now. I infer from the fact that the Bill has been introduced that the form of the amendment which came from us has been accepted, though, of course, I am not in a position to speak definitely as to that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : Do I understand that the British Government are prepared to recognize the naturalization given by Canada, after a probation of three years, and to recognize naturalization given by New Zealand, where there is no probation at all ?

Mr. DOHERTY: Naturalization effected by the Canadian law is dependent upon our adopting certain sections of the Act. The first matter that presented room for discussion was the question of how, assuming that we agreed upon the conditions, we could bring about the result. That I think I am safe in saying, although the final form of the wording has not been finally agreed upon, has been settled by the acquiescence in our proposition that the recognition of any man as a naturalized British subject in Canada, should come from the Parliament of Canada. I do not mean to say that it became necessary that we should determine that we were absolutely right and that no other view could be entertained, nor do I wish to say that the Imperial Government recognized that as essential, but, as was said at the conference, whether they had a right to legislate to give effect to naturalization within Canada or not, they did not propose to do it, so that question is cleared up.

The legislation proceeds upon the lines of the conditions laid down at the conference and read by the hon. gentleman that there should be five years residence but that residence need not necessarily be in the United Kingdom nor need it, if we adopt that law, be in Canada. There must be five years residence within the British Dominions and the last twelve months must be within either the United Kingdom or that Dominion, assuming we adopt the law, within which the naturalization is sought.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the dual condition to be maintained, is there to be an Empire nationality and a local one?

Mr. DOHERTY: That depends entirely on what we want to do. This Act deals exclusively with Imperial naturalization. It does not purport to deal with anything but Imperial naturalization. It lays down the conditions by which that may be obtained in England and provides that if we adopt those conditions then our naturalization shall be an Imperial naturalization in the sense that it will be recognized in England and also in such of the other Dominions as adopt this legislation.

Mr. GERMAN: Will it be possible to have in Canada two naturalization Acts, one local and one Imperial?

Mr. DOHERTY: If this Parliament, in its wisdom, thinks it is desirable to do it it may do it, it may continue to provide for a purely local naturalization but it would not be done in virtue of this Act. This Parliament has been doing that ever since Confederation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it the policy of the Government to accept the five year probation as suggested by the Imperial Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have communicated to the Imperial authorities that, subject to the settlement of the amendment suggested, we would be prepared to adopt the Act as submitted to us dealing with Imperial naturalization.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister be in a position to introduce the Bill from Canada's standpoint this session?

Mr. DOHERTY: Just as soon as this amendment is settled and we have a Bill as actually introduced in the Old Country.

Mr. GERMAN: Is it the intention of the Government to do away with the three years naturalization and create a five years residence?

Mr. DOHERTY: For the purpose of Imperial naturalization, we would have to require the five years residence.

Mr. GERMAN: But retain the three years residence for local naturalization?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is not necessarily connected with this legislation at all, it will be a matter to consider whether it is desirable to go on having two different statuses, because that is what they would be, called naturalization. I confess that I am inclined to the view expressed by the hon. member for Pictou that it is not desirable to have two different kinds of naturalization, but there is nothing to prevent us granting a man who has been three years resident in Canada all the rights that naturalization now gives him in Canada, even though we should not call it naturalization. This Bill leaves the question of local naturalization absolutely where it is to-day, the different dominions are free to exercise their own judgment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the five years time have to be spent in any British possession, or does that refer to the self-governing dominions?

Mr. DOHERTY: My understanding is that it applies to the British possessions; but I will give the exact words:

The Secretary of State may grant a certificate of naturalization to an alien who makes an application for the purpose and satisfies the Secretary of State——

That is the way it is to be done in England, but in this country the Government would give it. Here are the conditions:

(a) That he has either resided in His Majesty's dominions——

That is in the widest possible terms.

—for a period of not less than five years in the manner required by this Act or been in the service of the Crown for five years within the last eight years before the application, and

(b) That he is of good character and has an adequate knowledge of the English language.

In that connection I might point out that by section 7 it is provided that where this law would be adopted in any of the dominions in which any other language stands upon a footing of equality with the English language the condition may be modified by substituting 'that language' for 'the English language.'

Then the next paragraph provides that the residence required is residence in the United Kingdom for not less than one year immediately preceding the application, and previous residence either in the United Kingdom or in some other part of His Majesty's Dominions for a period of four years within the last eight years before the application.

Then the section goes on to deal with other conditions about taking the oaths and so forth, but I think those are the material conditions, and the acceptance of them as conditions of Imperial naturalization is merely what was accepted in principle at the conference in 1911 when the representatives of the United Kingdom represented that five years' residence, not necessarily within the country of naturalization, but at all events within the British Dominions, was an essential condition from their point of view, of the recognition on their part of the naturalization.

Mr. GERMAN: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he does not think that that leaves room for false statements and perjury? A man would only have to live one year in Canada and swear he had lived four years in New Zealand or in India or in any of the other British dominions throughout the world, to become a British subject, a naturalized citizen of the British Empire.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course that objection would be as strong in the United Kingdom as in Canada. But in the second place I want to point out that in subsequent sections there are powers to make regulations as to the nature of the proof that a man will be called upon to make, and if the sections are adopted, as we suggest, to make the necessary regulations to protect ourselves we shall insist that that proof shall be given. I do not know that five years' residence would be very much harder to prove than three.

Mr. GERMAN: The three years must be in Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: Under our present naturalization law it must be three years in Canada but if we are going to have an Imperial naturalization, we must have an Imperial naturalization.

Mr. GERMAN: And take a chance.

Mr. DOHERTY: We must take it with its advantages and what may be its possible disadvantages. The difficulty as to proof does not seem to me a very material one. I think it should be quite possible to so provide that people would not be naturalized without satisfactory evidence or without meeting the necessary conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I think that what I have said gives the hon. member the information which he asked for so far as it is in my possession. I do not think it would be proper upon this motion that I should enter into a discussion of the different provisions of the Bill which has been submitted. That Bill just as it is, will never be law so far as Canada is concerned; none of its provisions will be law until a Bill is submitted to this Parliament and passed upon by this Parliament, and this is not the time to discuss the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: I assume that when this little question which is still open between my hon. friend and the home authorities is disposed of, we may look for him introducing legislation on the subject this session?

Mr. DOHERTY: In that regard something would depend upon the vicissitudes through which that Act might go in the Imperial Parliament. I fancy that the wiser course would be for us to wait until the legislation had been enacted, or at all events until we were in a position to know that we were not legislating to meet a condition that possibly might not exist. That is a question upon which we will have to be guided by future events. I would not at this moment say that a Bill will be brought down this session. Now, as I have said, I think I have given to the hon gentleman and to the House, as fully as I am possessed of it, all the information as to what has taken place in connection with this matter since he last drew the attention of the House to it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I notice in our naturalization act, and I think the same language is used in the Imperial Act, that it is stated that the person who becomes naturalized by virtue of Canadian legislation say, is not to be regarded as a British subject when he is within the bounds of the country of his nativity.

Mr. BORDEN: Except in so far as he has ceased to be under the laws of that country.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would that condition be changed if we had Imperial co-operative legislation?

Mr. DOHERTY: Whether we change that condition or not, would not, as I understand it, make any material difference with regard to the way the country of his nativity or of original citizenship would treat him. What he would be considered to be by that country when he was in it, would depend upon what the law of that country was upon the subject of the recognition of naturalization outside.

Mr. GERMAN: He could not be a citizen of two countries at the same time.

Mr. DOHERTY: A man might find himself in this position that two countries claim him at the same time. Until 1870 Great Britain proceeded on the assumption that no man could cast aside his nationality, that he might go and get naturalization as he liked anywhere in the world, and yet Great Britain said you are still a British subject. It was not until 1870 and by the first of the conventions with the United States on the subject that Great Britain recognized the possibility of a man throwing off his citizenship and his allegiance. I understand there are still countries—I do not want to specify them, although I do not think I am mistaken; I have present in my mind one at least—I am certainly under the very strong impression that there are countries to-day that adhere to that doctrine, and so long as any country adheres to that doctrine there is no legislative provision in the world that the Parliament of the United Kingdom or the Parliament of Canada or any other parliament could make that would make that man be recognized in that country as a British subject. We might or might not determine, or the United Kingdom might determine, whether we would take the position that he was by virtue of his naturalization a British subject and therefore whether we would take upon ourselves to dispute the matter with that other country that had a claim to his allegiance, but at present I have not considered the question whether—

Mr. McKENZIE: What I meant was this. We state in our legislation to-day that we do not regard the person as a British subject at all when he is within his native country. We do not regard him as having ever been a British subject. What I want to bring to the notice of the hon. minister is, would we recognize a party that would be naturalized under our law as entitled to the rights and privileges of a British subject even if he was within the bounds of the country of his nativity. If he was in distress would we regard him as one of ourselves?

Mr. DOHERTY: That limitation in our Act was copied from the limitation in the Act of the United Kingdom and I have no doubt that the purpose of that was to make clear that the United Kingdom was not undertaking that if a citizen of any country became naturalized in the United Kingdom, and that under the law of the country he came from his naturalization was not recognized, she would undertake to assert for him as against his original country, while he was in his original country, his British citizenship. Some such provision had to be made, because there are cases where it is impossible to bring about the result that a man is not a citizen of two countries, of course taking it from the point of view of each country. And so long as there is a country which refuses to recognize the possibility of a man throwing off his allegiance, the position will remain where it will not be possible for any other country to legislate him out of that allegiance if he chooses to go back to the country which claims that allegiance. As to whether Great Britain, or the Empire, or Canada, should undertake or not to fight it out with the country of a man's original allegiance is a matter I would not like to pronounce an opinion on offhand; very much would depend upon the circumstances and conditions. When the question arose as between Great Britain and the United States—Great Britain standing on the doctrine that a man who was once a subject was always a subject, and therefore that if a man naturalized as a United States citizen who might go back to the United Kingdom should be guilty of any acts of rebellion he was guilty of high treason as a subject, and the United States taking the ground that it was the inalienable right of a man, of his own volition, to throw off his allegiance when he left his native country and went to another, and insisting that the people they had naturalized should be recognized in the United Kingdom as being American citizens then, the only method by which that difficulty could be solved was by a treaty between the two countries. No law that the United States could make could have altered that situation and equally on the other hand no law that Great Britain could make could alter it. The question of what the state of our naturalized man would be when he goes to some other country that under its law claims his allegiance will always depend on what the law of that country is or what arrangement may be made between the Empire and the country which that man has entered. That very question is dealt with in an explanatory memorandum by Mr. Chalmers in the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee of 1908. It says:—

> English law cannot of course operate beyond His Majesty's dominions, and, however wide the words of a statute may be, it is always to be considered, if possible, as not contemplating any infringement of international law, or affecting the status of foreigners outside the British dominions. Each country must legislate for its own subjects. It follows, therefore, that a person who, according to English law is a British subject, may, according to the law of some foreign states, be also a subject of that state, and this, theoretically, gives rise to many legal complications. For example, the son of French parents born in England is, according to English law, an English subject, while according to the law of France, he is a French subject. English law in the main regards the place of birth, while the laws of most foreign countries look rather to the nationality of the father. English law is founded on the feudal principle of allegiance, while foreign law for the most part is founded on the Roman principle of citizenship determined by descent. But, as Mr. Hall points out, not much practical difficulty arises except through the performance of certain kinds of voluntary acts by the individual in doing which he would follow the law of the country which he preferred; his nationality would only come into play if he stood in need of protection, or if a demand were made for his extradition. It is, however, obviously convenient that future legislation should, where possible, avoid the creation of double nationality.

So far as legislation by one country goes, the most we can do is to endeavour to avoid the creation of double nationality, the rest must be left to convention between the different countries. I think I have put the hon. gentleman who made the motion, and the House, in possession of substantially all the information which I am possessed of bearing on this question. I think I may claim that very considerable progress has been made in the matter and I think I may further claim that the events which led to the delay, namely, our contention that it should be made perfectly clear that we were not prepared to consent to anything that would diminish in the slightest degree the full right of control conferred upon Canada by the British North America Act over this matter of naturalization, fully justified us taking due time for that discussion, I think it is a matter of congratulation that the home authorities should have seen their way to agree to the legislation being so enacted as to perfectly protect our position in that regard. I do not want to be understood as saying that there was any question of the home authorities admitting that they could not legislate; it did not become necessary to discuss that, because as one of the speakers said at the conference: whether the Imperial Parliament could or could not legislate upon the subject and make that legislation effective in Canada they did not purpose doing so. We have got to a position where we can get the desired result and get it in such a method that no question arises at all of encroachment upon Canada's fullest power of control of the subject of naturalization giving to the terms of the British North America Act the widest possible sense of which they are susceptible.

Motion agreed to.

Duchemin in regard to the same; also a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Chisholm (Inverness).

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams between the hon. Postmaster General or the Post Office Department and any person or persons relative to the dismissal or request therefor of D. A. Redmond, until recently postmaster at Brinston, Ontario.—Mr. Graham.

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, &c., concerning the application by James McKelvey, of the town of Sarnia, Ontario, for Fenian Raid volunteer bounty.—Mr. Pardee.

For a copy of all letters, petitions, telegrams, complaints, evidence, reports and other papers and documents in the possession of the Department of Railways and Canals or any department of the Government relating to the dismissal of A. J. Wilkinson, at Mulgrave, N.S., and if there was an investigation, the names of all witnesses examined and a detailed statement of the expenses of such investigation.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Arthur Talbot, late postmaster at Robertville, county of Megantic, province of Quebec.—Mr. Pacaud.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, complaints, petitions or other documents of any kind received by the Government or any member or official thereof relating to the conduct of J. Morgan, one time postmaster of the village of Ailsa Craig, Ontario, as such, and relating to an investigation into said conduct.—Mr. Ross.

For a copy of all diaries and other documents relating to and showing the work performed during the months of June and July, 1912, by homestead inspectors Brandt, Balfour, Ouellette and Sipes, in the Regina land district.—Mr. Martin.

For a return showing the expenses of homestead inspectors Brandt, Balfour, Ouellette and Sipes during the months of June and July, 1912.—Mr. Martin.

At six o'clock House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, January 30, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ended March 31, 1912, Part I.—Mr. Foster.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TURRIFF moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 104, to amend an Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, chapter 1 of the Acts of 1881. He said: It will be remembered that some years ago the Government took steps to ascertain the cost of construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, and whether the time had arrived when the company should receive the benefit of section 20 of schedule A of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act. The company represented to the then Minister of Justice that it would be a long and expensive matter for them to prepare a statement as to the cost of the road, and that they were quite willing to forego any advantages or rights to which they might be entitled under that section, and to put themselves unreservedly into the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners under the same conditions as those that applied to any other Canadian railway company. The Government agreed to let the matter drop, and it has thus remained ever since. Ten years from now, or even twenty, the railway company might come forward and state that that was merely a letter written by an officer of the company without any authority, and that they did not propose to stand by it. The object I have in view, therefore, is simply to repeal section 20 of schedule A of the Canadian Pacific Railway Incorporation Act, which, I understand, will place the company in the identical position in which they have voluntarily placed themselves.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BONAVENTURE CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Minister of Agriculture been requested to ascertain what became of the cheques issued by his department to certain census enumerators of Bonaventure county in August or September, 1911, and which never reached the parties they were intended for?

2. If this has not yet been done, does the minister intend holding such an investigation as will reveal full knowledge on this point?

Mr. FOSTER:

1. A communication was addressed to the Minister of Agriculture on June 17, 1912, calling attention to the fact that many of the census enumerators in Bonaventure county had not been paid in full the amount due them for their work, and asking what had been done. The facts are these: The census branch was notified in March that certain enumerators complained that they had received cheques for balance of account only and not principal. This led to the discovery that the first cheques sent to the enumerators in question in September, 1911, had not been received. The Post Office Department was immediately requested to trace the missing cheques, which they were unable to do. Bonds of indemnity were then required to enable duplicate cheques to be issued. After a delay owing to inaccuracies in drawing some of the bonds, duplicate cheques were issued. As the bonds were corrected duplicate cheques were issued, the last being forwarded in September last year.

2. Under the circumstances, an investigation does not seem to be necessary.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—COUNTRY HARBOUR BRANCH.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

Has a survey been made for the proposed railway route between Country Harbour, Guysborough county, through the South River Valley, connecting with the Intercolonial? If so, has report been made thereon?

Mr. COCHRANE: The department has no knowledge of any such survey having been made.

MEDICINE HAT MAIL DELIVERY.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has the Post Office Department been asked to establish a street delivery of mail in the city of Medicine Hat, Alberta?

2. If so, when will the service be established?

Mr. PELLETIER: Instructions were issued on the 28th instant, to put street letter carrier service into operation at Medicine Hat. It is not possible to give the exact date on which the service will go into operation, but it will without doubt be within the next week or ten days.

PARLIAMENTARY DRINKING WATER.

*Mr. EDWARDS:

What provision, if any, is made for supplying members and employees of the House of Commons with pure drinking water?

Mr. ROGERS: The Commons and Senate are supplied with pure sterilized drinking water from a Forbes sterilizer located on the third flat of the main building. The water is brought from tanks to the filter, then through a Forbes sterilizer, which operates on the boiling principle. It is then passed through coils of galvanized metal tubing, through an iced chamber under the sterilizer, to seven taps distributed throughout the building as follows: two in the Commons Chamber, on each of which is a filter; one outside the west door of the Chamber, where there is a cooler; one in room 16; and three in the different corridors, one on each flat. The above-mentioned storage tanks contain a reserve supply of about one thousand gallons, and, as the water stands in the tanks for some little time before being filtered, there is no sediment going into the filter. These taps are steam-cleaned once a month; while the filters are cleaned twice a week, by reversing the water through them. The water supply is examined once a week by Dr. C. H. Higgins, pathologist of the Department of Agriculture, and his reports show that the supply of water passing through these filters has never been contaminated; and, during the recent civic investigation, the statement was made by Dr. Higgins in his examination that the Parliament buildings had the best water in the city, owing to the sterilizing plant. At the present time, the Forbes sterilizer of the Senate is out of order; therefore they are supplied from the one in the House of Commons. Tanks for drinking purposes are placed in seven different places throughout the House of Commons building. These tanks are divided into two compartments, one for drinking water, and the other for ice; so that the water, after being sterilized, may not again become contaminated by the addition of impure ice. In this connection, I wish to direct attention to the fact that in the drinking tanks we have supplied, there is in each two taps, one for drawing off the melted water of the ice, which must be disposed of as it accumulates, and the other for drinking purposes. That from the ice is necessarily impure, as it has not been sterilized, but notwithstanding that, some members and employees persist in drinking it instead of the pure water, presumably because it is cooler than the other; those who do so run great risk from it, but have only themselves to blame. My attention has been drawn to the fact that in the different members' rooms are water pitchers, which are filled with ice and water. The water is sterilized, but by the ice being put into it, it again becomes more or less contaminated. I desire to draw the attention of the members to this, and to suggest that they refrain from using ice in the water pitchers in their rooms.

LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina):

1. Has the Government, or any member thereof, received any representations from the letter carriers of Canada asking for an eight hour day?

2. Has any representations been made with respect to placing a limitation on the weight of mail to be carried by a letter carrier, his rate of pay, and with respect to conditions generally affecting this class of Government employees?

3. Has the Government dealt with any of the matters referred to in questions 1 and 2? If so, with what results?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Favourable consideration has already been given to the eight hour day request, and to the question of placing a limitation on the weight of mail. The other matters referred to are before the department, and their consideration is connected with the enormous increase asked by the tramway companies for the transportation of the letter carriers.

CITY POST OFFICE CLERKS.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina):

1. Has the Government, or any member thereof, received any representations asking for amendments to the Civil Service Act providing for the abolishment of present classifications of clerks in the city post offices, and substituting therefor two classes to be known as clerks and supervisors?

2. Has the Government received any representations asking for a general increase in the salaries paid to clerks in the city post offices?

3. Will any legislation in regard to the matters referred to in questions 1 and 2 be introduced at this session of Parliament?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1 and 3. Yes. The question has not yet been considered.

2. There was a general increase on the 1st of April last, amounting to about $250,000 a year.

CANADA GRAIN ACT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. KNOWLES : Could the Minister of Trade and Commerce answer my question of the other day, whether in the amendments which he proposes making to the Canada Grain Act, he will provide for the establishment of sample markets at places other than those now permitted, and the appointment of a survey board at other places ?

Mr. FOSTER : I shall have to ask my hon. friend to wait until to-morrow.

RADIOTELEGRAPHY.

Mr. HAZEN moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, respecting Radiotelegraphy. He said: This Bill, which I explained on the first reading, has been allowed to stand in order that the different interests concerned might have an opportunity of making representations upon it. Such representations have been made, and I am now asking to have the Bill read a second time in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries, which seems to be particularly qualified to deal with it, in order that these interests may make their views known and in order that we may have the advantage of the close attention which can be given to the Bill in that committee. The shipping interests of Canada will meet here next week, and I have thought that they should have an opportunity of appearing before a committee of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX : I have no observations to make on this Bill except to commend it. Has Canada adhered to the convention upon radiotelegraphy ?

Mr. HAZEN : Yes.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Consideration of the motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance) for second reading of Bill No. 36, respecting Banks and Banking, resumed from January 28.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland): The important matter involved in this Bill is now, and has been for a number of years in Canada, of very widespread interest, as is evidenced by the agitation on the platform, in this House, and in the press of the country with respect to it. That it has not been earlier discussed by Parliament is due to circumstances which are well known, not only to the members of this House, but to the people of the country at large. I am sure that we must all recognize its importance apart from the fact that it has such general discussion. It is not my purpose, to go into a comparison between the banking system of Canada and the banking systems of other countries. I shall leave that to others who are more competent. I have listened to the discussion that has taken place so far with the greatest possible interest. I am sure that we all appreciate the admirable speech —I call it a speech, but it was a treatise on the subject of the banking conditions which prevail in Canada—of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). It was suggestive, as a statement of the conditions not merely in Canada, but elsewhere, and of reforms—which, in the judgment of the hon. member, should be very seriously taken into consideration by the House. I shall not comment upon the radical nature of some of the hon. gentleman's suggestions. I shall content myself with saying that in my judgment very many of them are worthy of the most serious consideration. In addition to that address we listened to a very careful and accurate statement on the subject of banking conditions in Canada from my hon. friend the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), and I am sure that some of the propositions which he brought to the notice of the House should have our fullest consideration. Certainly they are such as are having, and have had for many years, the earnest consideration of the people of Canada. We also listened, I am sure with great attention, to the able speech of my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). With a daring and courage which I commend, under the circumstances, he placed before this House suggestions which, if they do not receive here, the consideration that is their due, will, I feel sure, receive it in the country. Why do I use the word 'courage'? I lay it down, without regard to political affiliations or the complexities of partyism, that it requires courage on the part of any hon. member to stand up in this Chamber and fully and comprehensively discuss this question in the way he would discuss it in private or in his business relations. When these difficulties are complicated by circumstances which require a member of this House to have consideration not only for the requirements of the country but for the restraints and exigencies of party government, I think the hon. member who has that courage is entitled to commendation. My hon. friend from West Middlesex in presenting his views, did not run counter to the views of those with whom he is associated; but my hon. friend from North Ontario did run counter to the views expressed by those with whom he is politically associated, and for whom he has the highest regard and the warmest feelings of personal and political friendship. The difficulties that my hon. friend had to face have been evidenced in this House since that speech was delivered. In making his statement he received the support and plaudits of many around him, but since that night there have apparently been many changes, and the necessity of courage and daring has been exemplified by the attitude of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I am not complaining of that attitude, which has been buttressed by the very strong statements of the right hon. leader of the House.

I do not propose to follow the part played by the hon. member to whom I have referred. He dealt very fully and comprehensively with the objections found in the proposed legislation. In many of those criticisms and objections I heartily concur. I do not propose to condemn in toto the banking system of Canada. I shall rather deal with the question from the standpoint of the atmosphere which surrounds the financial and banking conditions in Canada to-day. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) delivered a very able and comprehensive speech; indeed, I thought it fully met the expectations and demands of the hon. member for South York in one particular at least. My hon. friend from South York laid it down that what this country most needs, before we deal with the details of this Bill, is a monetary commission such as they had in operation about three years ago in the Republic to the south of us. He earnestly contended that there was in Canada to-day a want of information with respect to the inner workings of our banking system. He demonstrated, I think, with much force and fairness, the fact that there was an ignorance prevailing throughout Canada as to the internal workings and management of the banks. This, he pointed out, should be brought to the attention of the general public, should be inquired into, in order that the people—indeed that the members of this House—might be better informed than they are with respect to the matters involved in this Bill. But, after the speech of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), I had almost concluded that the aim of my hon. friend from South York had been accomplished. The hon. member for North Simcoe gave us the details not merely of the banking system in Canada but in every other country with such vividness and force that I came to the conclusion that we might perhaps drop the contention of my hon. friend from South York and lay aside the question of a monetary commission.

I said that I would deal with the atmosphere rather than with the details of this Bill. I think it can very well be dealt with on this motion because the subject is one that is so far-reaching and affects so many interests in the country that it is well, before we can reach the point of considering this Bill section by section, that we should have an understanding as to the circumstances and environment as they prevail in Canada in connection with the whole system of banking and the powers we grant to great corporations. I start out with this proposition, that the Bank Act, as it has been on the statute-book for the past decade, has resulted in the creation of the most powerful monopoly that exists in Canada to-day. Not only is it powerful, but there is no greater nor more tyrannical combine. Tyranny is breathed in every paragraph of the Bill under consideration. The Canadian Bankers' Association are not as most other associations. They have powers that no other body in this country has in matters of trade within their jurisdiction. They have powers which are autocratic in themselves and in their exercise. They are supreme. In a case of failure or bankruptcy, in the ordinary course of life and business, whether it is industrial or mercantile, the creditors have something to say as to who shall have a voice in the winding up of the bankrupt concern. But, in the case of a bank which has got into financial difficulties, the Bankers' Association can walk right in, take charge of the bank and its affairs regardless of the shareholders, the depositors or anybody connected with the institution. That is a power that is autocratic, and it is not always exercised in the interests of the shareholders or particularly in the interests of the depositors who are the creditors of the institution. They can take charge of a defunct or suspended bank, control its assets, appoint their own curator and do what they wish with the assets without reference to the banks creditors and shareholders. That statement, I am sure, is incontrovertible and such a condition gives to the Bankers' Association a despotic power. There is a very great question as to whether there should not be some limitation to that despotism. I know there are some who can defend it and defend it with a great many good reasons. Despotic government can be defended for like reasons. Autocracy in government can be defended. It all depends upon the autocrat and the despot. It has been claimed that despotic governments have been signally successful in comparison with more democratic governments. I do not know that any of us would wish to subscribe to the theory that, because, under certain circumstances despotism has been successful, we should therefore wish to adopt it. The Canadian banking system has served a very excellent purpose and, I would say frankly, it has contributed very materially to the advancement of the business interests of Canada. But, I will not admit, because I could not in truth admit, that it is a perfect system and that we should not apply the remedy where defects are seen. To accept conditions as they are because they have existed for many decades in Canada is not sound or good reasoning. To say that it has worked measurably well is no reason for this Parliament saying that there is no use in attempting to improve it; that we cannot safeguard the interests of the people, because it has worked well in many instances in the past. My hon friend from North Ontario voiced not only the sentiments of the people in regard to the conditions prevailing in our banking system, but of a great many people with respect to the powers that are enjoyed by very many of the great corporations in Canada. Do we realize how confined as to individuals are the forces which govern the financial institutions of this country? Have we stopped to think and to count the number of men in Canada who control not only the banking system, but the insurance companies, the loan companies, the trust companies and the mortgage companies of Canada? Has it been brought to the notice of this Parliament that Canada to-day is controlled, in so far as its financial interests are concerned, by less than fifty men? I was much interested recently in reading an article with respect to this condition of things. We all know that in the United States the number of men who control—I shall not say govern—the financial interests and the great corporation interests, can be counted on the fingers of my two hands. The Rockefellers, the Morgans, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds and a few others comprise the men who are the directive forces of all the great corporations in the United States. In elaborating that idea, I cannot do better than read some extracts from a book which was recently sent me by the president of one of our Canadian universities. The book has relation to the conditions which prevail in the United States; and points out the dangers and the menace in the trend of legislation in that country, in regard to the control of its business and financial interests. I read it with interest, and I deem it to be sensible and to the point. I think I can afford to ask this House to listen to some brief extracts from the opening chapters of that book. The author, in speaking of the social order and the conditions which have prevailed in the United States for the past ten years, says:

> Most of us were eager to get the better of our fellows by seizing some advantage which the rest could not get. Our vast continent offered unrivalled chances for this great American game. But at last we have begun to realize that some have played the game according to the accepted rules, but with unexpected effectiveness. The natural resources of this country are passing into the control of a minority. An ever increasing number of people are henceforth to live in a land owned by an ever decreasing number. The means of traffic are the arteries of the social body; every freight car is a blood corpuscle charged with life. We have allowed private persons to put their thumbs where they can constrict the life blood of the nation at will. The common people have financed the industry of the country with their savings, but the control of industry has passed out of their hands completely. The profits of our common work are absorbed by a limited group; the mass of the people are permanently reduced to wage earning positions. The cost of living has been raised by unseen hands, until several millions of our nation are unable to earn even the bare minimum which social science declares necessary for health and decency, and all families living on a fixed income have felt a mysterious and suffocating pressure.

The learned writer goes on to say:

> All this was the necessary outcome of our economic system; but it was a sore surprise to most of us when the process began to culminate and we saw the end of our own doings.

I have read that with the idea of emphasising conditions which exist and which have existed for the past decade in the United States, and with a view of pointing out that the operations which have resulted from the system prevailing in the United States, are sufficient to demonstrate to us that the same forces, the same dominating influences in Canada, are a menace to the great masses of the people. There is lurking in every section and paragraph of this Bill the atmosphere of that menace. While those influences in the United States are limited to say ten men as controlling the great financial interests of that country, we in Canada have the condition of practically twenty-three men controlling the great corporate interests, the financial institutions, the insurance companies and the trust and loan companies of the country. These men do not own all the stock; but they are the directing forces on the boards of directors: they are the influences that move and control at will the great body of people who are in any way interested in those corporations, whether financial, industrial, or insurance. In the information, which was brought to my notice, and which I shall presume to impart to the House in order to have it placed on 'Hansard,' I read that a certain gentleman, whose name is not important, compiled a list of companies, whose capitalization—bonds and stocks—reaches or exceeds $500,000, including a few insurance companies of smaller capitalization, because of the magnitude of their funds available for investment; and he discovered that the directors who are common to the 121 leading Canadian corporations can be sifted down to forty-eight, all residents in Canada, with the single exception of Lord Strathcona. Of these 121 corporations, eight are operating outside of Canada. The 48 directors are on the boards of at least three companies of the 121. The same inquirer found further, that at the bottom of the whole economic structure in Canada were 23 capitalist directors who are members of 90 out of the total 121 corporations. In other words, these twenty-three men are the directive forces in practically all of Canada's economic life. Out of the twenty three, nine reside in Toronto —Toronto the Good ! thirteen in Montreal —Montreal the Bad ! and one in England. He gave a table which shows the total number of directorships held by each one and the distribution of their directorships in different fields, transportation, industrial and financial, as well as the total capitalization and assets of the companies in which each is interested. This House at this moment is not interested in that table, and I will not encumber 'Hansard' with the recital of what it contains. Reference is then made to a chart designed to illustrate the situation. Each group is represented by a circle, the size of which is said to be roughly determined by the capitalization of each. This chart shows that twenty-five of the forty-eight directors are common to each of the three classes, constituting the financial group, that only four are common to the four classes of the industrials, and that four also are common to both classes of the transportation group. The relation of each group to the others is shown by the 'interlocking' of the circles which indicate that one director is common to the financial and industrial groups, two are common to the financial and transportation groups, and the two also are common to the transportation and industrial groups. But this 'interlocking' reveals one other very interesting point, the number of directors common to the three groups, financial, industrial and transportation. This number is twenty-three, as has been stated before. It is represented in the chart which the writer gives, but which I do not presume to place before the House. But it shows that there is a Canadian financial triangle which is of serious importance to the condition of the great masses of the people of this country. In Canada, the concentration of capital has developed to a very large extent. This is in conformity with the world-wide movement of corporate activities. We need not, therefore, be startled when we learn that the base of the economic structure of Canada is to be found in a triangular formation consisting of twenty-three capitalist-financiers upon whom depend in a very large measure the type and direction of material prosperity.

Now, Sir, these facts, which can be tested by the returns of corporations of the several classes—certainly are sufficient to alarm even this House in respect to many of the provisions which are contained in this Bill. I am free to say that, in the struggle which is going on between the corporate interests and the people of this country, I am on the side of the under dog; and I recognize that the people of Canada constitute the under dog in this struggle. I recognize also that one of the vital, potent forces in that struggle is the banking interest of Canada.

In the consideration of this Bill I wish to lay down what I deem to be an axiom, one that should be followed and observed in the interpretation of every paragraph contained in the Bill. I hold that where a public concession is given on which a business is more or less grounded, compensation to the public should be rendered and public supervision should be exercised. And I propose to discuss this Bill from that standpoint of principle. I believe also—in fact it is a truism—that power unrestrained tends to tyranny. I am willing that the Bankers' Association of Canada—aye, even the bankers of Canada and the banking system of Canada—shall exercise their great powers in the life of this country. I believe that in so doing they will only be acting in the interest of those who are interested in banking—the business community at large. But I hold that that power should be restricted in the interests of the masses of the people. I would therefore seek to discuss this Bill from that standpoint—that while I am willing they shall have great power, I shall insist that in the exercise of these powers there shall be a restraining influence that will, measurably at least, prevent abuses and safeguard the general interest. We cannot be too vigilant with respect to this measure. Eternal vigilance is not only the price of liberty, it is the price of everything else; and the people who allow their liberties to drift into the hands of the 'strong man' get what they deserve. The history of the United States has demonstrated this, to a degree which I hope will never be attained in Canada. My point in bringing to the notice of the House some of the exceptions I make to this Bill is my desire to have exercised, in the framing of the different powers, a restricting influence which, may be vigilantly exercised in order to preserve to the people of the country and to the business interests of this land the liberty which should be theirs. If that vigilance is not exercised the price would be too great for them to pay.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who may not be in accord with the views

I express, was charged, when he came into this Parliament, as coming here under the ægis of the strong man in Canada; with a mandate from the big Canadian interests to do their will in so far as it was possible for him to do so in the Parliament of Canada. I have witnessed the course and conduct of my hon. friend since he took his seat in this House, and when these statements were made with respect to his position I am bound to say I doubted the wisdom of their acceptance as being the truth. The very countenance of my hon. friend dispels suspicion, and his genial smile and courteous attitude on the floor of this House are such as to beget confidence—I speak with regard to the conduct of my hon. friend since he came into this House—and I accepted his statement when he repudiated such an insinuation as I have referred to. But sometimes there is in my mind a revival of the doubt which was openly expressed by others. I am bound to say that in his treatment of this Bill that doubt has arisen, and particularly so as pertaining to the course matters have taken since the Minister of Finance moved the second reading of this Bill. Many of my hon. friends opposite applauded the remarks of the hon. member for North Ontario and I realized then that the utterances of that hon. gentleman were finding a lodgement in the hearts and minds of many gentlemen opposite, as they found lodgement in mine. But there are some indications of a suppression of that zeal which should be exercised in the interests of the shareholders, the depositors, and the people at large, and if there were no room for doubt in respect of the attitude of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, I need only turn to my right hon. friend the leader of the House and review his verbal utterances, not merely in themselves, but considering also the tone and spirit with which he made them. It is not a matter incumbent upon me to criticise the intentions of any hon. member, and I have no such desire, but I do say that no member of this House can sit here and watch the trend of events without realizing that there are, at times, influences at work which bring about strange conditions. I have sat in the Parliament of Canada for—I have forgotten how long; the years have been too many, I admit. But I have observed that not merely this year, not merely last year, but through all the years during which I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House, the trend of legislation has been in favour of the corporate interests of the country. No hon. gentleman can sit as a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee or the Railway Committee of this House, —sitting after sitting, year after year, and session after session—without realizing that there are forces working with a view to the control by a very few of the great transportation and financial interests of the country. I sat only yesterday with the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I witnessed another attempt—as I have witnessed on many an occasion the attempts not in the interests of the people—for the enlargement of power and for the creation of forces that will tend to benefit special interests, and not the interests of the great masses of the people. That spirit, Mr. Speaker, is not confined to your right or to your left; it is wide-spread and general. I venture to make the statement that the great transportation interests, the great banking interests and the great industrial interests of this country have no party politics; they enter the door whether it is open or shut, and they care not whether that door is to your right, Mr. Speaker, or to your left. These facts and conditions should certainly demonstrate to us the fact that here is need for vigilance in dealing with the matter now engaging our attention.

In listening, as I have said, to the discussion which has thus far taken place on this subject, I have found that three features of the Bill have been particularly criticised. The greatest criticism has been made with respect to inspection; another one of adverse comment was with regard to the safeguards that are not applied, but which should be applied in this Bill, in the interests of the depositors. There has not been so much said with respect to the interests of the shareholders, only in so far as is concerned the inferential statement regarding the demand for a more perfect method of examination and inspection. The hon. member for North Ontario favoured smaller banking institutions, and emphasized very strongly the necessity of government inspection, showing wherein the attention of the Government might well be directed towards an attempt to further improve the banking system of Canada. My hon. friend did it on the invitation of the Finance Minister himself, and any suggestions which I may offer I will offer first because it is my right and privilege as a member of this House to do so, but also because my hon. friend particularly invited suggestions. I am not criticising the Bill simply from a desire to criticise. We are all in the same position. My hon. friend from North Simcoe is always in a happy frame of mind but he is in a very happy state, because he does not owe any Bank anything and therefore he can say what many cannot, that he is absolutely independent and he rather wished us to believe that he or any man who did owe the banks would be under a restraint in the expression of his opinions. My hon. friend inferentially and by implication gave utterance to a truth. I know how powerful the banking interests of Canada are, we all know that these influences are wide-spreading, that they are forceful—I hope that they are not vengeful, but whether they are or not, I do owe banks and have had business interests with banks and hope to continue doing so, but in having business relations with them I do not suppress my manhood and do not place myself in a position whereby I cannot exercise my duty conscientiously and fearlessly as a member of the House and a representative of the county which did me the honour to send me here. The criticisms which I shall make, are made, as I believe, not only in the interests of the people but of the banks themselves.

The minister has proposed to afford by this measure a system of audit. He is pleased to term it an external audit, he is pleased to refer to it, if not in direct words, by inference as an examination from the outside. In bringing in that provision he admits that there has been in Canada and is today a demand on the part of the people that there shall be some sort of external examination of the affairs of the banking institutions of this country. As has been said, the newspapers, irrespective of party, especially during the exposure of the horrible revelations with respect to the Farmers' Bank, have been demanding Government inspection, they were unanimous in the demand for an improved audit or examination. But I have not seen in the press or heard in this House during the past few months of any very great demand for an external examination. One newspaper writer has aptly criticised the proposed audit by an epigram. He says that the Finance Minister proposed to have an outside audit by an inside auditor, and that was the meaning of the amendment which he is offering. On the first reading I asked the minister if his proposition did not practically mean that his method of selection of the outside auditor or the auditor of the shareholders would result in the views and interests not merely of the directors but of the managers of the banks prevailing, and we know that that would be the practical effect. In theory it would be very nice indeed but we know that at annual bank meetings the slate of the board of directors is made out beforehand, that everything has been cut and dried, that proxies have been secured to enable the board of directors or the bank managers and its officers to do just what they please and select whom they please to sit on the board. This proposal would result in placing in the hands of the directors the appointment of an outside auditor. I do not insinuate or think that they would not act conscientiously and honestly in it, but the matter should be so arranged that in the appointment of that auditor or examiner there shall be no interest that could be in any way influenced one way or the other with regard to it. The answer of the Minister of Finance and of the right hon. the Prime Minister is that this Government inspection which has been proposed would be ineffectual and illusive. There would be a false sense of security on the part of the public and shareholders, and it would lessen the sense of responsibility in directors. Now, Sir, if that were true, there would be much force in the objection taken by my hon. friend. But I hold that it would not so work out. Why, that principle is incorporated in all government operations of this country. With respect to our Pure Food Act, an inspector is appointed. With respect to our steam boats which ply on our Great Lakes and round our coasts, an inspection is required. Does it create a false sense of security to have inspectors in every direction under government control? Why, Mr. Speaker, it seems so utterly absurd that it carries with it its own refutation. In the matter of our agricultural interests it is necessary to have government inspectors going through the country in connection with our fruit growing, our cereals, and every branch of government operation. Does it create a false sense of security, and do the people lie down and take no safeguards in their own interests? No, Mr. Speaker. I have before me a book written by a very eminent banker, Mr. H. C. McLeod, formerly general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, if I am not mistaken a banker of very high reputation who enjoyed the confidence of that great institution, and whose words I think are entitled to very serious consideration. He said on page 11:

Prior to the crisis of 1893 the audit of banks in Australia seems to have been provided for in the Acts of incorporation of the several banks, yet in 1896 the Government of Victoria enacted an amendment to the Companies Act, under which the banks were operating, making an audit compulsory by auditors whose qualifications are set out in the Act. This Act is an emphatic expression of opinion of those most capable of judging of the causes of the disaster; just as the audit of banks, which became universal in Great Britain after the City of Glasgow Bank failure, was an expression of the view of British bankers on the necessity for an external audit. Of course, banks in Great Britain and Australia have their departments for internal inspection, but experience in these countries has shown that an additional protection is essential, just as Canadian experience has demonstrated that fabricated balance sheets will occasionally appear so long as there is no proper supervision of the general management and of the direction. Auditing from the outside has had the same salutary effect in Great Britain under the branch banking system that government examination has had in the United States, where banks are not permitted to have branches.

It is said that there have been proportionately more failures in the United States, where they have a government inspection, than there have been here. I do not think that statement is in accord with the fact. In 1906 Mr. McLeod called attention to bank failures in Canada which were 25 per cent in number within the preceding 25 years, while in the United States, even an imperfect system of examination had reduced failures to 5 per cent. The article, although generally commended by the public, called forth criticism by some bankers opposed to external examination.

Now, why is it that the bank managers and the banking interests of this country oppose an external examination by the Government? I think that question is pregnant with thought. It is a very important question and one that should be properly answered. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, if he has not stood up straight has stooped down and arrayed himself along side of them in the matter of opposing an external inspection for the reason that he is not willing that the Government should appoint, apart from the banking interests altogether, an inspector. I certainly think that my hon. friend should answer the question. It may be that he has a satisfactory answer in his mind, but if he has, he should let the House and the country know why they are opposed to it. Surely if the banking interests in this country are being conducted as they should be, and as I think as a rule they are, it would do no harm. There is no question with respect to some of the banks of this country. I look upon the Bank of Montreal as one of the greatest banking institutions that we have, not only in Canada, but in the world, and what is more it has the confidence of the whole people. Reference has been made to the branching out of several of the banking institutions in this country by the establishment of branches here, there and everywhere throughout the several provinces. In eastern Canada it is recognized that many banks have established branches for one purpose, to gather up the earnings of the people, to centralize them at their head offices, either in Montreal or in Toronto, and then to operate with those funds here and there, in New York, or in the West, or wherever they can make the greatest profit in connection with the use of that money. The great object of these banking institutions in establishing branches was to secure those deposits. People were led to believe it on account of the fact that in times of stress, particularly in the autumn and early winter months business men in eastern Canada are, as a rule, unable to secure accommodation which they claim is their due. Many of them are left to slide over poor ground at a time when they need a little snow before their sleigh, and they are unable to get the accommodation necessary to meet the requirements of their business, and this makes it very difficult for them. I pay this compliment to the Bank of Montreal, and to one or two banking institutions in this country, that in so far as eastern Canada is concerned, they do safeguard, protect, and in every way cater to the requirements of their patrons in the matter of business necessities, even at a time when the money could be used to greater advantage in New York or in moving the crops in the West.

I have heard reference made to the fact that a very large rate of interest is charged in that section of Canada. Some banks in eastern Canada, and I have the evidence before me, are charging as high as twelve per cent and they are doing it in spite of the provisions to the contrary in the Bank Act, an ineffectual provision, I admit, a provision which, on its face, would seem to be operative but which in actual practice is impotent. My hon. friend has also said, with respect to this matter of inspection, that it would lessen the sense of responsibility of the directors. Surely my hon. friend is not very logical in that statement. Does it follow that because there might be a government inspector going into a bank occasionally, or at stated intervals, or unexpectedly, the sense of responsibility would be lessened in the mind of any one of the directors? There is one thing certain that the sense of responsibility would not be lessened in the president, cashier, or manager of the bank? It would be emphasized if there were an enforced examination on behalf of the Government and in the interests of the people. It would emphasize their sense of responsibility and they would have been more watchful had there been even a provision for outside inspection in the case of the Ontario bank. Then, the money would not have gone down to New York for stock speculation purposes. Had there been inspection in the case of all the other banks that have come to grief the results would not have been as disastrous as they were. It does not appear to me that there is a lessening of the sense of responsibility by a requirement in the Act enforcing inspection at frequent, or even, infrequent, intervals. Even if it were only once a year it would in itself have a salutary restraint upon the minds and actions of those who are responsible for the management of the bank.

My hon. friend has raised a point as to the difficulty of having an inspection of the branches and I quite appreciate the position which he has taken in that regard. I realize that it would be impracticable. But, in Scotland, where they have branches, they have such an inspection. I do not know any reason why we should not have an inspection at the head office because difficulties have arisen in connection with head offices. What do these branches amount to as a rule? Take a country branch anywhere throughout Canada and you will find that the manager of the branch has authority to loan but a very small sum without referring the matter to the head office either in Montreal or Toronto. Go and ask a bank manager in any of the towns and cities of the Maritime provinces for a loan of $5,000 and you will have to sign a statement and give the reasons why you want the money. You may be in a position to put down as collateral the best bonds that the country affords and yet the bank manager is compelled by the rules of the institution to submit the matter to the head office in Montreal or Toronto. That is a difficulty that business men feel throughout the country, it is a regulation that is in restraint of the business of the country and oftentimes men, rather than wait, have been compelled to go elsewhere and secure private loans at greater sacrifice than that which they would naturally make in connection with a loan from the bank. Therefore, it goes to prove that the difficulty connected with any bank that has gotten into trouble during the past twenty years has arisen, not because of the improper management of the branches, but by reason of the rottenness which prevails at the head office and which rottenness could have been discovered had there been an external audit. I am sure that my hon. friend and the Government are not taking into consideration the necessities of the country, the protection of creditors, shareholders and depositors, in refusing to grant this point which has been so ably urged by hon. members in this House since the beginning of the debate.

There are some other things that, to my mind, are anomalous. We grant great concessions to these banks in the matter of the issuance of their promises to pay. Their Bills and notes go broadcast throughout the country. To-day there is in circulation throughout Canada $110,000,000 of the notes of chartered banks. How much does the Government get from these institutions as compensation for the right and privilege under this Bill to issue their I. O. U's? After all, they are but the I. O. U's of these banks and it is a privilege which a very grateful and kindly disposed people, through their parliament have granted to these banking institutions. This country should in granting that privilege, require from these banks a return in the way of a percentage for the right at so much per thousand dollars or hundred thousand dollars. We all know of such a regulation in many foreign countries, particularly in Europe, and that there is a very great revenue derived by the Government from the granting of this franchise upon a commission basis on the amount thus issued. It seems to me that the Government should require the payment of a commission for this privilege.

There are two features particularly that I will invite the attention of the minister to and one is with respect to the banks engaging as landlords in violation of the Bank Act. We all know that in the bank statements, practically nothing is set forth as representative of the investments which those banks have made in their buildings, which have been constructed throughout the whole Dominion. We realize that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been thus invested, and that the amount stated in the annual statement which is furnished the Government is but a bagatelle in comparison with the real sum which the banks have invested and expended in these buildings. Take the banking institutions in the city of Ottawa, there is not a bank but has established not merely its central office in this city, but has branches throughout the whole city at every advantageous street corner, and hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent to that end. As has been stated, the banks generally acquire the very best corner; they make the price so high because they can afford to do it and have the money to buy it; they buy the site; they buy the best site; they locate and construct their banks to the injury of the other business interests of the place. If they do it, why do they not give a statement showing the actual amount thus invested? Banks are advertising day by day their great returns. I think I observed that the Merchants' Bank of Canada heralded it abroad the other day that it had earned last year nineteen per cent; the Bank of Nova Scotia advertised the fact that it had earned twenty-three per cent. Oh, but some say, this is not on the whole amount of money which they have in operation, it is only on their actual capital. What is the reserve but a part of the earnings, and accumulations practically of the earnings of the bank? My hon. friend from West Toronto complained that banks were not making enough, that the Dominion Bank had only made four per cent, if I understood him aright; yet the very next day I took up a Toronto paper which stated that the stock of the Dominion Bank had risen to 240, three points in one day. Poor decrepit institution, poor weak suckling, that required the aid and assistance of this Parliament lest some of those interested in it would go to the poor-house! The very fact, that there is hardly a bank stock in Canada to-day but sells at a premium above 100 per cent of its par value, demonstrates that the banking institutions of this country have been favourably dealt with by Parliament, by the conditions of the country, and that they should submit themselves now to the restraints which this Parliament in its wisdom should place upon them for the protection of those who have to do business with those banks. I am not so much concerned with the shareholders; they pay 240 or 250 for a bank stock; they know that it is subject to the double liability; they need none of the solicitude of members of this House, because they go right into the trap, if trap it be, with their eyes open. But the depositors, what of them? It does seem to me that it behooves this Parliament, during the progress of this Bill, to incorporate in it a provision whereby protection shall be afforded to the depositors. We did that some few years ago with respect to the noteholders. Why? Yet the Banking Act had been launched without that provision; for years our banking system was in operation and no such protection was afforded the noteholders. That provision has since then been operating, and we have many illustrations of the necessity of protection that should be afforded to the noteholders; but people say the bankers of the United States have been commenting very favourably on the banking system of Canada; the people of the United States, and many of the bankers there have been very flattering in their references to the Canadian system. They may be well deserved, but do you know the reason why? Because there are those who are interested in the banking institutions of the United States, who want to see adopted there a legislation which will accord to the banking systems of that country the privileges which we as a Canadian Parliament grant to the banking institutions of Canada. That is one of the reasons why they comment so favourably. People go on to say: Oh, it has been so good; it has worked so admirably during all these years; you should renew it, and you should not have any of these radical —as they call them—changes as are proposed. I venture to say the proposition to protect the noteholders was considered a radical change. It has not proved to be in any sense radical, but it has proved to be wise and beneficial legislation in the interests of the great masses of the people. I venture the prediction also that, if we were to have a provision in this Bill, and in the Act, when it finally merges into the status of an Act, whereby the depositors, these men who have so many millions placed in the banks receiving only 2½ per cent or three per cent on their deposits, would be safeguarded, I think it is but their right. If the Government of this country were to allow a larger rate of interest on deposits in the Government Savings Bank, there would be a very serious revolution in the matter of the business of the chartered banks in Canada. I make this statement on my own responsibility, that in addition to the legislation and the provisions of the legislation in Canada relating to banks, advantages have been given to these chartered banks in Canada by governments during all the years, in the matter of this allowance for interest, which measure up very largely to the advantages which are given by direct legislation. Why have not the Government of Canada given to the depositors in the Government Savings Banks a larger rate of interest? We have been paying as high as 3½ and 3¾ per cent interest, and on some occasions, I dare say, as high as 4 per cent, on loans that the Dominion has made in Europe; but we have been allowing our own people only 2½ and 3 per cent on the money they deposited in the Government Savings Banks. Why have not we increased the rate of interest? Simply because of the fact that the banking interests of this country were so powerful that the Government hesitated, to say the least, before taking that forward step. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance were to rise in his place to-night and announce to the country that the Government would increase the rate of interest on deposits in the Government Savings Banks of Canada, he would have the whole Bankers' Association here at daylight to-morrow morning with their protest; they would not send delegates, they would come in a body. It seems to me that a great many of the difficulties in connection with the banking system of Canada might be remedied if the Government would give a larger rate of interest on the money placed in its hands for safe-keeping.

I have said that the chartered banks should pay compensation for the privilege of issuing their bills. On the deposits which the banks make with the Government in connection with their right to issue their bills, the Government allow, as I understand 2½ per cent interest. But on the sums which the banks, in effect, borrow from the people at large through the issue of these bills, the banks get six, seven and eight and even as high as twelve per cent. It is from this source, in part, that they get the money with which they pay their dividends. They should pay something for the privilege they thus enjoy.

I have already touched upon the fact that the banks of Canada are to-day acting as landlords in direct violation of the provisions of the Bank Act. I have here a letter that I received from a gentleman in Charlottetown, which is, in part, as follows:

I have been much interested in reading a report in the Monetary Times, dated 28th December, in re the new Bank Act revision as introduced by the hon. the Minister of Finance; and as I noticed you had been taking part in the discussion, I am taking the liberty of calling your attention to the objection which can be raised to the matter of banks acting as landlords in connection with the buildings which they are constructing throughout the country. I know of instances where tenants have been solicited before the bank buildings were completed, thus coming into competition with private owners, although, as I claim, it is contrary to the Bank Act. It might work all right in larger cities where ground is limited and tenants many; but in a city like Charlottetown, where the population is stationary and the number of tenants limited, it becomes a hardship upon property owners who have erected buildings in the past for the accommodation of tenants.

In many of these small towns throughout the Maritime provinces, the banks have constructed buildings. These buildings generally contain rooms to be rented. These buildings have the best locations, and the banks that own them can fit them up nicely. In some instances they have depopulated buildings owned by private owners by attracting their tenants into the bank buildings. Now, that is in violation of the Bank Act, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance knows. But it is being done year in and year out, not merely in one province, but in all the provinces, not merely by one bank, but practically by all the banks. There is one bank which I have in mind which does not, I believe, adopt that policy. That bank believes that the building devoted to its own use should not be occupied by any other tenant, and it does not construct buildings to be rented. But we are told they are building skyscrapers in the city of Toronto. Out of what fund will the Dominion Bank, or the Bank of Hamilton, and others that have been named, build the twenty story buildings that we are told they are to build. And are the banks to be permitted, in violation of the law, to engage in competition with the owners of other buildings constructed in cities? It seems to me that those who are seeking for privileges and franchises through this Parliament should at least come to this Parliament able to declare that they have observed the restrictions placed upon them by the law as it stands.

The complaint is annually made, not merely here in Parliament, but throughout the country, that the shortage of money in certain seasons of the year for business purposes in Canada is due to the fact that our banking institutions go to New York and loan money on call, getting very much larger returns than they can secure by using that money anywhere in Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Surely, they do not do that. That would be sending money outside the Empire.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend knows that they have no politics, no Imperialism, no Canadianism, that in any way contracts their powers in this matter—that they go to New York, and Minneapolis, and Chicago, and even New Orleans.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that possible? I can hardly believe it.

Mr. STANFIELD: It must be pretty bad.

Mr. EMMERSON: I can well believe that my hon. friend opposite is not shocked. Of course, it is quite legitimate, it is quite right, for the banks thus to use their money, under the ægis of the Canadian Parliament, and with the privileges that have been granted to them—it is perfectly right for them to do this, because they are the 'strong man,' the 'big interests.' But no! It would not do for the farmer or the stock man to trade with the cities of the neighbouring republic. But when complaint is made with respect to this action on the part of the banks—as it has been made in this Parliament, and in the press throughout the country—the answer always is: havn't they the right to do it? Why should we restrict them? I do not intend to reply to the preachings and teachings of those who evidently thought it was a crime for our farmers, stonecutters, lumbermen and fishermen to engage in traffic with the United States. The banking institutions of this country were permitted to go into every hole and corner of the provinces of the Dominion gathering up and collecting the funds and savings of the farmers, wage-earners and fishermen, assembling them in the cities of Montreal and Toronto, and sending them down to New York. They have made twelve, fifteen and twenty per cent on call loans, whereas they have paid to those people only two and a half per cent interest on their deposits. The mere recital of these conditions should awaken this Parliament to the necessity of dealing with the matter so rigidly as to make the banking law not merely exclusive in its advantages to the mere few. I do not wish to unduly incite public opinion as against the banks of this country; I believe there is no particular banking institution in Canada at this moment which should be specially watched, and in this statement having regard to the twenty-five or twenty-six chartered banks in Canada to-day, I make no exceptions. But despite the fact that they are not at this moment open to suspicion; despite the fact that they are strong and powerful, and worthy of the confidence of the people of Canada, it behooves this Parliament to place restraints upon the management of these institutions as will protect, safeguard the interests of those who are compelled to do business with them. I affirm in all seriousness that we should provide for such a system of inspection as has been suggested in the course of the debate; that we should provide for efficient protection of the interests of the depositors; further if there is thought to be any doubt in the minds of the people as to the necessity of that course, I would say, as suggested by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), let us pause; let us meditate; let us obtain information; and in order to give us time for that purpose let us delay the passage of this Bill for two or three years, renew the charters of the banks and in the meantime appoint a monetary commission which would take into consideration the conditions prevailing with respect to banks not only in Canada, but in other countries.

I cannot leave this matter without first referring briefly to section 88 of this Bill. In the province of New Brunswick one of the greatest evils in connection with trade matters in the past was the system permitting of what is known as secret bills of sale. Under the original law, any man possessing property could give as security for a loan a secret bill of sale, and thereby protect friends or relatives, and the evils resulting from the use of secret bills of sale became so glaring that a remedy was applied by the New Brunswick Legislature. Under the Bills of Sale Act, if security is given on the strength of bills of sale, notice has to be filed in the county in which the property is situated. Under the provision of section 88, certain privileged persons were permitted to borrow from a bank say $500, giving a note, and, at the same time, give a secret lien to the bank, and then sell to a bona fide purchaser the property in respect to which the secret lien was given. The purchaser, in ignorance of the law, would utilize the property, and the bank, finding that the original creditor could not pay the money, enforced its claim against the then owner of the property. This procedure is as wrong in principle as it is in practice. Banking institutions should be run largely upon the reputation and credit of the individual, and their powers should be limited to taking security on assets which can be placed under the direct control of the bank. It is now proposed to extend this privilege to farmers and stock raisers; or, at any rate, the principle is to be extended to a wider range of individuals, without the necessity of any notice of the lien being given. The principle was bad enough as it was, and I am opposed to its being extended. I go farther, and say it will not inure to the advantage of the farmers of either eastern or western Canada, who will not obtain the benefits claimed for them in the enactment of this provision. The principle of secret liens and encumbrances is altogether wrong, and, when put into effect, will do greater wrong to others than good to the individuals participating in the lien. I would ask, therefore, that, in the Committee stage of this Bill, this particular feature of section 88 be very seriously considered.

Another criticism has been made to the effect that under our present law the banks of the country can merge without the authority of the Government, and it has been suggested that the Treasury Board should first pass upon any such proposed merger, or that the Parliament of Canada should first be consulted. I can quite appreciate the answer my hon. friend made with respect to the necessity under certain circumstances, of going to Parliament before any merger is made. While it might at times result in a hardship if we were to insist upon this, I think it would be better for our banking institutions in Canada to understand that there shall be no merger without the approval of Parliament. The reduction in the number of banks in Canada within the last few years is startling. Only a few years ago the number of chartered banks in Canada was nearly forty, but it has been gradually decreasing, and at the present time there are only twenty-five chartered banks in all Canada. We listened with much interest to the criticisms of the hon. gentleman at my left (Mr. Lemieux) with respect to the Internationale Bank. I am not going to make any special or extended reference to that institution, but I am sure we have heard enough to convince us that any criticism which can be made in a general way with respect to the banks of Canada is specially applicable to the affairs of this particular bank, and to the transactions which have occurred to the discredit of the fair name of Canada and to the injury of Canadians in the foreign market, especially in the French market in respect to industrial and other projects that might tend to the development of our country.

I have taken up more time than I intended but a sense of my duty and an appreciation of my own convictions have constrained me to make these observations.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words as the representative of a constituency in Western Canada, I have a great deal of admiration for the banking system of Canada and my admiration has increased since going to the West. The banks have kept up with the development of our western country and I think are responsible in a large degree for the advancement that has taken place. In my own constituency there are fifty-five branch banks, which is evidence of the interest which the banks are taking in that new part of Canada. At the same time I am in sympathy with much that has been said about protecting the interest of depositors in banks and I believe that the matter should be given the most serious consideration of this House. In the West we are mostly borrowers, as has been said in this debate, and I must admit that the depositors are very small in comparison with the borrowers. In any new country we must borrow money if we are to develop and we are developing there all the time and need all the money we can get for that purpose.

Referring to clause 88 in regard to loans to farmers on threshed grain and loans to ranchers on cattle, I am in favor of the provision if it is going to be helpful to the farmers and ranchers of western Canada but I believe it should be extended and I would suggest to the minister of Finance that farmers' live stock should be included as well as threshed grain. We heard in this House this session and last, advocates of mixed farming in Canada. I believe in that wherever it can be practiced but if it is to be encouraged the banks can encourage it more than anybody by lending the farmers money with which to buy live stock and start out in a small way. In my province and district it is important that the farmers should have means of securing a start in raising live stock, but under this clause provision is only made for lending money to a farmer on the security of his threshed grain, grain upon the farm. That should be amended to include live stock. Then we have provision that the bank may lend money to a rancher upon the security of his cattle. We have ranchers in western Canada who deal largely in horses and sheep and they should be assisted in this way as much as the man dealing in cattle alone. These matters should be given attention when the Act is in committee.

Another matter of great concern to the western farmer is the interest to be paid on loans. During the last year or so the question of state loans to farmers has been advocated. That may startle some people in this House and will be considered socialistic. I am not advocating it, but suggesting to the Government that it should be given some consideration. That system has been adopted in most of the Australian states and New Zealand and I understand has been successful. The governments of those states borrow money and lend it out to the farmers on mortgages on their lands and the record, so far as I could make out, shows that the governments of all those states have been making a profit in the operation of this particular system. I believe it is a matter that should be given serious consideration because money is not cheap in the West. I do not say it is cheap in the East, but I can bear out the remarks of the members for Regina and Strathcona that the interest is not confined to the rate stated in the Bank Act but goes over that amount to a very large extent. I do not know whether loans to farmers by the Government will be practicable or not; I have not made a study of it; but it has occurred to me that the Government could increase the rate of interest on loans in the Government Post Office Savings Bank and if they could possibly lend out the money afterwards through that bank to the people of the country as in Australia and in Germany, it would be a very great advantage. I believe this matter will eventually be brought to the attention of the Government by the people in western Canada and some in eastern Canada.

As I have said, we in the West are borrowers of money to a greater extent than we are depositors, but the time will come when we will be depositors to a greater extent than we are now. A great deal of the argument that has taken place during this debate in regard to the protection of the depositors has been based on disasters that have been met with by people through bank failures in recent years. I believe that this is an opportunity for the Parliament of this country to guard against the possibility of such happenings in future. We have been taught lessons in the past, we should learn something from them and do the best we can to safeguard our people in the future. Our banks have a great franchise, their franchises practically cost them nothing, they are given to them by the Government and it is the duty of the Government to safeguard the people who have to do with the banks of this country. I believe myself that Government inspection would be in the best interest of depositors, of the shareholders and of the country generally. From what I have read I believe it is practicable and when the Government gives a bank a charter it puts the stamp of approval more or less on that institution, and in that way the people who deal with the bank are led to believe that they can trust it because they know that it is chartered by the Government and therefore it is the duty of the Government to protect the people who deal with these financial institutions by every means in their power.

I hope that the provisions of clause 88 will be extended so as to cover the live stock of farmers, and in the case of ranchers over other kinds of animals than cattle, because we want to encourage mixed farming in the West, and it can be encouraged in this way as much as in any other. I hope that suggestion will meet with the sympathetic consideration of the committee.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): The criticism which has been offered to the several features of this Bill amply justify the time that has been taken on its second reading. Any legislation that has for its object the dealing with the financial institutions of this country must be of very wide and far-reaching importance. In the United States, in the city of Washington, during several months past, a committee has been sitting for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of affairs in that country with respect to the so-called money trust and its effect upon the industrial and commercial life of that country. It seems to me that the time is fast aproaching when some such action ought to be taken by this Parliament for the purpose of considering whether or not we are face to face with a similar condition of affairs in this country. I merely mention this for the purpose of emphasizing the references to this important matter which have been made by the hon. member for Westmorland in his very admirable presentation of the case this afternoon.

I speak more particularly of the condition of affairs that exists in the Maritime provinces. Fifteen years ago there existed in the Maritime provinces ten banks which were organized by the industry and enterprise of the business men of those provinces who furnished the capital. I will read them to the House, as hon. members may be interested in knowing in what respect the system of merging banks has affected that portion of Canada during the last few years. Fifteen years ago there were in the Maritime provinces the Halifax Banking Company, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Royal Bank of Canada, the Union Bank of Halifax, the People's Bank of Halifax, the Commercial Bank of Windsor, the Bank of Yarmouth, the Merchants Bank of Prince Edward Island, the Union Bank of Prince Edward Island, and the Bank of New Brunswick. Since that period the process of merging has been going on to such an extent that of the ten banks which existed fifteen years ago only two remain at the present time. The Halifax Banking Company was absorbed by the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the People's Bank of Halifax by the Bank of Montreal, the Commercial Bank of Windsor by the Union Bank of Halifax, the Union Bank of Halifax after absorbing the Commercial Bank of Windsor, was in turn absorbed by the Royal Bank of Halifax, the Bank of Yarmouth was absorbed by the Bank of Montreal, the Merchants' Bank of Prince Edward Island by the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Union Bank of Prince Edward Island by the Bank of Nova Scotia, and quite recently the Bank of New Brunswick was absorbed by the Bank of Nova Scotia. So that at the present time, of the ten banks that existed fifteen years ago, two only remain.

and of those two, one of them has removed its head office to the city of Montreal and the other has its general manager in the city of Toronto. So far as the Maritime provinces are concerned, then, it may properly be said that there is not a solitary local institution transacting the banking business of that important section of Canada. What has been the effect of the merging of those banks upon the interests of the general public throughout that portion of the country? I myself had an illustration a short time ago of the effect that a recent merger had upon the interests of the people who do business with a bank situated in the town where I live. Up to about a year ago the rate of discount charged by the Union Bank of Halifax in the town of St. Peters was 7 per cent. That was the rate prescribed by the Bank Act, and in my innocence I thought that no bank in Canada would dare to collect a larger rate of discount. However, a few months after the Royal Bank of Canada took over the Union Bank of Halifax, I was notified by the manager that the rate of discount had been raised to 8 per cent, and since that date 8 per cent has been the rate of interest charged upon loans to customers by the Royal Bank of Canada in the town of St. Peters. The situation there is not quite so unfavourable to the borrower as it is in western Canada, but I am accustomed to hear that there is a very great need for money in western Canada owing to the large development that is going on and to the speculative character of the investments there, so there may be some excuse for the large rate of interest charged by the banks there. That condition of affairs does not exist however, so far as the Maritime provinces are concerned, and more particularly so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned. Conditions have been established there for many years, and there is no large or undue investments in industrial enterprises of a speculative character, and there is certainly no large investments going on in real estate which would make the investments by the banks of a precarious character. The well established business that is going on in Nova Scotia, as I have said, has existed for many years, and there is no possible excuse for the banks of Nova Scotia increasing their rates of discount.

But there is another iniquity which exists in regard to the banking operations of Nova Scotia, and that is the variable rate of discount which they charge. If it was a general rate of discount that was charged in all places throughout the Maritime provinces, people might possibly be reconciled to paying it, but it happens that, while in the town in which I live, the Royal Bank of Canada is charging a discount rate of 8 per cent, in the next town the discount rate is 7 per cent, and I understand that in the city of Sydney where there is competition with other banks, the rate is 6 per cent. Hon. gentlemen who took part in this debate have stated that the merging of banks did not have the effect of increasing the rate of interest charged upon loans, but the instances I have given will refute any such contention, because there is no doubt whatever that the increase in the rate of discount in the town in which I live synchronizes, if I may use the word, with the merging of the Union Bank of Halifax with the Royal Bank of Canada. A bank is as necessary in a community today as a grocery store or a doctor, as people are in the habit of transacting their business through the banks, and when banking institutions are brought into existence by virtue of an Act of this Parliament, it is only right that Parliament should insist that they observe the charter under which they are incorporated. If a private individual should be fortunate enough to have more money than he has any use for in his daily business, and if he chooses to lend a portion of that money to a neighbour, he would have a right to charge whatever he thought fit in the circumstances, provided he did not bring himself within the provisions of the Usury Act. He gets no privilege from Parliament; he may or may not lend it just as he pleases. But the banking institutions occupy a different position. They have no right whatever to exercise the powers and privileges that they enjoy except by virtue of the legislation which they have received in this Parliament. Therefore I say that the Parliament of Canada has the right to say that the provisions of the Banking Act with regard to the rate of interest charged should be observed, and if the present law is not enforcible to such a degree as to prevent this usurious rate of discount, then it is the duty of Parliament to make that section of the Act more effective.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the only respect in which mergers have affected the business welfare of the comunities in which they do business. It has been stated in this debate that the rate of interest to depositors at the present time is 3 per cent. That has been the rate of interest for some years, and while the banks doing business in Nova Scotia have not reduced that rate of interest absolutely, they have so worked out the calculation of the interest as to make a further reduction of the interest upon deposits in that province. For instance a few years ago, the rate of interest, though only three per cent per annum was calculated by those banks quarterly and compounded, so that in addition to the 3 per cent rate the depositors got the benefit of this compounding of interest every three months. About a year as a consequence of this merger, the bank with which I am most familiar, instead of adding the interest quarterly to depositors, are adding it only twice a year, and the result is that money deposited in that bank at the present time does not earn as much for the depositors as it did a few years ago. Now, that having been done by the banks without any restraint being placed upon them by the charters under which they do business, we have no guarantee that in the future those banks may not make up their minds that compounding the interest upon deposits twice a year should not be continued, and in a very short time the depositors might have to depend upon the rate at simple interest for the deposits that they make. That alone effects a very considerable saving to the banks, taking into account the enormous deposits which are lying in these banks at the present time. It has been contended that these mergers result to the great advantage of the people because they make these larger financial corporations more stable and enable them to advance larger sums of money for the purpose of developing the industries of the country. But it is remarkable that, in order to bring about the mergers of these institutions, it is necessary to sweeten the pill by giving premiums to the shareholders of the banks which are to be merged. There seems to be an unwillingness on the part of the shareholders of the banks to be merged to give up their existence, and in order to overcome that unwillingness on the part of these shareholders they are paid a premium on their shares as an inducement to vote for the merger. I know of one gentleman living in my constituency who was the fortunate holder of a considerable number of shares in the Union Bank of Halifax, and in order to induce him to part with his shares, and vote for the merger between the Union Bank of Halifax and the Royal Bank, he was paid a premium equal to $3,000. That, it appears to me, does away with the suggestion that these mergers come as the result of requests from the merged banks in order that the larger banks may be made more effective and be placed in a position to do more good to the communities in which they are situated.

The system of banking in the United States, is in many respects, preferable to our own system. They have there a system of local banks; the directors are local men living in the community where the bank is doing business. They are interested in everything that contributes to the upbuilding and advancement of the communities in which these banks are established. In Canada it is different. There is practically not a single local bank doing business in the maritime provinces. The deposits which are collected by these banks are invested in other parts of Canada, they are sent to western Canada, to the United States, Mexico, and some as far as South America. These deposits are placed by the banks wherever they will earn the largest dividends for the shareholders. The sentiment which prevails in the United States with respect to the local interests cannot be said to prevail in Canada. There are, I repeat, practically no local banks in the maritime provinces. Banks are established there largely for the purpose of collecting money at the lowest rate possible from the people in the communities in which they are doing business and for the purpose of charging the highest possible rate on the loans made to people who desire loans from them. Some distinction seems to have been made by hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate between large and small loans made by a bank. Some hon. gentlemen endeavoured to argue that where loans of a large amount were made banks would be justified in loaning these large sums at a very much lower rate of interest than the smaller amounts of money which are asked for. The people who require small loans are the farmers, fishermen, artisans, and working men throughout the country. The need of the small farmer or fisherman for the $50 which he desires to borrow from the bank is just as great, just as pressing, as the necessity of the manufacturer who goes to the bank to borrow $5,000. In view of the fact that these banks are doing business by virtue of an Act of Parliament, a condition of affairs ought to be brought about by legislation on this subject which will give the small borrower, the small farmer, fisherman, labouring man and artisan, the same privileges in borowing money from these institutions as those which are enjoyed by the larger manufacturer or the speculator in real estate in western Canada. In the United States they charge a uniform rate of interest. Wherever a bank is doing business it loans its money at the same rate of interest. That is not the case in Canada. In the United States they pay 4 per cent upon the deposits which are placed in their charge by the customers of the bank and there is no such thing as a combine existing between the banks to keep down the rate of interest on deposits to prevent any bank from accepting any rate of interest on loans that may be agreed upon. I am not aware that they have in the United States any institution similar to the Canadian Bankers' Association. I do not know if such an institution exists, but if such does exist, it does not prejudice the rights and advantages which ought to come and do come in the United States to the small borrower in the community where the local bank is doing business.

When this debate was opened a week ago we received intimations from hon. gentlemen opposite that the debate would be pretty general so far as they were concerned and that they would take considerable part in it. It was further intimated that the criticisms of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were not to be uniformly friendly to the legislation which we are considering at the present moment. For some reason or other the debate on the other side has been abandoned for the last two days. I am sorry to believe that the interests of the common people find no champions except on your left, Mr. Speaker. I remember in the last Parliament that when any question arose which affected the people of Canada generally there were none more anxious to put themselves on the side of the people who are not fortunate enough to be classed amongst the bankers and capitalists of the country than hon. gentlemen opposite. I have here a quotation from the Toronto Telegram which I shall read to the House:

Toronto View of Bank Act.

Do the federal Conservative leaders realize that thirty Conservative members from this province are being led straight to the slaughter-house, not merely by the inadequacy of Hon. W. T. White's proposals, but by the terms in which these proposals were represented as the Government's highest duty and the country's supreme good? A Liberal candidate, with Hon. W. T. White's proposals and Hon. W. T. White's speech, could face a Conservative supporter of these proposals and endorser of that speech in any one of thirty districts in Ontario, and cause the sitting member to be hooted out of every schoolhouse in his own constituency. Major Sam Sharpe was a better friend to R. L. Borden and the Conservative party when he spoke out against the demands of the Bankers' Association than he would have been il he followed the Government even to disaster.

That is pretty plain speaking coming from a newspaper which is uniformly in favour of the present Administration. I could not but be struck with the activity of my beneficent and genial friend the chief whip on the other side of the House in what would appear to be a desire to shorten the debate on this important question.

Mr. STANFIELD: I wish to correct the hon. gentleman if he will allow me. I went around and asked every member on this side whether he wanted to speak or not. I also asked the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) how many on his side wanted to speak. There was no mention of stopping the debate, but simply to find out how long it would take.

Mr. KYTE: Whatever interest my hon. friend may have taken, I am free at all events to come to the conclusion that the debate, so far as the other side is concerned, very speedily came to a termination, altogether unexpected.

The conditions existing with respect to banking operations in this country are such as I think should call for the attention of hon. gentlemen in this House. We are on the eve of a situation that is not reassuring, so far as the people of this country, who are not fortunate enough to be in that class represented by the Canadian Bankers' Association, are concerned. In making use of that term, I of course have reference to the capitalists throughout this country generally. They are a very important and a very necessary portion of our population. I recognize without the advantage of money, without the opportunity for borrowing money which these large institutions afford to the people of Canada, that very many enterprises that have been carried on successfully, would not have come into existence, and that the tremendous development which Canada has experienced for the last twenty years, would not have been brought about. We must not forget, however, that there is another element in this country which has some rights, that there are people who look to the Parliament of Canada to see that they get a fair show so far as the finances of his country are concerned. I do not know what determination may be in the mind of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) with respect to further improving certain features of the Bank Act at present before the House. As I intimated a moment ago, I desire very strongly, and other hon. members have also expressed that desire, that a more effective clause be added to the Bill than the one existing at present, for the purpose of limiting the rate of interest which banks should charge upon loans. I was astonished when I learned that, in the bank of the town where I live, the rate had gone up in violation of that section of the Act; but if the banks doing business in Canada may raise the rate from seven to eight per cent in defiance of the Bank Act, there is no reason why it should not raise the rate from eight to ten per cent, twelve per cent or fifteen per cent. Before this Bill is finally disposed of by this Parliament. I hope that the hon. Minister of Finance will take into account the urgent need of a further safeguard for the people of Canada than appears to have existed since the present Bank Act came into operation.

As regards the deposits which are paid by the banks, I think the time has come when depositors ought to be granted a larger return on the money placed in the banks. It is only within the last ten or twelve years that banks have been making from eighteen to twenty-five per cent. Twenty years ago, when the rate of interest payable to depositors was fixed, the banks were not earning as large dividends as they are at the present time. It is high time that rate ought to be revised, and if the rate of interest paid by incorporated banks to depositors is regulated by the rate which the Government pay on deposits placed in the Government Savings Bank, then I think the Government should take the lead and increase the rate of interest paid to depositors, so that the banks of the country may be forced to follow suit. There is a large amount of money in the maritime provinces owned in small sums by the wage-earner; they do not like to invest money in hazardous enterprises; they are not familiar with investments of a private character, and they regard the Government Savings Bank or the savings branches of the banks of the country as the only absolutely safe places where they can deposit their money. It is taking an unfair advantage of the lack of familiarity on the part of these people with financial operations to compel them to content themselves with the niggardly rate of three per cent per annum, when the banks themselves are earning with their money from eighteen to twenty-five per cent. I do not desire to make any appeal to this House for the purpose merely of making those depositors believe that we have more interest in their welfare than in the welfare of the other interests throughout the Dominion of Canada; but I do say, under all the circumstances which I have detailed, that the time has come when something ought to be done to increase the earning power of deposits in the banks, having regard to the enormous increase in the earning power of money in the hands of capitalists in this country.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): In rising to make a few remarks on this Bill, I do so believing that it is the most important measure, so far as the people I represent are concerned, that will come before the House during the present session. The question of the navy is a very important question, and it has received a great deal of attention throughout the country and in this House. But in its effect upon the people that measure does not begin to compare in importance with the Bank Bill which we are now discussing. This measure affects every man, woman and child in the whole Dominion of Canada, because all have to do, more or less, with the banking system and with the interest affected by our banking system.

We have heard a great deal during the present debate of the splendid banking system we have in Canada. I am one of those who do not believe that we have a splendid banking system. It seems to me that any system under which, in the ten or twelve years past, twenty-five per cent of our banks have closed their doors and gone out of business, bringing loss and ruin to hundreds, and thousands, and tens of thousands, of people who trusted them, cannot be a good system. It seems to me it should be the care of the Government, as it seems to me its plain duty, to bring in a measure now that would, as far as possible, improve the banking system, so that in the future we hope to avoid the conditions that we have had during the past ten years. I was in hope that when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance brought down his Banking Bill it would be a Bill in the general interest of the people of Canada. Instead of that what do we find? A Bill that might have been drawn by the Bankers' Association, a Bill altogether in the interest of the bankers, and very little in the interests of the general public. In discussing questions of banking with bank managers, bank directors and bank presidents, I have heard practically the same points advanced that are embodied in this Bill. In the Bill, from beginning to end, so far as I can see, there is practically nothing in favour of the depositors and borrowers, but a good many changes made and every one of them giving the bankers and financiers of this country more than they had before. So, it seems to me that this system that we have all been so proud of is not, perhaps, quite so praiseworthy as it may have appeared to many people. I am glad of the discussion that has taken place during the past two or three days in this House: I am glad that the Bill was not referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee at once. I think the discussion has been along the right lines; it will do something to give the people of Canada an idea of what it is proposed to do under this Bill. It is very pleasant to have a subject to discuss that is practically free—it should be altogether free—from party bias. The matter has been discussed along those lines. Still I think that our friends on the treasury benches must have brought very considerable pressure to bear upon their followers, or we should have had a much fuller discussion from members on the other side than we have had. And I can tell the Minister of Finance that nothing will be done during this session that the people are watching so closely as this Bank Act, and that the Government of which he is such a prominent member will be judged very largely by what they do for the people of Canada on this occasion. We are now legislating for the next ten years, and if we do not take the proper steps now, we shall suffer the disadvantage of that mistake for the coming ten years; because it is not likely we shall have another revision of the Bank Act before that time.

When the hon. the Minister of Finance introduced this Bill some weeks ago, I stated that, in my judgment, banks should not be allowed to merge;—that is, one bank should not be allowed to buy out or sell to another, without coming to this House and getting authority from Parliament, just as they have to get authority before they can go into the banking business. And he, speaking off-hand, and without having had time to consider the matter, gave it as his opinion that that would not be possible or advisable, because it might often happen that an amalgamation ought to take place very quickly and without waiting for six months for Parliament to meet if Parliament happened to be in recess at that time. I do not think that, after giving the question some consideration, the Minister of Finance would use that argument again. Surely there can be nothing in that argument that if two banks wish to merge, or one to sell and the other to buy, they ought not to be called upon to wait even for six months to get authority to do so. Who is going to suffer in the meantime? It very seldom happens, that even at the present time, they form a merger without having discussed it for over six months. So, I think there is no argument why the banks, which are given their existence and their powers by this Parliament, should not come to this Parliament for the necessary legislation if they want to form a merger. One of the greatest dangers before Canada to-day is the tremendous merging of financial interests. We find our great railway systems controlled by three men. We find the manufacturers of the whole Dominion controlled by the Manufacturers' Association. We find the whole of the banking system of Canada controlled by two or three banks—that is by two or three men, and these the very men who control the railroads and manufactures to a large extent. If conditions go on during the next ten years as they have gone on during the past ten years, we shall have the most dangerous monopoly in Canada that exists anywhere in the world. We shall have two or three men controlling the banks and the railroads, and through these controlling the manufacturing industries and every other interest in the Dominion. I have heard hon. members state during this debate that if any danger occurred Parliament was well able to deal with the matter. Why should we wait until the ship is in danger of sinking before applying the remedy? Now is the time for the Minister of Finance to apply the remedy, and not wait until we get into such a condition as banking matters have reached in the United States. The other day, in Washington, some of the greatest financial men in the United States, the men who control not only millions but hundreds of millions of dollars, stated on their oath before a committee that the country had arrived at the danger point, and that any further amalgamation or merger of financial interests in the United States would be a matter of serious consideration for the whole nation. Why should we wait for such a condition as that to arise before applying the remedy? And I think that one of the remedies that, at least, will do something to bring this about will be for my hon. friend to agree to the amending of this Act so as to provide that banks shall not merge without the consent of Parliament. We have three banks to-day which control practically half the banking capital of Canada. The Minister of Finance would not agree that these banks should merge. But if his successor in office prove a weaker man than he, that successor may allow a merger under the Bill should it become law. Why not amend the Bill as I suggest and leave it to the representatives of the people, the men who represent not only the banks, railways and manufacturers, but the workingmen and farmers, to say when mergers shall take place. No harm would come of it, but I am sure that a great deal of good would result.

Much has been said during the last few days regarding the organization and operation of La Banque Internationale, of Montreal, and press reports state that a proposition has been submitted under which that bank is to be merged with another. A great deal of pressure must have been brought to bear in order to effect the merger between the Home Bank and La Banque Internationale, for the obvious reason that it was not desired that the affairs of that bank should be laid before Parliament, as in the case of the Farmers' Bank. Why should not these banks be compelled to come before Parliament, disclose their affairs before the Banking and Commerce Committee, and submit reasons why they should be allowed to effect this merger? The Finance Minister will find that the people of Canada are overwhelmingly in favour of the fullest publicity in matters of this kind. Some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have stated that a merger between a weak and a strong bank would be attended with good results generally. While I am unprepared to state definitely that it would not be a good thing, I have very grave doubts as to the nature of the effects which might thereby be produced. I do not look upon the failure of a bank as the worst thing that could happen. In many cases involving the merger of banks, I am of the opinion it would have been more in the interests of the people of Canada if one of the banks had gone out of business rather than, by amalgamation, form a huge combine of capital involving greater loss to the people generally than failure of the bank so absorbed in the merger. Arguments have been advanced to the effect that an institution resulting from a merger is better able to advance loans to merchants, manufacturers and borrowers generally. It is true that a greater amount of capital would be centred in the cities, and a larger sum be available for this purpose. But would the combined capital of two banks be of benefit to a larger number of the people of Canada than the same capital located in separate banks? I think not. I believe there would be fewer individuals served by the merged capital than by the same amount in two separate banks and their branches throughout the Dominion. As has already been stated, the whole banking system of the lower provinces of Canada has been virtually taken away from that portion of the country and centred in the cities of Montreal and Toronto, the banks in the lower provinces being simply used as centres for the gathering of money. This is obtained at a rate of interest of about 2½ per cent—they pay 3 per cent, it is true, but it costs them only 2½ per cent—and is then transferred to the western provinces and loaned at seven, eight, nine, or, as the hon. member for Regina has stated, as high as twelve per cent. A case was brought to my attention the other day regarding a man in the lower provinces who obtained $300 from a bank and deposited as security a bond for $1,000, readily saleable at par value in any market in the world. At the end of three months, notwithstanding the fact that he desired to continue the loan for a while, the bank insisted upon its being paid, and he was obliged to have a note indorsed by a friend in order to close the matter out. Is that an indication that the merging of these banks is helping the people of Canada? The whole of the Banking Act is in favour of the big interests of Canada, and no consideration is given to the ordinary man on the street. I will give the House another illustration. A man in Montreal who could offer as security for a loan, $60,000 worth of first-class gilt-edged bonds, had occasion to borrow $10,000, and he went to a couple of the banks to obtain this amount, but was unable to do so. He told his tale of woe to one of his friends, who was a broker, himself not worth $60,000. The broker undertook to obtain the money for his friend, and he went to a bank and readily obtained the $10,000. And why? Simply because that broker was able to bring business to the bank which, perhaps, they would not handle themselves, but dealt with through their subsidiary bank—a trust company—and the officers of the bank made a good profit from it. This is one of the results of the merging of banks. In my judgment, it is absolutely against the interests of the community, and if it goes on for another ten years I venture to say the whole country will be up in arms against it.

While I do not agree with some of the suggestions made by the hon. member for South York in his speech on this matter—the idea of nationalizing banks, for instance,—I venture to say that many of the propositions he put forth will meet with the approval of the people of Canada, and will be approved by many more before ten years have passed. Some of his suggestions may be somewhat in advance of the time, but the day will come, and that soon, when the Government will be forced to act more directly in the interests of the people of Canada than they seem to be disposed to do under the terms of this Bill.

I wish to say a word in favour of small banks. It is all very well to have a bank with $15,000,000 or $16,000,000 of paid-up capital and an equal rest account and $100,000,000 of assets, but those banks with that immense capital are not devoting themselves exclusively to banking. Some of the largest banks in Canada to-day are engaged in practically every business carried on in the country and when there is any stringency, any tightness of the market, is it the big banks that come to the rescue of the people and help them out the most? Not at all. Let me give you an instance. In Weyburn we have the smallest chartered bank in Canada. It was chartered by this House two or three years ago. Prior to its incorporation as a chartered bank the same people had been doing business for several years in Weyburn and half a dozen nearby towns as the Weyburn Security Bank. During 1907-8 when there was a money stringency the Weyburn Security Bank did more for the merchants and the farmers around Weyburn and the other towns, some half dozen, in which it had branches, than all the chartered banks that had branches in those towns, and there were half a dozen. Men who had been customers of the chartered banks would go to their banks and could not get a dollar.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the capital of the Weyburn Bank?

Mr. TURRIFF: The capital paid up to-day is a little over $350,000 only. Some of the big banks, including the Bank of Commerce, have branches in these towns. As I said, men were not able to get accommodation and some of the customers of these banks went to the Weyburn Security Bank, which then had not as much capital as it has now, and were helped out; that bank did more to help the settlers out in time of need than all the chartered banks put together. It seems to me that is an argument in favour of the smaller bank. Why should not a bank with $1,000,000 capital do a profitable business? There has never been a case where a small bank went down through lack of business or unprofitable business. Every one has gone down through the rascality of the men at its head. It is not because of their small capital, there are as good fields for the small capital as for the large, and they can make as good profits in proportion. Why then should we not encourage the opening up and the working of the smaller banks instead of lending our aid to these big banks to become bigger? The argument has been made here that it is better to amalgamate the weak banks. What do you call weak? A bank with $5,000,000 paid-up capital is only small and weak as compared with the Bank of Montreal or the Bank of Commerce or the Royal. Is it proposed that those banks should be amalgamated because they are weak? Is it proposed that several banks of $5,000,000 with a rest of as much should be allowed to amalgamate in order to make one strong bank like the Montreal or Commerce or the Royal? That is what the legislation we are discussing to-day is going to bring about. We are not through with bank merging, we have only commenced; we are at the beginning of it and I say it should not be in the hands of any one man to say that two or three banks should be allowed to amalgamate. Just before six o'clock the hon. member for Richmond gave us a list of the amalgamations in the lower provinces. Two or three banks that existed there have been merged into one big strong bank. I think the whole matter is wrong, that we are going in the wrong direction, that instead of allowing banks to merge together they should be absolutely stopped and if they are not stopped they should be made to come before Parliament and make it clear to Parliament that the amalgamation is going to be in the interest not only of the banks but of the people as well.

We have been dealing with this question practically along the lines that the whole consideration is due to the banks. I am free to admit that great consideration is due to the banks, to the shareholders who have put up $114,000,000 of paid up capital. There is probably an equal amount put up on rest account. That rest account in some cases—I know of one where the rest account was subscribed by the shareholders and in several of the other banks the rest account has been partly raised through premiums on stock sold, but, generally speaking, the great bulk of the $114,000,000 or over that stands to the credit of the banks as rest account has come out of the people of Canada in profits over and above a good big legitimate dividend that the banks were paying every year. So, while the banks shareholders and banks are entitled to some consideration—and I do not want to be understood as being against the banks, I want to rectify some errors that have crept in—while they are entitled to some consideration, what about the vast army of people who make up the balance of money at the disposal of the banks? We have $1,500,000,000 in our Canadian banks. Who put that money up? The people of Canada, the depositors of Canada have put that money up so that the bank owners, the banks and their shareholders only own a very small portion of the capital that they are using to-day to make their money and while they are earning—although they may not pay it all out now, it goes to their rest account—while they are earning from 15 per cent to 23 per cent, the depositors are earning about 2½ per cent. I speak of the depositors in the savings bank. I am not making any plea for the deposits of men like ourselves, the business men of the country who put money in the bank for convenience, who may have $5,000 in the bank to-day and may withdraw all of it to-morrow. There is $350,000,000 of that money lying to the credit of our people in the banks and the banks pay no interest for that. That is all right, we get paid for that by having our business attended to, by the convenience. When I speak of the depositors I speak of the men who have from $25 to $1,000 which they do not know how or where to invest to advantage and so place it in the savings bank. They are supposed to get three per cent. They do not get three per cent. If a man deposits $100 on the 2nd of the month, he does not get any interest until the first day of the next month and on the average, as a banker told me, it gives little if anything over two and a half per cent on the money deposited in the savings banks. These are the men who are deserving of the care and consideration of this House. We have heard during this debate that the banks are charging all the way from six per cent up to twelve per cent. If they are going to be allowed to charge in that way what about the depositors? It is not very long since I received a notice that owing to the stringency, the scarcity of money, my account would be charged with seven per cent instead of six per cent. Well, that is all right. Where has the stringency come from? Are the bankers paying any more for their money when they charge me seven per cent than when they were charging me six per cent? Not one iota. They are still getting part of the money for nothing, and paying at the very utmost three per cent. That is all that the Bankers' Association allows any individual bank to pay. An individual bank might be willing to pay four per cent, but the Bankers' Association would put that bank out of business if it did that. There is the greatest tyranny in the Bankers' Association. No small bank is allowed to pay what they want to pay. I know a case of a bank wanted to pay more than three per cent and it was not allowed to do so. If it had it would have been put outside of the pale of the Bankers' Association, and you know what that means. If money is scarce as they say, and they charge their customers one or two per cent extra, why should they not pay more to the depositors, the people who have $650,000,000 at three per cent in the banks? I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if he cannot see his way clear to shake off the influence of the bankers to this extent; representing the Government, he should say to the Bankers' Association: ten, fifteen or twenty years ago the Government in power at Ottawa could go to England and borrow money at three and three and a half per cent, and in those days we paid the depositor the same interest as we got the money for abroad; but the time has come now when we cannot go to Britain and borrow the money at three and three and a half per cent, and therefore we are going to do the fair and reasonable thing by the people of Canada, so that in future we shall pay the depositors who put their money in the Government Post Office Savings Banks, four per cent interest on their money instead of four per cent of the money going to Great Britain. Would that not be right Mr. Speaker? What would be the effect? Who would suffer if my hon. friend came out and showed the strength of his right arm and said to the Bankers' Association, big and strong as it is, I am going to pay the depositors in the Government Savings Bank four per cent instead of three per cent? Nobody would suffer. The bankers would still make twelve and fifteen per cent on their invested capital. They might not make twenty per cent to twenty-five per cent, but they would make fifteen per cent at least, and perhaps twenty per cent. Is that not enough when the men who put up the money are only getting three per cent? Is four per cent too much? Why cannot our bankers pay as much as the American bankers? The American bankers do not charge their borrowers any more than our banks, and they pay four per cent to the depositors. So I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to take that suggestion into his consideration, and if he does that, he will be one of the benefactors of Canada. If he does not, it will appear to me that the Bankers' Association is too strong for the Government. That is what it will look like to me.

I want to say one word about the legal rate of interest, and to bring one particular matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance. At the present time the Bank Act says that no bank shall be allowed to charge more than 7 per cent interest, but bankers pay no more attention to that than if it was not in the Act at all. I ask the Minister of Finance if he cannot remedy that. Let us leave the Yukon out altogether, because living is expensive there. Take our western provinces. The security is just as good there as it is anywhere else. I know of no place on earth where the security is better than the banks get there. I know of no place where the banks suffer fewer losses than they do in their branches throughout the prairie provinces and British Columbia. I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, if he leaves that clause as it is, that the bankers shall not be allowed to charge more than seven per cent, to put in a penalty clause providing that for the first offence of charging more than seven per cent outside of the Yukon a bank shall be fined $1,000, for the second offence $10,000, and for the third offence that those responsible be put five years in the penitentiary. I would point out to my hon. friend that that would only be asking them to obey the law. Why should the bankers not obey the law as well as the rest of us? They do not obey the law. They pay no more attention to the law than if it did not exist. You heard my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Martin) state that he knew of a case where chartered banks were collecting 12 per cent. Why should my hon. friend the Minister of Finance go on with his Bill now, knowing the facts, without putting in some penalty that would prevent those bankers from taking advantage of those who happen to be in their clutches? Is it not only fair to put in a penalty clause providing for a good fine at all events if we do not want to put in the extreme penalty? I think it would work well and I think the bankers would then respect the law. If my hon friend is not prepared to do that, I would ask him to put in a clause in the Act or to amend the clause that allows them to charge 7 per cent so that they could charge 24 per cent. Then the bankers would at least obey the law, and people would know what they were up against. There are lots of banks that do not charge those extortionate rates, but some do. Why should we pay an average of 7 or 8 or 9 per cent in the West while down here in the East you can get money at 6 per cent? They do not pay our depositors in the West any more than they do here. Why should the depositors get on an average only 2½ per cent while the banks charge 7 or 8 per cent? The law says they should not do so, but they do, and I ask my hon. friend to put in a clause providing that if they break the law in that respect they shall be fined and heavily fined. There is no country on earth that gives its banks what we give them. We give them $114,000,000 that they do not pay one red cent for, year in and year out, except the cost of printing the bills. Outside of that look at the tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of bills that are destroyed every year all profit to the banks. Those bills cannot be presented for redemption and they get all this money for nothing. If 7 per cent is considered the maximum rate that the banks should charge, my hon. friend should put in a penalty clause or give them a free hand so that they will not be tempted to break the law. That seems to be a reasonable proposition.

Another question that comes up is that with reference to the returns made to the Government. I have not heard the question discussed to any great extent in the House. This is one clause in regard to which I would be inclined to favour the bankers and to make the Act easier than it is at the present time. As I understand it, a bank manager is liable to indictment and imprisonment if he signs a false return to the Government. If the statements that he makes month after month are not correct I understand that he is liable to indictment. I think that is, perhaps, a little unreasonable. A bank manager sitting in Montreal or Toronto has a hundred branches, perhaps, scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He gets returns every month from every one of these branches; men that he does not meet, that he has probably never seen, they send him in certain returns upon which he bases his statement and if these returns are not correct the bank manager who signs the statement is liable to punishment. I think that is hardly fair. It is pretty hard on the bank manager to be made liable to punishment for making the return he is obliged to make when by no possible combination of circumstances can he know of his own personal knowledge whether the account is correct or not. But, there are some returns which the banks make that I am satisfied are absolutely untrue and misleading. I refer to the statement made by some of the banks as to the value of their real estate holdings. For a bank to return its real estate holding at $2,000,000 when, if they were put on the market and sold for purposes outside of banking they would bring from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, is just as much a crime and just as misleading as if it were to value its real estate at $5,000,000 when it was really worth $2,000,000. Why should these banks not be compelled to make a true statement of the value of their holdings? Why do they misrepresent the value? They do so for the purpose of hiding their profits. They do not want to show more than seventeen to twenty-four per cent profit whereas, if they put their real estate holdings in at the correct valuation, they would show a return of from twenty-five to thirty per cent profit. They do not want to do that and therefore they send in returns that are not correct. It has been common knowledge all over the country that heavy losses were made by the biggest bank in Canada down in Mexico in connection with a large speculation. It did not affect their profits nor did it affect their returns in any way. Why? They could turn in their real estate at greater valuation and cover up the loss. The public has no more idea of what is going on than nothing at all.

That brings me for a moment to the question of inspection. I see that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance proposes to have what is called an external audit of the head offices of the banks. He laid a good deal of stress on that point when he introduced his Bill. He pointed out that if this had been the practice in the past the Bank of Ontario would not have gone down, or at least that the rotten state it was in would have been discovered years before. I do not agree with him on that point. I think that the inspection that he propsoes will be nothing but a laughable farce. The shareholders are to appoint the auditor. Whom will the shareholders appoint? It will just amount exactly to the same thing in the case of every one of the twenty-four banks in Canada as if you inserted a provision in the Bill that the president of the bank shall nominate the auditors. The directors control the appointment, they must control it and the directors, with the shareholders' proxies in their hands, will appoint that auditor. In the case of the Ontario bank who would the auditor have been had the shareholders appointed him? —a man selected by the president and general manager and he would have selected someone that he could have managed with the result that nothing would have come out in connection with the bank that did not come out. If this audit is going to take place, in my judgment, the Finance Department should appoint the auditor. I am not struck with the idea of an outside audit anyway. I do not think that if, even if the Minister of Finance appointed the auditor it will amount to very much, but it will be something. It will be better than if the shareholders appoint the auditor. I do not think it will mislead anybody but it might have a little tendency to make people feel safer when as a matter of fact it would not amount to very much. But, if we are going to have auditors they should not be appointed by the shareholders and directors but by the Finance Department. It may possibly be of some advantage but I do not think it will amount to much.

There is another way in which the banks set the law aside and this is a matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. The law says that banks shall not deal in real estate. In Winnipeg banks are erecting the largest office buildings in the city and they do the biggest business in renting offices. A couple of years ago one of the banks put up a huge building on Portage Avenue—I would say from memory that it would be ten or twelve stories high —and they rented it. It is the highest priced space in the city of Winnipeg renting for $2.65 per square foot. They had no sooner got that building erected than they put up another huge addition, to it. That may be all right. Some argument can be advanced both ways. Some argument can be advanced in favour of it because sometimes a bank has a very valuable corner in a large city and it is an advantage to be able to put up a ten or fifteen story office building above their own apartments and make use of them. It is a legitimate way to earn money. But whose money goes into that building? You may say that it is the money of the shareholders but it is not altogether that because the building is paid for out of the assets of the bank. If a bank only had the money of the shareholders to invest in this way they would not put up these buildings. It is because they have tens of millions of money on deposit, for which they are supposed to be paying 3 per cent but for which they are actually only paying 2 per cent, they put up these buildings to compete against the very men who own the money they are using in putting the buildings up. We see it reported now that the Royal Bank is going to put up a twenty-two story building in the city of Toronto. The Bank Act specifically states it cannot do that. If my hon. friend proposes to allow the banks to continue in that way in the future, I would suggest that he amend that clause and allow them to do anything they like in the way of putting up bank buildings.

We heard a good deal the other day from my hon. friend from North Simcoe about what poor earnings the banks were making; we heard the same thing from my hon. friend the member for West Toronto, who said that no other concerns in the country made such small earnings as the banks did: that their earnings averaged only four per cent on their money; but when he was questioned, he had to acknowledge that the bank with which he is connected had made I think eighteen per cent during the past year. He also spoke of the much larger rate of interest that was earned by the banks in the Old Country. My hon. friend from North Simcoe gave a list of a few banks in different places where they earned large dividends. He led us to believe, or tried to lead us to believe, that the reason why money did not come from the Old Country to go into our banking system, was because so much more money could be made at home. If the statements made by my hon. friend from North Simcoe are anything like correct, if the British people can put their money into banking and make a great deal more money in Great Britain, which are making from fourteen to thirty-three per cent, why do they take our Government loans at four per cent, why do they send money out here to be invested in bonds on which they get five or six per cent, if they can get so much more at home? It may be that in the Old Country, these banks have become so established, probably with a small capital, and have been going on for the last fifty or a hundred years, that they are making large amounts of money; but no one need try to make the people of this country believe that money can be utilized in the Old Country to make more profit than our banks are making at the present time. I think that this whole question should be gone into, and that the Bank Act should be amended in many respects in the interests of the people.

Another matter, and one that our people in the West take very considerable exception to, is that one hundred millions of dollars of our money are sent down to New York and Chicago by our banks to invest and make money there. That may be all right. The argument is always advanced by the banks themselves, and I have no doubt would be advanced by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, that it is necessary that they should be allowed to do this, because the money should be in liquid shape, so that at any time they can realize on these call loans. In looking over the bank statements, I find that many of the banks and some of the large banks do not send any of their money down to New York; that only a few of the banks do so, to invest on the call loan market. How do these banks, who do not send any money down there, manage? They seem to manage to invest their money at home, and have it in a liquid shape ready to meet the cheques that are issued by their depositors all over the country. If the smaller banks can do that, why cannot the larger banks do it also? We are many a time in the West suffering from want of money, not able to get money to carry on the legitimate business of the country, and paying seven, eight and nine per cent for that money; yet one hundred million dollars of our money are in the United States, some times out at twenty-four per cent, often at a much lower per cent, very often down as low as two per cent. Why should not that money remain at home?

I wish to deal now with the protection of depositors. My hon. friend from West Middlesex the other night put that case very well and very favourably before the House. What I would suggest is this: We have protected the noteholders; that was an innovation. Now, why not protect the depositors? We give the banks about a hundred and fourteen million dollars of currency for nothing each year. They will make probably five million dollars a year out of that money which they get for nothing. Why could not my hon. friend the Minister of Finance put a clause in the Bill that would say this: that out of that money that the Government allows you to get for nothing, that is the currency, the bills you circulate, and on which you will probably make at least four or five million dollars annually, you will set apart say one-third of that amount each year. Do not give it away to anybody; but set it apart in a fund; give it to the Government, and the Government will pay you three per cent, and as soon as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance decides to change the rate to depositors in the Government savings bank, the Government will give you four per cent, the same as it gives the depositors. Leave it there as a deposit; let it accumulate year after year, and it will grow up into a fund for the protection of depositors, not the merchant depositors, but the depositors who have their money in for a length of time and who are drawing three per cent at present. If these depositors were getting four per cent and knew that there was a growing fund of millions of dollars held by the Government for their protection, it would be a very great advantage, and the banks would reap the advantage also, because there would be more confidence, and more money would come into their coffers. Why should not that be done? Let me point out that in the cases of the Ontario Bank and the Sovereign Bank, two of the worst failures we have had in Canada, the Bankers' Association, representing the chartered banks of the Dominion of Canada, came forward of its own accord and did that very thing, it protected the depositors, with the result that the depositors did not lose anything. Why did the Bankers' Association do that? It was not compelled to do so, but it did so, either because it felt that it was the right thing to do or it knew it would pay to do so; I think likely the latter, because I do not think the consideration of right or wrong would go very far. The Bankers' Association thought it was a good piece of business. If my hon. friend would say to these bankers: we are giving you a hundred and fourteen millions of dollars for nothing; you will put about two per cent of that money in a fund, which will be deposited with the Government, and on which we will allow you the usual rate of interest; let that account accumulate year after year for the protection of the depositors; and then when any bank in Canada fails, the depositors will be protected to the extent of that account. If every one of the big banks, every bank that is in the Bankers' Association of Canada, was responsible for the wrongdoing of all the banks, you would find that none of the smaller banks would be allowed to go very far wrong before they would be drawn up, not by the Government, not by the Department of Finance, but by the Bankers' Association.

I apologize for speaking at such length. But this is a matter which is of the utmost importance to my constituents. My constituents are not bothering their heads about the navy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, they are not bothering their heads about the navy. But, on that subject, what they say is: If we must have a navy, for goodness sake give us the Laurier navy. When people are fifteen hundred or two thousand miles from the ocean, they are much more interested in the banking than in the naval service. This banking matter appeals to them, it catches every one of them by the pocket. And they are taking an interest in it. The Minister of Finance will find, if he puts this Bill through in its present shape—a Bill absolutely in the interest of the bankers with not a line in it, so far as I can see, in the interest of the farmers—that he will hear from the people of this country. I have every reason to hope and to believe—knowing my hon. friend as I do as a man who wants to do what is right, who wants to do what is good for the country—that when this Bill comes before the Banking and Commerce Committee, when his friends behind him will not be gagged, he will hear enough there that will lead him to make many changes in this Bill; and that in the end, we shall have a Banking Act that will be good for the bankers, good for the manufacturers, good for the railways, good for the farmers, good for labouring men, and good for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. DAVID WARNOCK (Macleod): The Bill now before the House is a very important one, and, representing as I do a rural constituency in a prairie province, a district which is changing from a purely grazing area to a farming country, I wish to deal more particularly with clauses 88 and 91—clause 88 dealing with the rate of interest that may be charged, and 91 proposing to amend the banking law to allow banks to loan money to farmers on their grain and cattle. To the old timers in the West the present rate of interest is, comparatively speaking, not high. I remember when we had to pay as high as twenty-four per cent. But the conditions were different in those days. Under the conditions of to-day, with our farmers compelled to sell in a restricted market, if they are called upon to pay, eight, ten or twelve per cent on money, it becomes a very great hardship indeed. And the interests whose Bill is before us are largely responsible for this restricted market. I think they should make some concession by way of compensation to the farmers of the West for the very great restriction imposed upon them as a result of the verdict of September, 1911. High rates of interest are ruinous. Farmers simply cannot go on borrowing money while selling their grain at present prices —prices that hardly cover the cost of production—and make farming a success. The business interests of the East and of the West are mutually dependent, and, if a wave of depression should start over these prairie provinces, the bankers and capitalistic interests of eastern Canada and the manufacturing industries, will have good reason to regret their action of September, 1911. As to the high rates of interest of eighteen or twenty years ago, I may say that these rates were not paid to banking institutions, as they are to-day; they were paid to private bankers, men who had accumulated fortunes and many of them are now the richest men we have in that country. As a rule, the settlers of the West are not largely interested in the stability of banks from the point of view of depositors; they are much more interested to know how they can get that money from the banks to use in their business. And I can assure you that a great many of our settlers are becoming very much discouraged. I have reason to believe that many will be compelled to leave their homesteads this summer and seek employment in railway construction camps and elsewhere to enable them to accumulate another stake to be able to carry on farming operations. The next five or six years will be a very critical time in the development of our prairier provinces. Many settlers are quite convinced that they must go into mixed farming. But capital is required for this, and it is necessary that we should have money at low rates of interest. I was much impressed by the remarks made by my hon. friend from Strathcona and also my hon. friend from Medicine Hat. Both of these hon. gentlemen drew the attention of the Government to the system of loans and banking in Australia. While visiting the Old Country, my native country, about a year ago, and travelling in the rural districts, I was very much surprised to find the great attention that was being devoted to the Australian immigration policy. I found hundreds of men who would make excellent settlers, men trained in agricultural pursuits, very seriously thinking of going to Australia in preference to Canada. And should a number of our settlers become discouraged, particularly those from the British Islands, and begin writing letters home to their friends to tell them of the low prices and of the great difficulties under which we are labouring at the present time in western Canada, I am sure you will quickly see the tide of immigration directed towards Australia. It is undoubtedly true that a satisfied settler is the best immigration agent a country can have; and it is equally true that a dissatisfied settler can do more to discourage immigration than a force of trained immigration officials can to promote it. I would press this very strongly upon the Minister of Finance, so that when this Bill comes up in the Committee of the Whole he will be prepared to receive amendments to sections 91 dealing with the rate of interest. The desire of the prairie provinces is for cheaper money. It is absolutely imperative, else we are going to have a setback. I do not know whether the amendment proposed under clause 88 is a very great advantage to the farmer or not. I am not suggesting that it should be withdrawn, but it is very doubtful that it will be of very great service. I believe that the majority of farmers who will be able to borrow money under this amendment are able to borrow under the present law. Bankers will not be very anxious to loan money to farmers even at nine or ten per cent, if those farmers are compelled to sell their produce at the bare cost of production. It cannot be profitable, and I doubt very much if the farmer would benefit by this clause. However, it can be tried. I hope the minister will give heed to the suggestions of the hon. member for Assiniboia, and see that the provisions of clause 91 are strictly carried out.

I do not propose to take up any more of the time of the House, but I trust that before this Bill is passed such amendments will be made as will make it much easier for the farmers to borrow money at a lower rate of interest, thus protecting the interests of our farmers and encouraging the progress and development of the western provinces.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): It is not my intention to occupy much of the time of the House in my remarks upon this matter, but I may say that we have heard this matter discussed from the standpoint of both the shareholder and the depositor, and the standpoint from which I desire to discuss the matter is that of the borrower. The matter of bank inspection has been discussed at great length in this debate, and the opinions expressed in regard to its effectiveness have been many and varied. I was surprised at some of the objections raised to a system of government inspection We have been told that government inspection would be ineffective because those engaged in the banking business are reasonably honest. I fail to see why that is a good reason. If, as it is stated, the people engaged in banking are generally honest, and for that reason there should be no government inspection of banks, then we might as well do away with our Criminal Code in this country, for the reason that Canadians are generally law abiding, which applies equally to both cases. It is said also that government inspection of banks would be ineffective in that it would tend to create a false sense of security, and that it is impossible, in certain cases, to prevent fraud. If this argument holds good, we might just as well adopt the principal that because any of us can go out in the streets of Ottawa and commit a crime, city police protection should be dispensed with, because it does not prevent crime. If the arguments as against government inspection of banks are based in the statement that the people are honest and that it is impossible to prevent fraud, they equally hold good as reasons why we should do away with our Criminal Code and our police protection. We want to give a sound sense of security, and not a false one, and proper government inspection of banks will create such a condition. I have no doubt the Minister of Finance is quite capable of appointing officers who will make a thorough and efficient inspection. Some hon. gentlemen have stated that government inspection would not be effective for the head offices only would be inspected, but in the next breath they tell us this is where all the trouble arises. I do not agree with the statement that all of the trouble takes place in the head offices. I think that government inspection should be directed in a number of ways and particularly in such manner as to compel the carrying out the law.

I now wish to speak for a moment from the standpoint, as I have said, of the borrower. A good deal has been said in respect to the clause which provides that no more than seven per cent interest shall be recoverable, and it has been said that this clause is entirely ineffective. I affirm that this clause is a dead-letter; I am paying over seven per cent interest myself, and I may say that

I believe there is not a man in my constituency who is at the present moment obtaining the seven per cent rate. I believe that the instructions of the bank managers in the West—I do not now refer to such cities as Regina, as in my constituency there are no large towns—are to the effect that no loans are to be issued at less than 8 per cent. While I cannot prove this, I am convinced that it is true. In regard to the enforcement of this clause, a number of suggestions have been made, but I think none of them are quite to the point, though I believe that legislation could be provided which would prevent the banks from charging more than the law requires. I do not say that this provision should be done away with, as I am of the opinion that it is a fairly good one if strictly enforced. In the form in which it is at present, however, as I have said, it is a dead letter. I do not think any of the notes placed in the hands of my firm for collection bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. Yet the borrowers pay the stipulated rate, and why? Some of them, perhaps, do not know any better, but even if they did, what else could they do? If a business man were to say to the banker: You are charging more interest than the law allows; I will pay you 7 per cent and no more, what would be the effect? If he is like the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), and does not need to borrow money, he may be all right, but that is the only case in which he would be in a safe position, as it is altogether likely the banks would decline to advance him any further amounts if they were aware of the fact that he had refused to pay the interest demanded. The hon. member for Assiniboia has mentioned the clause in respect to penalties, and has dealt with the extent of its effectiveness. The only way in which this clause can be made effective is by government inspectors or officials. We are told that government officials cannot inspect the branch offices, but the Act could easily provide that the returns which are now made, I think twice a month by the branch offices to the head offices, should contain certain sworn information, among other things all loans made and the rate of interest charged. The inspector could inspect these returns, and if any one were charged more than 7 per cent, a requirement that the bank should refund the excess and pay a penalty to the Government equal to the overcharge would, I think, prevent abuses of this kind. I do not believe that heavy penalties would be necessary. The minister would find that a thoroughly effective way of overcoming the difficulty.

Another phase of this interest question is that there are interest zones in Canada in connection with the banking business. In one zone embracing the country around Toronto and Montreal, probably the greater part of Ontario and Quebec and possibly the maritime provinces, the average rate to the ordinary borrower is six per cent or six and a half per cent. In the West they draw an arbitrary line between Manitoba, and Saskatchewan—Heaven knows why, I do not. In Manitoba they charge seven per cent to good borrowers. In the third zone which takes in Saskatchewan, they charge good borrowers eight per cent at least. There is no fair-play or justice in that. There are no better loans in Canada than there are in Saskatchewan and I do not believe that the banks lose more there than in any other province, and why should they charge a higher rate of interest? Alberta I presume is as badly treated. That is unjust, unfair and injurious not only to the province but to the Dominion; you cannot injure one member of the body without injuring the whole body; you cannot injure Saskatchewan without injuring Canada.

Section 88 has been spoken of. I rather approve of the idea of the amendment. I do not know that any great gain would be made by it yet the minister is to be commended for endeavouring to meet some of the requirements of the public, although he may not succeed at first. Let me suggest that sub-section 3 is defective. I do not know whether it would be well to confine the amendment to sub-section 2 or to extend it also to sub-section 3, but if it is extended to sub-section 3 it should go further, there is no reason why a rancher should receive money on his cattle any more than a farmer. We are told that we should go into mixed farming in the West, but I do not think the mixed farmer should be discouraged—he should rather be encouraged. There are enough difficulties in our way and we do not want any artificial difficulties. The rancher is rapidly becoming a man of the past; the mixed farmer is the man of the present and with him we have to deal. I should suggest that if that clause is left in it should cover live stock generally. I do not see why a cow is a better security than a horse or a hog.

I hope that these suggestions will receive favourable consideration because they are amendments which I think will improve the Act very materially.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): In so far as section 56 provides for inspection it has not gone nearly far enough. The inspection there provided will be almost a nullity, not entirely, but at least it will lie primarily with the head offices of the banks. Those of us who have had anything to do with banks know that the appointment of shareholders' auditors will lie largely with those who attend the annual meeting of the bank, and in eighty per cent of the well managed banks or companies, as most of ours in Canada are, a very small percentage of shareholders attend the meetings. The usual mode of procedure is that prior to the annual meeting the managers and directors see to it that they have sufficient proxies in their hands to enable them to arrange things as they desire. To that I have no objection, although in this case, if the Act intends to protect the shareholders—which I take to be its object—that method is not sufficient. The law of Scotland is that shareholders may at any time make an application to the government to appoint an auditor to look after the affairs of the bank and I see no reason why, if the shareholders at the annual meeting do not appoint an auditor, they should not at any subsequent time have a right to apply to the Government to appoint an auditor to make such an audit as the shareholders think he should make. Along that line of argument I just want to ask the Minister of Finance for information. Perhaps I am wrong, but it appears to me, as I have always understood it, that there is the greatest difference between an audit and an inspection. Auditors come in and simply check up. They see that matters balance, and if they do, then their duties as auditors are done. They do not go into the actual workings of the institution to see whether or not the securities held or the securities given to that bank are sufficient to cover the advances that have been made upon those securities. It appears to me that what the shareholders ought to have is not an audit but an inspection of the assets which the bank holds, to see whether or not, the shareholders, and consequently the depositors, are sufficiently protected in respect to the moneys they have in that bank. It may be that in drawing that distinction I am wrong, but it has always appeared to me that there is the difference I have pointed out between an auditor and an inspector. I make that statement now because perhaps it ought to be drawn to the attention of the Government before the Bill goes to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I do think that so far as the provisions in this Bill for an audit go, they are insufficient; I think there should be some provision, not only for audit but for actual inspection. The Prime Minister said the other night, when dealing with the Bill that the provision was for an independent competent auditor. I think these were his words, but it does not appear to me that an independent competent auditor is always appointed by the bank officials. After all, he has to audit the figures of the officials who appoint him. Therefore, I do not think that under the Bill there is provision for an independent auditor. I do not desire to give the impression that because an auditor is appointed by bank officials he is not to be regarded as an honest auditor. Far be it from me to say that. I merely say that if the Act is going to provide sufficient safeguards for the protection of shareholders they should be of such a nature that shareholders would not be able to come back and say: if we had had the right to do this we would have appointed a man who would have looked after our interests. So much for section 56.

Let me go to section 60. That section says:

> The banks shall hold in Dominion notes not less than forty per cent of the cash reserves——

And then the amendment, as I take it, adds:

> —which it had in Canada.

Now I should like to ask why a bank should be compelled to hold not less than forty per cent of cash reserves in Canada only; why should it not apply as well to the cash held outside of Canada? It has always appeared to me that branch banks in many of the smaller towns in Canada are established there not so much to do an actual banking business as for the purpose of receiving deposits, in order that these might be sent to the head offices of the banks and invested not in Canada but outside of Canada. There is no question that in 1907 the stringency in the United States was very much greater than it was in Canada, and I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me when I say that a very large percentage, comparatively speaking, of the money of the Dominion of Canada was in the United States taking care of the stringency there, instead of taking care of the stringency in the Dominion. Why? Simply for the reason that the banks can get through their customers there a very much higher rate of interest than they can get in the Dominion; consequently, following out the law of human nature to make the most you can where you can, the banks sent the money to the United States, in order that their profits might be greater. Now when you consider the fact that the depositors in the Dominion of Canada have about one billion dollars of deposits, and that the shareholders have about one hundred million dollars on deposit; when you consider the tremendous discrepancy, as has been pointed out, that the large bulk of the funds of the chartered banks of Canada come from the depositors, without a cent of interest being paid on it, because it is on current loans, while the balance of it is on a basis of three per cent or as has been pointed out, not actually three per cent, it appears to me that as the banks receive their license to do business from the Parliament of Canada, and receive to a very great extent the funds with which to carry on their business from the people of Canada, it would be only equitable and fair for Parliament to say to them when renewing their licenses, you shall to as great an extent as possible protect your own people in your own country. I throw this out as a suggestion, that perhaps if they were compelled to pay five per cent on their foreign investments we might have more money left in Canada instead of having it go to the United States. Certainly I say that when we go to a bank and offer fair security and say here it is in liquid form, the bank has no right to say, we have no money to lend. To get down to the last analysis, when the banks are not lending, it is because a large proportion of their money is carrying short date accounts and short date paper in the United States. That does not seem to me an equitable basis on which the banks should work.

Then we come to section 88. I am not going to say, because I think it would be going a long way, that the merchant or the manufacturer each time he gets a loan from the bank should be compelled to register the nature of the loan as a chattel mortgage is registered. Perhaps that would lead to such an upsetting of business that it would be very detrimental to the commercial interests of the community. But I do not think that by reason of section 88 the bank ought to be allowed to step in and defeat the claims of the wage-earners in any way whatever, even although their lien may stand as it does in section 88. That does not seem to me a fit and proper thing to do, because it is through the wage-earners that the bank must eventually be paid, or at least it is through them that it holds the security for the advance; and consequently the producers of that security ought to be entitled to the first lien on the assets of that bank if insolvency should take place. As to subsection 3 of section 88:

> The bank may lend money to a rancher upon the security of his cattle.

I have no doubt that the interpretation clause will say what a rancher is, but I ask the minister why should a rancher be preferred instead of a farmer with 100 head of cattle in the province of Ontario? He is not a ranchman in the strict sense of the term but that man certainly, on his cattle, horses, hogs or sheep, from which, we know, springs the prosperity of the province of Ontario through mixed farming operation, ought to have as much right to receive a loan under section 88 as the ranchman. I cannot see how you can differentiate or how it would possibly be fair to do so. It appears to me, therefore, that when you come to put your interpretation clause into this Act you must define a ranchman as being a man having cattle and carrying on a cattle business. That would only be fair. He need not be absolutely in the cattle business because a man who is a cattle man must necessarily grow grain and carry on the ordinary operations of the farmer. I think that point ought to be very seriously considered by the minister when he looks over the Bill again.

Then, Sir, the question of the protection of deposits comes in. I was very much surprised at the Banking and Commerce Committee the other morning to learn that one of the members of the committee had gone so far as to say that a loan company ought not to be allowed to take deposits because the depositors were not secured. If any one will for a moment put forth the claim that the depositors in a loan company are not better secured than the depositors in a bank, I should be most willing to listen but it would take me a long time to be convinced that the depositors in a loan company are not absolutely secured for every dollar that they have there by the mortgages in the company's vaults. But it may be said perhaps that these are not liquid assets. I want to ask the Minister of Finance, as a man who has had large experience along these lines, if he wants any more liquid assets than first mortgages on real estate and municipal debentures. If there is money in the country at any time you can get it on these just as easily as on any other kind of security that I know of. It does not appear to me therefore, that the claim is absolutely preposterous. It might very well be applied to banks because, if the loan company depositors are to be more secure than they are at the present time, then surely the argument applies with a thousand times greater force to depositors in banks.

Mr. WHITE: Surely my hon. friend did not understand anything of the kind?

Mr. PARDEE: No, it was not the Minister of Finance. I certainly would not accuse him of any such thing. It was the hon. member for Brandon. I know that the Minister of Finance would not put forward such a claim and I would not impute it to him. But, I was only mentioning it to fortify this argument, that if any one for a moment would think that depositors with loan companies were not sufficiently protected, the argument applies a thousandfold to depositors in banks. So, it does appear to me, that with the amount of money that the banks have on deposit, it would be only fair that a percentage of the earnings of the bank should be ear-marked in the interest of the depositors. In the Banking and Commerce Committee yesterday morning a certain trust company made application, as the minister knows, that deposits might be taken, that deposits might be invested, that these investments should be ear-marked in the interest of the depositors and that in the event of the insolvency of the company these deposits should be a first lien on the assets. Surely, if that application is to be granted, as it undoubtedly will be, to this trust company, to ear-mark these securities in order that these depositors should be protected and that, in the event of insolvency, the depositors shall have a first lien upon these securities, it would appear that banks, with the millions of dollars they have on hand, might very well be compelled to take a certain percentage of their rest account and invest it in such securities as should be ear-marked for the benefit of depositors. The bank should be compelled to lay so much aside annually as a trust fund for the protection of depositors and in the event of the insolvency of the bank the depositors should have a first lien upon these securities. Few banks will be prejudiced in the slightest by any such arrangement. It will not matter one tittle to the larger banks. It will only affect those banks which may not be in as good a financial state as they ought to be in or those which, with the utmost vigilance on the part of the Finance Department at the outset, have not been started on a proper basis. It is only reasonable to ask that the depositors in such institutions as these should be secured. If the Bankers' Association is what the Bankers' Association pretends to be, the larger banks ought to be compelled to see, in so far as the weaker ones are concerned, that the credit of the whole of the banking institutions of Canada is protected in such a way that the depositors shall suffer no loss. These banks ought, according to their capital and reserves, be compelled to contribute pro rata to such a reserve fund as will be necessary to protect depositors from loss.

These suggestions are thrown out not in any spirit of hostility to the Bank Act. I recognize the part that banks have played, and that it is necessary for them to play, in the development of Canada. But it appears to me, now the matter has been again opened up for discussion, that we should act upon the lines that have been suggested in the various remarks that have been made by members of this House and that we should try, in so far as human ingenuity can assist us, to put the Bank Act in such a position as that depositors, shareholders and the community in general, shall feel safe under that Act.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly not occupy the time of the House at any great length after the exhaustive discussion of the Bank Act which we have had in expressing my views upon this important measure.

But, as I am not on the Banking and Commerce Committee, I would like, before this Bill goes to the committee, to suggest two or three changes that I think should be made in it. I think that the discussion will lead to great improvement even if all the suggestions which have been thrown out by hon. members are not adopted at this renewal of the bank charters. Hon. gentlemen must know that this Act respecting banks and banking savours somewhat of antiquitia. The first Act was passed in 1871, very largely the Act which we have now. At that time it was declared that there should be a renewal of the bank charters every ten years because it was known that banks holding charters under the Dominion Government and doing business as they were doing it under those charters were institutions which should be regulated from time to time by Parliament. Views such as that were thrown out at that time by the members who then had the honour of representing Canada in Parliament. It was to regulate banks that there were ten-year periods fixed for the renewal of the bank charters. At every renewal of a bank charter, anything which savours of injustice to the general public should be done away with, and such amendments made as might add to the general welfare of the country. The time has come when there is to be another renewal, a decennial renewal of bank charters, and it is not only the privilege but is the duty of Parliament to see to it that any injustice, that has been done in the past, and anything in the Act, which at this time works an injustice to the public generally, should be wiped off the statute-books and such changes made as might be necessary. Hon. gentlemen must remember that changes have been made in the law of Canada, the law of Ontario at any rate, which directly conflicts with the Act respecting banks and banking. My hon. friend who as just taken his seat and the hon. member for Wellington the other night suggested one instance in which the law of the province of Ontario conflicted with the Bank Act in regard to the priority which was given to the bank as against wage-earners. I find by what has been said by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that that phase of the Bill will be rectified, and that wage-earners will have their priority under the Wage-Earners' Act in the province of Ontario as against this particular Act in favour of the bankers. I wish to go further along that line, and to point out some discrepancies in this Act wherein it varies entirely from the law of the province of Ontario and the law which exists in several other provinces.

A good deal has been said about the question of inspection. I do not intend to elaborate that more than to say that, if we are to have an inspection at all, we should have effective inspection. The inspection which has been suggested by this Bill, I will venture to say, in the mind of any man in Canada, will amount to practically no inspection at all. That is the feeling which is abroad in Canada, that we might as well leave the Act as it stands as to pass this clause regarding inspection.

In regard to the question of protecting the depositors, I can see no reason why the banks of Canada should not in some way protect the depositors in the savings banks. That has been elaborated to a very great extent, and I will not occupy the time of the House in elaborating it further.

I shall now take up the section which provides that the bank shall not lend money on the security of stock. It has been said that the banks in many cases have been violating the law in regard to interest, and in regard to holding of real estate. I do not wish to say that they are deliberately violating the law in regard to lending money on the security of their own stock, but this Act practically allows them to do so, because it gives them a lien on the stock and a prior lien to any other creditor. To a man, who holds stock to the extent say of ten thousand dollars, they could lend ten thousand dollars on his own personal security, he having that stock. If he sold that stock to anybody and handed over the certificate, and the purchaser, an innocent purchaser for value, went to the bank to have the transfer made, the bank could say: you cannot get that transfer made, and that stock certificate will be of no benefit to you until you pay the amount of money that man owes the bank. I submit that that is a very, very grave injustice. I do not know that that clause in the Act has in the past worked an injustice to any person; but, as has been said by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, we do not enact a criminal code and say that that prevents all wrong-doing, we believe that the people are reasonably law-abiding citizens; but in order to prevent if possible wrong-doing, we enact the Criminal Code. I do not know that this particular clause has worked an absolute injury, but it might do so. There is this other phase of the situation, which not only can work an absolute injury, but which has done so, and that is the priority which a bank has on its own stock as against other creditors of that stockholder. Supposing a stockholder becomes insolvent or has an execution issued against him, and a sheriff seizes his stock certificate, he cannot sell it and make a transfer of it until the bank is paid, because the bank has an absolute prior claim as against all creditors. The law of the province of Ontario has for years past done away with priority among creditors. The Creditors' Relief Act in the province of Ontario was passed many years ago, so that when a sheriff makes a seizure and disposes of the debtor's goods, he has to hold the money for thirty days so that all creditors can come in with their certificates, their judgments if they have any, or their affidavits, showing that they have a claim, and that money will be divided rateably among all the creditors of the insolvent debtor. Not so, however, with the bank, the bank can come in, and if the debtor's only asset is a bank certificate for ten thousand dollars of the capital of any one of our chartered banks, and he owes the bank ten thousand dollars, the bank takes it all and the other creditors do not get a penny. I submit that is not in accordance with the law of the province of Ontario, and that is one of the things, in renewing the bank charters, that should be done away with. This Act should be made to conform with the laws of the various provinces of the Dominion, and priority among creditors should be done away with in regard to the banks as it is with regard to any other class of creditor in this country. To my mind there is no reason why a bank should have any priority in regard to an insolvent debtor. When this Bill comes before the Banking and Commerce Committee, I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will see to it that that section is amended. If the Banking and Commerce Committee does not amend that section when it comes before them, I will tell the hon. minister now that I will take the privilege, which I will have when this Bill comes before the Committee of the Whole House, as it will have to come later on, to divide the House on that question, and endeavour to put the banks exactly in the same position as any other creditors of an insolvent debtor. In regard to section 88 and sub-sections two and three, this Act prevents banks from lending money on chattel mortgages. I presume the reason, why a bank is not obliged to register or file with the clerk of the county court the form of written security, form 'C' in the schedules to the Act, is that it would savour somewhat of allowing them to deal in chattel mortgages. But they have to take from the debtor a written document executed by him in the form set out in the schedule of this Act. I submit that that document should be filed. It is practically a chattel mortgage. It is not in the form of a chattel mortgage, but that is what it amounts to. It allows the bank to lend money on grain, not only on grain in the Northwest but on grain in any part of Canada, it says:

The banker may lend money to a farmer upon the security of his grain (of any kind) grown upon the farm.

Now, if the bank takes this written document from a farmer as security for the money advanced on his threshed grain in his barns, I submit that that document should be filed with the clerk of the county court of the county in which that grain is located, so that other people generally from whom this man might also wish to borrow money on the security of his grain may know that the bank has this prior lien. Why does it appear to be necessary that everything that is done by the banks should be covered with secrecy? There is no reason that I can see why a bank's business in a matter of this kind should not be made as public as the business of any other concern or individual. The bank may also lend money to a rancher. My hon. friend who last spoke, apparently, did not notice the interpretation clauses of this Act. The interpretation section says nothing about what a rancher is. It says what cattle shall mean:

'Cattle' means bulls, cows, oxen, steers, bullocks, heifers and calves.

But it does not define 'rancher.' We all know what 'cattle' means, but 'rancher' may mean any man who deals in cattle. Must he have a hundred head of cattle, must he have a thousand, must he have ten thousand head in order to be counted a rancher under this Act? Or is he not a 'rancher' if he has cattle in the fertile fields of the province of Ontario. At any rate the 'rancher' whatever he may be or however many cattle he may have, can borrow money from a bank and execute a prescribed document to the bank under this Act, but this need not be filed with the clerk of the county court of the county in which the cattle are when the document is executed. I submit to the Minister of Finance that such a document should be filed. The effect of this clause will be to allow the bank to deal in chattel mortgages, and when they are given that privilege they should be put in the same category as others who deal in the same security. The next question is the question of the interest. It is said that the banks deliberately and continually violate this law. If they do, the law should be changed so that the violation may no longer take place. The wording of this section 91 is very peculiar:

The bank may stipulate for, take, reserve or accept any rate of interest or discount, not exceeding seven per cent per annum, and may receive and take in advance any such rate, but no higher rate of interest shall be recoverable by the bank.

But the people in the West, apparently, pay a higher rate than seven per cent. I think the section should be amended by striking out the words 'may stipulate for' and others so as to make it read:

The bank shall not in any case, take, receive or exact any rate of interest or discount exceeding seven per cent.

The section as it reads now does not state in words that they shall not take a higher rate than seven per cent, and I think the words should be made clear and specific. I will not go quite so far as one of my hon. friends from the West who said that he would put them in prison for violation of this section; but there should be some deterring element in this Act, it seems to me, to prevent the bank from violating that section of the law, and I hope the Banking and Commerce Committee will amend that section; otherwise, we shall probably have to amend it when it comes back to Committee of the Whole.

I believe that this discussion has done great good. Though the people of the country may not get at this renewal of the bank charters all that they want at the present time, I am quite certain that we shall get something that will help to remove some of the incongruities of this Act and some of the things which are not for the best interest of the public. I believe also that when another ten years roll round and it becomes the duty of Parliament to again renew the charters of the banks, probably the broader and larger questions which have been discussed by the hon. member for South York, the hon. member for Westmorland, and the hon. member for West Middlesex, will then come up, and probably the people of the country will then derive some of the larger benefits which these hon. gentlemen have been talking about.

Mr. LALOR: Does the hon. member for Welland understand that when a customer goes into a bank to borrow $10,000 if he holds a stock certificate of the bank for the amount, the bank can take that certificate, even if it has not been signed and deposited with the bank, as collateral security for the loan?

Mr. GERMAN: Certainly not, and further, the holder cannot deposit that security with the bank as security for the loan. The bank is strictly prohibited from taking that certificate as collateral security for such a loan. And there is the danger of the thing. If the bank were allowed to take that certificate as collateral security and hold it in the bank, the certificate could not be hawked throughout the country and sold to an innocent purchaser. In the fact that the bank is prohibited from taking that certificate as security lies the danger. The borrower in such a case could go out and sell his certificate, let us say, to my hon. friend from Haldimand, at par, or fifty per cent or a hundred per cent above, but when my hon. friend went to the bank with the certificate, the bank would say, 'Oh, yes, Mr. Lalor, but that man owes us $10,000, and before we will transfer that to you, you must pay us the $10,000.' The law prohibits the bank from lending money on its own stock, but by reason of the secret lien which the bank holds under this Act, they lend practically on the security of their own stock, and this, I say, should be changed and changed now. There are matters of great importance which cannot be reached at the present time, but these are smaller matters which affect very seriously the public interest, and will not in any way injure the banks or their chances of making money, but will protect the people of the country and the creditors of an insolvent debtor.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I desire to impose upon the House only a few words in regard to this matter, as I understand the discussion upon the second reading of this Bill is about to come to an end. I am the more anxious to be brief and to facilitate the passage of this Bill in that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has not so far been very fortunate in the propagation of his legislative species. Last year his chief effort was in vain. Many different opinions have been expressed as to who was to blame for that, but I have a very clear opinion in my own mind that the hon. Minister was the chief culprit. The Senate has been blamed for the fate of the Tariff Commission Bill, but I have always thought that my hon. friend was so proud of the original characteristics of his first-born that he would not have it interfered with in any way, and was clearly guilty of the horrible act of infanticide. I am personally anxious, therefore, that this Bill should have its second reading and pass into law in as good shape as possible, so that the offspring may be a real credit to my hon. friend for all time. I am almost certain that his effort will not on this occasion meet with any decided opposition on the part of the Senate, and that he will not meet with very great hostility in that quarter of the legislative universe.

The course of this discussion has been such as to call for comment on the part of anyone who has had regard to the usual course of legislative procedure and debate. This is one of the very important measures of the session, and it is the second-reading stage of that measure—that in which the debate is usually expansive and prolonged. There was every evidence that this would be the case, and that on both sides of the House there would be a wide-spread discussion of the Bank Act. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), who has just resumed his seat, was the thirteenth successive speaker on this side of the House, while we have witnessed the remarkable spectacle of an epidemic of absolute dumbness on the government benches. This, is to say the least, an extraordinary phenomenon indeed. It is the more extraordinary because the period of dumbness was preceded by an exceedingly able, active and forcible speech—I refer of course, to the activities of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was last year in grave danger, when cutting his ministerial and legislative teeth, of getting angry when the hon. member for Edmonton suggested—or perhaps a little more than suggested, as suggestions are not in the line of the hon. member for Edmonton—that the Finance Minister came into this House in somewhat close association with the moneyed interests of Canada. If there were anything calculated to lend strength to that consideration, it would be the knowledge going abroad that the Minister or the Government had done anything to supress free discussion on the other side of the House on the occasion of the second reading of any measure. I throw out that suggestion, too late to be of any use, as we are approaching the end of the debate, but I throw it out as being worthy of the consideration of the Minister on future occasions. I was inclined to congratulate myself honestly, and to congratulate Canada, that there had come a day when there was to be afforded evidence that in the rank and file of one of the great parties in this country there was evolving a spirit of independent thought which would do credit to the country, and shut the mouths of the critics of Parliament who say that both sides are really the servants of interests outside the House. But these congratulations are not now in order. My hon. friend the member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) made one of the speeches of his career—not in length, as he was not to-day engaged in one of his Marathon performances—but, in the ability with which he marshalled his facts, and in the very great importance of the matter which he brought before the House, he made a speech which was deserving of an answer from the benches opposite. He told us of the few hands, into which monetary power is drifting in this country, but the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite were an unbroken blank—no ideas; no speeches; only, as I have said, an epidemic of dumbness. It is well at this stage to call attention to this fact, and I am perfectly sure the people of the country will note it, and draw their conclusions.

With regard to the Bill itself, I am no authority on banking. I am, as my hon.

friend the Minister of Finance hinted the other day, somewhat old-fashioned. I follow Cobden and Bright in economics, but much older men than Cobden and Bright in regard to banking. I am afraid I will earn the additional contempt of my hon. friend when I tell him where I learned what I know about banking. I was, early in life, in the habit of paying a great deal of attention to Shakespeare and Solomon on these subjects. Shakespeare says: 'Neither a borrower nor a lender be'—and I trust my hon. friend will not criticise me to much, for Shakespeare was a good man in his day. Solomon said: 'The borrower is servant or slave to him that lendeth.' I have tried to be as close a follower as I could in my path through life, of these ancient but respectable fathers of instruction. My hon. friend has, I know, great contempt for the fathers. That is the way with youth; one rarely meets a youth who does not, in his own estimation, know more than his father. If I, with these primitive views, were to say anything upon this Bill I would say I find myself in very general agreement with the position taken by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. He said in effect, I think, that it was perfectly obvious that bankers must, to a large extent, do their own business except in so far as it is the duty of Parliament and the Government to look after the interests of the public in the way of preventing frauds, as far as they can be prevented by legislation, and to ensure the carrying into effect in every way of the provisions of the Bank Act. With these general positions I do not differ. I think it is a very wise modification to say 'to prevent frauds as far as they can be prevented by legislation,' for, after all, the power of governments and legislatures is a limited power. The Prime Minister was more absolute when he said we ought to ensure the carrying into effect in every way of the provisions of the Bank Act. That is very definite language, and I feel very strongly that it ought to guide the minister and the committee in handling every portion of this Bill. Surely there is in that general principle laid down in such concise and unmistakable language some guidance as to what we ought to do with section ninety-one. I shall read the section.

> The bank may stipulate for, take, reserve or exact any rate of interest or discount, not exceeding seven per cent per annum, and may receive and take in advance any such rate, but no higher rate of interest shall be recoverable by the bank.

That is the law laid down in language of unmistakable meaning. But what are the facts? We have heard them stated as they apply in various parts of the country. In my own province I do not know of anyone who borrows money at as low a rate as seven per cent. There may be big men in Calgary and Edmonton who borrow in large amounts who can make better terms, but as to the farmers, amongst whom I live, they pay invariably eight per cent. I submit to you and to this House and to the Government that that is a very serious state of affairs indeed. We pass an Act, we shall pass this Act through its three stages and committee, the Senate shall do the same; we shall follow you, preceded by the mace, to see the Royal consent given to that Act which contains the provision that they shall not recover more than seven per cent—and in our country they never think of taking anything so little. That is something which surely should be remedied. Surely this House and the Government should pledge itself here and now that they will remedy that. Either they should make it compulsory that they shall comply and the language he carried out, as the Prime Minister said, that we shall carry into effect that provision of the Bank Act, or, for goodness sake, strike the clause out and let the banks do what they like. There is only one possible course open to us if we are to retain our self-respect as legislators and if it is not going forth to the country that the minister and the Government are the absolute bounden slaves of interest outside of this House and Parliament altogether—which I should be the last man and the most sorry to think. There is a proposed amendment, as I understand, to section 88, which, I am afraid, partakes somewhat of this nature. I understand that the second and third sub-clauses in italics are proposed amendments to the Act as it was. They read:

> 2. The bank may lend money to a farmer upon the security of his threshed grain (of any kind) grown upon his farm.
> 3. The bank may lend money to a rancher upon the security of his cattle.

This does not rank in the same class with the clause on which I have commented, but I do not attach much importance to those clauses being put in and I think it is somewhat unnecessary to put them in. May not the banks do that now if, as the minister said, they lend largely on the character of the borrower, may they not lend to any man that they think is good enough to lend to?

Mr. GERMAN: That is the security.

Mr. CLARK. If they take the security on the credit of the man himself, that is without grain or anything else—and I am not so sure that bankers, in dealing with men do not attach more importance to the character of the man than to his reputed possessions. I think I have heard that stated by several members of the House who have studied the methods of bankers more, and at closer range, than the writings of Solomon and Shakespeare. 'A bank may lend money.' I do not think that exerts the power either of Parliament or the Government to any great extent. If these subclauses are to be of any value we should need to alter the 'may' to 'must'; but as I have already said, I agree with the Prime Minister that that would be a somewhat drastic interference with the right of bankers to manage their own business. That would be an extreme measure, in my view. I do not think that these clauses are of much value.

As to the fixed rate of interest granted on money, that differs from the practices in the Old Country. In the Old Country, in Scotland at least, when money was scarce they issued an advertisement that a higher rate would be paid, and at once money flowed into the banks. I think it is unfortunate that they have that fixed rate, especially when there is no fixed rate at which it goes out. I am with the Prime Minister that it is difficult to regulate these things by Act of Parliament.

Something has been said about amalgamation, and there is considerable consensus of opinion in the country behind the view eloquently and forcibly expressed by the hon. member for Assiniboia, that banks perhaps ought to come to Parliament before they are allowed to amalgamate. We give in each case a special privilege in the shape of a special charter of a given bank and a good argument could be set up for Parliament, which gives the original privilege to each of them, having power to step in and say: You shall not merge your interest unless you come before Parliament for the power. The facts brought before the House by the hon. member for Westmorland in regard to the amalgamation of capital and the crowding of the monied forces of the country into such few hands, carries with it a very important warning to those who have the good of Canada at heart and who know anything of human nature. Power is a dangerous thing. It was found dangerous in English kings, and we have a limited monarchy under which the King is largely ornamental, with fortunate results to all concerned. It is found dangerous to-day in the House of Lords, although there are five hundred of them, and their powers have been greatly curtailed. It would be a sad thing if a country like this, which in its very nature, and especially in the character of its people, is as pure a democracy as the world has seen, should allow to grow up, outside of Parliament and government altogether, a power which controlled either Parliament or Government, a very terrible thing. I recall on this point that one of the great writers and political economists in Great Britain who has travelled in America and all over the Empire, who travelled in Canada a few years ago, when he went home wrote a book, 'Canada of To-day.' In that book, writing for Englishmen supposed to love freedom and to know something of its enjoyment and to have done something to achieve it for others, and of human rights, he said: 'It is a sad fact to which the workingmen and farmers of Canada will one of these days waken up, that they are owned, body and soul, by a few bankers, a few manufacturers, a few lumbermen, and a few railway magnates.'

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who said that?

Mr. CLARK: Mr. J. A. Hobson. I have only been eleven years in Canada and I have to be a modest man in expressing any opinion about Canada, although I find a Canadian who goes to England for three weeks can return and tell me all about England; and I have the most patriotic and purest motives in venturing to quote that language to this House. I think it furnishes food for thought to every Canadian patriot, to every lover of his country. On that point also I am in agreement with the Prime Minister. Too much amalgamation would not be very good, and too little would not be very good either. There is another point upon which a great many members have spoken, and that is the point of inspection. I must confess that I was not struck with the somewhat light and airy way in which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance dealt with that subject. He is so fluent that I do not think he always elaborates his own argument as well as he might. He is so eager to get to another point that he does not always finish the last one in a satisfactory way. In regard to that method of arguing, as well as to getting his legislation through, we bore with him with great good humour, and we are inclined to do so still. We bore with his ways because they were the ways of an interesting youngster, but he is growing up now and he will have to give reasons for what he says. He dealt with this subject but very furtively; he seemed to shy off from it. I want to read just what the Minister of Finance said in regard to government inspection:

> With regard to government inspection, which has been put forward on more than one occasion, in my judgment, in connection with a system of banks such as we have in Canada, it would be entirely ineffectual and illusory. It would create a false sense of security in the minds of the public and, I think, in the minds of the shareholders of the banks, and I think it would tend to relieve the directors from a sense of responsibility which I think they should have respecting the administration of the affairs of a bank.

Now, I must confess that that reason does not carry with me. Why should the inspection of banks by the Government create a false sense of security? If it has any use in the world, it would create a sense of security, but why a false one? As my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) pointed out, we have all kinds of inspectors in civilized countries. We had the instance of meat inspectors brought before us by my hon. friend. Does any housewife in Ottawa look less carefully into the joints which she buys because there are meat inspectors in Canada? I think the reasoning does not carry. We had inspectors of nuisances in England. Would any one be likely to get a larger accumulation of dead cats in his back yard because there were inspectors of nuisances? I think the knowledge that there was an inspector of nuisances would on the other hand lead the careful householder to get rid of the single cat that happened to die on his own premises. I cannot for the life of me follow my hon. friend's reasoning; it does not carry me one step. I do not see where it would give a false sense of security. It would not only give a sense of security, but I hope it would give security. I think it would give security, or else the whole trend of legislation of the civilized countries of the world has been wrong. I would like the Minister of Finance to look at it from that point of view.

As to lessening the sense of responsibility on the part of the directors, does my hon. friend really think it would? Here are the directors of a concern. They know that the Government and the country through a well known inspector have their eyes upon that concern. They are responsible for the directing of the business of that concern; they know that the Government through a man of their appointment have their eyes upon how they are doing their business. Does my hon. friend argue from his knowledge of human nature that the sense of responsibility on the part of those directors would be lessened by the knowledge that above them was a power which even they must respect? Why, it is contrary to all our knowledge of human nature. I think there is nothing in that argument. There may be internal reasons why we should not have government inspection, reasons that I do not understand, but his argument is contrary to the best thinking I can do in the matter. The knowledge that the Government was watching them could never lessen the sense of responsibility of bank directors, any more than it would lessen the sense of responsibility of any citizens in any walk of life in any capacity to know that he was watched, and that, in the last analysis of his conduct, he was responsible to what ought to be the highest power in this land, the Government of the country. Now, I submit that, as a careful argument, and I have put it as carefully as I can before the minister to see if he can afford some better reason for turning down what is a very strong demand in this country. There can be no doubt, judging from the course of this debate, that if hon. members opposite were able to depart from party considerations outside of this House altogether upon this question of government inspection, we should have a very large vote following the lines of the speech from my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). I am perfectly sure that my hon. friend from North Ontario and many of those gentlemen who applauded him so vociferously, were not actuated by mere party considerations. I am perfectly sure that they have been studying this question. They were brought close to the suffering of the people who lost so heavily in connection with the more recent of our bank failures, and I am perfectly sure they are actuated by an intense and honest desire to prevent such sufferings in the future. I do not want to impute party motives in this matter, but of course they might have half an eye on the next election. I am sure however, that to a large extent they are actuated by good motives, and that they want to cure a real defect and to prevent such things from happening in the future if at all possible. I throw out these considerations strictly along the lines of the general principles laid down by the right hon. the leader of the Government, with whom I repeat, I agree on those general principles; but I think if our legislation is to be brought into line with the principles laid down by the Prime Minister himself, there must be some alteration of these clauses.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: If any other members desire to speak, it is my duty to declare that the debate is about to be closed by the original mover of the second reading, and that if they do not speak now, their opportunity will be gone.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not wish to prevent my hon. friend the Finance Minister from speaking, but I would like to understand the rule of Parliament in that regard. I have always understood it was only in certain cases of substantive motions that there was a right to reply, and I do not consider that this comes within that category.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule says distinctly that in substantive motions and on the second reading of Bills, the member who moves the motion is entitled to reply. This is the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I have to thank my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) for his tender solicitude both for myself and the Bill. I have known that my hon. friend was, until recently, as he has said, a follower of Bright and Cobden and Adam Smith. I have also known from his speeches in the House, which, I always follow with the interest and attention and, I may say, with great pleasure, that he is a student of Shakespeare, and that he derives a great deal of his playful humour, sarcasm and powers of vigorous and apt expression from the Bard of Avon. But, I never knew, until he told us to-night. that he had studied Solomon. If he has studied Solomon at all diligently then all I have to say is that he has not profited nearly as much as he might have from that study. So, I commend to my hon. friend, with reference to politics and many other things, a further study of our friend Solomon.

We have had a very interesting discussion on this Bank Act. I think it will do a great deal of good. When I introduced the Bill I invited suggestions of a practical kind. This is a non-controversial measure politically. It has always been so regarded. I stated that the Government would welcome any suggestions of a practicable kind that would improve this Act which I have had the honour to introduce in connection with the renewal of the several bank charters. I think we have all recognized that this subject is a very important one and I think we all desire on both sides of the House that there shall be no crude, ill-considered or hasty legislation in connection with a matter that touches the vital interests of the community in all its parts. I congratulate the House, if I may be permitted to do so, and I certainly desire to do so, upon the very fair minded discussion that we have had on this measure. It has not partaken of a political character, it is not a subject of political controversy and it could not well be. It is probably not borne in mind by members of the House on either side that at the time the late Government went out of office, or rather at the close of the last session just before the general election in September, 1911, there was a measure standing for its second reading, introduced by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), relating to the same subject, the renewal of bank charters, drafted by the Hon. W. S. Fielding, my predecessor. I desire to draw that again to the attention of the House in order that we may see how far bank legislation was advanced by that measure. That Bill was introduced by the right hon. leader of the Opposition and represented the views of the Minister of Finance of the late Administration. It will probably be a surprise to some hon. gentlemen who have criticised rather severely some of the provisions of this Bill to learn that they were the same as were contained in the Bill of the Hon. Mr. Fielding. When I came into office I found this Bill, which, as I say, on account of the session having come to an end, had not reached its second reading. Mr. Fielding, had turned his mind to the question of bank inspection and bank audit and the Bill which was introduced by the leader of the Opposition—the Fielding measure—did not go nearly as far as this measure of mine. The Bill, so far as audit was concerned, because he had rejected government bank inspection, made it permissive to the banks, at their annual general meetings of shareholders, to appoint auditors with similar powers to those which we have given them in this measure. I felt that public opinion would require a further step than that and in consequence I took substantially the provision in the Fielding Bill, but instead of allowing that to remain permissive I made it compulsory. In other words, is so far as the views of the late Government, through their Finance Minister, and the then Prime Minister, went, at that time, they were unwilling to grant or to consider favourably government inspection, but they had gone the length, which means a considerable step as I shall show, of permitting the shareholders of banks, at their annual general meetings, to appoint auditors with nearly the same powers as we have given them in this measure. That is the substantial difference between the two bills, the Fielding Bill and the Bill of this Administration, on the question; that is to say, that the late Government made audit permissive to the shareholders and this Government has taken a step further and made it compulsory.

There are two other substantial features of the Bill which differ from those contained in the Bill of the Hon. Mr. Fielding. In the first place, as I explained the other night, we have adopted very stringent provisions to prevent fraud and dishonesty in the period between the incorporation of a bank and the issue of its treasury certificate. I shall not refer to that again because I have adverted to it on two different occasions, the provisions are well known to the House——

Mr. BORDEN: And they are new.

Mr. WHITE: They are new. A third provision is one to which I shall refer a little later on at greater length, namely, a provision whereby the banks may advance to farmers upon the security of their threshed grain and to ranchers on the security of their cattle. A fourth provision is one which I think it is unnecessary to discuss at length in the House, but which will undoubtedly receive consideration during the discussion of the Bill in committee. It is the provision that banks may issue their note circulation against gold. There are a number of other features, for example, one to strengthen the form of the return which shall be made to the Government and in many other ways the Bill has been improved in order to meet judicial decisions.

Another feature which was also covered in the Fielding Bill is a provision whereby the directors shall be liable for negligence. His Bill provided for such criminal liability and the Bill which I have presented has an almost similar provision in that regard. As far as the two parties are concerned, the only substantial difference is that since the late Government was in office and this Government has come into office, we have advanced the legislation in the manner that I have indicated. In the course of the debate I have been impressed with the fact that after all history is continually repeating itself. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen have read the debates connected with the revisions of 1890 or 1900 but it is a fact that all or nearly all of the questions we have discussed upon this occasion were thoroughly discussed upon one or other of those occasions. For example, in 1890, provisions for audit were introduced into the Bill brought down by the Finance Minister. After a heated debate those provisions were withdrawn as impracticable. In 1900 the question of government inspection was raised, and almost by common consent was dropped as impracticable. In 1890 the question of loans to farmers upon threshed grain and upon their produce generally was made the subject of a heated discussion in this House. Among others, I think Sir Donald Smith, now Lord Strathcona, took the view that the farmers should be allowed to give liens to the banks upon the security of their produce in the same manner as the manufacturers were permitted to give liens. Sir John Thompson, then Minister of Justice, I think, and the Hon. Edward Blake, both disagreed and gave reasons of a very weighty character as against the proposed legislation. In substance their reasons were that the legislation invaded the legislation of the several provisions against secret liens, and violated the principle which brought about the enactment of the several chattel mortgage acts in those provinces, so that I say nearly all the questions which we have discussed on this occasion, I think even the question of a national bank, were discussed energetically and sometimes heatedly on those occasions. I think in 1900, Mr. Clarke Wallace and many others took strong grounds that the liens given by manufacturers and wholesalers to banks should be registered; and that was also debated at length. The Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, gave many reasons why in his opinion it would be inexpedient and impracticable. So I say there is nothing new under the sun, and these matters have all been discussed in the past. I do not mean to say, because they were discussed in 1890 and 1900, and a certain conclusion reached, that that conclusion must necessarily be good for all time. What has happened in the last few years of course has been that there have been a most unfortunate and regrettable number of bank failures, that have marred the honourable record of Canadian banking; and as a result people and press and legislators have been desirous of adopting such safeguards as will, if not absolutely prevent, tend to prevent or prevent so far as may be possible the recurrence of similar failures brought about by fraud and dishonesty. I am sure I am voicing the sentiments of every one on both sides of the House, when I say we all desire to afford those safeguards, and the only question is that of method. In view of what I have said as to the measure brought down by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, the Fielding Bill, and in view of what I have said as to the discussions that have taken place in the past, I think we may put on one side all questions as to whether any one side in this House reflects the opinion of a capitalist class or any other class. The Bank Act has always been an Act that has presented many difficulties in dealing with it; it has always been considered by the members of the House, irrespective of party, that most careful consideration should be given to any proposed innovation, especially of a drastic character. Banks are delicate organizations, and apart from that, very often legislation, which appears to be specious and plausible, and for which many good reasons may on the face of things be given, may turn out to defeat its very purpose. I think my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) will appreciate as fully as anybody what I mean by that, that is, that sometimes you seek to accomplish by regulation, in connection with trade or in connection with finance, something that appears to be desirable, and you find either that it is evaded or that as a matter of fact in carrying it out, it defeats the very object you had in view. Of course these are only general considerations; and I shall speak, I hope, not at too great length especially at this late hour, in regard to a number of matters which have been brought up, and I shall discuss them in the order, not of their importance, but of the opposite. I shall deal briefly first with those matters about which I think there is no substantial dispute among, at all events, the majority of the House. My hon. friend from South York, whom we all listen to always with great interest, is in favour of the establishment of a great national bank in Canada. As far as I can see, there is no public demand for such an institution. I think my hon. friend has lost sight of the fact that the Bank of England is the great regulator of London, and of the financial world. The Bank of England is not a government bank; it handles the Government business; but it is a private bank, privately owned and privately administered. Therefore so far as Great Britain is concerned, and London is the money centre of the world after all is said, they have not felt the need of a national bank. The Bank of England manages the Government business; and has a great deal to do for the Government; but it is not a government bank in the sense indicated by my hon. friend. I think probably that we have failed to realize the size of the banks that we have in Canada. So far as prestige, so far as financial strength is concerned, they stand very high among the great banks of the world, that is, our greatest banks. I think in this country there is no public demand, at least we have not heard of it except from the hon member for South York, for a great national bank administered by the Government, gathering up the savings of the people and using those savings on public works. I think the opinion of the people in regard to public works, is that it is very much better that we should use our credit abroad, where capital exists among the lending nations, especially in Great Britain, for the purpose of obtaining that money, and that the savings of the people should be available for the commercial and other needs of the country which are expanding at such a great rate. I also dismiss the suggestion made by the hon. member for South York as to a large issue of two or three hundred million dollars of Dominion notes secured to the extent of twenty-five per cent by gold. I do not think that would appeal to the sound judgment of this House. If the notes were unsecured by gold and were not made fiat money, they would not remain out; the Government would not be in a position to redeem them. As I pointed out the other day, only twenty-one or twenty-two million dollars of notes are in the hands of the people. Of course there are the bank notes, but two or three hundred million dollars of Dominion notes, secured to the extent of twenty-five per cent by gold, would be very unsafe finance, In fact it would be an impossible situation to maintain; the money would not stay out; the Government would not be able to meet its liabilities, unless it were made fiat money, and fiat money means a depreciated currency and all that follows from that. Therefore so far as those two considerations are concerned, I hardly think it necessary to deal with them at any further length.

There was another proposition put forward, which on the face of it appeared to be somewhat specious and plausible; it was that all banks should guarantee the deposits of each. Not many members spoke in favour of that; and I think that the sound common sense of the House is against that proposition. I believe that is right for this reason: that proposition really is that the credit of all the banks, the standing and reputation of all the banks should be equalized; it means that all the banks are behind each, that no party would exercise or would require to exercise any discrimination as to where he should place his deposits. It means that the bank that has been in business for a hundred years, or fifty years, and has an honourable record and is entitled to credit by its standing in the community, would have no more power, really, of attracting deposits than the bank that had not that standing. So, from that standpoint, I think it would be extremely undesirable. It may be said that this relates to the bank, and if it were in the interest of the public, notwithstanding that the bank might lose the advantage of its standing and reputation, still some such provision should be adopted. But there is this to be said from the standpoint of the public, and I think it is an important point in connection with such a proposal: If a bank, especially a smaller bank or a new bank, obtains money too rapidly, it is not likely to invest it very well. In other words, a bank must be in business some time before it is in a position to invest large sums of money wisely and well. Taking the two considerations together and I think you would have a stiuation which would not appeal to us as desirable.

Now, my hon. friend from South Wellington referred to the question of manufacturers' liens, and I understood him to say that he did not dissent from the provisions of the present Act under which these liens may be given without registration. I made very careful inquiry into that, because the point had been raised and discussed before, and I found that the lien given by the wholesale manufacturer is in use daily in almost all the banks and their branches in the principal places. Thus, hundreds of these liens are being taken daily. And I think that, having regard to the fact that that provision has been in operation for over twenty years and has given satisfaction, it would be extremely unwise to enact now that anything in the nature of a chattel mortgage should be given and registered. The giving of a chattel mortgage, as every hon. member of the House knows, is looked upon askance by the commercial community; and to make any provision for the filing of these liens, to say nothing of the difficulty owing to their number, would I think, tend to disturb the whole commercial community. As to the point made by the hon. member for South Wellington and others with regard to liens which are given under the provincial laws to workmen, I think that is a matter which should receive very careful consideration on the part of the committee. I am not quite sure that the Dominion law over-rides the provincial law in this matter. The hon. member for South Wellington seemed to think it did. So far as I am concerned, I shall have the greatest pleasure in looking into that, to see if a provision can be made to meet that position, if it is thought desirable by the committee to meet it.

Now we come to the question of liens on grain and cattle; and I may say in connection with that clause that a debate took place in 1890 to which I have referred before, a debate of very great interest. It is a principle that has been recognized in the Chattel Mortgage Act of every province that anyone who has in his possession goods shall be assumed to be the owner unless, if he gives a bill of sale or chattel mortgage, he gives public notice of it; and I think that is a very good law. A good many evils arose from non-registration of these mortgages and bills of sale in the old days, and creditors were seriously and adversely affected. And the result is that in nearly all the provinces they have the usual law relating to chattel mortgages. I made some inquiries as to whether liens given by farmers could be registered conveniently—for, of course, the legislation as to loans upon threshed grain is general in this character, applying to the West and to the East. The committee will have to carefully consider in taking that question under review, whether facilities exist in the several provinces for the convenient registration of these liens if it is thought desirable to allow them.

Mr. GERMAN: The liens taken by the manufacturers on manufactured goods sold to the farmer and others are filed with the Clerk of the County Court.

Mr. WHITE: That is, the manufacturer who has a lien on his manufactured goods sold to another has that lien registered. That is the law of Ontario. Does the hon. gentleman know if it is the law of the other province?

Mr. BORDEN: That is the law in Nova Scotia.

An hon. MEMBER: And in New Brunswick too.

Mr. WHITE: There is no chattel mortgage, I believe, in the province of Quebec.

So, there are matters which will have to be considered first as to whether facilities exist throughout the Dominion under which these liens could be registered, and second, whether it is desirable that they should be registered. Much can be said in favour of registration; but it must be obvious that, so far as the West is concerned—for this was primarily designed to meet conditions in the West—much will depend on the expense of the registration. It is obvious that if an expensive registration were provided for—let us say the drawing of a chattel mortgage and filing it—that might have the effect of so increasing the cost of the loan to the farmer who wished to borrow say $100, or $200, or $1,000, that he would not avail himself of this provision. These are things that the committee will have to give attention to when the subject is considered. As to liens on cattle, as I have already said, in 1890 that question was discussed fully, and the conclusion was reached at that time that it would not be in the interest of the creditors or the public generally that the powers should be given, and consequently up to this time it applied only to wholesalers and manufacturers—that is, the wholesale principle has governed—and they have been able to avail themselves of the Act and give a lien on goods in process of manufacture in order to pay for material and pay wages of workmen in the meantime. Wholesalers and manufacturers have been allowed to do that; not retailers and private individuals. The gist and essence of Canadian banking has been to loan upon the personal security of individuals, which, I think, is a sound principle of banking. I made careful inquiries about this matter of liens, because we realized that it was a serious departure. We all know the situation in the West. We know that it is very undesirable that the farmer should have to market his grain quickly. He needs money and cannot get it. He has to throw his grain on the market, let us say, within a few weeks' time. He sells at a time when the price is not as good as he probably could get if he were able to wait. There are other considerations, which I do not need to enlarge upon now in connection with transportation, and so on. But we knew the advantages and disadvantages, and we came to the conclusion that it would be wise to insert this provision and give it the chance. I made inquiries to ascertain whether the banks would be likely to lend more freely if such a provision was inserted in the Act, and I became satisfied from my inquiries that they would. It was by reason of that fact that I came to the conclusion that the advantages would outweigh the disadvantages, and that the former should have the privilege of giving a lien upon the grain in his possession. With regard to grain in the possession of a third party, no question arises as to registration. If I hold a warehouse receipt, that, is a receipt from a third party—a responsible party—and it is out of my power to dispose of that property or to deal with it in any way. In the same way, if I obtain a loan upon a bill of lading and the property which it covers is in the possession of a third party—a responsible party—it is out of my power to deal with it. The Act has not in the past given power to an individual to give a lien upon property not in his own possession. However, I think this is well worth giving a trial, and if the committee, after a full discussion of the matter, comes to the conclusion that the lien should be registered, and if there are facilities for registration, I need not say I shall be only too glad to give that my very best consideration, because I do want to reach the best results in the matter, and to adopt the best method of bringing about that result.

In reference to liens of ranchers upon their cattle, there has been great doubt as to whether cattle ranchers could legally give a lien to the bank. I think it is wholly desirable that the cattle raising industry should be encouraged, and all facilities afforded for its development. By virtue of a decision in the courts of Alberta, some doubt was thrown upon the rights of a bank to take a lien of that kind from so-called wholesale or large cattle raisers. It is very difficult to obtain a word that will cover the case. In 1890, when a definition was sought of the word 'wholesaler,' it was finally decided that a wholesaler was a wholesaler, and the word could not be otherwise defined. As I say, we are only too glad to consider any improvement to that clause, or, as a matter of fact, any other clause of the Bill. What we desire to do is to assist, by giving proper banking facilities to those who raise cattle in the West, in order that the industry may be encouraged to as great an extent as possible.

With regard to rates of interest and discount, I may say that I made some inquiries with regard to this clause also—for I certainly approached this Act desirous of doing whatever could properly be done to form an Act that would be in the interests of the public. I had not known that loans were made at a rate of interest as high as twelve per cent, and, if that is so, I have no hesitation in saying it appears to me to be extortionate. With regard to the seven per cent rate, I was told, upon making inquiry, that the banks in the new districts compete with each other for business, and in one of the papers I read with regard to the matter I observed the statement that in some places in the West one hundred or two hundred inhabitants there were two banks competing for business. I was told further that these branch banks require a considerable sum of money at the outset for their establishment, the cost of building, construction, and the expenses of management being very large, and some considerable time elapses before a branch bank becomes profitable. A very serious question arose as to whether, if that clause were made too drastic, the banks would open branches in the smaller towns; in other words, whether we might enact legislation that would really defeat itself. That is a matter for consideration, and I pass no opinion upon it. The clause limiting the banks to 7 per cent is in the Act; the high rate of interest mentioned seems to me, as I have said, to be extortionate, and how to meet that situation wisely so that on the one hand all the different sections of the country shall receive ample accommodation, and on the other hand that the public shall be protected against extortionate rates of interest, is a matter which will require very careful consideration.

Much has been said with regard to small banks, and I may say that I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia on this matter. Personally I have never held the view that the small banks cannot render as good a service as the large institutions, and I think I have expressly stated this would depend entirely upon the manager. I do not consider a capital of $250,000 too large if the banks will go into the business of banking and carry it out properly. If they pay no attention for a year or two to the question of what the stock is selling at, and earnestly take up the question of banking, I entertain no manner of doubt that they will meet with success if they carry on their business properly and realize that they are seriously engaged in the business of banking. As far as the small bank is concerned, therefore, I am not in disagreement with the views expressed during the discussion. With regard to a smaller capital than $250,000, I would like to point out that the provision for $250,000 as a minimum was provided after at least one bitter experience concerning a bank incorporated with a much smaller capital in one of the eastern provinces. This institution carried on business for three or four months, when it was closed, bringing disaster upon a number of innocent people. It has generally been considered since this Bank Act was first brought into effect, that $250,000 is the minimum capital with which a bank should engage in business.

A great deal has been said with reference to the comparative merits of the unit and branch systems of banking. I have no hesitation in saying that the branch system, which follows the English and Scotch systems, is a better one than the unit system. The fluidity of capital—that of gathering up deposits in the farming communities, for instance, where loans cannot be made equal to the deposits, and using the funds in the West for the moving of crops or other purposes—is one of the advantages of the branch system. The unit system, which is in vogue in the United States—that system which is carried on without branches—has many disadvantages. In the United States they have had a series of panics from time to time in which banks have been obliged to suspend cash payments, and, in a such time of distrust or panic, the result is that the people desire to obtain currency, and the small banks throughout the country call upon their New York correspondents for gold. They may have no immediate need of it, but in in order to make themselves a little stronger, they feel they would like to get some of their balances back. The result is that from all parts of the country there come these demands upon New York for gold and panicky conditions are set up. You find that to be one of the phenomena of the recurrent panic in New York. I have no hesitation in saying that the English branch system and the Canadian system, that is the branch system, is a superior system to the unit system. I am not saying, of course, that it is the last word in banking by any means, but still, as a system, I believe it is superior to the other.

We now come to this question which has been chiefly discussed, the question of audit or of Government inspection. When moving the second reading of the Bill I made the point that there was a difference between audit and inspection, that inspection presumed a passing upon the quality of loans and I pointed out some difficulties in the way of doing that, especially in connection with a system such as we have, a branch system with some 2,800 branches —some of course small but others important and some very large, spread throughout Canada and in different parts of the world. Audit means, I think, more than the mere checking of entries. It would be the duty of competent auditors to not only do that but if there were any ultra vires or fraudulent or suspicious transactions to bring them to the attention of shareholders, and to have them remedied. That is my view as to the duty of an audit. As to the head office inspection it is true that failures in Canada have usually taken place by reason of fraud and dishonesty at the head office. That had been the most convenient place but I am far from saying and I do not believe any one will say that that is the only place, in a system such as ours, in which fraud can take place. It must be obvious to all that legislation cannot absolutely prevent loss through fraud and dishonesty. Where you have collusion, means will be found to defeat, to some extent, the closest audit that can be invented and I think that all legislation can do is to protect the depositor and the public and the shareholders to the best of our ability, reasonably protect him. Many suggestions have been made. It has been pointed out that the appointment of auditor, while vested by the Act in the shareholders, would really be made by the directors. Any suggestions that will ensure that the auditors appointed shall be firms of the highest reputation and standing, men who would not collude, even if they were invited to collude, will receive the most careful and earnest consideration not only of the committee but of the Government. The suggestions that have been made will be considered. There is a provision in the Act that the Government may ask the auditor appointed by the shareholders to make an inspection of the bank, if anything appears in the statement handed into the Government, or anything called to the attention of the Government would seem to require examination, and report to the Government. I will be prepared to consider any suggestions that will tend to make that investigation a greater safeguard than the Bill provides. A suggestion has been made as to a minority requesting that an auditor be appointed. We will be prepared also in commitee to carefully consider that, in fact any suggestions of a practical characterare not only invited but will be welcomed, because we have all only one desire and that is to safeguard, as far as we can by effectual legislative safeguards, the interest of the depositors, the shareholders and the public generally.

Something has been said of the inspection of insurance companies. There is this essential difference between the two. An insurance company at its head office has the securities in which the moneys it has received are invested. The class of securities in which it may invest is defined in the Insurance Act, there is no difficulty in inspecting these securities, they are stock certificates or bonds, tangible securities. It can be readily ascertained whether or not they are under the corporate powers of the insurance companies and there is this essential difference between banks and life insurance or loan companies which, as the hon. member for Lambton has said, invest in mortgages and municipal debentures, that the banks invest upon personal security, upon notes all over Canada and the world, that they have $1,000,000,000 worth of current loans or discounts among their assets. These are principally upon personal security, so there is that essential difference between the banks on the one hand and insurance and loan companies on the other.

Speaking generally with regard to the audit system provided by the Act, it is practically the suggestion of Mr. McLeod, who was the general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, and a pioneer in this question of external inspection. The audit which is provided in this Bill is the audit he had in mind. I am sure that we can so mould the provisions of this Bill as to ensure that the auditors appointed by the shareholders at their annual meeting shall be reputable men of standing and capacity who will realize their duty under the Act and who will not be unduly influenced, and who will not be in a position to be unduly influenced by directors or officials or any one else. I think that can be accomplished and we shall try to bring that about, at the same time being willing to consider any other suggestions that have been made or may be made. It has been said that the audit system will be futile and ineffectual. I hesitate to believe that. The audit is a well recognized principle and has been for generations throughout the British world. The law in the United Kingdom provides for audit substantially as we have provided here. In all the provinces of Canada there is a system of audit under which auditors appointed by shareholders examine the affairs of a company, check over the cash and securities, and make their report to the shareholders. Personally, I believe it is of very great value, but a different opinion has been expressed as to that. As against that opinion I would just set out the fact that, as I have stated, audit is recognized throughout the British Empire as a very beneficial check upon the administration of officers of companies of all kinds, and therefore I cannot believe that it would be ineffectual. On the contrary I believe that auditors of high standing, who are not so elected as to be under the improper influence of any set of men, would carry out their work with credit to themselves and with great benefit, so far as safeguards are concerned, to the shareholders and to the public. I think that is the principle that underlies English law relating to audit. When we came to consider this, when we found as I have stated that in the Bill left by my predecessor there was this very form of audit made permissive, when I looked up the English law and found it was compulsory in Great Britain and that it was substantially the law throughout the British Empire, I thought, and still think, that the step made in this Act is a forward step and that the present Bill is decidedly in advance in many respects of any legislation relating to banking which we have had in this country up to date.

Now I think there is nothing further that I desire to say. The proper place to discuss these questions in detail is of course in the Committee, and I have no doubt that the Committee will bring to bear upon the question the sincere desire of bringing about well considered legislation which will meet the difficulties that have arisen and the defects that have been disclosed in the legislation relating to banking since the period of the last revision in 1901.

Mr. GERMAN: Would the hon. gentleman give us his views as to the right of a bank to have priority, as against other creditors, on the shares held by a deputy?

Mr. WHITE: I would like to consider that. I am not quite sure that I am familiar with the point raised by my hon. friend. I understand that a bank to-day has a lien upon its shares to the extent of any indebtedness of the shareholder to the bank. Is that it?

Mr. GERMAN: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: That seems to be a privilege which banks have but which I am not at all sure that they should have. I am quite willing to consider that in Committee. It is not the case in connection with any other companies, but it probably arises from this fact that the banks are not allowed to loan upon their own shares and they are not allowed to buy their own shares because that would diminish their security to the creditors. Nor are they allowed to borrow upon them. I am not at all sure that they should have that privilege, and when it comes up in Committee I shall be very glad to consider the point.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN: It is possible, though I am not quite sure, that we shall take up the third reading of the Bill to confirm the trade arrangement with the West Indies. After that we shall take up Order No. 3, resuming the debate upon the motion for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, January 31, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 105, respecting the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company.—Mr. Currie.

Bill No. 106, respecting patents of the Johnston Harvester Company.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 107, to incorporate the Manitoba-Ontario Railway Company.—Mr. Carrick.

GOVERNMENT INTERNAL ELEVATORS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. BUCHANAN: Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce state whether there is any foundation for the following despatch in this morning's Citizen:

Fort William, Ont., Jan. 30.—An important announcement is likely to be made in a few days affecting the grain business and the farmers of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

It is as good as settled that the Dominion Government will at an early date proceed to establish a very extensive system of internal elevators at central points in Alberta, Saskatchewan and possibly in Manitoba.

Mr. Staples, one of the grain commissioners, has been very active in the matter and has impressed upon the Government the imperative need for immediate action. The embargo announced by the Canadian Northern railway a few days ago has helped to bring the elevator situation to a point where action is necessary.

The first elevators, of probably 1,000,000 bushels capacity each, will in all probability be located at Saskatoon and Swift Current in Saskatchewan and Red Deer and Lethbridge in Alberta. Elevators may be erected at Calgary and Edmonton later on, but the question of city population does not enter seriously into the matter. The idea is to secure relief for congested districts and prevent blockades bound to occur.

It is understood that the railroad companies are planning and co-operating with the Government. The railroads figure that the same railway equipment as at present will be able to give about fourfold the present service.

As this is a very important matter to the West, I would like a statement from the Government as to whether there is any foundation for this report.

Mr. FOSTER: I saw that article. There is a good deal of ingenuity displayed in buiding up and extending the supposed information in it; but I have to tell my hon. friend that no conclusions have been arrived at, and up to the present time there cannot be said to be any truth in the article.

Mr. BORDEN.

THE CANADA GRAIN ACT.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could the Minister of Trade and Commerce answer the question which I asked the other day with reference to the proposed amendment to the Grain Act?

Mr. FOSTER: I think there will be some amendments to the Canada Grain Act. They will not be very important and will not extend the list of places where sample markets may be established. The procedure under that Act has to be pretty carefully undertaken, and it is not the intention to enlarge the number of sample market points at present. I am not in a position as yet to state whether there will be any extension of the number of places where there may be boards of survey. The amendments will provide for inspection at milling points where it is considered advisable.

OCEAN FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Has the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce been called to the enormous increase in ocean freight rates as applied to Canadian export grain, and can any relief be afforded through the subventions granted to some of the steamship companies?

Mr. FOSTER: That question has been brought to my attention. A representative committee from the Council of the Board of Trade of Toronto waited on me in Toronto and placed before me the matter not simply of rates upon grain but of ocean rates generally, and from their papers, so far as I have been able to look at them, they established the fact that the increase has been considerable.

Mr. MACLEAN: Phenomenal.

Mr. FOSTER: Whether it is unreasonable or not is a matter which is now being investigated by officials of my department. Similar representations have been received from merchants and other boards of trade.

GRAIN TRAFFIC DIVERSION.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would call the attention of the Minister of Marine to some resolutions adopted the other day by the Montreal Board of Trade about the diversion of grain traffic from Canada through the United States, in view of the very high insurance rates. Has my hon. friend received those resolutions, and what action do the Government intend to take? Of course, it is always the old question of Lloyds. I understand that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in a speech delivered not very long ago, rather suggested the idea that the Government would be willing to help towards the establishment of a Lloyds insurance in view of the high rates on the St. Lawrence. Is any action contemplated by the Government on this question?

Mr. FOSTER: As the hon. member has referred to me, I may say that the matter of insurance rates to Canadian ports as contrasted with the rates in the zone to the south of us, has for the last year engaged the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and myself, and a good deal of time has been expended and a great deal of information collected. As my hon. friend knows, it is a very difficult question. The position that the Minister of Marine and myself have taken is that we are thoroughly sympathetic with any means by which more reasonable insurance rates can be got for the St. Lawrence route, and our Atlantic shipping ports, at the same time we think it is up to the shipping and exporting interests to take the first step towards some practical method of meeting the difficulty. In taking that step they will be sure of the sympathy and co-operation of the Government. but to what extent I am not prepared to say.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, resumed from January 17.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Exactly two weeks ago to-day the debate upon the naval proposals of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was adjourned. It was adjourned at a moment when an emergency was constantly brought to our attention by hon. gentlemen opposite, and when it was constantly in evidence. In fact, the hon. members of this House felt somewhat insecure on account of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite that there was really an emergency facing the British Empire and facing Canada as part of the British Empire. Two weeks afterwards the debate is resumed at a time when the waters of international politics are as calm as a millpond in summer—at a time when England and Germany are working hand in hand to re-establish the peace of Europe. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister is very much to be congratulated upon this state of affairs, because, now that there is absolutely no question of emergency, and cannot possibly be any question of an emergency, he can use that money in the development of this country. He can do more: he can begin at once to establish his permanent policy, if he has any permanent policy, upon naval affairs in this country. The question of an emergency was the one upon which hon. gentlemen opposite based the support which they gave to the naval proposals of my right hon. friend. Within the last few days one of the ministers of the Crown, speaking before certain electors in the city of Montreal, said that he had supported the resolution of 1909, brought in by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, because, at that time he, with his Nationalist friends, was convinced not of the necessity for naval construction, not of the pride which every Canadian should have in the defence of his own country, or in the defence of the British Empire, but of the emergency which they believed then existed. Nationalists, he said, believed that if an emergency existed, it was the duty of hon. members of this House to support the resolution, and therefore he gave his support to the resolution of 1909. Strange, is it not, that in 1909, when the resolution was introduced by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, the emergency existed only in the vivid imagination of that minister of the Crown who gave utterance to such an argument? But he went further and said that he now supported the proposals of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister not because of any naval necessity within the British Empire, and solely because he believed that the right hon. gentleman had proved, by the memorandum laid upon the table and by his statement of the secret which is locked up within his own breast, that there was an emergency.

Now, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has been able to forget the emergency. He has been able to introduce legislation affecting our banks, which he considered to be of more importance to the British Empire, and legislation with reference to a treaty which he and his Government have concluded with the descendants of the liberated Africans in the West Indies, as well as with the English-speaking people of those colonies. It will be the duty of my right hon. friend to again prove, at least to his colleague, that he has a right to expect his support because that emergency, which seems to have been tied to the tail of a kite and to have flown out of the reach of hon. gentlemen opposite, still really exist, at least in the sinuous imagination of the Prime Minister. Upon this side of the House, we take a different view. Of course, we participate with hon. gentlemen on the opposite side in satisfaction at the happy condition of affairs which at present exists, and we believe that there is absolutely no emergency. We believed from the inception of this debate that there could not possibly be an emergency. We upon this side of the House have more faith in the British Empire and in Britishers ever to have believed that it was possible for 65,000,000 people of the German Empire to beat, either on land or at sea, the British Empire with its population of over 400,000,000 people. But we believed that it was becoming the dignity of a self-governing country within the British Empire to defend its own people and its own territory, and thus to take its proper share of defence of the British Empire. Therefore, in 1909, we took the stand, which we have maintained ever since, in support of the resolution which was presented in a concrete form by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

It would seem to us that there are two classes of Canadians. There are Canadians who have faith in their own country, who have faith in the men of their own country, who have faith in the brains of the men of their own country, and who believe that if Canada is to follow out her national traditions and her lines of development within the British Empire, the time to begin the national defence of this country is to-day, and within her own bounds. There is another class of Canadians who believe that they cannot possibly have any initiative, who have no confidence in their own brains or in the brains of the men who lead them, who believe that upon all matters affecting the policy of this country they are subservient to the brains of the men whose sphere is confined by the boundaries of Great Britain and Ireland. They are the men to whom I do not wish to appeal today. I wish rather to appeal to the men who have faith in their own country and in the destiny of their own country; who believe that Canada, because Canada is Canada within the British Empire, should have the pride of Canadians, and should build up their own country, not to be a burden upon the British Empire but to be able in time of need to render real assistance to the British Empire by defending her own coasts, her own people, and her own commerce.

Let me ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister what prompted him to make the proposal which he made. He knew what the policy of the leader of the Opposition was. He knew that we upon this side of the House risked political power owing to combinations made by hon. gentlemen opposite. He knew that we were not afraid to risk political power—that it was a matter of taking a stand upon a most important question affecting the policy of this country and the policy of the British Empire. He knew all that. He delivered speeches in support of that policy. He supported the resolution which contained it, and every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House did likewise; but he found, when he was called upon to carry out that policy or to frame another, that he was not capable of doing so, and he conceived the idea of taking certain of his colleagues with him and of travelling abroad. He did so; he put the country to considerable expense—we do not mind that so much; he arrived safely in London, and it was a matter of congratulation to the people of Canada that the Prime Minister arrived safely. He had sundry banquets and receptions, all in excellent form, and he debated the question of a naval policy. He went to the Board of Admiralty to consult them. He had forgotten that the Board of Admiralty had already given its advice to Canada, but he went again, he came home, he was received with the dignity becoming his position, we on this side of the House sharing with the people of Canada a feeling which was natural in the people towards their Prime Minister. We were glad to share in his reception. We expected that he was carrying back to Canada the basis of a policy which would be of some permanency, but on the contrary, we were amazed when we found that, whatever he might know of the naval position of the British Empire, or whatever he might know of the naval position of Canada, was locked up in his breast and he had to cable back to the Board of Admiralty for a document which would support the position which he meant to take before the people of this country. He had not faith in his own word, in his own action or in his own power of expression. He cabled over to London and there got a document, commonly known as the memorandum of the Board of Admiralty. He came into this House, proudly laid it on the table and said: Here is my evidence that an emergency exists and to meet that emergency we should immediately contribute $35,000,000 to the navy of the British Empire. So, we must assume right away that my right hon. friend had absolutely no ulterior motive. His one idea was to find the best solution of the naval difficulty. Let me assure him that upon this side of the House we share with him the same sentiments of loyalty towards the British Empire. We are concerned as keenly as he is with the solution of any naval difficulty which may ever confront the British Empire and instead of criticising the measure brought down by my right hon. friend, as it was the right of the Opposition to criticise it, we thought that we might do better in a moment of such great importance to the country and the Empire by helping my right hon. friend with a solution of the difficulty. Therefore, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition offered him an amendment which conveys the real expression of the feeling of the people of this country outside of this House as well as the feeling of hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House. It conveys the feeling of hon. gentlemen opposite if they were free to give voice to the views which are at present in their minds.

Before, however, taking up what I presume to be the case of the Government, since the Government bases its whole case upon the memorandum, I would like to make reference to the very admirable speech delivered prior to the adjournment by the hon. gentleman representing North Perth (Mr. Morphy). I congratulate him upon his sentiment when he says that no aspersions should be cast upon the loyalty of hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House. I think it is possible to discuss a question such as this simply as a question that affects the judgment of the members of this House, without accusing one another of disloyalty. It shall be my endeavour to deal with this question without affecting in any way the sensibilities of any hon. gentleman upon the other side of the House. Had the hon. member for North Perth contented himself with saying that he did not wish to cast any aspersion upon the loyalty of any hon. gentleman upon this side of the House he would have given expression to something that was known. But he qualified this statement. He said a moment afterwards, and almost in the same voice, that he could not possibly favour and this country did not favour, the idea of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition of creating a separatist navy. Was it really a separatist navy that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had in mind? Was it really the idea which prompted my right hon. friend, the then Prime Minister, in bringing in his resolution of 1909? I will appeal to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), the archangel of loyalty in this country, who spoke in this House in 1909, I do not think any hon. gentleman opposite or any supporters of theirs in the country will accuse the then hon. member for North Toronto, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of disloyalty. Let me quote to you, Mr. Speaker, the words of the hon. gentleman:

> The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada. I want to see something grafted on the soil of Canada's nationhood.

I do not quote these words to criticise them; I believed then as I believe to-day that they are correct, and I do not believe that they are disloyal words. They are not the words of the leader of the Opposition but they are the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He goes on to say:

> The point with me is as to whether it is not the greater wisdom to sow the seed at once and cultivate its growth as best we may.

The hon. member for North Perth was not in the House then, but we were, and we heard the words, and we did not think that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was then advocating a separatist navy; we thought he was giving expression to loyal sentiments towards the British Empire. But if the hon. member is not satisfied to take the Minister of Trade and Commerce as his mentor; if he is not satisfied with him as his preceptor in loyalty, let me ask him to listen to the words uttered by his leader, the present Prime Minister, on the same occasion in this House. Says the Right Hon. R. L. Borden:

> Acknowledged in every civilized community, recognized among all the great nations of the earth, the primal responsibility is the defence of their territories and the protection of their commerce.

Do not these words embody the principle of the amendment now proposed by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Were those disloyal words that were uttered by the Right Hon. Mr. Borden? Were we disloyal then because we applauded them and are we disloyal to-day because we continue to applaud them? But, the Right Hon. Mr. Borden did not content himself with these words; he went on to say:

> I am entirely of opinion in the first place that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard (in the defence of our territory) is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that. The other experiment (the experiment of contribution) has been tried as between Australia and the Mother Country, and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory.

Does the hon. member think that these words of his leader embody any sentiment of disloyalty when he says that in Great Britain the contribution of Australia has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory. But, the right hon. the Prime Minister now, then the leader of the Opposition, did not think he gave sufficient emphasis to his views, and he proceeded to say:

> The unanimous voice of the people of Canada demands that we shall be in the Empire and of the Empire, and being in the Empire and of the Empire we must take our fair share of the burden of the naval defence of that Empire and particularly of our sea coasts.

Let me tell the hon. member for Perth that at that time the Right Hon. Mr. Borden was so loyal that he wanted to set aside one-half of the annual militia expenditure of this country, estimated then at six million dollars, for the defence of the British Empire in building ships of our own. I might remind the Minister of Finance, whom I now see in his seat, that when the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier presented his resolution in 1909—a resolution which was supported by all the members of the House—the only objection which Mr. Borden, then leader of the Opposition, had to that resolution was that he wanted the word 'speedy' added to it; he wanted a speedy construction of the ships in Canada. Do the hon. member for North Perth and his friends on the other side of the House think that the Right Hon. R. L. Borden was disloyal in that? I think I have said sufficient on that score to convince the Minister of Finance and the member for North Perth and other gentlemen opposite who were not then in the House, that if there was any disloyalty in the matter the disloyalty was not to be found on this side of the House, but rather with the exponents of the doctrine sitting on their own side of the House, which we have tried to carry out ever since.

The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe), speaking immediately before me in this debate, said that the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier could not hold the province of Quebec on account of his naval policy. Let me tell the hon. member that the right hon. gentleman did hold the province of Quebec. He forgets that out of the sixty-five constituencies in that province forty sent members to this House ready and willing to do something for Canada and for the British Empire, and that the only men whom the leader of the Opposition could not convince of the necessity of doing something for Canada, and Canada as a country of the British Empire, are the men from the province of Quebec who are to-day in the arms of the Right Hon. Mr. Borden. It was not the province of Quebec which Sir Wilfrid Laurier could not hold to assist him in giving aid to the Motherland; it was that section of the Quebec representatives who do not believe in doing anything for the defence of this country or for the defence of the British Empire.

I shall now pass on to the consideration of the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). That hon. gentleman said that we should adopt the proposal now before us on account of the need which existed in the British Empire. Before taking any stand upon the question I began to study what was the need of the British Empire. I could not find any need expressed in the terms of the Admiralty memorandum and I went to the finances of the United Kingdom and what did I find? I found that for 1911-12 the expenditure of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was £178,545,000 sterling; and that their revenue was £185,000,000 sterling, leaving them a surplus of £6,540,000 or roughly speaking $32,725,000. I did not think that was an indication of any need of money on the part of the Motherland. I was not satisfied with that, and so I examined their national debt and I found that the national debt of the United Kingdom in 1911 was £733,072,609 and in 1912 it was reduced to £718,406,428, giving a reduction on the national debt for the year of £14,666,188 or $73,330,905 that might indicate to certain hon. gentlemen opposite a need. I do not see it in that way; on the contrary, I see great prosperity. I examined the naval expenditure of Great Britain and the naval expenditure of Germany. I found that in the United Kingdom last year they were able to spend over £45,000,000 sterling on the navy. They knew that the 400,000,000 people of the British Empire were at their back if they were in need. But they did not say they were in need at any time; on the contrary they said they were prosperous. Germany spent only £22,000,000 sterling on her navy—less than one-half what was spent by Great Britain. There is no indication here of any need on the part of the British Empire. But let me quote in support of the figures, the words of Right Hon. Lloyd George, Chancellor of the Exchequer:

> We have in these five ou six years wiped out more debt than any administration that every existed in this country.

Even to the imagination of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce there cannot be any indication there of need. If then, need is not shown in the financial condition of Great Britain, where is it to be found? I admit, that the English, the Scotch, the Irish taxpayers, complain that they have too much to pay for the navy, and I shall have a further word to say about that before I conclude. But if there is no need shown in the finances of Great Britain, where is that need? My right hon. friend the leader of the Government said we should find it in the memorandum, prepared by the Board of Admiralty. Let me examine for a few moments that memorandum, that we may know what it contains. It sets out by declaring that 'the Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material, and still more important moral assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas.' I ask you to mark the words 'on the high seas.' It does not say 'in the home waters.' Now, let us proceed cautiously and analyze this first important statement. The Canadian Government offered to aid the British Government in matters of naval defence by one of two different systems. The first, the idea of the late government was to have Canadian units to co-operate in time of need with the British naval forces. The second, the idea of the present Government, denying the efficacy of their predecessors' proposition, made the alternative suggestion of a contribution to the British navy of $35,000,000 by way of three dreadnoughts. The Board of Admiralty state emphatically that it is more important to give moral than material aid; the material aid it does not require. The memorandum sets forth in terms the fact that its naval programme is sufficient as against Germany up to the year 1920. So far there does not seem the slightest hint that the British Government requires any aid from Canada in money or the building of ships. It goes on to say how many ships they have and how many ships the German navy has. And then it states:

> It has been necessary within the past decade to concentrate the fleet mainly in home waters.
> In 1902, there were 160 British vessels on the overseas stations against 76 to-day.

In the next paragraph the Admiralty make two important statements. They state why they concentrated ships in home waters—they wished to obtain 'local superiority.' Why did they wish to maintain 'local superiority?' The memorandum states explicitly at page 7. It refers to the preamble of the German naval law of 1900, which concludes 'a great naval power will not be in a position to concentrate all its forces against us.' England decided that she would place herself in a position to concentrate her forces against Germany. I am sorry we are obliged to give out the secrets of the Board of Admiralty, but the right hon. Prime Minister has invited it. When England made up its mind to concentrate its forces in home waters, what did it do? It withdrew its ships from the overseas stations in order to gain 'local superiority.' What, then, does the Board of Admiralty tell us? It tells us what general naval supremacy is, and I would ask the special attention of hon. members to this:

> General naval supremacy consists in the power to defeat in battle and drive from the seas the strongest hostile navy or combination of hostile navies wherever they may be found.

England has not been working towards general naval supremacy but towards local superiority in home waters. Was that for the protection of the dominions of the Crown? Not at all, as the memorandum shows:

> It is the general——
>
> Not the local.
> —naval supremacy of Great Britain which is the primary safeguard of the security and interest of the great dominions of the Crown.

She can maintain her local superiority against Germany up till 1920 at least. But can she maintain her general naval supremacy, that supremacy which is 'the primary safeguard of the security and interests of the great dominions of the Crown'? What does she say to that? She answers the question:

> Further, at the present time and in the immediate future Great Britain has the power, by making special arrangements and mobilizing a portion of the reserves, to send, without courting disaster at home, an effective fleet of battleships and cruisers to unite with the Royal Australian navy and the British squadrons in China and the Pacific for the defence of British Columbia, Australia and New Zealand.

Sir Richard McBride saw that, if my hon. friend the Prime Minister did not, and the Premier of British Columbia knew that England was in a position to maintain her local superiority, and did not stand in need of empty ships. He knew also—and gave expression to the idea in the legislature—that England, whilst now in a position to maintain her general naval supremacy through a combination of the Australian navy and the British squadrons in China and the Pacific, might not always be able to do so, and he warned my hon. friend the Prime Minister to begin at once the construction of a navy for the protection of the coasts of this country—the very principle of the amendment introduced by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Let us go a little further with the consideration of the famous memorandum which my right hon. friend and his colleagues claim to be the brief upon which they base the proposition before this House. If general naval supremacy is the safeguard of the interests of the overseas dominions, is it the duty of this House to help maintain England's local superiority when she tells us she does not want any such help; and that she has made provision, covering the period up to 1920, as against Germany, her greatest naval rival? The conclusion to be drawn from the memorandum is that it is the duty of this House to see that we in Canada do what we can to maintain the general naval supremacy of Great Britain. The conclusion we are bound to come to is that although England, by keeping part of her navy at the overseas stations, is able to defend her overseas dominions; the time has come to withdraw her ships from the overseas stations, and concentrate them in the home waters. And why? Because the German naval law stated that no naval power could do such a thing. Another conclusion, that the dominions, to continue the safeguard of their security, must see to the continuance of the general naval supremacy of Great Britain, seems to me to be the logical sequence of the Admiralty's statement. I have already defined general naval supremacy, but allow me once more to lay stress upon the words. Such supremacy consists in the power to defeat in battle and drive from the high seas the strongest hostile navy or combination of navies, not in the home waters, but upon the high seas, wherever they may be found. Was that the idea of the British Admiralty in drawing up this document at the request of my hon. friend the Prime Minister? The British Admiralty asked for nothing, but received an offer. They do not want material assistance, but they do want moral assistance in order to maintain British naval supremacy, not in home waters, but on the high seas. To hon. gentlemen opposite it should be as clear as the letters of the alphabet that what England is seeking is the protection of the overseas stations, and not the increase in the number of her ships in the home waters and after giving to this memorandum much thought and consideration, I could not derive from its words any other idea. Having a desire to be convinced, I sought out the words of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce as appearing in 'Hansard,' and what did I find? Listen for a moment:

> Sir, the question forces itself. Six and a half millions of people with their mighty heritage, and yet to-day no adequate defence in her great seaports from a third-class cruiser which might suddenly appear within her gates! It makes us think. We can excuse it; we can palliate it; we can laugh it off; we can say it is fanciful to put the question to ourselves just that way; that it ought to make us think and ought to make this Parliament think, and every good citizen of this country think.

And it did make us think! Here we have confirmation from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce of the fact that the conclusion I have drawn from the memorandum is the view the British Admiralty desires us to take of the matter.

I infer from the memorandum that England requires her navy at home, that we are safe for the immediate future on account of combinations which may be made in time of necessity, and that the overseas stations are inadequately protected. My right hon. friend thinks the solution to the difficulty lies in the borrowing from England of $35,000,000 in order to lend her $35,000,000 worth of empty ships, to be manned and maintained in England at the expense of the English, Scotch and Irish taxpayers. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite one question. England's local supremacy, you say, is guaranteed; you want to assure her general naval supremacy. England states that is the only thing you can do, and the only thing she desires to be done. You wish to do it generously and judiciously. England's overseas stations require protection, and you want to afford that protection. Did the Admiralty tell you seriously that the best way to protect the overseas stations was by sending empty ships into the Mersey? Did it not occur to the right hon. gentleman that if he wanted to obtain, for instance, the best possible protection for these national buildings in Ottawa, he would not obtain it by sending a squad of Dominion policemen to the city of Toronto to be paid for in Toronto, to be uniformed in Toronto and to be administered in Toronto, but to be recalled to Ottawa when the buildings might be in danger? Does it not appear to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance who comes from Toronto that the best protection to offer to the buildings in this city would be to keep his Dominion policemen around the buildings? He thinks that the best way to protect the overseas stations is to send a few empty ships across the ocean to be brought back here when those overseas stations would be attacked. Let me put it in another way. They want to be generous towards England, Scotland and Ireland. They want to relieve the British taxpayer. They say that the British taxpayer —in other words that the English, the Scotch and the Irish taxpayer—is overburdened with taxation. They want to relieve it. That is the only reason they have left; their emergency has gone up with their kite. The taxes remain. The English, Scotch or Irish taxpayer will still have to pay his taxes and my hon. friends opposite want to relieve him. How do they propose to relieve him? The English, Scotch and Irish taxpayer say: We have already too many taxes to pay for the upkeep of our navy. The Prime Minister says: That is true, you have, I agree with you, Canada must do her share; we will build three immense ships to cost $35,000,000 or more. We will send them over the sea. You will man them, pay for the manning of them, you will pay for their upkeep and we will help you increase your taxes by that amount. Of course that may be sentiment or that may be loyalty but I cannot see it is efficient help to the English, Scotch and Irish taxpayer. Let me put it another way: My right hon. friend says, I have lived in your house, you have been overgenerous to me; you have paid for my board and I want to do something in return. You say you have a mortgage on your house, that you cannot pay the interest on that mortgage. I will help you. I will build an addition to that house and I will place upon the addition a second mortgage so that you will have to pay not only the interest on the first mortgage which you say, to use my right hon. friend's words, weighs too heavily upon you but you will have to pay the interest on the second mortgage—and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister calls that loyalty to the British taxpayer. It may be, Sir, but it is not the loyalty which I conceive we owe the British Empire, and it is not the loyalty which I wish to exercise towards the British taxpayer.

The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce says there is need, the finances of England show that there is absolutely no need, the memorandum shows that there is no need. But what do the people of England say? Let me quote from the Nation, a standard paper published in England—the only quotation which I shall offer. That paper says:

There is no naval necessity. There cannot be; for if there were, Mr. Churchill would deserve impeachment. What is there? Superfluity? Who dares ask the Canadian taxpayer to help us to more ships than we want, or the British taxpayer to keep them when they are built? But perhaps the necessity is not here, in European waters, but there, in the Pacific, at which indeed the Churchill memorandum plainly hints. But if so, why are these ships to be assigned to the central British fleet, instead of to the wardership of the Pacific coast? If there is a real and pressing need of the Motherland for added security against the German peril, no detachment of the Canadian ships from the North Sea is possible. And if (as, of course, is the fact) no strain exists on our shipbuilding or our financial resources, Sir Wilfrid Laurier's plan of building a national Canadian navy provides for any future relief which the central power may desire. The financial relief is obviously much greater. As the Borden offer stands, we shall, in the ordinary relations of debtor and creditor which exist between the two nations, lend Canada £7,000,000, for she cannot fairly be expected to meet this 'emergency' expense out of new taxation. This sum she expends in three semi-detached 'dreadnoughts,' which we, again, are to man and maintain. The one cost balances the other, even if the expense of manning does not exceed the interest on our loan. Thus we (at the Admiralty's suggestion) lend Canada money so that she may lend us ships, which we (on the Admiralty's showing) do not really want. The Laurier plan would have relieved us of the embarrassment of this ungracious bookkeeping. Canada would have had her ships instead of lending them to us on a running account, subject to withdrawal, and would yet have made a handsome and definite contribution to Imperial defence. It is not necessary to know why, with these advantages clearly in view, the Imperial Government, having accepted Sir Wilfrid Laurier's view of Canada's naval responsibilities, should revert to Mr. Borden's less signal logical and less practical plan.

I leave that part of my remarks there with the opinion of the English press supporting it. I maintain that the Government measure is unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional, not on account of the form in which my right hon. friend brought it into this House, but because we, the representatives of the people, have not been given the mandate necessary to change the relations which exist to-day between this country and the British Empire. It is unconstitutional because this country has not got the right to send $35,000,000 to the British Empire, even by way of ships, without a specific mandate to that effect from the people of Canada. I claim that it is illogical. The Prime Minister says that in compensation for the $35,000,000 we will get representation upon the Committee of Imperial Defence. This subject will come up later, but let me say that the Prime Minister is no doubt aware that the Committee upon Imperial Defence, where he seeks a seat, has about one-half the power of a committee of the British House of Commons. If he wanted representation worth while he would do better to go and seek representation upon a committee of the British House of Commons rather than upon the Imperial Defence Committee.

The right hon. gentleman was in London in July, 1912. I have no doubt that he was in the House of Commons and listened to the Right Hon. Mr. Asquith's speech on the functions of the Committee of Imperial Defence. In case he has forgotten Mr. Asquith's words, let me give them for his benefit, for the benefit of the hon. members of this House, and for the benefit of the country. We want to know something of what this Committee of Imperial Defence means. Here is what Mr. Asquith said:

The functions of the committee have on the one hand, no reference to policy; policy must be determined by that Cabinet; and on the other hand it is not in any sense an executive, because, both as regards the army and the navy, the executive responsibility lies in the one case with the Secretary of State, and in the other with the First Lord of the Admiralty.

So that, if there is no emergency—and he himself has seen that there is no emergency, because otherwise he would not have allowed so much time to elapse before proceeding with this debate—if he is convinced there is no emergency, as I know he is by the memorandum of the Board of Admiralty—because he is a very able lawyer—he is quite willing to give $35,000,000 for representation on the Committee of Imperial defence, which has absolutely no power over policy and no executive power. My right hon. friend did not need to give $35,000,000 for a seat on the Committee of Imperial Defence. That was not the idea he had in his mind as to representation. What has made him change his mind? He wanted representation in a council where there would be some power affecting policy.

Let me quote his very words. Speaking in this House he said this:

If Canada and any of the other dominions of the Empire are to take their part as nations of this Empire in the defence of the Empire as a whole, shall it be said that we, contributing to that defence of the whole Empire, shall have absolutely, as citizens of this country, no voice whatever in the councils of the Empire touching the issues of peace or war throughout the Empire? I do not think that such would be a tolerable position. I do not think the people of Canada would for one moment submit to such a condition.

Now that the Prime Minister of England says you can have a seat upon the Committee of Imperial Defence, which has no power over policy, my right hon. friend abandons his glorious ideas to which he gave expression in this House, and immediately says: 'If that is all I can get, I am quite willing to take it.' Does the right hon. gentleman not know that England will never share the power she now holds over matters concerning policy? Why, therein lies the greatness and the power of England. Let me quote again for the satisfaction of my right hon. friend the words of Mr. Asquith at the Imperial conference when Sir Joseph Ward had the very same ideas as my right hon. friend. What did Sir Joseph Ward's proposal come to? It was the same proposal as my right hon. friend's. I might describe the effect of it without going into details. This is what Mr. Asquith then said:

> It would impair if not altogether destroy the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom in such great matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of peace treaties, the declaration and maintenance of peace, or the declaration of war; and indeed, all those relations with foreign powers necessarily are of the most delicate character which are now in the hands of the Imperial Government, subject to its responsibility to the Imperial Parliament.

That authority could not be shared, and neither my right hon. friend the Prime Minister nor his Government will ever succeed in getting England to share its power over the policy of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The last and only argument which my right hon. friend has to offer to the people of the country in support of his proposals is that he might get representation in a committee which has absolutely no power whatever except to give advice to the First Lord of the Admiralty, which advice might be accepted or rejected, thrown into the waste paper basket or put in a pigeon hole. Therefore, because of the illogical conclusion which the Government has reached in its study of the memorandum, and because of the unconstitutionality of the Government asking powers not included in the general mandate conferred upon members of this House, I oppose the Government measure, and I insist that it is the Government's duty to appeal to the people for confirmation of its proposed action. If the right hon. the Prime Minister feels that he has the backing of the country in his proposals, why does he not go before the people of Canada and ask them to confirm the action of his Government? When reciprocity was brought into this House the then Opposition asked the Government to appeal to the people to find out whether they were behind them in that proposal. The late Government accepted the invitation of the then Opposition and appealed to the people of Canada for confirmation. Now, we issue the same invitation to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government. We ask him to appeal to the people, and we on this side of the House will go before the people confident that they will support the amendment of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I have very much pleasure in supporting that amendment, because I believe in the necessity of self-defence, and that the time has come for Canada to assume her share in Imperial defence by building, equipping and maintaining her own navy for the protection of the people of this country, so that in time of need she may aid in the maintenance of the solidity of the great Empire of which she forms a part and of the Crown which is the emblem of the liberty of all races and all creeds in this country. As long as I have a seat in this House I will do all that I believe possible, within my judgment, in conjunction with any or either party, to uphold the dignity of this country as a member of the greatest Empire in the world—not an Empire in need, as the Prime Minister would have us believe, but a great, a strong, a growing, a prosperous Empire. We upon this side of the House, I think, are at one in the determination to continue to maintain the position which we took in 1909, to insist upon the building of a Canadian navy to defend the people and territory of this country, as a country within the British Empire, and, in time of need, if the British Empire should ever be in need, to co-operate with the other countries of the Empire.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, if it were not superfluous, I would like to congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin), who has just taken his seat, on his oratory and patriotism. Having said that much, I intend to crave the indulgence of the House for a very short time while I discuss this question from perhaps a new standpoint and refer to one or two questions that have rather escaped the attention of those who have debated the subject up to the present moment. First, I would like to refer to the question of a referendum. I notice that a great many in Canada, and especially the people who are in the West, and that portion of the people in the West who are organized as the Grain Growers' Association have, on recent occasions, made declarations in favour of a referendum to the people upon this question. While I am a believer in the referendum, I am not a believer in a referendum on a matter of this kind. To me the safety of the nation is the supreme law and the safety of the nation has to be in the keeping of Parliament and especially in the keeping of the Government of the day. Not for one moment do I see how it would be possible to relegate this question of supreme importance, namely, the safety of the nation, to the vote of the people. We in this House every day pray that Providence may assist the King to vanquish and overcome all his enemies, and, if we live up to that prayer, it is our first duty to our country to take the responsibility of the defence of the country. The Privy Councillor, in his oath of office, is sworn before everything else to maintain the King's supremacy and the safety of the King's subjects and, that being the case, and that being the universal practice wherever British institutions prevail, it would be an absolutely new departure if a question of this supreme importance, in any phase of it, should be referred to the opinion of the people. The responsibility is on Parliament and the responsibility is on the dominant party of the day to maintain the defence of the country in every quarter. We would be poltroons in this House if we had not the courage to represent the nation on so important a question as this. We cannot escape our responsibility, nor can the people assume that responsibility and carry on our parliamentary institutions such as they are to-day.

It will first be necessary, if we are to have the referendum in this country, to have it started by parliamentary and constitutional definition what the extent of the referendum is to be, and how the vote of the people on any question referred to them is to be carried out and crystallized into legislation. We have no such provision as that at the present time. One of the things that we might take up, that we ought to take up, if we believe in the principle, is the question of defining the extent of the referendum and to what questions it might be applied. There are a great many questions that might be referred to the people, and they would form the basis of such progressive legislation as the country requires. The question of parcel post, that we had up for discussion in this House the other day, is a good question to refer to the people. There are social subjects, like the drink evil. We once did refer that question to all Canada, yet we paid no respect to the declaration of the people at that time. Many other questions could be referred to the people for their opinion—public ownership with regard to telephone and many questions like that. There are social questions that ought to go to the people without being encumbered by any other questions. It would be a good thing if we had a referendum upon all these questions and if we were governed by the results.

But, it must first be arranged for by a constitutional definition and when it is defined we must also set out to what questions it will apply. Certainly, it does not apply to defence of the country. The responsibility is especially upon the Government, it is upon Parliament, and we cannot contract ourselves out of that responsibility in any way. We must assume it and I am glad that at last the Parliament of Canada have come to a consideration of this supreme question. It was our duty to take it up. We were unworthy to call ourselves Canadians and members of the British Empire so long as we sat quietly here and saw the good old Motherland defend the Empire and the poor struggling taxpayers of the Mother Country supporting the weight of taxation necessary for the defence of the Empire and especially for the defence of the people of Canada. To-day for the first time, I can hold up my head as a Canadian and can talk with some purpose as a member of the Empire, as I purpose to talk, for a few moments, in regard to the great questions which agitate Europe to-day and which concern us more or less in connection with the defence of the Empire.

Having got that far, I propose now for a moment to take up this particular policy which is before us. The first thing I wish to say is that this policy to me is no temporary policy. It is an absolute permanent policy upon which we as Canadians are entering. The resolution based upon a money grant which has been brought into this House is the beginning of a great permanent policy on the part of Canada, by her sharing in the naval defence or any other defence of the whole Empire, Canada included.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the permanent policy?

Mr. MACLEAN: This may be not a very wide policy, but it will develop. It is the beginning of a permanent policy.

Mr. MACDONALD: What kind of a permanent policy?

Mr. MACLEAN: A permanent policy to this extent that it is a confession for the first time that the people of Canada, through their Parliament, admit their responsibility to the Empire for the defence of the Empire and for their contribution to that end. Once having entered upon that policy—

Mr. MACDONALD: That is not a policy.

Mr. MACLEAN: Let the hon. gentleman bear with me for a moment. It is the beginning of a permanent policy; it is a vote of money and it is a declaration of faith, and it is the first time we have ever gone that far—no, not the first time, for we have had the policy of the former Government. But here we have today a vote of money for the defence of the Empire, we have a declaration of faith, and it is the beginning of a great permanent policy. We cannot withdraw from what we are doing here today or reconsider or remit it to the people, ever after there must be a naval policy in this country which more or less must be based on what we are doing here today. We are beginning it now and we must continue it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Continue a contribution.

Mr. MACLEAN: No, let the hon. gentleman speak for himself and I will speak for myself. It is the beginning of a permanent policy, which will be continued from this time on, and it is because it is the beginning of a permanent policy that I, as a Canadian, rejoice to see it begin and I hope to see it kept up, and developed and strengthened hereafter. I will give you one or two instances to show that it is the beginning of a permanent policy. The conversations that took place between the Prime Minister of Canada and his associates and the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his associates all confirm my statement. There would have been no such conversations, and the documents which have passed, and the agreement that Canada is to have a seat in the Committee of Defence, and the promise that shipbuilding on behalf of the British navy is very shortly to be undertaken in Canada, all go to show that it is the beginning of a permanent policy. The vote of money we are making, this declaration of faith that is now taking place in this House, and, most of all, the far-reaching resolution of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, have converted it into an absolutely permanent policy; and we are in it now and for all time and I thank God we are in it now and for all time and that we will have a continuous permanent policy in line of maintaining the defences of the Empire. When I hear it said that this is a temporary measure and that it is based on emergency, it has no great value to me from that point of view, but it has immense value to me inasmuch as I regard it to be part of a permanent policy and therefore enabling us to have a voice in questions that we have a great interest in.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the hon. gentleman think that Australia is very badly treated within the Empire, because while she does her part in the way of naval defence she has not asked and is not receiving any position where she has a voice as to the wars of the Empire?

Mr. MACLEAN: I will deal with that matter later; I wish to make my argument now and my argument is that I regard this as a permanent policy and it being almost our first declaration of faith, I would like to see it a unanimous policy. One hundred and thirty years ago there was a little book published in England by an English squire, who didn't think it worth while to put his name to the first edition; it was written on the grand old sport of fox-hunting as it is carried on in England, and in one of the chapters this squire, good old Peter Beckford, discusses the excellence of the sport, and he especially dilates on a good pack of foxhounds working in the field and he says:

> I like to see them run like the horses of the sun all abreast.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see all the parties in this House run like the horses of the sun, all abreast to the defence of the British Empire. Not only that, but I would like to see all the outlying dominions, and we will see them: Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa running like the horses of the sun, all abreast for the defence of the Empire. And Sir, in some way we must come to that unity and we must all run abreast.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Were they not all running abreast in 1909?

Mr. MACLEAN: I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) will try to help this movement, and I trust that the running all abreast will not be confined to Canada but that it will include all the outlying dominions of the Motherland. We are going into this thing, not so much at the present moment to build dreadnoughts or to do this or that, as to make a declaration of faith and to make that declaration of faith to all the world that Canada, New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, are running like the horses of the sun all abreast to the defense of the Motherland. I would like to see it that all parties in this House and all the people of Canada, should voice their faith by some kind of unanimous declaration, not only that we are to help with money as this vote proposes, but that later on we are to help with ships, with men, with the development of the Canadian navy, and with a policy, the basis of which is the creation of sea power by Canada on the North American continent.

Mr. TURRIFF: We made that declaration four years ago.

Mr. MACLEAN: I know that declaration has been made and I do not want to interfere with it, and I would like to see it carried out and to the point.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some of your friends are too foxy.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: We fixed you all right.

Mr. MACLEAN: Now, I want to say why I believe we should all declare our faith as to our responsibility for the defence of the Empire and what will be the result of such action on our part. All the world is to-day watching southeastern Europe and the war between Turkey and the Balkan States. I have often wished that we could in this House of Commons express some opinion as to what is going on in Europe. In the British House of Commons it is the right of members to speak more or less on these questions, but have been precluded from discussing some of the questions that are up in Europe and which in my mind are of vital importance to us. This great struggle for liberty is now on in southeastern Europe. That is a struggle for better government. It is a mighty movement of the people concerned, native races, Christian races, to recover their liberty, liberty of country, and liberty of conscience, against an invasion, I will not say of heathen people, but of people altogether different from them in religion. These struggling people have always had the sympathy of the democracy of America. But we have never been able to send a message of sympathy to them; even the democracy of the United States in nearly every case has been precluded from sending them a message of sympathy. But, to-day, with this vote of ours which, in a way makes us responsible for the peace of Europe, we can send a message to these people of sympathy. And more, we can send an intimation to the great powers of Europe that they must clean up and clear up the situation there and allow these people the freedom to which they are entitled. In this I express, I am quite sure, the mind of the people of Canada, and, if I may speak for the democracy of Canada and of the United States, I have a right to demand the establishment in the near east of a better condition of affairs. Great Britain to-day has the leadership in the near eastern situation. And we have a right to say to Great Britain: Now that we have entered upon a policy of assisting you in your defence, and especially in the matter of defence arising out of these burning questions that exist in the near east, it is your duty to go ahead and clear up that situation and see that these nations that are struggling for liberty are given that liberty without delay. Who would have said, even sixty days ago, that this movement of the people in the Balkan countries was likely to succeed? But the people have gone ahead there; they have fought for their liberty, and a little more sympathy, a little more progressive action on the part of Great Britain, a declaration from us on our part that we wish to see these people made free, will go a long way towards establishing liberty in that part of the world. And for the first time, by reason of this vote, I have the right to say that in this House. Some will say to me: Why is that a vital issue to you in Canada? Every month in the year there are hundreds of these people coming to Canada and becoming our citizens—Greeks, Roumanians, Albanians and others. These people are coming, and coming in constantly increasing numbers; and the sooner they come to us with the seed of liberty in their minds and a knowledge of their rights as citizens, the better citizens they will be for Canada. And again I say as a Canadian, to the powers of Europe: Clear up the situation thereof; the democracy of America and the democracy of Canada demand it. And the democracy of Canada says to the Motherland: Clear up that situation; let these abuses that have disgraced civilization for four hundred years cease, and cease forever.

Mr. OLIVER: Is not the hon. gentleman aware that civilized Europe to-day is protecting the Turks?

Mr. MACLEAN: If the hon. gentleman is aware of it, he ought to speak out against it, as I am doing. But this vote gives me the opportunity to rise in this House and speak against it. Similar things are going on in Russia that have caused interference on the part of the people in the United States. The people of the United States have found a way to resent the unfair attitude of Russia towards Jewish citizens of the United States who have gone back to Russia. And they are resenting it to-day, and the democracy of America to-day is becoming a powerful means to improve the condition of the people of Europe and to establish peace.

Now, I come to another question; and because of this vote, I am enabled to state my views on that question in this House to-day. It is a question which affects us very closely—the question of the expansion of the German Empire. That is the great question in Europe to-day, and in that question we have a vital interest. It comes home to us all the more closely now that we are more or less embarked on the defence of the Empire, and therefore more or less involved in European politics. Now, is there anything that we can say in regard to this question of the expansion of the German Empire? The German people have grown to great proportions; their country is overflowing. To my mind, they have a right—using a phrase of to-day—they have a right to 'come into the sun.' And if the Germans can come into the sun, march into it or sail into it, and find a place where they can hang up their coat, they should have the right to do it, providing there does not happen to be a Canadian or an Australian Stetson already hanging on the peg. Now, if Germany has the right to expand, have we any vital interest in regard to that? In this case also I aspire to speak for the democracies of Canada and the United States. There is a large democratic element in Germany, and I have the authority of an American writer for saying that there are many other democracies in Europe. Now, the one thing that animates the democracy of Europe is the desire to get rid of this awful condition of militarism that exists to-day. That is the object of the democracies of Europe, and the democracies of America should do what they can to promote that great end. Can we, by reason of this vote, do anything to that end? At least we can say this much to England: That some of us in Canada think, now that we are voting this money, that it ought to be possible to find a way to permit German expansion without in any way interfering with the supremacy on the seas of the British Empire. And we can convey the message to Germany, especially to the democracy of Germany, that we hold that Germany has the right to expand, and that that expansion should take the shape of the creation of a great German democracy in some place overseas. If this were done the German dread would be largely removed, and therefore it is worth our study to bring this about if possible.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the way?

Mr. MACLEAN: Well, we have in America a very peculiar dogma which has been afloat on this continent for about one hundred years, the Munroe Doctrine, as it is called—the doctrine that no European powers outside of those now on this continent shall have any right in America, especially the right of settlement. If Germany can find a way for expansion by the settlement of a portion of South America, she ought to be allowed to do it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: South America might object.

Mr. MACLEAN: Then South America must look out for herself. The right hon. gentleman will not say there is not room in South America for the development of a great German democracy, and the creation of a safety valve for European trade—for the establishment of an Atlantic trade service between European Germany and Germany in South America would be such a safety valve. There is no reason why the people of the United States, under the Monroe Doctrine, should object to the settlement of a great German community or democracy in South America, and, if such a condition existed, this fear of a German invasion of England would be largely removed. The Germans would have their thoughts diverted to other matters; the struggle would be not for naval or military supremacy but for the development of their new territorial possessions. There is room in South America for millions of people; the wheat fields of that country are of a quality equal to and perhaps better than those of Canada, and cattle raising is carried on to an enormous extent. The development of a rivalry in trade would, as I have said, cause the people to think a great deal less of war. Is there any other possibility of German expansion? How would it do to let Germany have access to the wheat fields of south eastern Europe—Persia for instance? There are people in Great Britain who might object to such a proposition, and even other countries might oppose it—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps Russia.

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, perhaps Russia.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Perhaps Persia also.

Mr. MACLEAN: Persia might have some objection, but if this German scare is a menace—and it is a menace, and for that reason we are talking about it—we have a right to discuss it fully and make any suggestions as to its solution.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend not think that Canadians would prove themselves better patriots by exercising their activities towards the solution of the wheat problem in the Canadian West rather than directing their attention to Persia?

Mr. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman is facetious, but I am trying to be earnest. When the hon. gentleman was Postmaster General he was so facetious in discussing questions coming up at that time that he is not now trying to be earnest in regard to these same questions—parcel post for one.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the hon. gentleman see anything facetious in the present wheat situation in the West?

Mr. MACLEAN: No, and if the hon. gentleman had supported me when I raised the wheat question in this House, especially with regard to the enormous increase in ocean freight traffic, possibly the matter would be nearer solution than it is to-day.

Mr. OLIVER: So it would if the gentleman had supported us.

Mr. MACLEAN: Evidently we have different views. However, with regard to the matter under discussion, I may say that I believe in a Canadian navy because it is essential for the country. I further believe that we can build and man a navy, and that Canada is destined to be one of the greatest ship-building centres in the world. We have the iron, the steel, the coal; we have the workmen, the sites for the shipyards, and other necessary facilities. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister of England has made a statement to the effect that he is prepared to give us, in due time, the contracts for the building of some ships. It has been said that it would take a very long time to effect the establishment of conditions necessary to successful ship-building in Canada, but I think its progress would be rapid after it had been fairly started. It is possible to make a contract for the transfer of a great ship-building yard from Ireland, Scotland, or England, and bring it bodily to one of our Canadian ports. We can improve the naval college created by the late Administration and train officers and men for the navy. We can supply electrical experts, and can find employment in Canada for men of the Imperial naval reserve, many of whom find it difficult to make a living in the Old Country. They are model citizens, and we could make good use of them. We can have great ship-building industries not only on the Atlantic, but on the Pacific, and the general policy encouraging ship-building in this country should be actively adopted, first, to aid in the defence of the country, and, second, to enable us to supplement our railways by carrying our own farm products to the markets of Europe. The Canadian navy is no bugaboo to me. I have always been in favour of it, and I voted for the policy of the late Government in that regard. I have not since changed my views, and I trust that the policy we are now discussing will develop into one which will provide for a Canadian navy for Canada. I even go so far as to say that I am in favour of naval conscription in this country, because if we believe in the naval defence of the country we should be prepared to man our ships with our own men. I am told we will have to hire these men. I will undertake the responsibility of organizing Canadian youth so that they will gladly go into the defence of their country in connection with the navy and there will be no trouble about it, but that has to be done now, right away, and it may involve some money, it may involve training schools, and it may, in a way, involve the question of some kind of conscription. But there is no trouble to build ships in this country or to get men to man them if you go the right way about it and spend your money to that end, but the policy must be to that end. Above all, it must be based on an appreciation of the fact that sea power is absolutely necessary for us and for the maintenance of the supremacy of the British Empire. I believe in the maintenance of the supremacy of the British Empire, because it does stand to-day for the idea of progress and the uplift of humanity, for good government, for everything that is elevating and in some way makes for the improvement of humanity at large and because we have political institutions which are more or less endangered and which, if they are endangered, we are bound to defend. What is our position now? We are not a mere colony of Great Britain existing on the Atlantic coast as we once were, we are on this great continent of North America and there are 100,000,000 and more people speaking the English language on this North American continent That continent has become very powerful and we, as Canadians, instead of being a mere strip on the Atlantic coast, have spread across the continent and we look upon the Pacific, we look upon the two seas. We have an interest in the Atlantic, but the interest we have in the Atlantic is as nothing compared to that great interest that is coming in the Pacific. Canada seems to have a mighty destiny ahead of her. She is on the two oceans, she is on the inter-continent and the inter-continental ways run across her. Europe is pigmy compared to the Orient and Australasia on the Pacific. In some way we have got to play a part because of our position between those great continents, the one to the east and the one on the west and if we are to play our part it is absolutely necessary that we have sea power in this country because the dominion is on the sea and the world's questions will be fought out at sea. There may be an issue, not the issue of a German peril, but the issue of a yellow peril, or even whether the white race is to maintain its own on the North American Pacific coast.

All of these questions are coming up, and we must be prepared to play our part in them. The united voice of British Columbia to-day is that we must have sea power, and that the Pacific problems are the great problems which they must soon face, and therefore they want to see sea power in Canada, they want to see shipbuilding on their coast and they wish to see a great Canadian marine established.

It is a surprising thing—and yet it is not surprising when you talk about the destiny of Canada, to see how the Canadian marine has grown of late on these two great oceans. Look at the interest the ports of Montreal, Halifax and St. John have in regard to the trade of the Atlantic. Look at the number of ships there are now, Canadian ships, controlled in Canada, and the still greater ambitions of Canadian ship owners to enter every sea. Look what is going on on the Pacific, how the lines are developing there; look what is going on in connection with the Panama canal in a few months. The whole world is being turned upside down and the centre of the world is going to be on this North American contintent, the centre of the world in this century is coming to this continent and the nation and the people on this continent that has sea power and can build ships and sail ships and man ships, and whose people are in alliance with and maintain the great sea power of the Old Land and its traditions will be the people of the twenty-first century. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that Canada should not have sea-power, that she should not have a navy, that she should not build ships. Not for one moment do I say that the resolution before the House is contrary to the policy I am advocating; it may contain within it, I hope it does contain within it, a further development on the line of naval defence in the way of Canadian ships, Canadian seamen, a Canadian navy and an absolute belief that Canada, to play her part on this continent, must have sea power, must study sea power and know all about it as long as that may happen to be the dominant factor in the settlement of the politics of the world.

If what I have said is true, and it is so pregnant for the future, is there not some way in which we can all get together, even in this House, on this question? That is a question of the greatest importance to me. Cannot we get together in saying that we are ready not only to vote our money but to co-operate in helping to organize a navy in the direction of naval defence, beginning our naval defence, our naval ship-building in a modest kind of way, but somewhat on the lines of our fellow-countrymen in British Columbia? We must have some kind of a fleet on the Pacific and some kind of a fleet on the Atlantic. We can have our ships, dreadnoughts it may be, at the supreme point of danger, wherever the point of concentration of the bulk of the British navy is. But it is not inconsonant with that that we should begin the development of a navy here, to cultivate a naval spirit, to bring up our young men to seafaring, to consecrate a portion of our youth to the defence of the country, to teach them all about navigation, to teach them even how to fight because, the peace of the world and the elevation of humanity for many years to come must depend upon the big policeman and the big policeman to-day is the big warship. These things must be maintained, we must have great warships and we must also have smaller ships for coastal defence, for fishery protection, for doing our share probably of the general defence of the Empire and if that is true, and everyone must admit that it is true, then we must begin now and I believe we are beginning now by this vote, the beginning not only of a contribution but what is of more importance to me the beginning of the creation of a real Canadian navy which will grow as fast as the circumstances will require, and which, growing as it will, will also aid in the development of our country from a business point of view. We must have thousands of tons of ships built for the use of Canada's commercial marine in the next few years, and they can only be built by beginning to build them. I have before this quoted the old Greek proverb 'To play upon the harp you must play upon the harp.' To have a navy you must start to have a navy. You must teach your sons to fight in the navy; you must put them in the navy, feed them, pay them well and treat them well. If you do that you will have the beginning of sea power on this continent.

The mighty circumstances that are weaving the destiny of nations to-day all point to the centre of the British Empire gradually coming to North America. That is not quite a dream. When Canada has concentrated 50,000,000 of people, as she will do so soon—and if the United States with her 100,000,000 does not grow more quickly, Canada will soon have 100,000,000—the centre of the Empire will be here and the centre of British influence will be in North America. But if it is, it will be based absolutely on sea power, if sea power happens to be in those days a factor in the matter. I have said before that there are some things that might interfere. There is the spread of democracy, and the cardinal principle of democracy, which is against fighting, and which is now going ahead in a great way in Europe, might eventually lead, as I hope it may, more or less in the direction of peace. But until that day arrives we have to think of fighting; we have to think of militancy, and when you think of being militant, you have to look at it from the sea point of view. I want to see this country go in for sea power and for a naval policy, but I do hope that before the vote is taken a way will be found for the members of this House representing all the people of Canada, to go like the horses of the sun all abreast. I cannot repeat that too often, as it is what the people of Canada want to see. They want to see us going like the horses of the sun, all abreast, on this question, instead of making it a poor miserable party question in the House of Commons. Now there ought to be a way of getting together.

Mr. MACDONALD: What do you suggest?

Mr. MACLEAN: I cannot suggest. I would not like to be presumptuous even if I could suggest, but there is a way. Every time I go home, I meet prominent men who talk about it, and I have been approached by some of them who have been working to this end. I hope that before it goes to a vote, and I am not afraid of the consequences of the vote whatever it may be, a way will be found by which this House can get together in this, which is a declaration of our faith and belief, just as much as my right hon. friend's policy of three or four years ago was a very advanced declaration in that matter. It is a hard thing, and it needs a lot of work. There is a good deal of stumbling, and there has been a good deal of stumbling on the part of leaders of both sides in this matter but we are gradually coming out right, and we are coming out on top. If we can get together now, the effect of the vote will be ever so much greater than if it were a party vote. It is not a question of $35,000,000, and it is not because it is for dreadnoughts. In every way you can pick holes in this thing, but the declaration of faith before the people of the world that Canada is with the Motherland, and that Australia, New Zealand and South Africa are with the Motherland, would be the value of the vote. It would have a great moral effect that you cannot read into millions or into ship tonnage or anything of that kind. It is because of its supreme value in that respect that I again make an appeal to the members to try to get together, to forget differences, and to allow in some way this vote to go out to the world as the united voice of the people of Canada, showing that the people of Canada are prepared to give their money and their best endeavour, and to contribute their sons and their ships to a navy for the defence of the Empire at large and for the creation of a navy for the defence of our country at home.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): A rumour has been circulated this afternoon that our friends on the other side of the House would not share any longer in the discussion of this important matter. It was only last night that my hon. friend from Red Deer referred to a serious case of dumbness on the Government benches. If the rumour is true, the trouble is getting more serious, because this would be a case of aphasia, and aphasia is a symptom of paralysis. We know that the Conservative party have of late gone through a weak spell, but we had not thought that this great party was paralysed. My hon. friend from South York would contradict the rumour if only he could be considered an orthodox member of the Conservative party, but after listening to his declaration I have some doubt about that. I agree with many things that my hon. friend from South York said, particularly with his declaration that this proposal of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government is a declaration of faith. I myself believe, and have believed all along, that this was a declaration of faith, a declaration of imperialistic faith. I agree with my hon. friend also when he says he is in favour of a Canadian navy and of sea power in this country. My hon. friend said: Cannot we be of one opinion? Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we can be of one opinion; we were all of one opinion at one time —in this country. My hon. friend from South York is consistent with that which he advocated then, and if he will use his influence, which I think must be large, with his colleagues on the other side, and bring them over to the policy of 1909, then all the foxes will run abreast. Though this debate has been going on for many days and reasons which militate in favour of the Government proposals have been set before the House, I would feel remiss in my duty if I did not take this opportunity of saying, in as few words as it is possible for me to do, the reasons why I should object to these proposals. I would like to point out the inconsistency of the Government party, the inefficiency of their policy, the necessity for the creation of sea power in this country and also the dangers with which the Government policy is replete. The problem which confronts the Canadian Parliament to-day is a problem of defence by sea coupled, I think, with a political problem. The problem of defence by land was solved in this country some fifty years ago and all through the agitation and discussion over the solution of the problem of defence by land the dominating idea was the Canadian idea. Since that time no statesman, from Sir John Macdonald down, no man in this country, I venture to say, has advocated any other idea regarding the control and administration of the militia forces. For reasons that are obvious in a young country, seriously engaged in the development of its enormous resources, reasons which, I think, it would be idle for me to refer to at this stage, Canada was not confronted with the problem of defence by sea until 1902 when it was submitted to the Imperial conference in London. At that time my honoured leader, who was then the Prime Minister of Canada, referred to the work accomplished in this country in reference to territorial defence, and intimated the intention of his government to advert to the naval side of defence as well. Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that no fault was found with the position taken by my right hon. friend.

Since 1887, from the first Imperial conference in London down to the conference of 1909, the people of this country have always countenanced the position taken in these conferences by the representatives of Canada. It is true that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), a few years ago, presented to this House what I would call a very thorough compendium of the results accomplished by the different conferences and he did it in no contentious spirit and without any partisanship whatever. In 1909 this House was unanimous on certain principles concerning naval defence. Why was it unanimous? —because the resolution which we then adopted gave expression to one of the noblest sentiments in the hearts of the citizens of the country, the sentiment of the preservation of a common heritage, and because also it affirmed as a corollary to the principle, the principle of organizing speedily, immediately, a system of defence by sea. Canada would not escape the responsibility inherent in her as a nation. The example of all nations was before her. Smaller in area than Canada, nations have navies of their own, smaller in population than Canada, countries have navies of their own.

It is true that you will find nowadays people who will extol the arts of peace, who will curse war and armaments and who will contend that this is the era of peace, and that all international conflicts should be submitted to arbitration. Well and good, but although peace has been preached for nineteen hundred years in this world, people on earth have not yet come to the conclusion that they should settle all their differences by arbitration. So, we have to provide armaments—armaments by land and armaments by sea. In 1909 we were unanimous. It was at a time when there existed in the Old Country a scare. It was immediately after that famous speech delivered by the First Lord of the Admiralty, who was then Mr. McKenna, a thrilling speech, an alarmist speech, which created a great sensation in England. At that moment we accepted the idea that the best thing for Canada to do was to organize a naval defence of her own. When you come to speak to the ordinary people of war and armaments you arouse a feeling of repulsion and naturally so especially in a country which has been at peace for a hundred years. After the Naval Bill was adopted in this House and by this Parliament a work of education was necessary. Although we differed on certain matters, the principle of a Canadian navy was recognized and recognized by the Liberal party and by the Conservative party. It happened that an election was held in the province of Quebec, and, by the way, it was the first time that the naval issue was brought before the people. The campaign was carried on between two parties. I believe it was between the Liberal party on the one side and the Conservative party on the other side though some people may think that the Conservative party had not anything to do with it. I remember that during the course of that famous election a despatch was sent from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to a newspaper in Montreal in answer to a question put to him in which despatch he said: 'Defeat Laurier by all means.' It was signed by Mr. Foster. We remember that at that time also, when the election was over and when the Liberal Government had been defeated by a narrow majority for reasons that you Mr. Speaker know and which have been disclosed to the House fully, another despatch was sent to Mr. Monk. Where do you think this despatch came from? From a Liberal, from a Nationalist? Not at all. I will read the despatch:

Mr. Monk, Montreal.

Accept heartiest congratulations on your great fight and success.

That was signed by the chief whip of the Conservative party, Mr. George Taylor. The fight on the plains was led by Mr. Monk; it was directed by the Minister of Inland Revenue. The fight on the plains was also led by another prominent member of this House who is now, Mr. Speaker, your deputy, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) but I think if we look up higher, we will find that at the top of the mountain there were two political high priests who were then engaged in praying God for the success of the Nationalist arms, and these two political high priests were the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. LEMIEUX: All abreast.

Mr. BELAND: What were the exact positions of the political parties about the year 1909, and my citations will be few and short? Let us first take an utterance of the Prime Minister who said:

I believe that the defence of our own shores and the protection of our own commerce is due to the self-respect which should fill the heart of every man in this country.

That is the declaration of the Prime Minister, and now let us hear what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, speaking as to a contribution:

It disjoins what has been joined together from the earliest days of the world's existence: commerce and the protection of commerce.

Perhaps it would not be amiss if I refer to the declarations made by the Minister of Inland Revenue, who said in this House about that time:

I shall vote against the Bill (the Naval Service Bill) because it involves a recognition of military imperialism, because it aims at having the principle recorded in our statute-books. I shall vote against the amendment (that was the amendment moved by Mr. Borden) because it involves the same principle.

The Minister of Inland Revenue will, I suppose, stand just one more quotation. At a great meeting held in St. Jerome, the Minister of Inland Revenue said:

For me, I have believed that it was my duty to separate.

Here is a separatist.

—to separate myself from Mr. Borden on this important question, and if, as I hope I am, elected your member, I can assure you that I will preserve my attitude of independence on that subject.

Mr. NANTEL: Vous ne devriez pas tronquer la citation, citez tout.

Mr. BELAND: That is what was said by the Minister of Inland Revenue in 1910. Then in 1911, during the election, the Postmaster General who is mighty eloquent in the province of Quebec, said at Lorette on the 5th of September:

As far as the navy is concerned, I am against Mr. Laurier's project, and even if it does not please my opponent in this election, I am against Mr. Borden's contribution proposal.

On the 3rd of October, the election was over and the Postmaster General was elected, and the Conservative party was likely to attain power before long and this is what the Postmaster General said:

It is rumoured that I will be a minister. I do not know anything about it, not having been called by Mr. Borden to share in his Cabinet. At all events, I will be a minister, only if I am allowed to follow the line which has been traced by Mr. Monk.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, Oh.

Mr. BELAND: Again we find the Postmaster General on the 7th of October, 1911, when he was a full-fledged minister—

Mr. LEMIEUX: The same gentleman?

Mr. BELAND: Certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD: It must be a different man.

Mr. BELAND: Oh, no, he was a minister and he was re-elected as a minister by acclamation and this is what he said:

Minister, re-elected minister, I am here at this moment on this question of the navy with the same idea, and the same words, and the same programme as heretofore.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PELLETIER: I never got so much Liberal applause in my life.

Mr. BELAND: I do not believe my hon. friend would get the votes to-day.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have got them so far

Mr. BELAND: When we read over these declarations of 1909, 1910, 1911 of the gentlemen who now are members of this Administration; when we realize the wonderful metamorphos which has been accomplished, we equally realize the truth of the philosophical thesis that: the world is mutable. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the position of the Liberal party to-day?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Nobody knows.

Mr. BELAND: If my hon. friend wants to know, I can tell him that the Liberal party to-day stands where it stood in 1909 and 1910; it stands on the same solid ground of providing naval defence in this country for the defence of Canada as a component part of the British Empire.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do you know what the Liberal policy is now?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: You have not done much.

Mr. BELAND: And, where do you find the Conservative party? We find most of its members—every one of its members, with the noble exception of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean)—stultifying themselves, wandering away, trying to find a spot where the extreme Tory and the extreme Nationalist can embrace, and that spot has been found in direct contribution to the British Admiralty. This is the ground upon which the extreme Nationalists and the extreme Tories unite. What, then, is the line of demarcation between these hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves? It is clear, I think, and, I submit, it is deep. We all agree that money should be spent for naval defence. They say, spend it in England; we say, spend it in Canada. We all say that sea defence must be provided. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Provide for the defence of Canada in the North Sea—filled up with British ships; we say: Provide for Canadian defence in Canadian waters. Allow me to quote once more the words of the right hon. Prime Minister—noble words they were. I quote from the speech of the right hon. gentleman in 1909:

I venture to submit that the expenditure in defence of our seaports, in defence of our sea-coasts, and in defence of the waters of the ocean——

What waters? Listen to the right hon. gentleman:

—which are immediately adjacent to our coasts, is of immensely greater advantage and of immensely greater importance than the expenditure which from year to year we are disbursing in connection with the military forces of this country.

It is more important, in the opinion of my right hon. friend, that money should be spent for the defence of our ports, of our coasts, of our commerce, of the waters of the ocean that are adjacent to our coasts, than that it should be spent to organize militia forces in this country. I share the right hon. gentleman's view of three years ago,—and I am only sorry that he has gone back on his declaration. What further is the line of demarcation between the two parties? We propose to preserve and maintain in its integrity the self-governing privileges of Canada; they propose to curtail them and restrict them, as I shall be able to show in a few minutes to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) who seems not to agree with me at this moment.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

HURON AND ONTARIO RAILWAY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 70, respecting the Huron and Ontario Railway Company, and to change its name to The Toronto and Northwestern Railway Company.—Mr. Lewis.

On section 5:

Mr. LANCASTER: Sections 5, 6, 7, and 8 require a word of explanation. In order that no powers of expropriation with regard to waterpowers shall be exercised in violation of provincial rights and other matters, four clauses have been inserted in amendment. Section 5 repeals sections 6 and 14 of the original Act. Section 6 is the standard section in regard to provincial rights in connection with any expropriation in regard to waterpowers. Section 7 is the standard clause providing that the company shall not generate light, heat or power along or upon the streets of municipalities without their consent. The last section provides that railways shall not be built on the streets of any municipality without its consent.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has this railway been built, or is it only projected?

Mr. LANCASTER: I do not think any of it has been actually constructed, but the members of the railway committee were satisfied of the bona fide intentions of the company, and provided terms for renewing the charter under such conditions as to be in line with other Bills which have been enacted with regard to new railways.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the authority given to municipalities include rural municipalities?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes. In the general Railway Act provisions are made in respect of cities or towns, but any municipality not having the dignity or size of a town is not included. It is therefore provided that the company shall not in any municipality perform such acts as those to which I have referred without its consent.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR COMMISSION.

House in Committee on Bill No. 55, to incorporate the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners.—Mr. Taylor.

On section 1:

Mr. OLIVER: Would the hon. member briefly explain the purpose of the Bill?

Mr. TAYLOR: This Bill is for the purpose of creating for the port of New Westminster a commission similar to those of the several ports in eastern Canada. It follows precisely the language of two Bills passed by this House last year, respecting the harbours of Hamilton and of Winnipeg, the sole difference being in the local descriptions. Briefly it is to authorize the appointment of a board of three commissioners, two to be appointed by the Government and one by the corporation of New Westminster. We already have very important harbour properties in New Westminster. We have upwards of a mile of water-front owned by the city of New Westminster and now under lease to various industrial and shipping interests. The corporation of New Westminster are now expending half a million dollars voted by the citizens of New Westminster for the purpose of improving the main front of the harbour by making a quay wall which will be about a mile in length, carried out to a depth of forty feet of water so that it will be accessible to the largest vessel that floats on the Pacific. We anticipate at New Westminster very large shipping in the near future. This one mile of quay wall will afford only first accommodation. After that we propose to make a basin by damming between Annacis island and Lulu island, making a still water basin with unlimited accommodation for all the traffic within the next fifty years. At the expense of the city there have been secured the services of an eminent harbour engineer who has made very comprehensive plans to ensure that there shall be no mistake at the beginning, and that from modest beginnings we can go on and on without disturbing the arrangement until we have there one of the finest ports on the Pacific. It is with a view to having this work carried on under the most expert management that we desire to change the administration of the harbour from the civic control, under which it now is, to the control of a harbour commission. We propose to turn over to the harbour commission the whole of the mile of water front which we now own and the work which the corporation is doing, and to have them carry it on, and collect the revenues, which, from the first, will be very substantial; and generally speaking to administer the harbour in the same manner as the harbour commissions of eastern Canada administer the harbours under their control.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to ask my hon. friend three questions. First, who at present administers the affairs of the harbour? Is it the City of New Westminster?

Mr. TAYLOR: The City of New Westminster, through the corporation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the tonnage last year in the harbour of New Westminster?

Mr. TAYLOR: I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I desire to put this question, because it was raised in the Committee the other day, and I am glad to see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in his seat. Is there any trackage along the harbour of New Westminster, and, if so, does the railway company claim the foreshore rights?

Mr. TAYLOR: I forgot to say that the $500,000 which the city of New Westminster is now expending is for the purpose of widening the street along the water front from its present width of 80 feet to 200 feet, so as to leave ample room for all the railway trackage that may be desired there. We have already three tracks, the Canadian Pacific, the Great Northern and the British Columbia Electric along that street; but, with the street widened to 200 feet, we shall have ample room for all the trackage that may be desired.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to get an expression of opinion from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance as to the foreshore rights. I was not present at the Committee when the matter was mentioned, but I see from the papers that some one representing one of the railway systems claimed that whenever a railway company secured trackage at a harbour, it could claim the foreshore rights. Is that the case in New Westminster?

Mr. TAYLOR: No, New Westminster is applying to this Government for the foreshore rights.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Bill says that the harbour embraces the whole tidal water to the Fraser river. I would like to know how many miles of foreshore that covers.

Mr. TAYLOR: In the committee that definition was narrowed. The idea of the draughtsman of the Bill was to include all the tidal waters in the immediate vicinity of New Westminster, over which the harbour commissioners would have jurisdiction. It was narrowed down to embrace such of the tidal waters as may be from time to time defined by the Governor in Council as being properly under the jurisdiction of the port of New Westminster.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many miles do the tidal waters extend?

Mr. TAYLOR: About thirty-five miles past New Westminster, and New Westminster is about twenty miles from the mouth of the river.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it proposed that the title to this foreshore and harbour should be vested in this commission, or are they only to be trustees for the purpose of managing them?

Mr. HAZEN: I presume that the foreshore is vested at the present time in the Crown as represented by the Governor General. The law regarding foreshores as defined in the judgment of the Privy Council is this: That in those harbours that were public harbours at the time of Confederation, the foreshore is vested in the Crown in right of the Federal Parliament; that in those harbours that were not public harbours at the time of Confederation, the foreshore is vested in the Crown in right of the provincial legislatures of the provinces. What a public harbour is is left somewhat in doubt by the decision of the Privy Council. It is open to question whether what was meant by their lordships of the Privy Council by a public harbour was a harbour which was actually used as a public harbour, that is, actually a place to which boats resorted or which was used for the shipment of goods or for other purpose for which a harbour is used; or whether it meant something that was capable of being used at that time as a harbour and not something that has been created a public harbour since by artificial means such as dredging, or by the expenditure of money. But so far as New Westminster is concerned, I think there is no doubt whatever that the harbour there was a public harbour at Confederation, because it will be remembered that when British Columbia entered Confederation, New Westminster was settled, and no doubt the harbour was used. I think there can be no doubt, in the sense of being resorted to by vessels of commerce, and for other purposes. As I understand it, the foreshore is vested in the Crown as represented by this Parliament, but the custom under the common law of England, has been to recognize that the people who have really the first right to the foreshores are those who have the riparian rights down to the high water mark. In any applications for foreshores, this Government, and previous Governments, have taken into consideration who the riparian owners were. The foreshores are granted by the Governor in Council on a joint report from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Public Works. Before recommending the grant of any foreshore, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has to get a report from the chief engineer of his department and satisfy himself that the granting of that foreshore will not interfere with navigation, and the Minister of Public Works has to get a report from his officers and satisfy himself that the foreshore, of which a grant is requested, will not be required for public purposes; and on a report setting forth both these facts, as my hon. friend from Rouville knows, it is for Council to say whether the grant shall be given.

The remaining question is as to the price to be charged for the rental of foreshores. The practice in the case of municipalities where they are the riparian proprietors and are seeking the foreshore for public purposes, has been to give it to them for a nominal consideration, the grant stating that it is for public purposes. In the case of foreshores sought by private individuals, the custom has been to demand a rental for them, and that rental is fixed by the Governor in Council. There does not seem to have been in the past any principle upon which those rentals were fixed. Each case seems to have been considered on its own merits, and the Council fixed whatever rental they might think fit. But the practice I am pursuing in the cases of foreshores applied for by private individuals who are the riparian owners, is to give not grants but leases for a period of twenty-one year with a proviso that they can be renewed for two further terms of twenty-one years each. On the renewal of the first and second terms, the rental can be fixed by the Governor in Council and if the rental so fixed is not satisfactory to the lessees it will then be fixed by the Exchequer Court. That is the practice that is being followed now. There is a large number of applications for foreshores, principally in British Columbia, some of which have been in the department for a long time, and consideration of which is being pressed upon us to-day. We are overtaking them as rapidly as we can. There is no doubt that those foreshores have been enhanced in value. They are more valuable to-day than they were many years ago. People have been using them in many cases without having paid for them. They were people who had the riparian rights, and they were not interfered with, but they are coming to-day and asking for leases, and their applications have to be dealt with on some equitable principle as to rental, as in some cases they have buildings and constructions representing considerable value, and in other cases they are carrying on industrial and other enterprises. They have to be dealt with on their merits and according to the best judgment we can apply to them. In the case of the foreshore at New Westminster, I think application has been made to the Governor in Council for that foreshore on behalf of the city of New Westminster, which is the riparian proprietor. I do not know whether the Order in Council has been issued yet or not; but undoubtedly, as in similar cases, if application is made by the city, and the property is required for public purposes, a grant would go to the city at a nominal consideration. There are ample precedents for it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am very much obliged to the hon. minister for his explanation with regard to the practice of the department, which is very interesting, but what I wanted to find out from the hon. member for New Westminster was whether the effect of this Bill was to vest in this commission the title to the land now dealt with, or is the title to remain in the city of New Westminster subject to the control of the commission as trustees and to be used for harbour purposes?

Mr. TAYLOR: That point is covered by section 14, which provides that the corporation may take the property on behalf of the city of New Westminster. I think they hold it in trust for the city.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no vesting clause in the Bill by which the title to this property becomes vested in the commission. In some places in eastern Canada the title to the property in the harbour is vested in the commission as a corporation and they own and control it absolutely, subject to governmental supervision. Here apparently, it is only a case of this body acting as a trustee.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The 4th section of this Bill defines the harbour of New Westminster to include all the tidal waters of the Fraser river which, the hon. member for New Westminster tells us, extend 35 miles above New Westminster.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand my hon. friend to say that there is an amendment suggested by the committee which will be submitted to the Committee of the Whole when we come to it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In conection with that, I want to point out that section 15 provides that:

The corporation may regulate and control the use and development of all land and property of the water front within the limits of the harbour of New Westminster.

Would you give them the right to control the whole of this thirty-five miles covering territory upon which other towns may grow up? It seems to me that this would place the whole of the control of and jurisdiction over the river in this particular commission.

Mr. HAZEN: Which section does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Section 4, read in connection with section 15.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sharpe, Ontario): I would suggest that we discuss that phase of it when we come to it.

On section 4—harbour limits defined.

Mr. GERMAN: Why should it not be definitely stated in the Bill what the water front shall be? The Governor in Council may have a wider idea as to what should be done than the city of New Westminster. It seems to me that it should be absolutely defined in the Bill and then New Westminster would know exactly what it was getting. No government could change it and no government could enlarge upon what this Parliament intended. It leaves a loophole for action which might be absolutely detrimental to the public interest with regard to a great river such as the Fraser is. We should define absolutely what proportion of the river front New Westminster is to have.

Mr. TAYLOR: Conditions in British Columbia are slightly different from those in the hon. gentleman's locality. Our operations are not nearly so circumscribed there as they are here in some cases. At the beginning of things, as we are at the creation of a harbour, it would be physically impossible to satisfactorily define the limits of operations unless we did it by means of a sweeping definition such as that which was contained in this Bill before it was amended in committee. For instance, the plans which have been made for the harbour operations now under way, cover an area of six miles, only one mile of which is being used at present. Outside of this mile the harbour extends for four miles below the city and for a mile above it, and we have the possibility of continuous wharf facilities clear from New Westminster to the Pitt river, about twelve miles above the city, and of navigation in the Pitt river with continuous dockage for perhaps two miles. It may happen that in two or three years the operations of this harbour commission will be continuous for four miles below New Westminster and twelve miles above it. We cannot predict what the future will bring forth. We know what is likely to happen, but we are quite content to take whatever the Governor in Council may choose to give us, and what is called for by the requirements of the business at these docks. We know that these bounds cannot be made too small, because no Governor in Council would refuse his authority to carry on useful works which the local industries called for, and we feel quite sure that no Governor in Council would make these bounds so wide as to embarrass any other community.

Mr. GERMAN: The Governor in Council has to define at some time what the limits shall be. There must be something definite when the property is conveyed to the harbour commissioners. The limits might as well be defined now as in the future and incorporated in this Bill; then Parliament and this committee will see exactly what the Government is proposing to give to New Westminster. According to this Bill, and the hon. gentleman, the harbour commissioners would have power over all the tidal waters extending thirty-five miles up the river. I do not suppose it was ever intended that New Westminster should have that stretch of water front.

Mr. TAYLOR: That has already been explained as having disappeared from the Bill.

Mr. GERMAN: I know, but the Governor in Council is to fix the boundaries.

Mr. HAZEN: That is the practice with respect to all harbours. The limits of harbours are fixed by Order in Council for harbour masters' purposes. You will find in reference to the harbours on the lakes in Ontario, the harbours of the Maritime provinces and the harbours all through the country, that under the Act, the limits of the harbour, or what shall be considered as being within the harbour, are defined by metes and bounds and are embodied in an Order in Council. I presume the idea here is that with the rapid growth which will come to the city of New Westminster the present boundaries of the harbour may in a short time be too restricted and application may be made to the Governor in Council for the purpose of extending these boundaries. The provision of this Bill, as amended, is that in that event taking place the commissioners shall have jurisdiction all over the harbour and that jurisdiction would be extended in that way. It is the practice that the metes and bounds of harbours and the harbour limits are defined by Order in Council. The Bill need not be read a third time until it is looked into carefully by the technical officers of my department.

Mr. GERMAN: There is no natural harbour at New Westminster; it is simply a stretch along the bank of the river without any natural indentation. You are handing over to the Board of Water Commisisoners a stretch of river front, and as in British Columbia, towns are liable to spring up like mushrooms in a night, it may be that other towns along that river will in time to come require reasonable harbour facilities. The Fraser river is one of the greatest rivers in Canada, and the boundaries of this harbour control should be, I believe, defined in this Bill.

Mr. HAZEN: Montreal can hardly be said to be a natural harbour. The harbour of Montreal stretches along the river for sixteen miles, running from the north shore to the south shore, and taking in all the intervening space covered by water; and is similar in that respect to New Westminster. Having in view the very possible rapid development of New Westminster, it may be that they will require just as much water front as they have in Montreal today.

Mr. OLIVER: If the Governor in Council may define the limits of the harbour and may extend its limits, can the Governor in Council restrict the limits also?

Mr. HAZEN: I should think so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If in the meantime public expenditure has been made on the harbour, I should not think that the Government, by Order in Council, could restrict its limits. Clause 4 is entirely to indefinite and I think it should stand.

Section stands.

On section 14—power to hold and administer certain property for the city:

Mr. MACDONALD: We are giving these commissioners the right to defend and bring suit, and the title of the property is apparently not vested in them. An action brought by them might be defeated by the contention that the title was in someone else. Can the hon. member for New Westminster tell us what is the status of these commissioners?

Mr. TAYLOR: I do not think the corporation of New Westminster considered that. They relied upon the Parliament of Canada as an authority, which last year passed six sections in words identical with the words in this section. They took the former action of Parliament as authority for this.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am at a loss to understand how, if the corporation of Westminster still owns this property you can give this new corporation the right to bring actions in regard to it. These gentlemen appear to be trustees for the city of New Westminster; they have no independent status.

Mr. GERMAN: The section as amended says they may institute and defend proceedings in a court of justice in respect to the property of the commissioners, but the Bill does not give the commissioners any property; the property remains vested in the city of New Westminster. It would seem to me that the Bill is very badly drafted.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It must be intended that the commissioners should hold property, or else the Bill is badly drawn in other clauses. For example, section 19 says they can issue debentures on all property vested in or controlled by the corporation, which infers that they do hold property of their own.

Mr. HAZEN: It is quite clear that the intention is that the property should be handed over to these commissioners. The intention clearly is that the corporation of the city of New Westminster shall transfer to the corporation created by this Bill their harbour property to be administered, and the title would be vested in them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the Government propose by this Bill to vest any property in the city of Westminster?

Mr. HAZEN: This is a private Bill; it is not a Government measure. It simply creates a corporation for the purpose of administering the harbour property now controlled by the common council of New Westminster, and it covers the request of the council for a change in management, that body believing that the property could be better managed by a commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do I understand that under this Bill the city of New Westminster obtains title to no property which it does not now possess?

Mr. HAZEN: That is correct.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. BELAND: When the House rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to establish, as clearly as possible, the line of demarcation between the two political parties of this country, and I now propose to examine in a very superficial way the naval situation as pertaining to Great Britain and to Canada. Ten or fifteen years ago a large portion of the British navy was distributed throughout the various seas of the globe, but since then the rising of a certain European power has necessitated the concentration of the British fleet in the North Sea. Ten years ago, as has been stated by the right hon. Prime Minister, there were distributed over the seas 176 ships of the British navy, whilst to-day the number is but 70. In view of the fact that such a gap has been created, what is the imperative duty of the dominions beyond the seas? I submit that their duty is to fill that gap, and Canada can do this in no better way than by creating a sea power of her own, as has been so well stated by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). One of the chief objections urged as against a Canadian navy is that it will be inefficient; and some hon. members stated that the ships could neither run away nor fight, meaning, I presume, that the ships of the Canadian navy would be too slow and too weak to do so. This brings us to the question as to the speed and quality of the ships proposed by the naval law of 1910. This Act provided for the building of four Bristols. What are Bristols? Second-class cruisers. What is their speed? Almost twenty-six knots. I would remind hon. gentlemen in this connection that there is not in the British navy to-day, with the exception of the last battle cruiser constructed, a single ship which can attain that speed. This disposes therefore of the contention that the ships would be fit only to run away. With reference to the statement that they would be too weak to fight, it should be remembered that no small nation, if this assertion be true, could think of organizing a naval power of its own. Sweden, Norway, the republics of South America—all would make serious mistakes if they made provision for navies of their own. Canada is not the largest and most populous nation in the world, but it is indeed far from being the smallest, and all nations, large or small, if their territory is exposed to the sea, have provided for some means of defence, regardless of their area.

Another objection urged against a Canadian navy is the contention that the adoption of such a principle would make for the separation of Canada from the British Empire. This was emphasized by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), whose view was that the proposal of the right hon. leader of the Government would make for closer union, while the naval policy of the late Administration would make for dislocation and separation. The separatist argument is an extreme, and, I think, a desperate one, resorted to only under difficult circumstances. Moreover, if I may be allowed to use the expression, this argument is a gratuitous insult to all Canadians, regardless of their origin or creed. Matters have reached such a stage in this connection that to be a Canadian one must necessarily be a separatist. Sir John A. Macdonald, if he were alive to-day would, I am sure, be surprised at such a contention. With regard to the French-Canadian population, I may say, knowing whereof I speak, that that is the portion of the Canadian population most opposed to separation from Great Britain, and the reasons are so obvious that I will not now dwell upon them. What views has the right hon. the Prime Minister expressed in regard to this particular phase of the naval question? He made use of the following words in this House in 1910:

> Look at the pressure of Oriental nations upon our western coasts, and realize, if you will, that it would be the most utter folly for Canada to attempt to isolate herself from the activities of the world. Canada cannot be a hermit nation.

What does the Minister of Trade and Commerce think of a Canadian navy? Is he a separatist? In 1909 he said:

> You cannot point in history to a single commercial people that neglected to provide a protection more or less adequate for their commerce. Six and a half millions of people——

To-day he would say eight millions—

> —with their mighty heritage, and yet to-day no adequate defence in her great seaports from a third-class cruiser which might suddenly appear within her gates!

I take it that the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are the two leading statesmen of the great Conservative party, and the foregoing remarks were expressive of their convictions on this question. Further quoting from the remarks of the Prime Minister, I may say that on the 12th of January, 1910, he spoke as follows—and I commend these words to the hon. member for Frontenac, who, I am sorry to note, is not at present in his seat:

> Then, it has been argued that the creation of a so-called Canadian navy will have a tendency towards the separation of this great Dominion from the Empire. I do not see that it has such a tendency, more than the organization of a militia force—less, I say!

I had intended to quote from Lord Beresford, but I shall not do so at this stage, as I do not desire to load my remarks with quotations. I wish, however, to read to the House some of the remarks of the High Commissioner of Australia in London, Sir George Reid, who spoke to the Canadian Club in Ottawa on September 9, 1912:

I only wish the rest of the body of the British Empire were as lively as its toes are, in the way of defence. We have got an Australian fleet. What do you think of that? (Laughter, loud applause and cheers.)

And the Minister of Trade and Commerce was there!

We are twelve years old only, you know. You are a lusty forty-five. We are twelve years old, and we have got an Australian fleet, flying the white ensign. But we have got our own flag, mind you, on the front of the ship.

The remarks of Mr. Winston Churchill have been extensively quoted by the hon. member for Red Deer. I shall not quote the same words as my hon. friend did, but I wish to call the attention of the House to a few remarks made by Mr. Churchill at a shipwrights' dinner—I think it was in Glasgow—in May last. After speaking of the concentration of the naval forces of the Empire in the North sea.

The important thing is that the gaps should be filled so that while we of the Old Country guard the decisive centres our comrades and brothers across the seas shall keep the flag flying on the oceans of the world.

One point I wish to make clear. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the other day quoted these words of Mr. Churchill at the shipwrights' dinner. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) spoke immediately after my hon. friend from South Wellington. He said that it was all very well to quote Mr. Churchill at the shipwrights' dinner, that those words would be in order if Mr. Churchill had known about the new German Naval Bill. What did my hon. friend from North Grey say further? because it is most regrettable that such a well posted man, such a prominent member on the Conservative side should make such an affirmation before a body so important as the body of representatives of the Canadian people. He said, at page 1492 of 'Hansard':

All the quotations that have been made by the hon. member for South Wellington, all of the quotations made by the Hon. Mackenzie King, former Minister of Labour, in his speeches throughout this country have been from speeches delivered by Mr. Churchill, the First Lord of the Admiralty before he became aware of the contents of the German Naval Bill of 1912. And my hon. friend from South Wellington asks why were not some of the quotations which he made from speeches made by Mr. Churchill at a certain banquet, incorporated into the Admiralty memorandum of 1912? I will tell him why, because Mr. Churchill knew that the statements which he made earlier in the year, before he knew the contents of the German Naval Bill, would not be true if delivered after he knew the contents of the German Naval Bill.

That is very serious. He practically admits that if Mr. Churchill knew of the new German Naval Bill of 1912 we could rely upon his words and swallow his advice. What are the facts? First of all, the London Times referred to the new German naval estimates on the 15th of March, 1912. What more? In the speech delivered by Mr. Churchill on the main estimates of 1912 on the 18th of March Mr. Churchill makes an allusion which is in reality an allusion to he new amendments to the German naval law. He said:

If we are now as it would seem and as I fear it is certain to be confronted with an addition of two ships to the German construction in the next two years—two dreadnoughts.

On the 18th of March, 1912, Mr. Churchill knew the amendment to the German naval law. What is more precise than that? It is that the German estimates of 1912, considered as an amendment to their law, were brought down in the German Parliament on the 15th of April, and the speech of Mr. Churchill was delivered at the shipwrights' dinner one month later, on the 15th of May. This is perfectly accurate and cannot be contradicted. Then I would ask the hon. member for North Grey to correct that statement. It appears, moreover, that my good friend from Brome (Mr. Baker) and my good friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) went to McGill University and made the same incorrect statement. I think it is now corrected and will remain corrected forever. I have quoted the Minister of Trade and Commerce as against the idea of separation by the creation of a Canadian navy. I quoted the right hon. gentleman, I could have quoted Lord Beresford, Lord Brassey, I quoted Sir George Reid, I quoted Mr. Winston Churchill who advised us to fill the gaps. I might quote Sir Charles Tupper who has been quoted. We all know his ideas. But there is one man whom I desire to quote He is a Canadian, popular and very high-placed in the councils of the Conservative party, Sir Richard McBride, Prime Minister of British Columbia. At a session of the British Columbia Conservative Association on the 25th of October last Sir Richard McBride said:

That upon national grounds there was great need of a strong army and navy and particularly in British Columbia to protect its coast from poachers attacking in the Orient. Even considering the question on a commercial basis, the province had illimitable resources which to-day were practically unprotected. 'Let us,' Sir Richard added, 'shortly be able to lay claim to a regular Canadian army and navy second to none in the world.'

If we are separatists we are in good company. Everybody will admit that Mr. Foster, Mr. Borden, Lord Beresford, Sir George Reid, Mr. Winston Churchill, Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Richard McBride are gentlemen on whom we may rely when the question of loyalty is at stake, and if it is at stake in this question I think we may rely on them. What is the vulnerable part of the British Empire to-day? Surely it is not Australia or New Zealand, perhaps to some extent it is South Africa, but surely it is Canada. Why? Because we have not got a torpedo boat or a destroyer or a first-class cruiser or a second-class cruiser or a third-class cruiser or a single battleship; we have not got a single means by which we could protect our coasts in any event. This is the most vulnerable part of the Empire.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are the Rainbow and the Niobe?

Mr. BELAND: They are training ships and my hon. friend should not be so sure about the fate of those ships because if the idea of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) should prevail, the very party to which he belongs will have to use those ships as training ships before long. The sentiment is strong in the country in favour of a Canadian navy and if this party waits until four or five months hence you will not find a man in favour of contribution with the exception of a few advanced jingoistic Imperialists. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) made a great point when he said that the question of occupation was most important in case of war. We cannot treat that very lightly. What do we see to-day in Europe? My hon. friend from South York has referred to that. The events that have taken place in Europe to-day are well calculated to impress the world at large with the fact that there is a firm desire on the part of the European powers to bring about peace, and amongst those powers, there are not two more desirous of doing so than Germany and England. But there is another outstanding feature in the peace negotiations between the Allies on the one part, and Turkey on the other, the facility with which territory occupied by the Allies has been claimed and obtained. Where is the bone of contention to-day between Turkey and the allies? It is Adrianople. And why Adrianople? Because Adrianople has resisted investment by the allied forces though it is situated in the very centre of a conquered territory. The Turks claim that Adrianople having resisted occupation, should not be ceded, though they have been vanquished all along the line. Would it be risky to say that in an engagement between the German navy and the British navy, the German navy might detach a couple of cruisers and send them to Halifax? Could that happen? Is it in the realm of possibility? Who is going to protect Halifax? Is it the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries? Who is going to protect St. John or the sortie of commercial ships from the St. Lawrence? You have not got a single means of protection. Suppose that an engagement takes place in the North sea. Every member on the other side of the House says that it is not only a possibility but a probability in the near future. Suppose that that should happen, and that say one cruiser should be sent to Canada, suppose that the engagement should last a week or two; that an armistice should be signed and that Halifax and St. John should be occupied; what would be the fate of Canada? The Imperialistic party would not have provided for a single means of defence here, and probably Canada would be lost to Great Britain. Where would be the loyal party?

Mr. MACDONALD: Under the barn.

Mr. BELAND: Germany would say, we occupy Canada. What war where an armistice is signed in which negotiations are not necessary and concessions on both sides are not made? You cannot point to one in the whole of history. I say on that point that you should protect your coasts, your ports, and your trade. By doing that first of all, you would help the Mother Country, and next and close to it, you would help yourselves as Canadians, and as British subjects belonging to the Empire. The only way, in my humble opinion, in which you can preserve Canada to the British Empire, is by providing defence here on the coasts of Canada.

But there is another point in favour of a Canadian navy, and that is as regards Canadian industry. Have I indeed in front of me the gentlemen who are the political descendants of Sir John Macdonald, the great protectionist, the man who risked all in 1878 to establish national industries in this country? Are they really the political descendants of Sir John Macdonald when to-day they propose to encourage British industry to spend $35,000,000 in British dockyards that are filled to their full capacity, and to refuse to encourage a ship-building industry in Canada? Have we not got the iron, the coal, the nickel; have we not got the artisans and the seaports, St. John, Halifax, Sydney, Montreal, Vancouver and Victoria? We have the places, the artisans, and the material, and I say it is the greatest mistake on the part of this Government to neglect this the greatest opportunity of establishing one of the greatest industries in the world in Canada. By doing so, you would double, perhaps quadruple, the population of the cities I have mentioned. Furthermore, once established, that ship-building industry would advance towards the great lakes, Georgian bay, lake Huron, and lake Superior, and provide commercial ships. From this point of view, I submit that this House should rally to the proposition of my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition.

The claim is made that $35,000,000 are necessary to relieve a certain naval stress in Great Britain, to do away with an emergency. I sincerely believe that the emergency is dead. It existed up to the day before the Christmas recess, but the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out very properly to his followers that they should not stick to that word 'emergency.' He said it was not 'emergency,' it was 'need,' and he spelled the word. He climbed down, and though he did it very gracefully, still he climbed down. This emergency disturbed my hon. friend from Chambly-Verchères very much. In the debate on the Address, if I may be allowed to refer to a previous debate, he said that he was much disturbed by the Balkan trouble, and that we should provide big ships immediately to remove it. Then my hon. friend the Postmaster General referred to the impression he received when he heard the debates in the Imperial House of Commons. He said he was very much impressed by the words of Mr. Bonar Law, that the guns of Germany were pointed to Great Britain all the time. He lost his sleep over it that night, and he has been so strongly impressed ever since that he has become an advanced Imperialist, although, as my hon. friend from Red Deer pointed out, he is not a thorough Imperialist, he does not bear the ear-mark. I think my right hon. friend the Prime Minister believes that the emergency has disappeared, and why? In 1909 he spoke on the resolution, and I remember that in one of the best speeches I ever heard in this House, he said that as far as he could judge, looking over the whole situation, the crisis would come in 1912. Well, 1912 came, and it has gone, and I believe the danger has disappeared with it.

Then, there are those who claim that we can scare the Canadian people by saying, for instance, that Germany is going to have sixty-one dreadnoughs in 1920. You have read that in particularly dark articles in the Montreal Star. The Montreal Star naval expert said in his article that he thought that Germany would have sixty-one dreadnoughts in 1920. Does any one say that on the other side? Do the forty-one battleships and the twenty large cruisers referred to in the memorandum mean sixty-one dreadnoughts? The memorandum does not say that because the sixty-one ships referred to are not dreadnoughts. We have heard of the two-power standard and my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) said, in a flight of eloquence, that now the two-power standard of Great Britain had disappeared. The two-power standard has been abandoned in Great Britain for obvious reasons. It was first referred to in 1889 by Lord Hamilton, who was then First Lord of the Admiralty. It was then an adequate mode of establishing the supremacy of Great Britain. It meant that the naval forces of Great Britain should be equal to the combined forces of the two next strongest powers. To-day, the Admiralty does not stick to the two-power standard, not because it does not exist, but because it is considered that it would not be a full measure of security in consequence of the rising suddenly into prominence within the last few years of one particular naval power and, to-day, Great Britain is adhering to what is called the sixty per cent superiority standard.

So much has been said about the risk that Great Britain would be running in the near future on account of the relative weakness of her navy, as compared with that of Germany, that it will be my duty now to give you some figures.

In 1913 Great Britain will have twenty-six all big gun ships, dreadnoughts and ships that are fit to lie in the line with dreadnoughts. Germany will have seventeen and France six; Germany and France together, twenty-three. In 1913 Great Britain will have twenty-six as against the two strongest European powers' twenty-three. The two-power standard is maintained.

In 1914 Great Britain will have thirty-three all big gun ships, Germany twenty-one, France eight; Germany and France combined, twenty-nine. Great Britain will have thirty-three as against twenty-nine belonging to the two strongest European powers. The two-power standard is maintained.

In 1915 Great Britain will have thirty-seven all big gun ships, Germany twenty-three, France ten; total for Germany and France, thirty-three. In 1915 the two-power standard of Great Britain is maintained against the two strongest European powers.

But it is claimed that the two-power standard of Great Britain is gone in so far as the United States are concerned. I have here figures that I think will carry conviction to my hon. colleagues in this House.

In 1913 Great Britain will have twenty-six all big gun ships as against Germany and the United States combined, twenty-five.

In 1914 Great Britain will have thirty-three, as against Germany and the United States combined, thirty-one.

In 1915 Great Britain will have thirty-seven as against Germany and the United States combined, thirty-five. That leaves out the two Lord Nelsons, which are counted by many powers as dreadnoughts. The two-power standard is maintained against the two next strongest naval powers in the world. The memorandum makes a reference to the naval forces of Great Britain as against the combined naval forces of all European powers. It states that by the year 1915, whilst Great Britain will have thirty-five, all big gun ships, the rest of the European powers will have fifty-one. Well, that is all right, but I have been looking in vain in the memorandum to find a comparison of the forces of the triple alliance and the triple entente. I remember that Lord Crewe said that if you counted all the powers of the world as your possible enemies and none of them as your probable friends you could not on that score discuss the situation at all. Let us take the triple alliance and the triple entente.

In 1913, the triple entente will have twenty-six and the triple alliance seventeen. France and Russia are not counted here. I will begin counting them in 1914.

In 1914, the triple entente, Great Britain, France and Russia, will have forty-seven all big gun ships. The triple alliance in that same year will have twenty-seven all big gun ships—forty-seven to twenty-seven.

In 1915, the triple entente will have fifty-six all big gun ships and the triple alliance thirty-three.

This preponderance seems to be overwhelming. When Mr. Asquith said in the House of Commons that they had an overwhelming superiority over all possible combinations that could be anticipated, he stated the truth. The figures bear him out. These figures are official and they cannot be contradicted. Now, take the cruiser classes. Great Britain has one hundred and seventeen, Germany, fifty-three, the United States thirty-two, or a total for Germany and the United States of eighty-five. Great Britain has in the cruiser class one hundred and seventeen ships as against eighty-five for the next two strongest naval powers. In the cruiser class Great Britain maintains the three-power standard. Great Britain, in battleships, battle cruisers, and cruisers of all classes, has 189 warships, as against 165 for Germany and the United States combined.

I am not going to deal any further with these figures, but I believe they are quite conclusive to show that the claim that there is an emergency is indeed preposterous. The statesmen of Great Britain declare most emphatically that the situation is perfectly secure; they say they have the situation well in hand, and that they have an overwhelming superiority over all possible combinations. Well, I think we should rely on what the British statesmen say in that regard.

The proposition of the Prime Minister is not as harmless as it appears. I trust I am not indulging in a vain flight of imagination when I say that this contribution, and the ministerial declarations which accompany it, engage Canada irrevocably in the path of organic union in the Empire. That is what is in the minds of some of the English statesmen, especially those of the Unionist political party. Up to this present session of Parliament, no Imperialist has advanced or publicly advocated that scheme, but to-day, in some cities in this country, the flag of Imperial federation has been unfurled.

The question is not: will you contribute $35,000,000 to relieve the strained financial situation in Great Britain? It cannot be that, because there is no strained financial situation in the Mother Country. The question is no longer: are you going to contribute $35,000,000 to help maintain the naval superiority of Great Britain, which is already overwhelmingly superior? That cannot be entertained. The question is not: Is Canada ready to assume a share in the defence of the Empire, having regard to her geographical situation, her financial resources, and her sea borne trade? Yes, but something more. What the Canadian Parliament has to face and to decide to-day is an issue of more far-reaching consequence. The whole future of Canada as a political entity is involved. The question is, in my humble opinion: shall Canada be a sister nation in the British Empire, enjoying the full privilege of self-government, or, is she going to retrograde and become a province in the Imperial federation? A province in the Imperial federation—you are astonished I should make such a statement? But that statement has been made in this debate by one of the most prominent members of the Conservative party, Mr. Ames, the member for St. Antoine, Montreal. He said autonomy was a good word for the last century, meaning that autonomy is not a good word for this century. Listen to him:

Autonomy was a good word for the last century.

Listen to him further:

And I say the day is coming when the Dominion will hold the same relation to the Empire that the province holds to the Dominion.

Who is it on the other side of the House that wants that? Would any hon. gentleman opposite like to have Canada play the part of a province in the Imperial federation? Autonomy is a good word for the last century, says Mr. Ames; but let me quote Mr. Balfour, who in 1910, in the twentieth century, in the century that is supposed to have done away with autonomy, said:

It is a matter of common knowledge—and, may I add, not a matter of regret, but a matter of pride or rejoicing—that the great dominions beyond the seas are becoming great nations in themselves. Integral parts they are of the British Empire; but, nevertheless, claiming, and rightly claiming, to have reached the adult stage in the process of social growth.

Those words were pronounced in the twentieth century, the century in which, according to Mr. Ames the word autonomy is not welcome. Again, in the twentieth century, we hear the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain rebuking Mr. Ames, when he said:

How are we to bring these separate interests together; these states which have voluntarily accepted one Crown and one flag, and which in all else are absolutely independent of one another.

While some would claim they were independent between themselves, that is to say, one dominion independent of the other dominion, let us read further what Mr. Chamberlain says, so as to make it clear:

The time has gone by when we could treat them with indifference; when we could speak of them as though they were subject to our dictation. They are self-governing nations. They are sister states. They are our equals.

These words were uttered in the twentieth century, not in the nineteenth century, the century of autonomy, according to the hon. member for St. Antoine. What does Mr. Campbell-Bannerman say? I crave your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, for quoting at such length, but I think it is absolutely necessary to make out my case. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman said in 1907:

We found ourselves, gentlemen, upon freedom and independence. That is the essence of the Imperial connection.

The essence of the Imperial connection is independence, according to Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, and I suppose my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) would be scandalized if he heard that. Mr. Askwith, another statesman of a certain size, said:

The special feature of the British Empire has been that it has combined, and has succeeded in combining in a degree unknown in any other combination in history, a loyal and affectionate attachment between the center and parts of the Empire, and between the various parts themselves, with complete practical independence.

I am sure the hon. member for Frontenac and the hon. member for St. Antoine will not call these statesmen down for uttering such words.

I have said that I thought the scheme proposed by the Government involved the political future of Canada. May I quote to you some words uttered by the right hon. gentleman when he presented his resolution. I think they are quite decisive of this case:

Is there really any need that we should undertake the hazardous and costly experiment of building up a naval organization especially restricted to this Dominion, when upon just and self-respecting terms we can take such part as we desire in naval defence through the existing naval organization of the Empire, and in that way can fully and effectively avail ourselves of the men and the resources at the command of Canada?

If my hon. friend from South York is waiting for the right hon. the Prime Minister to establish the Canadian naval service, which the hon. gentleman seems to so greatly desire, I venture to say he will wait a long while indeed, judging by the declaration of the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman said further on the 5th of December last year:

No thoughtful man can fail to realize that very complex and difficult questions confront those who believe that we must find a base of permanent co-operation in naval defence.

And listen to the following words:

—and that any such basis must afford to the overseas dominions an adequate voice in the moulding and control of foreign policy.

And listen further:

The conclusions and declarations of Great Britain in respect to foreign relations could not fail to be strengthened by the knowledge that such consultation and co-operation with the overseas dominions had become an accomplished fact.

I have quoted the right hon. gentleman's words at some length because undoubtedly he was the mouthpiece of the Government in this instance, as he should be. But there is another hon. minister who has made a declaration which is very important, a declaration full of meaning. I refer to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). Surely he will not say he is not an advanced Imperialist. I was astounded to find that, in this Canadian country, which has been built up by men like Baldwin, Brown, Macdonald, Mackenzie, Cartwright, Tupper—to mention only men who have passed from the political life of Canada—a gentleman who occupying a seat on the treasury benches would make a declaration like this:

That question of permanent defence will be worked out; it will be worked out along proper lines; and we believe that one of the elements that will have to enter into the question of permanent defence will be the one of representation which Canada and the overseas dominions shall have with regard to foreign affairs and the policy of the British Empire as a whole.

Now, will the Government claim that they are not committed to a policy of organic union with Great Britain? Is not the political future of Canada clearly involved in these utterances? If these declarations mean anything, they mean that the political relations of Canada and Great Britain are shortly to be fundamentally changed. Now, perhaps I might quote a word from Mr. Bonar Law, but I need not take up time with it, for it is on the same line as the others. Let me quote the Duke of Westminster, an important man in Great Britain, one of the most influential members, I think, of the Unionist party, a leader of opinion in Great Britain. He wrote, in the November issue of The Nineteenth Century And After, the following words:

> The Empire requires for its security an Imperial army and an Imperial fleet, paid for out of an Imperial exchequer and controlled and directed by an Imperial Government. The defence of the Empire must be organized, but only the unification of the Empire will make possible the adequate organization which has been recognized by the leading colonial statesmen.

Listen to the balance of the quotation:

> Therefore they——
>
> That is, the colonial statesmen.
> —have urged us to call them to our councils.

That is, that Canadian ministers when in Great Britain, according to the Duke of Westminster, asked the Imperial Government to admit them to their councils in order that they should share in the direction of the foreign policy of Great Britain. I say—be I right or wrong—I beg to dissent; I beg to disagree; I do not believe that the people of this country want to share in the direction of the foreign policy of Great Britain.

The rush of population to our great wheat belt, the investment of home and foreign capital in this country, the growth of our railways and other means of transportation, the rapid development of our natural resources, the great activity of our manufacturing industries,—these are some of the features of our material progress. But what do we see to-day? At this hour of our history, when we possess the undisputed privilege of making our own treaties; when this Parliament is in possession of the undisputed direction of its military forces; when we have assurances from the British Government that no question affecting our Dominion shall be settled without the assent of the Canadian Government; when the time has come that our coasts are uncovered by the withdrawal of the British squadrons and we are confronted with the manifest duty of supplying the protection the Mother Country can no longer extend to us;—at this we are told that we must ascend to a place in the temple where the destinies of Europe are decided. Canada is to embark upon the whirlpool of European politics. This movement, I claim, is a retrograde movement. The status of Canada is that of a sister nation and not that of a daughter nation. These words have been uttered by Lord Grey, and I like them, for they are proud and noble words. The tie which unites the sister nations of the British Empire is love and devotion to one king And there is another tie, referred to three or four days ago by Lord Emmet at the Canadian Club dinner in London, England, who said that the love of the King and automony were the two things that united the nations of the Empire. They are the strongest and the most enduring ties. Do not try to supplement them with ties of a political federation, or with the ties of centralization, or with the ties of political concentration, for fear you might destroy them. Let all these sister nations co-operate, but do not make the vain endeavour to incorporate them. It has been claimed that we are going to have a preliminary voice in the councils of the committee of defence. The prospect has thrown my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) into a state of exulation. So far as I am concerned, I would not object to having a voice in the Committee of Defence. But it is nothing new; it is something we have had for years. But if this voice is called a 'preliminary' step, it means that something else is coming. And I fear it. I fear it because it means that the goal toward which the present Government is moving is the direction of the foreign policy of Great Britain. That would mean a share in the Government of Great Britain. And a voice in the Government of Great Britain would require to be supported by a corresponding voice in the Imperial House of Commons, and it would be in the full sense of the word an organic federation and the entanglement of Canada in the foreign affairs of Great Britain. I sincerely believe that the immense majority of the people of this country are utterly opposed to such a political scheme. It would lead to discontent; it would lead to contention; it would lead to friction; it would lead, I believe, ultimately to the disruption of the British Empire. And that is the main reason why I, as a French Canadian would oppose political federation.

Mr. Speaker, we have a sea-borne trade of $400,000,000. We have not a shadow of protection on either the Pacific or the Atlantic coast. Yet we are asked to vote thirty-five millions of dollars to the British Exchequer to place three ships in the North sea where they are not needed. Our Atlantic coast is three thousand miles from the North sea, and our Pacific coast is eight thousand miles from the North sea. We are without protection on either; and we are asked to vote thirty-five millions of dollars to place ships in the North sea. Statesmen in Canada, such as Macdonald, Cartier, Tupper, Mackenzie, have always repulsed the idea of Imperial federation or organic union. Yet the political descendants of Sir John Macdonald are asking us to throw ourselves into that whirlpool. The statesmen who are connected with the British Admiralty state that Great Britain has more dreadnoughts than any two powers of the world. And we are asked to supply three battleships to be located in the North sea where all the British fleet is concentrated. British statesmen declare that the situation is perfectly safe: we are asked to leave our coasts unprotected and to put three battleships in the North sea. It has been stated by Lloyd George that the British fleet is being constructed and being maintained without the poorer classes of Great Britain paying one shilling more in taxes a year, the additional taxes being placed upon the shoulders of the richer and wealthier classes who are well able to bear the burden. And still hon. gentlemen opposite propose that we shall place thirty-five millions of dollars in the hands of the British Exchequer. Great Britain has reduced her debt by $370,000,000 in the last seven years; Germany has increased her debt by $240,000,000 in the same time. Great Britain has a surplus of $35,000,000 this year. And still we are asked to relieve the financial stress of Great Britain by voting thirty-five millions of dollars. The income of wealth of Great Britain increases every year by an amount suffiicent to build twenty battle cruisers, and we are asked to pay for three battle cruisers to place them at the disposition of the Admiralty where they do not need them. All here are agreed that there are not too many Canadian industries. We require other great and useful industries in this country. We have no ship-building industries. It is the desire of every artisan, of every farmer, of every merchant, of every manufacturer, that a ship-building industry should be established in Canada. And yet the Government of Canada to-day proposes that we should vote thirty-five million of dollars to encourage the British ship-building industry, an industry that has more to do than it can attend to.

Mr. Speaker, the heart of the Empire is secure. Unionist statesmen say so; Liberal statesmen say so. The right arm of the British Government is Canada. And it is here proposed that we should vote thirty-five millions of dollars to add to the shield over the heart of the Empire of Great Britain, while we leave the right arm without a weapon. My last words, Mr. Speaker, are Let Canada develop as she has done until this day, and you will always find her ready to co-operate with the Mother Country in the hour of peril, as she has done so many times in her glorious history.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): I have never risen in this House with such diffidence as I do at this moment. After the splendidly eloquent speech of the gentleman (Mr. Beland) who has just taken his seat, I feel that I should have been glad to have the debate adjourned. I deeply regret the crack, of the whip that assigns me to follow my hon. friend, I should have been glad if I had been assigned to the duty of following my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), for then, I feel, I could have done yeoman duty. Mr. Speaker, since you were chosen to occupy the presidential chair in this Chamber, a position you have held with honour and the duties of which you have discharged with impartiality, it has been my lot on several occasions to receive at your hands the generous indulgence which secured to me the indulgence of the House. I hope to be able to depend upon the same courtesy today when I essay to discharge my duty to my constituents who are desirous I should express in their name and on their behalf their views and sentiments on the question now before this House. Every hon. member who has addressed you has expressed in the beginning his appreciation of the magnitude of the question now before you. I am no exception. I feel that this proposition calls for our most earnest consideration because it involves a new principle which means a change in a new departure from our constitutional status, an implication which, to my mind must have inspired the statement of Hon. Mr. Monk in handing in his resignation to the Prime Minister that the proposition goes beyond the constitutional Act of 1867.

In his opening remarks to the members of the Imperial conference in 1911, the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Asquith, made the remark that in the early Victorian era it had been the good fortune of the British Empire to have ben relieved from centralization and disintregation as well, but he did not know if he should attribute the good fortune of the Empire to the favour of Providence or to the political genius of the English race. In his legitimate pride as a Britisher, Mr. Asquith, was justified in using such bold language and as to the other colonies, such as South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, I am willing to grant that their cohesion is due to the political genius of the British race, but as to Canada I claim that the will of Providence did intervene when, anxious to save the French colony and the French people of Canada and North America from the false doctrines of the coming French revolution and its horrible consequences, Providence inspired the British statesmen of the day with the noblest possible sentiments of Christianity and humanity and directed them to Paris to sign treaties embodying the perpetual recognition of the laws, language and religion of the French people, privileges which were accepted with the deepest gratitude and which made the French Canadians the most devoted people of the British Empire as we have seen on many occasions. Behold the fall of Montgomery on the 31st of December, 1775, at the foot of the citadel of Quebec, under the command of Captain Chabot! Behold the field of Chateauguay where in October, 100 years ago, 300 French-Canadians with forty Scotchmen accomplished the greatest military feat of modern ages, which was witnessed only by 7,000 American soldiers as they were retreating and the heavens above rejoicing. And when later Downing Street attempted to inflict upon them the spirit of centralization and curtailment of privileges, they resisted and added their support to the combative genius of Joseph Howe and they are still securing for Canada this great broad dominion and securing at the same time the unity of the Empire. This spirit which animates every Canadian from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Acadian, in the land of Evangeline, in his generous forgiveness of the harshness of conquest, the Irishman and Scotchman—every born Canadian and every naturalized Canadian; it is a spirit which has produced Spartan deeds of valour in the battlefield for Canada and worthy acts of diplomacy and statesmanship. Look at the work for Canada of Joseph Howe, Lafontaine and Baldwin, Mackenzie, Papineau, and Cartier and many others, the Blakes, the Mowats and the Cartwrights, and to-day under the sympathetic admiration of Canada and the Empire, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and his many associates in every province of Canada, whose far-reaching vision and lofty patriotism will forever, in peace and harmony, without aggressiveness be able to develop the immense resources of this country and make of Canada the greatest of the sister nations of the British Empire, with her people gifted with national aspirations, appreciations of national duty and national responsibilities, strong in agriculture and industry, able, willing and ready at any time to give the Empire men and bread, ships and treasure. This question now before you with all its gravity and its immensity, after all is not a new question, and if we are here to-day to debate again this question, it is only due to the change of mind of my hon. friends opposite. We have been asked by many of our friends opposite why should we not join together and accept the responsibility of a contribution with its consequences. As far as an emergency is concerned, when I see an emergency that will be felt by the British Empire, that will be understood by the British Government as well as by the members of a political party on this side of the Atlantic, an emergency that would not need a dictionary and spelling to establish it, an emergency that could be called an emergency, the modest member for Gloucester would not be satisfied with $35,000,000—I would say as I said four or five years ago: Canada would open her treasury to the British Empire, together with every man and every dollar that we could send until that emergency was over. Then, when danger was averted, we would go back to the restoration of our agriculture and financial position with the vigour of a strong nation, a nation possessing a rich and wealthy patrimony and would quickly restore our prosperity—as France did after the German war, when she was able to pay her war indemnity in advance of the time specified. That is what I would think should be done in case of an emergency, and I should think that the people of Canada would adopt that course under any abnormal condition which might be termed an emergency.

Four years ago, the two parties in this House came to an agreement and designed the policy which was adopted by both sides of the House. During the course of this debate the right hon. the leader of the Liberal party, now for the time being leader of the Opposition, has been taken to task because he was not doing his duty, because he had been reluctant and tardy in doing his duty. Ever since Confederation we have been conscious of the duty to the nation to take steps to provide for our naval as well as for our military defence. Meanwhile the country had to progress and it fell to the lot of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to be the first to intimate in an Imperial Conference his desire and the desire of Canada to co-operate with Great Britain in the defence of the Empire, and the protection of the coast as well as of the trade of Canada. It was at the Imperial conference of 1902 that he declared that in the near future the creation of a Canadian fleet would be his policy, and that he would refuse to pay contributions. The principle then laid down remained, and my right hon. friend the leader of the Liberal party had always in view the establishment of a Canadian navy, but the time and the opportunity had not come then to carry out that policy. At that time my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition believed that the development of the country was as essential to the supremacy of the Empire as any contribution of ships or money. He believed that the country had to be developed, that transportation facilities had to be extended. People had to be brought into the country, and the population made happy and prosperous. The future granary of the Empire had to be well equipped; new transcontinental railways were required; a surplus production of wheat had to be secured for the Empire. But what was the good of producing a surplus of wheat without railways from east to west when there was an unsurmountable wall to the south? Time went on, the country progressed, and in order to relieve the Empire, of part of the burden of defence, the right hon. gentleman then leading the Government agreed to take charge of the defences at Esquimalt and Halifax. That was assuming a share of the burden of Empire.

When the whole country was waiting with patience for the development of the country, the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government and the hon. member for North Toronto, who is now, I believe, the chief counsellor and adviser of the new Government, brought in a motion with the object of relieving the Empire of the burden of expenditure on defence. On that occasion the hon. member for North Toronto delivered a speech in which he excelled himself. I believe I render him justice when I say that it was the greatest speech he ever delivered in this Parliament or in the country. It was a speech which earned the admiration of every member of the House, and it gave greater firmness to my convictions. The same hon. gentleman addressed this House on the 18th of December last when he was again very eloquent. He delivered a speech which has been proclaimed the speech of his life. I admit that he was very eloquent but I think he laboured harder than he did in March, 1909, when he spoke from the heart and expressed the sentiments which he had nourished for a lifetime. I think the speech of the 18th December last would have been the speech of his life if he had not delivered the speech of March, 1909. It was the sentiments expressed in the hon. gentleman's deliverance of March, 1909, that laid the foundation of the policy which was then considered and is still considered the one that Canada should accept and put in operation, and that policy was unanimously accepted at that date. Many of the hon. gentleman's words have been quoted, and I would like to quote a few of them now. I do not desire to abuse the indulgence of the House, but I hope I may be permitted to quote some of the expressions he used that were typical of a great patriot and a great Canadian. Speaking against a contribution, he said:

> After ten or twelve or twenty or thirty years you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck, there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil or beginning of the growth of the product of defence.

Further on he said:

> Again it disjoins what has been joined from the earliest days of the world's existence—commerce and the protection of commerce. After all, the basic idea of a naval force is the protection of the commerce of a country. A commerce side by side with its protector, and its protector side by side with the growing commerce of a country, flourish best together, and are the surest helpers to each other.

Again, as if anticipating the criticism which was offered to the measure adopted by the Government in 1910, when it was proposed to build armoured cruisers and torpedo boats as the beginning of a navy, he said:

> Then, again, I think this method ignores the necessities and the aspirations and the prospects of a great people such as the Canadian people are destined to become. We must have beginnings; these must at first be small; but some time or other, as I have said, our country will have its naval force for the defence of this country if for nothing else.

It has been stated, and outside of the province of Quebec it was used as an argument in the election of 1911 that the navy proposed was too small. But we did not intend to build at once a navy sufficient to protect our immense trade and our immense coasts on the Atlantic and the Pacific. On the 29th of March, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said that this must at first be small—that no nation has, ever entered into the immediate construction of a complete navy any more that we have been able to organize at once a sufficient army or militia for the sufficient protection of the country. In a very few years we will have a population of 25,000,000 with a commerce increasing from year to year which will require more and more protection. But, we would have added from year to year to that navy until it would have been sufficient to command the respect of every nation, as the United States has done. It has taken the United States many years to build their navy but they now have a navy worthy of their nation and their commerce and adequate for the protection of their immense coast line. We are asked to have unaminity on this question, to agree to the proposals of the Prime Minister, to leave politics aside, to join together in a patriotic consensus of opinion and vote the money which is now asked by the Government as a contribution from Canada to the Empire. Permit me to quote a few words uttered by the right hon. Prime Minister, for whom I have the greatest respect, on July 1, 1909, three or four months after the famous resolution had been passed and passed with his co-operation. Speaking in London at the Canadian banquet, the right hon. gentleman said:

> The resolution in the form in which it was passed, while its terms might not upon the surface seem as significant at this moment as the offer of one or two dreadnoughts would have been, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada upon which both parties united, and which would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of dreadnoughts.

These are the words of the then leader of the Opposition, now the leader of the Government, who claims that we should go back upon the policy which he admired himself and which he said would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of dreadnoughts as was contemplated by some members of this House at the time. Again, the right hon. gentleman, having returned from across the sea, goes to his constituency in the city of Halifax and there on October 4, 1909, addresses the electorate in these words:

> One governing principle at least should control, namely, that out of our material, by our own labour and by the instructed skill of our own people, any necessary provision for our naval defence should be made so far as may be reasonably possible.

On the same occasion and in the same address he said:

> The House of Commons last session laid down a policy touching naval defence in which both parties united. It may not have satisfied the aspirations of all Conservatives, but it seemed our bounden duty to place if possible above the limits of partisan strife a question so vital and so far-reaching.

These were the words and convictions of the right hon. gentleman at that time, just a few days before he was called to take his place in the House at the opening of the session of 1910-11 when, by some circumstance or by some means his judgment was transformed, so that when we proposed, a month or two afterwards, the policy which received the sanction of the Admiralty in 1910, he declared his opposition to it and demanded a contribution. Therefore, as I said at the opening of my remarks, if anybody in Canada, or in this Parliament, has failed to manifest a spirit of unanimity, or to unite in a consensus of opinion, or if anybody is responsible for dragging this great question into the realm of politics, it is certainly hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Now, we are told that we are not true and loyal subjects of the British Crown, that we do not foresee the future of Canada or of the British Empire because, forsooth, we stand by the same policy and the same ideals which were the policy and the ideals of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister in 1909 and which must be their ideals to-day because I cannot understand how men with even an infinitesimal part of the intelligence which I know these hon. gentlemen possess can possibly change their minds and say that a Canadian navy cannot be built in Canada inside of fifty years and that we have not the material or the aspirations to build it. But the law was passed, an election took place and we know what happened. The leader of the Opposition then became the leader of the Government, and with his friends took his place on the other side of the House. I wish them personally every possible success. Every one of them possesses my greatest esteem and respect.

I see before me my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) who represents my province in this Cabinet. He knows how great a personal admiration I have always had for him. Patriotic sentiments, I am sure, have inspired his intellectual activity, but when I have observed his actions on many occasions on this question I have wondered because I have thought that they were altogether in opposition to the true feelings of the man who has received the confidence of the people of his own province. I did help him in this matter but he knows that I have always admired him. Even when he speaks against me I always like to listen to him. But the fortunes of the country are a different thing. The future of Canada cannot be guided by personal considerations and nobody can say that he must not express his convictions on public questions with all the thoroughness of feeling and sentiment that he may be guided by. When I saw my hon. friend assuming the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries and of the Naval Service I hoped that it meant the beginning of the construction of ships in this country and that, agreeably to the hopes of his leader, we would have ships built out of our own material, by our own labour and by the instructed skill of our own people. I felt certain that when he assumed the portfolio of the Naval Service, he would be ready and willing to put into effect the policy which he had inherited from his predecessors in office and sign that contract for the building of the ships in Canada, which would have conferred untold benefits on his native city of St. John, on the province of New Brunswick, and on the maritime provinces generally. I felt that under the influence of the hon. gentleman there would be started in the province of New Brunswick, shipyards for the building of ships of war in the first place and for the building of ships of commerce later on. If any man more than another has been disappointed by the conduct of my good friend the Minister of Marine, it is the member for Gloucester. No one knows better than the Minister of Marine that we have in the province of New Brunswick vast deposits of coal and of iron ore which could have been turned into steel for the building of ships, and that we have harbours open all the year round which could have accommodated the shipyards. No man knew better than the Minister of Marine the wealth of the natural resources of New Brunswick in this respect, because he, as Premier of that province, gave his generous and patriotic co-operation for the development of the iron mines on the North shore. We have enough iron ore there to supply even the vast demands of Great Britain for generations. As everybody knows Canada has to keep going because every time we make a halt we go backward instead of going forward, and one way to keep going is to establish a ship-building industry in this country. Our iron deposits and our coal deposits lie side by side, and on the Nipisiquit river we have splendid water powers almost traversing the mountains of iron, and here electric furnaces could have been started immediately, if the Government had only decided to build the ships in St. John. Meanwhile that iron ore has to be shipped to American markets for want of a market at home. I cannot understand how my good friend, immediately after he took office, by a stroke of his pen cancelled a contract which would have made for the immediate prosperity of his own constituency and conferred lasting benefits on his native province. I believe there must have been a secret power that directed his hand to cancel that contract, and that power must have been the power of the Quebec Nationalists in the Cabinet with him.

We were told by the hon. member for Frontenac that the policy of the leader of the Opposition is a separatist policy, but I say here that if there is one member of this House who does not want to see Canada separated, now, or in the coming centuries, it is the modest member for Gloucester, and all those of his constituents who send him here by large majorities hold the same view. It is because of my intense patriotism and my intense admiration for Canada as the greatest sister nation in the British Empire, that I am opposed to the policy of the right hon. the Prime Minister which in the end I believe will tend to loosen the ties that bind us to the Motherland. My good friend the Minister of Marine told us last year that he would go to Great Britain with the Prime Minister and consult the Admiralty, and come back with a policy which would be, he believed, satisfactory to Canada and the Empire. He went to England and he consulted the Admiralty, but he and his leader came back with no policy at all. They then apparently hit on the idea of asking for a contribution until they had time to frame a permanent policy. I, for one, consider this emergency contribution, as it is called, a permanent policy of contribution for the building of ships, not in Canada but in Great Britain and these ships bear in mind are for service in the North sea. That contribution of $35,000,000 must be, of necessity, a preliminary to a permanent policy and that is a policy to which I am opposed, because it implies a change in our national status, a change which will not make for the stability of the Empire, but might cause disintegration, as did the policy of centralization disintegrate the Roman Empire and more recently the Spanish Empire.

As it is now eleven o'clock, and as I have a few further remarks to make, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Pelletier, House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 3, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada.—Mr. Foster.

ESTIMATES FOR 1913-1914.

A message from His Royal Highness the Governor General transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1914, was presented by Mr. White (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

PRIVATE BILLS.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 20, respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—Mr. Lespérance.

On sub-section 2 of section 1:

Mr. NESBITT: I see that this allows two-thirds in value of the shareholders present at a special general meeting to increase the stock, in place of two-thirds of the total number of shareholders. There might be only a few people there. I think there should be a greater amount of capital stock represented.

Mr. BORDEN: The gentleman who is in charge of this Bill does not seem to be present. I think this clause is in the usual form, that is to say, instead of requiring that a certain majority of the shareholders shall be present at the meeting, it requires that a considerable majority of those present upon due notice shall decide. However, I do not know anything about the Bill, and if the hon. member would like that point gone into and explained further, the Bill had better stand until the hon. gentleman who is in charge of it is present.

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR COMMISSION.

House in Committee on Bill No. 55, to incorporate the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners—Mr. Taylor.

On section 4—harbour limits defined:

Mr. TAYLOR: I have an amendment to propose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Deputy Speaker): The hon. member has to give notice of an amendment.

Mr. HAZEN: As I understand it, this amendment refers only to the description of the harbour. This Bill was in Committee on Friday evening, as hon. members will recollect, and there was some criticism of the description of the harbour boundaries given in the Bill. The hon. member for New Westminster, who has charge of the Bill, went over the matter with the engineers of the Marine and Fisheries Department, and he is asking to amend the section so that the harbour boundaries will be exactly the same as they are defined in the Order in Council for the harbour master's purposes. I think the proposed amendment meets the objections raised on Friday evening.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is not only a verbal amendment but it is a very important one, and no notice has been given. The matter ought to be allowed to stand.

Mr. BORDEN: If any objection is raised the Bill must stand.

PATENT OF GEORGE FREDERICK BISHOPRICK.

House in Committee on Bill No. 8, respecting a patent of George Frederick Bishoprick.—Mr. Macdonell.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where a Bill deals with a patent in the way in which this Bill does, it has always been usual, in my experience, inasmuch as it is a departure from the general law, for the party promoting the Bill to explain to the House the reasons which have rendered it necessary for him to ask for this special legislation. This remark applies to one of these Bills. The explanation given by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) with regard to the explosives Bill was that this was the second time in which the powers asked for in it had ever been granted by Parliament, and there was no explanation as to why they should be granted.

Mr. BORDEN: I suppose that explanations have been given in the committee on Private Bills. It is proper, however, that they should be given in this House. I have taken exactly the same view as that which my hon. friend has just expressed in regard to this Bill. The mover of the Bill does not seem to be in the House at the moment.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have no desire to captiously oppose this Bill, I only desire to understand the matter.

Mr. BORDEN: Better let it stand.

CANADIAN EXPLOSIVES, LIMITED.

House in Committee on Bill No. 9, respecting Canadian Explosives, Limited.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Bill No. 9 is not one for which I wish to take personal responsibility. It is a Bill introduced by the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames); but in his absence to-day I was asked to see it before the committee. I have read the Bill over and discussed it with interested parties. As far as I understand, it simply provides for the return of ordinary certificates, their endorsement in the register, and the re-issue in place of them of share warrants, which means simply shares that are transferable by delivery. It provides further that these share warrants may be later on returned and in their place ordinary share certificates may be issued. The Bill further provides for the status of the holders of share warrants in the event of meetings of shareholders, &c. But I presume that the explanation the hon. gentleman wants is as to why the company should be asking for power to issue share warrants at all. As far as my information goes, it is a practice that is very common in the Old Country and one which is becoming common here. Some companies in this country already have that power. If my hon. friend wants any further explanation, I do not feel that I should press the Bill further, because I can simply give him what has been given to me. In the Banking and Commerce Committee no objection was taken to the Bill on that ground.

Mr. MACDONALD: The view that I have reached in regard to the matter is that, where the right to issue share warrants on the part of a company is desired, the company should come and get a special Act of Parliament for the purpose as a matter of general principle. What we have here is a company incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies' Act coming to Parliament and getting a special right to deal in share warrants, a right which is not given to other companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies' Act. I understand that on Friday night, when the matter was mentioned by my hon. friend from Prince Albert, it was said that one other company existed which had this privilege. I maintain that, as a matter of sound legislation, we should not trespass within the arena of the Joint Stock Companies' Act and give to any company that comes here without any special reason, the right to issue share warrants. If they want that exceptional right they should come and ask for a special act of incorporation under which that right may be granted by Parliament. I think that is a sound principle which should guide Parliament in dealing with legislation of this character. If share warrants are a good thing then amend the Joint Stock Companies' Act and let every company have the right to issue them when they get their certificate of incorporation from the Secretary of State. Do not let us do this thing in piecemeal because investors will rely upon the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies' Act as being indicative of the powers of a particular company and you will have a considerable amount of confusion in dealing with the rights of parties where, in addition to the Joint Stock Companies' Act you find, away in the recesses of private legislation passed by this Parliament, some particular clause which gives a company special powers. If the gentlemen who are interested in this company desire special rights they should come to Parliament and ask for a special Act. That seems to me to be a sound proposition.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): With regard to what the hon. member for Pictou has said, I appreciate his point of view. I think that the Joint Stock Companies Act will require revision at a comparatively early date, but in the meantime it does not provide for the issue of share warrants. In the course of my experience I have had brought to my attention the desirability, almost necessity, of granting companies the right to issue share warrants, especially those companies which derive their funds from Europe. In this country the transfer is in the case of book shares on the books of the company or scrip certificates which pass from hand to hand by endorsement, and, so far as the financial world of Canada is concerned, they serve the purpose very well. For example, a man holds a certificate for 25 shares, in a particular company, he endorses that before a witness and it passes from hand to hand until some holder desires to have the shares transferred into his name. By virtue of the power of attorney endorsed in blank and which he fills in, the transfer is accomplished. The scrip certificate which passes from hand to hand here is not known in continental Europe, and its place is taken by what are known as share warrants, which are practically bearer certificates, entitling the bearer, upon giving notice under certain conditions to receive the dividends as and when they are declared. A number of companies incorporated in Canada which desire to sell their shares, or, in other words, to raise a part or the whole of their capital upon the continent of Europe, find it very desirable they should have the advantage of issuing share warrants in lieu of share certificates, as we have them in Canada. My hon. friend makes the point that the Companies' Act does not at present permit that, and that, therefore, there should not be any special legislation authorizing companies incorporated under the general Companies Act to issue share warrants. I can appreciate that point of view. But the revision of the Companies Act is a work of some magnitude, and should not be undertaken except after very careful consideration. In the meantime some companies might suffer seriously in respect to their financing abroad, if they are not permitted to come to Canada and obtain this special legislation under which they may issue share warrants for sale on the continent of Europe. I also appreciate the point of my hon. friend as to the advisability of their coming to Parliament and obtaining a special Act instead of getting incorporated under the general Companies Act and then coming for special legislation. But I submit to my hon. friend that as this very thing has been done before, and by reason of the fact that the parties having assumed that what has been done before could be done again, they may now be embarrassed. The companies which are applying this year for that special legislation, may be set back a year. I ask the hon. gentleman to take that aspect into consideration.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have not the advantage of belonging to the Private Bills Committee, and, therefore, I am in the dark as to what special circumstances exist with reference to this particular company which renders it advisable to give this power. I am glad the Minister of Finance agrees with the principle which I have ventured to submit, I think that perhaps in this House we do not pay that care to private legislation which we should. I am told that this exceptional power was granted last year in another case, and had I noticed it then I would have raised the question. I submit that it is not sound legislation, and that difficulties are always sure to arise where you have general acts dealing with the incorporation of companies and you pick out individual cases for special legislation. That should not be done except for very urgent reasons. If the principle incorporated in one special Bill is sound, then the general Act should be amended so as to make it open to every body. I would like to hear from the promoter of the Bill the circumstances which entitle this particular case to consideration.

Mr. NESBITT: Is there anything to show on the face of the share warrant of what the conditions of its issuance are?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): The share warrant states that the bearer is entitled to so many shares of the common or preferred stock, as the case may be, of such a company, incorporated under the laws of Canada. The share warrant is merely a document of title, showing that for the time being the bearer is entitled to a certain number of shares; it is precisely the same as if he held an ordinary stock certificate, stating that he is the owner of so many shares. The only difference is that the share warrant is to bearer, and passes from hand to hand like a bond payable to bearer. The reason it is favoured on the continent of Europe is that no question arises as to the authenticity of the signature to the power of attorney on the back of the scrip certificate. Nearly every company that carries on business on the continent of Europe adopts the share-warrant-to-bearer system, and a number of companies in this country, which desire to obtain money for their enterprises on the continent of Europe, have adopted the same expedient. If it is desirable that a company should be allowed to obtain money from Europe, then I think, if it could be safely done, as it can without doubt, facilities ought to be granted for the purpose of enabling it to sell its shares on the continent of Europe in the form the people there desire to have them sold.

Mr. NESBITT: What I wanted to know was whether the condition printed on the share warrant showed that the holder of the share warrant had no right, for example, to vote at a meeting of the company as he would had he held the shares.

Mr. WHITE: If the shares are entered in the books of the company in his name, he can vote.

Mr. NESBITT: The last clause says he had no right to vote.

Mr. WHITE: If the holder of a share warrant desired to vote, he could have the shares transferred to his own name, and could vote in the usual way.

Mr. BORDEN: As I understood my hon. friend, he desired to know whether or not the conditions alluded to in this section, which would entitle or disentitle the holder of the warrant to vote, are expressed on the warrant itself. I do not think there is any information on that point in the Bill. It seems to me that it would depend upon the determination of the directors as to the form of the share warrant. There does not seem to be anything in the Bill which controls that. There is no reason, however, why the Bill should not stand until further explanations are given. There is a good deal in what has been said by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) as to the lack of interest by hon. members in private Bills, and as to the frequency with which these Bills go through without any consideration on the part of the Committee of the Whole. It is desirable they should receive consideration, and that there should be the fullest explanations with regard to them. I am not sure that I see the exact distinction between a Bill such as this and one which would embody everything that is in the Joint Stock Companies' Act. My hon. friend from Pictou made one point which I appreciate, that is, that we should be able to refer to some general Act, and know that a company incorporated under it has certain powers and no others. That certainly is a point in favour of his contention. At the same time, any company desiring powers of this nature must come for them to Parliament so long as they are not in the Joint Stock Companies' Act. I heard nothing of the Bill before the discussion to-day. I understand that in other countries where money is raised share warrants are usual, and investors are very apt to desire the forms to which they are accustomed. There seems to be no difference between a share warrant and a share certificate which passes by endorsement, except for the consideration mentioned by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, that in the one case there might be fraud and forgery by reason of the necessity of a signature to the power of attorney on the back of the certificate, while in the other case the delivery must absolutely pass title.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is this peculiarity about the proposal, that when a share warrant is issued, the holder ceases to be a shareholder for all practical purposes, because under section 5, the directors have to strike his name out of the books. He ceases to be a shareholder, and his certificate is like a bond except that it has not a preference. Dividend coupons may be atached to the share warrant. Supposing all the shareholders had share warrants, you would really have no shareholders. Should there not be some regulation in the statute, which would provide what should be done in cases of that kind? When a company is incorporated, having reference to certain objects, I presume Parliament would have some regard as to who are to be the shareholders, to have control of the company. The moment you issue a share warrant, the shareholder ceases to be such, and until he gets the shares entered in his name on the books of the company, he has no voice in its management.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Let us take the case of an ordinary company issuing scrip certificates. A is a shareholder entitled to 25 shares. He sells these 25 shares to B, and hands B a scrip certificate endorsed in blank. So far as A is concerned, although he appears as a shareholder on the books of the company, he is of course not a shareholder. Equally so with regard to B. B has the right to complete his title by going to the company and having the shares entered in his name. The delivery of the scrip certificates endorsed in blank to B passes, as between A and B, all the right, title and interest of A to B, and enables B to go on and complete his title by having the shares entered in the books in his name. Take the case of the share warrant. A is a shareholder of the company, owning twenty-five shares; he has a certifiacte standing in his name. He desires to sell his shares, so he goes to the company, surrenders his share certificate, and takes in lieu thereof a share warrant to bearer. Instead, therefore, of delivering to B, the new owner, the scrip certificate endorsed in blank, he delivers to B the share warrant which is payable to bearer. B in the former case is not entered on the books of the company as a shareholder, and B under the second set of circumstances is also not entered in the books of the company; but B, holding the share warrant, just as he could have done if he had held stock certificate endorsed in blank, can go to the company, surrender his share warrant, have his name entered as a shareholder, and have a new share certificate delivered in place of the share warrant. That is the way it would work out. As a matter of fact, the principle is well recognized on the continent and, I believe, in England. These share warrants pass from hand to hand on the continent; that is the way they are dealt in. As has been said, the matter is new to the House, and there is no reason why the Bill should not stand for further explanation.

Mr. NESBITT: I have no desire to hold up the Bill. I simply want to point out that I think you are giving too much authority to the directors in issuing these share warrants, without having some knowledge as to whether they are printed in such a manner that they will tell the bearer what he is buying. We all know that often a great deal of deception is practised in issuing stock and stock certificates. The fault I find is that people taking these share warrants may think they are still shareholders of the company, and enjoying as such the full benefits and advantages of a shareholder. I think the position of the holder of such a warrant should be definitely stated on its face. If the directors of every company were absolutely honest, no risk would be incurred in this regard, but, unfortunately for this and other countries, all directors are not absolutely honest, and I think that before this Bill becames law a draft should be made showing how the share warrant should be printed.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to suggest to the Minister of Finance the wisdom of considering this method of dealing with the matter. The Joint Stock Companies Act was passed for the purpose of enabling a number of people to come together and obtain, within well defined limits and on certain conditions, certain corporate rights and powers. So far as Canada is concerned, the use of these share warrants has not become a matter of very great consequence in ordinary financial affairs. I think my hon. friend, if the principle of issuing share warrants is sound, should have an amendment to the Joint Stock Companies Act prepared, in which the rights of share warrant holders, and the status of transferees and all parties affected by the issue of such share warrants, should be provided for, and that the authority granted by letters patent in the first instance could be applied for in this special case, the Government then granting to such companies the right to use the share warrants under these well settled terms. In the meantime, I would suggest that the Bill be allowed to stand until its promoter is heard from.

NORTH FRASER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

House in Committee on Bill No. 59, respecting the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners.—Mr. Taylor.

On section 4—harbour limits defined:

Mr. OLIVER: As the area covered by the provisions of this Bill adjoins the area covered by the New Westminster Bill, perhaps this one had better be held until the two boundaries are decided upon.

Mr. TAYLOR: I do not think this Bill should be held for the reason stated. The changes made in the section simply meet the views of the Private Bills Committee, and in it there is no conflict with the Bill referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: Are the boundaries of the area affected by this Bill absolutely defined in the Bill?

Mr. TAYLOR: The boundaries were defined in the Bill, but the Private Bills Committee struck out the definition and left the matter to be defined by the Governor in Council. If the House has objection to the amendment that the Governor in Council shall define the limits, I would suggest that we go back to the Bill as printed and introduced.

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking of this North Fraser Harbour Bill.

Mr. TAYLOR: That is the Bill of which I am speaking. The Bill as originally introduced is, to my mind, quite satisfactory.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the hon. member state the reason for the division of jurisdiction between the area covered by the North Fraser Harbour Bill and that covered by the city of New Westminster Bill?

Mr. TAYLOR: The reason is that the four municipalities interested thought that their interests would be better served if they incorporated apart from New Westminister. The two committees agreed to disagree to this extent. There is no conflict between them, except that they wished separate incorporation.

On section 6—commissioners:

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to explain this section?

Mr. TAYLOR: There are four municipalities interested, and they have agreed to appoint one commissioner.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Might I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if the Government is an assenting party to this Bill?

Mr. HAZEN: This is a private Bill, and the Government is in no way a party to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does my hon. friend think of the provision of this Bill which grants to the company the control and entire charge of the foreshore within the limits defined by the Bill? Section 15 gives to the commissioners powers now vested in the Governor in Council.

Mr. HAZEN: My attention has not been particularly called to this feature of the Bill, and I think perhaps the Bill had better stand. There is no intention of conveying to anyone by this Bill the absolute control of the foreshores of the harbour.

Mr. TAYLOR: The wording of this Bill is identical with that of two Bills passed by this Parliament last session, its provisions are in every syllable the same as the provisions of the Bill passed with respect to the harbour of Hamilton and the harbour of Winnipeg and St. Boniface; the draughtsmen of this Bill followed those two measures precisely with the exception of the two local definitions. If we were correct in passing those measures last year, and I must presume we were, I would urge that this Bill be gone on with because it is of importance to us locally that some progress should be made.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the object to be attained by placing these harbours under local commissions?

Mr. HAZEN: The object of these Bills is that in some cases it is believed by city corporations that their harbours could be more successfully managed by a commission, that is, in a sense, independent of popular control, some of its members being appointed by the Government and others by the city, and so not liable to being changed every year, than it could by a Committee of the Council. It is thought that by having a board of this sort, more permanent in its character, harbour improvements can be carried out in a more systematic way and the harbour can so be better developed. There are some harbours like Montreal where the reasons are not so obvious but in that case the city divested itself of the control of the harbour and the harbour commissioners there are simply a branch of the Dominion service. This is a case where the municipality of New Westminster felt that the harbour could be more permanently and satisfactorily administered by a commission than by a committee of the council or by a Government harbourmaster who would collect the tolls. That was the object sought in Hamilton and Winnipeg. There might be a distinction between Hamilton and Winnipeg and New Westminster. In Hamilton there is practically no rise and fall of the tide and therefore very little foreshore, and the same, I think, is true of the Red river at Winnipeg, while at New Westminster there is a greater foreshore of greater value and there is more Government interest in the foreshore than in the other harbours. Some words might be added to this Bill to make it clear that it is not intended, at the present time at least, to hand over to the commission the foreshores of the harbour. It has been the practice to hand over for a merely nominal consideration the foreshores in public harbours to the municipality, to the city or public body interested, where it is to be used for public purposes, and in the event of this commission being appointed and the foreshores of this harbour being required for public purpose and it being made clear that the erection of works on these foreshores would not interfere with navigation and that the foreshore would not be required for the erection of public works for the Public Works Department, no doubt an Order in Council would pass handing over the foreshore provided the municipality was the riparian owner of the lands abutting on the foreshore. There is force in the argument of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that the matter should be considered by the officials of my department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I quite agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that there is an important difference between this case and the cases of Hamilton and Winnipeg. In the cases of Hamilton and Winnipeg I do not think this Government has any right whatever to the foreshore, whereas in tidal harbours like New Westminster it is undoubtedly the case that the foreshore is entirely owned by His Majesty by right of the federal authorities. Therefore it does seem to me that any scheme which proposes to vest in any local body the control of the harbour frontage, that is the control of the foreshore, ought to emanate from us or have the consent of the federal authorities. I think this Government ought to jealously guard the rights of the federal Government in the foreshore on harbours throughout the Dominion. I know there has been a disposition upon the part of some local authorities, more especially the government of British Columbia, to ignore the rights of the federal authorities in the foreshores of the province. I thought myself, when Minister of Public Works, that the time had arrived when a case should be stated between the Federal Government and the provincial government as to the right to the foreshores. I believe the government of British Columbia has presumed to exercise the right of building wharfs in places like Prince Rupert and other harbours along the Pacific Coast without any reference to the Public Works Department or the Marine Department of this Government. That is a right that ought to be contested under the terms of the British North America Act and now when the local authorities are asking that the entire control of the foreshore in this most important tidal harbour should be placed in a body independent of the federal Government, and its control taken out of the Governor in Council, the matter ought to be carefully considered by this Government and they should have a policy in reference to it in any measure of this kind, professing to give to any separate corporation the control of the foreshores, the right to say how they shall be administered and developed, the right to say what improvements shall be made on public property. I think that before Parliament is asked to pass a measure of this kind the matter ought to be considered by the Government and such a Bill ought to have the approval of His Royal Highness the Governor General before it comes to this Parliament for consideration.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member is, of course, aware that the question of whether the foreshores belong to the Crown in right of the Parliament of Canada or in right of the provincial legislature has been before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and judgment has been given on it. The effect of that judgment is that in the case of harbours that were public harbours before or at the time of Confederation, the foreshore is vested in the Crown by right of the Dominion Parliament but in the case of harbours that were not public harbours at the time of Confederation the foreshores are vested in the Crown in right of the provincial Government. The matter is left in an unsatisfactory condition for this reason that it is not clear from that judgment what the definition of a public harbour is, that there is room left for doubt as to whether a public harbour means a harbour or a sheet of water that was capable of being used as a harbour, the different qualities that a harbour would ordinarily possess or whether it means a place that was actually used as a harbour, as a landing place for goods, a place of refuge, &c. The judgment thus leaves the question in confusion and there are cases, principally upon the Pacific Coast, where the question is arising as to whether they are harbours over which the Parliament of this country or the legislature of British Columbia exercises control. While many cases are absolutely clear and while there is no doubt about the harbour of New Westminster being a harbour that was a harbour at the time of Confederation so that this Parliament clearly has jurisdiction, there are other cases where the question is bound to arise. One of these cases is the case of Prince Rupert because I do not know whether there is any historical information that can be relied upon with accuracy to the effect that the harbour of Prince Rupert was actually used as a public harbour before the time when British Columbia became a part of the Canadian Confederation. As regards the foreshore of Prince Rupert, a great part of the land on the foreshore is owned by the Government of British Columbia, and if the Government of British Columbia, they being the riparian proprietors, desire to use the foreshore for public purposes, for the erection of public works, or of wharfs or for public purposes of that sort, I do not think that there can be any doubt that they will be treated in the same way as it has been the practice to treat municipalities and public bodies in the past, that is by exacting a nominal rent and giving them a grant of the foreshore where it is for the purposes of harbour development or for works that are for the benefit of trade and commerce. But I think a case is bound to arise when it will be advisable to have it decided by the highest Appellate Court, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, so that a definition may be obtained as to the word 'harbour' and as to whether the words 'public harbour,' in the judgment given years ago, mean a public harbour used as such, or a place capable of being used as such.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the case of Prince Rupert I agree with my hon. friend that upon application being made by the provincial Government of British Columbia, the right to erect wharfs or other structures would be given for a nominal consideration, or for a very reasonable consideration. But when I was minister, the provincial government did not think it worth while to come to the federal authorities at all. They claimed the right, apparently, to build structures upon the foreshores without any reference whatever to the Dominion Government, thereby asserting, as I have said, the right in the provincial authorities. I think the federal Government has always taken a contrary position, and the time has certainly arrived when a case ought to be stated in order to get an effective definition of the words 'public harbour.' I would like to point out to my hon. friend that at the time of Confederation there was a clear and well-marked definition between public harbours and private harbours. That was particularly the case in the province of Ontario. A long time before Confederation, the legislature of Ontario incorporated many private companies and, vested in those companies different harbours in the province. I have in mind several. The whole authority and control, the right to build wharfs and elevators, and the right to exact harbour dues, were vested in the private corporation. Therefore when the framers of the British North America Act came to consider what harbours should be vested in the federal authorities, they had clearly in their minds private harbours and public harbours. It seems to me that the question of whether a harbour is a public harbour or not does not depend upon what vessels have frequented it, or upon whether any vessels have frequented it. The question is, have the public a right to frequent it? Is it open to the public, is it entirely free from private ownership? It seems to me that every harbour that has not been vested in private authorities is a public harbour under that definition; so, I take it, that if the harbours on the coast of British Columbia, as well as on the coast of the maritime provinces, are capable of being used as places of refuge for vessels, and there is no private ownership in their waters, they are public harbours just as much as if they were frequented at the time of Confederation or are now. But as my hon. friend says, so far as the harbours of New Westminster and the Fraser river are concerned, they were both undoubtedly used by vessels coming in from the Pacific ocean long before Confederation.

Mr. TAYLOR: Might I ask the hon. member for St. John whether, in the event of his contention being well founded that this Bill might infringe on the property of the Crown, that could not be cured by the insertion of two words in section 12, where it says:

> Nothing herein shall be deemed to give the corporation jurisdiction or control respecting private property or rights within the said limits.

If we were to add 'rights of the Crown' after the words 'private property or rights,' would that not meet the objection the hon. gentleman has taken?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it does not give control, what is the effect of the Bill? The Bill would be inoperative if you gave the commission no control whatever. In another section it does give control, and does allow this corporation to say how far out in the water a private owner shall build his wharf, how he shall build it, and what development he shall make on his property. If you do not give the harbour commissioners that power, you might as well not pass the Bill at all. What this harbour commission wants is power to regulate and control the development of the foreshore property. That is what they are asking for in section 15.

Mr. TAYLOR: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to argue that the harbour board must of necessity infringe upon the rights of the Crown?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should say undoubtedly it does; undoubtedly it is intended to do that, because it is intended to give to the Harbour Board by section 15 the right to——regulate and control the use and development of all land and property on the water front within the limits of the harbour of New Westminster, and all docks, wharfs, buildings and equipment erected or used in connection therewith, and for these purposes may pass by-laws as hereinafter provided.

Surely that language is so broad as to enable this board to say A, B and C, you shall develop the foreshore in front of your property only in a certain way; you shall only erect a certain class of buildings and a certain class of wharf, and at a certain distance; wherever you got the grant of it, you can only do that under the authority and control of this Board of Harbour Commissioners. That is the object of this statute. If they cannot get that authority, I suppose they would not ask for this Bill, and if they get it, it would seem as if they would divest the Government and the Government lessees of the right of control in the foreshore.

Mr. HAZEN: We can easily amend that section.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR: There is no difficulty that cannot be met by a very simple amendment. I should like to point out that there is no desire on the part of anyone in the province to interfere with the prerogatives of the federal Government, least of all on the part of the promoters of this Bill. This Bill was framed on the suggestion of a representative of the Government made to me last session that the proper way to deal with our harbours in connection with the works we were asking for was to secure the incorporation of a board of harbour commissioners, and the two Bills of last year were offered to us as our model. We took these on the authority of the Government, and have followed them. I think that if we provide in section 12 against the infringement of the Crown rights, that would absolutely meet the objection of my hon. friend. I would like to add that the necessity for this legislation is that every year embarrasses the situation more and more as to the creation of effective public harbours in British Columbia. Until very recently, we could acquire the property necessary for harbours with very little embarrassment to private interests, but with the extraordinary development there, property is being taken up more and more rapidly, and the cost of acquirement for harbour purposes has become greater every year. Therefore it is a matter of the very greatest importance that such boards should be constituted so as to give notice to all concerned, when the time is ripe to apply for certain properties for harbour purposes, and thus be able to get the property at its value at the time notice is given of the intention to use it for a harbour. It is desired to be in a position to give that notice and not be held up later on by exorbitant prices which would prevent the carrying out of our harbour schemes. If this House, because of fancied legal difficulties which have not hitherto presented themselves, defer our chance of giving this notice for another year it will inflict a great hardship on the communities I represent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no desire, on my part, to cause delay for another year, but my hon. friend must not be too impatient if he finds, when he introduces a Bill as a private measure which interferes with a public harbour in which the Crown has foreshore rights, if somebody wants a little more consideration given to the Bill with a view to safeguarding public rights. If any member is not satisfied that public rights are safeguarded and he does not suggest that idea to the committee I think he is not properly discharging his duty. In view of what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries suggested that the Bill might require a little consideration at the hands of the officers of the department with the view of making some necessary amendments, I think my hon. friend would be discharging his duty in consenting to the committee rising in order that we might further consider this Bill with the New Westminster Harbour Bill, because I take it they are both drawn in the same way and that if one is amended the other would have to be amended also.

Mr. TAYLOR: I understand the difficulty is that this is a private instead of a public Bill. Would it be a remedy if this were introduced as a public Bill?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman is getting unduly alarmed. There is no disposition to throw the Bill out because it is not introduced by the Government. All I ask is that some words should be inserted in the Bill with a view to safeguarding the public interest and to give to this harbour board the regulation and control of private property only when we have safeguarded the rights, either of the Crown, in so far as its property is concerned, or of private individuals, in so far as their property is concerned. The Bill, by section 15, proposes to give to this board the absolute right to control the mode of improvement of all property fronting upon that harbour whether owned by the Crown or private individuals.

Mr. TAYLOR: The hon. gentleman must recognize that that is governed by section 12 and sections 12 and 15 must be read together. Section 12 specifically excepts the rights of private individuals.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How would my hon. friend propose to amend section 15?

Mr. HAZEN: We would have to amend section 15 in the way suggested by my hon. friend from New Westminster, by inserting the words 'subject to the provisions contained in section 12.'

Mr PUGSLEY: That would do.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Section 6 in my opinion is slightly defective. This corporation, as I understand it, is to be managed by commissioners. Two of these commissioners are to be appointed by the Governor in Council and the third appointed by the four municipalities of Richmond, South Vancouver, Burnaby and Point Grey. I understand that each of these municipalities appoints one man and that the four men appointed by these municipalities are to meet and elect the third commissioner. Provided that two of these municipal representatives voted for a certain individual to fill the place of the third commissioner and the other two voted against, no appointment would be made. I think there should be some provision under which there would be a casting vote given either by the Governor in Council, or some other body, so that we would be sure to have all the municipalities represented on the board.

Mr. TAYLOR: I may say that the municipalities themselves very thoroughly considered that point and they are content to have the section as it appears in the Bill. They did not overlook it and this arrangement is perfectly satisfactory to them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If litigation arose and a court were called upon to consider this legislation it would be no answer to say that the parties themselves were satisfied. The judges interpreting the statute would ask what wisdom or judgment had Parliament to bring to bear upon the subject. As my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) points out, the clause may be unworkable if we do not make any provision, such as Parliament ought to make, for the case of a casting vote. Suppose any question did arise, what would the courts say as to the wisdom of this Parliament in passing legislation of that character? The court would not know that my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) had assured Parliament that he and those for whom he is acting were perfectly satisfied with this provision. The court would say: what was Parliament thinking of when it enacted legislation of this character which might result in the whole proceedings of the corporation being blocked in case there should be an equal difference of opinion between the four men appointed by these municipalities. Surely my hon. friend ought to consider that and make an amendment which would make the Bill as perfect as possible.

Mr. TAYLOR: The hon. gentleman does not seem to realize that a member of Parliament introducing a Bill at the request of a municipality is simply the servant of that municipality, and that they, having fully considered the matter and having instructed him that this was what they wanted, he cannot very well come to the House and say that this is not what they want, but that they should have something else. If they failed to elect a third member to their board, they would be the sufferers, but I cannot conceive of their failing to make such an election.

Mr. HAZEN: It would be a very simple matter if they failed to make an appointment to refer the matter to the Chief Justice of the province or someone else in whom they had confidence, but the trouble is that, if two municipalities vote one way and two the other, the whole thing is blocked and nothing can be done. While there might be an understanding at the present time, yet this Bill will be operative for a great many years and perhaps long after those who are promoting it will have passed away, and therefore it would be a mistake, I think, not to have some provision under which a deadlock of that sort could be relieved.

Mr. TAYLOR: I would suggest that in case of a deadlock the third should be appointed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no objection to that.

Mr. TAYLOR: You might very well arrange that under section 8, which provides for the case of a vacancy occurring, should the municipalities fail to appoint, the Governor in Council can make the appointment. It might also be provided that in case of the municipalities disagreeing the Governor in Council might make the appointment.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps we had better let this stand.

Section 6 stands.

On section 8—filling of vacancies:

Mr. PUGSLEY: As this section is to be amended we had better let it stand so that it may be considered in connection with section 6.

Section stands.

On section 19—borrowing powers:

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems doubtful whether the corporation should be given unlimited power to borrow; is it not usual to provide that the borrowing should be done only with the approval of the Governor in Council ?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Let the clause stand.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 45, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company.—Mr. White (Renfrew).

On section 2—issue of bonds:

Mr. OLIVER : What is the purpose of this Bill ?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew): The amendment is to increase the bonding power from $100,000,000 to $175,000,000.

Mr. OLIVER : I thought it was the understanding of Parliament that this Georgian Bay Canal Company should not be enlarged in its rights while it was being continued in existence. The idea was that it was not considered advisable by Parliament to wipe the company out of existence, but that Parliament should not further strengthen its position, because if at some future time the country would decide to build the Georgian Bay canal, a private company holding rights on that territory and in connection with that enterprise would be an impediment to the expected and hoped-for action of the Government. To put it shortly, and I hope not offensively, I understood the view of Parliament to be that this company might get into a position, if it was not already in that position, of a hold-up on the Government, and that it was not therefore advisable to strengthen it further, but merely to continue whatever rights it had. I would hope that the Government, being charged with the responsibility on behalf of the country in regard to this canal, should see that this Bill does not further strengthen the position of the company against the country, which must some time come to a decision on the issue if the canal is ever to be constructed.

Mr. DEVLIN: Perhaps I may be allowed to say to the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) that by this Bill the Georgian Bay Canal Company do not seek any increased power. They simply seek for an increased bond issue from $100,000,000 to $175,000,000. Owing to the increased cost of construction generally, they wish to be in a position to undertake the work, should the Government decide that the canal is to be built by a private company instead of by the Government itself.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it intended to put these bonds on the market?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not for a while, I should think.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. DEVLIN: I understand that the company which would undertake to build the canal is in a position to put up all the capital necessary.

Mr. OLIVER: I would very respectfully ask an expression of opinion from the Government in regard to this very important matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: Section 43 of the original Act is re-enacted here of course and I should think it amply protects the Government in regard to taking the work over, inasmuch as should the Government at any time decide to do so they have only to pay the actual expenses.

Mr. OLIVER: Does not this proposed increase of the bonding powers strengthen the position of the company as against the Government, should at any time the Government undertake to construct the canal?

Mr. DEVLIN: No.

Mr. OLIVER: I should like to have an expression of opinion from the Prime Minister.

Mr. BORDEN: In view of the provision of the original Act which has been cited by the Minister of Railways, I should think not. If my hon. friend has any suggestion, I would be very glad to consider it, and have the Bill held over for that purpose, if necessary. At the moment I do not see how it would strengthen the position of the company, if they are entitled only to consideration in respect to actual expenditure. It certainly could not improve the position of the company, unless it were acted upon in some way, it would come down to the question of actual expenditure, so far as I understand the matter.

Mr. OLIVER: It is rather an important question, and has been brought up for consideration from the point of view which I have already expressed.

Mr. BORDEN: There is no reason why it should not be discussed.

Mr. OLIVER: After authority has been given to increase the amount of bonds that this company may issue, if the company acts on that authority, it will certainly be more difficult for the country to take over the enterprise. Supposing this company issues $175,000,000 of bonds, then $175,000,000 of private interests have to be settled for before the country can take over the enterprise. As it stands at present, the total amount of bonds would be one hundred million dollars. Supposing the company had acted to the limit of authority that has been given it, the country would have to overcome only one hundred million dollars. It strikes me that there is a very radical difference between the present and the proposed issue, assuming that the time will come when it will be desirable for the country to take over the enterprise as a national work.

Mr. LANCASTER: I think there is a little misapprehension on the part of my hon. friend from Edmonton as to the effect of the enactment. If the hon. gentleman will look at clause 5 of the Bill as originally printed, he will see that we have not made any amendment to it in the Railway Committee. Clause 5 of the Bill is:

Nothing in this Act shall affect or impair the rights of the Government of Canada under or by virtue of the provisions of the section substituted by section 5 of chapter 128 of the statutes of 1906 for section 43 of chapter 103 of the statutes of 1894.

That section is continued in force here without any change as follows:

His Majesty, his heirs and successors may at any time assume the possession of, and the property in, the said canals and works, and of and in all the rights, privileges and advantages of the company on giving to the company one week's notice of intention to do so; and thereupon all property in the said canals, works, rights, privileges and advantages shall become, and thenceforward shall be vested in His Majesty, his heirs and successors; and by way of compensation His Majesty shall pay to the company the value of the work actually done up to the time of the giving of such notice in surveying, and in the making of plans, and otherwise upon the ground, together with the value of all tangible property of the company of which possession may be so taken, such values to be fixed by three valuators, or the majority of them, one valuator to be chosen by His Majesty, another by the company, and the third by the two so chosen.

The hon. gentlemen will, on reflection, see that there is the same amount of damages whether the bonding powers be one million dollars or twenty million dollars. The Government is not responsible for a cent more under this than it would have been if the bonding powers had remained at $35,000,000, as they were in the first charter. In the Railway Committee we spent two days upon the question to make sure that that was the effect of the section, and the committee were sure that we were amply protected in the matter which the hon. gentleman has brought up.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to be thought as opposing the Bill, but I must say that the statement of my hon. friend does not seem to me to meet the point that I raise. If the company is authorized to issue bonds, then this Parliament cannot ignore in equity, and I do not think would be allowed to ignore in law——

Mr. LANCASTER: We have a positive enactment, a positive condition.

Mr. OLIVER: Even if the positive condition is there, I do not think that Parliament should, as a matter of right, ignore the fact that the authority which it had given had been acted upon, and that third parties, that is parties other than the Government or the company, bondholders drawn from the public, had been brought into the arrangement. If bonds are issued under the express authority of this Parliament, I submit that this Parliament at any future time could not ignore the liability.

Mr. COCHRANE: You would not buy a bond with that condition in the Act?

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry to say that I would not be buying any bonds at all.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am only putting it in that way.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think that is a proper way to put it. This Parliament should not authorize an act that may be carried forward and become, as a matter of right, a liability which this Parliament, at some future time, under circumstances that we expect will take place, would have to assume. The supposition that nobody would buy the bonds that we are authorizing in this case is not sound. We do not know what representations would be made to induce people to buy these bonds, or at what price they might be sold. Bonds are sometimes sold very much below par. It is conceivable—I do not say it is going to be the case—that this company may issue bonds which this Parliament has authorized it to issue, and these bonds having been issued, if this Parliament or the Government of Canada should desire at any future time to enter upon the construction of that canal, they would have to settle for those bonds as a part of the claims of the company. I would be perfectly satisfied if the Government would say here and now either that there is a responsibility which is covered by the addition of this bonding privilege, or that there is not such a responsibility. If the Government will say on its responsibility as a government that the assent of the House to this amendment does not as a matter of fact affect the situation, I am satisfied; but I want that statement on the responsibility of the Government.

Mr. BORDEN: I have given the hon. gentleman my view already. Supposing a hundred million dollars of bonds were issued, my hon. friend apprehends that notwithstanding the provisions in the original Act, there might be some claim on the part of those bondholders.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. BORDEN: It certainly would not be a legal claim; he is alluding to some moral claim that might be put forward and presented in this House on the ground that some injustice had been done to them.

Mr. OLIVER : Yes.

Mr. BORDEN : His view is that when you increase the limit of the bonding powers, you increase the danger from a source of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER : Precisely.

Mr. BORDEN : We will pass the clauses and let the Bill stand to Committee for consideration.

Section 3—time for construction of canals extended:

Mr. LANCASTER: The first amendment is to substitute the word 'put' for the word 'have' in line 19. The word 'all' for proper grammatical effect, is struck out of line 23, and after '1894' the words 'and amendments thereto ' are added, so that the company will have the powers originally granted, as well as those conferred by subsequent amendments. The word 'or' in line 26 is taken out, and the word 'and' substituted, making the phrase 'put in operation ' additional and not alterative.

On section 4:

Mr. LANCASTER: By an amendment to this section, we re-enact a provision introduced last year regarding provincial rights as follows:

Nothing in this Act or in any other Act governing or affecting the company shall be construed to authorize or empower the company to enter or take, or use the public lands of the province of Ontario or Quebec without the consent of the Lieutenant-Governors in Council of the respective provinces, except to the extent necessary for the purpose of constructing the canal and necessary works incidental thereto, and for the purpose of developing power necessary for the operation of the canal.

HURON AND ERIE LOAN AND SAVINGS COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 57, respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—Mr. Beattie.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the promoter please state briefly the purpose of this Bill?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman who promoted the Bill is absent, but I may say that the Huron and Erie is a well-known loan company, with head offices in London. In 1905 the company obtained an amendment to its corporate powers under which it was authorized to incur liabilities by way of this issue of debentures and receipts of deposits to an amount equal to four and three-quarter times the amount of its paid-up capital. The company's reserve has now increased, and it is proposed to substitute the word 'five' for 'four and three-fourths.' The matter was fully discussed in committee and the recommendation was made without a dissenting voice. The company has pursued a good policy with regard to its shareholders, and has set aside a very large reserve, equal, I think, to its paid-up capital. The company explained that before coming to Parliament they had consulted their agents in Great Britain, who were entirely willing that this additional power should be sought—a power which gives them the right to issue about $600,000 worth of additional debentures, that amount being available for loans throughout Canada and particularly in the West.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister is himself satisfied that the additional power is covered by increased assets?

Mr. WHITE: Entirely so. There seems to be no objection whatever to the added power being given.

Bill reported.

NORTHWEST GUARANTEE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 46, respecting the Northwest Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company.—Mr. McKay.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the committee has not been made aware of the purpose of the Bill, and a short explanation would be in order.

Mr. McKAY: This Bill follows the model Bill provided by the Insurance Act of 1910, and clause 7 sets out the objects for which the enactment is sought. If the hon. gentleman requires an explanation in regard to any particular matter connected with the Bill, I shall be glad to furnish him with any information he may desire.

Mr. OLIVER: I merely wish to have on record a responsible statement as to the scope and purpose of the Bill. I have no objections to urge as against it.

Bill reported.

CANADA WESTERN TRUST AND MORTGAGE COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 29, to incorporate the Canada Western Trust and Mortgage Company—Mr. Meighen.

On section 1—incorporation:

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): This is an incorporation in the usual form. Changes have been made in the name and in some minor provisions throughout the Bill. It follows the form of previous mortgage company incorporations. The purpose of the company is to make loans upon real estate and other securities throughout Canada. Powers are given to issue debentures and accept deposits in the usual way.

Mr. OLIVER: The tendency is always to enlarge on the model Bill, and if there are any departures from the model Bill it would be acceptable if the minister would call attention to them.

Mr. WHITE: There are no variations in what we call the model Bill. All these Bills are very carefully considered in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and the committee is very jealous of any enlargement of the powers granted under the model Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems to be largely capitalized.

Mr. WHITE: $400,000 subscribed and $100,000 paid up. There is no precedent as to the total amount of capital that may be authorized in the case of such companies.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems to me the amount to be paid up is small compared with the capital.

Mr. WHITE: The Bill follows the usual form and precedent with regard to the amount required to be paid up. As to the amount of authorized capital, that may be as much as they desire, but of course the capital must be furnished.

On section 7—limit of time for securing certificate:

Mr. OLIVER: Is it usual to provide that the time may be extended by Order in Council?

Mr. WHITE: I think it is the same provision as is in what we regard as the model Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it is not a proper provision.

Mr. WHITE: A condition might arise under which it would be inequitable not to extend the time, and it is safeguarded by being under the control of the Governor in Council.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to hold back the Bill. If this is in accordance with the model Bill, I am satisfied to let it go through without discussion.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend will allow this particular clause to stand, I shall look at the model Bill. Of course, I am not in charge of the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the promoter could answer that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not certain whether it is in accord with the model Bill, or whether it is a provision from the Companies Act. I do know, however, that this Bill was submitted to the Finance Department, that Mr. Fitzgerald made very considerable alterations and offered many suggestions, most of which were accepted by the promoters; and that as to clause 7 there was none; so I presume, that there is nothing extraordinary in that clause. My own idea is that it is provided for in the Companies Act, but, of course, unless it is in part II of the Companies Act, it does not become incorporated in this Bill, except by special enactment. I think the provision is from the Companies Act.

Mr. OLIVER: It does not strike me as a proper provision that there should be an extension at the will of the Governor in Council. We are giving Parliamentary authorization for the establishment of a company on certain terms and conditions. and I think it is fair, if those terms and conditions are not fulfilled, that Parliament itself should be the only authority to give an extension of time. I do not wish to argue the point at any length, but that seems to me a fair proposition, and I wish to go on record as holding that view.

Section 7 stands.

On section 9—powers of agency association:

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to ask an explanation of the words 'agency association' in the side note.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Clause 9, in so far as it enables the company to act as an agency, has only this effect. The company are empowered to establish the relationship of principal and agent between the party who advances the money and themselves. Were clause 9 not there, instead of the relationship of principal and agent, they would simply be in the position of two contracting parties, the debenture holder and the company. This clause enables the company to establish another relationship, not that of trustee, but of principal and agent.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that the usual authority given to such companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it has been given many times.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—borrowing powers, deposits, limitation liability to the public:

Mr. OLIVER: I want to be clear about this limitation liability to the public.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was threshed out very fully in Committee. The effect of it now is this. The total possible liability of the company to the public, inclusive of its liability for moneys deposited and moneys borrowed, must not at any time exceed four times the amount of the paid-up capital stock.

Mr. OLIVER: Does it mean that the public are not able to recover against the company over that amount?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. If the company exceed their powers, and incur a liability in excess of their powers, they would not be able to relieve themselves of that liability on the plea of ultra vires.

Mr. OLIVER: As it reads to me, as an ordinary citizen, it would be possible to put that construction upon it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. The company could be restrained by injunction from using debentures beyond the amount restricted in the Bill, but if the company were not restrained, the parties loaning the money would have recourse against the company.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—decrease of capital:

Mr. OLIVER: Is it usual to give a company the power to decrease its capital stock without referring to any other authority?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that authority is usual enough. I think the way it is usually worded is that the company may decrease it by any amount not less than $100,000. That was the way it was worded here, and the Committee raised the amount from $100,000 to $500,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Without any reference to the Minister of Finance or to the Governor in Council or to any other higher authority?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—issue of debenture stock:

Mr. OLIVER: Would the promoter be good enough to give the committee a statement as to the meaning of the term 'debenture stock' as contained in this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Palmer, an authority on company law, defines the difference between debentures and debenture stock as being the same as the difference between a mortgage and a mortgage deed. I do not know that the definition makes it much clearer to my hon. friend's mind.

Mr. OLIVER: You are absolutely right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the definition which is given by the leading authority on company law. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has another way of putting it. It is simply a matter, in so far as I understand it, of putting the debenture indebtedness of a company into another form. The Minister of Finance gave an explanation at the meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee and I think it would be well if he would give the same here. It did not quite agree with my understanding, but it may make it clearer to my hon. friend.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Debenture stock is a very well known term. Probably the hon. gentleman is familiar with what are known as debentures that pass from hand to hand. A debenture is the obligation of a company to pay a certain amount at a certain time with interest at a stipulated rate. It is usually under seal and it is simply an evidence of the obligation of the company to repay sums for which it has received consideration at a stipulated date and at a stipulated rate of interest.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that transferable without record?

Mr. WHITE: That is transferable from hand to hand. Railway and traction companies and other companies that issue debentures or bonds sometimes use the words 'interchangeably' with regard to that type of security. It is an obligation to pay $100, $500, or $1,000 at a certain date and at a certain time. These securities pass from hand to hand and are negotiable. Debenture stock is what they call inscribed stock and it is similar in character to the inscribed stock of the Dominion. Debenture stock was invented to meet this condition, that if you have a debenture payable to bearer and if you lose it, you are apprehensive about it because some one else may find it and pass it on to a third party without notice of the fact that he is not the owner. In England they do not like debentures that pass from hand to hand. They like what they call inscribed or debenture stock. Debenture stock is precisely the same as a debenture in so far as the obligation is concerned except that, instead of it passing from hand to hand as a negotiable security, the name of the holder of the stock is inscribed in a book kept by the company for that purpose. For example, if A is the owner of a thousand dollars of debenture stock and A wants to transfer it to B, instead of handing over to B a debenture payable to bearer, he sends his attorney into the office of the company and makes the transfer in the books of the company just the same as you would register a transfer of stock. In other words, debenture stock is safer from the standpoint of the holder and of the company itself. The provision in this Act for the issue of debenture stock is quite a usual one in connection with loan companies.

Mr. OLIVER: Does this debenture stock carry the right to vote?

Mr. WHITE: The word 'stock' is confusing. It is not at all analogous to the stock held by the stockholders in a company. Ie represents an indebtedness on the part of the company just the same as a debenture would be. It is transferred in the way that I have described, the idea being to prevent loss. It is a usual provision, I can assure my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: What I wanted to be clear upon was whether it carried any voting authority?

Mr. WHITE: No.

On section 18—cancellation of debenture stock:

Mr. OLIVER: Is it usual to allow a company to buy up its debentures?

Mr. WHITE: A company buying up its debentures, with, of course the consent of the parties who hold them, is reducing its indebtedness. The Dominion has in all its loans a sinking fund provision under which it buys in its own obligations and in that way reduces the debt. It is a very proper clause.

Mr. OLIVER: I was under the impression that it was not allowable, the idea being that a company, if it were not honest, might wilfully depress the value of its debentures in order that it might buy them up at less than their face value.

On section 22—power to acquire business of other companies:

Mr. OLIVER: That power is very wide. Is it usual?

Mr. WHITE: It is a usual power. Companies are permitted to acquire the undertakings of other companies carrying on a similar business, provided they comply with the requirements of the statute. The requirements usually are that the agreement for sale and purchase must be approved by the shareholders of both companies at a meeting called for the purpose; that a certain percentage of the shareholders shall vote in favour; and that the agreement to become effective must be approved by the Treasury Board. I should imagine that is a provision to safeguard the rights of the minority.

Mr. OLIVER: It would appear to me that the business of a mortgage company is somewhat the same as the business of a bank, and I would ask the Finance Minister if he thinks it advisable that he should be empowered to verify the information which the Act provides these mortgage companies shall furnish to him annually. The Bill provides that in the public interest the company shall make certain statements to the Finance Minister as to its business, but I do not see any penalty for failure to furnish these statements or any provision by which the minister can verify them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subsection 2 of section 26 provides a penalty for default under section 26, and the general Companies Act which is applicable to this company also provides a penalty.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no provision for verification of these returns by the minister?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): That raises a very large question. These loan companies make returns showing the amount of their indebtedness towards the public, the amount of their securities, their assets, their liabilities, and the average rate of interest; it provides also that classes of securities shall be distinguished. But so far as to make it incumbent on the minister to go into the business of any one of these companies to verify the statement, it would be a large order for the Minister of Finance to inquire into the character and value of the different securities. The general Companies Act imposes penalties for false returns.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) suggest to empower the minister to investigate and verify?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not making any suggestions, but I would point out that if it is in the public interest that the minister should be informed as to the details of the business of the company, it goes without saying that he ought to be able to satisfy himself that the information given to him is accurate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do you mean by external inspection or audit?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not suggesting anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Companies Act requires the officers of the company to make their statements under oath.

On section 7—extension of time:

Mr. WHITE: This clause was allowed to stand, and I find that its words are precisely the same as the words in a similar section of the British Western Loan Company's Act, which is considered to be a model Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not intend to oppose the provision in the section, but I wish to go on record as giving my opinion that it is not a proper provision.

Bill reported.

WESTERN CANADA MORTGAGE CORPORATION.

House in Committee on Bill No. 62, to incorporate the Western Canada Mortgage Corporation.—Mr. Stevens.

On section 32—preference stock:

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to section 32, this Bill does not follow in detail the Bill that we have just passed. I think there is no provision for preference stock in the other Bill. If there is, I overlooked it. As the section is worded, it seems to me that it gives a very wide authority to the directors of the company. I should like to have a fairly close understanding of the matter.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend will look at sub-section 3 of section 32, he will observe that:

No such by-law——

That is to say, for creating and issuing any part of the capital stock as preference stock—

—shall have any force or effect until it has been sanctioned, either by the shareholders in writing or by a vote of the shareholders present or represented by proxy at a general meeting of the company duly called for considering it, such shareholders holding not less than two-thirds of the amount paid up upon the capital stock of the company.

As I understand it, that means that if the shareholders desire to create a preference as between themselves, their doing so would not in any way affect the rights of the public. Therefore I see no objection to the section. It is generally recognized, I think, that preference shares in companies may be created, if safeguards are provided such as the one set forth here, that is, it must be by a vote of two-thirds of the shareholders.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not asking the question as between the shareholders and the public, but as between the different shareholders of the company. On a casual reading of the section, it seems to me that there is an opportunity for an aggressive group of shareholders to promote certain interests which they desire to promote at the expense of the other shareholders. If such a section as this is to be embodied in the Bill, I think the interests of all the shareholders should be amply protected.

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not think there is any likelihood of the shareholders suffering in a case of that kind. Usually when common shares are issued and paid up, the company wanting to get more money for loan purposes, issues preference stock. This is a preference in so far as common stock is concerned, but it has the effect of making the common stock of more value than if the preference stock had not been issued, because under the preference stock they are able to secure money at good rates of interest. It does not, therefore, depreciate—it rather appreciates—the value of common stock, and if two-thirds of the holders of common stock are agreeable, I think the matter will be satisfactorily dealt with.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not provided that two-thirds of the stock must support this preference, but that two-thirds of the stock shall be represented, and the majority of that representation shall make the decision.

On section 45—term for which land may be held:

Mr. OLIVER: What is the effect of that provision?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): In every general election act relating to companies, there is usually a clause providing certain limitations and conditions under which the company may hold lands. This special provision applies to land which the company may acquire, to the conditions upon which it may be held or forfeited, and in some cases, to the extension of time which may be given by the Crown.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the actual effect of this clause in operation?

Mr. WHITE: The company disposes of its lands within the time limit provided in its Act of incorporation; otherwise a forfeiture may take place, unless it is relieved by the Crown.

Mr. BORDEN: I think this a provision usually made in such cases to prevent the possibility of the land being tied up in corporate ownership. The company may have to buy land on which it holds a lien, and this section provides that it must get rid of it within ten years.

Mr. OLIVER: The ordinary individual would assume that if the company had bought and paid for certain lands, it was entitled to hold them under the same conditions as a private individual; but this and other Acts say it shall not. In practice, will this work any hardship on the company, or will the company simply get around the provision?

Mr. WHITE: The basis of all this legislation is really the old mortmain doctrine, which, acting under the principle that the corporation was effected in perpetuity, considered it against the public interest that the company should hold lands forever. In actual practice, I believe the companies observe this clause, otherwise there would be a forfeiture.

Mr. OLIVER: In the city of Edmonton the National Trust Company and the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation have both built very fine buildings. If these companies are subject to such a provision as this, it may be a very great hardship.

Mr. WHITE: I would call the attention of my hon. friend to that section of the clause which makes an exception of land in actual occupation by the company.

Mr. OLIVER: In the two cases I have mentioned, while these companies occupy a portion of the buildings they have erected, they do not by any means occupy the whole of them, or perhaps even one-half of them. It seems to me there is a question as the whether or not they are occupying this property for themselves.

After Recess.

CANADA PERMANENT MORTGAGE CORPORATION.

House in Committee on Bill No. 66, respecting the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation.—Sir Edmund Osler.

On section 1—charter amended:

Mr. OLIVER: This is a somewhat difficult Bill to follow. It is an amendment of another statute, and an explanation would be of assistance to the members.

Mr. BARKER: This Bill was introduced by Sir Edmund Osler, but I have a general knowledge of the facts about it. The Canada Permanent, as all people in Ontario know, is one of the oldest and strongest of the loan societies of Ontario. They have asked a few amendments to the ordinary provisions of their charter, for example, as to the election of directors. They simply want a provision that at a general meeting the stockholders present may, upon reasonable notice, provide for a change in the directors—not more than twenty nor less than ten. There are one or two small amendments in regard to debentures, none of which are important, and a provision enabling the company to purchase fractional shares that may be left provided it sells them again within a short period.

Mr. OLIVER: As long as the provisions are in accordance with precedent, as the hon. gentleman has assured the House, I think that is entirely satisfactory. The company is, of course, very well known and of very high standing.

On section 2—debentures, bonds, &c.:

Mr. PERLEY: The Canada Permanent is organizing the Canada Permanent Trust Company, the next Bill on the Order Paper, and they intend to take nearly the whole of the stock of that company. It is for the purpose of having a trust company closely allied to the Canada Permanent, and this provides that they may take a larger amount of stock in the Canada Permanent Trust Company than they are allowed to take in any other trust company because it is really their own company.

On section 3—consolidation and division of shares:

Mr. OLIVER: I notice that in the Bank Act in such a case special provision was made for protecting the rights of holders of fractional shares. I do not see a corresponding provision here.

Mr. BARKER: This was suggested in the Committee, and the section has been put in to avoid any difficulty of that nature. At the same time it is quite clear that a company such as the Canada Permanent is an absolutely secure basis for any person who may have a fractional share; they cannot remove that fraction without buying it in, it will remain there until it is bought in and they take authority here to buy it in.

On section 5—sections of the Companies Act which shall not apply:

Mr. OLIVER: These sections which shall not apply to this company are of the same nature as in the case of other companies; that is to say, there is no repeal in this section of an important section of the charter?

Mr. WHITE: No; my hon. friend is correct.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA PERMANENT TRUST COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 67, to incorporate the Canada Permanent Public Trustee Company (as amended, and recommending that the title be changed to the Canada Permanent Trust Company)—Sir Edmund Osler.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like an explanation of this Bill.

Mr. BARKER: The only important change is as to the designation of the company. It was proposed to call it the Canada Permanent Public Trustee Company, but in the committee the use of the word 'public' with regard to what was a semi-private company was objected to, and the company agreed to strike it out. It was the wish of the late Minister of Finance that there should be no appearance of giving a public or Dominion character to any chartered corporation, and it was thought that the use of the word 'public' would be infringing upon that principle. I remember that Mr. Fielding was very strenuous upon that point, and I always supported him. Certain banks got titles that to-day would not be given to any institution of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend's explanation hardly bears on the question I asked. I want to know the reasons for granting this charter to a subsidiary company, as I understand it, to be under the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): There is not only precedent for it, but I think it would be of very great advantage, not only to the company, but also to the public. The Huron and Erie Loan Company has a subsidiary company. I think its name is the Canada Trust Company, and this Canada Permanent Mortgage Company is authorized to hold the shares of incorporated companies. There is a great deal of business that goes to a loan company that can be advantageously handled with the assistance of a subsidiary trust company. Apart from that, the Canada Permanent Mortgage Company, under its original incorporation, was clothed with the powers of a trust company, and can, I believe to-day, certainly could, act as trustee; and now they propose, to the extent of $200,000 I think of their capital, to invest in the shares of this Canada Permanent Trust Company and to carry on the business of trustee, executor and agent. I may say that they have also taken up the question, as did the Huron and Erie Company, with their agents abroad, so that no question is involved so far as the debenture holders or shareholders are concerned. The amount of the Canada Permanent Mortgage Company's reserve is I think $6,000,000, so that it is only a very small percentage indeed of their reserve that is invested in the shares of this particular company. Such companies are not prohibited by law, speaking generally, from investing in the shares of other incorporated companies. The principal loan companies own shares in companies of this kind. As I have said, there is not only precedent for it, but the trust company will, I have no doubt, render good public service, and, in connection with the Canada Permanent, will assist very materially in the loaning business and in other business which it can undertake throughout Canada. With regard to the name, the words 'public trustee' are objectionable because in England there is a functionary known as a public trustee who is a government trustee.

Mr. BARKER

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend knows there is a growing feeling in the minds of the public that there is more of this interlocking directorates of financial institutions than is really good for the public. My reason for asking specifically for an explanation in this case was to find out what extension of power or authority the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation might expect to get through the organization of this subsidiary company, and how much added burden of responsibility is placed upon its present reserve. I take it for granted from my hon. friend's explanation that the purpose of this company is to give the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation power to handle a class of business that it is not now authorized to handle, and that it is to handle this business on a part of its present capital. Am I correct in that understanding of the case?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend uses the words 'on a part of its present capital.' As I pointed out, the amount which could be distributed among the shareholders of the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation, if they were so disposed at any time, is $250,000 which is very insignificant compared with the reserve, so that there is no impairment of capital. A very small percentage of the reserve is invested in this. Of course, it is to be presumed that the trust company will carry on its business properly, and if they do so, it should be an advantage, and not in any way a detriment. It will enable the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation to throw a great deal of business in the way of the trust company and vice versa, and if the two businesses are conducted properly, as they always have been in the case of the Canada Permanent Company, you will have a loan company and a trust company carrying on their business to the decided advantage, I hope, of the public and of the shareholders and debenture holders.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not questioning the substantial character of the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation, or suggesting that the organization of this company under the terms set out in the Bill is going to have any detrimental effect upon the Canada Permanent. I wish merely to get clearly before the Committee just what the relationships are. I take it that the description I gave is practically correct. I imagine that if there is any company in Canada that might very well claim the right or privilege to organize a subsidiary company such as this, it would be the Canada Permanent. I do not want to be understood as suggesting anything to the contrary, but as I have said, public opinion is somewhat acutely interested in the organization of financial institutions at the present time, and it is desirable that we should know exactly what the effect of any legislation we pass is likely to be. May I put the case in this way for the purpose merely of eliciting information? Is the position between the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation and this proposed trust company in any way analogous to the position of a chartered bank which was, in some manner, empowered to run a private bank in connection with its business, so that while the bank itself was under the control of the Bank Act, it could derive additional and extraordinary profits by means of business transacted through this subsidiary, outside, or private organization? Is the purpose of the organization of a trust company in connection with a well established, conservatively and honourably conducted mortgage corporation, to enable that corporation, by means of this subsidiary organization, to enter upon transactions which it would not be enabled to enter upon in its capacity as a mortgage corporation, which transactions might be expected to yield a larger measure of profit than would be derived from transactions such as it is entitled to enter upon under its present charter? If this is not the purpose of this proposed subsidiary organization, I am somewhat at a loss to understand what its purpose is. If it is to widen the scope of the original company without increasing its responsibility beyond a certain, limited, fixed amount, we would like to know it.

Mr. WHITE: The Canada Permanent Savings and Loan Company, with respect to investment in shares of incorporated companies, such as this trust company, is very much more limited even under this legislation which we are now adopting than other loan companies which we have incorporated.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not want to be understood as opposing this Bill or challenging this trust company at all. I only want to understand it.

Mr. WHITE: Well, if I take it this way, I think my hon. friend will see that not only is this proper in so far as the Canada Permanent is concerned, but that it is more restricted than the average loan company which has been incorporated by this Parliament within the last few years. I call my hon. friend's attention to the Bill which we had under review before six o'clock. That company, as in the case of other loan companies carrying on the same business as the Canada Permanent, is authorized to purchase or invest in the debentures, bonds, stocks and other securities of any government, or municipality, or school corporation, or of any chartered bank or incorporated company being incorporated in Canada. What does that mean? It means that any loan company, such as those we have been incorporating in recent years in this Parliament, may invest its funds in the fully paid-up shares of any trust company, because the trust company is an incorporated company incorporated in Canada. In the case of the Canada Permanent there was a limitation in their original Act which did not permit them to go quite to the length of investing $250,000 in the shares of the trust company. They point out that in the first place they had partly the powers of a trust company in their original charter, that their reserve is several millions which they could distribute, if they desired, among their shareholders, and that this $250,000 is a very small percentage of the reserve. As all other loan companies are incorporated and are permitted to purchase the shares of incorporated companies, including trust companies, they ask that, to the extent of $250,000, they would be permitted to invest their surplus funds in the shares of this trust company. I have no doubt whatever that the application is not only made bona fide but that the business of the trust company will be carried on as the business of any other trust company is carried on and that the directors, as they will be such men as are connected with the Canada Permanent Company, will see that the business is conducted properly. The result is that while, in a sense, their powers are enlarged, they are only the powers which we have been giving to trust companies, the proper exercise of which will enure not only to the benefit of the public but to that of the shareholders. A loan company has many opportunities, not in an improper way, but in a proper way, of turning business to a trust company in which it is interested. A loan company carrying on business in a community will earn the good will and favourable opinion of different parties and people may be disposed, when they make their wills, to make them in favour of the Canada Permanent Trustee Company. It seems to me that to deny them these powers would be to prevent them from doing what we are permitting every other loan company to do; in other words, to prevent one of the best mortgage and loan companies in Canada from doing that which we have permitted every other loan company to do. I distinctly understand that my hon. friend is not opposing this Bill but merely seeking for information.

Mr. BARKER: I think the hon. gentleman who put the question had in his mind possibly an effort to get a widening of the opportunities of the Canada Permanent Loan Company. It is the reverse of that. The trust company is far more restricted in its operations than one of those loan companies. It is required to keep its accounts in a far stricter way. Every precaution has been taken in the various charters which have been granted to trust companies to secure people who are not able to look after themselves, such as widows and orphans, the estates of deceased persons and all that. Under this Bill, which is to incorporate a trust company, the Canada Permanent is simply allowed to take stock, but under the charter there will be a great deal more precision in account keeping and more care as to the nature of the dealings of the company than with the ordinary loan company, such as the Canada Permanent itself. It is not an effort to enable the Canada Permanent Loan Company to widen the scope of its business, but it is to permit it to take an interest in a company which would be much more restricted in its operations than the Canada Permanent. People are growing more and more inclined to trust the estates of children, infants and widows to a well conducted trust company under strict rules and obligations than they are to entrust these responsibilities to private persons who may be all right to-day and all wrong to-morrow. The Huron and Erie Company, a few years ago, obtained a similar subsidiary charter, and this company is conducting, with great success, a trust company. But that trust company is bound by special rules which are applicable to a trust, far more stringent and precise as to investments and the keeping of accounts than are the rules applicable to an ordinary loan company. It is for that reason that this Canada Permanent wishes not, strictly speaking, to form a trust company, but to invest in such a trust which, I have no doubt, it will control but will control subject to the rules of the statute which this Parliament authorizes. It is the very opposite of the Canada Permanent trying to secure a looser system of investment. It is to enable the Canada Permanent Company to take stock in a company which will be strictly a trust company, conducting its business in the ordinary and strict sense of the term.

On section 13—power to sell undertaking:

Mr. OLIVER: Does that amendment mean that the sale shall be by a two-thirds vote of the shareholders or by a vote of the majority of the shares at the meeting at which two-thirds of the shares are represented?

Mr. WHITE: I take it that it means a majority at the meeting, but there must be two-thirds of the value of the shares present.

Mr. OLIVER: As a matter of fact, one share more than one-third of the total may dispose of the whole property.

Mr. BARKER: Every shareholder has the opportunity of being present. You have a majority of those attending and in addition the sale must receive the approval of the Treasury Board.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that provision is very good but I want to see what it means. In the case of the disposal of the whole property the decision should not be made without the actual vote of at least two-thirds of the shares and not a majority of two-thirds of the shares.

Mr. BARKER: You cannot compel attendance. You cannot carry your vote unless two-thirds are present to form the meeting. If you say that you must get eighty or ninety per cent there is no means of compelling people to attend. I am sure the hon. gentleman knows how difficult it is to get people to attend especially when a financial concern is going on well. It is very difficult to get two-thirds in value, not in number, at any meeting, and if you get such a meeting and get such a majority and the Treasury Board confirms the decision, you are fairly safe.

Mr. NESBITT: It says two-thirds in value of the shares, does it not?

Mr. BARKER: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: Two-thirds must be present.

Mr. OLIVER: It does not say that two-thirds must vote for the disposal of the property, but that two-thirds must be present at the meeting, and that a majority of those present may dispose of the property. That means that one share more than one-third of the total number of shares can dispose of the whole business.

Mr. NESBITT: That is the way I understand it.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not wish to hold the committee on that, but I wished to find out exactly how it was. I understand it now.

Mr. NESBITT: I understood it the other way. If that section is put in, every other loan company in the country will want the same thing.

Mr. OLIVER: We have already passed it in one Bill to-night.

Mr. BARKER: The meeting, which is not an ordinary meeting, must be called for the approval of this particular proposition. Any gentleman here, who knows about calling meetings, is aware of the difficulty of getting even as many as two-thirds of the shareholders present.

Mr. NESBITT: It says 'by proxy.'

Mr. BARKER: Present in person or by proxy—even that is not an easy matter. Two-thirds of the shareholders being present at the meeting, either in person or by proxy, the meeting is constituted; the motion is put; it is either carried or lost; if carried, it must be approved of by the Treasury Board. Surely that is a protection.

Mr. NESBITT : I think, as the proposition has to be approved of by the Treasury Board, the protection provided is sufficient. If the people who hold stock in the company do not take enough interest to send their proxies or to be present at the meeting, and if there are not two-thirds of those people, after they hear the explanation of the directors of the company, willing to sell that stock, then I do not think they should be forced to sell. One-third is quite a large minority to be overcome by a majority of two-thirds. I think the principle is absolutely wrong to compel any larger a minority than one-third to sell if they are opposed to selling. If the matter went to the Treasury Board, and those who were opposed to the sale opposed it before that board, it is quite probable that the Treasury Board would not allow the sale. I appreciate that. What I object to is to have such a clause in the Bill, even though it is for the Canada Permanent. We all respect the Canada Permanent, but that does not make any difference. In the Banking and Commerce Committee, we have people coming in every day for new Bills, and they want to obtain everything that the old Bills have given them, and ten times as much more, so that we have to deal with this question constantly. I submit to the minister, who is really responsible for all these finance Bills while he is in that position, that he should not let the Bill pass in that form; it ought to be two-thirds of the stock.

Mr. WHITE : If I remember rightly, my hon. friend, who is usually a very diligent member of the Banking and Commerce Committee, was present when this amendment was made.

Mr. NESBITT : I had to go out before we came to that Bill.

Mr. WHITE : It was pointed out by my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) that the meeting must be called and every shareholder notified. It is rather an extraordinary experience to get two-thirds of the shareholders, fully paid, present. With the provision of the check of the Treasury Board upon the sale, I think the matter is entirely safeguarded. If a minority had any real grievance, they would present their views to the Treasury Board. I think that was considered by the Committee as a very effectual safeguard.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill No. 61, respecting the Simcoe, Grey and Bruce Railway Company.—Mr. Middlebro.

Bill No. 57, respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—Mr. Beattie.

Bill No. 46, to incorporate the North West Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company.—Mr. McKay.

Bill No. 29, to incorporate the Canada North West Loan and Mortgage Company.—Mr. Meighen.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MONTREAL DRILL HALL.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

Is it the intention of the Government to erect a drill hall on Lafontaine Park, Montreal?

2. Has the lease of the above-named park been extended? If so, under what conditions?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Not at present, but the militia in that part of the city are requesting the erection of a drill hall at an early date.

2. No change has been made since October 1, 1911.

FENIAN RAID GRANTS.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Is it the intention of the Department of Militia and Defence to issue a certificate for the payment of the volunteer bounty grant as a Fenian raid volunteer, to Levi Lochiin, of Strathcona, Alberta?

Mr. PELLETIER: This application is on file in the department, but has not yet been reached.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Has the application of Théophile Rouleau, made in the name of his father, Jean Rouleau, one of the veterans, who died in April, 1912, for the bounty received the attention of the Militia Department? If so, has it been accepted?

2. Have the heirs of a veteran, deceased after the sanction of the law passed at the last session (the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act), the right to the bounty?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. This application was received on June 28, 1912. It is numbered 11,414, and will be considered in its turn.

2. It is so understood.

HALIFAX AND PROSPECT MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Who has the contract for the carriage of the mails between Halifax and Prospect, Halifax county?

2. What is the amount paid therefor?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. James H. Walsh.
2. $545 per annum.

SHERBROOKE AND SHEET HARBOUR MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Who has the contract for the carriage of the mails from Sherbrooke, Guysborough county, N.S., to Sheet Harbour, Halifax county, N.S.?
2. What is the amount paid therefor?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. John S. Cameron.
2. $3,384.35 per annum.

EMPLOYMENT OF JOSEPH MORIN.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is Joseph Morin, formerly a tailor at St. Roch des Aulnaies, in the employment of the Post Office Department?
2. If so, on what date was he appointed?
3. What are his duties?
4. What is his salary?
5 Does the Government know that the said Joseph Morin, as alleged, was one of the most active canvassers of Doctor Paquet, member for L'Islet at the last election?
6. Does the Government know that Captain David Bourgeault, keeper of the lightship at La Traverse, St. Roch, is said to have declared to have paid to the said Joseph Morin five hundred dollars to be appointed to the said position?
7. Does the Government intend to inquire into these facts?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. A man named Joseph Morin, from St. Roch des Aulnaies, is employed as a railway mail clerk, Quebec district.
2. 24th June, 1912.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. $500.
5. The Post Office Department has no information on the subject.
6. The Post Office Department has no information on the subject.
7. Answered by Nos. 5 and 6.

ST. ROCH DES AULNAIES PREVENTIVE OFFICER.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is Mr. Joseph Dupont, of St. Roch des Aulnaies, a preventive officer of the Department of Inland Revenue?
2 If so, what is his salary?
3. What is the date of his appointment?
4. Has he made a report?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. Yes.
2. $200.
3. August 15, 1912.
4. Up to the present time not to the department, but he may have communicated with the collector of the division, to whom he should make his reports.

MARITIME PROVINCES INLAND REVENUE INSPECTOR.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What is the residence and address of John Macdonald, who has been appointed inspector of inland revenue in the Maritime provinces?
2. Has he been employed previous to his appointment in the Inland Revenue, or any other department?, If so, in what capacity?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. John McDonald, jr., St. John, New Brunswick.
2. He has not been employed as far as the department is aware.

BRITISH COLUMBIA SALMON.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Is there a fishery regulation in force prohibiting the export of freshly caught sockeye salmon from British Columbia to the United States?
2. Have any alterations been made by the present Administration in the regulation referred to in paragraph one? If so, what alterations have been made?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. No. As the salmon canners gave the department a written assurance that they would take all sockeyes tendered them by the fishermen at a price satisfactory to the fishermen, a change in the regulation was not considered necessary.

BOULARDARIE CENTRE POST OFFICE.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. What were the distances, respectively, between the post offices at Big Bank, Boulardarie Centre and Boulardarie, county of Victoria, before the office was moved from the residence of Alex. Matheson?
2. How far west from its former position was the Boulardarie Centre post office moved?
3. Is the Boulardarie Centre post office still within the limits of Boulardarie Centre, so-called?
4. Who is the new postmaster of Boulardarie Centre?
5. Were there any complaints lodged against the former postmaster, Alex. Matheson? If so, what were they?
6. For what reason was Mr. Matheson dismissed and the post office moved to its present location?
7. Was there any general request from the people of that locality for a change in the location of the Boulardarie Centre post office?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1, 2 and 3. The department has no specific information at present on these points.
4. Mr. Malcolm Campbell.

5. Yes. He was charged with political partisanship.

6. For political partisanship.

7. The postmaster having himself admitted partisanship, the dismissal took place without the necessity of any general request one way or the other, and none was made.

NEW CAMPBELLTON CUSTOMS OFFICER.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Who is the present customs house officer at New Campbellton, county of Victoria?

2. When was he appointed?

3. What is the distance between the present customs house office and the Government breakwater and harbour at New Campbellton?

4. For what reason was the old customs house officer, Captain George Livingstone, dismissed?

5. How far was the customs house from the harbour and breakwater of New Campbellton when the office was held by Captain Livingstone?

6. How much further away from the port is the customs house office now than it was when held by Captain Livingstone?

7. What was the reason for moving the customs house office so far from the shipping port?

Mr. REID:

1. William R. McKinnon.

2. He was authorized to act as sub-collector by letter dated November 11, 1912.

3. There is no information on this point in the Department of Customs.

4. The old customs officer, George Livingstone, was dismissed on account of political partisanship.

5 and 6. There is no information on these points in the Department of Customs.

7. The sub-collector of customs for New Campbellton does his office work in his house, temporarily, during the winter. The permanent location of the sub-collector's office is still under consideration by the department.

ANTIGONISH COUNTY ESTIMATES.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

1. Referring to the document or letter which appeared in the Casket newspaper, published at Antigonish, of date the 9th day of January, 1913, as follows:—

Office of the Minister of Public Works of Canada.

Ottawa, December 28, 1912.

Senator Girroir.

My Dear Sir,—Your letter of the 24th instant and addressed to the Minister of Public Works received, and, in accordance with your request, I am enclosing you herewith a list of the items which have been placed in the Supplementary Estimates for Antigonish county for 1913-14.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) George Buskard,
Minister's Secretary.

To E L. Girroir,
Barrister,
Antigonish, N.S.

Main Estimates.

Arisaig—Complete extension to wharf..	$3,000
Bayfield—Repair to wharf breakwater.	2,500
Blue Rock—Repairs to breakwater	8,200
Breen's Pond—Construction of breakwater..	1,400
Harbour au Boucher—Repairs to wharf	1,000
Malignant Cove—Repairs to breakwater	800

Supplementary Estimates.

Cribbins Point—Wharf and dredging..	15,000
Delorey's Beach—Breakwater repairs and extensions..	14,700
Malignant Cove—Extension of piers and dredging	4,000
McArras Brook—Extension of piers landing	1,700
McNair's Cove—Extension to wharf....	5,500
Ogdens Pond—Sand grain and extension of pier	2,800
South Lakevale—Extension of channel pier..	3,000
Auld's Cove—Protected channel..	15,000
Tracadie Harbour—Improvements.. ..	27,000
Harbour au Boucher—Warehouse	1,200
Breen's Pond—Extension to breakwater..	14,500
Georgeville—New wharf..	90,000

There will also be placed in the general vote for dredging amounts for Lakevale and Bayfield, and an amount for repair for old wharf at Georgeville, will be placed in estimates when exact amount of damages is ascertained.

2. Did the secretary of the Minister of Public Works send, or authorize to be sent, to Senator Girroir, of Antigonish, N.S., the said letter and enclosure?

3. If not did the minister's secretary send, or authorize to be sent, any letter to Senator Girroir in the month of December last, respecting the estimates, or proposed expenditures for Antigonish county?

4. If so, what were such letters and inclosures?

Mr. ROGERS: The following letter and memorandum were sent by the Secretary of the Minister of Public Works:—

Office of the Minister of Public Works of Canada,

December 28, 1912.

My dear Sir,—

Your letter of the 24th instant addressed to the Minister of Public Works received, and, in accordance with your request, I am inclosing you herewith a list of the items which have been placed in the Supplementary Estimates for Antigonish county for 1913-14.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) George Buskard,
Minister's secretary.

To E. L. Girroir, Esq.,
Barrister,
Antigonish, N.S.

List of Amounts for Antigonish county, N.S., noted for Estimates 1913-14.

Main Estimates.

FRUIT INSPECTORS.

Mr. KYTE:

1. How many fruit inspectors are there in Canada?
2. How many of them have been dismissed since October 10, 1911?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. There were forty-eight inspectors employed for the season of 1912-13.
2. Four inspectors have been dismissed since October 10, 1911, and ten temporary fruit inspectors employed during the season of 1911-12 were not re-engaged during the season of 1912-13.

LANORAIE WHARF.

Mr. BELAND:

1. Has the Department of Public Works granted a contract for repairs to the wharf at Lanoraie, county of Berthier?
2. If so, to whom was this contract granted?
3. On what date was the sum appropriated for these works originally voted?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.
2. Arthur Daignault, of Longueuil, P.Q.
3. In the fiscal year 1911-12.

SHELL FISH COMMISSION.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has the commission appointed last year to investigate the shell-fish industry reported?
2. Are any changes to be made in the lobster regulations that will apply to the present year?
3. If so, what are the proposed changes?

Mr. HAZEN: 1, 2, and 3. The commission has not yet reported.

ST. IRENEE LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

What amount does Mr. Dorila Tremblay, ex-lighthouse keeper at St. Irénée, county of Charlevoix, receive as pension?

Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. HAZEN: $196 per annum. This man was keeper of the light at Portneuf (en bas) and not St. Irénée.

ARTIFICIAL ICE.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings):

1. Is the Government aware that a company has been formed to manufacture and sell in Ottawa artificial ice made from water which has been distilled twice, and therefore guaranteed absolutely pure?
2. Has any move been made by the Government towards ascertaining the price, with a view of entering into a contract with the company to supply this pure ice to the two Houses and the different departments of the Government?

Mr. ROGERS: The practice is to call for tenders for ice supply, and this company will have an opportunity of tendering.

PRINCE RUPERT PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Have the plans for the public building at Prince Rupert been approved? If not, why have they not been approved?
2. If they have been approved, have the tenders for the construction of the building been called for? If so, when will they be let?

Mr. ROGERS: A site has not been purchased, and plans have not been prepared.

REVELSTOKE PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Have the plans been approved for the public buildings at Revelstoke? If not, why have they not been approved?
2. If they have been approved, have tenders been called for the work? If not, why not?
3. If tenders have been called for, when will they be let?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No.

2 and 3. The residents were not satisfied with the size of the building, and ask for a larger and more expensive building.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Has Captain V. Lyons, lately in charge of the Government dredge Northumberland, been dismissed?
2. If so, on what grounds was his dismissal made, and who is his successor?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. (a) Incompetency; (b) William McKenzie.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has Mr. Louis Pineault, keeper of the lighthouse Le Bequet, Rimouski, been removed from his duties? If so, for what reasons?
2. Was there an accusation made against him? If so, by whom?

3. Has an inquiry been granted?
4. Who has replaced Mr. Pineault?

Mr. HAZEN: 1. Yes, for political partisanship.

2. Yes; by Mr. Boulay, M.P., and Mr. F. E. Heppell.

3. No.

4. H. N. Lavoie. Mr. Lavoie was drowned in November last. His widow is in temporary charge.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Mr. DEVLIN moved:

That, in the opinion of the House, it is essential to the commercial independence of Canada, that we shall have within our own boundaries and subject to no control but our own, the means of transporting the products of every part of our country to every other part; and also that we shall maintain all Canadian routes by which the products of all the provinces may reach the world's markets, and for this and other commercial reasons, it is necessary that the Georgian bay canal be immediately constructed.

He said: In support of the resolution which I have the honour to propose, I intend to be very brief in the observations I shall offer to the House, because the hour is late, the matter is not new, and there are several hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who intend to speak upon it. The question of the construction of what is commonly known as the Georgian bay canal is not at all new in this House or in the country. Even before Confederation it was mooted, and I believe that a contract for the construction of the canal was granted as far back as 1852. The construction of the canal was advocated in the legislature of the country before this House existed, and the Hon. Mr. Skead and several others spoke upon it. It was advocated at a time when our population was barely two million people, and when our total trade was $131,027,532. I feel, therefore, that we may with greater reason and with greater force advocate its construction to-day when our total trade is $942,303,904, and when we have a population of about 8,000,000. To-day we are in a position to begin the construction of the Georgian bay canal. When I mention that we collect $60,000,000 more in duties than we did ten years ago, hon. members will understand that the finances of this country tend more to the carrying out of an enterprise which might even be termed gigantic, than they did in former years. Let me further call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1903 the exports of Canadian produce amounted to $215,145,308. Ten years afterwards, a very short space in the natural lifetime of a man, and shorter space in the lifetime of a country, our exports have reached the enormous sum of over $318,000,000. We are to-day engaged in developing our country, in building railways, and in improving our canal systems. I am certain that the House will agree with me in saying that if we can find a way to improve our transportation system, and to lessen the rates upon the freight which is carried from east to west or from north to south, we shall solve the great problem which at present confronts the Dominion.

In moving this resolution, let me say at once my object is to have our produce pass through Canadian channels on its way to the markets of the world, to facilitate the transportation of the ever-increasing production of western Canada, to lessen the rates upon grain transportation, and to develop a great section of our country which is rich in farm lands, in lumber and in minerals. I am not an opponent of the enlargement of the Welland canal. I believe that our country is great enough to stand as many canals as we possibly could build. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is not in his seat. Upon his departure for Australia to conclude a trade arrangement I would like to have taken this, possibly the last occasion I may have before his departure, to wish him God-speed upon his journey and to wish him every success in the arrangement which he wishes to conclude with Australia. I do not think that there is a man in the Dominion Cabinet to-day who is better fitted for the mission than the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. It would be well for him, if he carries out what appears by the press to be his intention, to stop on his return trip in China and Japan and there examine the canals. It is wonderful to think that in the three countries of China, Korea and Japan, countries that should not be as advanced in their development as Canada, there are 200,000 miles of canals. Will hon. gentlemen in this House tell me that it is impossible for this country, which is becoming the greatest and richest dominion of the Empire, to improve—not build, but to improve—a natural waterway by a few miles of dredging and by twenty-eight miles of canal? The engineering reports respecting the canals of the three countries which I have just mentioned, point out that forty canals across the United States from east to west and sixty from north to south, would not equal in the number of miles those in China, Korea and Japan. I am proud of my country, I may see greater possibilities in my own country than perhaps some men do, but there is not a member of this House who gives any study to the question of transportation who cannot see that it is absolutely necessary that, if you are going to be able to transport your grain from west to east, if you are going to be able to build up your national ports, if you are going to be able to find markets where you want them and not by going to the country to the south, you must build an enlarged waterway system in this country. The right hon. Prime Minister, for whose judgment I have the greatest possible respect, has said that our object is to keep Canadian trade in Canadian channels and to continue as much as we can the policy of making that trade run east and west. These are his words, these are the words which have been uttered upon this side of the House and by other hon. members upon the opposite side of the House. Do you mean what you say? Is that your object? Do you mean to direct your trade east and west, do you mean to keep it within your own territory? If that is your intention what must you do? Enlarge the Welland canal? Do it if you will, but you will not direct your trade within Canadian channels. Improve your waterway system from the Georgian bay along the French river down the Ottawa and along the St. Lawrence and then you will keep your trade east and west within Canadian territory and Canadian channels. You are either serious in what you say or you are not serious. Construct as you will your railways—you have now the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific—build ten more transcontinental railways and, with the ever-increasing production of grain in the Northwest, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works will agree with me, you cannot find a system of transport which will meet the necessities of the West. If I were simply speaking of the transportation of the crop from the Northwest to the Canadian ports in order to find the best way to the markets of the world, I would stop here and say: Improve your waterways system from the great lakes to your national ports along the French river and the Georgian bay. But, Sir, to my friends from Nova Scotia, I will say this: If you want markets for your Nova Scotia coal, where will you get them? Is it not a fact that you cannot tranship your Nova Scotia coal practically past the city of Montreal? You want to find a market further west. You cannot do it and why?—because freight rates are too high. I appeal to hon. members to take this question into their very serious consideration. This project has been before this House since Confederation. It has almost become an annual theme, but do hon. gentlemen take it up seriously? I put it to the members of this House individually: Have you as legislators given that serious and earnest consideration to this project that you should have? You have spent the money of the country in surveys, you have said: Find out if it is feasible, tell us the cost, and then we will see if we are able to build it. You have formed commissions. You had your commission upon transportation as far back as 1905. Let me refer to the Royal Commission upon Transportation for one moment. It was a most important commission, it studied the question of transportation thoroughly and to what conclusion upon the waterways did it come? It said this:

> We would recommend that, in case the Ottawa river scheme, because of want of feasibility from a commercial or engineering point of view, or on account of its cost or for other reasons, be not adopted, then that the Welland canal shall be enlarged.

And the Welland canal shall be enlarged only if you find that the Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal is not feasible, commercially or on account of its cost. Have you found that out? You appointed in 1908 a body of engineers to study the question and a very voluminous report was brought into this House. What did the engineers state in their conclusion? Let me, as briefly as possible, pick out one or two of their conclusions.

> That a twenty-two foot waterway for the largest lake boats,——

Not barges.

> —(six hundred feet by sixty feet and twenty feet draught) can be established for $100,000,000 in ten years, and that the annual maintenance will be approximately $900,000, including the operation of storage reservoirs for the better distribution of the flood waters of the Ottawa river.

$100,000,000 is a great deal of money, not so much for this country, but it is a great deal of money. But what revenue are you going to derive from it? It is pointed out to you in clear terms. Let alone the increased trade in the country, the increased traffic, what do you find in section 9 of the report of the Chief Engineeer to the Government.

> That with a storage system and plant and the tributary basins thereto required for the navigation project, a reliable water-power supply is secured at various dams amounting to 1,000,000 horse-power, which can be developed for about $50 per horse-power.

What else? Would that not be a sufficient guarantee of revenue to induce this House to come to the conclusion that the project ought to be undertaken? Do you want more? Is your grain trade increasing? Are you to-day getting more grain from the Northwest than your railways can possibly handle? And on this point let me say that what you need in this country, at your terminal ports, is elevators. This country should not stop at any expense for the building of elevators. It is all very well for members to say that the farmers of the West should build sheds to keep their grain in. That is very well, but you are inviting immigration into this country, you are asking people to come from Europe and take up your lands, you are advertising those lands and telling the people of Europe that they can go upon those lands with little capital and grow grain. Do you tell them to bring capital to build warehouse on their farms? No, you do not. Are you taking the necessary means to protect their trade when it reaches the terminals? You are not. This country, Sir, should not stop at any expenditure on terminal elevators, and as long as I have a seat in this House I will give my support to any expenditure in that direction. You are undertaking to make great national ports. You want to build up Montreal into a national port. I believe that Montreal is really the national port of Canada. I think that you can safely spend as much money as you will upon the port of Montreal, and you will not only develop your country thereby but you will develop the trade of your country. I am not sectional, I have no particular interest in the city of Montreal, but I do say that with the ever-increasing population of Montreal, when it is prophesied and rightly prophesied that in a very few years you will have in Montreal a population of over one million people, it is the duty of Canada to see to the enlargement of its port. It is the duty of this Government, as it is the duty of every Government in this country that may hold the reins of power, to see to the enlargement of the St. Lawrence channel. Build your elevators at your ports, build your elevators in Montreal. Are they necessary? I mean to show in the few remarks I will make to-night, the absolute necessity of these elevators. I mean to show, if I am able to show, that the grain production of the West is so great, that your transhipment of grain is so great, that your transhipment of coal is so great, that the Americans, the very men you are afraid of, are running away with your trade and no man in this House will gainsay that. You are enlarging your Welland canal, enlarging it for the benefit of the American people If you do want your trade to go through American ports, if you want the American carrying trade to go into your West to the detriment of your Canadian trade, neglect your national waterway from the Georgian bay to the St. Lawrence, and go on enlarging your Welland canal.

I said I would give a few figures respecting the transhipment of grain, the shipments of Canadian grain from Fort William and Port Arthur to Canadian ports in 1908 were 31,978,334 bushels. In 1911 they were 36,378,535 bushels. But whilst we were transporting that grain through Canadian ports, we were transporting other grain as well, because we have to-day, the facilities, through our waterways, to transport our grain to American ports. And what were we doing? In 1906, of our wheat, over 12,398,000 bushels or 28 per cent found its way to American ports. In 1911, our production was going up, 33,806,534 bushels or 48 per cent of it found its way to American ports. Of our total grain transhipments in 1906, 34,000,000 bushels odd found its way to Canadian ports. Of our total grain, 60,000,000 bushels or 32 per cent found its way to American ports. In 1911, 58,000,000 found its way to Canadian ports and 36,000,000 bushels found its way to United States ports, or 37½ per cent. And what are you doing to stop that? What are you doing to tranship your grain? Your railways cannot and will not be able to tranship it. Are you doing anything in regard to your waterways system, having surveys made, spending a few dollars here and there? To what benefit? To what purpose? I do not say this in a partisan spirit; I do not blame this Government any more than I blame the former Government. This is a national question; this is not a question that must be approached in any partisan spirit; it is too large for that. I know that upon both sides of the House the project of building the Georgian bay canal has enthusiastic support. I should like to see the number of those supporters increased, call them Conservatives or call them Grits, it is a matter of total indifference to me. Like your navy or your national defence, it is too big for party politics; and the men of this country ought to be big enough to study national problems without considering whether or not they will gain twenty-five or thirty more votes in their respective constituencies. I appeal to both sides of the House in that spirit, and I ask you to consider this question in that spirit. If the present Government brings in a scheme by which the waterways system from the Georgian bay to the ocean ports will be improved, will be enlarged, will be deepened, I ask hon. members on this side of the House to give the Government their hearty support and co-operation. I am not alone in the opinion that I expressed to-day. I have said that the right hon. the Prime Minister favours our trade from east to west. This is the only possible way of securing our trade from east to west. By the Welland canal you must offer to the Americans exactly the same advantages that you offer to the Canadians. Do not forget that. Whilst in the Panama canal the Americans may have an advantage over you, by treaty you are obliged to offer to the Americans the same advantages as you offer to your own people, because you are dealing with international waters. In the building of the Georgian bay canal, get the revenue and give to the farmers of this country a free canal. This proposition has been mooted for a great number of years. A committee was appointed by the Senate of Canada in 1898 and several opinions were given. For the benefit of the new members of this House, I should like to refer to some of the opinions there given. Mr. T. C. Clarke, an eminent civil engineer of New York, when called upon to give evidence, said; referring to the Georgian bay canal scheme:

The improvement of the navigation of a chain of rivers of such a nature is a comparatively easy task. The greater part of the task is already accomplished.

Mr. Marcus Smith, also a very able engineer said that he saw no physical difficulty in the building of the canal. William Van Horne, who is an authority to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, also gave evidence, and he refuted the theory that the building of this canal would militate against the railways of this country. It is commonly observed, that the moment you undertake to enlarge your canals, you are going to hurt your railways. Here is what he says:

The building of the canal would result in the establishment of important industries along the whole route. Everything tending to diminish the cost of transportation, must incontectably have a good effect. The canal would help the Canadian Pacific railway inasmuch as it would create more traffic for the road than it would take away.

As we are at a period of our history, when we are entering upon military manoeuvres and upon the defence of our country, it might not be inopportune to quote Major General Gascoigne, who was then Commander of the Canadian Militia. His words were:

That the Georgian bay canal would be of the greatest possible benefit for military purposes and hoped for by England.

To some of the members of this House, it may be a very strong argument to advance that you will be free from your neighbours to the south of you, because if your ships are in any danger from American ships, all you have to do is to run your ships up into the Georgian Bay canal and they will be perfectly safe. That is what Major General Gascoigne said. If my hon. friend the Minister of Militia were in the House today, that argument alone would be sufficient to convince him that we should immediately began the construction of the canal.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to say that there is another matter that must appeal to our friends from Nova Scotia, who are interested in the coal question. They may be surprised to know that 2,708,000 tons of coal come from American ports through the lakes and find their way westwards. Why should not your Nova Scotia coal go west? We want to develop a Canadian trade; we do not want to trade with our American neighbours. Why should we not do everything we possibly can to help Nova Scotia in the transhipment of her coal westward, instead of working towards the betterment of transportation for Americans in order to allow them to bring in their coal westward from their American ports and send it west to the detriment of Nova Scotia. I may be asked right away, why could not Nova Scotia coal come west now? It could not come because the freight rates are too high. With water transportation your freight rates will be lowered, and you can bring your Nova Scotia coal westward. It might be unfair to my hon. friend from North Renfrew, if I were to dilate at any greater length upon the question of freight rates. If I give him a chance, I know that he will this evening deal with that phase of the question, and I will resume my seat hoping that this resolution will be adopted by the House, that the Government will give it its serious consideration, and that a way will be found, without increasing revenue, to begin the construction of this canal system at once.

Mr. GERALD V. WHITE (North Renfrew): In view of the excellent address delivered by the hon. member for Wright and of the very cogent arguments advanced in connection with the resolution he has placed on the Order Paper, I feel somewhat diffident, especially at this hour of the night, in rising to address the House on so important a question. However, there are one or two aspects of this project which I would like to dwell upon for a short time. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that the Prime Minister of this country has declared himself in favour of improving our trade routes, east and west, and I think the Prime Minister—although my hon. friend doubted it somewhat—was quite sincere in the expression of his views in that connection. When the question of reciprocity was before the country, one of the strongest arguments used on this side of the House was to the effect that reciprocity, if passed, would have a detrimental effect in that it would divert our trade north and south instead of allowing it to flow east and west. When that issue was before the country, our friends to the south were keenly alive to the benefits they would obtain by the passing of the reciprocity pact, and evidenced no hesitancy in declaring their views on this point. For instance, the Northwestern Miller made the following statement:

The prospect is a grand one. With the enormous and steadily-increasing crops of Canadian wheat flowing into the mills and elevators of the United States, a splendid tide of activity and prosperity would follow in its wake. New mills would be built and capacities enlarged. New railways would be extended into the wheat-growing territory; American railways carrying the flour from the mills would secure additional freight; American banks would obtain increased deposits; American mill operatives would be in demand and pay-rolls increased. There would be an increase in grain firms, in elevators and in every branch of the grain-handling and flour-making interests. This would be felt in the added value of real estate, and in the solid and substantial development of every undertaking and enterprise that makes a community prosperous.

Governor Foss of Massachusetts, speaking on behalf of the eastern states, made this statement:

Our great water terminal, Boston harbour, will be improved with new docks and piers adequate to this increased business. Our present railroads will increase their facilities and extend their lines to handle it.

These extracts indicate the anticipations of the people of the United States with regard to the passage of the reciprocity pact; the United States was to be the gainer and Canada the loser, in so far as our transportation interests were concerned. In view of the fact, however, that that isue is dead, it seems to me that the Government of this country should endeavour to promote and stimulate eastern and western trade, and this can only be done by improving the methods of carrying our products to the markets of the world. As my hon. friend has stated, I believe that the governments of this country have been somewhat derelict in their duty concerning the improvement of our water transportation routes, and that it is a most important question for the government of the country to take up and deal with in a manner suited to present needs. It appears to me that the paramount importance of the waterways problem, the failure of our present canal system to meet existing conditions, the weakness of the present position of our carrying trade on the great lakes and the immediate necessity for a through deep waterway between the great lakes and the Atlantic seaboard, capable of accommodating the largest lake vessels without breaking bulk en route, are strongly emphasized by the recent action of the Government in suspending the navigation laws, and allowing American vessels to dock at Fort William and Port Arthur for the storage of grain during the winter season. This has been done by the Government to relieve the congestion of grain in the Canadian Northwest, and it is reported that there are at the present time a large number of American vessels loading grain at these points. The amount of grain being loaded into these vessels for storage is, I understand, in the neighbourhood of 12,000,000 bushels, and the wheat may thus be conveyed to the markets as soon as navigation opens. This will show, to some extent, the inadequacy of the Canadian grain fleet to handle even the grain of our own Canadian West. According to the grain statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce, I find that in 1911 the grain fleet on the lakes numbered some ninety vessels, with a combined capacity of 8,952,000 bushels. Thus it will be seen that the grain which is now being loaded at Fort William and Port Arthur into American vessels is almost one and one-half times the capacity of our entire Canadian fleet.

My hon. friend also pointed out that in view of the superior equipment of our American neighbours to handle this grain crop a large amount of our grain was shipped in American bottoms to American ports. This has been increasing very rapidly. The figures which I have here show that in 1908 180,683 tons or some 6,000,000 odd bushels of Canadian wheat passed through the Canadian Soo locks to American ports. In 1909 the amount was 400,300 tons. In 1910 it was 461,050 tons and in 1911 the large amount of 838,368 tons, equivalent to practically 28,000,000 bushels.

The great bulk of this wheat was carried in American vessels and was therefore lost to the Canadian carrying trade from Fort William and Port Arthur eastward.

It is to be expected that with the natural increase of the grain production in the Northwest these conditions will constantly become more unfavourable to Canada, and it is therefore a national duty for us to discover and adopt a remedy and preserve the Canadian carrying trade to Canadian ports, to Canadian vessels and Canadian transportation routes to the seaboard. From the figures contained not only in the Government reports, but in the newspapers I find that there has been a very false impression created by these figures. For instance, in the Government statistics for 1910 issued by the Department of Railways and Canals the following statements are made:

There was a further substantial increase in the volume of traffic through the canals of the Dominion. In order that comparison may be made with preceding years and at the same time a demonstration afforded of the rapid expansion of Canadian water-borne business the figures relating to the tonnage for the past decade are given.

The figures quoted show an increase from some 5,665,259 tons in 1901 to 42,990,608 tons in 1910 and the report further states:

The growth during the first 5-year period was equal to 65 per cent and during the second period 308 per cent.

I propose to show that those figures are entirely misleading, first because they fail to distinguish between Canadian business and United States coasting trade—using Canadian canals free of toll and without benefit to Canada, and in the second place because under the erroneous methods employed in obtaining these aggregate figures, every cargo carried between the head of the lake and Montreal is multiplied by three; that is to say every cargo is recorded, not only at the Soo locks but also at the Welland canal and at the St. Lawrence canals. About four-fifths of the traffic through Canada's boundary canal system is United States coast-wise trade which uses Canadian canals free of cost and without benefit to us. In 1910 the division of traffic as shown by Canal Statistics was as follows: United States coast-wise trade, 32,853,985 tons, or 79 per cent of the total. Canadian coast-wise trade, 5,036,297 tons, or 12 per cent of the total. Then with regard to international trade, United States to Canada, 2,528,554 tons or 6 per cent of the total; Canada to the United States, 1,063,893 tons, or 3 per cent of the total. This would make Canada's share of the traffic as follows: coastwise trade 5,036,297 tons or 12 per cent, and international trade, Canada to the United States, 1,063,893 tons or 3 per cent, making a total of 6,100,190 tons or 15 per cent, or less than one-seventh of the whole. But I find that the facts are even less favourable to Canada than these figures would indicate. For instance, there are included in the figures for Canada-United States traffic, 461,054 tons of wheat which passed through the Canadian Soo locks to Buffalo and other American ports. This was nearly all carried in American vessels and represents therefore an actual loss to the Canadian carrying trade from Fort William eastward.

Again large reductions must be made owing to the duplication of figures. For instance a vessel with 1,500 tons of wheat shipped from Fort William or Port Arthur to Montreal appears in the traffic returns for the Soo canal, the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence canals respectively and her cargo appears in the aggregate as a movement of 4,500 tons instead of 1,500 tons. Similarly a boat proceeding from Montreal to Lake Erie ports with a consignment of pulpwood, say a thousand tons, appears in the returns for not only the St. Lawrence canals, but also the Welland and her cargo appears in the aggregate at 2,000 tons of pulpwood instead of 1,000 tons. In the Canadian Year Book for 1911, I find that there also mistakes have been made. The Canadian Year Book for 1911 on page 373 shows that 3,528,185 tons of wheat were carried through Canadian canals in 1911. On page 413 it appears that the total shipments of wheat by all vessels from Fort William and Port Arthur in 1911 were 70,185,069 bushels equal to 2,105,552 tons. Less than 80,000 tons of United States wheat are reported as passing through the Sault, Welland, and St. Lawrence canals, and less than 5,000 tons were carried on all other canals. United States wheat in transit between United States ports amounted to 516,283 tons. Therefore the figures on page 373 show an overstatement of about—800,000 tons, or approximately 27,000,000 bushels. Now this is a striking indication of the misleading nature of these figures. In the Canal Statistics for 1910, on page 38, appears a statement showing the quantity of freight passing eastward from Lake Erie through the whole of the St. Lawrence and Welland canals to Montreal. The total is 1,170,139 tons. On page 40 a similar table shows the westward movement amounting to 162,360 tons, making a total eastward and westward movement of 1,332,499 tons. And this amount was credited to both the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, and was therefore included twice in the aggregate figures of traffic for the canals of that year. Besides this, it must be taken into account that the eastbound Welland traffic in 1910 included grain shipped from Canadian to Canadian ports to the amount of 672,790 tons. Practically all of this came from Lake Superior, and was included in this statement of traffic of the Canadian Sault lock. These items alone show a duplication of figures amounting to somewhere near 2,000,000 tons. Deducting this from the 6,100,190 tons representing the combined Canadian coast-wise and Canada to United States traffic and deducting further the 461,054 tons of wheat shipped to Buffalo, we have left only between 3,500,000 and 4,000,000 tons as the total movement of Canadian freight in Canadian vessels on the boundary canals in 1910, or only about one-twelfth of the 42,990,608 tons quoted in the Canal Statistics to show the rapid expansion of Canadian water-borne traffic.

Now, taking the traffic on the Great Lakes, I find that the annual traffic passing the Sault amounted to almost 75,000,000 tons, and almost 100,000,000 tons passed Detroit. But about nineteen-twentieths of this traffic is purely local traffic between the various states of the American Union bordering on the great lakes and is therefore a traffic from which Canadian vessels are absolutely barred. It seems to me that there should be some way of keeping within our own channels the large amount of our traffic which is being taken advantage of by our American neighbours. The construction of a through water-way from the lakes to the seaboard, seems to be the only feasible proposition, a water-way which will be entirely within Canadian territory. I have pointed out that the present Canadian fleet is entirely inadequate to handle the Canadian grain crop. In 1910 we had in the Sault trade only 12 vessels of over 2,000 tons registration with a combined tonnage of 35,142 tons against an American fleet of the same or similar registration of 375 vessels with a combined tonnage of 1,466,879 tons, or some forty times that of the Canadian fleet of similar registration. The United States not only have enormous advantages in the number of vessels, but their vessels have a monopoly of the United States coasting trade, which forms, as I stated before, about nineteen-twentieths of the total traffic. United States earnings in freight from which Canadian vessels are barred, amount annually to some $25,000,000. In 1910 their earnings in the iron ore trade alone amounted to $25,500,000. Having the monopoly of this enormous traffic in which their profits are made, United States vessels could afford to carry one or two cargoes of wheat at such rates as would merely pay running expenses.

With regard to the international trade, about two-thirds of the United States coal carried to Fort William and Port Arthur, is carried in American bottoms, and more than three-fourths of the wheat from these ports to Buffalo is carried in United States bottoms. It has been contended that the only remedy for this state of affairs is the enlargement of the Welland canal, that that would temporarily overcome the difficulty. The only result, however, which would follow from this would be to allow the American vessels which are too large to be accommodated by the present Welland canal to go to lake Ontario instead of enabling them to enjoy only the increased trade of the upper lakes. There are several reasons why I believe this state of affairs may be anticipated. For example, when the Welland canal was enlarged from nine feet to fourteen feet a similar state of affairs existed. Following the report of the Canal Commission in 1871, the enlargement of the Welland canal was commenced at once and the new Welland canal was opened for traffic in 1882 with twelve feet of water on the sills; it was later increased to fourteen feet on the sills. However, the enlargement of the St. Lawrence system from lake Ontario to Montreal was not immediately proceeded with. We had for some eighteen years the enlarged Welland canal with a smaller St. Lawrence system and it was not until I think 1900 that a through fourteen-foot channel was constructed from the great lakes to Montreal. The theory then held was that as soon as the large lake vessels could descend to lake Ontario there would be a heavy traffic to Kingston and Prescott for transfer to barges to be carried down the St. Lawrence canals to Montreal. It was also thought that Canadian vessels of the new Welland canal size would be built for this trade, giving us an advantage over the American routes. Official traffic reports prove that these theories were entirely erroneous and that the results were entirely unsatisfactory from a Canadian standpoint. As a matter of fact, there have been some fifty-one vessels of Welland-canal size built in Great Britain for the Canadian grain trade and of these forty-three were built between 1900 and 1911. There were eight British vessels of Welland-canal size in the trade which were built prior to 1900 but which were not brought to Canada until after that year, and consequently did not engage in the grain trade until after the whole St. Lawrence system had been enlarged. In 1893 the late Thomas Munro, engineer in charge of the enlargement work on the St. Lawrence canals, reported that the only result of the Welland enlargement had been the establishment of a line of American lake propellers between Chicago and Ogdensburg, and in 1899, just before the completion of the fourteen-foot St. Lawrence canals, he stated in a report as follows:

> As a matter of fact there are scarcely any vessels drawing 14 feet now engaged in the the St. Lawrence trade except a line of American propellors, plying between Chicago and Ogdensburg. When the St. Lawrence river and canals are fully ready, it is presumed that craft of the required capacity will be forthcoming, but the grain fleets for the St. Lawrence route have yet to be built.

This corroborates the facts I cited a few moments ago with regard to vessels which were built and put on that trade after 1900. In Mr. Munro's report of the first season's operation of the completed system in 1900 he said:

> Only one vessel of full canal size passed through the canals during the season, namely, the Strathcona on her way from Scotland to the lakes to engage in the grain trade.

In 1899 a prominent Canadian resident in the city of New York stated to the New York Herald:

> The fact is beginning to be realized that the policy of Canada as to canals is a monumental blunder. This is illustrated by the startling statement that while Canada has spent sixty million dollars on her canals, she has not sixty craft to navigate them.

Not only was this true at that time, but in 1912 it was stated in the brief of Daniel Mullin, K.C., who has been retained by the Dominion in connection with the protest of the Canadian Government against the diversion of waters from the Great Lakes by the Chicago Drainage Canal:

> In the grain-carrying trade of Canada, there are seventy vessels, sixty-one of which are what is called Welland-canal size and nine larger.

The grain statistics for 1910 show that there were 83 Canadian vessels carrying grain from the head of the lakes that year; their total capacity was 8,113,000 bushels and these were not all engaged exclusively as grain carriers because they also did a passenger and general traffic business. I think it is an important fact to be noted, that during the eighteen years of operation of the new Welland canal prior to the completion of the fourteen foot through channel to Montreal, no vessel of the Welland canal size was built for this route, and that the new Welland canal merely served to accommodate the large American propellors already on the lakes. The reports show that during the entire eighteen years up to 1900, the Welland traffic never once reached the level which it had attained prior to the commencement of the enlargement. In 1873 the traffic on the Welland canal amounted to 1,506,484 tons. During the enlargement it fell off to 686,506 tons in 1881, or less than one-half of what it had been before the enlargement was commenced. When the enlarged Welland canal was opened for traffic the United States coasting trade through it increased from 179,605 tons in 1880, to 653,213 tons in 1896, or nearly four times what it had been. But on the other hand the Canadian traffic continued very light, and in 1901 and 1902 the second and third years of operation of the fourteen foot through channel, the total traffic was only 629,209 tons, and 665,387 tons respectively; the combined traffic for the two years being over 200,000 less than that for the single year of 1873. The traffic increased, of course, but it was not until 1907 that it attained its proportions of 1873. The total traffic for the several years is as follows:

	Tons.
1907	1,614,132
1908	1,703,453
1909	2,025,921
1910	2,326,290
1911	2,537,629

This shows conclusively that no benefit was derived by Canada from that work until after the completion of the through fourteen foot channel to Montreal. The figures which I have just quoted confirm the view that the only effect of the Welland canal enlargement would be to permit the present enormous fleet of American boats on the great lakes to come down to lake Ontario in competition with our own Canadian fleet and naturally to our disadvantage. This view is expressed by the Dominion Marine Association, as outlined in the following paragraph, which appeared in their annual report in January, 1910:

In view of the existing division of opinion and the belief on the part of some members of the association that the building of the new Welland canal would bring heavy United States tonnage into competition with the Canadian tonnage for which the present canal is adapted, this association has not been officially represented at the hearing of any of the delegations which have met the Government this year to urge the commencement of the undertaking, and your counsel, when he has apeared has done so on behalf of the Kingston Board of Trade.

Then, there is the question of return cargoes. Apart from these results from the former enlargement of the Welland canal, my conclusions are based on the comparative conditions with regard to obtaining return cargoes on lake Ontario, and other facts. Large sized Canadian vessels bringing grain down to Kingston and Prescott will have no source of return cargo beyond those which are now enjoyed by the present fleet. Taking the question of water-borne traffic of Canadian ports on lake Ontario. I may point out that this traffic is very small and there are no resources on the lakes in Canadian territory to create any new traffic. Then, as to the water-borne traffic of the great lakes, this is a highly specialized trade, and practically ninety-seven per cent of it consists of iron ore, coal, lumber, grain, and pulpwood. Taking into consideration the question as to some of the lake ports on the Canadian side, let me refer to the report of the Toronto Harbour Commissioners for 1910, which gives the receipts for the port of Toronto through the Welland canal as follows:

Soft coal, 34,330 tons; grain, 1,230 bushels; oil, 103,535 barrels.

In that year Toronto's total coal receipts by all routes amounted to 1,230,127 tons of which less than 35,000 tons or less than three per cent came through the Welland canal. Yet, Sir, the strongest opposition to the Georgian Bay canal comes from that section of the country. The total grain traffic in 1910 through the Welland canal was 1,023,500 tons of which Toronto received the large amount of 37 tons. These figures indicate what little direct interest Toronto has in either the coal trade or the grain trade of the Welland canal, the grain trade, forming sixty-five per cent of the eastbound trade of the canal and forty-four per cent of its total traffic. The shipments by water from the port of Toronto are not published in the Harbour Commissioners' report but the traffic department of the Canadian Manufacturers Association says that they are insignificant in quantity. This is borne out by the fact that in 1910 the entire revenue of the port of Toronto from harbour dues was only $7,320. Notwithstanding this, Montreal's portion of business through the same canals during 1910, amounted to some two and three-quarter million tons. With an enlarged Welland canal of say twenty-four or twenty-five feet is there any sound reason for believing that Toronto would benefit very materially, judging by the figures which I have just cited. The only other port on the lake for which I have been able to obtain figures is the port of Belleville and in 1910 the exports by water from Belleville were 13,000 shingles, 1,121 tons of merchandise, and 1,754 tons of cheese, most of which went eastward. The figures for Kingston are not available, but practically all the westbound freight from that point came through from Montreal and most of the grain vessels discharging at that port go West light. It is safe to say that the enlargement of the Welland canal will create practically no new westbound trade from Canadian ports on lake Ontario. The only advantage to be derived by Canadian shippers will be the saving in cost of carriage of grain from the head of the lakes in vessels of say 3,000 tons as compared with that of carriage in vessels of 1,500 tons. On the other hand, the large American freighters will gain very substantial advantages over those which they at the present time enjoy. For instance the American vessels carrying Canadian grain from Fort Wiliam to Oswego, instead of to Buffalo, will discharge their grain at a point ninety miles nearer New York by rail. If the cargo is to be transferred to barges for cariage by the Erie canal to New York, it will gain whatever is saved by a reduction of 148 miles of canal carriage, as it is only 204 miles by the Erie canal to the Hudson river from Oswego, as against 352 miles from Buffalo. Taking for instance the rate of canalling as three miles an hour, this represents a saving of 49 hours on each trip between the lakes and New York; or at four miles an hour a saving of 37 hours, in other words a net saving of from 24 to 36 hours on each cargo on the way to New York. If the American freighter goes on down to Ogdensburg, it will be within 400 miles of Boston and Portland, and can secure from New England points a large return trade in package freight. It may be argued that a Canadian vessel can go to American ports for return cargoes of coal. Both American and Canadian vessels carry large quantities of coal westward from Lake Erie points. The soft coal or bituminous coal areas lie south of lake Erie and the shipping points for this coal are Cleveland, Ashtabula and other ports on the south side of the lake. The anthracite or hard coal area lies south of Oswego; Buffalo is the main point of shipment for anthracite coal, about 3,000,000 tons a year having been shipped from that point. When the Welland canal is enlarged American freighters can descend to lake Ontario, and the result will be the transfer of a large share of the west-bound anthracite shipments from Buffalo to Oswego, which is ninety miles nearer by rail to Scranton, a common point on the way out from the mines. Even with the disadvantage of being obliged to use vessels of Welland canal size, Oswego shipped in 1910, 200,000 tons of anthracite coal westward. American grain boats discharging grain at Oswego can therefore load a full return cargo of anthracite coal. On the other hand, Canadian boats will to a large extent be debarred from this trade. The bulk of the Canadian imports on the upper lakes is soft coal. In 1911 the amount of hard coal carried through the Sault canal to Canadian ports was only 189,383 tons, while soft coal carried amounted to 1,770,442 tons; thus while American boats coming down to lake Ontario will be able to secure full cargoes of anthracite coal, most of the Canadian boats will have to go back light at least as far as lake Erie points for a return cargo of soft coal. So that whether you look at the comparative conditions for carriage of eastbound freight to the coast or the securing of return cargoes on lake Ontario, the competitive advantages of American vessels would appear to be very greatly increased by their being able to come down to lake Ontario, while Canadian vessels would find their conditions very much the same as they are at the present time. There appears to be only one solution to the question of increasing our Canadian waterborne trade. That to my mind is to construct a through waterway from the lakes to the seaboard in the shortest possible time, such that the largest vessels on the lakes, if necessary, can go to tide water without breaking bulk. At the present time there are two proposals; one is the enlargement of the present St. Lawrence canal system, and the other is the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. With regard to the first proposal, there are many serious obstacles to carrying out this work, both as to completing it within a reasonable time and as to the question of international entanglements. It seems that from a discussion which took place before the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers some two years ago, there is no definite information with regard to the cost of improving the St Lawrence river. On page 319 of the transactions of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, volume 25, part I, I find the following:

A discussion was introduced by Mr. Henry Holgate of Montreal with regard to the upper St. Lawrence river, and the following resolution was moved: That the council of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers be requested to take up and study the suggestions made that the Dominion Government be urged to make a study of the river St. Lawrence and its possibilities, and that a comprehensive report be submitted before any commitment be made by the Government for the damming of the river St. Lawrence at any points, or the carrying out of any other great scheme of canal transportation; and that the council be requested to take this matter up, and if advisable to make a report to the Dominion Government.

You will notice one clause there which says:

Or the carrying out of any other great scheme of canal transportation.

The result was that the discussion drifted into the claims of the Georgian Bay canal as compared with the St. Lawrence and the Welland route. Mr. St. George of Montreal, a member of the society and a prominent engineer, stated that the words, 'Or the carrying out of any other great scheme of canal transportation' should be expunged, as the society agreed as to the necessity of a survey of the St. Lawrence, but its interference in any great national question might be unwise. The result was that the resolution was moved to be reconsidered; and I do not think has ever come up at any subsequent meeting of the society. The late Mr. George Y. Wisner, who during his lifetime was one of the most prominent hydraulic engineers in the United States stated before a committee of the Canadian Senate that a water-way via the St. Lawrence, equal to the proposed Georgian Bay canal would cost twice as much as the latter project.

In dealing with the St. Lawrence waterways question, two plans have been submitted for consideration. One is to enlarge the St. Lawrence canals by means of heavy embankments and cuttings on the mainland, and the second is to raise the water levels by dams across the river, and create slack water stretches similar to those proposed on the Gorgian bay canal route. With regard to the first plan, it seems to me it is not in any way feasible. There are, as we all know, very large rapids in the section between Prescott and Cornwall; there are over 23 miles of canal in this section alone, with swift river stretches not safely navigable by large vessels. For the most part we are confined to cuttings, through the main land, or embankments along the river, whereas the Americans, holding all the principal islands, can obtain deep water on their side by placing dams between these islands and overcoming changes of level by locks.

The second scheme, which is the one suggested by Mr. Henry Holgate, of Montreal, and by General Bixby, Chief of the United States Army Engineers, is that of constructing dams to drown out the rapids and create slack water stretches similar to those proposed on the Ottawa river. These dams would necessarily be much larger, and consequently more costly, and the character of the shores and of the river at the rapids is not nearly so favourable as on the Ottawa. Another objection to this plan would be the international character of the river, especially between Prescott and Cornwall, where very large rapids would have to be overcome, and, consequently, international dams constructed. That being the case, the United States would be joint owner of the waterpowers and navigation development, and should, therefore, contribute its share to the cost of the necessary works. Should this take place, it would have the effect of making the entire St. Lawrence-Welland canal route an international one—a route on which Canada has spent $80,000,000 of her own money. Article 26 of the Treaty of Washington of 1871 provides as follows:

Navigation of the river St. Lawrence ascending and decending from the 45th parallel of north lattitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

By an article of the same treaty, the United States is given equal rights with Canada in respect of the Welland canal. It must, therefore, be agreed that control of the avenues of trade between the Canadian Northwest and the Atlantic seaboard cannot be shared with a foreign nation, but that Canada ought to maintain sole control. The principle laid down by the Toronto Board of Trade in this regard seems to be a most feasible and logical one It is as follows:

It is essential to the commercial independence of Canada, perhaps pre-requisite to the preservation of the political union of the provinces that we shall have within our own boundaries, and subject to no control but our own, the means of transporting the products of every part of our country to every other part, and also that we shall maintain all Canadian routes by which the produce of all the provinces may reach the world's markets.

It would therefore be much more advantageous for Canada to open a through waterway from the Ottawa river to the seaboard, and retain our present control of the St. Lawrence-Welland canal system—giving us the benefit of the possession of two alternative routes under our absolute control—than to depend entirely on an international waterway along the border, under international control. Canadians have recently, and with no uncertain voice, decided that it is esential for Canada to retain full control of the commerce between the provinces of the Dominion and to maintain a national policy with regard to our tariff instead of entering into a reciprocal agreement with our neighbours to the south. And it is, to my mind, also essential to have a strictly independent national transportation policy, devoted to building up the East and West trade within our own borders. The Georgian bay canal project will, if consummated, furnish a route entirely free from international entanglements, and will ensure Canadian trade to Canadian vessels and Canadian ports.

Mr. George W. Stephens, ex-Chairman of the Montreal Harbour Commission, has stated:

> I believe if all Canadians concentrate on the Georgian Bay canal and build it, our American friends would be forced to build the enlarged Welland canal. We ought to all work for the integrity of our Canadian water transportation, and not do anything that will help to divert our export and import business through foreign ports.

It must be admitted that if the St. Lawrence-Welland system of canals is to be dealt with at all, it must be dealt with as a whole—that no half-way measures will be effective. More than three-quarters of the entire Welland canal traffic of Canada passes through the St. Lawrence canals, and either section without the other will therefore be of little or no benefit to Canada. As was stated by the Minister of Railways and Canals last session, the Welland enlargement involves the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals as well.

I wish to point out one or two of the advantages to be derived from the building of the Georgian Bay canal. Mr. W. F. Tye of Montreal, a prominent engineer, pointed out in the discussion to which I referred, in regard to the improvement of the St. Lawrence system, that the development of power in the future especially will be much more important to Canada than the development of transportation. He pointed out that our American neighbours had been very extravagant and wasteful in connection with the development of their natural resources. He showed that the method of coal mining in the Appalachian basin had been most extravagant and that the fuel in that section of the United States was within measurable distance of being exhausted. The United States Geological Survey says that for every ton of coal mined in the United States at least one and a half tons have been left in the ground; the lowest and easiest seams have been mined first and the consequence is that the roof and floors of the upper seams have been destroyed owing to disturbances. Mr. Tye points out that the waste of natural gas in the Appalachian basin has been even greater than the waste in connection with coal mining. The result, he states, is that the great supply of natural gas fuel in Pennsylvania and the whole United States is within a measurable period of exhaustion. Some authorities estimate that the coal will not last over 100 years. Then there is the question of the high-grade iron ores. These are rapidly becoming diminished. Dr. Allerton I Cushman, director of the Bureau of Industrial Research at Washington, estimates that these high-grade ores will be exhausted within thirty years. Therefore, with the depreciation of the high-grade iron ores in the United States and the increase in the cost of coal which must result from the waste of the easily mined seams, the great advantages possessed by Pittsburg and the Ohio Valley as a manufacturing centre will disappear and with the loss of these advantages will come Canada's opportunity. Mr. Tye points out that it is conservatively estimated that the Ottawa and its tributaries will give 3,000,000 horse-power, equivalent in power development to the mining of 40,000,000 tons of coal per annum. Water-power, unlike coal, can never be exhausted, and with the rapid depletion of coal and iron and with the enormous power of the Ottawa and the great deposits of low-grade iron in the Ottawa Valley, it is easily possible that in years to come the great manufacturing centre of this continent may be transferred from the Ohio Valley to the Ottawa. For such reasons as this the construction of the Georgian Bay canal is a national necessity. Mr. Tye also refers to the question of water powers on the St. Lawrence river. He admits that they are very extensive, but he also points out the fact that one-half of the power developed there would belong to our neighbours to the south.

Opponents of the Georgian bay project contend that there would not be sufficient water on the summit-level to operate the locks. Two schemes are proposed, namely, to make the present summit-level, which includes lake Talon, lake Turtle, and Trout lake, the summit-level of the canal. This is called the high summit-level. The other project is called the low summit-level. That involves using lake Nipissing as the summit-level. I need only refer to the report of the Government engineers with regard to the quantity of water supply at the high summit-level. They point out that by tapping certain bodies of water in the neighbourhood of the summit-level a supply sufficient to provide for 54 lockages, equal to 45,365,000 tons of freight per annum, is available. With regard to the second project, that is making Lake Nipissing the summit-level, there is an inexhaustible supply of water. Lake Nipissing has a drainage area of 4,077 square miles and a water area of over 300 square miles with a low-water discharge of 3,600 cubic feet per second. That is equal to 164 lockages per day for the passage of one vessel or sufficient for five sets of locks side by side, with 137,760,000 tons of traffic per annum. The only objection which might be raised to the second scheme, that is the adoption of lake Nipissing for the summit-level, is the extra cost, which is estimated at $12,000,000. On the other hand, it would obviate the necessity of an extra lock at the east end of the summit-level and an extra lock at the west end of the summit-level and consequently the cost and maintenance of these two extra locks. Personally, in looking over the merits of the two summit-levels, I would strongly recommend that when the canal is built the lake Nipissing level should be made the summit, and if that is done it will ensure a sufficient quantity of water for canal purposes for all time to come.

With regard to the bends and curves on the route, it has also been argued that the number of bends and turns on this route would impede navigation and that while the route is some 300 miles shorter than via the great lakes and the St. Lawrence the saving in time of transit would be very small as compared with the St Lawrence route.

Let us assume for a moment that this argument has some merit. Let us assume also that a vessel entering the canal would lower its speed. What would be the result? Its consumption of fuel would naturally be lessened, that is, it would be much smaller that than of a vessel endeavouring to shorten its time on the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence route. Some other items of expense would also be less. It is a well known fact however that the consumption of fuel varies nearly as the cube of speed, or in other words, double the speed requires eight times the quantity of fuel. The extent of this saving therefore, is very apparent; otherwise, as the St. Lawrence and Welland canal route is on the round trip 564 miles longer than the Georgian bay canal route, we would be facing the fallacy that a vessel could haul freight 564 miles for nothing. It is the round trip that should be considered, because it is necessary to complete the commercial exchange. As a matter of fact however, there are five miles more curvature on the Welland and St. Lawrence systems than on the Georgian bay canal system. In 449 miles of the proposed route of the Georgian bay canal there are only sixty-nine miles of curves or fifteen and a half per cent of its total length which would affect navigation as against seventy-four miles of curves affecting navigation on the Welland and St. Lawrence route. It could also be argued that the longer stretches on the lakes are a source of delay especially during the fall months, due to the prevalence of fogs and high winds. These impediments to navigation would not be apparent on the Georgian bay canal route.

There is another important point in connection with the construction of this canal, mentioned by my hon. friend from Wright, the effect of opening up a large area of new country where there are inexhaustible resources. My hon. friend referred to the question of Nova Scotia coal. This, it seems to me, would be an important factor in connection with the return cargo. It has been argued that in connection with this project there would practically be no return cargo. I think I have pointed out pretty conclusively that so far as the Welland and St. Lawrence routes are concerned, the return cargo is made up almost entirely of the coal traffic, and when we consider the amount of coal which has been carried from the United States into this country, it seems to me that we should endeavour to build up our own industries and not the industries of the republic to the south of us.

I have here some figures which I secured from the Department of Customs with regard to the imports of coal during the years 1910, 1911 and 1912. I will refer simply to the question of bituminous coal, because, as we all know, up to the present time at least, we have not found any anthracite coal deposits in eastern Canada. In 1910 there was imported from the United States 8,069,424 tons of bituminous coal to the value of $14,498,656. In 1911 8,581,691 tons, valued at $16,208,576; in 1912 11,170,350 tons equivalent to $21,425,223; or taking the anthracite coal imports for the last year and including them. I find that altogether there was some $40,000,000 worth of coal imported from the United States into Canada during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1912. Then, as I have stated, we have immense coal deposits in Nova Scotia, immense iron deposits along the north shore of lake Superior, and immense pulpwood tracts along the Ottawa, as well as large areas of hardwood, all of which would form important sources of traffic for this route. The Ottawa valley has been the chief source of pine lumber. While this particular wood is gradually becoming depleted, the lumber industry of this district will for many years to come be an important factor. I need only refer to a matter which came under my own personal knowledge. In the town of Pembroke last year the mills there sawed some fifty odd million feet of lumber. A considerable quantity of our lumber is exported, and naturally water carriage would be a much cheaper means of shipment than rail, as at present. Therefore, It would seems to me that in view of the many resources which are to be found in that locality and in view of the return cargoes of coal which we could get from Nova Scotia, so far as the question of securing trade for the route is concerned, it would be a very easy matter.

There are many other points to which I would like to refer, but before concluding I would like to refer to the work which has been done by the federated boards of trade and municipalities in endeavouring to point out the advantages of the Georgian Bay canal route. This is an organization which was formed a few years ago, and it comprises representatives from boards of trade as far west as Calgary and as far east as Prince Edward Island. The secretary of this organization, Mr. J. A. Forward, has been an indefatigable worker in securing data and placing the advantages of this route before the public, and I desire to pay a tribute to the good work which Mr. Forward has done in that connection. I have here some resolutions which have not already been placed before the minister, and I would like to send these to the Minister of Public Works in order that he may have an opportunity of looking over them. I have, amongst other papers, a telegram from D. J. McDonald, of Sydney Mines, N.S., dated March 13, 1912, just prior to the time the deputation waited upon the present Government in connection with this project. It is as follows:

Resolved, that town council, town of Sydney Mines, Representing some 8,000 people, heartily concur with all parties endorsing early construction of the Georgian Bay canal. We feel that it would be in the best interests of the whole of Canada, more particularly the Sydneys in which we are particularly interested, making it possible for the products of our mines and steel industries to be brought to our great Canadian markets by a shorter water route. At the same time we would ask that the Government retain for the people of Canada the water power developed on the Ottawa river.

(Sgd.) D. J. McDONALD, Town Clerk.

In conclusion, I would like to impress upon the Government the need of commencing the construction of this work at the earliest possible moment. I know that the Minister of Public Works has been looking into this question very thoroughly because I have had occasion to speak to him with regard to the matter. He is a good business man and I feel convinced that he will find this a good business proposition. I therefore hope that within a very short time the Government will see their way clear to commence the construction of this great work.

Mr. E. PROULX (Prescott): As my hon. friend from Wright and my hon. friend from North Renfrew have gone very fully into the details of the question with respect to the Georgian Bay canal, I shall detain the House but a very short time with the few observations which I have to make upon the subject. The country is awaiting with great anxiety a declaration of policy on the part of the Government with regard to this important work. It was the intention of the late Government to have commenced the construction of this canal in the near future, or as soon as the revenues of the country would permit, and, as the revenues of the country have largely increased within the past few years, the people are of the opinion that the Government would be warranted in making a beginning. Last year the Government asked for a vote of $100,000 to commence dredging in the French river. I do not know what work has been done but I certainly expected to see a large amount placed in the estimates this year to begin work of constructing the canal. I am very much disappointed to see that there is no special vote in the estimates which were tabled in the House this afternoon for this work, whilst there is an item of $2,000,000 for the Welland canal. There is an item of over $1,000,000 for canals generally; I do not know whether it includes the Georgian Bay canal—I hope so. There has been an impression created lately that the Government are not very favourable to the building of a canal and that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is not very enthusiastic over the project. I hope the impression is false and I hope that the hon. Minister of Public Works will be able tonight to dispel that idea. Rumour has it that the Government intend to improve the navigation of the French river and lake Nipissing up to North Bay, and to make North Bay the point of distribution or, in other words, a Canadian Buffalo. They propose to have the grain unloaded in North Bay and then let the railways take it and carry it to Montreal or the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. ROGERS: I never heard of such a proposition as that which the hon. gentleman suggests now.

Mr. PROULX: My hon. friend may not have heard of it, but I have heard it. It has been rumoured in North Bay itself. It is quite legitimate for the Minister of Railways and Canals to dream of making North Bay a great city and a great port, but I do not think it is a substitute for the all-water route which the country wants. The objection to the Welland canal is that the St. Lawrence route cannot be made navigable for large freighters, while the Georgian Bay canal, with a width of 200 feet and a depth of 22 feet, can be made navigable for large freighters and there would be no unloading. Grain would be shipped by vessels from terminal to terminal. I do not intend to go very fully into the details as we are all familiar with them. This question has come up in the House in previous sessions and the newspapers have published so much with regard to it that the country is familiar with the important details. The area of the industrial and agricultural district affected by the transportation system of the great lakes is that stretch of country having its apex at Chicago and St. Louis in the United States and at Fort William and Port Arthur in Canada, stretching back to the west and the northwest, covering an area of over 1,250,000 square miles and comprising the states of Michigan, Indiana, Missouri, Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Dakotas, and the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and part of New Ontario in Canada. It has a population of 26,400,000, while ten years ago it had only 22,600,000. It is the finest grain growing country in the world, and in 1909 produced 3,386,000,000 bushels of wheat, barley, oats, corn and rye. It is the distribution of a portion of this grain, together with the movement of iron ore, that has given the impulse to lake shipping which has brought it to its present magnitude and perfection of economical transportation.

A glance at the map will show the present position of this trade. The points of assemblage for this enormous traffic are: In the United States, on the one hand Kansas city and St. Louis, and on the other Chicago, Milwaukee and Duluth; and in Canada at Winnipeg, Fort William and Port Arthur. In these centres the grain is sorted, cleaned, classified and prepared for shipment, and from them it is sent for export either south to the gulf ports of New Orleans and Galveston, or east to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Portland and Montreal, or to immediate points for distribution in the densely populated areas of the east.

With regard to the export of wheat, we see that in 1899 there was shipped by New Orleans and Galveston 26,038,000 bushels and in 1909, only 4,826,000 bushels. At the Atlantic ports, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Portland, in 1899, there were shipped 49,302,000 bushels and in 1909, 59,495,000 bushels, while from Montreal, St. John and Halifax there were shipped in 1899, 9,852,000 bushels, and in 1909 21,160,000 bushels. These figures show that the gross totals in each year are practically the same but that the exports from the gulf ports have decreased and those from the Canadian ports have increased to a remarkable extent. This route has the advantage over the St. Lawrence route that it would be an all-water route, and as my hon. friend from Renfrew has said, it would be free from international entanglements, and it would probably force the United States to change their project of enlarging the Erie canal into building a canal by way of lake Champlain. The cost of this work is estimated at about $150,000,000 and the revenue is estimated at about $8,000,000 per annum It is estimated that 16,000,000 tons would pass through this canal the first year of its operation and at a toll of 50 cents a ton that would give a revenue of $8,000,000. If we put the cost of maintenance at $1,000,000 per year, there would still be left $7,000,000 to pay the interest on the cost of construction which would be equal to four and two-thirds per cents on an outlay of $150,000,000. This is apart from any revenue which would accrue in due course from the sale of hydro-electric power. It is well known that very valuable water power is to be found on the route of the canal and that there are great possibilities in the forest wealth and the mineral wealth in the country contiguous to it. If this work is commenced to-day it is practically certain that at the time the canal is opened in ten years hence the very modest estimate of traffic used in the above calculation will have materially increased. With the same tolls every extra one million tons would give another $500,000 per annum revenue or about three-tenths of one per cent. on the capital cost. I shall not detain the House longer but I do hope that Parliament will soon be favoured with a declaration of policy from the Government and that we will know whether it is the intention of the Government to commence this work in the near future.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very able and exhaustive speeches by the members for Wright and Renfrew, I shall not enter into the subject at any length to-night; but I desire to answer some of the objections that have been advanced as regards the feasibility and the desirability of building this canal. The hon. member for Prescott will pardon me if I do not follow him in the remarks he has made, but I notice he is somewhat more insistent on having a declaration of policy from the present Government than he was in having a declaration from the late Government in spite of the fact that Mr. Pugsley, former Minister of Public Works, and the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, former Premier, had said that this would be the next great work undertaken in Canada if they were continued in power. This is no new project. Surveys for such a canal were made as far back as 1839 and various surveys have been made from that time up to the present. We find that the reports of the engineers were on every occasion favorable to the construction of this great work. We find also that the Americans, through some of their best engineers, have been strongly of the opinion that this work was not only feasible but could be constructed at a very moderate cost compared with the great utility it would be to the continent of America. We have the report of the commission appointed by the United States Government for the improvement of the Erie canal, wherein they state that if Canada goes ahead with this work it will place the grain-carrying trade of the American continent almost entirely in the hands of Canadians. There has been a mistake made in the past and even up to the present time in naming this the Georgian Bay canal. As a matter of fact, according to the survey sent out by the late Government (who by the way made a very exhaustive report at a cost of about one and a quarter million dollars) the total distance to be canalled does not exceed twenty-eight miles, and there are some thirty-five miles of river to be improved, curves straightened and so on. It is stated that the balance of this long waterway is entirely navigable, and as most members of the House know, a greater portion of this distance is through lakes, many of them miles wide and entirely free from any obstruction of any kind. The objection has also been raised—and I think the hon. member for North Renfrew has answered it more fully than I can—that there would be dangerous bends and obstructions in the streams included in this canal, but those who have been over the route know perfectly well that there is no greater difficulty in navigating any portion of this waterway than there is in navigating into the Sault canal and Detriot river at the present time. The curves are just as dangerous there as they would be in any portion of the so-called Georgian Bay canal. Another objection that has been raised by those opposed to the scheme is that this canal would freeze up somewhere about July, or August, or September or October or something of that kind, but coming as I do from that part of the country I know perfectly well that these waters are open long after the Sault canal is closed and that on the average they are open two weeks after navigation has ceased in the harbour of Montreal. It has been stated by the engineers of the Government in their report on the general survey of this canal, that the water supply would be sufficient for 29 lockages each way per day. Take it even on a very much smaller basis; assume for the sake of argument there was not that supply of water, and suppose we could have ten lockages per day of a vessel of 1,000 tons carrying about 300,000 bushels of grain, the result would be that with only the ten lockages there would pass through that canal grain equal to 3,000 carloads or 100 trains of thirty cars each. If on the other hand we could carry on thirty lockages per day we find it would be equal to 300 trains per day or about twelve trains of thirty cars each per hour. There is also this to be considered: that 1,000,000 hydraulic horse-power would be developed. When we remember that the great city of Minneapolis, the flour milling centre of the world, derives its greatness entirely from the fact that it has water-power from the river it is located on, when we remember that all the grain must be taken by cars to Minneapolis and the flour carried to the seaboard on trains, we can see how great the advantage would be if a vessel carrying two or three hundred thousand bushels of grain could tie up at or near one of these great water-powers on the canal and inside of twenty-four hours replace her cargo of grain with a cargo of flour and continue her voyage with that same grain manufactured into flour. This is no dream; it is entirely possible and feasible, if this great work is carried on. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for North Renfrew, we have immense timber resources which are lying idle, and portions of which are being almost daily burned; these would be rendered available by the opening up of this canal. It has also been pointed out that by the opening up of the canal, western Ontario ports as far west as Port Arthur and Fort William would be a market for the coal of our eastern provinces. There is one small port in my own riding which imported this year upwards of 500,000 tons of soft coal. If this canal were an accomplished fact, I have no doubt that every pound of that coal could be brought as cheaply and more cheaply to the point of consumption by the canal, and could be brought from Canadian mines. This coal of which I speak has to be taken by rail eighty to a hundred and eighty miles after it is landed at the Georgian Bay port. In this way we find that the building of this canal would be of benefit to almost all classes in Canada and to almost all sections of Canada. It is not local in any sense of the word; it is not a canal or a work being built for the benefit of the constituency of North Renfrew, or for the benefit of the county of Wright; but it is a work that would benefit almost every constituency in the Dominion of Canada. The hon. member for North Renfrew has also pointed out very exhaustively that at the present time we have about one hundred small boats navigating the great lakes. There is a reason for that, as has already been stated by the hon. member. If, on the other hand, we had a canal entirely through Canadian territory on which we could control the tolls ourselves, or in other words on which we could give a benefit to the Canadian shipper, is it not reasonable to suppose that our merchant marine upon the great lakes would vastly increase? The result would be that our grain from the West and our coal from the East would be carried in Canadian instead of in foreign bottoms, as they are at the present time. I am very firmly of the belief that the time for the construction of this great water-way is the present. As has been pointed out, it will take ten or perhaps more years in building. In this regard, I might just state that there is a difference between this water-way and most others, in that as soon as is commenced, it will be of some benefit. I know something about that section between Georgian bay and lake Nipissing. I listened very closely to what the hon. member for Prescott had to say in that regard, and I want to point out to him that possibly the greatest Minister of Public Works who ever sat under his esteemed leader, the late Hon. Mr. Tarte, of Montreal, was very strongly of the opinion that the canal should be commenced immediately and completed as far as lake Nipissing at least, until they found out the feasibility of the rest of it. The building of the canal, the opening of the French river as far as lake Nipissing, will give to Canada at a very small cost many additional ports; it will give grain routes very much shorter than we have at the present time, by any of the ports through which we carry our grain to Montreal, and in that way even the commencement of the canal will be a benefit to Canada as a whole. If the canal was started simultaneously from both ends, it is not reasonable to suppose that the opening of the canal between Ottawa and Montreal would be a benefit to Canada? It is quite clear to me that the commencement of the water-way, if it is done at the present time, will be of immediate benefit, without the necessity of waiting for the entire completion of the work. I was pleased to see the estimate of $500,000 for the French river end of the canal, or for the French river, which I presume amounts to the same thing. I only desire that the Government, between now and the end of the session, may see its way clear to add greatly to that amount.

Personally I have no desire to knock the Welland canal. I think that because we are advocating the building of the Georgian Bay canal, we should also be quite willing to allow these other works to go forward. As has been very ably pointed out by my hon. friend from North Renfrew, the deepening of the Welland canal at the present time will benefit American and not Canadian ports. As far as the city of Toronto is concerned there is absolutely no use of deepening the Welland canal to 24 feet, because the harbour of the city of Toronto has only about twelve feet of water as an average, and any boat which can go into the city of Toronto at the present time can very easily go through the Welland canal. The same is true of almost all the ports on the Canadian side. I think some of the ports east of Toronto have probably only about nine feet of water as a rule. The only port to be materially benefited will be the port of Ogdensburg on the American side. Another objection to the Welland canal is that it is entirely free to the American shipper. We have no special advantages in that water-way, although it may cost $50,000,000 to build; the Americans have the same rights as we have, and must have them according to the treaty we have at the present time. I am not an alarmist; but as has been already pointed out by the hon. member for Wright, it is more or less exposed and lies along the international boundary. Besides that we have this to think of, that the deepening of the Welland canal, the deepening of the whole St. Lawrence system will develop nothing new in Canada; it may increase our facilities at the same time that it increases American facilities for carrying grain; but it will open no new territory, develop nothing new at any port of Canada, and as I pointed out before, until the St. Lawrence canals are deepened to the same length, it will benefit the Americans and the Americans only The Georgian Bay canal will be a Canadian canal entirely. As the right hon. the leader of the Opposition said, it will be built, owned and manned by Canadians; it will benefit the Canadian farmer in the West; it will benefit the Canadian miner in the East; it will benefit the Canadian lumberman and the manufacturers throughout Ontario. It will develop, as I said before, 1,000,000 horse-power which is to-day idle, and which is passing entirely unused over the waterfalls of that northern country. It will build up industries throughout Canada, and I believe that it will make Canada entirely independent of the carrying trade of our neighbours to the south.

Mr. AMES: I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. OLIVER: If the debate is now adjourned, the motion goes down on the Order Paper and probably will not be reached again this session. I understand that is the rule at the present time. I believe that the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals would like very much to have something to say in regard to this motion, and if by any means, by consent of the House or otherwise, it would be possible to adjourn the debate and allow the motion to occupy its place on the Order Paper, so that those who have not spoken—the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals included —would have an opportunity of doing so, it would be very much in the interests of all concerned.

Mr. ROGERS: I think it is not necessary to adopt any special rule as to the placing of the motion in any particular place on the Order Paper. I am aware of the fact that when the opportunity presents itself, the hon. member for South Renfrew and others wish to say something in connection with the Georgian Bay canal. I may say to my hon. friend that as Minister of Public Works I desire to avail myself of an early opportunity of saying something in connection with this great national undertaking, and as far as the Government is concerned, it will be pleased at an early date to bring this matter before the House for further discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule of the House in regard to a matter of this kind would prevent its being placed on the Order Paper, but the Government could, of course, call it up at any time it might desire to do so.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand the Minister of Public Works assures the House it will be called up at a later date.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

UNOPPOSED AND UNDISCUSSED MOTIONS.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, papers and documents relative to the disimssal of Captain Lyons, of the dredge Northumberland, and the appointment of his successor.—Mr. Macdonald.

For a copy of all papers in connection with the withdrawal from settlement of a strip of land one mile in width along the line of the Hudson Bay railway, and of the Order in Council, and also of all plans and correspondence in connection with the same, prior and subsequent thereto.—Mr. Graham.

For a copy of all Orders in Council, and of all letters, telegrams, complaints, petitions and of all other documents of any kind, in the possession of the Government, or of any department or official thereof, in any way relating to or concerning the dismissal of Dr. Clarence T. Campbell, post office inspector of London, Ontario.—Mr. Ross.

For a copy of all Orders in Council, letters, telegrams, reports, petitions and other papers and documents in the possession of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or any department of the Government, relating to the granting of licenses to pack lobsters, and bearing date between January 1, 1912, and January 25, 1913.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and other papers and documents received from the offices of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees by the Department of Labour, or the Department of Railways and Canals, between the 1st day of January, 1912, and the 25th day of January, 1913, relating to investigations and dismissals of employees for political partisanship, and of the replies thereto.—Mr. Sinclair.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Alex. Matheson, postmaster at Boulardarie, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the dismissal of Mrs. A. J. McKay, postmistress, at Cape Dauphin, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and of the evidence taken and reports of the investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to the same, with a detailed statement of expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Dan Dunlop, postmaster at New Campbellton, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of the investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to same, with a detailed statement of expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all charges, correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of Roderick Bain, boatman at New Campbellton, riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, N.S., and of the evidence taken and reports of the investigation held by H. P. Duchemin, in regard to same, with a detailed statement of expenses of such investigation.—Mr. McKenzie.

For a copy of all letters, petitions, telegrams, complaints, communications, reports and other papers and documents, received since the first day of October, 1911, by, and now in the possession of the Department of Railways and Canals, the Government Railway Managing Board or any official of the Intercolonial railway or of the Prince Edward Island railway, relating to or in any manner appertaining to an application for, or a proposed reduction of, the working hours for the Intercolonial railway employees at Moncton, or at any other point of the Intercolonial railway or the Prince Edward Island railway.—Mr. Emmerson.

For a return showing in detail the number of dismissals from public offices and positions of emolument by the present Government since the first day of October, 1911, to this date, in the county of Westmorland, New Brunswick, in connection with any of the departments of the public service; together with the names of the dismissed officials or employees, the reason for their respective dismissals, the complaints or charges against them, and by whom made, save and except the case of George H. Cochrane, collector of customs at Moncton (the papers for which have been already moved for); together with a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other communications with respect to each such case of dismissal, and of all minutes of evidence of investigations, where any such were held, and of all reports relating to such dismissals now in the possession of any of the departments of Government, or of the Government Railways Managing Board, or of the officials of the Intercolonial and the Prince Edward Island railways; also the names of all parties appointed to fill the vacancies caused by such dismissals, and the names of the persons by whom the same have been respectively recommended for appointment; together with a detailed statement of all amounts and expenses paid by any department in connection with the said dismissals and investigations or removals from office.—Mr. Emmerson.

For a return showing how many postmasters and other post office employees were removed from office respectively from the 1st of July, 1896, to the 1st of October, 1911, and the number in each province; and from the 10th of October, 1911, up to date, with the number in each province; also the number of post offices in operation in each provinue on the 1st July, 1896.—Mr. Rainville.

For a return showing the number of applicants for Fenian raid bounty, the names and addresses of the applicants, the names of those to whom the grant has been made, and of those to whom it has been refused, with the reasons for the refusal, and a copy of the regulations under which said Act is being applied.—Mr. Macdonald.

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, reports and other documents in the possession of the Department of Railways and Canals relating to an application by the Central Railway Company of Canada to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals for the approval of their proposed route between Hawkesbury and South Indian.—Mr. Proulx.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the dismissal of William Bow, postmaster at Winchester village, county of Dundas, and of all recommendations for the appointment of his successor.—Mr. MacNutt.

For a copy of all telegrams, letters and other documents passing between the Government of Canada, or any member thereof, and the Government of the province of Saskatchewan, or any member thereof, with respect to chapter 17 of the Statutes of Saskatchewan, 1912, being an Act to prevent the employment of female labour in certain capacities.—Mr. Martin (Regina).

On motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at twelve oclock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 4, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 109, respecting the British Columbia and White River Railway Company.—Mr. Bristol.

Bill No. 110, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Sharpe (Lisgar).

Bill No. 111, respecting the Imperial Underwriters Corporation, and to change its name to 'Imperial Underwriters Corporation of Canada.'—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 112, respecting the North Empire Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Turriff.

Bill No. 113, respecting the Pacific and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Clements.

Bill No. 114, to incorporate the Port Nelson Company.—Mr. Beattie.

Bill No. 115, to incorporate the Prudential Life of Canada.—Mr. Meighen.

ADJOURNMENT—ASH WEDNESDAY.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That when the House adjourns this day, it stand adjourned until Thursday next, the 6th instant, at three o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question. Next Monday the position of Solicitor General will have been vacant for a year and four months, or sixteen months in all. I noticed in the press the other day a statement that it was intended to fill this vacancy by the appointment of a gentleman from the province from which I come. I would like to ask my right hon. friend whether the rumour is correct, and if not, when he intends to fill the vacancy.

Mr. BORDEN: I did not observe the newspaper announcement to which my hon. friend calls attention, and I do not know what it was. The subject has not been under consideration recently, owing to the pressure of public business. Whenever any conclusion is reached, it will be announced to my hon. friend and to the other members of the house without delay.

Mr. MACDONALD: Don't you think you had better abolish the office?

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think so.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—TRANSPORTATION OF HAY.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): On the 26th of November I had a question on the Order Paper with respect to the free or reduced transportation of hay over the Intercolonial railway for the eastern counties of Nova Scotia. The question stood on several occasions when called. After the 15th of December the question disappeared from the Order Paper without any answer having been given. Will the Minister of Railways now state whether there has been any arrangement made for free or reduced transportation of hay for the county of Antigonish or any of the other eastern counties, or whether it is his intention to make such an arrangement?

Mr. SPEAKER: This is scarcely a question of privilege

Mr. CHISHOLM: It would be if I spoke on the question having been dropped from the Order Paper without my consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member directed his remarks to an inquiry as to why the question was dropped from the Order Paper, it would be a question of privilege, but it is quite a different thing to question the minister now.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I thought perhaps it might expedite matters if I put it that way.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know how the question was dropped from the Order Paper. It was not done at the solicitation of the Government. I answered in the house orally, that the question whether the people in the districts referred to by my hon. friend would be assisted in getting their hay was under the consideration of the Government. As to the general principle of the Intercolonial railway giving free transportation, that did not enter into the question. If free transportation is to be given at all, provision will have to be made for it by a vote of Parliament.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, resumed from January 31.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): When the debate on this question was adjourned last Friday night, I had made known my opposition to the proposition now before the House, and had expressed my regret at the policy of procrastination adopted by the present Government after the election of the 21st of September, 1911, which had frustrated the steps taken by the Canadian people, with the assent of both sides of the House, towards the construction of a Canadian navy which was to be at the service of the Empire whenever needed. I stated that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as some of the newspapers supporting the Government had declared that the naval policy of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was a policy of separatism. I added that if there was one man more than another devoted to the maintenance of the supremacy of the British Empire, it was the modest member for Gloucester, and I said I believed that every member on this side of the House entertained similar sentiments. I am surprised that to-day any member of this great Parliament of Canada could suggest for a moment that there are yet sane men in this country who wish to obtain separation from the Empire. As to the naval policy of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party in Canada, and as to its superiority in an empire sense over the policy proposed by the Right Hon. Mr. Borden and the Conservative party, I shall not give you my authority, but I shall cite the words of some of the most eminent statesmen in the British Empire. At the very time two or three years ago, that the Liberal party were getting the assent of this Parliament for the construction of a Canadian navy, Lord Milner was in Toronto, where he delivered an address full of good sense and of the most patriotic sentiments. In that address he said:

> It is not a question of shifting burdens, but of developing fresh centres of strength. For this reason I have never been a great advocate of contributions from the self-governing state to the army and navy of the United Kingdom, though as evidences of a sense of the solidarity of the Empire such contributions are welcome, and valuable, pending the substitution of something better. But I am sure that the form which Imperial co-operation in this field will ultimately take, and ought to take, the form at once most consistent with the dignity of the individual states and most conducive to their collective strength and organic union, is the development of their several defensive resources in material and in manhood. I know that it may be argued—it has been argued—that individual strength would make for separation. But I have no sympathy whatever with that point of view.
>
> The professional and technical, not to say the strategic, arguments for a single big navy of the Empire are enormously strong, so strong that they have to some extent overcome in the past, the political objection. But without wishing to be dogmatic on a subject which requires a great deal more careful study on all hands than it has received, I must say that, speaking as an Imperialist, I feel the political objection very strongly.
> If the self-governing states were going, under our present constitutional arrangements, merely to contribute to a central navy, whether in money, or better still, in men and ships, I do not think they would take that interest and pride in the matter which it is essential they should take. They would continue, as now, absorbed in their local affairs, and, even if they felt their obligation to the Empire as a whole, they would rest content to have discharged it by such a contribution. The contribution, in these circumstances, would probably not be large; but that is not really the weakest point in such a system. Its fatal weakness is that the participation of the self-governing states in Imperial affairs would begin and end with the contribution.

These are not my words. Providence has not endowed me with the necessary attainments to enable me to frame such a speech on the future of this great Empire. I commend it to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who spoke so violently against the policy of the Liberal party. Other members spoke along the same line some days ago. I commend this statement of Lord Milner to their careful study and cogitation. I think it ought to be sufficient for them. Meanwhile allow me to give you another authoritative expression of opinion, referred shortly after this debate commenced, a few days before the leader of the Opposition proposed his policy to this Parliament, and before the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave his views in support of the policy of his right hon. leader. It is the expression of opinion of a man belonging not to the Liberal party in England, but one who has been and will perhaps again be the leader of the English Conservative party, the Hon. A. J. Balfour himself. Speaking on December 1st at a great gathering in the Holborn restaurant to celebrate St. Andrew's day, Mr. Balfour. who presided, spoke on Imperial nationality, as follows:

> He referred to the great part his countrymen had played in reconciling the principle of nationality with ardent patriotism in various parts of the world. It was only by emulating that example that the future of the Empire could be secured. People in Canada and the overseas dominions must have, and will have their own feeling of nationality. Every Canadian ought to want to feel that Canada has got its own principles of development, and in future do not let us discourage that local patriotism, he said. Let them cultivate their own feeling of nationality. Canada for the Canadians, Australia for the Australians, but the whole for the British Empire.

I say again that the maintenance of our own navy and our willingness to place it at the disposal of the Empire when required, will be of greater service to the Empire than a policy of contribution. It will keep the coming generations of Canada, actively absorbed as they are in the development of the resources of the East and the West. also nourishing the pride and the dignity of Canada. Other authorities have been quoted. I do not know whether I would quote them, as I may possibly be repeating what has been said already at the risk of fatiguing the House, as this question is so important and so vital to the future of Canada, I will give the expressions of opinion of a few of the leading men of the British Empire, who have been asking Canada to follow the policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition, when he said in 1902: 'I will not accept the principle of contribution, but I will build a Canadian navy as soon as the facilities of Canada will permit, and as fast as the revenues of the country will permit.' One authority is no less than the First Lord of the Admiralty, Winston Churchill, in that famous speech which he delivered at a banquet of the Shipwrights' Company on May 15 last, a month after the great German Bill for expenditure on armaments was put through. Even after that Mr. Churchill was willing to give the dominions across the seas the time necessary for them to build their navies, knowing that he was prepared, as he said, for any attack from Germany or any other country. He advocated the development of such navies by all the sister nations of the Empire, and commended it as the best policy that could be adopted for the maintenance of the future British supremacy against all comers. He said on that occasion:

> The Admiralty was prepared to give the Dominion full control over the movements of their naval forces in times of peace. The policy of naval construction which lately has been brought to its final act, has given a real measure of security to the heart of the Empire. But the fact that the fleet must be concentrated at decisive theatres in European waters creates a new want, a new need and a new opportunity for the self-governing dominions.
>
> We should always be in a position to overdome the strongest combination of powers. We believe that we are in that position now and for the immediate future, but a war may be protracted or indecisive or, more likely, war may never come in our time. Meanwhile, and pending decision in critical theatres the general mobility of our fleet is reduced at the present time, and for some years to come we shall only be able to maintain a sufficient margin in home waters at decisive points, but by making special arrangements for effecting partial mobilization we can, in case of need, outfit and despatch strong squadrons to the aid of any of the colonies whose vital interests are menaced or attacked.

Further on, referring to the maintenance of our supremacy, he said:

> That we can do now, next year and in the years immediately before us. Still, we must recognize that with every new development of the continental navies, with every step in the ceaseless accumulation of the naval strength with which we are confronted, the world-wide mobility of the British navy becomes sensibly restricted and here is the great opportunity for the overseas dominions, those strong young nations which have grown up under the shelter of the British flag and by the stimulus of its protection.

I need not quote at greater length; I believe these words are sufficient to convince any hon. member who will give the subject fair consideration that the policy adopted by the late Government should have been carried out by the Government now in power. I have already shown that the policy adopted by the present Government has been a detriment to Canada from an industrial point of view. This is greatly to be regretted. But it is even more to be regretted that Canada has been placed in a false light before the British Empire and before the nations composing the British Empire. We have inaugurated a policy which was accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which was eloquently defended by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in this Parliament, when he declared that our navy, though small in its beginning, could grow, and with its growth could render greater service to Canada, and that the establishment of that navy was an earnest and a proof of the determination of the people of Canada to do their duty to the Empire, as Australia, New Zealand and other nations are doing. But the repeal of the Naval Service Act and the cancelling by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of the orders for the construction of vessels have resulted in spreading a different opinion of Canada among the nations composing the British Empire. That Canada has been put in a false light before the Empire is shown by the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty made on the 22nd of July last, when the leader of the Government and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were present. That statement only shows the effect of this policy of procrastination entered upon by the present Government. It shows that this policy has given the impression that only then, on the 22nd of July, was Canada beginning to think of her duty to the Empire. But we know that, two years before, our resolution had been unanimously passed in this House and would have been acted upon effectively had not the Canadian people, in a moment of error, withdrawn their confidence from the Government that was carrying that policy into effect. The First Lord of the Admiralty, on the occasion to which I have referred, said:

> It is our duty to acknowledge the important aid already given. The progress of the Australian fleet units is continuous, and as it develops it facilitates the new fleet organization by releasing the numbers of men whom we have hitherto maintained in those waters for service nearer home. I have already referred to the action of the Government of new Zealand. Now Canada has come forward. We have had repeated conferences at the Admiralty.

Now, Canada has 'come forward.' As though only then, when the present Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made their visit to Great Britain, had Canada thought of coming forward to the help of the Mother Country. Had the policy which we adopted been carried out, this very day, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have been able to tell us that in St. John, or Halifax, or in some of our ports on the Pacific coast, the work of ship-building for the Canadian was effectively going forward. And the reverberating sound of the blacksmiths' hammers on the plates of Canadian steamers would have made a greater and more favourable impression upon the Empire and the world at large than this mere proposed contribution of Canadian money. For this contribution tells the world of nothing except of Canada; it sets forth only an expedient of a divided party.

These hon. gentlemen tell us that their policy is a policy of emergency. When they are asked what is their permanent policy, they tell us: In future years—in twenty-five or fifty years, perhaps,—we may build up a Canadian fleet. Why this long delay? There is no country in the world that can more readily develop a fleet than Canada. We have all the resources necessary for the construction of ships—we have the waterfalls which will provide the economical and convenient power to turn the wheels of the great ship-building industries, and we have great supplies of raw materials. We have also the men needed to build the ships and to man them when built—the engineers, the mechanics, the workmen, the sailors. I regret for the reputation of the Prime Minister himself, that he has given expression to such an opinion of the Canadian people and of Canadian resources as he has given. These gentlemen went to England looking for an emergency.

Mr. BELAND : They did not find it.

Mr. TURGEON : Yes, they found it, but they did not know it when they saw it.

Mr. BELAND : Where was it ?

Mr. TURGEON : On our coasts left unprotected by the withdrawal of the British ships to concentrate the fleet in the North sea. There was the emergency; and I greatly wonder they did not see it.

Mr. BELAND : They went to the wrong place.

Mr. TURGEON : They might easily have gone to the right place, for this emergency is clearly set forth in the memorandum of the Admiralty. Here are the words:

> It has been necessary within the past decade to concentrate the fleet mainly in home waters.
>
> In 1902, there were 160 British vessels on the overseas stations, against 76 to-day.

There was an emergency if these hon. gentlemen had wished to see it. When these hon. gentlemen asked the head of the British Admiralty to give them a statement of the position of the Empire in reference to naval supremacy, this was the condition of affairs he clearly explained to them. In reference to these overseas dominions the memorandum goes on:

Naval supremacy is of two kinds: general and local. General naval supremacy consists in the power to defeat in battle and drive from the seas the strongest hostile navy or combination of hostile navies wherever they may be found. Local superiority consists in the power to send in good time to, or maintain permanently in some distant theatre forces adequate to defeat the enemy or hold him in check until the main decision has been obtained in the decisive theatre. It is the general naval supremacy of Great Britain which is the primary safeguard of the security and interests of the great dominions of the Crown, and which for all these years has been the deterrent upon any possible designs prejudicial to or inconsiderate of their policy and safety.

The rapid expansion of Canadian sea-borne trade, and the immense value of Canadian cargoes always afloat in British and Canadian bottoms, here require consideration. On the basis of the figures supplied by the Board of Trade to the Imperial Conference of 1911, the annual value of the overseas trade of the Dominion of Canada in 1909-10 was not less than £72,000,000, and the tonnage of Canadian vessels was 718,000 tons, and these proportions have already increased and are still increasing. For the whole of this trade wherever it may be about the distant waters of the world, as well as for the maintenance of her communications, both with Europe and Asia, Canada is dependent, and has always depended upon the Imperial navy, without corresponding contribution or cost.

In this memorandum they state that it had been the duty and the generosity of the British Empire to protect this immense trade of Canada for years, and that Britain had to leave them without protection at the moment, and that trade was increasing very rapidly, as we know it has increased even since the date of the Imperial Conference of 1911. Surely the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine should have at once established the very navy which we had voted for in 1909-10, which would have been consistent with this as well as with the recommendations in the memorandum of the Admiralty. When I read this quotation from the memorandum does it not recall these words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, pronounced in 1909:

After all, the basic idea of a naval force is the protection of the commerce of a country. A commerce side by side with its protector, and its protector side by side with the growing commerce of a country flourish best together and are surest helpers of each other.

I cannot understand why this paragraph from the memorandum of the Admiralty, which is so similar in expression and sentiment to the language of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, did not impress itself on the minds of the members of the Cabinet and induce them to at once establish an era of shipbuilding commencing with the $15,000,000 which the present Government refused to vote for the building of these ships. That would have been an illustration to the British Empire of the intelligent devotion of the Canadian people to that Empire.

The Minister of Marine, on his return from across the sea, used language very similar to that of the Admiralty memorandum. He gave us figures to show the huge amount of money spent by Great Britain for the protection of the trade and commerce of Canada. He said:

Certain figures have been obtained, and it has been ascertained that the cost of maintaining the ships on the North American and North Pacific oceans from 1851 to 1901 was about as follows:—

1851-1861	$21,000,000
1861-1871	27,000,000
1871-1881	19,000,00
1881-1891	19,000,000
1891-1901	23,000,000
	$110,000,000

It will be seen from this that the total cost to Great Britain of maintaining ships on the North American and Pacific stations for the protection of Canada and of Canadian trade and commerce during the last half century amounted in round figures to $110,000,000. This does not include any charge whatever for the first cost of the ships and armament, or for the preliminary training or pensions of the men. The British Admiralty also, during this period, maintained two dockyards on Canadian soil: the Halifax dockyard first established in the eighteenth century, at a cost of installation of $800,000 and the Esquimalt dockyard established in 1855, at an original cost of $580,000. The expenditure on the maintenance of these two establishments, during the period from 1850 to 1900, amounted to over $6,000,000.

After giving some further particulars of Great Britain's expenditures, he continues:

Is not the fact that during all these years that Canada has remained under the protecting aegis of the British Crown, we have not been called upon to contribute anything to the cost of the maintenance of that navy—without which our overseas commerce and tonnage would be without protection, and without which Canada could not possibly exist in its present free and independent position under its present form of government,—calculated to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every loyal Canadian—that reproach is one which will be wiped out by the passage by this House of the Bill which has been submitted by the right hon. the Prime Minister.

A reproach because we nave accepted all that protection from the Imperial Government which has cost that Government so much money, which will in the future cost an even greater amount with the expansion of Canadian trade, and he tells the people of Canada that $35,000,000 is going to wipe out the blot from the record of the Canadian people, and will pay our debt to the British Empire for the protection she has given us. As I said the other day, there is no limit to the generosity of our people when their help is required, but when we are told that $35,000,000 will wipe out our debt to the Empire for the protection we have received, while the insult may have been given unwittingly, without intent, I accept it as an insult to the Canadian people. We have been told that it will take fifty years to build a navy. But the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce has himself told us that from this date until 1920 the British Empire can keep her position against Germany notwithstanding the increase of armament. If he has that conviction, why did he not say to the people of Canada: Let us hurry up with the building of our navy. We have eight years, and during that time the people of Canada will be able to build the cruisers that were designed by the Navy Bill of 1911; then we can build two or three dreadnoughts in the next eight years, and then Great Britain will have all the assistance necessary for the protection of the Canadian coasts on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic. When my hon. friend says it will take fifty years to build a navy, I imagine that the people on the Pacific coast are just as sensitive to his expression as the people on the Atlantic coast, because ports can be found on either coast where mighty dockyards and shipyards, large enough to build the greatest ships in the universe, can be established, and where we can find men with patriotism to work in any direction that may be required.

There is the Premier of the province of British Columbia, Sir Richard McBride. He has told us for the last five or six years that it was necessary that Canada should build a fleet unit for the Pacific coast, and I agree with him. It was the intention of the Liberal party to do so as quickly as possible. When Sir Richard McBride returned from Europe a few days ahead of the Prime Minister of Canada, he stated in this very city of Ottawa that we should have a fleet on the Pacific coast in order to protect that coast against any possible eventuality or attack from the Japanese or Chinese. It was agreed in 1911 that Canada and Australia should protect the Pacific zone.

Then it is said that we cannot man a navy. I have heard many strange things in this debate from speakers on the other side of the House, but none which has offended me so much as a Canadian and a Britisher as that statement. They say we cannot find the men necessary to man a navy. Do my hon. friends imagine that everybody would flock to join a navy when there is no employment to be given? Who ever knew of a Canadian industry that was not able to go on for lack of men? Only a few years ago the paper industry was started in Canada, but who has known of that industry running short of labour? When we have started any other industry there has been no lack of ability, and no lack of men. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia knows that in Quebec only a few years ago we established the manufacture of Ross rifles. Will he tell the House and the country that the Ross rifle made in Quebec is not equal to the rifle made in London or Manchester or the United States? I am certain that given sufficient time we could get enough men to man a navy. Our friends on the other side talk of the Niobe and the Rainbow, and say that we could not get men to man these ships, trying to give the impression throughout the country that the young men of Canada are not willing to enlist for the protection of her shores. But, Mr. Speaker, how could you expect our young men to enlist when immediately the Naval Bill was passed it was announced all over the country that if the Conservative party came into power they would repeal that Act and therefore put an end to naval armaments? No young man in Nova Scotia or in New Brunswick will enlist unless he is sure that employment in the navy is to be permanent. He would leave the country and go to the United States and find employment there, rather than waste his time seeking employment in which there is no assurance of permanency. Immediately after that unfortunate day, the 21st of September, 1911, it was stated all over the country that the Navy Act was good as repealed, so that there was no inducement for any young man from the Maritime provinces to seek employment on the Rainbow or Niobe.

Again, it has been said that the Maritime provinces have not supplied as many men as the province of Ontario, but that is only natural when you consider that the population of Ontario is three or four times larger than the population of the Maritime provinces. That fact, however, only tends to show that it is not only from the seaboard that Canada may expect to get men for a navy but from the large cities. In those large centres men who happen to be out of employment would enlist and gradually our navy would be manned. The ships of the British navy are not manned entirely from the seaboard; the men come from London, and from other large cities of the British Isles; and it would be the same in Canada. They would come from Ontario as well as from the other provinces. But in the meantime there is no inducement for any young men to enlist, and those that have the apitude for a naval career have to go to the United States. If you go to the shipyards across the line you will find there many Canadians from New Brunswick and other provinces working as mechanics and in other capacities. There are some in the navy of the United States itself; some from my own county are serving in the United States navy to-day. Every year half a dozen of them come back home to see their relatives and friends, and they come back as morally sound and as patriotic as when they left the country. From the statistics we gather that there are over 1,000 Canadian-born subjects in the American navy to-day, and only a few days ago it was stated that there were 260 who were still Canadians, not having made application for American citizenship. If Canada established a permanent navy those men would return to Canada and would probably join the Canadian navy. It requires time to build any industry, and the larger it is the more time it requires, and time is needed to build a Canadian navy.

Then hon. gentlemen talk of an emergency threatening the heart of the Empire. But to maintain her vitality the Empire must pay some attention to her legs and arms and toes. It is said that the emergency is threatened by Germany, that Germany is waiting a chance to assail the British Empire in the North sea. But it is my opinion that Germany has a good deal to do yet before she finds herself in a position to undertake that task. Let me read to you again a few words of the First Lord of the Admiralty, Mr. Churchill, from his speech on the 24th or 25th of July last:

> We are spending £45,000,000 ($225,000,000) this year and we are going to spend more next year. We are raising the personnel of the navy to 141,150 by 1913, and to 146,000 in 1914. As regards construction, Germany this year is laying down two new battleships and we four. Next year Germany is laying down one extra and we two. This year Germany is laying down two small cruisers, and we are laying down eight. Germany, in the course of the next eighteen months is laying down twenty-one destroyers, we forty-three. There is no cause for panic or alarm.

There is no cause for panic or alarm, says Mr. Churchill. Hon. gentlemen opposite are bound to make us believe that there is an emergency and that they must have this contribution at once. In the meantime we may judge of the reality of that emergency by the conduct of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. The emergency has been bottled up from day to day and from month to month, from the time that he left England until he opened the House, from the time that he opened the House until the present and he is still waiting and waiting calmly for the decision of Parliament. If there is an emergency it is one that well accommodates itself to circumstances. There is another authority to sustain my judgment when I say that I cannot see an emergency. I have here a statement of another man in England, in London, at the heart of the political activities of Great Britain, a leader of the Conservative party to-day, the leader at the time that my hon. friend was in England and at the time that Mr. Churchill pronounced these words to which I have just referred. The gentleman of whom I am speaking is Mr. Bonar Law. Here is what he said in a statement on the 25th of July, 1912, the same day as that upon which Mr. Churchill gave expression to his views upon the subject. Mr. Bonar Law said:

> But, in spite of all that has been said, does the country—do the House of Commons, do any of us—believe there is danger and vital danger? I confess that I have the greatest difficulty in believing it myself.

Many a man, like Mr. Bonar Law, has great difficulty in believing in the emergency idea. This deliverance was made on the 25th of July. But they say that Germany is waiting for her chance, that she is only twelve hours from the shores of the British Isles, that she can come with her dreadnoughts in a night, reach the shores of Great Britain, come into her harbours and destroy London, Liverpool, or any other port.

Mr. BELAND: The hon. Postmaster General was frightened when he heard what Mr. Bonar Law had said:

Mr. TURGEON: Yes, my hon. friend the Postmaster General got a sensation when he heard that. Let me tell you what the leader of the Government in Great Britain, Mr. Asquith, said on that same day with reference to Germany and other nations. Speaking in the House of Commons he said:

> Yet, remember what is sometimes forgotten by those criticising our foreign policy, namely, that these powers with which these special relations exist, are powers of various parts of the world and are brought into closer and intimate contact with us in possibilities of friction and possibly of animosity, if our relations were not happily what they are between ourselves and those great powers, with which in Asia and Africa and elsewhere we and our subjects are constantly brought into closer relationship.
> The history of the past eight years is a history of mutual understanding, freedom from friction and difficulty, and of growing cordiality. (Cheers.) But when I say that of the powers between whom and ourselves intimate relations exist. I must add that our friendships with them are not in any sense exclusive. (Cheers.) I say deliberately that we have no cause, so far as I know, no occasion for quarrelling with any country in any part of the world.

That was, I presume, the day when my right hon. friend was finding an emergency in London. He was rushing back to Canada to give us the impression of what he had heard and seen in London. But, Mr.

Asquith went further on that same occasion:

Continuing, the Prime Minister said that he viewed without the least suspicion or dissatisfaction and with more than equanimity, the special conversation and interchange of views such, for instance, as between Russia and Germany. Our relations with the great German Empire were relations of amity and good will. Mr. Haldane, the lord chancellor, had paid a visit to Berlin earlier in the year and had entered into conversations and interchanges of views. This had been continued since in a spirit of frankness and friendship on both sides and we have now in London a distinguished diplomatist, whom the German Emperor had sent to our court.

Our friendships were not in any sense exclusive. For more than one reason the greatest of British interests remained that of peace of the world. If, unhappily, as was the case, there was in this country, as elsewhere, a growing and lamentable expenditure upon armaments, both naval and military, there was no power in the world which did not know perfectly well that so far as we were concerned we had no aggressive purpose. We coveted no heritage, we had no inclination or temptation to extend in any way the range of our responsabilities.

But, said Mr. Asquith, in conclusion, those responsibilities are world-wide, and if we are compelled to divert from other purposes more productive, more advantageous to mankind, the sum which we are now spending for the maintenance of our supremacy at sea, I am speaking what everyone in this House knows to be absolutely and literally a fact when I say that that expenditure is regarded by us simply as an insurance, a necessary insurance of which the Government of the country and the House of Commons are, or ought to be, the faithful and vigilant trustees.

That was the position in which Great Britain was on the 25th of July last, when the Prime Minister was just about to leave England. If I were to quote at length figures showing the armaments of England and Germany which, it has been said, might be employed against each other, it would take too much time and I shall therefore dispense with reading them in detail. But, the subject is an important one and I will again ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I present a few suggestive facts in that connection. Mr. Allen Baker, member of the British Parliament while in this country recently made the following statement which appears in the Toronto Globe of November 12, last:

In our mighty pre-dreadnought fleet we have 40 battleships (many of them, as Mr. Asquith said, in the first bloom of youth) against Germany's 20. Ours have a displacement of 584,000 tons to the Germans' 241,000 tons—38 of our 40 have among them 152 twelve-inch guns, while the 20 German ships have no guns larger than eleven-inch ones, and only 40 of them. But besides these first-class pre-dreadnought battleships there is also our fleet or armoured cruisers to be reckoned with——

Cruisers are to be reckoned with by the British Admiralty and by gentlemen who know something of fleets and fleet units in the British Empire.

—we have 35 of them, and Germany has eight; ours displace 416,000 tons, theirs displace 78,000 tons; ours have 470 guns, theirs have 112; 68 of our guns are 9·2, while the Germans have only six over 9-inch, and they are 9·4. So that not only in numbers but also in the calibre of the guns the British sea power is simply overwhelming.

Mr. BURNHAM: With the Canadian navy, such as the hon. gentleman describes and such as he wishes to bring into being, would Canada be permitted to declare war on her own hook?

Mr. TURGEON: Canada has no intention of declaring war, even with the greatest possible navy upon her coast. We are willing to trust the British Empire to declare war, and if she does declare war she can rely upon the people of Canada to assist her in the time of need. Only a short time ago, I think it was during the Christmas holidays, the hon. Postmaster General, whom I do not see in his seat today, spoke in Quebec, saying that he was ascending the steps leading to the great temple from which war is declared. I would ask the Postmaster General to stay that ascension, and I can assure him that if Great Britain is in need, every man and woman in Canada will do their duty by the British Empire. I do not want to see war; I hope war will never come; but I shall do my duty if it does come. As I told my constituents last fall, I do not see why we should regard Germany as the enemy of the British Empire, and I believe it to be bad policy to endeavour to make enemies of nations that are trying to be friendly to us. Germany has her needs as well as the British Empire. She has a population of 65,000,000, increasing by 1,000,000 a year; she has to provide for the support of her population in order to keep body and soul together in these 65,000,000 people. Germany cannot expand her limits; she can only support her people by bringing in raw material to enable them to engage in manufacturing. Germany needs protection in this way. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed to the millions of dollars' worth of trade pouring out of the ports of Great Britain, saying that this trade needed protection and that we must concentrate our forces to protect our trade. On the other hand, let me ask him to remember the huge quantities of raw materials that Germany has to get from all parts of the world and bring through the North sea to her ports. Why should we say that because another nation builds a ship, we must build a ship also? If Britain is to build three dreadnoughts as fast as possible to maintain her superiority against Germany, then of course Germany will build three more dreadnoughts, and the proportion will remain the same. I do not see why Germany should be pointed out to us as a dangerous enemy to England. Let me quote the words of the German Ambassador at the Court of St. James, which are worthy of calm and generous consideration by the people of Great Britain and of Canada. The new German Ambassador arrived in London on the 19th of October last, when the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues were talking of an emergency because of the hostility of Germany, and this is what is written:

London, Oct. 19.—The corespondent of the Daily Mail has obtained an interview with Prince Charles Max Lichnowsky, the newly appointed German ambassador to Great Britain. The Prince, in speaking of the much-discussed status of the Anglo-German relations, says: 'I am not going to London with anything in the nature of a programme. I have no policy except to establish the warmest possible mutual relationship between the government and the peoples so as to lay the foundations strong enough to meet any emergency in the spirit of good-will and tolerance.'

The new ambassador said that he did not know whether a hard and fast naval agreement between Great Britain and Germany was practicable, but if it were it would lay the spectre which is chiefly responsible for the Anglo-German tension.

'We do not cherish the slightest desire or intention of disputing Great Britain's mastery of the seas,' said the Prince. 'A supreme fleet is, as the Britons claim, a life and death question with them.' They are supreme now, and no responsible person in Germany dreams of disturbing that pre-eminence, but it must not be forgotten that a powerful fleet is also a vital necessity for us. England must not read hostility into the fact when we now and then lay down a dreadnought.

'Anglo-German relations,' said the Prince in conclusion, 'are beset with difficulties, but they also offer ample oportunities for an agreement.'

Any yet, in view of such language from one of the German princes, the effort of the Prime Minister of Canada and his friends has been to inflame the public mind in Canada against the German Empire. We know that shortly after that there was a meeting of German and English business men held in the city of London at which resolutions were passed urging peace and harmony between these two great European nations.

As making for peace, there is one fact which I wish to mention at the risk of inviting criticism in ths House and outside the House. It is remarkable that during the present debate no hon. gentleman on the other side of the House has referred to the entente cordiale between Great Britain and France as an element in preserving peace, even if there were any idea of hostility on the part of Germany towards Great Britain. If Germany is twelve hours from England and can reach the shores of the British Isles over night, let it be remembered that her ships would have to pass along the coast of France, and that France is ready to-day to give moral and material assistance to the British Empire.

Mr. BELAND: One hour from England.

Mr. TURGEON: One hour from England, and at the very moment these formidable German dreadnoughts would leave a German port, France would be ready to send her dreadnoughts to meet them halfway. Let it be remembered that when some of these belligerent speeches were delivered in this House by gentlemen on the other side, Mr. Poincaré, then Prime Minister of France, had given to the world a declaration of the determination of France to stand by her ally, Great Britain. Mr. Poincaré, the Prime Minister at the time, a few days before the opening of Parliament, made this declaration, which I shall read, and which will be more impressive than any comment I may make upon it. Mr. Poincaré had been accused of trying to evade his responsibility to the British Empire, owing to the fact that he had made an agreement with Germany to endeavour to establish peace in the Balkan states. His friendship towards Germany had been criticised by some people, and he took advantage of the opening of the House to give to France and to the world at large his determination to stand by the entente cordiale with Great Britain and Russia. I will endeavour to translate his remarks as well as I can. Mr. Poincaré said:

We have no intention to change our friendships. The ties which bind us to Russia and to Great Britain are imperishable; they are cemented by political sentiments, political interests, and political probity. Nothing can compromise an entente upon which the European equilibrium depends. . . .

A few weeks after he had pronounced those words, Mr. Poincaré was elevated from the position of Prime Minister of France to the Presidency of France by the votes of the majority of the representatives of the people, under the pressure of public feeling throughout the whole of France. His statement, therefore, is an expression sanctioned by the majority of the French people. And yet we have not heard one hon. gentleman in this House paying France the compliment of saying: 'Well, we can depend on her moral support at least, if we cannot depend on her material support. As my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) says, it will not serve their cause, but it will serve very much the cause of the British Empire. My hon. friends may think that they are giving a great boon to the British people by building three dreadnoughts for them, or paying them $35,000,000, which amounts to the same thing. It is $35,000,000, and no more. In my judgment, they would have been still more generous if they had given the money unconditionally. They are giving it under the condition that Great Britain shall equip and maintain those ships at her own expense. I do not see at all the generosity of hon. members on the other side. The British people will have to do as much as the Canadian people, if the Bill is sanctioned, which I hope it never will be. They will have every year to pay three and a half or four million dollars for the maintenance of those ships. Our hon. friends opposite try to make us believe that this contribution will be received by the British people with an immense amount of gratitude. There are men in Great Britain who do not see any very great generosity in it. As they say, if every other government of the other sister nations were to inflict upon us the support of other dreadnoughts that they might give us, we would be killed by kindness. A London paper of high standing on December 9, commenting on the naval programme, said:

> We are in danger of being killed by kindness.

The British people are receiving this contribution with certain consideration and reflection. When speaking of the generosity of the people of Canada towards the people of Great Britain, the artisans in the factory who have to bear the burden of all these ship armaments, the Minister of Trade and Commerce waxed eloquent in behalf of these poor artisans, who have to pay immense sums of money every year to keep their army and navy going. If my hon. friend had had his own way for the last fifteen years, the products of those artisans would have been taxed by us to the same extent as the products of Germany and the United States. It was due to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and to the Liberal party that we were able to increase the value of the products of those people by millions of money every year, by giving to the products which they sold to the people of Canada the benefit of the British preference. That preference would have been much more increased, had it not been for the fatal verdict on the part of the people of Canada on the 21st of September, 1911.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has expatiated upon the suffering which the British people might endure in the event of war if foodstuffs, cotton, and other necessities of life were stopped on their way to Great Britain. If he had the cotton to supply, he would tell the people of Lancashire to tax the cotton of other countries so as to get from them a higher price for his cotton. That is the sympathy they receive at the hands of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and the other side to-day. The British subject, notwithstanding this great expenditure on armaments, is not standing under a greater burden than the taxpayer of Canada, if we compare our population with the population of the British Isles. Our population is about seven millions against that of forty-five millions in the British Isles. We find that our per capita gross debt to-day amounts to $70.06, for federal purposes alone; the gross debt of the provinces, generally speaking, amounts to another $11.52 per head, making in all about $81 per head of the population of Canada. Nothwithstanding the larger amount of debt in the British Isles, the public debt is a burden of only $72.25 per head; and, as my hon. friend from Beauce has shown, Great Britain, during the last six or seven years, notwithstanding these armaments for which she paid out of her yearly revenue, has reduced her public debt by $370,000,000. And with all this Great Britain had a surplus last year of about $30,000,000. I do not compare the financial condition of the taxpayer of Canada with that of the taxpayer of Great Britain to show that our people cannot afford what is proposed. I say that we must, for the self-respect and dignity of our nation, contribute to the support of our own navy as we maintain our own militia. But when I see so much sympathy shown to the British taxpayer, I must declare that what we do is not done through sympathy but through the impulse of the heart.

I desire to touch upon just one point more—a strong point, for which I ask the special consideration of the House. This question does not present itself to my mind as a question of thirty-five millions of dollars, but as a question of principle. The words of the Prime Minister in introducing this proposal show as clearly as words can show that this contribution is but preliminary, that others must follow, and that the giving of them must involve a change in the constitutional status of Canada. This vote means an impairment of the autonomy of Canada, and it means that we are called upon to vote for it here notwithstanding that the Government has refused to submit the question to the people. I do not speak lightly of the sum of thirty-five millions of dollars. That large sum of money could be used to great advantage in Canada in the improvement of our harbours, in the making of other public works, and in the development of our commerce. I have already said that in the great exchequer of the British Empire this thirty-five millions of dollars that it is proposed Canada shall contribute will be but a mere drop in the ocean. But small in population as Canada may be, great as may be the need for the development of her immense territory, we still could easily afford thirty-five millions of dollars if this contribution were really of advantage to the Empire and assisted in establishing Canada's place in the Empire. For such a purpose, we must well vote a hundred millions. But I object to this contribution, not for its amount, but because it is voted under conditions which means a retrograde constitutional step, a change in the position by which we were guaranteed autonomy under the Constitution of 1867. That change will be injurious, not to Canada only, but to the British Empire also. Carried to its logical conclusion, such a change must mean the disintegration of the Empire. Against a contribution under such conditions and involving such consequences, I appeal to the true sentiment of Canada. What is the policy of the Liberal party in regard to this question of autonomy? Our great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, has given it in a concrete and limpid sentence:

I want the unity of the Empire in the autonomy of its component parts.

No member of this House was more chagrined than the member for Gloucester, when, the other day, I heard one of our friends on the other side, who is in the secrets of the present Administration, say: 'Autonomy is a word of the past.' Has the principle of autonomy, enshrined and sacred in the Constitution of 1867, become but 'a word of the past?' Is Canada, with its growing population, with its continent-wide expanse, and with resources capable of making it within comparatively few years the greatest nation of the world, to be called upon to declare that it is willing to be a mere province among the nations of the Empire? Such words wound my feelings as a Canadian, and I believe that my sentiments on this subject are shared by Canadians generally. Let me show where we stand, and let me indicate the hard work that my right hon. friend will have before he can establish a policy of such a nature as this which he proposes. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), if my memory serves me well, stated in Montreal that it would take three or four years more to formulate a permanent policy and Mr. Bonar Law says that it will take all the energy of the believers in that policy to develop it within fifteen or twenty years If this be true, then the Minister of Justice, in order to be consistent, would be obliged to come back to Parliament for another contribution. Or, if we had to wait fifteen or twenty years for the development of this policy, what would become of Canada in that time? To show how necessary great activity would be for the development of that policy of Mr. Bonar Law, even in twenty years, let me cite some authorities. At the last conference in 1911—after Mr. Asquith had spoken against the position now taken by my right hon. friend—Sir Wilfrid Laurier, representing Canada, said:

As to the sentiments which you have expressed a moment ago, perhaps it would be better not to anticipate them, but for my part, I heartily recognize the truth of the principle which you have laid down, that if there is one principle upon which the British Empire can live, and ought to live, it is Imperial unity based upon local autonomy.

There was only one representative of the British Empire at that conference who held the view that we should create a parliament or a council at which the different nations would be represented, and that a policy should be formulated by them. Sir Joseph Ward, the representative of New Zealand, was the only gentleman of the conference to stand by that conviction, and, speaking after him, Mr. Fisher on behalf of Australia said:

You said in your address that the genius of the British race rather than a dispensation of Providence had developed the unity of the peoples of the Empire. I think that is a fine sentiment boldly stated. The other point that impressed me was that greater freedom had led to closer unity. It had done much to assure peace in the world, and might do more to prevent war. That is a great achievement. I hope the limits of such an organization have not yet been reached.

At that conference there were also other representatives of other nations. Newfoundland was represented by Sir Edward Morris, Prime Minister of Newfoundland; and let us not forget that Newfoundland is, in my estimation, a part of Canada, bound to be in a very few years a province of this Dominion, and the great protection of Canada itself, owing to her strategic position; that it is her bounden duty to be within the Dominion of Canada for the greater safety of Canada and the greater utility of the British Empire; and, therefore, when Newfoundland has spoken through the voice of her representative, we must give consideration to what she says. I have heard no reference by hon. gentlemen opposite to what has been said on behalf of Newfoundland. I shall quote in full what Sir Edward Morris says, as he expresses very fully my views as to the future of the sister nations in the British Empire. He said:

Mr. Asquith, I desire to say that I also have listened with the greatest interest to the very interesting and able address of Sir Joseph Ward, and I am in entire sympathy with the underlying motive or suggestion running through his remarks, but I am quite convinced that the proposal would not in any way effect what he desires. I quite appreciate and agree with the suggestion arising out of your question that the effect of such a council, legislative body, or parliament as is now proposed would be to supersede the functions of the Imperial Government and that the two bodies could not exist together.

The idea, I think, that Sir Joseph Ward has is that some remedy should be proposed in order to give the great dominions that he and his colleagues represent some say in, or some advisory council, or representatives in relation to the larger questions of Imperial Government. It seems to me that the only way that could ever be accomplished would be to have some representation in the Imperial Parliament but that as regards the dealing with large questions like war and treaties and navies that is to remain, at least for a very long while, in the hands of the Imperial Government who are largely responsible and who have to bear the great proportion of the expenditure.

Any scheme of representation, no matter what you may call it—parliament or council —of the overseas dominions, must have so very small a representation that it would be practically of no value. You have in the first place to consider that you have an empire representing something like 500,000,000 of people. We know when you give them a fair representation on that council the overseas dominions, as they are termed, will have a very small say in the matter.

. That is the position to which we would be reduced under the policy proposed by the right hon. the leader of the Government and in connection with which the $35,000,000 is only the opening wedge of what Canada would be morally responsible for. Let me again read for the edification or education of my friends on the other side some words from the Prime Minister of England himself on that occasion. The President, Mr. Asquith, said:

Sir Joseph Ward, in a speech the ability and interest of which we all acknowledge, which must and undoubtedly did represent the expenditure of a great deal of time and thought, has presented us with a concrete proposition, but it is a proposition which not a single representative of any of the other dominions, nor I as representing for the time being the Imperial Government, could possibly assent to. For what does Sir Joseph Ward's proposal come to? I might describe the effect of it without going into details in a couple of sentences. It would impair if not altogether destroy the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom in such grave matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of treaties, the declaration of maintenance of peace, or the declaration of war and, indeed, all those relations with foreign imperial government, subject to its responsibility to the Imperial Parliament. That authority cannot be shared, and the coexistence side by side with the Cabinet of the United Kingdom of this proposed body—it does not matter by what name you call it for the moment—clothed with the functions and jurisdiction which Sir Joseph Ward proposed to invest it with, would, in our judgment, be absolutely fatal to our present system of responsible government.

Here are the words of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to-day. Has the representative of Australia or the representative of Newfoundland changed his mind? The Prime Minister has said that wherever he has propounded that principle it has been received with great generosity. It may be that it was so received in some quarters, but I am sure he did not at any time impress very much the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his colleagues for I remember reading some of his utterances not long after in which he said that if the dominions want representation in Parliament and if they would present formally their request he would be pleased to give them a hearing, but he did not say he would accede to their request. I might give other authorities from Great Britain, I might quote Mr. Harold Spender, the eminent journalist, who writing on July 30, a few days after the ministers had had their interviews in England, said:

If the dominions were given a statutory voice they would likely possess more power than the House of Commons or the Cabinet.

If Canada is to have a voice, it is clear that the other dominions must also have a similar concession. Any council formed will have to be consulted on all important questions of foreign policy, and if there is any reality in the plan the British Cabinet will necessarily be obliged to accept the advice of the dominions.

In that way, the article proceeds, the supremacy of the Cabinet will certainly be impaired, and so far as the British Cabinet is impaired to that extent, a blow will be struck at the British Parliament from which the Cabinet is drawn.

Would this fundamental change in government make for a peace or war? asks Mr. Spender, and he answers the question by saying:

It is to be feared that it would make for war. The restraint on war is chiefly from the fear of the consequences of war, but as the dominions are far removed from the probable centre of any European war, they would be far less liable to those restraints. It is perfectly natural that Great Britain should rejoice at the willingness of the dominions to help her both in defence and offence, but it was the dream of the earlier school that the British Empire should be a League of Peace.

That is the way in which those propositions are viewed by many great Imperial authorities. I might also give the opinion of the Manchester Guardian, another high authority in England, expressed about the same time. In an editorial that paper said:

The hopes that the colonies will extricate us from our difficulties seem wildly out of proportion to the actual facts. The colonies for a long time to come will do well if they can make themselves responsible for their own naval defence. Even Canada, which under Premier Borden has gone further than the others, does not expect actually to lighten our burden. Moreover her aid is conditional on serious changes in the Empire's constitution which are full of difficulty and we think of grave inconvenience.

The matter cannot be settled by sentimental impulse. Parliamentary federation is quite out of the question, for the moment and colonial representation could only come by the admission of the colonies to the executive. The result would mean an increased independence of the executive which would aggravate the existing evil of the loss of control of foreign affairs by Parliament.

That surely ought to convince our friends on the other side. But let me also quote the opinion of an hon. gentleman from Australia. If Australia is considered loyal to the Empire when she continues the policy that she adopted in conjunction with that of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, am I, because I belong to the Liberal party and support that policy, to be accused of disloyalty or of seeking to detach Canada from the Empire? Let me read a few words from the speech of the Right Hon. Sir George Reid, delivered in the city of Ottawa. That hon. gentleman represents his country in London, and some of his eloquent words have been cited by my eloquent friend the member for Beauce. But I wish to quote a few of the sentiments which appealed to everyone who heard him, and which ought to convince everyone as to the direction in which the policy of Canada should lie. He said:

We have heard a number of eloquent appeals for some new form of Imperial federation. I would be delighted if some of our statesmen who have this matter so earnestly in their minds would produce even the barest outline of a scheme for carrying this out. It is easy to talk about tying the bonds which unite us more closely together; but if you ask me to submit such a scheme, likely to preserve and promote the harmony of the Empire, I would ask you to go to my friends the Canadian ministers. (Laughter.) If they have some scheme which would do that, I think the whole Empire will acclaim them as benefactors. The onus upon those who wish to make changes is tremendous. The harmony of the Empire as it stands to-day is one of the miracles of human experience. We think it wonderful that majestic bodies in the heavens should revolve round the central sun. Well, that is not more marvellous than the orderly orbits in the political heavens of the various constellations of our Imperial system.

Then he goes on to say:

One of the secrets—not a secret—one of the marvels of the relations between the self-governing dominions and the Mother Country has been this, that as every tie was removed there was more loyalty, more attachment. And there is so much to be done in the Empire, in Canada, in Australia, there is so much to be done in developing the latent strength of these grand communities that we cannot, while we are waiting for the scheme, do better than pursue our present course. Just think of the triumphs of enterprise, of progress and development, making for the strength of the Empire, which Canada is achieving! Just think of the marvellous development in Australia and New Zealand and even South Africa, to say nothing of the majestic Indian Empire. If we will only develop each for ourselves the grandeur of our resources, if we will only make our own people happy and prosperous and well governed, we will, I think, be promoting one of the best possible ways to the health, strength and prosperity of the whole Empire.

These are the words of the representative of Australia in Britain. My hon. friend heard them and other hon. gentlemen on the other side heard them; and yet they come here to-day and try to lead Canada in a direction contrary to the sentiments he expressed. This policy of centralization is adverse to the spirit of the British colonial system, which experience has proved to be superior to any other system of colonization. It is a policy which has made the colonies sister nations, not dependencies or adjuncts, or provinces. It is a policy which has enabled the British Empire to extend her commerce to all the continents of the earth, and on that policy of commercial expansion Providence will smile so long as it is based on the true principles of Christian liberty so eloquently expressed in the case of Canada in 1763, and so eloquently repeated in 1901 in the case of South Africa when the laws, religion and language of the conquered were safeguarded by Britain. It is a policy which has enabled Great Britain to wrestle with the intricacies and complications of European, African and Oriental problems. And yet to-day we are asked to distrust Britain's ability to maintain, without our intervention, her position of supremacy. Let us follow her policy and condemn the policy that is advocated by our friends on the other side, and if some day England has to declare war, let us stand by the Motherland no matter what the consequences may be.

I do not oppose the policy of the Government on account of this $35,000,000, but because it might stay the progress of our country in the path which she should follow. I would like to see the Postmaster General here to-day, and if he were here, I would say to him, as I say to every hon. gentleman present, let us not divert Canada from the path of progress outlined by the hand of Providence and upon which she set out again in 1867 when men of all political proclivities, forgot their differences and mingled their patriotism for the good of their common country, as Sir John Macdonald conceding his ambition for a legislative union and George Brown relinquishing his opposition to separate schools in order to bring the people of divergent races together under a constitution which would be the basis of Canada's future grandeur and prosperity. I feel, not as a Liberal, but as a representative of the Canadian people, that it is my duty to put every possible obstacle in the way of the voting of this money, and I take that position in order to protect Canada from the danger which I see ahead. Let us go back to the spirit which animated every member of this House on the 29th of March, 1909, let us go back to the construction of a Canadian navy for the protection of our coasts and the assistance of England, let us go back to that policy together and let us now lay aside all party politics as we did upon that day. Let us be Canadians, and let us be Britishers as well. If some misfortune should in the future threaten to change the aspect of the British nation let us hold ourselves in readiness to defend the Empire, but in the meantime, let us act at once vigorously and patriotically and let us take the steps which are recommended by every Imperial authority in England. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have kept you so long; I thank you very much for your generosity. I think it would be a misfortune were we to have a change in the presidency of this House and I do not believe such a change would occur even if we were to have a change of constitution. I maintain that every possible effort must be put forth to dissuade Canada from entering upon a policy which I consider would be disastrous to her best interests.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, we heard some days ago about an epidemic of dumbness that had struck hon. members on the other side of this House. There seems to be a second epidemic of dumbness. I do not know that I can explain all the reasons, but I think I can give one reason for it. We have heard able and well prepared speeches by hon. members on this side of the House against the proposal of the Government and no reply has been made to them. There may be many reasons why we have had no reply, but I believe that one reason will be found to be some remarks made by my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) in his speech the other day. You will remember that, when the question came up in the debate here as to the dates of the coming into force of the new German Naval Law and the dates of certain speeches delivered by the First Lord of the Admiralty, some very bold statements were made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to these dates. My hon. friend from Beauce showed conclusively that these dates were wrong and that those who are fixing these dates are misleading the people of Canada. I do not say that they are deliberately misleading them, but we have the right to assume that hon. gentlemen opposite are sufficiently well acquainted with such things as to justify us in believing that they are deliberately misleading the people. The desirability of the removal of this question of naval defence from the arena of contentious politics has been asserted frequently here. I quite agree that it is desirable. Unfortunately, however, our opponents have thrown this question into the political field. They have made it a political football. The central idea of the joint resolution of 1909, as you all know, was the speedy organizing of a Canadian naval service. There were other details about it but that was the central idea and in that idea all parties united. That was a common platform. Our hon. friends have seen fit to desert that platform. I am not going to criticise their action; that is their right.

I wish to say a few words with regard to the proposal of the Government. We are told that the permanent policy of the Government is still undisclosed, but I think we have heard sufficient from the speeches of hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support of the resolution and from speeches delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister and his associates in 1910, to disclose the general principles upon which that policy is to be based. The general principles are that we are not to have what was originally agreed upon, that is the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service, but instead we are to have a Canadian unit of the Imperial navy. This navy is not to be controlled by this Parliament, not to be controlled by the Government of Canada, but it is to be controlled by the Imperial authorities. It is not to be stationed in Canadian waters, it is to be stationed upon the North Sea, and, above all things, it is not to be manned by Canadians. This, I think you will agree, is not a Canadian navy. It will be in no sense a Canadian navy except in the sense that the people of Canada are paying for it. As far as this policy has been disclosed I think the permanent policy, of which our friends spoke, is quite as much a policy of contribution as the temporary expedient which we are discussing here. It is a contribution of ships in each case. The main difference that I can see between these two contributions is the string that is attached to the contribution in each case.

In support of the policy of the Government it is claimed that a need has arisen. It used to be an emergency, but the emergency refuses to emerge and our friends now prefer the word 'need.' I am willing to accept that term. We are told that a need has arisen and that it will be met by the proposed contribution. The first minister, in a very indirect way, suggests that the naval supremacy of the Empire seems on the point of being successfully challenged. The hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), in the same indirect way, compares the condition of the British Empire with that of a burning building—not a very pleasant comparison. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins), with his usual ornate phraseology, speaks of the Empire as being surrounded by clouds and darkness, and he graphically pictures Young Canada rushing in with her contribution to dispel that darkness. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), believes that there is a need that can only be met by a contribution and he suggests that a refusal at the present time might end in disaster and destruction. These are gloomy suggestions, but they are merely suggestions, and they are flatly contradicted by the first Lord of the Admiralty on his naval estimates. Some quotations have already been made from this speech, but I shall take the liberty of citing from it briefly. The First Lord says:

I should like to make it clear that as a result of the measures taken by my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, there is no cause whatever for alarm or despondency. The Admiralty are prepared to guarantee absolutely the main security of the country and of the Empire, day by day for the next few years, and if the House will grant us what we ask for the future, that prospect may be indefinitely extended.

Nothing very dismal about that. Further on, he says:

Lastly, the House is entitled to be relieved of any anxiety which they feel in regard to the expansive power of the ship-building resources of the country. It is not possible to say whether our most prominent competitors can build as fast as we do. What is certain is that they do not in practice do so, and it is also true, I am pleased to say, that we can build, arm, and equip great ships each year—and continue the process year after year—upon a scale largely in advance of any other single power in the world, according to its present resources. The House may take it for certain, therefore, that there is absolutely no danger of our being overtaken unless we decide as a matter of policy to be so.

In the same speech he says:

I am glad to be able to assure the House that no difficulty will be experienced in making arrangements to maintain our relative positons n the near future, and to secure as quickly as we need them adequate margins of safety. I am glad also that these measures will not involve any excessive or disproportionate expense.

It seems to me that these words of the First Lord should be sufficient to dispel the gloom of hon. gentlemen opposite but should they require anything more, I would like to refer them to a statement placed in 'Hansard' by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). That hon. gentleman presented a statement showing the relative naval strength of the different great nations of the world, and I find from that statement that Great Britain has more armoured battleships than any other two nations in Europe; that she has more cruisers than any other four nations in the world, and that she has more men in her navy than any other two nations in the world. To put it in another way, according to the speech of the hon. member, Great Britain has more than double the number of armoured battleships, more than double the number of cruisers, and more than double the number of men employed in her navy, than have any other nation in Europe. That should also help to dispel the gloom of hon. gentlemen opposite.

If they want any further evidence to dispel their gloom, I think they can find it in the financial position of Great Britain to-day. We know that Great Britain is annually wiping large sums off her indebtedness, while her great rivals are yearly sinking more deeply into debt. What does that mean? Surely that should convince us all that there is at least no financial need in Great Britain, and that there is no need of further ships than those which the British Admiralty is able to provide. We must remember that the need of money to build ships is the only need which our friends on the Government side of the House propose to supply, yet all the evidence goes to show that Great Britain is financially strong and able to cope with all her necessities from a money point of view.

While there is no other need than the need of money which the policy of the Government supplies, and that need does not exist, yet it does not necessarily follow that there are not other needs which might be provided for. The most important of the needs disclosed by the material before us, is the need of the vessels for the overseas stations of the Empire. That need is shown, as we have been told, by the memorandum of the Admiralty, and the Prime Minister himself appears to be so satisfied about it that he referred to it in his speech over and over again, though it seems to me he has adopted rather a peculiar way of providing for it. I submit that the policy of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party will supply that need so far as Canada is reasonably able to, and certainly the intention of that policy is to supply that need. On the other hand, the policy of the Government, if we can call it a policy, makes no pretense of supplying that need, and even the permanent policy of the Government, so far as it is disclosed, does not tend to attain that result. Not only that, but no less an authority than the Minister of Trade and Commerce has told us that to supply that need would be utterly useless. He dwelt at great length on the uselessness of placing warships on the overseas stations, but it seems strange that if it is so utterly useless to place warships on the overseas stations, Great Britain should still maintain seventy-six such vessels and deplores the fact that she is not able to maintain more.

We are told that if we place a fleet unit on the Pacific or on the Atlantic, that this unit would not be able to cope with the navy of any ordinary power. Quite true, but is that a reason why the ships should not be placed there? If so, it is equally potent as a reason why Great Britain should withdraw her ships from outside stations, because they are scattered all over—except in the case of Canada, where they are gone entirely—here, there and everywhere, and there is not a single place, outside of the North sea, where these ships are sufficiently numerous to meet the onslaught of any ordinary hostile fleet. It is quite plain that Great Britain sees some use for those ships on outside stations, even though they are not so numerous as she would wish them to be. We can understand that in case of necessity these ships would be prepared to meet certain emergencies, and that in a general attack by a large fleet they would form the nucleus around which would gather vessels from all parts of the world. If our friends on the other side of the House are right in saying that these ships are useless in outside stations, then the British Admiralty is entirely wrong in maintaining them. Either our hon. friends opposite are mistaken or Great Britain is mistaken and badly mistaken in that policy.

My hon. friend (Mr. Turgeon) was not so frightened of the German scare as some gentlemen opposite profess to be, and neither am I. I do not believe that the people of this country are convinced that there is any real danger from Germany, or that an attack from Germany is even the most probable attack on Great Britain. I would like to know if my hon. friends from British Columbia really acquiesce in that doctrine. Do they really think there is no need whatever for vessels on the Pacific coast; do they think there is no possible danger except the danger of attack from Germany? The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) has given us figures to show not only the relative strength of Great Britain and Germany, but also of Great Britain and her friends on the one side and Germany and her allies on the other, and the figures given by him prove conclusively that it would be utterly unsafe for Germany and her allies to attack Great Britain and her allies on sea. If Germany within the next ten or twelve years is to attack Great Britain, she will not rely entirely on herself and her European allies. We know that some little flirtations have been going on between Japan and Germany. We are told that Japan is an ally of Great Britain; that is true, but we must remember that the allies of to-day are sometimes the enemies of to-morrow. We have professions of friendship from the people of Germany and also from the people of Japan. I have had some experience with Germans individually; and I find that a German is a man on whose word I can rely, on whose profession of friendship I can rely. I should like to ask my hon. friends from British Columbia if they can stand up in this House and say the same of the Japanese.

Mr. MACDONALD: They will not answer.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Would they like to see an invasion of a hundred thousand Japanese into British Columbia? What a panic there would be! On the other hand, if a hundred thousand Germans were to come in, there would be a boom in British Columbia at once. Every hon. member in this House from British Columbia would be delighted at such a prospect. It would mean the greatest era of development that British Columbia has ever had. My hon. friends from British Columbia know that those Germans would become first-class Canadian citizens, and that they would easily assimilate. Can we say the same of the Japanese? To my mind there is more danger of an attack from some of the Asiatic powers than there is from any European power. If that attack comes, where will it come? It may come in India; it may come in Australia; it may come in New Zealand; is it not just possible that it might come in British Columbia? What would that mean? My hon. friend says that we must not put war vessels there, that it would lead to a separation if we put them there. I think it is more probable that it would lead to a separation if we do not put them there.

I wish to refer now to a second need, possibly not so important but still of some importance, that is the need of facilities for building navies and equipping ships in the overseas dominions. The Opposition policy would supply that need so far as we are reasonably able to do so. The proposal of the Government entirely ignores that need. It is quite true that Great Britain, recognizing that this Government ignores that need, proposes to step in herself and to a certain extent supply that need. Is it creditable to Canada, because Canada refuses to do her duty in supplying a need, which is an Imperial and also a Canadian need, that Great Britain has to step in and perform that duty herself? I do not think that it is to the credit of Canada or to the credit of the present Government; I think it is very much to their discredit.

Another need is disclosed in the memorandum before us, that is the need of men. I might call that a prospective need. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) referred to that need in his speech, although he did not say very much about it. Quotations, which have been given here from the speeches of Imperial statesmen in connection with the new German naval law, refer to this as a need arising from that law; that the only new need shown to arise from the new German naval law is the need of men. The Germans are not going to have as many ships, but they are going to have them better manned; from that springs up a need of men. I noticed a number of pamphlets in the House which had been sent out by our jingo friends, one pamphlet in fiery colours which dwelt on the terrible position of Great Britain at the present time. I should not like to quote that as an authority, because, if it were, we might as well give up all hope for the British Empire at once. There might however, be some truth in its statements. I notice one statement showing that with the German reserve, the men in reserve trained by Germany, she has as many or almost as many seamen as Great Britain has. We must also remember that Great Britain has a very much smaller population than some of her neighbours have; and that while she is quite able to man all the war vessels she has at the present time, the time may come with the rapid increase of war vessels when it may be somewhat difficult for her to do so, and it may be necessary for the overseas dominions to assist her in this particular. There is the prospective need. The Opposition policy proposes to supply that need; the Government policy does not propose to supply that need; in fact speakers on the Government side of the House are vigorously opposed to any attempt being made to do so.

I have said that Great Britain is not in financial need. Let us suppose for a moment, for the sake of argument that Great Britain is in financial need, what then will be the effect of the present contribution? Will that be an adequate supply of the British need? We are told that the yearly income of the people of Great Britain is in round numbers $10,000,000,000. Will a contribution of $35,000,000 dollars to such a people be an adequate supply of their need, if they are really in financial need? It will be equivalent to a gift of $3.50 to a man who has a yearly income of $1,000 a year, or as the Postmaster General would put it, a gift of 17½ cents a year. Would that be anything more than the proverbial drop in the bucket?

We are told that we are indebted to Great Britain by reason of her naval and military protection of the provinces which now constitute Canada. The first minister in his speech the other day estimated the sum spent in this way during the nineteenth century at $400,000,000. As I understood him, that did not include interest, it was merely principal. The inference is that we are indebted to the Mother Country by reason of this protection. If we are morally indebted for the payment of the principal, then we are also under a moral obligation to pay reasonable interest thereon. Some of this interest has been outstanding for a century and we all know how interest accumulates. If we add interest to that principal, the amount will be very much in excess of a billion dollars. Let us put it however at $1,000,000,000. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) in referring to this fact, asked if it is not calculated to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every loyal Canadian. He cheerfully adds that the reproach is one which will be wiped out by the passage of this Bill. Is not that a very convenient way of wiping out our debts? If we could do that personally, I think we should very rapidly be relieved of our debts. The debts of some of us need not worry us long if we could pay these debts with three and a half cents on the dollar. And that is what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries suggests—we are to pay our debts to the Mother Country at three and a half cents on the dollar. And, more than that, we are to attach a string to that three and a half cents, so that we can pull it back if we repent our spasm of honesty. If we were really indebted in that amount of money, we should pay our debts like men; not compromise like a bankrupt. Canada is not a bankrupt country, and has no right to claim the privilege of a bankrupt. Such a suggestion, as I have indicated, coming from a minister of the Crown is sufficient to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of any honest Canadian—and I see no good reason why a loyal Canadian should not be also reasonably honest.

I shall vote against this proposition, first for the reason that, while it calls for an expenditure of about five dollars for every man, woman and child in Canada, it supplies no existing need. Another reason for voting against this proposition, one that has been referred to already, is that it is a backward step in our work of self development. 'Autonomy' is a word that we have often heard used in this connection. I prefer the words 'self-government and self-development.' But this is no new struggle.

It is the same old struggle between centralization and self-development that has gone on so long. That struggle reached its most acute stage in Canada about three-quarters of a century ago. At that time the parties to the struggle were the old family compact and their supporters and retainers on the one side, and on the other the more intelligent and progressive of the early settlers of Canada who were seeking to hew out for themselves a home in this new country —the great common people of that day. The Family Compact were the jingoes and the ultra-loyalists of that day, as our hon. friends on the other side are the jingoes and ultra-loyalists of to-day. The struggle of that day was different in some particulars from the struggle of to-day, but the great question was the same —centralization against self-development.

There was one thing I noticed in one of the speeches delivered on this subject on the other side of the House, that of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). I think that hon. gentleman is one of the greatest champions of centralization in this country, and an ultra-imperialist of the ultra-imperialists. Yet I noticed that in his speech the other day he paid a high tribute to our predecessors of the last century, those who were engaged in the great fight for the right of developing and governing their country and themselves. But, while he paid a high tribute to these men, he had no word to say for his own predecessors, the men who were struggling on the same side as that on which he struggles now. Some men are very wise after the fact. Some men are very far-sighted; they can see things at a long distance, but they cannot see things that are near at hand. Apparently, that is the way with the hon. gentleman. He can see clearly the actual state of affairs three quarters of a century ago, but he cannot see what is happening to-day; he does not understand it; it is past his comprehension. He apparently recognizes in the hardy pioneers of the last century better Empire builders than his ultra-loyal predecessors. As I have already said, this is no new struggle in Canada. History has been repeating itself, and I predict that it will repeat itself again. The struggle that went on in the 19th century is going on to-day in the 20th century, and I have no doubt it will go on in the 21st century. The struggle that is to come in the next century will be different in its details, no doubt, but it will be the same in principle—the struggle between centralization and self-development. And I have no doubt that in that day the jingoes and ultra-imperialists will point to what is taking place to-day and will pay all honour to those who to-day are fighting the fight for the right of developing and governing ourselves. But they will have no more words of praise for their own predecessors who sit on the opposite side of this House to-day than the hon. member for St. Antoine has for his jingo and imperialist predecessors of the 19th century.

I believe that if ever the British Empire is destroyed the destruction will be caused by the ultra-loyalists, the extremists, the jingoes. I do not believe that the jingoes and ultra-loyalists of any day will ever do anything to strengthen and build up an Empire. I believe that the way to strengthen and build up the Empire is to make stronger our position as part of that Empire. That is a question that should engage our best attention. I believe that our friends opposite are sincere—or many of them are—in believing that the Empire is to be strengthened by centralization. But I do not believe in that principle, and cannot support them. I do not believe that an Empire widely distributed over the world has ever been strengthened in that way. The old plan of dealing with colonies and with subjects at a distance, was the plan of force, the plan of binding these colonies tightly together and tightly to the mother country. That has in every case been unsuccessful. The Roman Empire was unsuccessful in it; Spain was unsuccessful in it; and Great Britain was unsuccessful in that policy and succeeded only when she changed. We talk of Great Britain as a great colonizing country. When did she become a successful colonizing country? It was after she had adopted a policy directly opposite of that which hon. gentlemen opposite contend for to-day. When she dropped the policy of centralization, she became a successful colonizing power. I wish I could put this in the words in which I would like to place it before the House. I feel my inability to express what I wish the House to understand. I believe there is just one way to bind this Dominion or any of the other overseas dominions closely to the Empire and in such a way that the bonds will never be severed. It is impossible to keep the Empire united by binding closely the overseas dominions to the Mother Country. The tighter you make the bonds, the more likely they are to break, and the less tightly you bind them, the more—though that will seem a curious way to put it—the more closely you bind the parts of the Empire together. Colonial history is false, if that is not true. That is true, or else colonial history is false. The only way to bind our dominions safely and securely to the British Empire in such a way that there will be no danger of severance is for us to do our work of developing ourselves, developing our own defence, developing our country, in every way. I know that there are many gentlemen, not only in this House, but in the Empire in many parts, unfortunately there are men of influence in the Mother Country who take a different view, that is quite plain. There are some people who will not learn the facts of history, who will shut their eyes to actual facts and to things that have passed. There will always be those who believe in binding the dominions tightly to the Mother Country so that they cannot in any way be cut off. That policy is a terrible mistake, the most serious mistake that can possibly be made in connection with colonial government.

We have heard some complaints about the action of the farmers of Manitoba in certain resolutions which they have passed. I do not entirely concur in those resolutions, but I wish to say a word in favour of the position of the western farmers. The spirit of the West is entirely different from the spirit displayed by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) the other night when he pronounced his eulogy on the spirit of war. The hon. member for Brantford is evidently convinced that the doctrine laid down in the parable of the Good Samaritan, is now rank heresy. The spirit of the West is entirely different, the western farmer believes in the doctrine laid down in the parable, that they are good doctrines to-day, that they are sound doctrines, that if they are properly applied they will always be successful. That is the spirit of the West, the spirit that was shown in that parable. I do not think that the western farmer will quite agree with a great many things said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, particularly in that portion of his speech where he represents the German Chancellor as saying: We (that is the German people) are making fleets, forging the blood and he brains and the bones, into machinery for war, and for what object? For war with a country that has no designs upon us, in order that we catch her unaware and overpower her. These are the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Let me quote in opposition to that an extract from a speech delivered by the late German Chancellor a few days ago:

> What would a nation gain to-day if it overthrew one of its maritime rivals? It would perhaps destroy the economic organization of its adversary, but it would, undoubtedly, at the same time inflict the gravest damage upon its own commerce. It would be doing the work of those others who would gladly take the vacant places in the markets of the world, and comfortably establish themselves there. The evil consequences would be permanent. . . . I cannot conceive that the idea of an Anglo-German war should be seriously entertained by sensible people in either country.

If that spirit is entertained by people in both countries there would be no danger of war but evidently the German Chancellor believed that if those who looked for war were sensible they were not serious and if they were serious they were not sensible and I think I can quite agree with him.

> They will coolly consider the enormous damage which even the most successful war of this character would work upon their own country, and when they reckon it out it will be found that the stake is much too high in view of the certain loss. For this reason, gentlemen, I, for my part, do not take the hostility of a section of the English press too tragically.

I am glad he has said that and given an indication of how the German people feel on that question because we may hope that the German people, reading the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not take it too tragically.

I shall read an extract from the speech of Mr. Balfour on the 22nd of July last. He said:

> My hope is based upon the fact that a modern war especially an all embracing war . . . . would not merely be so frightfully destructive of accumulated wealth and of human life, but would so profoundly disorganize the industries on which, in increasing measure, every great civilized country is now, more and more, dependent, that even the most reckless statesman, when he sees it before him, will shrink back horrified at the prospect.

Some of our friends do not shrink back, especially the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is not afraid of conflict—but I do not think he ever expects to see it come to pass and that is the reason he is not horrified.

We have heard it said that the best way to ensure peace is to prepare for war and I grant that to a certain extent this is correct. There is a certain amount of truth in it, but we are apt to let these things carry us too far. I do not think the westerner is generally very much impressed with that, he has had some personal experience and knowledge of that matter. He knows that in some communities in the West people went out with the idea in their mind that the way to preserve their peace was to prepare for war, they felt that if they armed themselves to the teeth, if they were prepared for a fight, they would be able to avoid getting into fights. Others of us went out with the opposite idea, with the idea that we would go to this new country unarmed, ready to do our work in that country, expecting no trouble, looking for no trouble, and what was the result? History tells us the result. In the places where people went out prepared for war they found war; when they went out thoroughly prepared to defend themselves they had to defend themselves. Those of us who went in a different spirit had no occasion to defend ourselves, we found the people peaceable and quiet and found no trouble. We were not looking for fights and did not get them. That is the other side of the question and I think that although the other side is so often presented to us we should pay some attention to this side.

It is nearly half a century since any two really civilized nations of Europe have engaged in war with each other. This has been prevented, I think, by certain restraining influences, and I believe these influences will have more effect in suppressing war in the future. I have every hope that the world will never see any such contest again. We have heard of the restraining influence of the knowledge of the horrors of war, even to the victor. That was certainly a strong restraining influence but I do not admit that was the only restraining influence which there will be. I claim that modern Christianity and morality will have a restraining influence. I claim that the modern sense of righteousness, justice and fair play will have a restraining influence. I believe that those things will largely prevent the possibility of any such occurrence. Now, in closing, I wish to return to the desirability of removing this question from the arena of contentious politics. Some suggestions have been made from this side of the House looking to that end.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

PATENT OF GEORGE FREDERICK BISHOPRICK.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 8, respecting a patent of George Frederick Bishoprick.—Mr. Macdonell.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. gentleman give the Committee an explanation of the Bill?

Mr. MACDONELL: George Frederick Bishoprick has a patent, issued six years ago, for some mechanical device in the way of cardboard asphalt, this being a material out of which to make boxes. He commenced to manufacture the invention in Toronto four or five years ago, but failed. Then he went to manufacture it in Alma, Michigan, under the American patent. The same misfortune overtook him there, he returned to Canada and he is now commencing to manufacture in the city of Ottawa. Through an inadvertence, and while travelling abroad and in the United States, he did not receive notice to pay his renewal fee. He was two months late in paying the fee and now he asks that the patent be validated. The Bill came before the Committee, the promoters were represented and read affidavits which were such as to satisfy the Committee, nobody objected to the Bill and he, being only two months late in paying his dues through an inadvertence, the Committee took no exception to the Bill, particularly as, by clause 2 of the Bill, any persons who may have acquired rights to manufacture during the period that the patent had elapsed, have been fully protected. The Bill is of a kind that frequently goes through the House and it is the least objectionable Bill of the kind that I have seen go through.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the length of time during which the patent is valid?

Mr. MACDONELL: It can be renewed for two periods of six years, which would give a total duration of eighteen years. Six years have expired.

Mr. OLIVER: Twelve years would be the extreme limit?

Mr. MACDONELL: Twelve years additional to the six years which have already expired will comprise the full life of the patent which is eighteen years under the Patent Act.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN EXPLOSIVES, LIMITED.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 9, respecting Canadian Explosives, Limited.—Mr. Ames.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) wishes this Bill to stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would suggest that an examination be made of the provisions of the English statute bearing upon the issue of share warrants with a view to having similar provision placed in this Bill with all requisite safeguards. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) was speaking to me to-day on the subject, and he told me that there is such a provision in the English statutes. I think that whatever safeguards are put in the English statutes ought to be put in this special Bill, as there is no general provision in the law of Canada bearing on the subject.

Mr. BLAIN: I will direct the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) to the remarks of my hon. friend.

Progress reported.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 20, respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—Mr. Lesperance.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the object of the Bill?

Mr. LESPERANCE: The object of the Bill is to increase the capital of the company from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 for the requirements of the company.

Mr. OLIVER: What are these requirements?

Mr. LESPERANCE: The capital of $10,000,000 has been exhausted, and new capital is required for new boats and increased terminal facilities.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not see anything in this Bill to limit the application of the capital to purposes as are mentioned.

Mr. LESPERANCE: Sub-section 2 of section 1 provides that:

> The directors may increase the amount of the capital stock at any time to an amount not exceeding fifteen million dollars; but the stock shall not be increased until the resolution of the board of directors authorizing such increase has first been submitted to and confirmed by two-thirds in value of the shareholders present or represented at a special general meeting of the shareholders duly called for that purpose.

The company wants this capital to take care of increasing traffic.

Mr. OLIVER: I have seen a great deal in the newspapers with regard to the proposed increase of the capital stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Very strong objection has been taken to that proposed increase by some hon. gentlemen in this House. There may be similar objections to this proposed increase in the capital stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. I think that a little more definite statement on behalf of the company would certainly be in order before giving assent to a proposal to increase the capital by one-half. It should be made clear to the Committee that this increase is required by the legitimate development of the company and not for other purposes.

Mr. LESPERANCE: If my hon. friend will read clause 1 of the Bill he will see that it is not intended to increase the capital beyond what is absolutely required by the necessities of the company, such increase to be sanctioned by two-thirds of the shareholders present. I do not think that the shareholders would sanction an increase in the capital stock unless it was in the interest of the company to do so. The company have taken over the Northern Navigation Company, the Inland Company, and the Niagara Lines and they want new terminals at Fort William and new boats. They must have new capital for that purpose and the new capital will be issued only as actually required by the business of the company.

Mr. OLIVER: Is any of this increased capital required to pay for the lines which have been purchased?

Mr. LESPERANCE: No, it is simply to take care of the expanding business of the company. The traffic on the great lakes is increasing by leaps and bounds and the company wants to take care of the traffic. Unless they get the capital necessary to do that I do not see how they can cope with the business.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no objection to allowing the company to increase its capital for the purpose of expanding its legitimate business, but the question having been raised so very publicly in regard to another great transportation enterprise, I thought it was only fair to question this particular enterprise in the same connection. Is it proposed that there shall be any restriction with regard to the price at which these shares shall be disposed of? That is a point that has been raised very generally in the public mind in connection with the proposed increase in the capital stock of the Canadian Pacific railway. I suppose it is just as right and proper that it should be raised in connection with an increase in the capital of this transportation company.

Mr. LESPERANCE: The last issue of capital stock by the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company was at par. The stock was selling in the market then at about 117. That is a very slight premium for the shareholders. I do not know what the condition of the market may be at the time the company may want to issue this new stock, but at the present time, there is no intention to issue that stock below par.

Mr. OLIVER: What are the shares of the company standing at now?

Mr. LESPERANCE: At 117.

Mr. NESBITT: What do they propose to do with the additional capital?

Mr. LESPERANCE: Provide boats and terminals to take care of the increased business of the company.

Mr. NESBITT: Are you quite sure they do not require it for the purpose of buying up the other navigation companies?

Mr. LESPERANCE: I am positive they do not. That has already been taken care of.

Mr. McKENZIE: I presume the powers of this company are defined in the original Act and I do not understand why these further and indefinite powers are taken in the second section of this Bill.

Mr. LESPERANCE: That was amended in committee.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not see much difference between the original and the amendment. I protest against two-thirds of the value of the shares held by shareholders present at a meeting being sufficient to enable the directors to carry out any scheme; I have always held that the consent of two-thirds of the total shares should be necessary for that.

Mr. LESPERANCE: The representative of the company accepted whatever suggestions for amendment were made in the committee, and the Bill as now before us was unanimously adopted by that committee. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company is one of the oldest companies in Canada and its affairs have always been well managed. They have used up all their capital in legitimate enterprises and now they ask power to issue additional capital to take care of the increased business of the country, I do not think anyone can reasonably object to that. As to the employment of the idle capital hon. gentlemen opposite know that during the winter season the boats are idle and if the company has any capital on hand then it would be in its interest to invest it to the best possible advantage. If at the close of navigation the company has on hand some money, why should it not have the opportunity to use it to the best possible advantage by lending it out on call loans or otherwise temporarily?

Mr. NESBITT: If the company promoting the Bill were as explicit as my hon. friend in telling us what they wanted to do with the capital, there might be no objection. If their capital is invested in their ships, how can they take it out of the ships and reinvest it again in the winter?

Mr. LESPERANCE: What I referred to was the ready cash on hand.

Mr. NESBITT : We know that this summer there were rumours about amalgamation and merging of navigation companies, and the name of the Richelieu and Ontario Company was very freely used. It was said there was to be an amalgamation of nearly all the navigation lines and it is even rumoured that negotiations are still pending. At the present moment I cannot remember whether it is the Richelieu company which is trying to absorb the other company, or vice versa. There is a great deal of rumour in the newspapers about the proposed amalgamation, and I think, with all due deference to my hon. friend, that it is a little drawing on the imagination to talk about this company investing its loose capital in call loans in the winter time, because it is not running its ships.

Mr. PUGSLEY : Can my hon. friend tell me how the company is required to invest its surplus moneys at the present time, and from what arises the necessity of making this change ? It certainly strikes me as rather extraordinary to give the directors of the company a power which they could exercise independently of the shareholders, that they might invest the surplus money of the company as they see fit, in mortgages on real estate or in promissory notes, or deposit it in banks. That company has been in existence at least since 1895. It has been a very successful company; it is apparently well managed, and is of course a great accommodation to the travelling public. It has not, however, been shown to this committee that any great inconvenience has arisen by reason of the present law as it affects this company. Before the committee should be asked to make such an apparently sweeping change as this, which might be acted upon to the detriment of the minority of the shareholders, some good reason ought to be shown for the change.

Mr. LESPERANCE : The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company was incorporated under its present charter about fifty or sixty years ago. The hon. member knows that all companies organized under letters patent have the same privilege as the one that is asked for to-day by the Richelieu Company under section 2, that is, they have the right to invest their idle moneys as they see fit in the interest of the company.

Mr. BELAND: The company had that power before to-day.

Mr. LESPERANCE : They did not have it, but they took it, they found that it was contrary to the regulations under their original charter, and they want Parliament to-day to give them the right to use that money in the same way that the companies organized to-day under letters patent have. There is no special privilege asked for here but what is given by the Governor General in Council in issuing letters patent. As I said a moment ago the Richelieu Company during the summer months had big earnings, and had a large sum of money on hand or in the banks for which they were getting no returns, and they want to have the privilege, as all companies to-day organized under letters patent have, to lend that capital to the best advantage of the shareholders of the company. The section does not say that the directors shall have the right to invest the money temporarily, but that the company shall have the right, and the directors shall only have the privilege to use that money as directed by the shareholders.

Mr. OLIVER: That is not at all clear in the Bill. I should like to say to my hon. friend that there is an interest in this or any other transportation company outside of the mere terms of the Bill. As a matter of fact during the past season, rates of freight on the Great lakes have been materially increased, and the people of western Canada are feeling the burden of that increase to-day in a reduced price for their wheat. When a company interested in transportation on the lakes comes forward and asks for an increase in capital, we would like to be satisfied that that increase of capital is for the purpose of developing transportation, for the purpose of increasing transportation facilities, as my hon. friend has told the House it is, rather than for the purpose of restricting competition in transportation. If the Bill stated what my hon. friend said to the House, it would be very much more satisfactory; but the Bill does not make any such statement. Instead of the Bill providing that the company may only increase its capital stock for the purpose of enlarging its actual transportation facilities, in section 2 the Bill provides that the company may use its money for any purpose that it pleases. If that does not leave the condition so that the company may raise money by selling stock and then use that money to choke off competition, I am at a loss to understand how such action would be prevented by this form of wording. This is the position as it appears to us, and while we have no expectation of preventing the passage of the Bill, and while we do not wish to delay its passage when we are not able to secure amendments, we feel it necessary to place before Parliament our views in regard to the section.

Mr. McKENZIE: I should like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the sweeping character of this legislation. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman who is in charge of this Bill is a lawyer or not, but this legislation goes very much farther than we are accustomed to see. I do not wish to detain its passage, but I think there should be as much uniformity as possible about such enactments. There was a time in corporation law when anything that a company was not prevented from doing by the Statutes they could do. The common law as bearing on company law to-day is that they can only do what they are specifically authorized to do. I take it that the powers of this company were granted in the original charter. I notice that the charter was amended seven, eight or nine times, and possibly its powers have been extended. It has not been brought to the notice of the Committee that powers have been taken to enlarge the capital before, although such powers might have been taken. I do not see, however, why the powers of the company should be extended simply because it requires to enlarge its capital. The common sense idea of the committee would be that the company simply wants more money to carry on the same business as it has been doing in the past. If that is all it is going to do, all that is necessary is the power to raise the capital from what it was to what the company wants it to be. The section goes very much farther than that; and applying the common law as I understand it to this second section, I think it gives unlimited and undefined powers to the company. The directors through whom the company must act are given unlimited powers, whatever their notions may be of what is required to be done with the money or whatever they choose to invest it in. We are getting away altogether from the rules that are supposed to surround legislation of this kind. I do not quite understand why any well-advised draughtsman would use the language used in the section, or why any company that wishes to be governed by a Dominion charter should ask for such a clause. I would also call the attention of the promoter to the second section. We had a Bill of like character before the Commons yesterday, and there was a good deal of discussion as to the representation of shares at the meeting. I think the conclusion reached last night was that there should not be less than two-thirds of the value present and that a majority of that two-thirds should decide the action of the company. There is nothing in this Bill providing that two-thirds of the shares must be represented. It only provides that two-thirds of the value present shall decide. There might only be three shares represented, and the majority of these could decide the action of the company. This is very vague legislation. I think there should be at least two-thirds represented by proxy or otherwise, and in that case a majority might well decide. But under this provision, if there was only one share represented, and if, conceivably, you could divide that share, then, two-thirds of that one share would decide the action of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Bill professes to go far beyond what Parliament has done with reference to joint stock companies incorporated by letters patent. There are strict limitations in the Joint Stock Companies Act as to what a company may do with its funds. Would the promoter be willing to incorporate in the Bill some such provision as this:

Provided, however, that the company shall not be allowed to invest its money contrary to the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act.

I would call the attention of the Prime Minister to this point. Take for instance, section 167 of the Joint Stock Companies Act. It provides:

No company shall loan any of its funds to any shareholder.

There is a clear limitation, a prohibition. Yet, if the Bill passes, this company will be free to loan its money to shareholders. Whether that is the object of the amendment or not I do not know. At all events, it is something absolutely prohibited by the Joint Stock Companies Act. Thus, the promoters of this Bill seek to obtain powers which they could not obtain under the Joint Stock Companies Act, so far as loaning to shareholders is concerned. Another section of the Companies Act, and a very important one, says:

168. No company shall use any of its funds in the purchase of stock in any other corporation unless in so far as such purchase is specially authorized by the special Act and also by the Act creating such other corporation.

If section 2 of this Bill is passed, there is nothing to prevent this company having perhaps, several millions in its treasury, as the result of the sale of this seven or eight millions of dollars of additional stock, making temporary investments, at all events, of these moneys in the purchase of stock of other corporations. My hon. friend will see that he is asking this Parliament to change the powers of this company with regard to the investment of its money, asking Parliament to give far wider powers than can be granted under the Joint Stock Companies Act; in fact, giving powers that the Governor in Council is prohibited from giving, and the company prohibited from exercising; and he does this without, it seems to me, presenting any satisfactory reasons for making such a sweeping change in the existing powers of the company.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to hear the Prime Minister on such a sweeping Bill as this. It goes very far, and asks us to assume a great deal of responsibility in giving this company practically a charter to do as it pleases.

Mr. BORDEN: To what particular clauses does the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. NESBITT: To subsection 2 of section 1.

Mr. BORDEN: It seems to me that this is a very ordinary provision for the increase of the company's capital stock. The capital can only be used for the purposes of the company. I think that many Bills of that kind come before Parliament which are passed without very much discussion. So far as section 2 is concerned, that is a rather unusual clause. I am not at all sure that the view taken by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is a correct one. I should be rather inclined to think that, unless it were otherwise specified, section 2 would be governed by the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This company is not incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act.

Mr. BORDEN: I thought the hon. gentleman said the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act governed it——

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. BORDEN—and that this section took it out of——

Mr. PUGSLEY: No. We are seeking to give this company powers far more sweeping than could be obtained under the Joint Stock Companies Act, and therefore the clause should be struck out.

Mr. BORDEN: Often, powers are given to a company different from those contained in the Joint Stock Companies Act. I do not know what is the particular object of the section as to temporary investment. That is not a thing usually provided for.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps the promoter will explain; and will he tell us at the same time where the company is going to spend the money on terminals? Will it be in Montreal, Quebec, or where?

Mr. LESPERANCE: The money will be spent wherever there are terminals to be made on the line, and the line runs from Fort William to Saguenay.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The expenditure on terminals is a very important item; and my hon. friend, who is a member of the board, should be able to tell the committee where the company expect to spend the money.

Mr. LESPERANCE: I could not do that offhand. I know that terminals are going to be made at Fort William that are expected to cost about a million dollars. It is not likely that all this capital will be issued at one time, but only as needed by the company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that the annual meeting of the company is to take place in a very few days, and the rumour is that there will be a complete change in the organization of the company. Would it not be better to wait until that takes place?

Mr. LESPERANCE: I do not see what that has to do with the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It does seem to me that my hon. friend ought to answer the objection that I raised to the Bill. He urged that this company was simply asking for powers relating to investment and capital which are conferred on companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act. I have shown him that a company incorporated under that Act is prohibited from doing the very things which he is asking this Parliament to give power to this company to do.

Does not my hon. friend see that if this section passes the company can invest any moneys it has on hand by lending to a shareholder of the company, which is contrary to the Joint Stock Companies Act, and that the company can invest in the stock of another corporation, which is expressly prohibited? He is asking Parliament to do what it has forbidden under the Joint Stock Companies Act. Then too the increase of capital can be arranged for without the consent of even half or two-thirds in number of the shareholders. It need not issue stock for its immediate requirements, it is authorized to issue an additional seven or eight millions which might not be required for a number of years, and pending its being required it is authorized to do what it pleases with that money, irrespective of the wishes of the minority shareholders.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to insist upon the absolute propriety in the public interest of this Bill setting forth in terms what my hon. friend has set forth as to its purpose. Those who are directly interested in transportation from the head of the lakes to the sea want to know whether the intent of this Bill is to increase transportation facilities on the lakes or to restrict competition in transportation. That can be made perfectly clear by a proper amendment to the Bill. If that is not done we are bound to assume that the purpose of the Bill is to enable this company to increase its capital by one-half for the purpose not of increasing its transportation facilities but of acquiring competitive facilities and thereby decreasing competition upon the lakes with corresponding benefit to the company.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood the Prime Minister to say that this was usual and somewhat extraordinary legislation. From that I am encouraged in insisting on clause two being struck out altogether, or being sufficiently defined, so that we will know exactly what it means. The directors under this are to be a law unto themselves and can do what they like with this money. Then we are not given any definite or clear understanding as to what the money is wanted for. I can only recall one precedent in 1904 or 1905 when the Canadian Pacific railway applied for an increase in capital and the hon. member for West Toronto (Sir Edmund Osler) had to furnish a detailed account of the purpose for which every dollar of that money was to be used. This is not a railway company, but a company of a similar character. It is asking for money to extend its works, to increase its terminal facilities, possibly to buy some boats, and to extend its plant generally. If the practice was good as applied to the Canadian Pacific railway, it is equally good applied to this company, and the particulars should be put in the hands of the Government and in the hands of the committee.

Progress reported.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. THOMSON: Mr. Speaker, when this House rose at six o'clock, I was proposing to discuss the desirability of removing this question from the field of party politics. Certain suggestions were made from this side of the House looking to that end. As I said at the beginning, the question has been thrust into the field of party politics by our friends opposite, but they do not seem disposed to give very much assistance in the way of removing it from that field. Any suggestions made from this side of the House have not been too well received, have not received too much sympathy from members opposite, or from the newspapers supporting them. It has been suggested on this side of the House that the Government should dissolve the House and appeal to the country on this question. Our friends opposite, however, do not seem to like that idea. I propose to make a further suggestion to see if it will meet with their approval. I would suggest that the question be referred directly to the people by means of a plebiscite. It seems to me that while we on this side are very anxious that it should be referred to the people by means of a general election, after all the other way may be the best. At least it would be the best way of finding out what is the actual wish of the people generally, and it would be as good a way as it is possible to adopt of removing this question from the field of contentious politics.

Personally, I am in favour of the principle of direct legislation. I am well aware that a great many members on both sides of this House do not approve of that principle. We are told that many of the best and ablest men both in this House and in other Houses of Parliament are strongly opposed to that principle, but the same thing might be said with regard to any forward movement that has ever been made in the world's history. There is no forward movement in the world's history that has not been opposed by some of the ablest and most conscientious men of the day. However, the world moves on, and our political institutions make progress, notwithstanding that opposition, and I venture to say that the time will come when the principle of direct legislation will be put generally into force. Personally, I would like to see the principle adopted in a general way. I do not say that it should necessarily be applied to every sort of legislation, but I should like to see it applied to all measures of a certain class. I do not wish to see the principle applied to special pieces of legislation that the Government or some party might wish to refer to the people in order to put the responsibility off their own shoulders on to the shoulders of the public. I say I would sooner see the principle generally adopted. My hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) says he is in favour of the general principle, but strangely enough he opposes the application of that principle in cases of this kind; just why, I can hardly understand. I notice that the only objection which he states, is to having questions affecting the safety of the nation referred to the people. He does not give any reason why he should object—why he thinks the people should not be trusted to look after the safety of the nation. It seems to me that if we are not to refer this question to the people because it affects the safety of the nation, my hon. friend from South York is in disagreement with his leader; because his leader, while he does not speak of direct legislation, says that the permanent policy which he intends to introduce, and which, we understand, is a policy looking to the safety of the nation, shall not be brought into effect until the people express their opinion upon it. It seems rather strange to find the leader of the Government saying that this question of the safety of the nation must be referred to the people in some way, and his followers saying that other questions may be referred, but that the people are not to be trusted on this particular question. I am glad to see that the leader of the Government has more faith in the people than my hon. friend from South York, or, to put it another way, I am sorry to see that the member for South York has so little faith in the people. He talks a great deal about faith sometimes, but apparently he is lacking in faith in this regard. This question is of all questions one that should be referred to the people. The general principle of referring questions to the people has already been adopted in most of our provinces in matters of municipal politics. It may be just to say that questions of ordinary expenditure, even if we do adopt the principle of direct legislation, should not be referred to the people, because the Government, in order to exist and to carry on the business of the country, must have it within their power to expend money for ordinary purposes and for carrying on the ordinary works of the country. But this is not an ordinary appropriation, but an extraordinary appropriation, and we cannot make it anything else. It is an extraordinary and unusual appropriation. I cannot see any ground for the objection of my hon. friend from South York. There are good reasons why we should make an exception in this case. Personally I am not in favour of taking special cases and referring them to the people, but prefer that we should adopt that policy generally. I am aware that many hon. gentlemen in this House are opposed to the principle of adopting the referendum generally. I think, however, that this is a case in which we should be prepared to drop our objections. It is important, I believe, that we should remove this question from the field of contentious politics. I think every hon. gentleman in this House acknowledges in the bottom of his heart that what I propose is right. We are not all acting as though we believed it, but I believe that every member is convinced that that is the proper course to pursue. I believe also that this is such a tremendous expenditure of the people's money that the people have a right to be consulted. We must remember that there is no way of actually getting at the real feelings of the people except by means of direct legislation. It is all very well to say that we can get at the views of the people in a general election. That plan was adopted in the last general election.

Mr. BLAIN: What would the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) say on that point?

Mr. THOMSON: The hon. member for South Renfrew is not here, but he is quite well able to answer for himself.

Mr. BLAIN: He stated in the debate that he was absolutely opposed to plebiscites.

Mr. THOMSON: The hon. member for South Renfrew is only one in this House. If my hon. friends opposite are willing to adopt the principle which I have suggested the hon. member for South Renfrew cannot stop them. I do not think my hon. friend need worry at all about my hon. friend from South Renfrew. I do not think he is worrying very much about him, but I do believe that he is worrying about his own party.

Mr. BLAIN: I did not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I was only answering a point by calling his attention to the fact that the hon. member for South Renfrew was not in favour of a principle which he stated everybody was in favour of.

Mr. THOMSON: I did not say that everybody was in favour of it. I am trying to induce everybody to accept that principle in this case. Even although it does not meet with our approval in every particular, I think that, in view of the importance of taking this question out of the field of contentious politics, we might sacrifice a little. I am willing to sacrifice a little. I said that everyone was in favour of taking this question out of party politics or at least that I believed that to be the case. I also said that, because this is such an unusual expenditure, the question should be referred to the people, for the same reason that we refer such questions to the people in municipal politics.

Mr. BURNHAM: What form should this question take?

Mr. THOMSON: The hon. member for Peterborough, I know, is a sort of animated interrogation point. Surely he does not expect me to fix the form for the Government ! I will be quite satisfied with any reasonable form the Government shall fix, so long as the question is framed in such a way as to get the views of the people. I trust my hon. friend is satisfied that I am not the Government.

Mr. BURNHAM : I would be satisfied if the hon. gentleman would leave it to the Government.

Mr. THOMSON: I am satisfied to leave the form to the Government. Does my hon. friend understand that ?

Mr. BURNHAM : I understand that.

Mr. THOMSON: Hon. gentlemen opposite profess to believe that the people are behind them on this question. They are also clearly on record as favourable to submitting the question of naval defence and a contribution to the people. They are almost unanimous on that point. This is their chance to carry out the policy which they approved of in opposition. If they were sincere then and if they really believe that the people are behind them now, I venture to say that they will submit this question to the people directly. If they do not, if they refuse to adopt the suggestion I am throwing out I submit that there is only one conclusion to which we can come. The only conclusion to which we can come is that they themselves recognize that the people are not behind them on this question and that they themselves recognize that if the people are given an opportunity to pronounce on this question they will turn it down and they will bury it beyond the hope of resurrection.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this House will regret that we are not to receive any more enlightenment from the other side upon this important question. I am the third to rise to-day in succession on your left to discuss the subject under consideration. I am satisfied that this is not the way in which Parliamentary procedure has been carried on in Canada and I know that at a very early date the government will change its attitude in that regard because the people want to have this question thoroughly discussed and ventilated. Silence will not carry the policy of the Government forward and it is not in the interests of the country that such tactics should prevail. Not having heard any speech to-day from the other side of the House in reply to what has been said by my hon. friends on this side of the House, I will have to refer back to some of the speeches which have previously been delivered and make an attempt to deal with some of the arguments which have been advanced in them. On the 5th December, in introducing the measure now before the House, the right hon. the Prime Minister presented the memorandum of the Admiralty Board and prefaced it with the following statement:

I have alluded to the difficulty of finding an acceptable basis upon which the great dominions, co-operating with the Mother Country in defence, can receive and assert an adequate voice in the control and moulding of foreign policy. . . I am assured by His Majesty's Government that, pending a final solution of the question of voice and influence, they would welome the presence in London of a Canadian minister during the whole or a portion of each year. Such minister would be regularly summoned to all meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence, and would be regarded as one of its permanent members. No important step in foreign policy would be undertaken without consultation with such a representative of Canada. This seems a very marked advance, both from our standpoint and from that of the United Kingdom. It would give to us an opportunity of consultation, and therefore an influence which hitherto we have not possessed. The conclusions and declarations of Great Britain in respect to foreign relations could not fail to be strengthened by the knowledge that such consultation and co-operation with the overseas dominions had become an accomplished fact.

Again, he said:

No thoughtful man can fail to realize that very complex and difficult questions confront those who believe that we must find a basis of permanent co-operation in naval defence, and that any such basis must afford to the overseas dominions an adequate voice in the moulding and control of foreign policy. It would have been idle to expect, and indeed we did not expect, to reach in the few weeks at our disposal during the past summer a final solution of that problem, which is not less interesting than difficult, which touches most closely the future destiny of the Empire, which is fraught with even graver significance for the British Islands than for Canada. But I conceive that its solution is not impossible; and, however difficult the task may be, it is not the part of wisdom or of statesmanship to evade it. And so we invite the statesmen of Great Britain to study with us this, the real problem of Imperial existence. The next ten or twenty years will be pregnant with great results for this Empire, and it is of infinite importance that questions of purely domestic concern, however urgent, shall not prevent any of us from rising 'to the height of this great argument.'

This is the most important phase of the question that is now before the House and the country. The question of voting $35,000,000 to the Imperial exchequer in defence of the Empire is to Canada a secondary one. Canada, owing to her fortunate position, owing to the immense strides she has made in the last few years, is in a position, if the circumstances warrant, to pay freely out of her exchequer such an amount as that. But that is not the question with which we are confronted at the present time. The Prime Minister has declared that the question with which we are embarrassed now is as to how we shall bring about co-operation between autonomy and defence.

Before entering into the discussion of this phase of the question, I shall glance briefly at the conditions under which Great Britain came into possession of Canada. It so happens that the humble member for Bonaventure, who is now addressing the House, is the descendant of a French family settled in Canada before the English first came, and I therefore feel some interest in referring to the matter. The French Canadians have been for a succession of years the faithful subjects of two of the greatest nations of the world, France and England. These two great nations have been at intervals rivals for centuries, but to-day they are allies, and it is a singular coincidence that at this very moment, when the British Empire, according to some, is threatened by that new German Empire which has arisen in Europe, England looks towards France as a valuable ally in case of need. Corbett, the author of a History of Seven Years War, the result of which gave Canada to England, shows from what small beginnings arise great wars which bring about the fate of nations. Describing the nature and object of the war Corbett says:

A most ill-judged advertisement from the war office has set all the ministers on fire and made them believe we are going to war, which is, I hope, the furthest from our thoughts. So, on October 10, 1754, the Duke of Newcastle, First Lord of the Treasury to King George the Second, wrote to the Earl of Albemarle, his ambassador in Paris. The latest news from America had been so serious that the Government had resolved secretly to reinforce the colonial garrisons, and the war office had let the secret out. So Albemarle was urged to represent the measures that were being taken as purely defensive, and to do all he could to preserve the peace, consistently with the necessary measures for securing our position in North America. Excuse this free letter Newcastle concluded in apology for disturbing the suavity of diplomatic intercourse with so much earnestness but we are on a precipice. I am sure you will keep us out if you can, and I think you may.

How far Newcastle saw into the precipice that yawned at his feet, it is difficult to say, but in its depths lay that mighty drama, which George Washington had already opened in the obscurity of the Ohio solitudes, and which he was to end in triumph before all the world with his declaration of independence.

The origin of the Franco-English war at that period was the publication of this ill-timed advertisement, which was intended to facilitate the sending of assistance to the British colonies in North America. The French at that time were puzzled how to complete the circle which they intended to place around the English colonies, by filling up the important gaps that lay between lake Erie and the upper waters of the Ohio river. La Galissonniere's dream of Empire had been communicated to Duquesne, the new governor, and in 1754 Duquesne went to what is now the site of Pittsburg and constructed a wooden fort, the remains of which are said to exist at the present day. There he was confronted with George Washington, who met with his first defeat at the hands of de Beaujeu, whose descendants still inhabit the province of Quebec. The ill-judged action of Newcastle precipitated this war at a time when England and France were seemingly upon the very best of terms, and this author tells us that at that very moment the English Minister of Foreign Affairs was on good terms with the French court and was sending his presents as usual to Madame de Pompadour, who then exercised great influence at the court of Louis XV. At all events, England sent her troops to Canada and they took possession of the country, under circumstances with which we are all familiar.

The proposition which the right hon. the Prime Minister now submits to this House would, in my opinion, if it were adopted, have the immediate result of reopening the whole constitutional question of our relations with the Mother Country. Some of us had the pleasure of sitting in this House with the late Sir John Bourinot who was clerk of the House up to the time of his death and, as we know, he has left some very valuable writings on the constitutional history of Canada. In a small book, entitled: 'How Canada is Governed,' Sir John Bourinot points out what the people of the colonies and the people of Ontario and of Quebec were able to obtain from England after a struggle of nearly one hundred years. The struggles of the past of Ontario and Quebec are known to us in history to-day and I am sure that no member of this House and no well-wisher of Canada would want that chapter reopened. Speaking after having given this matter close study, my impression is, that if we enter into the partnership of the Empire which is now proposed to us, we will to a certain extent reopen the whole constitutional question as we have had it in Canada in days gone past. Bourinot says:

As we look back over the century that had passed between the Treaty of Paris, which ceded Canada to England in 1763, and the Quebec convention of 1864, we can see that the struggles of the statesmen and people of British North America had won from England for all the provinces the concession of the following principles which lie at the foundation of our whole political structure:—

1. The establishment at an early period of Canadian history of the principle of religious toleration and equality of sects.

2. The guarantee given to the French-Canadians for the preservation of their law and language.

3. The adoption of the English criminal law in the French as well as the English provinces.

4. The establishment of representative institutions in every province.

5. The independence of the judiciary and its complete isolation from the political influences and conflicts.

6. Complete provincial control over all local revenues and expenditures through the people's assembly.

7. The right of Canadian legislatures to manage their purely local affairs without Imperial interference.

8. The establishment of municipal institutions and the consequent increase of public spirit in all the local divisions of the old provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

9. The adoption of the English principle of responsibility of the Legislative Assembly under which a ministry or executive council can only hold office while its members have seats in that body and possess the confidence of a majority of the people's elected representatives.

I am glad to know that these ideas of consitutional government still prevail in the old country, and that the British statesmen of to-day, worthy successors of those who governed the Empire in the past, who are familiar with the struggles in which the people of Canada engaged for nearly one hundred years to obtain concessions, have recognized it in the statement made in the memorandum from the Admiralty:

The Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material, and still more important moral, assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas, but they think it necessary to disclaim any intention, however indirect, of putting pressure upon Canadian public opinion, or of seeking to influence the Dominion Parliament in a decision which clearly belongs solely to Canada.

This is a recognition of the important principal that not only, as Bourinot says, in matters of local concern but in matters of Imperial concern, whatever step is taken by this Parliament will be taken after mature deliberation and the full responsibility for it must rest solely with the Parliament of Canada. We are here representatives of a growing and prosperous community; we represent men of various creeds and various origins but we are all British subjects, are all loyal to the King, we are loyal above all to Canada our country. No man here within the sound of my voice would hesitate one moment to vote this sum of $35,000,000 now asked for, if he were convinced in his heart and soul that that amount was really necessary or useful for the maintenance of British integrity and British power. We present to-day, unfortunately, the spectacle of a divided people, divided upon a question upon which we should be united; because the adoption of this resolution by a majority of this House, however large or however small, will diminish greatly its value in the eyes of the world, and in the eyes of the Empire. In a matter of this kind it is unfortunate that the sentiment of this House is not unanimous, as it was in 1909, when the matter was first brought up by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). That responsibility, however, does not rest with us. The country is familiar with what happened in the month of March, 1909, at the time of the German scare, and it is needless for me to enter into that phase of the question. I wish to point out another paragraph of the same work, to show what is now the settled policy of this country, recognized not only by this country but by the Imperial authorities. It is at page 66:

It is a fundamental principle of the English constitution that a people under English Government can be taxed only with their own consent through their representatives under the forms prescribed by law.

I claim, with all respect, although I have not the honour of being a member of the legal profession, that a proposal of this kind is not contemplated in the British North America Act—that this Government has no mandate from the people on this subject, and that this Parliament has no authority to take $35,000,000 of the public funds of Canada, and vote them to maintain warships in the North sea or anywhere else. In the British North America Act explicit power is given to this country to organize land and naval defence. The land and naval defence of Canada is confined to this country. The Conservative party in the past under Sir Geo. E. Cartier organized the land defence of Canada. The present leader of the Opposition was the first statesman in Canada to make a step forward in the organization of the naval defence of this country. I am free to speak of his action to-night in his absence, and say that it will be realized hereafter, if it is not realized by men of his own time, that in doing so he blazed the trail; and, though he is of an origin different from that of the majority of Canadian people, the services which he rendered to Canada and to the Empire at the time of the Boer war, and in 1909 in the unanimous adoption of this resolution by the Canadian Parliament, will never be forgotten.

Since England took possession of Canada, we have passed through various phases. We have had one hundred years of probably one of the most interesting constitutional experiences in the history of any nation. We first had military rule; then we had the Quebec Act; then we had the Constitutional Act; then we had the Act of Union, and, lastly we had the Act of Confederation. Each of these was an improvement and an amelioration on the preceding one. The Act of Confederation, under which we have been living for the last forty-three years, was the greatest improvement of all. Confederation was brought about, as we all know, for two main reasons: first, for the purpose of grouping together the colonies of British North America for the purpose of defence, at a time when British possessions in this country were not secure from an invasion from the great republic to the south. That was not the first time when British power in this country was threatened. Away back in 1776, the Americans invaded Quebec at a time when old Canada comprised practically only Quebec; they offered the people of Quebec many inducements to join them under the republican banner, which had been displayed in the American colonies to the south. It is a fact, therefore, which English-speaking people should never overlook, that, while men of their own blood had become rebels in the thirteen colonies of North America, Providence gave to the French-Canadians, the descendants of the pioneer citizens of this country, the settlement of the question as to whether British power should remain or should depart from this country. They decided in the affirmative, notwithstanding the blandishments of Franklin and Carrol, notwithsanding the inducements set out by Rochambeau and d'Estaing, notwithstanding all the efforts that were made with their clergy and their leading men by the American army itself after capturing Montreal. All this came to naught when, in facing Quebec, the commander of the Americans fell defeated, and the first invasion of Canada was at an end.

In 1812 the same experience was repeated, and in the county of Chateauguay, 300 French-Canadians, led by de Salaberry were able to cope successfully with 7,000 Americans and, in co-operation with the victory of Brock at Queenston, to maintain once more the British flag upon this continent.

We have, therefore, reason to be able to say to England to-day that, while this country has remained British, it has remained British because its first citizens realized that under the British flag could be found all that was necessary for freedom, for liberty of conscience, for progress, and for common security. It was, therefore, unnecessary, I think, and rather unfortunate, that the Admiralty, in sending a state paper of this kind—and it will be assumed that the Admiralty is a human institution—made the following statement to a country such as Canada:

> Whatever may be the decision of Canada at the present juncture, Great Britain will not in any circumstances fail in her duty to the overseas dominions of the Crown.
> She has before now successfully made head alone and unaided against the most formidable combinations and she has not lost her capacity by a wise policy and strenuous exertions to watch over and preserve the vital interests of the Empire.

As a Canadian, I say it has never been our intention to leave to England the defence of Canada. We are prepared, we have always been prepared,—we have proved it during a hundred years, and we are willing to prove it now that we are prepared—to stand and defend the Empire and to carry our full share of the burden. The only question which remains to be settled is how that can be best brought about.

Before I enter into the discussion of the merits of the question, you might perhaps bear with me for a few moments while I give two or three very short quotations from the leaders of the Conservative party, the men who were the great giants of the party now entrusted with the administration of affairs, to show under what condition Canada brought about and secured the foundation of the North American Confederation. The three men whom I wish to quote are Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George E. Cartier and Sir A. T. Galt. They will tell us in very few words what were the responsibilities which we assumed at the time of Confederation, what were our relations then with England, and what England gave us when she gave us the British North America Act. I am stating this simply for the purpose of showing how important it is that these great principles should not be overlooked. The question of voting this money is a secondary consideration. There are certain principles which guided the formation of the Dominion as it is to-day, and it is to the friends of the Dominion, the friends of all the dominions, it is to the friends of the Empire that I wish to submit these utterances of the giants of the Conservative party, to show, before it is too late that what is attempted to be done here is not in the interest of the British Empire, and is not for the maintenance of British authority and power on the American continent. Let us benefit by history. We know what happened in the North American colonies when the Imperial Government sought to interfere in their affairs. British diplomacy has learned a great deal since that time, and this paragraph in the memorandum which I have had, the honour to quote to you shows that no pressure is brought to bear upon Canada and none is intended to be brought to bear, but we are left entirely free to discuss this question. Sir John Macdonald, in introducing the measure about the Confederation of Canada, as reported in the Confederation debates, said:

I believe, that while England has no desire to lose her colonies, but wishes to retain them, while I am satisfied that the public mind of England would deeply regret the loss of these provinces—yet, if the people of British North America after full deliberation had stated that they considered it was for their interest, for the advantage of the future of British North America to sever the tie, such is the generosity of the people of England, that, whatever their desire to keep these colonies, they would not seek to compel us to remain unwilling subjects of the British Crown. If, therefore, at the conference, we had arrived at the conclusion, that it was for the interest of these provinces that severance should take place, I am sure that Her Majesty and the Imperial Parliament would have sanctioned that severance. We accordingly felt that there was a propriety in giving a distinct declaration of opinion on that point, and that, in framing the constitution its first sentence should declare 'that the executive authority or government shall be vested in the Sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.'

And he goes on:

The desire to remain connected to Great Britain and to retain our allegiance to Her Majesty was unanimous.

That desire still prevails in Canada. And the Prime Minister of that day, Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, gave a word which has now become familiar to every man, woman and child in Canada—that the last gun to be fired in defence of Canada's connection with Great Britain would be fired by a French-Canadian.

Sir John said further:

Not a single suggestion was made that it could, by any possibility, be for the interest of the colonies, or of any section or portion of them, that there should be a severance of our connection. Although we knew it to be possible that Canada, from her position, might be exposed to all the horrors of war, by reason of causes of hostility arising between Great Britain and the United States—causes over which we had no control and which we had no hand in bringing about—yet there was a unanimous feeling of willingness to run all the hazards of war, if war must come, rather than lose the connection between the Mother Country and these colonies.

Liberal as I am, I am proud to be able to speak for my countrymen of the Liberal party when I say that though forty-six years have passed since these words were spoken by the great leader of the Conservative party, the sentiments of the Canadian people have remained the same. We wish to remain British subjects; and we wish that the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people should be masters of their own destinies. The problems in which we are more competent to express an opinion than is the elector or even the Parliament of Great Britain we wish to settle for ourselves. And as to the settlement of the important question which is now before the House, my humble opinion is that no satisfactory solution will be brought about until the people of this country have been consulted and been given an opportunity to say what they want. The right hon. Prime Minister is anxious to do something for the Empire, evidently; but he is anxious, at the same time, that we should enter into the foreign policy of Great Britain. Does any man fully realize what it means for a small country like Canada—small after all compared with Great Britain—to enter into the foreign policy of Great Britain? We all know that at the present time there are hundreds of treaties binding on Great Britain—binding some of them on us, though the interpretation given by the Imperial authorities is that we can be relieved of those treaties—which it would be ridiculous to attempt to make binding upon Canada. There are some of these treaties the mere mention of which is enough to give food for thought. I may mention a few of them—not the commercial treaties, because these commercial treaties we may be excepted from, but some of the political treaties. People do not seem to think what it is to shoulder responsibility of this foreign policy of Great Britain, and to have a voice in the framing of that foreign policy. Mr. Gibson Bowles has made a list to (1900) of British treaty obligations. It is in part as follows:

Thus she has guaranteed that Belgium shall form an independent and perpetually neutral state.

She has undertaken, in case of the attack of an invader, to protect Chusan and its dependencies.

She has guaranteed that the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg shall henceforth form a perpetually neutral state.

She has guaranteed the integrity and perpetual neutrality of Switzerland.

She has guaranteed, as against Russia, the territories of Norway and Sweden.

She has guaranteed the independence and territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

She has guaranteed Greece as a monarchial, independent and constitutional state.

She has especially guaranteed, as against Russia, all the Ottoman possessions in Asia.

And most especially and most repeatedly has Great Britain guaranteed her most ancient ally, Portugal. . . to defend and protect all conquest of her colonies belonging to the Crown of Portugal.

The right hon. Prime Minister proposes that we should enter upon the consideration of relations such as these. Will Canada have a voice in the framing of the foreign policy of Great Britain throughout the world? Is that the task we are about to undertake? Is that the consideration that would be given to us for our contribution of $35,000,000? I hope the Prime Minister has no such intention; because if our sessions are long now, lasting six months, I am afraid that twelve calendar months will not be sufficient for the consideration of these questions. I would like that whatever is done for the defence of the Empire should be done unanimously by the Canadian people, if possible; that it should be done unanimously by the Canadian Parliament. Three years ago we were unanimous on this question. I did not have the pleasure of voting on that question, but I had the pleasure of putting it to the House. I have the advantage, or disadvantage, of being the only member now sitting in the Parliament who was also a member of last Parliament who was not called upon either to speak for or against the navy, for the reason that I occupied then the exalted position which you now occupy, Mr. Speaker, so creditably to yourself and to the House. But I wish it to be understood, that, in so far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to enter into a policy such as this. I have no mandate from my electors for anything of that kind. I have been elected by them to this House to deal with questions affecting Canada, Canadian questions, to deal with what is of interest and importance to them; but as for guaranteeing the neutrality of kingdoms beyond the sea, meddling in the affairs of the Ottoman Empire, or Persia or Abyssinia or other kingdoms, I am not prepared to enter into any policy of that kind. I am prepared, speaking in their name, to do what I think is right for the maintenance of British rule in this country. But at the same time, as we maintain British rule, I would like to maintain, and I know I am fulfilling my duty in maintaining the rights of the Canadian people because British rule can only be maintained in America in so far as the rights of the Canadian people are maintained, and interference from the British Government can only bring about disaster, in the twentieth century as it brought about disaster unfortunately, in the eighteenth century. The British Government have learned by experience, and will not ask us to do this or do that. They will leave the matter with us. What remains for us to decide is whether the proposal now made by the Government is a proper one to meet the case, or whether we should resort to another.

I have promised to give extracts from three Conservative leaders. I mentioned Sir John A. Macdonald because he was the great man of Confederation. How profitable it sometimes is to glance at history. We have heard it said that when the present leader of the Opposition, in company with the then leader of the Opposition, agreed to bring about the creation of a Canadian navy, that was surely a step towards separation from Great Britain. Is it not extraordinary that Sir John Macdonald had to contend with an argument of that kind when, in bringing about Confederation, he was told that it was the first step towards the independence of Canada? If we are to be met at every turn, at every step forward, with the statement that it means the separation of Canada, we shall have to turn back the clock, to look backward, and return to the old days when Canada was a province ruled by a military governor from Great Britain. Sir John said:

One argument, but not a strong one, has been used against this Confederation, that it is an advance towards independence. Some are apprehensive that the very fact of our forming this union will hasten the time when we shall be severed from the Mother Country. I have no apprehension of that kind. I believe it will have the contrary effect. I believe that as we grow stronger, that as it is felt in England we have become a people, able from our union, our strength, our population and the development of our resources, to take our position among the nations of the world, she will be less willing to part with us than she would be now, when we are broken up into a number of insignificant colonies, subject to attack piecemeal without any concerted action or common organization of defence. I am strongly of opinion that year by year, as we grow in population and strength, England will more and more see the advantages of maintaining the alliance between British North America and herself.

These words, that fell from the lips of a statesman should be given full consideration before such a momentous decision as that which we are now called upon to make. Let me proceed a few lines further:

Does any one imagine that, when our population, instead of three and a half, will be seven millions, as it will be ere many years pass, we would be one whit more willing than now to sever the connection with England? Would not those seven millions be just as anxious to maintain their allegiance to the Queen and their connection with the Mother Country, as we are now? Will the addition to our members of the people of the lower provinces in any way lessen our desire to continue our connection with the Mother Country? I believe the people of Canada East and West to be truly loyal.

These were the words of a statesman. They were spoken after the experiment of trying to govern this country by having one province rule at the expense of another, after a deadlock which had existed for years between Ontario and Quebec, after the fear of invasion from the American colonies, at a time when the roar of cannon mentioned by the Prime Minister was heard, not in the Balkans, but within not many hundred miles of the place where we are now met to deliberate on a mementous question. Representatives of the people then declared that Confederation of the North American colonies meant an alliance with England, the alliance of one nation with another nation.

As I understand it is the wish of the House, as we have no sitting to-morrow, to adjourn at an early hour to enable certain members who wish to leave the capital to do so, I will, with your permission, move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On Hotion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 6, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 117, respecting the Canadian Western Railway Company.—Mr. Aikins.

Bill No. 118, respecting the Imperial Traction Company.—Mr. Clark (Bruce).

Bill No. 119, respecting the Prudential Trust Company, Limited.—Mr. Macdonell.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) stated the other day that a question of his which had not been answered had been dropped from the Order Paper. On making inquiry, I find that the question was answered at the time, and, therefore, it properly disappeared from the Order Paper.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): The answer given was that the matter was under the consideration of the Government, which is no answer at all.

Mr. MARCIL.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is the right of a minister to give such answer as he deems suitable, and the answer given in this case is an answer which is frequently given by members of Government.

HOMESTEAD INSPECTIONS.

Mr. KNOWLES:

How many inspections were made during the months of June and July, 1912, by homestead inspectors Shields, McLaren, Erratt and Rathwell, respectively?

Mr. ROCHE: Shields, 25; McLaren, 34; Erratt, 47; Rathwell, 72.

HOUSE OF COMMONS LAW BRANCH.

Mr. WILSON (Laval):

1. Has the report of the Royal Commission appointed to examine into the affairs of the Law Branch of the House of Commons been received? If so, when and by whom?
2. Who were the persons who formed that commission and what were their instructions?
3. What did the commisson find and what recommendations did it make?
4. Has the Government taken any action in consequence?
5. Does the Government intend to place the report of the commission or any other documents relating thereto on the table of the House? If not, for what reason?

Mr. BORDEN: An inquiry was made by Dr. Adam Shortt, of the Civil Service Commission, and Mr. W. D. Hogg, K.C., of Ottawa. Their report is under consideration. Further information will be given to the House at a later date.

EMPLOYMENT OF LOUIS LAVOIE.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

1. Is Mr. Louis Lavoie, of St. Paschal, county of Kamouraska, in the employment of the Department of Agriculture or of any other department?
2. If so, what are his duties, what is his salary and who recommended his appointment?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Louis Lavoie, of Rivière du Loup, is employed by the Department of Railways and Canals on the Intercolonial railway at Rivière du Loup.
2. Extra trackman; his rate of pay is $1.70 per day and he was recommended by Dr. Luc LeBel.

DOMINION LAND AT PRINCE ALBERT.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina):

1. Was the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8, in township 49, range 26, west of the 2nd meridian, a part of a forest reserve?
2. If so, was it ever made available for homestead entry, and on what date was it made so available?

3. Was any notice that the land was available for homestead entry given to the public? If so, what notice was given, and what was the nature of such notice?

4. Who was allowed to enter for the land as a homestead, and what was the date of such entry?

5. Were any instructions sent by the Government, or any member thereof, to the Dominion lands agent at Prince Albert, directing such agent to accept the application of any particular person or persons for the said land?

6. Is the Government aware that the said piece of land is said to form a part of the city of Prince Albert?

7. Has patent for said land been issued? If so, on what date and to whom?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. No. It was included in land set aside by the department with the intention of having it form part of a forest reserve, but subsequently this parcel with others along the southern boundary of the proposed reserve were found to be good agricultural lands and were withdrawn prior to the establishment of the reserve.

2. Yes; March, 1909.

3. No.

4. Arthur Donaldson, 16th April, 1912.

5 and 6. As far as the records of the Department of the Interior are concerned, no.

7. Yes. 19th November, 1912. Arthur Donaldson, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan.

MOOSEJAW LAND DISTRICT.

Mr. KNOWLES:

How many inspections were made during the months of June and July, 1912, by homestead inspector Miller, of the Moosejaw land district?

Mr. ROCHE: 33.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.):

1. Has a contract been entered into for the construction of a steamer for the proposed car ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland?

2. If so, who are the contractors, and where will the said steamer be built?

3. What will be her nominal and indicated horse-power?

4. How many tenders were received, and what was the amount of each tender?

5. What is the amount of the tender which has been accepted, and what will the steamer cost when completed and ready for the service?

6. When will the service be commenced?

7. Has a contract been entered into for the construction of the necessary piers? If not, why why not?

8. Have the plans, specifications and estimates of the piers been completed?

9. If so, when will the piers be built and what is the estimated cost of each?

10. Has it been decided to standardize the gauge of the Prince Edward Island Railway? If so, have the plans, specifications and estimates of the work been prepared, and what is the estimated cost?

11. When will the work of standardizing the said railway be commenced, and when is it expected to be finished?

12. Will tenders be called for this work, or will it be done by day labour under the supervision of the department?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. An Order-in-Council was passed on January 9, 1913, awarding a contract for the proposed car ferry service, which contract is now under preparation.

2. The contract was awarded to Sir W. G. Armstrong Whitworth & Co., Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, at their works.

3. 7,000 indicated horse power, collectively.

4. Four: (a) Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth & Co. England, £138,000 sterling. (b) Canadian Vickers Ltd., London Eng., 2 tenders: No. 1, £112,480 sterling; No. 2, £110,700 sterling. (c) Swan, Hunter & Wigham, Richardson, Ltd., Wallsend-On-Tyne, England, £140,000 sterling.

5. Amount of tender accepted, £138,000 sterling.

6. It is expected the service will be commenced some time during the year, 1914.

7. No; but plans, specifications and an estimated cost, for the necessary piers, &c., are being prepared.

8. No.

9. Answered by numbers 7 and 8.

10. The matter is receiving the attention of the Government.

11. The matter is under consideration.

12. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.):

1. Will any dredging be required on either side of the Northumberland Straits in connection with the proposed car ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland?

2. If so, how much will be needed, and what is the estimated cost?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes. Some dredging will be required.

2. Plans, specifications and estimates in connection with the proposed car ferry service are not completed.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EMPLOYEES' WINTER CLOTHES.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Have the railway trainmen on the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways been furnished their usual suits of winter clothes? If not to all, have any of the classes of trainmen received them? If not, what is the cause of the delay?

2. Were tenders asked for the supply of such clothing? If so, who were the tenderers and what were their figures or prices respectively?

3. If contracts were not made after public tenders, were the purchases made by private contract, with whom and at what prices on the several divisions respectively?

4. Have the train or ticket agents received their winter suits of clothes? If so, from whom were they purchased and at what prices?

5. Have the railway conductors received their suits of winter clothes? If not what has caused the delay?

Mr. COCHRANE :

1. The railway trainmen comprising conductors of parlour cars, sleeping and dining cars, sleeping car porters, brakemen and train agents have not yet all been furnished with their usual winter uniforms. Twenty-eight of the fifty-four parlour, dining car conductors and sleeping car conductors and porters, have received theirs. The delay in receiving the other uniforms, which the contractors promise to deliver next week, was partly due to delay in receiving the cloth for these uniforms and partly due to the tailors themselves.

2. The serge for the uniforms was purchased from Mickleborough, Muldrew & Co., Toronto, at the following prices: Serge for uniforms of brakemen at $1.75 per yard, serge for uniforms of conductors, policemen, train agents, dining, parlour and sleeping car conductors and porters at $2.75 per yard; for the making of these uniforms, tenders, as per attached summary, were received.

3. For the making of the Intercolonial railway uniforms on the line east and west of Moncton, the offer of Roop & Co., Truro, was accepted; for the making of uniforms north of Moncton, the offer of J. A. Ferland, Quebec, was accepted; for the uniforms required on the Prince Edward Island railway, the offer of Geo. McQuaid, Charlottetown, was accepted.

4. Thirteen of eighteen train agents have received their uniforms. They were supplied by Roop & Co. and J. A. Ferland, at the prices named in answer Number 2.

5. A small proportion of the conductors have received their uniforms; the contractors promise that they will deliver the balance next week. The delay was partly due to not receiving the cloth on time, and partly due to the tailors themselves and our having to return some of the uniforms, they not being made according to specification.

CHAMBLY CANAL.

Mr. DEMERS :

1. In the session 1910-11, what sum of money was voted by Parliament for macadamizing the public roads along west of the Chambly canal, county of St. John's and Iberville?

2. What amount of this sum was so expended during the year 1911?

Mr. COCHRANE :

1. Amount of vote, $16,000.00.

2. Amount expended, $15,237.04.

Mr. EMMERSON.

MILITIA PERMANENT FORCE SUPPLIES.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

Who are supplying the militia permanent force at Halifax, N.S., for the year following April 1, 1912, with the following articles:—bacon, jams and butter, and at what prices respectively?

Mr. HUGHES :

1. The contractors for butter are Messrs. Smith & Proctor, Halifax, at the following prices: dairy butter, 24 cents per pound; creamery butter, 27 cents per pound. These prices are for butter supplied either in one pound prints or in firkins. The contractors for bacon are Messrs. Davis & Fraser, Halifax; the prices are: breakfast bacon, 15 cents per pound; green bacon, 10 cents per pound. The contractor for jams is E. D. Smith, Winona, Ontario, at 63 cents per 7-pound tins.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

Mr. COCKSHUTT :

1. Is the report of the Royal Commission on Technical Education yet completed?

2. How soon is it likely to be brought down to the House?

Mr. CROTHERS : I am advised by the chairman of the commission that the report has not yet been completed, but will likely be early next month.

CLAIMS OF PELAGIC SEALING.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Does the Government intend to compensate the persons formerly interested in sealing off the British Columbia coast and in the waters of the Pacific, for the losses sustained by them owing to the stoppage of pelagic sealing?

2. Does the Government intend to appoint a commission to consider and determine the amount of such compensation? If so, when will this commission be appointed?

3. What are the names of parties who have filed claims with the Government, if any, and the amount of each claim so filed?

Mr. HAZEN:

1 and 2. The matters are under consideration.

3. No stated claims have yet been filed.

FIGHTING ISLAND FISHING RIGHTS.

*Mr. McCOIG:

1. What is the date of the arbitrator's report fixing the annual value of the fishing rights of Charles H. Gauthier on Fighting island in the Detroit river?

2. At what amount was the annual value of the said fishing rights fixed or determined by the said arbitrators?

Mr. HAZEN:

1 and 2. The submission to arbitration was revoked before a conclusion was reached, and as a consequence the arbitrators had no power to make an authoritative award.

GOVERNMENT LAND PURCHASES, OTTAWA.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Within an area north of Wellington street and west of Bank street, in the city of Ottawa, what properties have been purchased or acquired by the Government, from whom were the purchases made, and what was the price paid, or agreed to be paid, in each case?
2. How many of the said properties are not yet paid for, who are the owners thereof, and what amount, if any, is in dispute in each case?
3. What are the names of the persons who were employed in any capacity, or for any purpose, in connection with the purchase of the said properties, and what were the terms of their employment?
4. What amount has been paid to each, what further amounts are to be paid to such persons, and what are their respective names?
5. Has the Government employed any persons or agents to collect rents from the tenants or occupants of any of the said properties? If so, what are the names of such rent collectors, for what period are they employed, and what amount by way of salary, fees, or commission, has been paid to each?
6. What was the total amount paid by the Government up to January 31, 1913, in connection with the purchase or acquisition of the said properties?

Order for return agreed to.

ALDERSHOT CAMP—ICE SUPPLY.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What were the amounts paid for filling the ice house at Aldershot, on the camp grounds in the years 1909, 1910 and 1911 respectively?
2. What amount has been paid in the present year?
3. Have tenders been called for the supply of ice in 1911 and 1912?
4. What are the names of the parties supplying ice in each of said years?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria and Haliburton):

1. 1909, $121.12; 1910, nothing; 1911, $145.80.
2. Fiscal year 1912-13, $325—lowest tender received.
3. Yes.
4. 1911, Wellington Sanford; 1912, Kenneth Sharpe.

FARMERS' BANK COMMISSION.

Mr. HENDERSON:

1. Has the report of the Royal Commission appointed to examine into the affairs of the Farmers' Bank been received by the Government?
2. If not, when does the Government expect to receive such report?

Mr. WHITE:

1. No.
2. Before the end of the present month.

LARRY'S RIVER AND CHARLOS' COVE MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has a contract been entered into for carrying the mails between Guysborough and Larry's River and Charlos' Cove?
2. If so, what is the name of the contractor, the yearly amount and date of contract?
3. What are the names of all parties who tendered for this service and the amount of each tender?
4. Who are sureties for the present contractor?

Mr. PELLETIER: This contract not being yet completed, it is not deemed advisable to give particulars now. They will be given as soon as the matter is closed.

YARMOUTH NORTH POST OFFICE.

Mr. LAW:

What were the receipts from the sale of stamps, money orders and postal notes at the post office at Yarmouth North, Yarmouth county, Nova Scotia, for each of the months of October, November and December for the years 1911 and 1912, respectively?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1911.	Revenue.	Money Orders issued.	Postal Notes sold.
Oct.	$115.45	$3,142.08	$13.90
Nov.	106.40	3,448.07	15.11
Dec.	187.23	3,981.88	31.62
1912.
Oct.	57.61	705.88	41.11
Nov.	72.49	502.97	49.41
Dec.	143.66	732.09	57.63

UNIFORM BRITISH NATURALIZATION.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: With regard to the question of Imperial naturalization, which we discussed a short time ago, I see a cable despatch to several of the Canadian papers stating that action by the Imperial Government has been delayed on this question on account of the objections raised by the Canadian Government. Perhaps the Minister of Justice will let us know what justification there is for this cable despatch, and what the position of matters is.

Mr. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I am at a loss to understand how it can be correctly said that delay has resulted from our action. The last communication went from our side on the 4th of December, and we are yet awaiting an answer. I did say the other day that the precise form of an amendment which had been suggested and, as I understood, accepted in principle, had not been settled. Our communication of the 4th of December is still unanswered, and I believe it is still under consideration on the other side.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, resumed from February 4.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): When I had the honour, on Tuesday evening, of moving the adjournment of the debate, I had reached a point in my argument where I was attempting to show that the Prime Minister, under the proposals now before us, is proposing to bring about a change in the relations which exist between Canada and the Empire. I had the honour to discuss that point and to read to the House the declaration made by Sir John Macdonald in the Confederation debates to show that the basis of the Confederation of the Dominion of Canada had been an undertaking by the Canadian people to govern and defend these North American colonies under the British constitution. I promised also to quote two other statesmen of that period. Sir A. T. Galt and Sir George Cartier. I will quote first Sir George Cartier to indicate some of the conditions under which Confederation was brought about and the undertaking which Canada assumed at that time, as a reminder at the present time to the men in office and charged with responsibility by the Canadian people that in bringing about any change in the relations between Canada and the Empire they are assuming vast responsibility. Attorney General Cartier said this:

> Confederation was, as it were, at this moment almost forced upon us. We could not shut our eyes to what was going on beyond the lines, where a great struggle was going on between two confederacies, at one time forming but one confederacy. We saw that a government, established not more than eighty years ago, had not been able to keep together the family of states which had broken up four or five years since. We could not deny that the struggle now in progress must necessarily influence our political existence. We did not know what would be the result of that war—whether it would end in the establishment of two confederacies or one as before. However, we had to do with five colonies, inhabited by men of the same sympathies and interests, and in order to become a great nation they require only to be brought together under one general government. The matter resolved itself into this, either we must obtain British North American confederation or be absorbed in an American confederation. Some entertained the opinion that it was necessary to have British North American confederation to prevent absorption into the vortex of American confederation. Such parties were mistaken. We knew the policy of England towards us—that she was determined to help and support us in any struggle with our neighbours. The British provinces, separated as at present, could not defend themselves alone, and the question resolved itself into this: shall the whole strength of the Empire be concentrated into Prince Edward Island or Canada, as the case may be, in case of a war with the United States—or shall the provinces be left to fight single-handed, disunited? We were not sufficiently united. We had our duties, with regard to England, to perform. In order to secure the exercise of her power in our defence we must help ourselves.

The leader at that time of the Government for the province of Quebec undertook to show the Canadian people that the first and most important duty Canada had to perform at that time was to put an end to the controversies between Ontario and Quebec, which had existed for many years after the union of the provinces, as to representation by population, secularization of the clergy reserves, and various other grievances with which the descendants of the early settlers had to contend. Another step forward had been taken; Canada under Sir John A. Macdonald had become a nation, and the time had come when any proposed alliance would be brought about, not between a dependency and the Mother Country, but between one nation and another. In giving us the British North America Act, Great Britain admitted once and for all that, as concerning Canada and Canadian affairs, the Parliament of Canada, made up of the representatives of the Canadian people, was supreme. In giving us the British North America Act, Great Britain gave us power to defend Canada by land and by sea. As I have already pointed out, Sir George Etienne Cartier organized our land forces, and it was left to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his cabinet to commence the organization of our sea forces. Unfortunately we stand to-day, in the eyes of the Empire, on a great Imperial question, a divided people. The least that can be said is that the members sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, represent one-half of the Canadian people, and, as I say, we of this Parliament are in the eyes of the Empire and of the world at large, divided on this great question. What value would be attached by England to this $35,000,000 contribution if it were felt that the amount was contributed with the consent of only one-half of the Canadian people? That is the unfortunate position in which we find ourselves; but I know that on a question affecting the maintenance of the British Empire, every Canadian worthy of the name—regardless of his origin, regardless of his political ties—is determined that, come what may, British supremacy and British institutions must be maintained in this country.

Before leaving this feature of the matter, allow me to read a few words penned by Sir A. T. Galt, in 1859, who was at the time Minister of Finance, and who represented more particularly the English-speaking element of the province of Quebec. He it was who made the declaration of fiscal independence taken up in 1878 by Sir John A. Macdonald, and resolved into the National Policy which kept our friends opposite in power for so many years. In this brief statement of Sir A. T. Galt the sentiment expressed is to the effect that in fiscal and political matters of Canadian concern the Canadian people and the Canadian Parliament should be supreme. This statement should have some weight with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, because it comes from one who in the long line of distinguished persons the Conservative party has given to the service of the country, is one of the best men that political organization has produced.

When the Canadian tariff of 1859 proved to be of a distinctly protective character, various petitions against it were sent from British Chambers of Commerce, and on August 13 the Colonial Secretary, the Duke of Newcastle, wrote to the Governor General, Sir Edmund Head.

The idea prevailing at that time in England, and held particularly by the commercial classes, was that Canada had no right to enact a tariff which imposed duties upon British goods, and here is the statement made by Sir A. T. Galt in respect to this communication from the colonial secretary:

It is to be deeply regretted that His Grace should have given to so great a degree the weight of his sanction to the statements in the memorial, without having previously afforded to the Government of Canada the opportunity of explaining the fiscal policy of the province, and the grounds upon which it rests. The representations upon which His Grace appears to have formed his opinions are those of a provincial town in England, professedly actuated by selfish motives; and it may fairly be claimed for Canada, that the deliberate acts of its legislature, representing nearly three millions of people, should not have been condemned by the Imperial Government on such authority until the fullest opportunity of explanation had been afforded. It is believed that nothing in the legislation of Canada warrants the expressions of disapproval which are contained in the despatch of His Grace, but that, on the contrary, due regard has been had to the welfare and prosperity of Her Majesty's Canadian subjects.

From expressions used by His Grace in reference to the sanction of the Provincial Customs Act, it would appear that he had even entertained the suggestion of its disallowance; and though happily Her Majesty has not been so advised, yet the question having been thus raised, and the consequences of such a step, if ever adopted, being of the most serious character, it becomes the duty of the provincial Government distinctly to state what they consider to be the position and rights of the Canadian legislature.

Respect to the Imperial Government must always dictate the desire to satisfy them that the policy of this country is neither hastily nor unwisely formed; and that due regard is had to the interests of the Mother Country as well as of the province. But the Government of Canada acting for its legislature and people cannot, through those feelings of deference which they owe to the Imperial authirities, in any way waive or disminish the right of the people of Canada to decide for themselves both as to the mode and extent to which taxation shall be imposed. The provincial ministry are at all times ready to afford explanations in regard to the acts of the legislature to which they are party; but subject to their duty and allegiance to Her Majesty, their responsibility in all general questions of policy must be to the provincial parliament, by whose confidence they administer the affairs of the country; and in the imposition of taxation, it is so plainly necessary that the administration and the people should be in accord, that the former cannot admit responsibility or require approval beyond that of the local legislature. Self-government would be utterly annihilated if the views of the Imperial Government were to be preferred to those of the people of Canada. It is therefore the duty of the present Government distinctly to affirm the right of the Canadian legislature to adjust the taxation of the people in the way they deem best, even if it should unfortunately happen to meet the disapproval of the Imperial ministry. Her Majesty cannot be advised to disallow such acts, unless her advisers are prepared to assume the administration of the affairs of the colony irrespective of the views of its inhabitants.

The Imperial government are not responsible for the debts and engagements of Canada. They do not maintain its judicial, educational or civil service; they contribute nothing to the internal government of the country, and the provincial legislature acting through a ministry directly responsible to it, has to make provision for all these wants; they must necessarily claim and exercise the widest latitude as to the nature and extent of the burthens to be placed upon the industry of the people. The provincial government believes that His Grace must have their own conviction on this important subject; but, as serious evil would have resulted had His Grace taken a different course, it is wiser to prevent future complication by distinctly stating the position that must be maintained by every Canadian administration.

There we have in a nutshell the statement made by the Conservative party while in office, a statement accepted by Sir John Macdonald, ratified by the people of Canada in 1879 at the time of the adoption of the national policy and which is now in force, that no matter what may be the proposals of the British Government, no matter whether these proposals may come from the Home Office, the Colonial Office or the Admiralty Board, the Canadian representatives and the Canadian administration have a first duty to fulfil and that first duty is to expend the revenue from the taxation of Canada for the purposes of Canada, regardless of whatever views may prevail in Imperial quarters upon our duties. Therefore I deem it of the utmost importance that before any action is taken in this matter the position of Canada should first be weighed, before that of the Empire at large or before that of even the Mother Country.

I wish to read one further short quotation before entering upon the discussion of the memorandum which is now before us. I wish to quote from one of the most gifted speakers who ever spoke in this House, one of the most gifted men Ireland ever gave to this country, a man who, the night he fell under the bullet of the assassin, had pronounced one of the great speeches which have made his name a household word throughout Canada, the late Thomas D'Arcy McGee. These are his words in the debates at Confederation and they are pregnant with meaning at the present moment.

England warned us by several matters of fact, according to her custom, rather than verbiage, that the colonies had entered upon a new era of existence, a new phase in their career. She has given us this warning in several different shapes—when she gave us 'Responsible Government'—when she adopted free trade—when she repealed the navigation laws—and when, three or four years after, she commenced that series of official despatches in relation to militia and defence which she has ever since poured in on us, in a steady stream, always bearing the same solemn burthen—'prepare! prepare! prepare!' These warnings gave us notice that the old order of things between the colonies and the Mother Country had ceased, and that a new order must take its place. (Hear, hear.) About four years ago, the first despatches began to be addressed to this country, from the Colonial Office, upon the subject. From that day to this there has been a steady stream of despatches in this direction either upon particular or general points connected with our defence; and I venture to say, that if bound up together, the despatches of the lamented Duke of Newcastle alone would make a respectable volume—all notifying this Government by the advices they conveyed, that the relations—the military apart from the political and commercial relations of this province to the Mother Country had changed; and we were told in the most explicit language that could be employed, that we were no longer to consider ourselves, in relation to defence, in the same position we formerly occupied towards the Mother Country. Well, these warnings have been friendly warnings; and if we have failed to do our part in regard to them, we must, at all events, say this, that they were addressed to our Government so continuously and so strenuously that they freed the Imperial power of responsibility for whatever might follow, because they showed to the colonies clearly what, in the event of certain contingencies arising, they had to expect. We may grumble or not at the necessity of preparation England imposes upon us, but, whether we like it or not, we have, at all events, been told that we have entered upon a new era in our military relations to the rest of the Empire.

Those were the notes of warning spoken in this House at the time of Confederation, which were given fruition in the adoption of Confederation by the immense majority of the Canadian people. These principles have since been accepted and followed, and I am sure that no man now representing the people at large would undertake to change those conditions without giving to that proposal the deepest consideration.

The right hon. the Prime Minister, after dealing with what seems to him our pressing duty of entering into a better understanding with the Empire with regard to defence and to trade, went on to say that

With the enormous increase of naval power which has been undertaken by all great nations in recent years, this tremendous responsibility has cast an almost impossible burden upon the British Islands, which for nearly a thousand years have exercised so profound an influence upon the world's history. That burden is so great that the day has come when either the existence of this Empire will be imperilled or the young and mighty dominions must join with the Motherland to make secure the common safety and the common heritage of all.

Can it be fairly contended that Great Britain is reduced to this point that a contribution of $35,000,000 from this country will change her position in the eyes of the world? I should rather take the view that was taken by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in the interesting speech which he gave us the other night that the Prime Minister is now undertaking to pay to a certain extent a moral obligation which consists in meeting the expenditure of $400,000,000 incurred by Great Britain in the maintenance of British authority in North America. To meet a debt of $400,000,000 by a payment of $35,000,000 is indeed a very poor way of meeting a moral obligation; but I hope that is not the view which will be taken by this House or by the country. We are told then in the words of the Prime Minister that this is to pay an obligation, that Great Britain has now a burden almost too heavy for her to carry. This naval question may seem to us in this Parliament a new question, but in the Parliament of Great Britain it is a very old question; it is a question which politicians and administrations there discuss year in and year out.

I have been interested lately in reading two publications in England, both bearing on the navy, to see how men can disagree. One is the Naval Annual, a very important publication in England, the other is a publication issued by the Imperial Maritime League and it is most interesting to see the divergent views which prevail regarding Britain's present position in naval matters. With the Imperial Maritime League is connected Lord Charles Beresford, a man who has taken a prominent part in the affairs of the Empire lately, and its publication recently contained a statement protesting against the Declaration of London and the Naval Prize Act which has had the support of 400 admirals and general flag officers of the fleet. In any undertaking of this kind all decisions must be of tremendous importance. This paper must be the mouthpiece of a great portion of the public of Great Britain, and it is remarkable to see the difference between the position taken by this Imperial League and that in the memorandum which has been submitted to this House by the Prime Minister. We have been told in this memorandum that no attempt whatever has been made to influence Canada or the Canadian Parliament in a decision which belongs clearly and solely to Canada. In the concluding paragraphs of the memorandum we are again notified, and notified in the most formal language, that if we insist on giving assistance it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Mr. Winston Churchill, the First Lord of the Admiralty, is a bright man. We had the pleasure of meeting him in Ottawa some years ago, and of listening to his address. He has had a meteoric career in Imperial politics; he comes of a good stock; and he may go further than he has already gone. But he has been styled the naval pope, the civilian head of the Admiralty Department. I do not know whether my hon. friends opposite have taken the trouble to read this pamphlet, bearing the good old British colour, but it is a good thing to read such documents because they show that in England people are not afraid to say what they think, and to say it freely. It is only from the expression of honest convictions, after all, that the public interest can best be served. In Canada in the past—let us admit it frankly the people know it, it is inscribed in the pages of history—the loyalty cry has been worked to death by both political parties—by our friends on the other side, and I must say by some of our own friends. But loyalty to Canada is the loyalty which appeals to us to-day, and it is because I am a British subject, and because I am seeking to maintain the British Empire so that those who come after us may have the benefit of the institutions under which we live a happy life, that I contend that the contribution now proposed is a faux pas, a step in the wrong direction, and that, instead of maintaining and augmenting the importance and value of British connection in this country, it will tend to move a certain class of the people further away from British Government. It would be a fatal mistake if we were to undertake to do now what was done in the reign of King George III, to allow even a suspicion that tribute of any kind can be raised in Canada for the benefit of the Empire. It was a fatal mistake of that kind which brought about the loss of the North American colonies and which gave birth to the great Republic to the south of us. What we want to do in this matter, as I understand it, is what we agreed to do in 1909, and let us do it unanimously. Let us do it as the free expression of the opinion of the people of this country. We have a promise of the present Prime Minister on this matter. The Prime Minister when leader of the Opposition made this statement: Were I in power, what would I do? I would go to England and investigate. I would become familiar with the circumstances and would learn, if I could, the exact state of affairs; and, if an emergency did exist, as I am convinced it does exist, and if effective and immediate aid were necessary, I would come back to Canada, I would appeal to Parliament for that immediate and effective aid, and, failing that, I would appeal to the people.

Is the right hon. the Prime Minister not convinced at this moment that Parliament is not unanimous on this question, that there is a strong, nay an almost unconquerable opposition to the proposal that is now before the people? It is not because of the $35,000,000 that is involved—after all, that is a small sum for Canada to-day—but because it is laying down a principle and opening up an era of contributions which may be, unfortunate for British rule in this country, and which, being unfortunate for British rule, would in the long run be unfortunate for Canada itself. I am sorry to detain the House so long with these quotations. But this is such an important question, fraught with such great and tremendous consequences, not only to Canada but to the Empire at large, that we must act in the full knowledge of what we are doing. We must not do this blindly. We must sit here six months, if necessary, and we must sift this question to the bottom, because it is the most important question which could have been brought to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to our attention.

What does the Imperial Naval League say? It says that the present Government in Great Britain has failed in its duty to the people, that in 1906, 1907, 1908, it failed to carry out the promises made by the right hon. the leader of the Government because of party politics, because it sought to increase its popularity by old age pension funds, and because of other matters of internal concern in British politics. It says that the British Government failed to give to the navy the contributions necessary to maintain its strength as the premier naval power of the world. That is the charge that has been laid in Great Britain against the present British Government. Are we in a position to sift a charge of that kind? Are we in a position to say whether that charge is true, or false? We come to the words of Mr. Asquith and to the words of Mr. Churchill. They say that the present British Government has done its duty, its whole duty—that it has taken the steps that were necessary. Their words have been quoted so often that I have not the patience to quote them again, but we have been given the most positive assurance that at present England is capable of meeting Germany as she has met other nations in the past—that there is nothing to fear. This publication of the Imperial Naval League goes further. It goes on to say that the Unionist party in Great Britain has accepted the assurance of the present Government of Great Britain that England is now capable of defending its flag, its territory, and the Empire, not only against Germany but against all comers. Are we to butt in, to use a very inelegant Americanism, between the two political parties in Great Britain? Are we to blame the present Liberal Government on the one hand for having failed in its duty of keeping up the standard of the British navy, or are we going to suggest blame by giving them a contribution which they have never asked for? To me it is a humiliating position to take in the eyes of Great Britain and in the eyes of the Empire. Why should we undertake to butt in? Why should we tell those two great British parties that they have been recreant in their duty, that they have not done what the people of England expected them to undertake? Dire prophecies have been made in the past about the fate of the present British Government. We read every day that it is doomed to destruction. One day it is on the Welsh Disestablishment Bill—and, by the way, I see that that Bill was passed yesterday, and that the Welsh members, like ourselves, have caught the good habit of singing the National Anthem. We were told that the Asquith Government would go to pieces on that question. Then its doom has been predicted over the suffragette question, which is a much more important question than the German scare or the German menace, and it may be that the British Government will not overcome this social difficulty with as much ease as it has settled the Home Rule question. That question is settled now in the way in which Great Britain, for her honour, should have settled it years ago. She has settled that question, she has settled the Boer question, she has settled the Canadian question when she gave us the palladium of our liberties in 1867, and told us to be worthy of our sires who gave to the North American continent the benefits of British institutions. We are following in her footsteps to-day. What we ask is the right to be informed before we take such a stand as that which we are asked to take now. We do not want to take a step in the dark which may be unfortunate for this country. It is not a question of consideration, it is not a question of finance but it is a question of advisability. What does this Empire League say further? It says—and it has taken this for granted, which I do not, and I am merely stating this to show the position of the navy question in England—that long ago England should have assumed its responsibilities in the eyes of the world, as Germany has done, that England should have come forward with a national loan of a hundred million pounds for the purpose of placing its navy and army in a position to maintain the prestige and independence of the greatest Empire that the world has ever seen. Why have the British authorities not done this, why has the British Parliament not done this?—probably because they thought it was unnecessary. It is a useless waste of time to say that England is deficient in financial resources. England is the great banker of the world, England has millions and billions of money at all times available. She has untold wealth and the volume is increasing in magnitude every day. Must England go before the chancellories of Europe and say that her maintenance rests upon a paltry contribution given by a divided people, after weeks and months of wrangling, that England's prestige rests upon a contribution of $35,000,000 given by the Canadian Parliament without the consent of the Canadian people and without a mandate from the people? Say what we may, every man in this House will admit, as every man, woman and child knows, that the question upon which we were elected was not the question of a contribution of $35,000,000 to the Empire for the maintenance of Canadian ships on the North sea, but it was the question of reciprocity. That was the question that was discussed in this House for weeks and months during the preceding session, that was the issue upon which we went to the people and we came back from the people not to vote $35,000,000 or any other number of millions of dollars to maintain Canadian ships in the North sea, but to carry out what the British North America Act says our duties are. These duties are described in one of the clauses of that Act as the maintenance and defence of Canada and its territory by land and by sea.

Let me give a few lines from this publication to show what the conception of these people is. They are ardent Imperialists, they are men who belong to a race which for a thousand years has been master of the seas, men who inhale the breezes of the English channel, men who inhale the salted air from the German ocean, men who would be the first to pay the penalty if Great Britain were recreant to her duty. The four points which these men say, constitute the Magna Charta of the British people, are these:

(1) The embodiment and distribution of the whole or the greater part of the fleet reserve.
(2) Abstention, under the present conditions of relative strength, from sending any battle vessels away from home waters.
(3) The immediate arming and preparation for war of a considerable number of selected British merchantmen whose names shall be kept secret.
(4) The appointment of the last-mentioned committee to deal with the question of food supply in war.

This is the platform of this great political party. Have any of these proposals attracted the attention of the Imperial Government to the extent that they have been carried out? I am not sufficiently familiar with navy conditions in Europe, more especially in Great Britain, to say whether these suggestions should be carried into effect or not. The British Government do not think so and the Unionist party seem to be satisfied with the present condition of affairs. How then are we to judge whether Great Britain is really in a position where she needs our co-operation and assistance? I shall not be unfair, and it is against parliamentary practice to quote anything that is derogatory of the conduct of a member of another parliament, but the charges which are made against the first sea-lord in this publication practically mean malfeasance in office and dereliction of duty to his sovereign, his government and his country. Are we to judge between these two? It is not a position that I intend to take. I intend to fulfil my duty as I understand it. I have been sent here to discharge my duty to the Canadian people. The principal duty with which Canada is concerned is the development of our resources and with the carrying out of the ideas of Confederation as we find them in the British North America Act. But, if the Government of the day have a proposal to make, if they are willing to undertake this responsibility, if they wish to widen the relations which exist now as between Great Britain and Canada, if they wish to repeat the experience of Sir Joseph Ward in the Imperial Conference of 1911, to propose an Imperial Council, an Imperial Confederation, copartnership with the Empire, or if they have any of these proposals to make, let them make them, but all I have to say is, let us be faithful to the conditions of the constitution under which we live and let us go to the people who are our masters and by whose verdict we must abide.

Apart from the quotations which I have given, there are many others from authentic sources in Great Britain that would enlighten this House and the Canadian people who, unfortunately, are not familiar with the naval question. I must admit myself that I am more familiar now with it since this proposal has been made to give a contribution to the Empire and if the proposal has had no other result than to bring about a study of the conditions which exist in Great Britain to-day, we should be thankful to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister for that. But, let us look into some of the conditions which now prevail in England and see whether this scare has any substance to sustain it, whether England is really in need of a contribution, whether England is in need of any ships, what are the conditions that exist as regards Germany, what are the conditions in the North German ocean, in the British Channel, in the North Atlantic and in other seas of the world apart from those waters surrounding Canada. Let me quote a few lines from Earl Brassey, who has been invited to contribute an article to The Naval Annual, which article has been given the honour of first position, with respect to the relations of Great Britain and Germany:

Finally, the writer takes occasion to refer to matters which must in the present posture of affairs, cause deep concern to all thinking men, and which in an eminent degree affect the Admiralty. If the hostile feeling which unhappily exists in Germany (not without some provocation) continues, we must look for renewed efforts in construction.

Let us consider the circumstances which have led to mutual distrust. In Germany the construction of battleships has advanced on a scale unapproached elsewhere. It has caused anxiety—perhaps undue anxiety—in this country. Germany does not stand alone in the resolve to create a strong navy. Leading statesmen in all countries have been impressed by the writings of Captain Mahan. In the United States, of all countries the most secure from foreign foes, President Roosevelt had ambitious schemes of naval expansion. Everywhere the belief is held that a nation has no influence without a navy.

These are words that should be well pondered by every hon. member of this House.

Nor is this conviction new. Naval weakness in former times was a moving cause of the discontent then universal in Germany. In a memoir on the political condition, written in 1847, Prince Hohenlohe, minister at Athens, used these words: 'No one will deny that it is hard on a thinking energetic man to be unable to say abroad, 'I am a German,' and not to be able to pride himself that the German flag is flying from his vessel. And when we study the man and see how the Baltic, the North sea, and the Mediterranean, break upon our shores, and how no German flag commands the customary salute—surely the hue of shame will rise into our cheeks.'

To create a navy was impossible while Germany was a divided land. It was sure to be undertaken when Imperial unity was achieved. Russia and France were in close alliance and strong at sea. To redress the balance was a not unnatural resolve. Many ships were built of a type adapted to shallow waters. They became obsolescent at a stroke by the creation, under the direction of Lord Fisher, of a new type with unmatched superiority in speed, and armed with guns of longer range than any hitherto carried on board ship. There was no reticence in the commendation to the public of the new design. It was proclaimed that all earlier ships were obsolete. Lord Fisher carried consternation into Boards of Admiralty.

In Germany it was resolved to make a vigorous effort to build dreadnoughts. The total number proposed under the navy law was thirty-eight. Four ships were to be laid down annually, to be reduced to two ships in 1912. We might have wished that the construction had been spread over a longer term. The aggregate force proposed cannot be pronounced excessive for the fleet of a first-class power.

We have been given the figures of comparative naval strength over and over again, but they are repeated very briefly in the opening lines of this article in which the declaration is made that Great Britain occupies a commanding position. Here we are told that in 1911, whereas the United States expended £26,000,000 on her navy, Germany expended £22,000,000 and Great Britain £45,000,000. On new construction the United States expended £5,250,000, Germany £12,000,000, and Great Britain £17,500,000. The statement continues:

> In eleven years 1900 to 1910, the navy estimates have aggregated for Great Britain, £283,000,000; Germany, £157,000,000; United States, £240,000,000. Our expenditure has grown in enormous proportions. Our supremacy should be beyond question. How do we stand? In men, in ships completed, in ships in commission, we hold a commanding position. In new construction, as measured by the amounts voted, we have not in recent years maintained the two-power standard.
>
> It is not contended that progress has not been sufficiently rapid for present needs. We have to look to the future. If increased construction should be required, it may be possible to put a check on expenditure for other services.

With reference to the manning of the fleet Earl Brassey proceeds:

This brings us to the policy in regard to manning. In numbers we far exceed the two-power standard. Costs of manning must be high under a voluntary system.

Navy Pay—1911-12.

	Numbers.	Wages.
Great Britain..	134,100	£7,511,500
United States (1910)...	60,500	7,206,211
Germany (1910)	57,355	1,910,010
France (1910)	57,500	2,533,043

In addition to wages and victualling expenditure must grow on the maintenance of ships kept in commission, largely for purposes of training. The cruisers of the larger classes at sea under the British flag vastly outnumber those under foreign flags.

The Admiralty insist on manning all effective ships with full crews of permanent men.

This is an answer complete in every respect to the observations made by the Imperial Navy League, that Great Britain is at the mercy of its German foes. There is a paragraph here which shows that Great Britain could easily take advantage of her mercantile marine, if the conditions were such as to lead the Motherland to think that there was any real danger. But it would seem that while gentlemen on the other side of the House are kept awake with nightmares as to the German invasion, the people of Great Britain themselves do not feel the least alarmed. England has the largest mercantile marine in the world, for every two ships that sail the waters one carries the British flag; England has the power to-morrow of arming these merchantmen and of demonstrating to the world a naval power that has never yet been equalled in the world's history. Why has England not taken that step; why has the recommendation of the Royal Commission in this respect not been carried out? Is it not because England believed there was no necessity for it. I quote:

> In closing these recommendations, the report of the Royal Commission on Manning may appropriately be quoted:—We possess they said, in the mercantile marine elements of naval strength such as no other country in the world enjoys. It is in the power of the Government to draw closer to the state at the moment of danger, the loyal enthusiasm of those on whom your Majesty must rely. While the primary object of any scheme of training at the public charge is protection from the hazards of war, it is an advantage not lightly to be valued that the enrolment, training, and maintenance of a reserve must improve the position and elevate the character of British seamen of both the services, and knit them together in the firm bonds of reciprocal feeling and of common interests.

If England is in such dire straits as gentlemen opposite say, as that she must accept a contribution from one of her colonies, why has she not availed herself of her merchant navy? How can it be said that England is in need of money at a time when she has abundant surplus in her treasury, at a time when she is lending money the world over, at a time when she is reducing her national debt, at a time when Lloyd George and other eminent statesmen are carrying out a programme of social reform which costs millions and millions and millions of money and which is attracting the attention of the world?

Not being familiar with the methods of the Admirality, I could not explain how it was that the clerk who prepared this memorandum was careful to point out the present condition of the navies of Italy, of Austria, and of Germany, and overlooked the navy of France. If we are to accept the statements that are made by gentlemen opposite in support of this contribution, the death struggle is to be between Germany and England. We are told that the German ships are within twelve hours' steam of the shores of Great Britain, but we have not been told that there is a power still nearer to England; a power which has been the worthy foe of England in days past, a power which has a tradition on this North American continent, a power which is to-day the friend and ally of England. Anyone who looks at the map of North America will see in the names of the rivers, the lakes, the cities, the states, the provinces, that a great and powerful race swept over this continent before the coming of the great nation whose loyal subjects we are to-day. That power is France, a nation which may be called upon to-morrow to be the arbiter between Germany and England. The students of recent events know that France is one of the foremost nations of Europe, not only in financial, but in naval and military strength. Notwithstanding that the population of France has been stationary, notwithstanding that in 1870 France met with one of the most disastrous defeats ever inflicted on a nation; notwithstanding that France was prostrated almost lifeless at the foot of the Teuton invader, France has given the world a marvellous example of recuperation, and to-day, as always, France is in the advance guard of civilization. France as I say, may be to-morrow the arbiter of the destinies of England and Germany. It is strange, then, that we have not a word in this Admiralty memorandum about France. Why have we been told of the strength of Italy, of Austria, and of Germany, and why has the power of France, the ally of England, not been mentioned? The Naval Annual tells us that France is to-day the third naval power in Europe. We all know what would happen in the event of a war between Germany and England. Remembering the feelings which have predominated in France for the last foryt years, and knowing that France would not be slow to take advantage to get back what she lost in 1870, we need not be prophets to tell what would happen. I shall not quote a French authority to show that France to-day holds a commanding position in Europe; I shall quote from a writer in the Naval Annual:

No navy has made greater progress during the last year than that of France. In nearly every department of naval activity there is evidence that the period of stagnation, suspense, and unrest is at an end. The reports of M. Bos, M. Chaumet and M. Benazet drew the attention of Parliament to the deplorable condition to which the French navy had been allowed to sink, and under the able and vigorous impulse of Admiral Boue de La Peyrère, steps were taken to place the administration of the navy on a sound footing. Better collaboration has been established between various branches of the service, the dockyards have been set in order, the period of construction much reduced, and a shipbuilding programme put in hand which will make the French navy again a formidable naval force. The idea too long prevalent in France, that torpedo boats, submarines, and the guerre de course could compensate for inferiority in the fighting line has been abandoned. A new squadron of powerful ships has been commissioned. The manœuvres brought together an unusual number of vessels of all classes, and the great review outside Toulon on September 4 which M. Fallières, accompanied by the Presidents of the Chambers and many of their members, saw the whole fleet under way was the most important French naval demonstration since M. Loubet reviewed the fleet off La Ciotat in 1901. The terrible disaster to the Liberté on September 25 was a serious blow to progress, but the navy has recovered its equilibrum, and the Naval Department has since made it a special care to prevent the recurrence of such calamities. M. Delcassé has proved a worthy successor to Admiral de La Peyrère as Minister of Marine, and the immediate future of the French navy is safe in his capable hands. Admiral de La Peydrère is now in command of the battle fleet.

In a very notable report on the estimates of 1912, in which he dealt with the Liberté disaster questions relating to the high command, the central and dockyard administration, and other matters, M. Plainlevé, the Budget reporter raised the fundamental question of the real object of the French fleet, which he described as the command of the Mediterranean—la maitrise de la Méditerranée. French resources, he said, did not permit France to rival Germany in her naval preparations, but they enabled her to command at least the western basin of the Mediterranean against the fleets of Austria and Italy, which he further declared to be the essential object. In his view the disembarkation of an army corps properly equipped and supplied on the channel or Atlantic coast is not an enterprise to be feared. It would present too many risks, in view of the presence of the coast flotillas and the length of time it would take. Even if it partially succeeded, the invaders would encounter the land forces, and unless they would seize some fortified place, in which they would be invested, they would be lost. Therefore, M. Painlevé regarded the hypothesis of an invasion by sea as chimerical, and moreover as promising to change in no respect the result of the war on land.

This author goes on to show that the effort of France is to maintain supremacy in the Mediterranean, and he points out that France, the ally of Great Britain, is also the ally of Russia. Surely the descendants of the old British stock in this country are not afraid! The descendants of the men who long ago heard of the Russian scare and the Russian bear, the descendants of the men who heard of the French scare when Napoleon had the nations of Europe on their knees before him, and when the French flag floated from every citadel and every capital in Europe; surely the descendants of the men who have had to face problems such as those will not be scared by Germany to-day. France is the mistress of the Mediterranean. Britain has nothing to fear from Austria or from Italy; and Austria and Italy are the allies of Germany. Therefore, England has with her her old time foes. She has France and she has Russia and is sure to obtain support should an emergency arise. But that emergency, speaking from what I can see in perusing these somewhat dry statistics, does not present itself; England is in no fear of an invasion, and never was,—Germany would never attempt it. But the British sailor is not what he was, the British Admiralty is not what it was at Trafalgar and elsewhere, if it can be said that, man for man, and ship for ship, England could not meet and overcome German invaders. We look upon Trafalgar as the crowning feat of the British navy, accomplished by Lord Nelson with twenty-seven ships against thirty-three possessed by his opponent. If British men to-day are not able, with practically two ships to one to meet a German invader, then it is not the paltry contribution of thirty-five millions of dollars from Canada that will put heart into them.

Another phase of this discussion brought to our attention by the introduction of this memorandum in the House, is that Great Britain is forced by circumstances to abandon the oversight of her colonies throughout the world, to reduce her fleet on overseas stations and also in the Mediterranean and concentrate in home waters. Now, the proof we have that England can afford to do that, is that England is doing it. In doing it probably, we may assume, she is acting on the advice of competent men, men who, I am sure, we will admit, are as competent as we are to decide questions of strategy,—to say how many ships should be in the home waters, how many in the North Sea, how many Gibraltar should have, and how many Malta for their base, how many should be sent to Chinese waters and how many to other parts of the world. Surely, we are not going to attempt to decide whether the position taken is right or not, for it is a matter of internal concern, a matter that concerns the British Admiralty and the British Government. What we are concerned with here more particularly is that portion of the memorandum which refers to naval supremacy of two kinds—general and local. We are not cencerned with the local superiority of Great Britain, for she looks after that herself, she has done it before and she can do it again. What we have undertaken to do, and what I think is our duty and what the Canadian people want to do, I believe, if they are properly enlightened on this question, is to look after the general supremacy of the British navy and not the local supremacy. The question of local supremacy we leave in the hands of the prominent statesmen and the progressive people of those noble races, the Irish, the Scotch and the English. But it is a part of our duty, and should be our concern, to assist in solving the problem of the general supremacy of Greater Britain. This is our duty because in the galaxy of nations forming the Empire, we occupy the first position. We occupy it by the extent of our territory; we occupy it by the races that people this country; we occupy it by the resources at our disposal; we occupy it by the advantages which Providence has bestowed with a bountiful hand upon this northern half of the North American continent inhabited by the scions of the first races of the world united together in the rivalry that means union and not disunion. And that our duty should be ready to fulfil.

With what has occurred in recent years the House is familiar and I will refer to it but briefly. In 1909, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) delivered what has ever since been looked upon as one of the memorable speeches of this Parliament, declaring that the time had come when Canada should undertake the naval protection of Canada. Why had not this been done during the previous years of Confederation? Why had it not been done during the twenty or twenty-five years during which our political opponents were in control of Canadian affairs? Because the resources of Canada did not permit it, and we relied on the protection of the British fleet. Also, we were on friendly terms with the United States and had no complications in view. But the time had come when this motion was to be brought forward. It was brought forward at an opportune moment, after it had remained upon the Order Paper for about two months. I had good knowledge of the procedure of the House at that time, because it was given to me to call up these motions day after day, week after week, and month after month, as happened in the case of the reciprocity debate. The matter was brought up at a time when the attention of the Empire was riveted on naval matters; when Mr. McKenna had just made his startling statement that Britain was at a disadvantage and that a German invasion was possible. And what did we say? Political leaders on both sides united to adopt a policy of co-operation for the defence of Canada and, of the Empire. Unfortunately, that state of affairs does not exist to-day. The Canadian Government of that day attempted to make a beginning commensurate with the resources of Canada. The representatives of the Government went to England and asked the Admiralty what was best to be done. The Admiralty, speaking as a body of that kind naturally would speak, suggested the making of one fleet. One fleet exists in Russia, one fleet in France, one fleet in Germany. But in Great Britain that state of affairs could not be achieved, and I will give you the words on that point of Mr. McKenna, the predecessor of Mr. Winston Churchill, to show you how very different a position the British Empire occupies from that of any of the other nations I have mentioned. Mr. McKenna spoke of the nations within the Empire that had made fleets and of those that, on account of limited resources were not able to establish fleets and had undertaken to make contributions. Students of history must admit that the man who lives under the British flag is satisfied with his lot, because there he finds justice, liberty and advantages not to be obtained in any other part of the world. Every member of the family was willing to help; some were ready to offer ships, others money; others were willing to undertake housekeeping on their own account by building a navy, and Canada was one of these. These are the words used by Mr. McKenna in the memorandum:

> In view of these circumstances, His Majesty's Government considered the time was appropriate for the holding of a conference to discuss afresh the relations of the dominions to the United Kingdom in regard to the question of Imperial defence, and on the 30th April sent an invitation to the Defence ministers of the four dominions and the Cape Colonies to attend a conference under the terms of resolution 1 of the conference of 1907, to discuss the general question of the naval and military defence of the Empire, with special reference to the Canadian resolution and to the proposals from New Zealand and Australia.

This is the important paragraph, and one which I would like to see in the hands of every Canadian voter, so that he would become familiar with this intricate question, and realize what it means to thoroughly organize the naval defence of the Empire. (Reading):

> If the problem of Imperial naval defence were considered merely as a problem of naval strategy it would be found that the greatest output of strength for a given expenditure is obtained by the maintenance of a single navy with the concomitant unity of training and unity of command. In furtherance, then, of the simple strategical ideal maximum power would be gained if all parts of the Empire contributed, according to their needs and resources, to the maintenance of the British navy.
>
> It has, however, long been recognized that in defining the conditions under which the naval forces of the Empire should be developed, other considerations than those of strategy alone must be taken into account. The various circumstances of the overseas dominions have to be borne in mind. Though all have in them the seeds of a great advance in population, wealth, and power, they have at the present time attained to different stages in their growth. Their geographical position has subjected them to internal and external strains, varying in kind and intensity. Their history and physical environment have given rise to individual national sentiment, for the expression of which room must be found. A simple contribution of money or material may be to one dominion the most acceptable form in which to assist in Imperial defence. Another, while ready to provide local naval forces, and to place them at the disposal of the Crown in the event of war, may wish to lay the foundations upon which a future navy of its own could be raised. A third may think that the best manner in which it can assist in promoting the interests of the Empire is in undertaking certain local services not directly of a naval character, but which may relieve the Imperial Government from expenses which would otherwise fall on the British Exchequer.
> The main duty of the forthcoming conferences as regards naval defence will be, therefore, to determine the form in which the various dominion governments can best participate in the burden of Imperial defence with due regard to varying political and geographical conditions.

The British Government is a changing institution; men disappear, but the traditions of the Admiralty Board remain. Here is an admission that concentration of the British fleet would be a fatal mistake; that the mobilization of naval forces in the North sea, the danger point being elsewhere, would be a false move. Authors declare that the weak point of the present policy of the Admiralty is that there may be over-concentration. We, however, are not concerned with that; we are concerned primarily with our own duty, and our duty is to defend Canada. In defending Canada we defend the Empire, and in defending the Empire we protect for the Canadian people all those benefits and advantages which they wish to obtain and to hand down to succeeding generations—the respect of the rights of a British subject; the protection of his life, liberty, and all the privileges dear and sacred to him. These are all found under the British flag, and for that reason this present Government should submit to the people the broad question whether seven and a half millions of Canadians—aye, nearly eight millions—are competent to frame a policy suitable for Canada and the Empire, or whether we are to get the mandate from the Admiralty Board or from one of the sub-ministers employed in that office. I consider that the Prime Minister of Canada is making a grave mistake in imagining that because we are contributing $35,000,000 and obtaining a voice in the control of England's foreign policy, he is conferring a boon on this country. Generally, the reverse would be the desirable position. I think it would be worth $35,000,000 to Canada were she to keep out of European politics and complications—to keep out of diplomacy with China, Persia, Japan or any land in which we have no business interest except that which has a bearing upon Canadian affairs. Everybody knows that England can rely on Canada. If she were in danger in the Pacific ocean; if she were in danger in the Atlantic ocean; if she were in danger in the south, there would not be a Canadian worthy of the name who would not come forward and do what Canadians have done before, and freely, throughout a century of Canadian history. We are the best judges of the conditions that prevail in Canada; we know what would be the result on this North American continent of a false move on the other side. We do not wish to be left alone in the Empire; we desire to assume our share of the Imperial burdens; but we do not want to be misled—I use the word not in an offensive sense—by the theory that because a member of the Canadian ministry goes to London as a member of the Imperial Defence Committee, he would be consulted upon all matters affecting war or peace. Can any one imagine that at a critical period—at a time when war might be declared, as it was in 1870 by the sending of that famous telegram from the Ambassador to the French Emperor to the German Chancellor—can anyone imagine, I say, that in such a case, or in any matter affecting peace or war, the British Government would consult the representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, or South Africa? We are not living in a fool's paradise! Surely no man who has given the matter any consideration will consider that this representation would mean anything to us. It would only be a source of great embarrassment to the British Government.

The Prime Minister has spoken of co-partnership with the Empire, of a closer union with the Empire, of a closer discussion, of assuming part of the burden; not the financial burden, because that is nothing, but the burden of declaring peace or war. The right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada is an ardent Imperialist. This is a free country and we live fortunately in a century wherein liberty of speech and thought prevail. The Prime Minister of Canada is free to have whatever views he likes in regard to closer connection with the Empire. I may have my views, every gentleman in this House may have his, but before we enter into this new arrangement, before we undertake to pay this money which we are not authorized by our people to pay, before we enter into this bargain to pay $35,000,000 to obtain admission even by a side door to the council of the foreign policy of England, I want to call attention to what became two years ago a proposal made by another great Imperialist, Sir Joseph Ward. Sir Joseph Ward too was an ardent Imperialist, a man who would have favored the policy that has been preached by the jingo papers of Canada and England during the last year. If he had been in Canada he would have been a member of the old Imperial Federation League that used to meet in the Railway Committee annually for about ten years and finally died a natural death. What became of all the dreams and proposals of these gentlemen? They all disappeared in thin air. Here is a concrete proposition from a man representing New Zealand, one of the most advanced of these so-called Imperialist states. New Zealand occupies a different position to us. She is an island in the southern Pacific; she has close at hand other islands on which Germany and France and other nations have a footing. Within a few hours sailing on the other side is the great eastern problem of Japan and China. New Zealand may be attacked at any time. Therefore New Zealand was anxious to have a closer union with the Empire, and, not being able at the time to organize a fleet, it organized a dreadnought. But what did the Prime Minister of New Zealand want?

That the Empire has now reached the stage of Imperial development which renders it expedient that there should be an Imperial council of state——

Well, we are not going to have an Imperial council of state, but a council of defence which is not quite so important; an Imperial council of state would be something whereas the committee on defence is merely an advisory board, as has been explained. (Reading):

—with representatives from all the self-governing portions of the Empire, in theory and in fact advisory to the Imperial Government on all questions affecting the interests of His Majesty's dominions overseas.

And what were the points on which this resolution rested?

1, Imperial unity; 2, organized Imperial defence; 3, the equal distribution of the burden of defence throughout the Empire; 4, the representation of self-governing overseas dominions in Imperial Parliament of defence for the purpose of determining peace or war, the contributions to Imperial defence, foreign policy as far as it affects the Empire, international treaties so far as they affect the Empire, and such other Imperial matters as might by agreement be transferred to such parliament.

This was the proposal on a grand scale, in a grand spectacular way, of the creation of a new board of Empire, a new imperial parliament, holding sway over the maintenance of its defence and of its unity and for the discussion of all questions affecting the Empire at large. That proposal of Sir Joseph Ward was on a much larger scale than the proposal the Prime Minister makes today, and what became of it? It was shipwrecked, it met with universal condemnation from the representatives of every colony there; and I feel justified in again quoting the few words that fell from the mouth of Mr. Asquith, the present Prime Minister of England:

Sir Joseph Ward in an extremely able and interesting speech had brought forward a concrete proposal, but no representative of any other dominion had been able to accept it. What would Sir Joseph Ward's scheme come to in practice? It would impair, if not altogether destroy, the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom in such grave matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of treaties, the maintenance of peace or the declaration of war. The responsibility of the Imperial Government subject to the Imperial Parliament in these matters could not be shared, and the co-existence side by side with the Government of the United Kingdom of this proposed body with the functions and jurisdiction which it was suggested should be entrusted to it would be fatal to the present system of responsibility. The proposed body would further have power to impose upon the dominions a policy from which one or more of them might dissent, which in many cases would involve expenditure, and that expenditure, would have to be met by taxation, although the people of the Dominion might not approve the policy. Speaking for the British Government they could not assent to a proposal so opened to the fundamental principal on which the Empire had been built up and carried on.

Speaking for the British Government, the Government who sent this memorandum not at their own volition, but at the urgent request of the Canadian Prime Minister:

Speaking on behalf of the British Government, they could not assent to a proposal so opposed to the fundamental principles on which the Empire had been built and carried on.

That is the closing chapter of that phase of imperialism. We may have to deal now with another chapter in our representation on the other side by a Canadian minister; but I do not think that can be taken seriously. I would pity the Canadian minister who would be sent over there if he had first of all to become familiar with the various branches of British policy; it would take him a lifetime and might interfere very much with his happiness. But what would become of the Canadian minister once he had attended this committee of defence? Would he be responsible to this Parliament? We are to pay his salary and expenses; under our constitution the ministers are responsible to this House and we are responsible to the people. Would this minister return here to make an annual report or would we be consulted on this report? Would we have to revise the decisions that he had arrived at, or would he have the power to hold up the hand of Great Britain until this Parliament had been consulted as to whether there should be a new delimitation of the frontier of Abyssinia? A complication arose there yesterday, according to the papers; for the tenth or twelfth time the unfortunate happening of the death of Menelik, King of Abyssinia, has been announced. This time it is taken for granted that the old man is really dead. He was an important man, the king of kings in his country. He had a treaty with Great Britain; it stands first on the list, as it begins with 'A,' and one of the important clauses in that treaty is that the caravan route is to be maintained through the mountain passes of Abyssinia and to be open to British subjects—and to the Canadian representative, if he goes there to inquire on the ground into this important question. Will this minister act in camera and without the authority of this Parliament, or will he be there to assume responsibility for war or for peace? If he assumes the responsibility for war, we shall have to back up the undertaking; we shall have to tax the Canadian people for the cost of that war, no matter what it is. I have great faith in the British people. We believe that Great Britain will never carry on a war of aggression. She has every interest in the world not to carry on a war of aggression, because she is in a commanding position, and has every interest to maintain peace. But supposing she does carry on a war of aggression, or any kind of war, will any member of our Cabinet be authorized to endorse the declaration of war, and if he does endorse that declaration shall we back it up with the taxation of this country? If he is consulted about the declaration of war, will he report here and shall we wait until his report comes to the House? Will it be referred to a special committe to be investigated; or will it be reported upon by the Department of Justice to ascertain whether it is in conflict with the present constitution of Canada? Mr. Speaker, I do not want to use unparliamentary language, but to me the proposition seems utterly ridiculous. We have no business to meddle in the foreign policies of the Empire; the Empire is well able to look after itself. But what we want to do, what we have done, and what we should continue to do in matters affecting Canada is to insist that no decision shall be reached until Canada has decided through its properly constituted authorities what should be done. As regards contributing towards the maintenance of the Empire, we are contributing now. What would the prestige of the British Empire be if it were to lose its North American possessions? Is Canada not the brightest gem in the British Crown? Is there a man who is prepared to say that, if at a pinch England needed help to-morrow, Canada would not jump into the breach and give assistance freely, give her money, of her blood, and of her vessels if necessary. But that fortunately is not necessary at the present time. Unfortunately, we have not reached the millenium. Instead of carrying out the precepts laid down twenty centuries ago, the nations of the earth are still carrying on the practices of the past. But as one statesman has remarked, the wars of old, which were practically a permanency, are prevented to-day by the maintenance of huge armaments. It is only by the maintenance of huge armaments that wars are prevented, and I prefer the maintenance of huge armaments to the ruthless massacres which took place in olden times.

I do not wish to dwell further on this question; I just want to look at the last phase of it, and to show how this Parliament is not in a position at the present time to pronounce upon the matter. First of all, we do not think that the Empire needs this contribution. The Empire is rich, and has a powerful fleet, and she is doing the best she can to meet all exigencies. The Imperial Government says there is nothing to fear, and the British Opposition accept that declaration. The sending of three empty war vessels, the maintenance of which will have to be paid for by the British taxpayer, would be no solution of the problem of Imperial defence, Imperial unity and Imperial progress. We have not the knowledge, if we have the willingness, nor the competency to judge that such action is necesary at the present time. Coming as I do from the mother province of the Dominion, I desire to point out that we had a variance in the last election which gives me the impression that we are not yet prepared to pronounce upon this question. On the other side of the House sit a number of members of Parliament who gave to the constituencies which elected them the understanding that there would be no contribution of any kind, naval or otherwise, until the people of Canada had been consulted. I know it has been denied before, but the facts are there, the newspapers are there, and the people who heard those declarations are there. The undertaking was given by a considerable number of members who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, that no Canadian navy, no undertaking of that kind, would be entered into, so far as they were concerned, until the Canadian people had been consulted. At their head was the member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk), who, we are sorry to see, is absent from this House through illness, but whose presence, and whose contribution to this debate would have been of great value. That hon. member has occupied a prominent position in this House. I think he is the sole survivor of the Conservative party elected in 1896 in the province of Quebec. He is a man who, whenever he has taken part in debate, has taken an exalted view, and given valuable information to this House. He took the stand two or three times during the last Parliament that there should be no contribution and no Canadian navy until the people had been consulted. The dissolution of Parliament took place, the member for Jacques-Cartier was re-elected in his own constituency on that platform and on that promise; he came here, and he kept his word. When the Prime Minister submitted the Admiralty memorandum to his colleagues, the member for Jacques-Cartier said: 'I have made a promise to my electors that I will not vote for this contribution, or for any other contribution, before they are consulted, and before the matter is laid before the Canadian people.' He adopted the constitutional course of handing his resignation to the Prime Minister, and he retired from the Government, but he still remains a member of this House, and, as I have said, it is unfortunate that he is not here to give us the benefit of his views. We all hope that before the end of the session he may be in a position to return.

With him, in the province of Quebec, was one of its brightest newspaper men, a man who was formerly a member of this House, who at one time occupied a prominent position in the Liberal party, who seemed to be a promising man in our ranks, but who became estranged from us because his views differed from ours. I have not time to condemn or approve of the course he followed; all I need say is that he broke away from our party for one reason or another, and became, as he styled himself, an Independent. He found in the programme of the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier what was necessary for his purpose. He accompanied the member for Jacques Cartier to various parts of Quebec, and being a gifted speaker, a hard worker, a man well posted, a capable man in many respects, he attracted great attention throughout the province of Quebec. He made promises that are in black and white; they cannot be denied. He reiterates them to-day. 'We promise the people,' he said, 'that before any undertaking of this kind is entered into, by one or other of the political parties the people of Canada should be consulted.' The election took place, a number of members were returned to this Parliament from the province of Quebec, and they sit to-day at your right, Mr. Speaker. They will have an opportunity during the course of this debate to explain their position and they owe it to themselves, they owe it to their constituents, they owe it to the political traditions which have prevailed in this country, to explain their position. I have no right to know what that position is at the present time. We shall know when the time comes, we shall become acquainted with it in the regular manner but in the meantime, would I be allowed to give the conclusion of an article which appeared some weeks ago from the pen of the gentleman to whom I referred to a moment ago? That man, it is needless for me to say, is Mr. Henri Bourassa. Mr. Bourassa has been a consistent opponent of contributions of all kinds to the Empire without the people being consulted, and he has continued in that policy. During the last campaign he and his ally, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, had immense meetings all through Quebec. If living witnesses were required by the thousands they could be had to testify to that statement. Mr. Bourassa has published a number of articles, always interesting reading, although we do not always agree with them, but here is one that was published on the 11th December, 1912, in Le Devoir. It is headed Naval Policy of Mr. Borden as Nefarious to-day as it was yesterday.

He condemned the proposals of the late Government, he condemned the proposals of the present Government and then went on to give his reasons, the effect of which is that no action of this kind should be taken until the people are consulted. Let me read the concluding part of the article:

The one is only the second edition, considerably increased, but not corrected, of the other. The figure of the contribution is almost double, but the principle and the motives remain the same.

This is more than ever the nefarious policy condemned at St. Eustache, St. Henri, St. Remi, Grand Mère, Longue Pointe, Montmagny, Nicolet, wherever the resolutions of St. Eustache were read and reread and ratified by the raising of hands and patriotic acclamations.

It is the policy which was crushed at Drummond-Arthabaska, as well as that of the Liberal party. It is the policy which Mr. Monk opposed with us from the time of his speech at Lachine to September 21, 1911. It is the policy denounced by Messrs. Nantel, Coderre, Pelletier, Blondin, Sévigny, Lespérance, Guilbault, Bellemare, Boulay, Lavallée, Paquet, Rainville, as well as by Messrs. Achim, Barrette, Lamarche and Mondou.

These gentlemen are all members of this House.

And in this denunciation they were supported by Messrs. Tellier, Patenaude, Cousineau, Plante, Renaud, D'Auteuil, Girard, Lafortune, Conservative members of the legislative assembly, as well as Messrs. Lavergne, Prévost and Bourassa. That policy, we continue to denounce and oppose, because we find it to-day as we did yesterday, false and bad. It is in our eyes like the Laurier Act, contrary to the principles of responsible government for the future of Canada, contrary even to the true interests of the Empire, whose equilibrium it breaks.

And to-day, as before the second reading of the Laurier Act, I do not hesitate—I, who have gone back on nothing—to say to the representatives of the people, to those especially who have taken the solemn engagement to accept no legislation of this nature without its being submitted to the people, you have no right to vote this law without consulting the people.

(Sgd.) Henri Bourassa.

If we are to accept the evidence of this gentleman—and there is no reason why his evidence should not be accepted by gentlemen on the other side of the House, because he fought last election side by side with them—then, if the members of this House are pledged to a policy of that kind, we are wasting our time here, because, what would become of the Administration if these gentlemen opposite, so-pledged, were to vote against it on this the most important question which has ever been brought before the Canadian people? Instead of silence from the Government benches, we should have further explanation and more light. The people of Canada, the people of the province of Quebec, the people of the constituencies represented by these gentlemen, are entitled to know if they are right and if Mr. Monk is wrong. It is the duty of His Majesty's loyal Opposition to see that this matter is sifted to the bottom. We want the Canadian people to know that once a man is elected to this House, he must live by the promises he has made to his electors.

We know that the Canadian people will not shrink from the duty which rests upon them, if duty there is, in the maintenance of the Empire. So far as I am concerned, no case has been made out to show me that Great Britain is in any need of this money. Great Britain has never asked for it; Great Britain is humiliated in the eyes of the world by this contribution being offered. Canadians have a nobler and higher duty, than by the payment of $35,000,000 to get away from their responsibility for the defence of this territory by land and by sea. When the Fathers of Confederation went to London and asked for the British North America Act, the palladium of the liberties of the Canadian people, they assumed responsibilities for which we, their political descendants, are responsible. It is our duty to carry out the bond entered into with the British Government when Great Britain gave us our liberty. We undertook to defend this part of the Empire, and no Canadian worthy of the name will fail in that when the hour comes. And, Sir, if I know His Majesty's loyal Opposition, it is determined to stand by that duty until the final verdict has been pronounced by the Canadian people.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, the subject which is engaging the attention of the House was first submitted with a great flourish of triumph by the right hon. the Prime Minister on the 5th of December last, and it was received by the Conservative newspapers with great shouts of acclaim. When this session of Parliament opened, the Prime Minister did not display very great haste in bringing down this measure, which he announced was the sole and only reason why he had called Parliament together before the Christmas holidays. When he did present it to Parliament on December 5, he did so in irregular form, and the discussion was consequently delayed for another week, and when Parliament rose for the Christmas holidays, we had only discussed the subect for six days. Then, after the holidays, it was discussed again for two or three days, but other matters, evidently of greater importance to the Government, were brought forward and the contribution proposal was treated by the Government as though it were of no importance whatever. Were I to use the ornate phrase adopted by the Minister of Public Works earlier in the session, I would say that the reptile press supporting the Government of this country are now demanding that this Parliament should proceed immediately and without further delay to vote on this measure. And that, mind you, Mr. Speaker, in face of the fact which is not understood outside this House, but which is very well understood inside the House, that up to this day this great measure of the Government has never been regularly introduced to the House, and that the first reading of the Bill has never been regularly had in this Parliament. What we are discussing now is not this much-heralded naval measure but a resolution preliminary to the Bill, which ought to have been introduced on the 5th of December last. The fact is, that the Bill which we are told now by the Conservative press should be immediately passed without further discussion, has never regularly come before this Parliament at all.

I have been waiting for the promised utterance of the Minister of Finance, (Mr. White), who intimated some time ago that he was going to tell us how the Empire was to be saved, as a result of this measure. He was not satisfied with saving Canada; that was too small for this legislator who has only been in Parliament for a year and a half; his task was to show not merely the people of Canada but the people of the Motherland, what was in the interests of the Empire, and how the Empire could be saved. He is rather tardy in commencing this large order. There are statesmen who know something about the Empire and something about the duties and relations which this family of nations owe to one another, and these men have spoken on the subject, and before the Finance Minister makes any headway with his ideas, he will have to show that Lord Milner is entirely wrong as to what the relations between Canada and the Empire should be. The Minister of Finance, who has been in public life for a year and a half, purposes telling the people of this Empire that he knows more about empire-building than Mr. Deakin, ex-Prime Minister of Australia, or than Mr. Fisher the present Prime Minister of Australia. The Finance Minister leads the people of Canada to think that on this question of the naval relations which should exist between the colonies and the Mother Country, he knows more than Lord Beresford ('Condor Charlie'), who is supposed to be the darling of the Unionists in Great Britain, the fast friends of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that even though his task is a hard one, he should enter upon it at once and let us hear what he has to say about it.

Then, are we not to hear from the Minister of Inland Revenue, (Mr. Nantel)? Those of us who were in the last Parliament remember his sturdy form and the vigorous way in which he denounced anything that was proposed in this House whereby Canada might give anything to the Mother Country for purposes of naval expenditure. Not only is the Minister of Inland Revenue bound to explain what he stated in this House and to the country before, but he ought to explain to this House and country why he should be here as a Minister of Inland Revenue to-day. The Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) also should tells us not only why he is sitting there now, but how he came to be there at all. And as for the other hon. gentlemen opposite whose former utterances on this subject are matter of record, their task and their duty is so evident that it will be a mere adopting of the policy of the ostrich—hiding their heads in the sand in hope that nobody can see them—for them to remain silent; silence will avail them nothing. As to those hon. gentlemen opposite who have not spoken on this question, I can only suppose that they have taken the admiral's advice in Pinafore:

> Stick close to your desks and never go to sea,
> And you all may be rulers of the King's navee.

But there has been an absolute failure on the part of these hon. gentlemen to justify the anomalous position they occupy to-day and which runs counter to all the traditions of the Empire from the time the American colonies separated from it. Their silence does not alter or conceal the fact that we are dealing with one of the most serious problems ever brought before this Parliament, a problem whose effects will be felt not merely in our own days, but throughout the future history of Canada. And hon. gentlemen opposite cannot escape responsibility for the seriousness of it by silence. We must approach the discussion of this question fairly and manfully.

Those of us who have had the honour of places in previous parliaments know that this question has been before us for four years in various forms. Hon. gentlemen opposite must concede that there are men in this House who have some belief in the future of this country, men who are animated by something higher than desire for mere party success, men who have hoped, during all the time they have been honoured with seats in Parliament, that they might do something in order that the tie that binds this great nation and the other nations composing this Empire, may be maintained for all time strong and indissoluble. That is the aspiration of some of us here in Parliament, and it is from that standpoint that I would like to discuss the matter. It is the fear that measures like this may imperil that tie and bring about conditions in which we shall not be able to maintain the connection with the Empire which our fathers have handed on to us and which we ought to endeavour to hand on to our children unimpaired, that makes us regard this as an issue of the gravest importance. We have had fifty years of national life, fifty years during which we have been working under the conditions granted us by the Imperial Parliament in which are laid down in clear words the rights, the powers of this Parliament, and the status of the Canadian people. As to the particular phase of power of Canada which we are now considering, it was not until 1910 that we passed a naval law, attempting to exercise the powers conferred upon us by the British North America Act.

In 1867 it was declared that this Parliament should have exclusive control for the peace, order and good government of this country of all matters relating to the military and naval services of this country; and it is by virtue of that fact that the power was given us in 1867 that Parliament must move to solve this problem to-day. We dealt with the question of the militia in 1868; we dealt with it on lines which have been apparently satisfactory since that time. The militia, constituted and paid for by the Canadian people, attend to the peace and good order of this country, and as we showed in 1900, are available in times of war for the aid of the Mother Country. In 1910 we proposed to exercise the right further conferred upon us in 1867 by the constitution of a naval service which would bear the same relation to this country that the militia service has borne for many years. But hon. gentlemen opposite come along to-day with a proposition that is out of touch with the conditions that were laid down in 1867, and that involves our taking a course quite different from that which the fathers of Confederation, Macdonald and Cartier, regarded as the proper course to pursue—and to that I will refer at greater length later on.

We are dealing here to-day with an entirely new proposition concerning what Canada ought to do in regard to naval service in her own interest and in the interest of the Empire. As I have said, we are not legislating for to-day, but for all time; and the lines upon which we proceed in the determination of this measure are those which will direct our course in future years. For my hon. friends opposite have included in this proposition the repeal of the naval law which was passed in 1910. True, the measure is not before Parliament in those exact words, but the announcement made by the Minister of Naval affairs to the effect that the policy of this Government is to do away with this law means that we are departing from the principle that we should inaugurate in this country a system of naval defence for Canadian purposes. These hon. gentlemen are putting this forward as a solution of this problem; they seek to provide that we shall solve that problem by means of contributions. The issue then is: Contribution or no contribution, as the determination of this question for all time. What is the effect, in a general way of this legislation upon our future? In dealing with this problem we must decide to do one of two things,—either we are to continue to be one of a collection of nations making up the Empire, each in its own way and under its own conditions working out its local problems while joining with the others in time of stress; or we must confess that we have no men, no artisans, no capacity,—that instead of doing our part as the Australians are doing theirs we are willing to give up the status of nationhood and hereafter become in a most important particular, subservient to other nations within the Empire for all time to come. That is the proposition. What will the Canadian people of a future day say to us? I assume that every man in this House to-day has caught the spirit of Canadian enthusiasm, a spirit that has more than ever taken possession of our people within the last ten or fifteen years—that pride of country, the certainty of our future, that animates our people in every walk of life, that caused us to progress in a material sense in a way far exceeding all previous time in our history. Is that progress to stop? Is our population to stand still or decrease, or is it to increase as time goes on? What will the self-respecting Canadian of future times, when this is a country of fifteen or twenty millions of people, say about those who in this debate have decreed our inability to stand up as men and as Canadians before the whole Empire? Will he then without any dockyards or ships, either naval or merchant, be content with this defenceless position within the Empire? Will he act on this principle, or will he assert his independence? If the hon. gentlemen will not give voice to their opinions on this matter they should at least consider whether or not the Prime Minister was correct when he declared in 1909 that the chief evil which he recognized in the contribution system was that it tended towards severance of the ties that bound this country to the Motherland. Will the Canadian of 1925 be proud of the Prime Minister who made the statement that contribution meant separation, and then deliberately proposed to solve the problem of naval defence by making a contribution? I submit that we should remember our responsibility, and, as true friends of Empire maintenance so act that there may be no question in the future that the conditions created and the status maintained will comport with the patriotism and pride of the Canadian that is to be. That is the duty we must fulfil at this stage and we are lacking in serious regard for the great interests of our land, as well as its future, if we fail—and we will fail if this proposal set forth by the hon. gentleman opposite is followed out.

There are only one of two courses to be followed. My hon. friend talks about the deliberation in regard to a permanent policy, and I would remind hon. gentlemen that he has been deliberating since 1909—four years ago—and that he has changed his mind three or four times during that period. When in England my hon. friend told those with whom he came in contact that he always had one opinion on this question, and the opinion he expressed at a dinner at the Colonial Institute was one he never gave expression to in this House. The English ship-owners hailed the arrival of the new customer with great delight as they saw the dividends they were to receive. There is, as I have said, only one or two courses to be followed —either contribution, or Canadian ownership and construction. We must either provide for a Canadian navy, or inaugurate a policy of contribution—there is no middle course. Notwithstanding the platitudes of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to formulating a permanent naval policy they may think until doomsday, but only two things will ever come to them—either the policy of a Canadian navy or the policy of contribution. My hon. friend's assumed pose on this question, and his desire to lead the people to believe that his brain is working out some ponderous idea, and that eventually he will evolve something on this question, is all mere pretext; there is not even a hybrid policy involved. He tells us that Canada will have her voice in the councils of the Empire and until that is accomplished, and Imperial federation is arranged for, we ought not to have a permanent policy. Anyone who, in addition to studying English conditions, has sat in the gallery at Westminster and watched the struggle that is going on in England to settle the problem of democracy of that country; any one who knows how the machinery of the Imperial Parliament is clogged in this respect; anyone who reads the English 'Hansard' and observes the varied considerations that come before that Parliament, sitting, as it does, almost ten months in the year; any such person knows that under present conditions, Imperial federation is a long, long way off, and that it cannot be worked out until some scheme of self-government of the component parts of the United Kingdom is evolved. When my hon. friend says that nothing can be done until Imperial federation is realized, he either desires, on account of his late alliance with the Nationalist element in the province of Quebec, to escape all further responsibility in regard to the naval question, or he is attempting to deceive the people of this country with the idea that he is looking forward to some patriotic accomplishment, and that when that patriotic accomplishment takes place, all these problems will be solved. If my hon. friend is waiting for Imperial federation to be consummated before he propounds his permanent policy, then the policy will never be propounded. Possibly he hopes to escape from the rather nasty position he occupied in 1910 and 1911, when, in order to attain power, he went back upon his position in respect of a Canadian naval service, in order to secure the support of the reactionary element in one of the provinces of this country. Let there be no mistake about it; in this proposal the Conservative party do not intend—as the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has said, and as other hon. gentlemen who argued against a Canadian naval service meant, if they did not give expression to their thoughts—the Conservative party of this country, led by the present Prime Minister, do not intend at any time to have a Canadian naval service; they propose to solve this question by a continual policy of contribution.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think my hon. friend is mistaken when he says that I used such words in respect to the permanent policy of the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am quite sure my hon. friend would be delighted if he were in a position to commit the Government in respect to certain matters, but as he is not, I did not refer to any language of his as so committing the Government. If my hon. friend is not a good friend to this Government, if he is not thoroughly in touch with it, or desires to intimate to the House that he thinks one way and the Government thinks another, I would like my hon. friend to tell me so.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am quite content to let the language I used speak for itself. I am sure, however, the hon. gentleman cannot show that I used the language he attributed to me in the first instance.

Mr. MACDONALD: I shall look at 'Hansard.'

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let us see what all this amusement is about. Is the hon. member for Brantford not in favour of a policy of contribution? Does he not think that is the solution of this question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If there is a crisis that calls for an immediate contribution; I said our policy at present is an immediate contribution to meet an emergency.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the future policy?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I said it would be thought over and brought down in due time. I said that the permanent policy would be brought down and, further, submitted not only to the House but to the people of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is one advantage about this little episode. We have got a new word. Emergency was discarded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster); he spelled it out—n-e-e-d.

Mr. FOSTER: Was that not the correct spelling?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, but a rather bad spelling for emergency. It is a good old-fastioned Anglo-Saxon word that was not hard to spell; but by hon. friend was so anxious to show that he was not standing for any emergency theory that he called it need, and in order to emphasize the word he spelled it. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the past has sometimes pursued an evasive course. I can remember in the session of 1911, when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) moved an amendment to the address, and when his leader had moved a sub-amendment, my hon. friend voted quite loyally for the amendment of his leader, but when the motion in amendment of the member for Jacques Cartier was not put by the then Speaker, I have still a vision impressed on my mind of the hon. minister's coat-tails disappearing from his desk out through that door. Although his leader sat and voted for the resolution of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not stand for it.

Mr. FOSTER: Will my hon. friend now assert on his responsibility as a member that those were my coat-tails that he saw that day?

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no question about that; he made his exit through the door. My hon. friend would like, in that happy way of his, to jocularly evade the serious proposition with which I started out in regard to this matter; but my hon. friend was a little evasive on this question of emergency. Need was his theory. He will not deny that he declined to vote for the motion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier; although his leader was quite willing to wait and did wait and voted for that resolution.

Mr. FOSTER: Perhaps it was a case of emergency that took me out.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps we might adopt my hon. friend's word, need: he needed to go out, he wanted to go out. There has been a gradual simmering down since people began to see what had really gone on in the Motherland and the Minister of Trade and Commerce is too old a hand at the parliamentary game not to know that the case which he was attempting to justify was too weak for him to pretend to seriously argue to this House, that there was anything that could be called an emergency. But my hon. friend from Brantford, in discussing this question, said exactly what I am saying now, that there is a very sharp and definite line drawn between the two parties on the question before the House. The policy of one party is that we shall have a naval policy, and the policy of the other is that the question should be settled by a contribution. This is what the hon. member for Brantford said:

> There is a very sharp line drawn between the naval policy of the Conservative party, as announced by the Prime Minister and the naval policy of the Liberal party, as set forth in the resolution of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. The Conservative policy follows the line I have suggested of making contributions to maintain the supremacy of the British fleet upon the high seas, and the Liberal policy of to-day seeks to enlarge somewhat on the Liberal policy of 1909 as embraced in the Naval Service Act of Canada.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The contributions that are referred to; that was the word that was used.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friends on the other side have shown such an absolute disinclination the last day or two to make any speeches that I think they will have to postpone any utterances till a later occasion. I would not want to call them up, or cause them to break in any way the instructions that seem to have been given by the First Minister that they were not to say anything.

Eliminating all this nonsense about permanent policy, because no other language can be applied to it, all this talk is intended simply to mystify and mislead the people of this country about a permanent policy. What we are considering to-day is a most momentous question, the question whether or not we shall reverse the whole history of the relations that have been maintained between the different nations of the Empire and the Motherland during the last fifty years, and shall take a position of absolute subserviency, so far as naval defence is concerned—never do anything for ourselves, but always go on and contribute to Great Britain in cash. That is the issue. It is just as well to have this issue defined clearly so that there will be no mistake about it; and if there is any hon. gentleman in this House who has confidence and belief that this country in the days to come is to attain to the greatness and the extent and the strong position we all hope it will, if there is any hon. gentleman who thinks that our children who may be in this House in 1930 will be prepared to stand up and declare that their fathers in 1912 and 1913 laid down a true policy when they said that Canada would be for ever destitute of dockyards or ship-yards or any of those conditions which are necessary to the success and prosperity of any nation, then I am sorry for the hon. gentleman who has that view. What has been the position of this country in regard to that question? There has been four stages in our history dealing with it.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before six o'clock I was endeavouring to point out that the clear issue between the parties in this House at this time in regard to our future relations to the Empire with reference to naval defence, was whether our part would be better met by a policy of contributions or by looking after our own defence by the establishment of a Canadian navy to act in relation with the Imperial navy in time of war. I pointed out that any one who approaches the consideration of such an important question from the standpoint of a lover of the Empire, who wants to see that Empire maintained for all time, and Canada maintain her position within the Empire, peopled by a loyal and free population at all times devoted to her own interests and to those of the Empire, must realize that the menance to that future by reason of a contribution policy is of the gravest possible kind.

In order to consider this question with the gravity and care which it demands, I think it would be desirable for us to glance over the past history of Canada since 1867 with a view to seeing just what were the aspirations, views and ideas of the fathers of Confederation, and also of the different public men who have had to do with the settlement of great affairs since that time. We must remember, as a premise, that practically we are now adjusting finally our future policy in the execution of that power which was conferred upon us under the British North America Act, whereby we were authorized to legislate in regard to naval defence. In looking at the history of Canada we find that there was a period from 1867 to 1909 when Canada did absolutely nothing so far as naval defence was concerned, and Canada did not propose to do anything. During the greater portion of the period during which my hon. friends opposite were in charge of the affairs of the country, no statement is to be found in the debates or in the statutes of the country which would indicate that those gentlemen and their leaders, to whom they appeal when they desire to rally the spirits of their followers, ever proposed to do anything. A proposition of military defence was evolved in 1900 when the party to which I have the honour to belong and the leader whom I have the pleasure to support, sent to South Africa, the sons of Canada to fight the battles of the Empire. Then there was a second period beginning in 1909 when Canada, in conjunction with Australia, reaffirmed in this House by a unanimous resolution the principle laid down at Confederation and provided for the establishment of a local navy to be constructed, owned and manned by this, one of the nations of the Empire, just as Australia and other nations of the Empire proposed to construct, own, and man their navies, these navies to act in co-operation with the Imperial forces in time of war. That was the next step in the development of our relations in this particular regard and in the exercise of the privileges which were conferred upon us as a Parliament. Then came another period when the opposition to the Government of the day divided into two wings. One of them took the extreme view expressed in this House that Canada owed nothing to England, and that we were not called upon to engage, either by contribution or by the institution of a local navy, in any matter of naval defence, that we had no right to create a navy which was to act in co-operation with the Imperial navy in time of war. There was another wing, which in other parts of the country took an entirely different view, declaring that the proposals made by the Government of the day were wholly inadequate, and that the people of the country should be consulted before anything was done; and imagining they saw an emergency, they forthwith proposed to contribute $25,000,000 to the Mother country. Then we have to fourth period of development in regard to this matter, the period which we have now entered and which has evolved the policy we are now discussing, a policy of contribution as distinguished from a policy of construction. The Government of the day propose to solve the problem of our relations with the Mother Country in regard to naval defence and to exercise the powers conferred upon them under the British North America Act by a contribution. We on this side of the House declare that the policy which our leader inaugurated in 1909, the policy of construction within Canada of a navy, and of provision for dock yards and for all the implements which Canada as a component part of the Empire can supply for local defence, is the best exercise that can be made of our constitutional power, and the best service we can render to the Empire.

These are the four periods, and I propose to examine the conditions that applied to each of them. Reverting to the first period, we find that under the British North America Act, sub-section 67 of section 91, there was conferred upon the Parliament of Canada the exclusive right of legislating in regard to military and naval service and defence. It is clear that the fathers of Confederation contemplated that in the development of this country, great as it has been in excess of their visions, the time would come when Canada would be called upon to do in regard to naval defence what they themselves with Sir George Cartier proposed to do in 1868 with regard to defence on land when they passed the Militia Act. That was their view point, and the Conservative leaders during subsequent years steadfastly refused to consider any proposition which involved a contribution of money or of men to the Mother country. So clear is that, that one scarcely needs to argue it, because history, the debates, and the political views expressed since 1867, more especially in later years are within the memory of hon. gentlemen in this House. But in order that the fact may be made more clear and definite, let me read to you a statement which was made by Sir Charles Tupper, one of the fathers of Confederation, the coadjutor with Sir John Macdonald in the early days in settling the lines upon which the foundations of Canada were laid. Let us see what he said, because he is one of the few who are able to interpret exactly the view point of the men of those days. In 1891 Lord Salisbury requested a delegation from the Imperial Federation League to prepare a statement of some scheme with regard to confederation. Later the league appointed a committee of which Sir Charles Tupper was a member, but the committee evolved no scheme and died from inanition in 1893. After that event, Sir Charles Tupper wrote this letter in which he showed where he stood in regard to the attitude which Canada should adopt toward Great Britain, and I think we can take his utterance as an illustration of the view point of the Conservative leaders of that time.

This is what he said:

> Knowing as I do that the most active members of the committee were mainly intent on levying a large contribution from the revenues of the colonies for the support of the army and navy of Great Britain, I am delighted to have been able, almost single-handed, to obtain such a report from such a committee.

That statement is one which cannot be overlooked. It is a concise statement of where the Conservative leaders were in the old days on this question of a contribution. But let us see what he said at a late date—1909—on this question. He speaks not only with a full knowledge of Conservative traditions in Canada, but with a full knowledge of the conditions as they existed in London and, on account of his position as high commissioner, with a knowledge of the attitude of Englishmen generally. He said:

A few years ago, when Canada was struggling to open up for British settlement the great granary of the world, a few gentlemen here raised the question of a Canadian contribution to the Imperial navy. I joined issue with them and was sustained by the press and public opinion. It was admitted that Canada was not only no burden to the Mother Country, but without her harbours and coal mines on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, Britain would require a larger navy. Contrast the progress of Canada, Australia and New Zealand under Imperial management, and since it was relinquished, and it will be seen to whom their present importance is due.

There is a strong argument for my right hon. friend the Premier, from the great Nova Scotian who preceded him as leader of the party and who tells him that he is not in favour of this policy of subserviency. this policy which declares that a man who was born in this Canada of ours is of poorer timbre, of less degree, than a man who happens to have been born within the United Kingdom, that it is not a sound policy or one which he, as leader of a Canadian party, should stand for in this country.

I have an authority which is not so great, but which is derived from a gentleman whom the Prime Minister thought of sufficient importance to advance not long ago to a position in his Cabinet. I refer to my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue. The Minister of Inland Revenue reminds me of a gentleman who was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the days of Peel and of whom the great Disraeli is reported to have said that, 'like a fly in amber, one wondered how in the devil he ever got there.' When the announcement of the appointment of my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue was made some fifteen or sixteen months ago, one wondered how in the devil he ever got there, and the wonder to-day is how in the devil he stays there. The Prime Minister thought that this gentleman was of sufficient worth to take him from the ranks of the left wing of his party, with which he had formed this alliance, and advance him to a position at the head of a great department in this country. Mr. Nantel—if I will be pardoned for referring to him by name—posed in this House between 1908 and 1911 as a great authority upon constitutional practice and upon the history of the Conservative party. This is one of his utterances:

I say again, that our Canadian statesman: Sir A. MacKenzie, Sir George Etienne Cartier, whom the Liberals have vilified to such a great extent and upon whom they now rely in order to have the present Bill adopted, and Sir John A. Macdonald, have rejected this doctrine of imperialism at all times, and especially in 1863 and 1885.

He referred particularly to occasions when the aid of Canada was sought. But he went further:

And it is more than probable that if Sir John A. Macdonald had been the leader of this country in 1889, our Canadian militia would not have gone to fight in South Africa.

Is the Minister of Inland Revenue right? If he is right how was he ever allowed into this Cabinet? How does my hon. friend the Minister of Militia possess his soul in patience when he has alongside of him a man who declares that, when the Minister of Militia insisted that Canada should send men to South Africa, he was acting entirely contrary to the traditions of Sir John Macdonald? Of course, newer days have come to the Minister of Militia. The warlike member for Champlain who is the Deputy Speaker, and who, in the last Parliament, and out of Parliament too, was a doughty warrior has become a man of peace, and he devotes his energies to finding employment in this House for a large number of French translators. He flouts the Minister of Militia; he writes to his friends in Quebec and instead of referring to him as the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, he calls him Sam the tetrarch, and boasts, not of having fulfilled his many promises with regard to opposing naval contributions, but that, while the Government is going on with its naval contribution, he is devoting himself to the arts of peace in the way of finding jobs for the faithful who want to serve their country for a consideration as translators in spite of the tetrarch. The Minister of Inland Revenue tells us that Sir John Macdonald would never have sent troops to South Africa in 1899. Does he know what he is talking about, is he right; because he was preaching the gospel of the left wing of the party at that time? If he was, then one of the cherished illusions of hon. gentlemen opposite must go by the board. Do not let us at any time hereafter in this House have any enthusiastic back-bencher stand up and declare that it is entirely a mistake to say that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had anything to do with sending the troops to South Africa, but that it was done by some gentleman who sat in opposition, and who, in some mysterious way, forced the Government to do what it did not want to do. We have heard that statement made in this House. But, whenever any hon. gentleman rises to do that again, let him remember that one of his leaders, the distinguished Minister of Inland Revenue, has told them that they do not know what they are talking about, and that if Sir John Macdonald had lived at that time they would not have been permitted to go.

The record from 1867 down to 1896 is absolutely barren of accomplishment. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who used to weep about the weary Titan, sitting alone in the North sea and all her children enjoying the advantage of her protection without coming to her aid, sat on the treasury benches for fourteen years and never opened his mouth about sending armaments or ships to England. He comes in here occasionally and makes these speeches of his which he has on tap for the purpose of relieving the party when they are in a bit of a hole. He talks about the inadequacy of the position which the Liberal party have assumed, and their failure to do anything for the Empire, when, in his day of supremacy and position, when he had charge of the treasury of this country, he never gave a five-cent piece towards helping England in any part of the defence of the Empire. That is the record of the Conservative party from 1867 to 1900. When we hear these men talking about a separatist navy, as if the men sitting on this side of the House were not as loyal as they, though our blood is just as vigorous, flowing with Saxon strength, Scotch vigour and Irish enthusiasm, and when we recall to mind the fact that for thirty years these men stood inactive and did nothing, we see how natural it is to-day that they should occupy a position which is an ignominious one, and not the proud Canadian one which we occupy upon this great question. In 1900, under Liberal rule, Canada sent 8,372 officers and men to South Africa at an expenditure of $2,830,963; and, of the Canadian boys who went there to defend the Empire, the bones of 224 lie on the veldt. When I hear these men opposite boasting of their loyalty, I recall an occasion last summer when in the little village of Canning, Nova Scotia, I saw a shaft raised in memory of a son of Canada who gave up his life for the Empire in the South African war. Was he the son of any of these doughty warriors opposite? Was he the son of any of these men who talk so loudly now about what we should do for the Empire? No, he was the son, the only son of my friend the former Minister of Militia, who in his official capacity provided for the sending of the sons of Canada to take part in the defence of the Empire, and among them his own gallant son was not the least worthy. Then, in 1904, the Liberal party, without any blowing of trumpets, gladly assumed, at the request of the Home Government, the maintenance of the dockyards at Esquimalt and Halifax, and they further agreed to man the defences of our country at the expense of Canada, and to relieve the Imperial troops from duty here. When the two great parties in Canada come to compare their records of services to the Empire, the Liberal party can justly claim the laurels. Indeed, it may truthfully be said that whatever has been done by Canada for the defence of the Empire has been done by the Liberals of Canada.

This brings us down to 1909, when this House passed a unanimous resolution which, without taking its words ipsissima verba, set forth these three great principles: First, the recognition of the duty of Canada to assume a larger measure of Empire defence; second, an absolute condemnation of regular and periodic contribution, which was declared to be an impossible solution of the question; and, third, that it was the duty of Canada to at once proceed to the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service. That is where both parties stood in 1909, and the Liberal party set out to put into effect the principles contained in that resolution. Let me call attention to the attitude of the Conservatives in this House with respect to that question at the time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce subscribed to all three of these propositions, and reiterated on every occasion that he was opposed to anything like stated contribution. And the Prime Minister himself declared absolutely against stated contribution and in favour of a Canadian naval service. He went to England, and he returned; he landed at Halifax; he came back to this House the following year, and in the debate on the Address he declared that he was still in favour of the Canadian Naval Service Bill. In the winter of 1910 he said to the Government of the day: Go on with your naval service. I know that in politics consistency is the least of all virtues, and I know that in the history of the Imperial Parliament and of our own, public men have changed their views within a reasonable period of time: but I venture to say that no man occupying a responsible position either in England or in Canada has ever made such a complete reversal of his position in such a short time as has the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada on this question. Probably the explanation may be found in the saying of Lord Rosebery: 'Toryism has under the occasional pressure of men shown itself singularly adaptible.' I fear that the right hon. the Prime Minister has, since his early days, become inoculated with sufficient Toryism to enable him under the pressure of the Nationalists of Quebec to adapt himself to exigencies. These gentlemen tell us now that while they did of course condemn contribution, yet what they did condemn was regular and periodical contribution. Indeed, one of them told us that what they did condemn was 'stated' contributions, and the query arises in my mind as to how many contributions can be made before contribution becomes objectionable. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) is something of a mathematician, and I would like him to figure out how many contributions Canada would have to make before she put her autonomy in danger. Of course, that argument is simply casuistry on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to try to escape from a situation which they realize is incompatible with the dignity and independence of Canada. Surely, if a second contribution or a third contribution is bad, there must be something of evil in a first contribution. A contribution is urged now, because, as we are told, in 1920 if England does nothing in the meantime, there is going to be a sort of parity between the English and German navies. There is a need not an emergency, but a need—that is, there may be in 1920. But suppose that,—an unfortunate thing for Canada—this contribution goes through, and that Germany comes down next year with a programme for the building of a great many more vessels, then the Prime Minister, still having his thinking cap on—for his permanent policy cannot be developed within a year; it is never going to come until Imperial federation comes, and we know that that cannot be within a year, and meantime Canada will be destitute of any preparation for her own defence, no shipyards, no ship-building—there will be nothing for him to do but to come and say: We want another contribution because Great Britain is going to be in need in 1921. But I am inclined to think that the very grotesqueness of this argument must appear to hon. gentlemen opposite, and they must see that, if their leaders were right, and if they themselves were right, if we all were right, when we were in hearty agreement on the subject of contribution, then contributions are not the solution of our relations with the Mother Country. And when you come to the clear ground contained in the third paragraph of that resolution, to which the Prime Minister gave full and enthusiastic adherence and which he followed up by going to his constituents and declaring before a large audience that the result of that policy was that 'to-day was Nova Scotia's opportunity.' What can these hon. gentlemen say? When I hear hon. gentlemen opposite argue that that policy of Canadian naval defence is not a sound one, I wonder at their assurance and temerity. Were they like some other hon. gentlemen who tried to get out of it—were they asleep when this resolution was passed? Did they know what was going on? I think they all knew very well. And I believe that deep in the hearts of many hon. members who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, is the feeling that the right thing for Canada to-day is to build her ships in her own shipyards and man them with her own men for the defence of the Empire.

Why should not we do what Australia has done? One of the greatest fictions which the press of hon. gentlemen opposite are continually publishing is that Australia has done something different from what Canada was going to do. They say: If Canada would only do what Australia has done; if Canada would only follow Australia's noble example, all would be right. Half the Canadian newspapers of this country are uttering this nonsense, that Canada was doing something different from what Australia now proposes to do. Let us examine that, because it has to do with this second period of our history, that beginning in 1909 when the House unanimously declared in favour of a speedy organization of a Canadian navy. Where was Australia at that time? Working out the problem by itself without referring to Canada. On April 15, 1909, inside of two weeks after the resolution had been passed in this House, the Premier of Australia sent home to the Secretary of State for the Colonies an announcement that they in Australia did not want to have anything to do with contributions, they wanted to have an Australian navy. I have before me the official report in regard to it. It gives an outline of the plan on which the Australian navy is to be established, the relation it is to bear to the Imperial forces, and the whole basis on which the thing is to be worked out. It was Australia that first originated the system of local navies within the Empire. The result of the proposition was that the Secretary of State for the Colonies called a conference which was held in London in 1909 which was attended by the hon. gentlemen (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the Opposition in this House, and also the then Minister of Militia and the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Let me run over the history of this movement in Australia, for a moment, for it is very instructive. There was a conference in 1902, and that conference was attended by Sir Edmund Barton, Premier of Australia. When he went back from the conference he anounced to his legislature that he had promised to contribute to the Admiralty at least £200,000. This proposition excited the greatest criticism in the colony, and the Opposition became so serious that Sir Edmund Barton was compelled to resign his position as Premier of the Commonwealth and take the position of Chief Justice and retire absolutely from politics. Now, let me remind the House that the facts I am relating concern a country ninety-five per cent of whose population are of English extraction. If you will keep that fact in mind as the story proceeds, you will realize how ridiculous is this story of a 'Separatist navy' which the press of hon. gentlemen opposite indulge in and which some of these hon. gentlemen even have the temerity to speak of in this House. After a good deal of agitation there came a time, when, in 1909, Australia deliberately gave up the policy of contribution and started upon a policy which meant that they should originate and maintain a local navy, and a conference was held in England with regard to that matter. Before the conference was held, Mr. Fisher went out of power and Mr. Deakin came in. The conference was held in England in 1909, and with the full accord of the Admiralty it was decided that henceforth Canada and Australia should make their contributions to the Empire by establishing local navies, and that the relation of these navies to the Mother Country should be that they should protects our own coasts in time of peace. And in the time of war, where were they? One of the great things hon. gentlemen opposite have been talking about in Ontario and other provinces is that this navy proposition of the Liberal party of Canada was a 'Separatist party' because, forsooth, this Parliament would have the say whether the navy should go to the aid of the Mother Country in time of war or not. That is what hon. gentlemen opposite preached individually, while their confreres in the province of Quebec were declaring it was an absolutely imperialistic navy. What was the opinion expressed in Australia? Anyone can obtain information as to the law by looking at the Australian Defence Act, to be found in the statutes of that commonwealth of 1909; but here is an explicit declaration of the Premier of Australia, made in the Australian Parliament on September 6, 1911:

Mr. RYRIE: I am not clear on the point whether under the naval agreement——

That is, the naval agreement with the Mother Country, to which Canada was a party.

—under the naval agreement, our fleet unit in time of war is to be subject absolutely to the British Admiralty, or only so subject with the consent of this Parliament.

What did the Premier of Australia say? 'Only with the consent of this Parliament.' This is one little fiction hon. gentlemen opposite have been very fond of talking about. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has juggled with cold, legal phraseology about the anomaly of the statement that when the Empire is at war, Canada is at war, and the anomaly of Parliament having anything to say about it, although as a constitutional lawyer, he knows full well that there is no way by which the navy or militia of Canada or Australia, or any other nation within the Empire, could go to England's aid without the consent of Parliament. Right here, remembering the position of Australia, ninety-five per cent of its people being of English birth, let the slander upon the Liberal party heralded by these ultra-loyalists on the other side be forever buried when it is known that there is not a ship in the Australian navy which can set sail to assist the Empire in time of war without the consent of the Australian Parliament.

I have already said that after Mr. Fisher made this proposal, he went out of power, and Mr. Deakin came in. An arrangement was made as to the construction of these ships, and when Mr. Deakin went back to Australia in the autumn of 1909, a Bill was introduced by which he proposed that the Australian people should borrow £3,500,000 in the Old Country for the purpose of having ships built in England. This measure was very much like that of hon. gentlemen opposite, the only difference being that Australia proposed to keep these ships as a part of her own navy, whereas the right hon. gentleman proposes to send ships built with our borrowed money over to England, from whence the money comes. Let us see what was said in the Australian Parliament with regard to this. Mr. Ryrie said:

I hold, at the same time, that the plan that has been adopted, of raising £3,500,000 in the money market on bonds, in order to buy our own ships, which will soon become worthless old iron, is the wrong plan. It is suicidal to borrow money, in this way. It is the work of the prodigal of finance.

Then Mr. Matthews says:

If they borrowed money to establish national shipyards for the building of a fleet, they would be on safer lines. They tell us that we may be able to build some of the small vessels, but could not possibly build a dreadnought, because only certain yards in the world can do such work.

This is the fiction of the English shipbuilder, who is a very powerful factor politically in the Old Country, because of the profits he hopes to reap from a policy involving the construction of ships in England.

I do not see the immediate necessity for a dreadnought or anything approaching it, and the money could have been well spent in establishing a national yard or yards. In that sense it would be reproductive, because it would establish the shipbuilding industry in our midst. If the Government had made a suggestion of that sort, I could have seen my way to vote for it.

But to borrow £3,500,000 from the British money lender, and spend it on the construction of ships in British yards is simply perpetuating the old order of things and piling up debt, with no advantage to Australia, either immediate or remote.

Let me now present another statement:

Mr. Matthews: We shall not add to the stability of the Empire by borrowing money to construct warships in the Old Country. Great Britain can afford to pay for whatever warships she requires and can build all that she needs. I am against this proposal to borrow to provide for the cost of this unit, and to have the vessels of the fleet constructed almost entirely in the old country. I am as strong an Empire man as is any hon. member—I was reared in an atmosphere that makes me an Empire man—but I recognize that my duty to Australia is to assist in making her, as far as possible, self contained. If that were done and we continued to have for the Old Country the feelings that we entertain towards her to-day, we should do something subtantial for the cause of Empire.

Here we have, in concise form, the proposition made in Canada. Although we make the proud boast that we are the greatest colony of the whole Empire, we should remember that four years ago Australia, which does not equal Canada in population, resources or extent, quietly proceeded to establish a local navy on the lines of the Bill proposed by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House. Talk about tin-pot navies! Australia with ninety-five per cent of her population of English birth, has had a tin-pot navy since 1909. Mr. Brown, at the conclusion of the debate in 1909, made the following statement:

Defence is an expression of national preservation and patriotism. Australian self-preservation and patriotism are not necessarily antagonistic to British or Empire preservation or patriotism; but may, and should be, their complement. There is no justification for the innuendo, and in some cases, the direct statements that Australian patriotism means or spells disloyalty to the Empire, and that the desire to build an Australian navy and to provide for Australian defence, is necessarily antagonistic to the best interests of the Empire.

In Australia, just as here, there were politicians who charged the Government, because they wished to build their ships in Australia, with a desire to have a separatist navy, but Mr. Brown concludes as follows:

Finally, Australian naval defence should be: (a) paid for by Australian money; (b) built by Australian labour and skilled workmen out of Australian material so far as possible; (c) manned by Australian men, animated with Australian patriotism; and, (d) an Australian fleet under Australian supervision and control up to the point when the Empire needs united action under central control.

This with the substitution of the word 'Canadian' for the word Australian, is an admirable statement of the Liberal policy of to-day. The proposition to borrow money to build the Australian ships in the Old Country, submitted in the autumn of 1909, was carried by a very narrow majority, but it led to the speedy downfall of the government which proposed it, and there came into power a government which repealed this law, and inaugurated a policy for the construction of the ships in Australia, along the line of the proposition laid down by Mr. Thomas Brown. That is the policy in effect in Australia to-day.

Let us see the nature of that. Did Mr. Deakin, whom everybody recalls as having taken a distinguished place in the conference at home, when he found that Australian sentiment demanded that this navy should be constructed in Australia, oppose it? On the contrary he became one of its most vigorous upholders, and when in 1911 the then Premier, Mr. Fisher, went home to the conference and came back with an agreement made with the naval authorities permanently establishing the status of that Australian navy, what do we find? That in the session of Parliament which followed he announced in the speech from the throne:

The naval agreement arrived at after conference between Commonwealth representatives and the Admirality is extremely satisfactory, embodying the policy formulated by the Government and approved by the people of the Commonwealth.

And then what followed? Here is an opponent of Mr. Fisher who then instead of keeping up this agitation as hon. gentlemen have been doing for political purposes, gambling with the future of Canada on one of the most vital questions in her interest, said:

The naval defence scheme was formulated by the Liberal Government. Like many others of the measures of that Government, it was found that it could not be improved upon and that it was the best thing for Australia. Consequently it has been adopted, notwithstanding the most strenuous opposition of members of the Labour party, when the policy was originally put before the people.

This is an opponent of Mr. Fisher declaring that Mr. Deakin and his party are entitled to the credit of establishing it. Let us see what was the attitude taken by another critic on the other side of the House towards the Government in their proposal that the ships should be built in Australia. Mr. Joseph Cook, whose name is familiar to every one having any knowledge of Australian history, said:

When I see this Labour Government spending millions of the peoples money in creating a navy and army for the defence, not only of Australia, but of the Empire, it is my place to support it, and to reserve all criticism which is not absolutely necessary.

I have dwelt with that question at some length for the purpose of showing the House and the country that Australia has led the way, first, in the proposal of 1909 to the Mother Country of the establishment of local navies. They provided for the construction in Australia of their navy and they have now in existence at Sydney an immense dockyard and shipyard where the vessels for the Australian navy are being built. These shipyards were inaugurated only two years ago and they provide all that is necessary for the mercantile interest of that great colony right within their own doors as a result of the policy introduced by their Government. The statement was made in the Australian Parliament only a year ago that there were already in that great shipyard at Sydney orders to the amount of £800,000 for the construction of vessels of various kinds and demands were being made in Parliament from different portions of the Commonwealth that the Government should proceed to institute other shipyards in other parts in order to provide for the construction of mercantile ships.

Now where is Canada? Canada has stood still.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friends who came into this House within the last two years say, 'Hear, hear.' They have been reading Tory newspapers. If they had been down here and had seen the play that went on with the Prime Minister on one side and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) on the other, they would not be chuckling to-day. In 1909 when the conference was held in London, our representatives went home, they entered into the same agreement as the Australian people, they came back to their Parliament just as the Australian representatives did. Instead of proposing a Bill to borrow money to build ships in England they anticipated what Australian public opinion decided to do a year afterwards, and introduced a Bill which provided that Canada should proceed to provide for the construction of these ships in Canada on exactly the same lines as under the Australian Act. Why did they not do it? Because of an alliance, an alliance the like of which has never been seen in our history, where you found one great political party who claimed to be the founders of Confederation joining themselves with a combination of Nationalists who set about creating discord and dissension in one of the great provinces of this Dominion. That is why that navy was not built.
