Let us follow the history categorically. That is what was done by our representatives when they came back in 1910. On their return to Canada they found that the right hon. the present Prime Minister had been over to England, that he had said that a Canadian navy was a good thing. He came back here and said the same thing. When they introduced their Naval Service Bill in this House of Commons they were met by two amendments, one by the present Prime Minister, who declared that nothing should be done without consulting the people of Canada. Hon. gentlemen who titter about this thing ought to read the record. They were not here to know that the Australian Government went on without bothering to consult the people and did the thing, but the present Prime Minister thought he could play a little politics and add to his strength in the province of Quebec. He adopted the Bourassa policy of consulting the people, in order to get support. There can be no mistake about that. Our friends from Ontario have no doubt, I suppose, that this man Bourassa was a Grit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, he was, but for the last ten years he has been playing your game, he was the same kind of a Grit as your leader, the present right hon. Prime Minister was, but he and the Prime Minister were Grits who were not doing very much at the job, they have been playing the Tory games.

Mr. FOSTER (Kings): They had some principles, the two gentlemen you spoke of.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am glad that this gentleman from Kings county has become such a devout admirer of Mr. Bourassa. It will be a good thing for his people down there to remember. The present Prime Minister said: Go on with your naval service, down to January, 1910. On the first reading of the Bill to provide for the naval service, the present Prime Minister said: Go on; and when the second reading came, he and his former follower, Mr. Monk, proceeded to move two amendments to it, both intended to kill it, and there was formed a compact between the two combinations that remained in opposition down to 1911, each playing a different game, each shouting a different shibboleth, only united in one idea, to beat Laurier. The country and its navy and everything else, all its future, might be imperilled if that one thing could be obtained. What were the lines? First, the right wing whose duty it was to shout the tin-pot navy, the separatist navy and that the people should be consulted. Suddenly an emergency was discovered, one of those emergencies which the Prime Minister last year, when trying to explain to the House the differences that existed between himself and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), admitted on a later occasion he had discovered never existed. Well, an emergency had of course to be provided and forsooth $25,000,000 had to be voted to please the jingoes. And that old phrase of Tennyson's was used. I do not know what my hon. friends opposite would have done during the last four or five years if Tennyson had not written that phrase:

One King, one flag, one fleet, one throne.

Poor Alfred Tennyson never had any idea that his words were going to be put to such base uses as those people were putting them to. Well, that was how the right wing talked. Then there was the left wing, of which the doughty and stolid Minister of Inland Revenue was one of the chief factors. I understand he is in doubt as to whether there is an emergency. The only emergency that my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue knows of is one that might interfere with his job. The hon. member for Brantford said this afternoon that there was a crisis, so I think the Minister of Inland Revenue had better wake up and get busy. The idea of the left wing, of which the hon. Minitser of Inland Revenue was one of the formidable factors, was to utilize the services of Mr. Bourassa. He had been carrying on an agitation against the Liberal leader since 1900 when the Liberal leader sent the troops to South Africa. So a combination was made, and there were meetings in this House of Commons. Representatives from the province of Quebec came here and held consultations, and decided, how the Minister of Inland Revenue knows; he is laughing at it now, but he knows to what I am referring.

Mr. NANTEL: I am not ashamed of it.

Mr. MACDONALD: They decided that Mr. Bourassa's influence would be most useful in the province of Quebec and that it was desirable to use it if possible on behalf of their party. So they concluded that they would run along parallel lines, one shouting 'tin-pot navy' and the other 'we don't want to have anything to do with England.' The compact was made and we were told that the navy proposal was unconstitutional, that conscription would follow. Just imagine the horrible picture which the Minister of Inland Revenue drew when he told the habitants that conscription would follow, that emissaries of Sir Wilfrid Laurier would go into their quiet and peaceful villages, and that the young people, instead of growing up to be good Frenchmen and good Catholics, would be taken away and placed on the decks of the vessels that Laurier was going to build and sent to be made meat of by the guns of the Japanese and Chinese. That was the kind of warfare that the Minister of Inland Revenue and his confreres carried on in the province of Quebec. They said, forsooth, that if Canada was to have a navy, conscription must necessarily follow. That was a figment of their imagination. My hon. friend the Postmaster General, who has done us the honour of discussing this question, instead of being practical and explaining how he came to accept a position in the Government when his views were so different from what they were before the election, gave us a most interesting historical lecture upon the loyalty of the French-Canadian people in this country. My hon. friend requires to give that lecture to many of the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him; he does not need to prove it to anybody on this side. In giving us that lecture he tried to conjure up the theory that, if the navy proposition were carried into effect, no men in Canada would go on those ships. He wanted to keep alive the old theory that conscription might follow; that was what was at the back of his head when he talked that way. It was a very effective cry previous to 1911, and no one knows it better than the men who owe their seats in this House to it. They said that any proposition of that kind was unconstitutional, and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in this House supported the proposition moved by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that not merely should nothing be done until the Naval Defence Bill was submitted to the people, but that nothing should be done until the alternative proposition of the then leader of the Opposition was submitted to the people. They claimed that both policies, contribution, and naval defence in Canada, should be submitted to the people. Wherever it was necessary for political effect, they scorned the idea of being followers of Mr. Borden. He was 'the vicar of Laurier' they said. This was done to get the support of gentlemen in Quebec who thought that their interests would be imperiled by those things. That was what took place, and all the while they were abusing the Niobe. Poor old Niobe; she was no good; she ran on the rocks; she was a very old vessel they said. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, again recognizes the reference. How I would like to settle this question of the Niobe. The Niobe was built in 1899. She is a vessel of 11,000 tons.

Mr. NANTEL: Was it built in Canada?

Mr. MACDONALD: Can I assume that the Minister of Inland Revenue would have thought she was all right if she had been built in Canada? I think the minister had better take a day off and tell us all he knows about these things. Apparently his duties in the Inland Revenue Department are so arduous that he has been unable to collect his thoughts or his notes and to tell us what he thinks about the matter, but I am sure he will do so in the course of a day or two. This is the situation in regard to the Niobe: She was built in 1899 and is of 11,000 tons. She has a speed of twenty knots, and was built by Vickers, Maxim, Limited, at Barrow. She is a protected first-class cruiser. Now, is she so very old, or was there anything the matter with her? I suppose the British Government could be trusted in the matter of making a bargain, but apart from that, let us see how she stands in comparison with vessels belonging to other countries. I want to put on record these facts, because we have had so much nonsense talked about this vessel that it is well to settle the matter once and for all. There are fifty-one armoured cruisers and ships at present in service in the British navy that are as old as or older than the Niobe. There are ninety-eight armoured ships and cruisers of the same tonnage or of less tonnage in commission in the British navy to-day. Let us take France. There are thirty-five armoured ships and cruisers in commission in the French navy to-day that are smaller than the Niobe and thirty-one that are older. In Germany there are fifty-eight armoured ships and cruisers smaller than the Niobe and seventeen armoured ships and cruisers as old or older. In Italy there are eighteen armoured ships and cruisers older than the Niobe and twenty-five smaller. I could point to five other countries which have navies and show from the Naval Annual that there is a large percentage of vessels still in commission in these navies that are not only smaller than the Niobe but as old or a great deal older. That is the vessel which those gentlemen scorned, the vessel which they said went ashore coming from a political picnic. That is one of the stories which hon. members opposite delight to tell in the back concessions of Ontario where they know all about vessels. What are the facts? The facts are that in the town of Yarmouth there was being held an old home week, as they are held in a great many places throughout the provinces. Yarmouth is the second sea-port of importance on the south shore outside of Halifax. The Niobe had been there for the purpose of the public seeing her, people visited her in great numbers, she was returning to Halifax and in the ordinary course of her journey she ran ashore, not in the county of Yarmouth, but on the south shore of Nova Scotia off Cape Sable. Who was in charge of her? Hon. gentlemen opposite insinuate and suggest that some appointees of the Liberal Government were in charge of her. The man who was in charge of her was the navigating officer, Lieut. White, an appointee of the English Government, sent over with her and responsible for her navigation and direction while under his control, as she was entirely from Yarmouth to Halifax. In the court martial that was held afterwards, he was the one that was criticised for having neglected his duties. Could any imputation of any kind be made upon the Government that had to do with that vessel or upon any member of that Government or of the department? Yet this is one of the fictions that hon. gentlemen have rolled as a sweet morsel under their tongues and which they harp upon and talk about. In this very debate, not more than a week ago, some smart gentleman made some slighting remark about the Niobe and created a titter around him as if that meant that there was something to titter about.

I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) before me and I was just going to refer to him. He has just wakened up. He has one or two things to explain. I want to call his attention to a very solemn statement which he made in this House and which it would be desirable and necessary that he should explain in the course of this debate. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who sat with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), in the last Parliament, declared that there was no constitutional obligation in this country or this Parliament to do anything for the defence of the Mother Country. I will read the hon. gentleman's remarks. Perhaps he will find it well to explain them. They will be found in 'Hansard,' page 4139, of date February 24, 1910. To show how anxious he was to solve the problem of naval defence at that time and to second the laudable and patriotic efforts of the Australians and all those great men throughout the different parts of the Empire who were grappling with this question, let me read to the House what the hon. gentleman said:

> What I desire to point out is that, under our constitution, there is no obligation on the part of Canada, legally or constitutionally speaking, to contribute to the naval forces of the Empire, and that position will continue to exist so long as the United Kingdom alone has exclusive control of the foreign affairs of the Empire.

How does he justify to-day giving away $35,000,000 of the money of the Canadian people?

Mr. DOHERTY: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to answer his question?

Mr. MACDONALD: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend's voice is very sweet, and he has a peculiar habit of elucidating knotty questions. This one which I do not propose to allow him to elucidate and thus interfere with my speech at this time. He can take time to do it later on. I would like to know upon what principle a man who fills the position of Minister of Jusice in this country, after he has gone on record solemnly as declaring that legally or constitutionally this Parliament has no obligation to contribute towards the naval defence of the Mother Country, can justify the proposition to send $35,000,000 over to Great Britain without submitting the question to the people here.

Mr. SPEAKER: The expression 'man' is scarcely parliamentary.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to be in order. If Mr. Speaker would be good enough to suggest what words I might use in referring to the hon. gentleman I shall be glad to be guided by him.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. member or hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh, hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: I shall endeavour, Mr. Speaker, to come up to your standard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that dissent from the explanation of the Chair is scarcely in keeping with the decorum of Parliament or with the effort of the Chair to keep as closely to the rules of debate as possible

Mr. MACDONALD: I hope the hon. Minister of Justice will tell us what he meant in that quotation to which I have directed his attention, and will take an opportunity of letting the House know just what he meant by his legal and constitutional objections. I would like to know whether they exist, and why, if that proposition is a sound one, he should insist on sending $35,000,000 of our money across the ocean for the purpose of contributing to the defence of the Empire.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman calls upon me.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, I am not calling upon my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order. Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman who has the floor does not desire to give way he is entitled to continue his speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has the floor, and unless he desires to give way he is entitled to continue.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is another minister, whose utterances will be found on page 4537 of 'Hansard,' 1910, who talked with regard to what should and what should not be done at this juncture, and who must take a part of the responsibility for the laggard position that Canada occupies in the matter of naval defence. I refer again to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. He said:

I shall vote against the Bill because it involves the recognition of military imperialism, because it aims at having that principle recorded in our statute-books. I shall vote against the amendment——

That is the amendment of his present colleague the Prime Minister—

—because it involves the same principle and because I do not admit that there is any emergency under the present circumstances. I do not wish to justify the motion of the leader of the Opposition. I have just said that I am against it.

One of the problems which has never been solved and which I hope to revert to later on, to which, at some later date the hon. gentleman might address himself, is how it was that, being against his colleague and leader on such a vital question, he came to support him, what the terms were that he made with his leader when he accepted a seat in the Government and what he has to say in regard to this utterance. I have another quotation which will require explanation at a later time. It is as follows:

The sub-amendment——

That is, the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier——which calls for a referendum to the people on a question of such importance, is the only proposal which meets my full and entire approval.

Personally, I believe that the policy to be followed by Canada is, and will be for a long time to come, the policy which has been followed ever since 1863, admitted by British and Canadian statesman such as Gladstone, Disraeli, Salisbury, Sandfield Macdonald, Cartier, J. A. Macdonald, Blake, Mackenzie, until the days of Chamberlain, and which is limited to the defence of our land, to the defence of the Empire on Canadian territory, so as to entirely dispense the Mother Country from any such trouble and care.

How does the Minister of Inland Revenue square this proposition to give $35,000,000 to be spent in the shipyards of England, with his high-flown doctrine propounded by him two years ago? At that time the hon. member for Laval was curious to know where the Minister of Inland Revenue stood, whether he was still a supporter of Mr. Borden, or what he was, and Mr. Wilson asked him:

Mr. WILSON (Laval): Does the hon. member for Terrebonne intend to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) at the next election.

That was a poser, and what do suppose Mr. Nantel replied to that?

Mr. NANTEL: I say in answer to the hon. member for Laval that on this side of the House we are free to differ from our leaders. We have opinions of our own. We stick to principles in preference to mere expediency.

I wonder whether he is still sticking to principles or whether expediency has run away with his principles. And now, let me quote to you some language uttered by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) who has been honoured by being made deputy whip of the Conservative party. This is what that gentleman said:

At a moment when our fondest hopes are being realized; at a moment when the stream of immigration we are in need of is pouring into the country, is it fair, is it proper, without consulting those new settlers to adopt a policy which must result in leading the flower of our youth into naval battles on all the seas of the world. Are we Canadians to be used as targets on the waves of the North Sea and upon the billows of the different oceans?

That was a very effective expression in the back parishes: the waves of the North sea, and the billows of the different oceans; how those words rolled under the tongue of the hon. member for L'Islet. Then again the hon. member for L'Islet said ('Hansard,' page 6494, 1910):

Our statesmen by their acts, by their legislation, have expressed the opinion that Canada should not participate in wars which in no way concern Canada.

What do you think of that as sound doctrine? Again he says, in exemplifying this proposition, because of adherence to which, the left wing of the Conservative party asserted they were the true inheritors of the ideas of the Conservative statesmen of the past, and it is well we should know it on such good Conservative authority, so that there may be no question about it hereafter:

In 1885, General Laurie and Colonel Williams proposed to raise two regiments and asked the Government to bear part of the expenditure. Sir John A. Macdonald, after being consulted by Lord Lansdowne, wrote that Canada could not contribute to the wars of the Empire. We have no voice in the wars of the Empire; and to-morrow we may be called upon to shed our blood on the battlefields of the Empire; to-morrow our fellow-countrymen may be sent to China, to Australia, to India. I cannot subscribe to this policy.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. MACDONALD: The member for L'Islet. And let me say just here, I wonder if that is the reason why, in this very loyal policy enunciated by hon. gentlemen opposite, they have taken good care that no Canadians will be on board these ships to fight the battles of the Empire? Is it because the Nationalists of Quebec who support them are opposed to sending Canadians to fight the battles of the Empire? That is the game that worked in Drummond-Arthabaska.

When Parliament met in 1910 and tenders had been called for the construction of these ships in Canada, we found a very curious state of affairs. The two parties were getting closer together on the question. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier moved a resolution setting forth regret that there was no intention on the part of the then Liberal Government to consult the people on the naval policy, or the general question of a contribution by Canada to Imperial armaments. I want the House to remember that resolution. Then Mr. Borden moved an amendment, in which he went on to regret that there was no intention on the part of the Government to consult the people on the naval policy of Canada. Mr. Borden's being in the form of a sub-amendment, it was put first, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce voted for the motion of his leader; but when the motion of the hon member (Mr. Monk) was put, the hon. gentlemen (Mr. Foster) made his exit in order that he might not be called upon to vote. The Right Hon. Mr. Borden, the present Prime Minister, did vote, and he voted for the proposition that he regretted that the Government had declined to consult the people on their naval policy and on the general question of contribution to Imperial armaments. Later on, I will be able to show that Mr. Monk was right when he attempted to hold the Prime Minister to his declaration made in this Parliament in the autumn of 1910. In the election which followed, Quebec was the only battle ground in which the navy question was fought out. Reciprocity was not the issue in the province of Quebec; it was the navy that was discussed there. There was a combination between the old Blues and the associates of Mr. Bourassa, who fought against the Liberals led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the fact that the present Prime Minister has twenty-six members from the province of Quebec to support him, is due to the agitation carried on in Quebec by the left wing of the Conservative party. And, when the battle was over and the victory won, who was the dictator? How did the member for Jacques Cartier and the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Postmaster General come into the Cabinet? It is a fact that the columns of Le Devoir, Mr. Bourassa's newspaper, contained the exact account as to who were to constitute the Cabinet two days before anybody else in Canada knew anything about it. That information must have been obtained from someone who was in consultation with the Prime Minister. We all know what heartburning there was when some of the men who had been truly loyal to Conservative principles for years were left out of the Cabinet, and the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Postmaster General and Mr. Monk, avowed Nationalists, were given seats at the Council Board. The old time Blue was relegated to a back seat and in this coalition Government, partly Conservative and partly Nationalist, the Nationalists were in control so far as the province of Quebec was concerned. And after that Government had been formed, we asked last session for a statement which, under the rule of every constitutional parliament in the whole history of the Empire should have been made at once, as to how these men, absolutely diverse in principles and ideas, could get together in the same government. And no explanation was forthcoming. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, in a moment of exhilaration, soon after having got into office, told us, "We are here, and you are there. And he said that he was riveted and bolted to his seat, and that was all he had to say. He was evidently not riveted and bolted to his seat half so hard as he thought he was.

Mr. GERMAN: Not half as hard as the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, not half so hard as the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. But the Prime Minister was asked for an explanation, and I crave the indulgence of the House, because of the interest of the question and of later developments, while I read what the right hon. gentleman said. Those of us who had the pleasure of sitting in previous parliaments, can enjoy it better, perhaps, than those who are here for the first time in the present Parliament. This is the jaunty way in which the Prime Minister disposed of the matter:

> It is true that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and I did not see eye to eye, but the point that divided us at that time was not a question of policy, but a question of fact, because the Minister of Public Works had said over and over again that when any emergency confronted this Empire he and those who think with him would be prepared to do their duty. The Minister of Public Works and I stood together on this common platform that it would be the height of unwisdom, and not in the interest of a united Empire that any great scheme of permanent co-operation should be forced on the people of this country without affording them an opportunity to pronounce upon it.

It was rather interesting to find after this frank acknowledgment that though disturbance had been going on in the province of Quebec in which everything that approached giving assistance to England was denounced, the man who was the leader of it, the man who marshalled the forces alongside of Mr. Bourassa was not divided from the leader of the Conservative party on any question of policy, the difference between them being only a question of fact as to whether there was an emergency or not. And the Prime Minister went on to say that he was quite mistaken about there being an emergency in 1910. He had wanted to give $25,000,000 to England because of an emergency he thought then existed, but he found out afterwards that he was mistaken and consequently, he and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) could well get together. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier never told us his side until he left the Government, and I will come to that stage of it in a moment. These hon. gentlemen came into office, and what were they pledged to? There is no manner of doubt that while the Prime Minister pretended to be so absolutely disingenuous, he had given private assurance to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that he would repeal the Naval Defence Law, that law which Australia has made the basis of all her contributions to the Empire in regard to naval defence and which is working out admirably there and will be the permanent policy of Australia. There is no doubt that the Prime Minister assured his Nationalist ally that the Laurier Naval Defence Law would be repealed. That was one of the terms. Then what did he do? He had to get another emergency. He thought he had one in 1910, but it slipped out of his hands, so that he had to find another. But that was a big enough emergency for the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. He was a great man last year. Hon. gentlemen who sat behind him and who had to do with him as Minister of Public Works admired his ability, lauded his capacity, and the Conservative party throughout this country heralded him one of the big French-Canadians. Now, none of them are so poor as to do him reverence. When the Prime Minister came back from England with his emergency which he had created himself, in his pocket, and took it to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that hon. gentleman said it was not an emergency at all. In fact, it is said the hon. member for Jacques Cartier told his friends that the Prime Minister went to England and asked the Admiralty to give him some material upon which they could base a case, that the Admiralty sent him figures and that he was indignant and sent for something more and could not get what he wanted; and when he came back to Canada and came before the then Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) with whom he had this difference as to the question of fact of an emergency, he had no evidence to give the then Minister of Public Works that there was an emergency. Mr. Monk in his letter of resignation declared:

I regret to find I cannot concur in the decision, arrived at by the Cabinet yesterday, to place on behalf of Canada an emergency contribution of $35,000,000 at the disposal of the British Government for naval purposes, with the sanction of Parliament but without giving the Canadian people an opportunity of expressing their approval of this important step before it is taken. Such a concurrence would be at variance with my pledges.

To whom? These must have been the pledges the Prime Minister gave him when he came into the Cabinet and on which pledges he gave pledges to his allies in the province of Quebec. There is no doubt that when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier took his place in the Cabinet he secured from the right hon. the Prime Minister assurance as to what his policy would be. On the faith of this he said to his friends who had fought for him: Depend on me. But in leaving the Cabinet, he writes to the Prime Minister that to consent would be at variance with his pledges:

—and the Act proposed is of sufficient gravity to justify my insistence. It goes beyond the scope of the Constitutional Act of 1867.

So, the hon. gentleman declared that the Prime Minister had violated the pledges on which he had taken office, resigned from the Cabinet, and went out, declining to come into this House to defend the proposition that this money should be sent to England. These are the facts about which there is no question. What does the jaunty Minister of Trade and Commerce say? I do not know whether the Minister of Inland Revenue was in his seat or not when this was said. I think he must have been asleep, for otherwise I am sure he would have resented it. He is a very jokey man, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he said:

Then he said this is the result of an unholy alliance between the Nationalists and the Liberal-Conservatives. If it is the result, who won?

It certainly does not take after the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Here is a measure which says contributions; the Nationalists damns contributions; will have none of it. If this is so, whatever the antecedents may have been, the Nationalists did not prevail, that is certain.

If ever there was a humilitating statement made in any Parliament, it was this statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Seated behind him there are twenty Nationalists from the province of Quebec who owe their seats in this House solely and only to their extreme views on this question. Two of them sit in the House riveted and tied to their seats in the Government which they would not give up, no matter what principles prevail. What are the rest of them to do? Is the Nationalist principle to prevail—that is a conundrum in regard to which we may in the future have some revelation. The former Minister of Public Works lifted the curtain a little when he wrote his letter. Why did not the Prime Minister, when the minister left his cabinet, as every other prime minister in every parliament of the Empire has done on such occasion—why did he not make an explanation to this Parliament, as has always been done, and as always should be done? Some of these days the story will come out, and we will know what the bargain was; how the naval defence of Canada was bartered away, and the terms upon which the Nationalist party and the Conservative party came together in the autumn of 1911 and formed this Cabinet. We will know, too, why Mr. Monk resigned, and whose pledges were violated, resulting in this farce being perpetrated on the people of Canada in their being asked to vote $35,000,000 to help the Tories out of a hole in the province of Quebec.

What was the next step on the part of these gentlemen? This combination of political pedlars, who purchased their principles so cheaply in the province of Quebec, went over to England and sold them in the dearest market. This arrangement with the Nationalists costs the people of Canada, if they vote this money, $35,000,000. Last year the Government announced that it had decided to repeal the naval law, to do away with naval defence, and to put the hands of the clock back for years to come, as far as Canada was concerned, in regard to ship building. Why did they do that? To please the Nationalists of Quebec. When the Prime Minister went over to England his hands were tied and he notified the Admiralty that he did not intend to act upon any basis of the establishment of local forces, as Australia had done. He was taken up at once by the ship builders of Belfast, Glasgow, and Newcastle-on-Tyne, who saw their opportunity and did not fail to grasp it. Let us see what was the policy of the English Admiralty before the Tory party, as they themselves claim, was asked to do something:

It is not unlikely that the main naval development of the next ten years will be the growth of effective naval forces in the dominions overseas—that we shall be able to make a division of labour between the Old Country and the overseas states, so that we (the Mother Country) maintain supremacy against all-comers at decisive points, and that they (the dominions) shall guard and patrol all the rest of the Empire.

That was the policy of the Admiralty in May, 1912. And what other principle featured in their policy? They were contemplating—and this may be found in the Naval Review of last year, page 11—something to the following effect:

Expenditure from colonial exchequers on the greatly increased scale lately recommended, must be spread over a long space of time. In the interval which will elapse before all the ships proposed for the local navies are completed, we may, at little cost to our homeland, confer a real boon on our kin beyond the sea. We may, as it has been said, place vessels in reserve in Australasia, which would materially increase the means of defence, at least from such forms of attack as it is necessary to prepare to meet. In doing this essential work of co-operation we create a new bond of Empire.

That was the avowed policy of the British Admiralty when the Prime Minister arrived in England. But they saw him coming, as it were, and they were willing to consent to any proposal he would make. I shall read the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty, published in the Naval Review at page 372:

The development of the naval policy of Canada is at the moment somewhat uncertain. Until the proposals of the Dominion Government are formulated, it is not possible to say how far the organization of the recently constituted Royal Canadian navy will be modified; but the Admiralty will earnestly co-operate in any scheme which will enable Canada to take a real and effective part in the naval defence of the Empire.

So when the Prime Minister arrived there they said: we are ready to do anything you ask. Before the Prime Minister consulted the Admiralty, he spoke at several places and on several occasions—this laudatory banqueting had all been arranged. This man who wanted to submit things to the people of Canada; this man whose left wing was operating in the Province of Quebec; this man who stood up in this House and solemnly supported the theory that we should engage in Canada naval defence, speaking at the Royal Colonial Institute before he had seen the Admiralty at all, stated:

I have always had the conviction, and I hold it today, and I am saying no new thing to you, when I declare that it is my opinion that the defence of the Empire can be best secured by one navy.

After all these statements made and pledges submitted in regard to the policy of Canadian naval defence, he declared in England—whether it was an excess of hospitality that caused his frankness I do not know—that he believed in the proposition that there should be only one navy—no local navies for him.

In this mood, he went to see Mr. Winston Churchill, and Mr. Bourassa tells us what took place. Mr. Bourassa used to be a good authority on what was taking place in the Conservative Party and, in so many words, the Prime Minister said to Mr. Winston Churchill: I am committed to the Nationalist wing of my party to repeal the naval law, and unless you accept a contribution from me, I can do nothing else. Those were the facts. It took three attempts to have a document prepared that would be satisfactory. The Prime Minister came back to Canada without it and I have not the slightest doubt that portions of that document that were sent back here were submitted to the Admiralty by the Prime Minister himself before they were sent to Canada. They bear every earmark of it. That is a nice kind of an emergency is it not? It is no wonder the Minister of Trade and Commerce says it is not an emergency, it is a need. His leader was in great need when he went to England to find someone to lead him out of the maze he had got into and unless he could find some way to take a contribution there was nothing he could do. He comes back and talks grandiloquently, he says that henceforth the Government are to have participation in the Imperial Defence Committee. That is a statement which I propose to treat with the greatest possible care because there are some elements in it of which the Canadian people ought to be made aware. He had talked very glibly about Canada being heard in a military council before they should engage in any permanent co-operation in regard to the question of a navy so he set out, as he says, when he got to England, to make some arrangement of this kind and all through the Tory press of this country there was heralded the statement that a wonderful achievement had been made by the Prime Minister—Canada was to be represented in the councils of the Empire and he had obtained this concession from the Asquith Government and he had the audacity to stand up in this House and make this statement. Let us see what he did, because the document which was issued by Mr. Harcourt, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, was issued for the purpose of contradicting Mr. Borden's statement made in this House that he had obtained that right for Canada. The evidence in that regard is so clear and positive that I shall read it to the House. Let us see what the right hon. gentleman says:

I am assured by His Majesty's Government that, pending a final solution of the question of voice an influence, they would welcome the presence in London of a Canadian minister during the whole or a portion of each year. Such minister would be regularly summoned to all meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence, and would be regarded as one of its permanent members. No important step in foreign policy would be undertaken without consultation with such a representative of Canada. This seems a very marked advance——

Mark that statement:

This seems a very marked advance both from our standpoint and from that of the United Kingdom. It would give to us an opportunity of consultation, and therefore an influence which hitherto we have not possessed.

Is it not intended to imply to this House and to the country that he had obtained this advantage for the first time?

The conclusions and declarations of Great Britain in respect to foreign relations could not fail to be strengthened by the knowledge that such consultation and co-operation with the overseas dominions had become an accomplished fact.

I heard the right hon. gentleman make that statement. I had some recollection in regard to this matter, but I could hardly believe that an hon. gentleman occupying the position which he did, would say to this House that something had been arranged for, which Canada had never possessed in all her history, and that he had been able to accomplish something with the Asquith Government which assured to Canada a voice in the question of war and peace which we had never had before. That is a view point which the enthusiastic Conservative editors up and down this country, and enthusiastic college presidents who have been writing articles in magazines, adopted, thinking that Mr. Borden had obtained this right in England. What are the facts in regard to this? A cousin of the right hon. gentleman who is Premier, the former Minister of Militia, in 1902-3 sat on the Imperial Defence Committee in England on the express invitation of Mr. Balfour, the Conservative leader. In 1909 Sir Frederick Borden sat again in the Imperial Defence Committee at the request of the then Government. In 1911, two years ago, when the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was in England, the question as to whether Canada and the other colonies were to have representatives on the Imperial Defence Committee was settled—two years ago, over a year before Mr. Borden ever saw England or discussed the question. When the right hon. gentleman made that speech in this House on the 5th of December it was cabled to England, it was announced that the speech was published simultaneously in the different parts of the Empire. Mr. Harcourt, Secretary of State for the Colonies, saw this speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister and he saw that the impression which the Prime Minister of Canada was endeavouring to create in regard to this matter was wholly erroneous, and he proceeded to write a state paper to the Premier of Canada and the other self-governing colonies stating the true facts in regard to the question. It is most difficult to conceive that a responsible man, holding such a high position as the Prime Minister of this country, should deliberately set himself to allow the people of Canada to believe that he had obtained for the first time the right for a Canadian minister to sit upon the Imperial Defence Committee and yet the evidence of this document, issued by Mr. Harcourt, is so positive that I leave it to the House and the country to draw their own conclusions in regard to the matter. This letter is as follows:

Downing Street, December 10, 1912.

My Lord,—I am forwarding by post for the confidential information of your ministers, a record of the proceedings of the Committee of Imperial Defence of May 30, 1911 (during the Imperial Conference), and of August 1, 1912 (during the visit of the Canadian ministers to London).

This record deals solely with the question of the representation of the dominions on the Committee of Imperial Defence.

Your ministers, who were present on the first occasion, will remember that the matter arose out of a resolution by Sir Jos. Ward on the Agenda of the Imperial Conference, asking that the High Commissioners of the dominions should be summoned to the Committee of Imperial Defence when naval and military metters affecting the overseas dominions were under consideration. The unanimous view of all those present on May 30, 1911, was that the representation of the dominions should be not by the High Commissioner but by ministers who would be responsible to their own colleagues and Parliament and at the same time it was decided that a defence committee should be established in each dominion which would be kept in close touch with the Committee of Imperial Defence at home. The resolution untimately put forward by His Majesty's Government and accepted unanimously by the members of the Imperial Conference at the Committee of Imperial Defence were as follows: (1) That one or more representatives, appointed by the respective governments of the dominions, should be invited to attend meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence when questions of naval and military defence affecting the overseas dominions are under consideration. (2) The proposal that a defence committee should be established in each dominion is accepted in principle. The constitution of the defence committee is a matter for each dominion to decide.

There is a clear and explicit statement, that on May 30, 1911, these arrangements were made with reference to the Imperial Defence Committee, and to the representation of the Colonies upon it. Now what occurred? Clearly the Prime Minister of this country had nothing to do with that, because it occurred in the summer of 1911.

The Canadian Government having changed in the Autumn of 1911, it was necessary when Mr. Borden and his colleagues visited England this summer, to put these proposals before them, as of course they were unaware of the previous proceedings. Subject to consultation with his colleagues in Canada, Mr. Borden provisionally accepted the resolutions as passed and stated that he saw no difficulty in one of his ministers, either with or without portfolio, spending some months of every year in London in order to carry out this intention. Mr. Asquith and I had, subsequently, several private conversations with him, at which he expressed the desire that the Canadian and other dominions ministers who might be in London as members of the Committee of Imperial Defence should receive, in confidence, knowledge of the policy and proceedings of the Imperial Government in foreign and other affairs.

Mark what the Imperial Government says to the Prime Minister of Canada. He wanted something more than what had been given before.

We pointed out to him that the Committee of Imperial Defence is a purely advisory body and is not, and cannot under any circumstances become a body deciding on policy, which is and must remain the sole prerogative of the cabinet, subject to the support of the House of Commons. But, at the same time we assured him that any dominions minister resident here would at all times have free and full access to the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Colonial Secretary for information on all questions of Imperial policy.

Now this is what the Conservative newspapers have been heralding all over the country as a great achievement in the way of imperialistic attainment on the part of this Government. This proves it to be absolutely hollow and a mockery. The arrangement whereby Canada was to have the right to send representatives to the Committee of Imperial Defence was made to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues in 1911.

Now we are asked in this, the fourth period of the history of our relations to the Empire in regard to naval defence, to support a proposition to give $35,000,000 to the Mother Country. It is clear that the Prime Minister when he went to England was compelled to say to the Imperial Government, you must let me give you a contribution; it is the only way out of it? The evidence upon that is indisputable. He could not do anything else, because he had tied himself up in every possible way and he knew, even before he went to see them, that that was all he could do. Let us consider some of the things that we could do with the $35,000,000. Hon. members discuss the Georgian Bay canal. Those $35,000,000 would pay one-third of the cost of the Georgian Bay canal. Over in England, where the people are taxed to the extent of only 15 per cent as compared with 18 per cent in Canada, they are giving back to the poor men and women old age pensions, and a tremendous amount of that money does not come from the plain people of the country, but from the rich people. Why, with those $35,000,000 we could inaugurate in Canada three or four times over a system of old age pensions and capitalize it for a long term of years. Then all over the country there are demands for increased transportation facilities, for the construction of railways, and yet in order to help the Conservative party out of their hole on this navy question, all these problems and improvements, the Canadian people are told, must go by the board. We will send this money to England, they say; we care not what you say. That is the position which these gentlemen are in. By their policy they will acomplish nothing for Canada, and absolutely nothing for the Empire. According to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the ships which we propose to build in Halifax would be no good in six years, but if that is so, then the ships which they propose to contribute would be no good in six years. I observe that the Minister of Labour has come back to the House. I am sorry he was not here a little earlier to have heard a little discussion about some of his colleagues who are not one flag and one navy men on this question. What is the Conservative party saying all over the country now? While the Prime Minister is saying one thing here and member after member is getting up and declaring that Canada cannot build ships, that they cost too much, and that they will be obsolete before they are built, what is the Prime Minister's own organ in Halifax saying:

Mr. Borden's Administration, which has been only fifteen months in power, has a majority of nearly fifty in the House of Commons. At the recent election the people were aware that the thought of giving an emergency contribution to the British navy, to be followed by the establishment of a permanent Canadian navy, but only after the project had been submitted for their approval.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that Senator Dennis?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, Senator Dennis, whom the Prime Minister esteemed so much that he promoted him to the Senate in order that he might be near him to give him inspiration. The Prime Minister tells the people of Nova Scotia that this is the hour of their opportunity, and he dangles before them the prospect of a Canadian navy while most of the members behind him are denouncing it at every stage. To that proposition we offer an alternative for which every Canadian in this House and out of it ought to stand by virtue of the fact that he is a Canadian, the alternative proposition that we shall have a fleet unit on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific thus relieving the Mother Country of the duty of policing and looking after the two oceans which wash the shores of our country. That is a policy which is inspiring and one to which we attach the condition that here in Canada, with Canadian men, with Canadian money, with Canadian brains, as Sir George Reid of Australia said, we propose to go on and carry it out. I say it is a proposition worthy of a Canadian in this 20th century.

I venture, Mr. Speaker, even at this late hour, to deal for a little with the question of whether we Canadians can build ships. When I sat in this House and heard the Prime Minister, who comes from my own province, where as a boy he knew that there was not a creek, not an inlet, not a harbour, where men could not or did not build ships—when I heard him say that nothing of a decent character could be built up in this country within a quarter or perhaps half a century, I wondered whether he realized the humiliating spectacle he was presenting to the Canadian people. Why, Sir, talk about the Mother Country; they never built a steel ship in England until 1877. Is that fifty years ago? What a man in the British Isles can do, sturdy and all as an Englishman is, I have enough pride in my fellow-citizens to think they can do just as well. It was not until after the discoveries in steel, perfected by Bessemer and Siemen, that it was possible to build steel ships. In that connection let us see what my hon. friend from North Simcoe said in 1910. Speaking in this House, he said:

> Now, Sir, of this total steamship tonnage of 35,478,878 tons, Great Britain owns approximately about 50 per cent. Various authorities give our Canadian steam tonnage classification on the same basis as 200,000 tons, and deducting our lake tonage we have 100,000 tons on the ocean. In other words our tonnage is in proportion to British tonnage as 1 to 177. If we take an estimate of the value of British commercial ships and their earnings we will get at the reason of the huge expenditure on the British navy from the business standpoint, and we will find that this is one of the greatest revenue producing industries of Great Britain, and the greatest contributor to the enormous wealth and revenues of that country.

It is well that every Englishman knows it. If you talk about the English taxpayer being burdened for the support of the navy, let me tell you that there is not a dollar practically that goes into the navy that does not go to the workmen at Belfast, on the Clyde, or at Newcastle-on-Tyne. It never goes out of the country and the wealth of the country is never decreased. Mr. Currie noted that fact, and it is one of material importance.

Let us see what is done in other countries. Is Canada a hermit nation that cannot do anything? Let us take Austria-Hungary; there they have 22 armoured ships all of which have been built since 1895, 14 of which were built in Trieste not very long ago. Take Brazil. We are apt to regard with some pride the people of this northern portion of the continent as being in some sense superior to the people who live in South America. Brazil has 5 armoured ships and 11 cruisers, all built since 1895 and every one of them built in her own shipyard at Rio de Janeiro. Take China, effete China still in barbarism, 14 cruisers, all built since 1895 and in 1900, twelve years ago, they originated in China two shipyards of their own where they have been building all their ships. Take Denmark, a small country; they have 5 armoured ships and 3 cruisers all built at Copenhagen within twenty years. Why cannot we do it in Canada? Take Italy; 27 armoured ships and 16 cruisers all built in their own country in less than twenty years at Genoa, at Speria, at Venice, and at Castellanunare. Japan emerged from barbarism a little earlier than China. What about Japan? They have to-day four shipyards in that country. They have built 27 armoured ships and cruisers in their own country since 1897. They only began to build ships in Japan in 1897, and yet the Prime Minister of Canada practically insults the people of this country when he tells them that they cannot do it inside of fifty years. Mark you farther—we talk about our English shipbuilding. To-day they are building in England the Iron Duke of 25,000 tons and the King George V. of 25,000 tons. These are the biggest ships they are building in England. Out in Japan, where they never built a ship until 1897, they have five huge yards in which they are building the Kobe, 27,500 tons and two other vessels each of 27,500 tons. They are building these tnree vessels, bigger than the biggest vessels which are being built in England at their shipyards over there. What they can do in Japan surely we can do in Canada. Take the Netherlands, a small country; they have their own yard at Amsterdam and since 1892, they have built 18 armoured ships, cruisers and smaller vessels. Take Norway; they have their own yards at Horten and Christiania where they have built ships for twenty years. Take Portugal; is there any Canadian who is willing to say that we will take second place to Portugal, that a Canadian citizen has not as much brains intelligence, capacity, that our artisans are no good, that we cannot produce ships here as well as in Portugal. The Prime Minister says that when he tells us that we cannot do it within fifty years. In Portugal they have been building ships since 1895 at Lisbon, and their new yard is started there. Take Spain; they only began to build ships in 1892. They have three shipyards and they have built 17 armoured ships and cruisers. Take Sweden; they only began to build twenty years ago and they have 18 armoured ships and cruisers. They have three big shipyards at Stockholm, Gothenberg and Maleno. Take Turkey, the sick man of Europe, the nation that may be wiped off the map in Europe whatever she may do in Asia; there they have been building cruisers in their own shipyards since 1893. We cannot do that in Canada according to this great Government, this Government, that asserts it is the lineal descendant, and inherits all the traditions, of the men who, twenty-five years ago, promulgated the gospel of Canada for the Canadians. A splendid successor; When the hon. Minister of Public Works delivers that speech which he always delivers to this House when he gets on his feet, about the grand old national policy, I want him to tell us where this policy of his rings in under the national policy. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that when he adopts a policy which means that, although you can build ships in Japan, in England or in any other place in the habitable globe, you cannot start to build them in Canada, it is not the policy of the once great Liberal-Conservative party.

As to the United States, my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) told us a wonderful story about the development of Quincy, Massachusetts, as illustrating what can be done with regard to ship construction in a country. When I tell you that the first armoured ship that was ever built in the United States was only built in 1893, twenty years ago—and that statement is made on the strength of the authority of the Naval Review of England—and when I tell you that they have no less than eight large shipyards all over that country and that they have built, since 1897, fifty armoured ships and twenty-three cruisers, and that only six ships in commission in the United States were built before 1897, sixteen years ago, do you mean to tell me that the statement of the Prime Minister can be seriously regarded anywhere in this country in the light of these facts?

As I have said, in the olden days of wooden ship-building in the Maritime provinces, all the way from Quebec, in every inlet and harbour around that coast until you came to St. Andrews, you could hear the click of the workman's hammer in the winter days as the keel was laid and the ships rose until they were ready to be launched in the summer of the succeeding year. When the decay of wooden shipbuilding began because of the introduction of iron and steel, why did not the Canadian people go on building ships? Because we had no steel industries in Canada. If we could have had our steel plates rolled in Canada at that time the maritime instincts of our people would still have found encouragement and the supremacy which we enjoyed, far in advance of almost every nation in the world of double our population, would have been maintained. But, we had no steel industries and that is the reason why we did not go on. What is the state of affairs to-day? In Sydney, in New Glasgow, at the Soo, in Montreal, in Hamilton, at Fort William and other places there are in the country numerous large steel companies producing everything that you need in steel. Any Canadian steel manufacturer will tell you that they can make steel rails and every other article manufactured from steel just as well in Canada as they can in England. There is no mystery about manufacturing steel plates. In 1910, my versatile friend from North Simcoe made the statement in this House, and I have since verified it and found it to be correct that when the Dominion Steel Company heard in 1910 that the Government proposed to build ships in Canada, they sent abroad for machinery and they have it in their works to-day, by which inside of two months they could proceed to roll steel plates of all kinds that might be required in Canada for ship construction. My hon. friend from North Simcoe said in 1910:

> The Dominion Iron & Steel Company have a large mill for the rolling of plates but they have it housed out in a shanty because under existing conditions they could roll in a month all the plates used in Canada in a year. But if you undertake a substantial policy of this kind, they will soon erect their mill and in a short time we would not only be rolling iron plates but be able to furnish all that the country required. The time will not be far distant when we will make our armor plates because the nickel that goes into the armor plate of the world comes from this country. We will also be able to make our guns and even tender for the building of warships for the British navy.

When the contract for the Quebec bridge was to be let two years ago, an English bridge company tendered and contended that it was impossible in Canada to build such a bridge, but when the Dominion Bridge Company composed as it is of up-to-date business men, provided a proper plan which was approved by the engineers, and asserted that they were able to build that bridge, the late Government committed the task to them, and these Englishmen went home and complained about the Government of Canada giving the contract to Canadians. And, Sir, I venture to say that this Canadian firm will construct that Quebec bridge, just as well, if not better, than could the English firm which tendered. In my own constituency, fourteen years ago, there was built the steamer Mulgrave, 485 tons owned by the Dominion Government, and now operating between Port Mulgrave and Point Tupper. The plates were brought from Glasgow, but the steamer was built there from top to bottom, and if there were a demand for the manufacture of plates in Canada, the Canadian steel companies would be prepared to manufacture just as good plates as could be made in Glasgow. If you have the steel plates, then there is no reason why you cannot build the hull of a steel vessel anywhere in this country, and the manufacture of the machinery will follow as a matter of course. And yet there are to be found in Canada some people who preach the humiliating doctrine that go where you will throughout the world you will find people able to build ships, but when you come to Canada, Canadians have not the ability, or the energy, or the enterprise, to do so.

The manning of the ships was the greatest dread of the Postmaster General, and I have something to say on that point. Along our seacoast, down through Quebec, in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Prince Edward Island, there grew up in the olden days a race of men who manned Canadian merchant ships and carried the flag of England to every port of the world. To-day, you will find Canadians commanding and manning the best steamers that sail the ocean. Start from New York to the West Indies on a winter trip, and you will find these great passenger ships commanded by sons of the Maritime provinces. The shipbuilding industry decayed in the Maritime provinces, there was no local interest and no local ownership in vessels, and in the course of years there was no interest for the sea-faring people to seek employment in these large sea-going vessels. True, you will find them to-day navigating their small boats and schooners and amongst that hardy race are numbers of men, who, were the incentive offered, would be ready to respond to the call of the navy. Mr. George E. Drummond of Montreal is a pretty good authority on industry and in 1902, speaking at the meeting of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire in Montreal, he gave his opinion as to what Canada could do in regard to ship-building in these words:

> The Canadian Government should at once enter into negotiations with one of the great British shipyards, to induce them to establish a branch at one or other of our Dominion ports. It is almost certain that with such a contract as our Government would have to give, supplemented by the business to be secured in the building of merchant vessels, and possibly additional aid from the Imperial Government in the way of contracts, there would be little difficulty in persuading one of the great British shipbuilding firms to establish works on Canadian soil, bringing with them naval architects and expert shipbuilders and founding an enterprise of vast importance to Canada, and probably of very great service to the Empire. While these warships must be built in Canada, the specifications should be made by the British Admiralty Board, and the ships when completed should be satisfactory to that Board.

That is just what was proposed by the Liberal Government. Mr. Drummond continued:

> I am convinced, sir, that our contribution to Imperial defence should be based upon the idea of relieving the central authority of all cost of defending Canada, and I hold that in undertaking this duty a magnificent opportunity will be afforded our Government and people to establish in Canada the enterprise of shipbuilding to foster the production of armour plate, for which with our wealth of nickel and iron, we are equipped by nature in a very exceptional way. In establishing and developing such enterprises we will at the same time be making Canada in the matter of appliance and munitions of war, a base of supplies on this North America continent which in time of war on either the Atlantic of the Pacific would be of incalculable value to the whole Empire.

There is the opinion of a practical iron and steel man who knows what can be done in Canada. Take the opinion of Admiral Sir John Colomb and Mr. William White, who were designers of the Imperial navy for years, and they are on record as saying that it was a mistake for the Empire to concentrate its construction and repair shops in any one part, and that the Empire could not be preserved if there did not exist means whereby in case of difficulty or distress the naval armament of the Empire could be put into fighting shape in the different overseas dominions. Sir, upon that question it does seem to me, the argument is all one way. I digressed for a moment on this question of ship-building to point out what George E. Drummond said upon the question. Now, if my hon. friends, in 1911, instead of carrying out their deal with the Nationalists of Quebec, had accepted the contract which had been submitted to them by the ship-building firms, who were willing to engage in the construction of ships in Canada, there now would be rising in this land the hulls of vessels which would be the harbingers of a most material growth and expansion in the line of ship-building, and would have been the basis of an industry of which every Canadian would be proud. When they tell us: You cannot get Canadian capacity, or pluck, or industry, competent enough or great enough or intelligent enough to produce these ships, it seems to me that the men who make that statement can only be said to be insulting the Canadian people. As for the question of manning these ships, if the conditions under which Canada shall produce the ships are established, there will rise from every creek, from every inlet, from every harbour on the Atlantic and on the Pacific men who will be found ready to go into Canadian vessels and will be proud to carry the flag whether in peace or in war.

I have but a few more remarks to make. I wish to summarize one or two things. Against this theory of contribution, we have Australia's example, we have the agreement of 1911; we have the expression of the British authorities who declared that the policy of co-operation of the overseas dominions in the establishment of local navies was a correct one; we have the opinion of Mr. Winston Churchill; we have the opinion of Sir Charles Tupper, the former leader of the Conservative party; we have the opinion of Lord Charles Beresford; we have the opinion of Lord Milner, the opinions of Mr. Deakin and Mr. Fisher of Australia; and we have in addition to that the opinion which was expressed by the Montreal Gazette a short time ago. The Montreal Gazette discussed seriously the attitude of these gentlemen who talk about co-operation in defence and in trade with the Unionists on the other side, and warned them against trying to force this thing so far. When the Prime Minister went to England and made his arrangement—which he says he did not make, though, when he spoke on this naval question and spoke of 'co-operation in trade as well as in defence' I do not know what he was talking about if it was not an arrangement—he took his inspiration from the class of men like those who came here last summer. Take the gentlemen who went back to England and told the intelligent people there that he had not found one man in Canada in favour of home rule. He could not have run up against the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), or against the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes)—for while the hon. Minister of Militia is not strong for home rule himself, he could have told this gentleman of a lot of bad men who were. Think of the audacity of a man like Mr. F. E. Smith, who comes over to Montreal, dines with some one at the club there, takes the next steamer back to England then undertakes to explain to the people of England the opinions of the people of Canada: The Montreal Gazette warns this Government against having anything to do with these people:

> There are many things to be thought of in Canada in connection with naval and military outlays. Probably a third of the people are not of British descent. Probably not a tenth of them were born in the British Isles. They do not all see things through London spectacles. It is a notable thing that they not only accept but readily accept all that comes to them in the way of duty to the Empire. The extremists cannot expect or hope for any more. They should leave what is well to develop what is better by natural process. To force the growth may be harmful. It is especially likely to be harmful also when the talk directed to the colonies seems intended to have effect on the domestic politics of the United Kingdom, with which matters certainly the colonies should have nothing to do.
> 'A people with a story of such character does not need to have the drums beating all the time to make it think right. If it did it would not be true to the stock from which it sprung. The talkers should rest their intellects for a while. They do not understand what their efforts may produce. Canada is going forward. The experiement of the late Government in the matter of naval preparation, while it did not show the results that had been expected by those who directed it, was on the line of assuming a responsibility that local conditions would not have made seemingly necessary for many years perhaps. It was accepted by the mass of the people as proper.

The Gazette goes on and warns its friends who sit on the treasury benches against the danger of forcing an unreal imperialism upon the people of this country. I, for one, believe in the permanence of this Empire. But I warn the men who, under pretence that they are doing something that will make for the permanence of this Empire, are overstraining the proposition. The Canadian of 1930 who finds this land destitute of defence at sea, destitute of shipyards, destitute of the munitions of war, will say of the Tory Government of 1913 that they were poor Canada builders and poor empire building indeed

Sir, naval defence is assured, whichever policy is adopted, because to-day, England, stands according to all her statesmen, as absolutely impregnable, absolutely safe beyond question of any kind, at any rate until 1920. Under these conditions, let Canada go on and in the meantime provide for her own future, provide for this outpost of Empire overseas, provide the conditions under which we can build our ships to assist the Empire. Let us go on to do that, and we shall be doing our part and doing that for which those who come after us in this land will give us credit. Shall our maritime strength be renewed and our money be spent in Vancouver, Montreal, St. John and Halifax for the construction and development of the ship-building industry in this land, or shall we send our money over to be spent in England, to be spent in Belfast, or on the Clyde, or in Newcastle-on-Tyne. That is the issue before the Canadian people. Sir, if by any misfortune this policy should ever pass this House, I venture to predict that it will be repealed and repealed before many months are over. I appeal on this question, not to men like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), whose partyism is of such hide-bound character that if toryism proposed to do anything which deliberately and beyond all question injured Canada, and this were made manifest to him, would stand for it——

Mr. CROTHERS : May I ask the hon. gentleman a question ?

Mr. MACDONALD : No, the hon. gentleman can address the House after I have finished.

Mr. SPEAKER : I think the hon. member is going a little wide of the mark. It is not permissible to attribute improper motives to any member of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD : I was not attributing motives, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER : To say that the Minister of Labour would do anything that——

Mr. MACDONALD : I did not say he would do anything. I said he would vote anything the Conservative party would propose.

Mr. SPEAKER: I give my understanding of the hon. gentleman's language. Of course, it is my duty to say that it would be rather straining the rules of debate.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not say he would do anything; I said he would vote. I am not appealing to him, Mr. Speaker, but I appeal to those hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House who believe in the theory that a Canadian is as good as any white man under the sun; who believe that members of this House are loyal, whether they sit on the right of the Speaker or the left. Whatever hon. gentlemen may say on the back benches, or in the excitement of elections; whether they follow one leader or another, they are proud of their country, anxious to do their part in this their day and generation so that the ties of Empire may be cemented and strengthened; so that this Canada of ours may be peopled by a population proud of its Imperial connections. To them I appeal to so act that, in exercising as they now do one of the powers committed to them by the Confederation Act of 1867, those who may come after us may say we did our duty and prepared a condition favourable to their greatness, their prosperity and their continued loyalty to Canada and the Empire.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, at this somewhat advanced hour of the evening, it may be thought that we have heard enough of this question, but the alleged emergency of the matter is such that I desire to discuss it a little further. I am sure that the people of Canada and hon. gentlemen of this House will not begrudge the time devoted to-day to this debate, and will not consider that the time was not well spent, in view of the very admirable addresses delivered to the House by the hon. member for Bonaventure and the hon. member for Pictou, who has just taken his seat. I have been a member of this House for a great many years, and have heard many excellent addresses by members on both sides of the House, but I think it is my duty to pay to these two hon. gentlemen the tribute that never before in this House, or, perhaps, in any colonial parliament, has any subject been dealt with more ably or on a more lofty plane than the manner in which it has been dealt with by these hon. gentlemen. Hon. gentlemen who sit on the government side of the House give the impression, by their silence and absolute refusal to take any part in this debate, that it is a discussion which is unprofitable, and not called for by the people of this country. I think I can assure those hon. gentlemen that the time is not far distant when the people will want to know the pros and cons of this great question that is now before the House, and that they are not begrudging the time we occupy in its discussion. When the opportunity comes, they will severely call to task hon. gentlemen having upon their shoulders the responsibility of government, who have muzzled and gagged their friends and supporters, and will not permit them to express an opinion upon this question.

Twice during the address of the hon. member for Pictou he was interrupted by hon. gentlemen on the other side who have shown some signs of life and some little desire to express their views. If there is any hon. gentleman upon that side of the House who now wishes, in a proper and constitutional way, and according to the rules of this House, to express any opinion or put his views before the people as an answer to the hon. member for Pictou or the hon. member for Bonaventure, I shall be glad to give way to him, and to give him an opportunity of expressing his opinion. A very serious statement has been made by the hon. member for Pictou, and a quotation of far-reaching effect on a constitutional point has been made by him, in reference to an expression made some years ago by the hon. the Minister of Justice. When the Minister of Justice sat on this side of the House, as a member of the Opposition, he was regarded as a high authority in legal matters by the party of which he was then a strong supporter. He came into this House as a gentleman of high reputation, and one who for many years occupied a high position in the courts of his province, and it was only fair, and reasonable that his opinion on legal matters should bear considerable weight in this House. The statement quoted to-day as made by the Minister of Justice was to the effect that there was no constitutional power on the part of this Parliament to do anything by way of assistance to the Mother Country until that question was submitted to the people of the country; that is, if we are to follow along the lines laid down in the constitution, that we have no jurisdiction, and that if we had any jurisdiction at all, it would have to be through what is known as direct legislation, after we had received the authority of the people of the country. If there is anything wrong with that quotation; if that was not his view at that time, or if it is not his opinion now, I offer to him the opportunity of putting himself on record as going back on that declaration of law which he gave to Parliament at that time. Failing to do this, we must believe he stands by that opinion, and that to-day in this Parliament we must accept from the Minister of Justice the best legal authority on the Government side of the House, the constitutional dictum that we are supporting a resolution, and will support in this House, which is without any constitutional foundation. That is the opinion of the Minister of Justice, and that he fails to deny when he is given an opportunity of doing so.

I wish to refer to my friends from the Maritime provinces who are struck with dumbness and silence on this question. It has been held out to us for years that the building of a navy in the Dominion of Canada was to be a great boon for the province of Nova Scotia, and we were told that it would revive the old days in that province. But the Premier now comes forward with a policy intended, I believe, to strike a death-blow at our highest ambitions in that respect. Hon. gentlemen representing the famous province of Nova Scotia, all along the coast of Nova Scotia, from Digby to Halifax, seeing this death-blow struck at this great industry of Canada, sit silent and dumb in their seats in this House, and have nothing to say except to give their assent to a policy which wipes away every hope that we have in respect of this great industry in our province. I submit to you, Sir, and to the people of Nova Scotia that this is not the line of action that we in Nova Scotia expect from them and this is not the line of action that will be approved by the people of Nova Scotia; and if they think by their silence, by their indifference on this question that they are going to make themselves solid with the people of Nova Scotia politically, they are very much mistaken. We have in the province of Nova Scotia and always have had men with a particular genius for the building of ships. We had for many years past and have to-day men who could build ships out of the raw material in the backwoods of their own farms. We had men who built those ships, equipped them from stem to stern, rigged them in every particular, loaded them with passengers and sailed them across the seas to Australia and New Zealand where they sold the ships and became settlers, with their passengers. That is the kind of people we have in Nova Scotia and are we to be told that their descendants are of such a class that they can do nothing but be subjected to this humiliating position by the Prime Minister that it takes twenty-five or thirty or fifty years for them to develop into anything like the other countries by which we are surrounded and which are making names for themselves in the building of ships. I am sure that such an aspersion will not receive the sanction or approval of the good people of Nova Scotia, and my friends in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island will see that while they send men here to represent their ideas in the House of Commons on questions of this kind, by some mysterious wave of the magic wand of the Prime Minister their mouths are stopped and they become perfectly dumb and have nothing to say. The importance of this country and our situation in the Empire is such that our attitude on a question of this kind is of the highest possible importance. This is not a small country, we are not an insignificant part of this great Empire; we are the oldest, the largest and the first colony of the Empire and the policy which we adopt on a question of this kind is of the first importance, not only to ourselves but to the Empire at large. It is said that we have not done anything for the last forty-five or fifty years towards the advancement of the defence of this country, that in fact we are indebted to the British Empire for everything that was done in the way of our defence. That is to some extent stated in the state paper read by the Prime Minister on the 5th of December in this House. I am sorry that any such statement should be made in the House by any minister. It is quite possible that we have not done very much in the building of fortifications, of guns or of warships, but we have done much indeed for the general advancement and spread of Britishism and British authority and power in this country. We have a large country, we have an area equal to that of the great republic to the south of us, we have a country capable of making happy homes for an equal number of people. If the United States is capable of being the home of 100,000,000 happy and contented people, Canada is capable of being the home of the same number. They have somewhere about 100,000,000 people to-day in the United States and I do not think it is an exaggeration to state that they are capable of comfortably housing or making homes for twice that number, possibly 250,000,000. If that is so, this Canada of ours is capable of doing the same thing. We have started preparing the soil, preparing the country to be the home of hundreds of millions of British born and men who come to this country and become British subjects, and in making homes for them under the British flag we are doing ten times more for the general advancement of the authority of our King, the prosperity of our country, its growth and advancement than anything that could be done by any line of militarism that could have been taken by our people. We are not to be told or to believe that we have done nothing for the general advancement of this country for the last forty or fifty years, forsooth, because we have not built any fortifications or warships. I submit that what we have been doing and what we are doing to-day is equally important and equally calculated to promote the general advancement of our country. From the history of the people to whom I belong, I need not be afraid to make any statements about the relations of my ancestors and my own relations to the British Empire and Crown. I do not care whether anybody thinks I am disloyal or not. I know my own history, and I know the history of my people. I know the history of the province from which I come, and I know too well that anything of that nature which may be said about myself or my county or my people will not for one moment be believed, and for that reason I am absolutely indifferent what gentlemen on the other side of the House may say on that subject. I therefore feel that I have the same right to speak in this House of Commons as the representative of one of the good, loyal counties of the province of Nova Scotia, as any member of the House of Commons of England has to speak in his House, representing any section of the country, nor do I admit that because I am a born Canadian and a member of the Canadian House of Commons, I am less a British subject or have less privileges, less standing and less authority than any other subject of His Majesty, be he born wherever he may in any part of the Empire. Therefore, as a representative of a section of this country under the British Crown, I have a perfect right to express my opinion freely, fearlessly, as regards the relations of this country to the British Empire. Will anybody tell me that if Canada was to be wiped off the slate, if Canada was to disappear from the face of the earth to-night or to-morrow morning, that would lessen the responsibility of the British Empire in maintaining its strength against Germany or any other European power? Nothing of the kind. I submit Sir, that while we are perfectly loyal and are perfectly willing to do anything that any subjects of His Majesty can do to maintain the dignity and integrity of the Empire, we are not going to admit for one minute that because we are a great country we are any burden upon the British Empire in the matter of maintaining a navy. We are nothing of the kind. I wish it to be clearly and expressly understood, both in this House and out of it, that while I do not take second place to any man in loyalty to the King and to the Empire, I wish to say fearlessly that it is all bunkum to say that if we do not do our duty we shall impose such a burden on the Empire in the matter of maintaining a navy as to break the back of the Empire so to speak. That view would be perfectly right if by our existence here we were adding anything to the burden, but we are not, and as I have already said, if we were wiped off the slate to-morrow, it would not take one dollar off the burden which the British people have to sustain in maintaining their position in the nations of the world. That being the case, as I view it, I do not think that we should have been called upon so early to take any particular part in this naval question. It is my thorough and honest conviction that we were serving the Empire in building the Canadian Pacific railway, in constructing the canal system of Canada, in making the St. Lawrence the great avenue of trade it is to-day, in building the Transcontinental railway, in developing the great Northwest, in dividing it into provinces and in giving them educational and other facilities. I submit that in that way we were serving the Empire and serving our own country in a manner which should have been recognized by the home government as being more useful than the building up of armies and navies. That is the position which I fearlessly take up on this question, and which, I am sure, sensible men in this country and in other parts of the Empire will admit is a sound and sensible position to take. It is an argument which I am sure, will appeal to the people from the old country who are coming to Canada and finding fair homes amongst us, who are finding the great Northwest opened up to them, places where they can become more prosperous than they have ever been before, where English liberty, English law, English religion, and English privileges are to be found. I am sure those people will say we have done more for them in that way than by giving contributions for navies or armies.

As I said at the beginning, we have heard this subject very fully discussed to-day, and it will go fully before the country. I submit that the time we have devoted to the discussion has been well spent, and I am sure that the people of Canada will be pleased to see that notwithstanding the dumbness that has struck our friends opposite, we are still capable of going into every phase of the question so that nothing shall be left unsaid. Watching the silence of our friends opposite I thought of a man in the days of long long ago who hardened his heart and who would not listen to any petitions or propositions that were placed before him. I thought of Pharaoh to whom strong representations were made to do the right thing and to let the people decide upon certain conditions. Reasonable propositions were submitted to Pharaoh, but he was invulnerable; he was determined to stand by his position wrong as it was. But I would remind my hon. friends opposite that when Pharaoh went out into the country something happened to him. He never came back; he was never heard of again. We do not know of one argument he ever gave to the great Moses, except stolid silence. I warn my hon. friends on the other side. They are no doubt good students of the good old Book. Let them learn what sort of man this Pharaoh was and what happened to him, and let them come back to this House to-morrow, or at the beginning of the week, and discuss this question fully. They were given the power of speech; they were given positions in this House to speak upon questions of policy and upon questions affecting the country. The very name of this assembly has a meaning. It is a parliament in which the people speak, a place in which the voice of the people may be heard, and in which questions may be argued fully so that the people who are the great jurors may have an opportunity of judging for themselves who is right and who is wrong, and what is the best policy for the country to adopt. But if hon. friends opposite choose to follow the course of the austere king of old who refused to speak, who refused to give audiences or to do anything but go on in his own stubborn way, and who met his deserts, they will receive the same reward. They will not be able to say that they have not been warned of the result of their folly. It is a well known fact, Mr. Speaker that when hon. gentlemen speak in this House they address not only this House but through you the country, and the constituencies, particularly in that part of the country from which I came, look to the expression of opinion in Parliament by their representatives. It will, therefore, be incumbent upon me to go over some of the ground that has been traversed already, and to the best of my ability, to place before the House and before my constituents the history of this question and to trace the stages through which it has passed. It will be my privilege to point out the position which was taken by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr Foster) upon this question and by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) when he was leader of the Opposition. The position which they took then was the right one. The arguments which they put forward at that time received a hearty response from the people. They were in accordance with the views of the people and Mr. Foster, when he is right, is a different proposition from Mr. Foster when he is wrong. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he is taking a logical, clear-cut view of imperialism is a very different proposition from the hon. gentleman when he is playing the cuttle-fish, trying to blindfold the people and getting out of a difficult position by means of the somersaults which he has been performing upon this question in following up the theory which was laid down for him by the people over whom he had no control. I beg your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, while I go categorically into the history of this question. It has already been pointed out that when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce brought forth his resolution in the fall of 1909 he did not do it hurriedly or without due consideration. He did it after the resolution had remained on the Order Paper for months and after it had no doubt received the fullest consideration of himself and his esteemed leader. We have the right to believe that his leader considered this question from the fact that, when it was discussed, he gave his full approval not only to the resolution but to the speech made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). This resolution was well considered and at that time I have every reason to believe contained the centralized, boiled-down opinion of the Conservative party upon the naval question, not only the opinion of the hon. member for North Toronto and of his leader, but of every hon. gentlemen of that party who had a seat in the House. It will be my privilege to read to the House, and through the House to the country, the opinions which he then expressed, opinions which are well worthy of him and which were received with the fullest satisfaction and approval by the people of the country. The first resolution that he introduced is comparatively short. He moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

It is not very long ago since we had the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce making another speech in this House—on the 18th of December last. He made no reference to this resolution as far as I could gather from the report of the speech. It was then an entirely different theme.

Here he expresses himself by stating that the time has arrived when Canada has grown big enough, when she has plenty of people and money, to enable her to defend her own ports and seacoasts. The following year he made a speech in this House in which he stated clearly and distinctly that he had nothing in view on that occasion except the proper defence of the seacoast and the seaports of Canada and that he had no notion of extending that resolution to cover anything beyond that. What did the hon. gentleman say in support of that resolution? I want to take the speeches in the order in which they were made and I want to quote from the Minister of Trade and Commerce in support of the resolution as he read it. This, you will understand, is not the resolution which finally passed the House, but it is the resolution as he introduced it and his statement in support of that resolution must be read without reference to any other resolution or any other statement, by way of a resolution, that was made at that time. As will appear from page 3484 of 'Hansard', March 29, 1909, the hon. member for North Toronto moved the resolution which I have just read and supported it by a very able and eloquent speech. On that occasion he used this language:

For a good many years I have been more and more impressed with the necessity of our facing the question involved in this resolution. Nothing particular has been done with it so far in Parliament. I do not think that we mitigate any difficulties by avoiding them, or get rid of any of our responsibilities by evading them, and it seemed to me that the time has now come when the Parliament and people of Canada should sit down together and take stock of the position and come to some conclusion as to whether they have duties, and what these duties are, regarding the great question of the defence of our common heritage.

Now we have, I myself have, all sympathy with that class of good and estimable men who declare that war is horrible, that its burdens are almost intolerable, and that its effects are wide-reaching and in the main injurious, and who, in our country as in others, declare that we want no armaments, no militarism, no defences, that ours is an era of peace, and that we should strive, as best we can, to make good this in principle and in action, without arbitrament of war. But whilst I have sympathy with this view, I have taken into account the history of the world and the lesson it teaches. And whether I be right or wrong, I draw from the history and experience of the world this one great fact that force, absolute physical force, lies at the foundation of all our progress and civilization.

At page 3486 the hon. member for North Toronto is reported to have said:

Sir, into this world of trouble, of uncertainty, amongst this world of nations, Canada has pushed foward to her place. She has taken a position which is important now, which will become more and more important as the years advance. Her ship of state is launched on the world's waters, it is open to every storm, it is exposed to every danger. She cannot escape the common burden, she cannot neglect the common duty, she cannot ignore the common responsibility. I do not believe that she wishes to. Having entered the game, I believe that it is the disposition of the Canadian people to play it valiantly, to play it honourably, and to play it successfully. If her sons have the pride of manhood, as I believe they have, if they know what the stern joy of contest means, if they have proper faith in their high destiny, if they visualize any adequate picture of the future, it seems to me it is up to the people of Canada and to the manhood of Canada to prove their faith and their worth by their works, to grasp the full meaning of their heritage and its responsibilities and to prepare to defend it as well as to develop it.

That was the position that the Minister of Trade and Commerce took on that occasion. There was not a word then that we had not the brawn, brains and the courage and the possiblities of building ships in Canada; the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that if we were to become the great country we are destined to be, we should commence ship-building at once. At page 3488 'Hansard,' the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

Well, Sir, suppose to-day, while we are all in fancied peace and security, which is not real peace and security, suppose that to-day a third-class cruiser should show her face in Victoria or Vancouver, in Halifax or Sydney, or St. John, Quebec or Montreal, would not a great deal of this fancied peace and security into which we have lulled ourselves and which we expect to abide in, and never to be interrupted quickly pass away to be succeeded by deep anxiety? The question forces itself on us, six and a half million of people with a mighty heritage and have to-day no adequate defence from a third-class cruiser which might singly appear within our gates.

At page 3489 of the same volume, the hon. minister is further reported as having said:

But as to naval defence, I think we might just as well be frank with ourselves, and say we have done nothing. From the earliest dawn of history, commerce and protection of commerce have gone hand in hand, have sailed the seas, together and worked out their beneficent destiny of development and protection side by side. You cannot point in history to a single commercial people that failed to provide protection more or less adequate for their commerce. We are a people a century old with a mighty heritage of which I have spoken, which is not simply for our own enjoyment, but which is to be transmitted to the generations, the far-distant generations which succeed us. We, to-day, sit in this Parliament and live in this country and we have to acknowledge to each other, if we would be frank, that we have done no single imperative thing in the way of naval defence. Ah, but one says, 'we have taken over Esquimalt and Halifax.' Yes, we have, and we have undertaken to relieve Great Britain of a certain amount of expense, we have taken them over, and we foot the bills, whatever they are. But we might as well be frank and say that as to their active force, here and now, they do not appear large. You have to judge these things by the test of actual war, and if actual war broke out and cruisers appeared at Esquimalt or Halifax, of what value would these be? Have we the guns? Have we the torpedoes? Have we the machinery? Have we the trained men, even if we had the machinery? Such statements serve to salve our consciences when they prick, they are nice to round a sentence upon on the hustings, but we must come down from all this, we must be frank and that from the point of view of actual naval defence 'They are the basis round and upon which we may build? But it seems to me that is the best that can be said of them.'

It is no stretch of the imagination to believe that the Empire with its component parts in full accord may have at some time dockyards in Canada, one on the Pacific coast and one on the Atlantic, in which will be built not only our own vessels, distinctively Canadian, but a part of the navy of Great Britain itself. It is said that there are fiscal and mechanical difficulties to-day to be overcome; I have mentioned these, they can be overcome. Time and the application of a resonable amount of resource, will overcome those difficulties, and place us where we have had to place ourselves with respect to every other great line of development. We must begin at the beginning, and work faithfully until we gather the skill, plant, machinery and the power to make of ourselves what at first was a physical impossibility for us to make.

That was a sound position taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time; he was talking the proper doctrine; he was giving utterance to wise and sensible words, uninfluenced by the side winds which afterwards shifted his course. He to-day is standing by the idea of getting hirelings to protect us in our time of need. I wonder if the Minister of Militia and those who sit around the Council Board do not see the distinction between hiring men to defend you, and having true-born Canadians when the time of stress and storm comes to protect their own homes. The Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) figured out that we would have to get hirelings to protect us. We have the authority of Scripture, that the hireling, when the wolf comes, will run away, and that it is the true shepherd, in this case the true Canadian, who stands up for the protection of the flock. Sir, Canadians are ready, and willing, and able to defend their homes and their firesides. The Postmaster General tells us there is no necessity for our paying high-class Canadians to serve in our warships when he can go elsewhere and get Russian, Finns, and Hungarians, and people of that class to serve cheaply in our army and navy. He tells us that that is the kind of a Canadian navy the Canadian people will be proud of. We are to have Hungarians and Finns and Russians manning our navy and Canadians can go about their business and earn big money.

Mr. PELLETIER: I never said that; I never thought of saying such a thing.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will read what the Postmaster General did say. Speaking of the upkeep of the navy, he said:

It is an interesting matter to know this: when these great men are launching this great policy, let me tell them that in Canada ordinary seamen are paid fifty cents a day.

It is very startling to the Postmaster General to think that men in Canada should be paid fifty cents a day. We have thousands of labouring men throughout the country watching how the Government stands in the interest of labour, and here we have the Postmaster General declaring that so far as he is concerned, he regards fifty cents a day as too much to pay for any able-bodied Canadian in this country. My hon. friend says:

In Canada, ordinary seamen are paid 50 cents a day; in Great Britain, they are paid 28 cents a day.

There is his speech of a few days ago. I fully expected this denial and I had the book by me.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the hon. gentleman allow me? I expect fair treatment.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is what the hon. gentleman will receive so far as I am capable of giving it to him.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member said that—

Mr. McKENZIE: Do not spoil my speech by a long interruption.

Mr. PELLETIER: Go on, then; but it is too bad—

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sitting down waiting for what the hon. gentleman has to say.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. gentleman has said that I declared that we were to have Hungarians and Roumanians on board our ships and these would form a Canadian defence. I never said anything like that, and I deny the statement. The hon. gentleman quotes a sentence from my speech in which I said that Canadians were paid 50 cents a day and Englishmen 28 cents a day, and he says that this proves his statement. Is that fair?

Mr. McKENZIE: I simply say that the hon. gentleman, as a man of affairs in this country, knows that he could not get an Englishman of any standing in England to work for 28 cents a day. We know where the low-wage people come from. The hon. gentleman knew where they come from, and for that reason I mentioned the places from which the low-wage people come; and when he makes the statement about getting them to serve this country for 28 cents a day, he must have had in mind the countries I have named. He did not name them; but I know the only places from which these men could be drawn to work for that wage; and it is a fair deduction these were the places that the hon. gentleman was talking about. If he does not refer to Poles, Russian, Finns and these other poor people who are not educated, and who before they can be properly educated in this country are willing to take these small wages and occupy low positions in life—if these are not the people he had in mind, will he tell us where he was going to find the people to man these ships and receives these wages of twenty-five cents a day? Of course, we could not encourage these people to come into this country, and we are going to send the ships over where ships, men and everything will be clear of our shores and we know nothing about them. I submit that that was not the idea of the hon. gentleman who occupies the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce when making his speech on the 29th of March 1909. But before I leave the speech of the Postmaster General let me say that he has a long list here of different classes of wages which he thinks are too big for the men who will defend our country, and we must get a low class of men for that work. I submit to the Postmaster General and to you, Mr. Speaker, that this Canada of ours is big enough to pay for the services of those who defend it; it is big enough to employ the best men we have and give them charge of this part of our affairs and pay them well. Our country should be properly protected, and protected by our own bone and sinew, men who are trained along the line which will make them first-class men for the protection of the country. If we are going to have protection, let us have protection of which we shall all be proud. The highest wages paid to men and officers of the British navy are not too high for us to pay. We have shown the Englishmen in many respects that we can teach them lessons in advancement and prosperity and good wages; and we can teach them in this connection that if we are to have a navy, the man who stands on the deck and does his work there is worth his wages as well as is the man who is engaged in the factory or in any other business. We are not looking for paupers, for low-class men who will work for half nothing. But I want the labouring classes of this country to know that we have a Postmaster General in a Tory Government in this country who regards fifty cents a day as a good wage for a good Canadian, and if he cannot get a Canadian, he will go across the Atlantic and pay twenty-eight cents a day.

Mr. PELLETIER: I again repeat I never said that.

Mr. McKENZIE: What in the world am I to do with this man?

In Canada ordinary seamen are paid 50 cents a day.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is a fact.

Mr. McKENZIE: (Reading):

In Great Britain they are paid 28 cents a day.

That is what the hon. gentleman said. I admit, I gave the matter a little embellishment. But it is necessary to do so in order to have it understood. It would not do to say merely 50 cts. and 28cts., and leave it there. The people would not understand it, and I want the people to understand it. I have said in this House before, and I say it now, that the great Tory party with its connections with the trusts, combines and mergers is not the friend of the workingman. They are willing to pay $35,000,000 to the ship-builders of the Old Country, but 28 cents a day they think enough for the poor man who is to work on the vessel's deck. That is the position taken by so eminent a member of the Government as the Postmaster General.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have never said it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Well, I will not read this over to the Postmaster General any more. He will see it in 'Hansard.' I have read it two or three times and I pledge my word I have not misquoted him, and he can see the speech in 'Hansard' if he thinks I have misquoted him in any way.

When we got into this controversy, I was coming to that part of the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce where he was dealing with this very point of the shape that our defence of this country should take. And I was pointing out that he did not approve of the hiring of anybody, much less the hiring of men at 28 cents a day. He wanted to do the thing himself; and, though the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not a very big man, I think he had the idea that he could handle himself in the defence of his country as well as the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) who is a big, strong man. And he talks as he feels, I have no doubt. He says:

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears to do what we ourselves ought to do, as though a man the father of a family in lusty health and strength should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to this form of aid.

That statement, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce was then in earnest, bears upon its face the stamp of logical conviction. I am not now reading the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce so much for the sake of putting his remarks upon record as expressing the exact views I myself hold upon this question, and I use his language and his diction for the purpose of putting it in very much better form than I could if I had to shape it from the beginning:

It goes still further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve, or twenty to thirty years, you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck, there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the produce of defence. Yet some time or other no one can doubt that, with resources and with a population constantly increasing, we must and will have in this country a naval force of our own for our coast and home defence.

The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada. I awnt to see something grafted on the soil of Canada's nationhood, which takes root and grows and develops until it incites the spirit of defence in this country, leads to a participation in the defence, leads to that quick interest in it, its glories, its duties and its accomplished work, which is after all the one great thing that compensates a people for great expenditure either on land or on sea in the way of defence and of the maintenance of the rights of the country.

Again, it disjoins what has been joined together from earliest days of the world's existence—commerce and the protection of commerce. After all, the basic idea of a naval force is the protection of the commerce of a country. A commerce side by side with its protector, and its protector side by side with the growing commerce of a country, flourish best together, and are the surest helpers to each other. That is the idea which is in my mind—that when we make our contributions in the way of a fixed sum and it goes from us, and we are not responsible for it, we have none of the inspiration resulting from the growth and development of a system of future defence in our own country. We are deprived of the larger benefit ourselves and in the future we do no greater service to the Empire of which we form a part, in this matter of defence.

Then again, I think this method ignores the necessities and the aspirations and the prospects of a great people, such as the Canadian people are destined to become. We must have beginnings; these must at first be small; but some time or other as I have said, our country will have its naval force for the defence of this country, if for nothing else. The point with me is as to whether it is not the greater wisdom to sow the seed at once and cultivate its growth, as best we may, in our circumstances and with our resources until at last we arrive at that stage of expansion which we have reached in other great lines of our country's progress.

The first Canadian-owned vessel, built and equipped in Britain, and sent out to defend our coast would become the nucleus and the training-ground of Canadian stokers, Canadian sailors and Canadian officers, and by-and-bye perhaps of a Canadian Admiral on the Canadian coast. How much time would be taken in completing that circle none of us can say, but if we begin the tracing of it and follow it fairly and faithfully, the time must come when we get a complete circle, and have an Imperial adjunct to the British navy for the defence of Canada and the defence of the Empire, in which Canada has some of her body, her bones, her blood and her mental power, her national pride.

That is the expressioin of opinion as given by the then hon. member for North Toronto, and he points out the exact course afterwards followed by the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in respect to this first vessel used in connection with the proposed navy. There was a great deal of fun, if I may use the word, poked at the Niobe, but I have just read the statement of a member of the present Administration to the effect that this vessel would have to be one built and owned in the old country, and brought here for the purposes of starting a Canadian navy in Canada. That being the case, we of the then Government were simply following out the suggestion made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and if there is anything wrong with the principle, hon. members supporting the Government must assume the same responsibility, because it came first from that side of the House.

That concludes, Mr. Speaker, any observations I desire to make at this stage——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE:—in respect to the observations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member for North Toronto will be disappointed if he thinks I am at all approaching a conclusion. I regret the 'emergency' that is now before the country, and while I think we have had enough of this discussion for one day, I am certainly prepared to do my part, and occupy the time of the House a little longer. The next resolution that was proposed is not the one that finally passed the House, but I have here the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Toronto when Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I think it is proper that I should quote his observations in support of that resolution.

The resolution which finally passed the House differs but slightly from the resolution as first moved by the then Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The present Prime Minister took occasion to criticise the resolution in its first form, not adversely at all, and he made suggestions which were afterwards accepted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the resolution, so amended, was passed. I said that I took pleasure in quoting the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he was right, when he was laying down proper, logical, clear-cut conclusions, worthy of being followed by the people of Canada. I shall have equal pleasure in quoting to the House and to the country the observations made on that occasion by the Prime Minister when he was right and before he drifted off into paths unknown and into ideas far from consistent with the position which he took on that occasion. Hon. gentlemen opposite think that they are on higher and firmer ground, on a better foundation from an empire standpoint, than they were then. They sneer at hon. gentlemen on this side who are giving their honest convictions and standing by the same logical conclusions that were put forward a few years ago by their leaders. They upheld their leaders then and there has been no earthquake in this country, political or otherwise, to change those conditions since those opinions were expressed. If they were right then the hon. gentlemen who supported them should be prepared to stand by them to-day. We are standing by those opinions and the people will support us in our adherence to these logical and well-considered views. I have read with great care more than once the speech delivered by the Prime Minister of December 5. That speech was carefully prepared, he would not risk delivering it without reading it, so careful was he in his expression. The whole meaning of that speech is that this is a contribution first, last and all the time, and that this is the policy of the Government of which he is the head—and that they will stand by it and nothing else. The whole meaning of that speech is that we can better serve the purposes of the Empire by supporting the one navy and employing the resources of this country in maintaining that navy, keeping up that grand old institution which is a thousand years old, which has gone on from one step to another until it has reached its present high proficiency, that that is the best value we can get for our money and there is no need for anything else. That is the language of the Prime Minister. I listened with interest the other night to the speech of the hon. member for North Ontario. I always follow with interest in military matters the language of a military man, and while it was evident that he recognized the emergency of standing by his party and said that this contribution is all right, he took mighty good care to place himself hard and fast on record as saying that that must not be the policy, that the policy of this country must be a navy built by Canada, owned by Canada, manned by our own people and subject to their will. That is the policy that I understand the hon. gentleman to stand by and that is the policy supported by the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames). The Prime Minister says that there is no need for that, that the best way in which we can use our money is to give it in contribution to the British Government. There is this great line of cleavage, this great gulf divides them. Their position reminds me of an old friend of mine in Nova Scotia who had a controversy with a clergyman on the temperance question. The clergyman gave his opinion and the old man immediately countered by saying: 'That is your opinion, you quote your own opinion only, but here is my good old Bible and here is Moses, and Moses tells me something absolutely contrary to what you say; let me tell you that when you are on one side and Moses on the other I am with Moses every time.' When we have the Premier of Canada saying that there will be only one navy in the Empire and that will be the British navy, and we will be contributing towards its support that is what will go in this House while he is Premier, and not anything that might be said by hon. gentlemen who occupy halfway positions between the front of this House and the back.

Before I read any of the observations of hon. gentlemen opposite in the days gone by, I want to remind my hon. friends of what the Prime Minister said on this very question as to whether we are to continue to contribute or whether we are to have a navy of our own. What I am about to quote is from his speech of 5th December last.

> Without intending or desiring to indulge in controversial discussion, I may be permitted to allude to British naval organization. Obviously, one could not make a very complete or thorough study of so great an organization in a few weeks, or even a few months; but during recent years, and especially during the past summer, I have had occasion to learn something of its methods, its character, and its efficiency, and good reason to conclude that it is undoubtedly the most thorough and effective in the world. There have been proposals,——

Mark you, there have been proposals > —to which I shall no more than allude, that we should build up a great naval organization in Canada. In my humble opinion, nothing of an efficient character could be built up in this country within a quarter or perhaps half a century. Even then it would be but a poor and weak substitute for that splendid organization which the Empire already possesses, and which has been evolved and built up through centuries of the most searching experience and of the highest endeavour. Is there really any need that we should undertake the hazardous and costly experiment of building up a naval organization especially restricted to this Dominion, when upon just and self-respecting terms we can take such part as we desire in naval defence through the existing naval organization of the Empire, and in that way fully and effectively avail ourselves of the men and the resources at the comand of Canada?

That to me, whatever it may be to hon. gentlemen opposite, is absolutely conclusive that what the Prime Minister had in his mind was that this policy of contribution is the beginning of a series of contributions from this country, and that we are not to have anything else while the present party is in power and while it is led by the hon. gentleman who to-day occupies the high and honourable position of Prime Minister. Now, I cannot hope to finish this evening, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. gentleman has been speaking for some time now, and he might go on and finish his speech, and let us get on with our work.

Mr. McKENZIE: I cannot hope to finish my speech to-night. It is now 12 o'clock and I think it is unfair to ask me to go on.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not want the hon. gentleman to feel that we are at all unfair to him, but he ought to bear in mind that we have had only two speeches to-day. We have spent a great deal of time and shown a great deal of patience in listening most attentively to those speeches, and I am sure my hon. friend will feel we are not doing him an injustice in asking him to go on. I may say that we shall be prepared to adjourn as soon as he is through with his speech.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did think that at this late hour we would be treated to an adjournment. As I stated a moment ago, I have already gone over the ground so far as the observations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are concerned, and I shall now give quotations from the speeches of the Prime Minister himself when he supported the policy which we are supporting now. We have not changed on this side at all, and the quotations which I am about to give from the speeches of the Prime Minister are exactly in harmony with the proposition that the present opposition is supporting. The observations I am about to quote were made in criticising the resolution when submitted to the House by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in its original form. The Prime Minister said:

But, Mr. Speaker, let us not forget also that a national status implies national responsibility. It is of no use for us in Canada to speak of this country as a nation, and to shrink in any manner from the discharge of our national responsibilities. What are those responsibilities? Acknowledged in every civilized community, recognized among all the great nations of the earth, a primal responsibility is the defence of their territories and the protection of their countries. I do not gather, Mr. Speaker, that my right hon. friend dissents in any way whatever from the enunciation of that principle which was laid down this afternoon in such eloquent terms by my hon. friend the member for Norht Toronto.

On page 3519 of the same volume of 'Hansard,' the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

I come now to a consideration of the resolution which has been moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and I will say that with many portions of it I am in entire sympathy. But, I would like to make one or two suggestions to the right hon. gentlemen, and I do not make them in any party spirit or in any carping spirit, because if there is one thing more than another that I would desire it is that the policy of Canada on this great question, and the resolution announcing it should meet with the absolute and unanimous approval of this Parliament and of this country. What suggestions I have to make, I make with the sincere desire that we may shape a resolution of which we can all approve and which shall go forth to the world as a ringing declaration that if the mother of nations has to fight the battle of her life, the people of Canada without distinction of party or of creed will stand by her side in that fight. This is too great a question for the introduction of party strategy; it is a question in respect to which we should all rise superior to all party motives.

On page 3521 of 'Hansard,' the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

Just one word as to the further amendment which I would like to suggest to my right hon. friend.

Then he read the resolution:

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The Prime Minister proceeded:

I would be glad if my right hon. friend could accept the suggestion of inserting in that paragraph some word which would indicate an intention to act promptly. If my right hon. friend would insert before the word 'organization' some such word as 'immediate' or even 'early,' I think it would meet with my approval, and I do not think it would be disapproved of by any hon. member of this House. Now, I understand what the right hon. gentleman contemplated in 1902. At that time he looked to the establishment of a Canadian naval force. At page 18 of the proceedings of the Imperial Conference of 1902 the First Lord of the Admiralty announced this:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier informed me that His Majesty's Government of the Dominion of Canada are contemplating the establishment of a local naval force in the waters of Canada, but that they were not analogous to those enumerated above.

Then, further on, in the written statement of my right hon. friend, the following is to be found:

At present, Canada's expenditure for defence or defence service is confined to the militia side. The Canadian Government are prepared to consider the naval side of defence as well. On the sea coast of Canada there are a large number of men admirably qualified to form a naval reserve and it is hoped that at an early day a system may be devised which will tend to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of war. I suggest to my right hon. friend that we should put something in this resolution which would point to prompt action. In 1902 we told the Imperial Conference that we intended to do something, but up to the present, seven years afterwards, we have done nothing. If the resolution of my hon. friend were so amended I think it would commend itself to the unanimous approval of the members of this House.

That was the statement made by the leader of the Opposition on that occasion and, in response to the suggestion he made, the resolution was amended by the then Prime Minister and passed the House in the shape in which it has been before the country ever since. That was a resolution in favour of a Canadian owned, Canadian built, and Canadian manned navy. There is no good reason why any gentleman who supported that resolution should not be prepared to stand by the policy of our party to-day. The Prime Minister, then the leader of the Opposition, went to England very shortly after that resolution was passed and he took occasion to express his opinions in the very shadow of the throne as to the resolution. If he had had any doubts as to what would be the proper thing to be done in England, if he had any doubts as to what the popular idea with the home Government would be, he would certainly not have expressed anything that he would not have regarded as being in accord with the accepted opinions of the English people. We are not obliged to speculate as to what he said. We have it here. We have heard it before but I promised at the beginning that I would put on record the ideas that were expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite in those days when they were talking freely, honestly and conscientiously and when they had no designs upon the country from a party standpoint such as they have to-day. These words are well known, they are on record and what he said in Great Britain at that time was a statesmanlike expression of opinion by the leader of the Government. He said:

Some feeling was created in the British Isles owing to the fact that Canada did not, by resolution or by speech from the Prime Minister vouchsafe the offer of one, two or three dreadnoughts. The resolution in the form in which it was passed, while its terms might not upon the surface seem as significant as the offer of one or two dreadnoughts would have been, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada which would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of dreadnoughts.

When the Prime Minister came back to his own province, and after he had had plenty of opportunity of discussing and thinking over the resolution passed by this Parliament on the 29th March previously, he addressed his own people in the city of Halifax and what did he say?

How the present Administration will work out the policy which was outlined by the resolution to which I have alluded, remains to be seen. One governing principle, at least, should control, namely that out of our own materials, by our own labour and by the instructed skill of our own people, any necessary provision for our naval defence should be made so far as may be reasonably possible. In this connection may not we hope that there shall be given a stimulus and encouragement to the ship-building industry of Canada which has long been lacking? To-day should be Nova Scotia's opportunity in that regard. Providence has endowed this province with the material, with the men and with the maritime situation which are essential not only for developing a scheme of naval defence and protection, but also for the resuscitation of that ship-building industry which once made Nova Scotia famous throughout the world.

That is the position which was taken by the Prime Minister in the city of Halifax where his own people were looking forward with great expectations and hope to what the policy of the then Government was to bring to the country and which they expected their own representatives to support. He said further:

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country, I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion in the first place that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard, is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that.

The other experiment (that is the contribution idea) has been tried as between Australia and the Mother Country, and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory. In Australia it failed, in the end, to meet with the approval of the people.

I have a few more quotations from statements of the right hon. gentleman and then I am through with what he had to say. He talks about war with a thrust of his shoulders and says what he is prepared to do:

If the Germans prove themselves the greater race, if they have greater endurance, greater skill and superior organizing ability, more sincere and self-sacrificing patriotism, they are entitled to be supreme on the sea as they are on the land, we have no right to resent the challenge.

I want my hon. friends to pay attention to this in view of the cheque writing heroism which we see in this country now.

But, unless the ancestral blood flows less red in our veins, we shall meet it with a heart no less firm than that with which our forefathers encountered the shock of the invincible Armada. I am the descendant of those who have never lived under any other than the British flag since it first streamed the free breezes of Heaven. I am as profoundly and unalterably attached to British institutions and connections and as ready to work and if necessary fight for them as any man in Canada.

That is an expression of opinion given by the leader of the Government, but I can imagine that when he spoke of fighting, when he used the word 'fight.' the Postmaster General immediately grasped him by the coat-tail and said: Fight? A man getting your wages? What fight can you make?

The idea of getting a man to fight who has $46.33 a day! Why, says the Postmaster General, I can get all the fighting material I want in this country for 26 cents a day. Then the Postmaster General said: I myself get $30.35 a day, and the Minister of Inland Revenue gets $30.35 a day, and you could not with a crowbar get us out to fight; we don't do it. The idea of you talking about fighting with a salary like that when, says the Postmaster General, I can get a Russian Finn for 26 cents a day that is twice your match in a battle; stay at home Mr. Premier and don't talk nonsense. At this stage the Minister of Marine comes in and he says when a man in my province talks fight, he has the seabreath in his nostrils. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us a few days ago that down in New Brunswick he had men with marvellous nostril capacity, and he told us that if ever the day came when there was any fighting to be done, particularly sea-fighting, the nostrils of these men gave evidence of great fighting possibility. When the Postmaster General was keeping the Prime Minister from fighting, this explanation came from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; that the sea breeze would get in his nostrils. But, said the Postmaster General, I have a remedy for his nostrils, I will put under his nose this Rogers-Macdonald election drug, and that is so malodorous that it will drive all the salt air in the Bay of Fundy out of his nostrils, and he will not talk fighting any more. That was the dialogue that took place between my hon. friends when the Prime Minister waxed eloquent and talked about his blood being no less red than that of his forefathers, and told us that he would stand up before any German that ever was born. Of course the Postmaster General warned him that his salary was not of the fighting kind and that he had better be careful.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you reading from?

Mr. McKENZIE. It is not necessary for gentlemen on this side to read their speeches, they can make good speeches without reading them. I am sorry that these extempore speeches made on this side of the House are not so palatable to hon. gentlemen opposite as the canned variety to which they are more used. I do not think I will trouble the House at this late hour with any further quotations from the speech of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad I am able to please my hon. friends opposite; they want some cheer. I am glad to be able to help them out of that Egyptian darkness and gloom in which they have spent the last few months and to give them a glimpse of the Promised Land. As we have been promised that we can go home as soon as I am through with my speech I will not detain the House much longer. It is admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite that they are only supporting this policy of contribution because there is an emergency, and where are we to get the facts upon which to base the opinion that there is an emergency? Surely the best authority would be the First Lord of the Admiralty in Great Britain who is responsible to the people of Great Britain and to his colleagues in the British Cabinet. I challenge the Prime Minister or anybody else in this House to point to one syllable that has ever been uttered by the First Lord of the Admiralty in England or by any Minister of the Crown in England which says that there is an emergency in the old land, or that there is any condition which the people of England are not able themselves to cope with. They have the men. They have the money, they have the ships; they have everything that is necessary to defend the heart of the Empire, and they have the fighting blood in them. In all parts of the Empire; in the old land, throughout the overseas dominions they have the Irish blood, the Scotch blood, the English blood, that is prepared to fight if fight is necessary. I submit that there is not the slightest emergency in any part of the Empire. The First Lord of the Admiralty told the people of England on the 18th of March last, when presenting his Naval Estimates in the House, that he was reducting the present vote for the Admiralty by £2,300,000 and that even then they had more than enough to provide for the defence of the Empire against any possible enemy that might arise. I need not weary the House by reading this speech. It is in the hands of hon. members and they know I am quoting absolutely that speech of the 18th of March last. And, what further does he say which throws light upon the effects of this proposal on our part to provide three additional ships? He says it is the greatest possible folly to build even one ship for the navy except as it is required. He says the moment a ship is built it becomes heir to all the ills that tend to the scrapping of a warship. Yet we volunteer three ships which must be premature in their birth and must come to naught before their time. We want to provide $35,000,000 to be expended in a country where it is not wanted and where the man who is responsible for this department of affairs tells his own people and the world that he has got all the money that he wants. He is asked by a member of the House: How much money do you want? And his answer is: I have in the estimates all that I want, all that can be profitably spent. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that since that speech was made there have been great developments and important information has been disclosed by reason of the new German law. But that new German law, as explained in the memorandum submitted by the Prime Minister only means two battleships and two smaller vessels. Surely the great Empire to which we belong with its five hundred millions of people, with its vast wealth at home and abroad, is not to be startled out of a course on which it had decided by the fact that in six years the German nation intends to build two warships and two smaller vessels. The First Lord of the Admiralty supplemented this speech with a discussion of the new navy law. This I think, was on the 16th of May. He stated that the members of the new Canadian Government were coming to England to discuss the matters with respect to the navy. And he went on to say that in ten years Great Britain had been securing the heart of the Empire, and that the next ten years would be devoted to supplementing this condition in the overseas dominions. The great thing for the Canadian people, for the Australians and for the South Africans to do, was to build up the naval requirements of their own country, so that, all being secure at the centre, the wings might be secure also. If this be correct, and we have every reason to believe that it is, is it not plainly the duty of the Canadian people to build up on the shores of Canada, both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, such a defence as will be worthy of our great country, such a defence as will not only secure our own shores but will enable us to take a first class position in the defence of the heart of the Empire should that be necessary? There is no man in Canada who will not give his time, his energy and his money for the defence of the Empire. But the proper thing is not to send money out of our country but to utilize it here among ourselves. We have a country of nearly eight millions of people. I submit that the training of that people in any line of action is not a small matter or one to be neglected. What development shall we have in this country by reason of this proposed expenditure? I need not tell hon. gentlemen of the training in engineering and ship-building that might be given to our people through the inauguration of this great industry in our country. You do not merely read a book to a person if you wish him to learn to read. The book must be given to the person who is to learn to read. In the same way, if you wish to build up a people and make them capable, you must trust them with the industries that make for capability. Are we to be told that when, in a few years, we shall have twenty or thirty millions of people, our country is to be helpless so far as defence is concerned, that we are to have no development on this line and that our money must be sent to a foreign country to hire these twenty-eight-cent-a-day men to defend our magnificent heritage? Is that a policy of which the free people of the west will be proud? Is that the position that our proud English speaking friends from the Pacific coast will welcome with gladness, that we are to have twenty-eight-cent-a-day Hungarians on the decks of English ships in the North sea as the representatives of our idea of Canadian home and national defence? That is not the idea of the people of this country. Our people want to have their own defence in their own hands. We are loyal to the Crown, as we have always been and always will be. And we scorn the idea that there are any people in this country except those who are loyal. And I submit to our friends that it is a poor class of politics to say that any section of this country, whether Grits or Tories, or any other, are disloyal to the Crown. That is poor politics, and a poor announcement to make to our friends across the line—that half the people of Canada are not loyal. There are matters on which we can legitimately divide without dividing on questions of loyalty. So far as this side of the House is concerned, and so far as the party is concerned which is here represented, we wish to stand by the principles laid down by this House on the 29th of March, 1909, when Grit and Tory, French-speaking and English-speaking, were of one opinion and favoured one policy. That was the right policy. There we stand at the present time, and I believe the Canadian people stand there also. This House may do what its majority may think proper, but, as Paul of old appealed to Caesar, so shall we appeal to Caesar, and we shall get a decision on the principle of Canada for the Canadians—Canadians capable of carrying forward and putting into operation a Canadian policy making for the development of Canadian interests, setting forth and polishing this first jewel of the Empire, rendering unto it a lustre brighter than it has ever before attained, and placing it in a position which the capacity of the Canadian people within the bounds of the Empire, loyal to their King and country, will occupy and sufficiently deserve.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Telegraph statistics of the Dominion of Canada for the year ended June 30, 1912.—Mr. Cochrane.

IMITATION BUTTER AT SASKATOON.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to a statement published this morning in the Ottawa Citizen:

> Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, February 6.—Out of forty-four samples of butter examined here in the past few days by City Bacteriologist Buckell, only one, so far, has been approximated pure butter. The other samples are composed largely of lard stearin and beef stearin, mutton fat, renovated butter, etc. Food Inspector Davies states there are four or five firms, either in eastern Canada or Winnipeg, shipping the stuff here.

I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will see the importance of at once looking into this matter with the view of maintaining the reputation of Canadian butter.

Mr. BURRELL: I have not seen the article mentioned by my hon. friend; but so far as I gather from what he has stated, this is a matter of adulteration of food and comes under the department of my hon. colleague, the Minister of Inland Revenue. I will take notice of the item and have it looked into either by my hon. colleague or by myself.

WEST INDIAN TRADE AGREEMENT—STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a matter connected with the ratification of the treaty with the West Indian colonies. It was stated by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) that the Bill would come up for a third reading some days ago, but for some reason it has been postponed. It is stated in the newspapers that, in connection with the working out of this proposition and the providing of a steamship service between Canada and the West Indies, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is seriously considering the awarding of a contract under which Boston, in the United States, will be made a port of call. This is a matter that commands an unusual amount of attention in the city of St. John, and the people there —and I believe the same is true of Halifax —are bitterly opposed to the subsidized steamers calling at a port in the United States. I had intended, and I believe some other hon. members on this side also, on the third reading, to discuss this very important matter. May I ask if the Prime Minister can give us assurance that no contract will be entered into allowing the subsidized steamers to call at Boston until this Bill comes up for the third reading, that the matter may be discussed?

Mr. BORDEN: It is not customary to give assurance on such subjects. However, as my hon. friend seems to be somewhat disturbed over the situation, and as I know there has been some rumour both in St. John and Halifax along the line that he mentions, I can only say that I do not think the people of Halifax or St. John, or my hon. friend, need give themselves the slightest concern in the matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then we have the assurance of my hon. friend to this effect. I am satisfied that his statement will be received with great pleasure by the people of the maritime provinces.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, resumed from February 6.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina). When a matter so important as this comes before us, I have no apology to offer for taking up some of the time of the House. This is a question which may change the whole political history of Canada, and may, and I believe will, change the whole future relations of Canada as a nation within the British Empire. I am somewhat surprised, as other hon. members who have spoken on this side have been surprised, to note the apparent lack of interest in this great question by hon. gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House. This matter was introduced into this Parliament on the 5th of December last. Prior to that time, the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues had gone to Great Britain for the express purpose of finding an emergency. They came back during the summer, and I noticed by the Conservative press throughout the Dominion that there was, according to the information the Prime Minister had obtained, a great emergency in the naval history of the British Empire. I waited for a period of three or four months. I expected that the Dominion Parliament would be called together almost any day, that its members from the Atlantic to the Pacific would be called upon to leave their business and come here in September or October to deal with this great emergency. A little later, I saw it stated that Parliament would not be called probably until January, 1913. And finally, the Prime Minister, in the face of this great emergency which they say exists decided to call this Parliament together on the 21st of November, 1912, which in my experience as a member, of this House, is the latest date when this Parliament has been called together for a fall session. And then, on the 5th of December, the resolution we are discussing was introduced by the Prime Minister. There did not seem to be great urgency in carrying on the debate. A few speeches were made before the Christmas holiday; after the holiday, a few more speeches were delivered, and for the last two or three weeks not a solitary speech has been delivered by a member on the Government side. I hold that in connection with a question of this kind it is the duty of every man who has a seat in this House to discuss the question and have it put squarely before the people. I would not say that the Prime Minister has gagged his supporters in this House. I think I recognize in this matter the fine—or shall we say the coarse—hand of the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). He has carried on in the Manitoba legislature tactics of this kind. One or two members of the Government would discuss a subject and then they would say: We will leave it to the Opposition. I would like to say to the Minister of Public Works —I am sorry he is not in his place—that he will find that in the Canadian Parliament he cannot carry on the same tactics that he has carried on in Manitoba.

I know that a number of members from the West would like to speak on this subject—and one of the excuses I have for speaking is that very little has been said by members from west of the great lakes. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) did make a speech which I had not the pleasure of hearing. I have no doubt that I missed a splendid oration and a most enlightening discussion of this question. Except this hon. gentleman, there has not been a single gentleman from the prairie provinces on that side of the House who has discussed the question. And yet this is a matter of very great interest to the prairie provinces.

It may be said that we are not interested in the question of a navy. I may say however that in going through Ontario since I came to Ottawa at the beginning of this year, I found more people in this so-called loyal province of Ontario, who are opposed to the navy—opposed to doing anything at all by way of contribution or constructing a Canadian navy—than I have found in the constituency of Regina or in the whole province of Saskatchewan.

I am sure that a number of members from Manitoba and the West sitting on the other side of the House would like to speak on this question. I am sure that my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) for the last two or three weeks has been spoiling for a chance to make a speech on the navy. I have seen him a number of times in the library within that time, and I know that he is carrying a speech on this subject in his pocket. But there is one hon. gentleman on that side whom I should particularly like to hear, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett). He has been to the very foot of the Throne. He has been hobnobbing with the Privy Councillors of the British Empire. I am sure that on his tour he must have found many things of interest to this House, and I have no doubt that the hon. member also is spoiling to make a speech. But, for some reason, the supporters of the Government have been gagged by some one high in authority in the party. Sitting upstairs in my room recently, I heard noises proceeding from an adjacent room where a Conservative caucus was in progress. I would suggest to hon. members opposite that they make less noise in their caucus and a little more noise in the House.

I said a moment ago that I had met many people in the province of Ontario who were not in favour of contributing anything or doing anything towards assisting the British navy or in maintaining the naval supremacy of the British Empire. I believe that if you would take a referendum of the people of the province of Ontario on the three questions: Do you want contribution ? Do you want a Canadian navy ? Do you want to do nothing at all in this matter ?—the majority of the people, outside the city of Toronto, would vote in favour of doing nothing at all. I do not say that the people from the province of Ontario are disloyal, but we have heard from scarcely any members representing constituencies in the province of Ontario in regard to this very important matter. Evidently these hon. gentlemen are afraid to get up in their places and express their sentiments as supporting the Government's proposition. I do not say these people who assert themselves as not being in favour of doing anything are disloyal; I do not agree with them, and a large majority of the people I have the honour to represent do not agree with this view—it is largely a matter of opinion. These gentlemen from the province of Ontario say: We do not want any navy; what danger is there of our being attacked? While I respect their opinions, I say that in view of what has been taking place in respect of the warlike preparations of other nations during the past few years; in view of the fact that Germany has been increasing forces on land and sea; and that other nations of Europe have been increasing their naval armaments to a great extent, we in Canada must do something towards maintaining the supremacy of the British Empire on the high seas. I say this not on the basis of the statement that we owe a great deal to England. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) has arrived at the conclusion that we owe a billion dollars in cash to Great Britain, but surely it is impossible for hon. gentlemen on either side of the House to make any calculation as to what stated sum of money Canada owes to Great Britain. What we do owe to Great Britain is the benefit we have received in our civilization, out liberty, our right of free speech—which by the way, has been apparently gagged on the other side of the House—these things we owe to Great Britain, for Great Britain is to-day the greatest civilizing force known in the world. The only question is, how are we to pay this debt? In this consideration lies the difference between the opinions of the two political parties of Canada to-day—the question is as to contribution, or the construction of a Canadian navy.

The Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel)—I will perhaps quote him to a greater extent further on in my remarks—says that we have done more than our share towards naval supremacy by the construction of transcontinental railroads. Be that as it may, the fact remains that we have been too busy in this country developing our natural resources and building great railroads, and linking the provinces of Canada together, to give very much consideration to our naval forces. I think I am safe in saying that the first time this matter was mentioned in the House of Commons was when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), on March 29, 1909, moved that famous resolution which has been so often mentioned in the course of this debate. That was the first time, at least in my experience in this House, that this matter was discussed to any great extent.

I listened the other evening with considerable interest to the remarks of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), and I have heard similar sentiments expressed in other speeches made in connection with this debate. He said that in the year 1912 Canada did not spend one dollar towards the maintenance of the naval supremacy of the British Empire, or for the purpose of doing anything for the construction of a Canadian navy. This is what he said:

> Great Britain spent some $86,835,000; Australia, 11,000,000; New Zealand, $500,000; the little island of Newfoundland, $15,000; India, $500,000; South Africa, $475,000; and Canada—not a dollar.

The hon. member for North Perth stated that Canada did not spend one dollar in the year 1912. Whose fault was that, Mr. Speaker? This Government came into office on October 10, 1911, after that famous resolution of March 29 had been agreed upon in this House by both political parties, and after a considerable expenditure had been made by the late Administration under the provisions of that enactment. Some hon. gentlemen have said: Your navy is a tin-pot navy; the Niobe is no good and the Rainbow is no good. I do not know whether they are or not, but to hon. gentlemen opposite I would say that if the Niobe and Rainbow are not good ships why did they not, in 1912, spend some money in the construction of a small Canadian navy in this country, thus carrying out the provisions of the resolution of March 29, 1909? The responsibility for the position which Canada occupies to-day in the eyes of the Empire must rest upon the present Administration.

In listening to the debate which took place in this House when the matter was brought up in March, 1909, I was very much impressed with the fact that the two political parties on that occasion were apparently united on the policy of constructing a small Canadian navy for the protection of our sea coasts and our Atlantic and Pacific trade. I discussed the matter with

hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and there was manifested a general feeling of pleasure that the time had come when Canada might herself adopt a policy of constructing small fleet units or cruisers for this purpose. That was the general policy adopted in 1909, and, mark you, under very peculiar circumstances, for if there ever was reason to believe in the existence of an emergency in the history of the British Empire, it was in March, 1909. And what was the cause of this condition? Mr. Arthur Balfour, had made his famous speech in the House of Commons in connection with the naval supremacy of the Empire, in the course of which he said that because Britain had dropped what was known as the two-power fleet construction, and had dropped the building of about one ship a year, Germany had taken advantage of the cessation and pressed forward and was building as quickly as possible. In three years Germany would be equal, if not superior, to Britain in the North sea, and Britain's supremacy would be challenged. He fixed April 1, 1912, as the crucial time, when Germany would probably have twenty-eight dreadnoughts, as opposed to Britain's twenty-five. But April 1 has come and gone and what is England's position as compared with that of Germany? Britain had eighteen dreadnoughts and Germany ten. As I have said, in the month of March, 1909, a general feeling of alarm was manifested throughout the British Empire, and the direct result of this condition was an offer on the part of Australia of two dreadnoughts, an offer from New Zealand of one dreadnought,—and what did the hon. member for North Toronto have to say upon this question? All he had to offer was this miserable little resolution involving the construction of a Canadian navy, and at the same time he offered strong arguments as against a policy of contribution. Let me place this resolution on record:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

In the face of this feeling of alarm existing in the British Empire, all the member for North Toronto could squeeze out was this resolution, and in 1913, when the security of the British Empire was never on a firmer basis, he tries to tell us, in words that might well become a war-scare artist, that there exists in the British Empire to-day a great emergency. I wish to place on record the amended resolution passed in March, 1909, and agreed to by both political parties in this House without, as far as I am aware, one dissenting voice:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service——

I will ask you to note that the word 'speedy' was inserted at the request of the present Prime Minister of Canada. It was not sufficient to have a resolution simply expressing the principle of having a Canadian naval service. It must be inaugurated 'speedily,' according to the policy of the present Prime Minister.

—in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

As far as I am concerned, and the people I know in western Canada, we stand by the principle enunciated in that resolution of Parliament of March, 1909. That resolution contemplated nothing more or less than a Canadian naval service of our own, built up in Canada, built of Canadian material and manned by Canadian men. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce argued for at some length and with great eloquence in March, 1909. I wish to place on 'Hansard' some remarks he made during that debate, they are most enlightening. Speaking in favour of the resolution which he moved in 1909 the Minister of Trade and Commerce emphasized the following points against a policy of contribution. He said, in effect, that the idea of making a money payment was not right, it seemed too much like hiring some one else to do our work, it looked like hiring a man to protect one's family and a money contribution smacked too much of tribute.

That, I think, is a fair summary of the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1909 opposing the principle of a contribution in support of the British navy. His words were:

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do; as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to this form of aid.

It still remains basic.

If it was an objection to the policy of contribution in 1909, surely in 1912 or 1913 it is equally an objection; it looks too much like hiring some one else to do the work we should do ourselves, it looks as though the Dominion Government of the day were shifting the responsibility of Canadian naval defence on to the Empire which hon. gentlemen opposite say is so much burdened and over-taxed and on its last legs, so to speak, to-day.

It goes still farther than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve, or twenty, or thirty years, you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck; there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the product of defence. Yet some time or other, no one can doubt that with resources and with a population constantly increasing we must and will have in this country a naval force of our own for our coast and home defence.

I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, why does not the Government make a beginning to-day? Once this contribution is made it goes to England, it may be no use to England, what good has it done to Canada? Have you started any Canadian force of your own or rooted anything in Canadian soil? The same argument that was good against it in 1909 should be equally good in 1912-13. Again he said:

Again, it disjoins what has been joined together from the earliest days of the world's existence—commerce and the protection of commerce. After all, the basic idea of a naval force is the protection of the commerce of a country. A commerce side by side with its protector, and its protector side by side with the growing commerce of a country, flourish best together, and are the surest helpers to each other. That is the idea which is in my mind—that when we make our contributions in the way of a fixed sum and it goes from us, and we are not responsible for it, we have none of the inspiration arising from the growth and development of a system of future defence in our own country. We are deprived of the larger benefit ourselves, and in the future we do no greater service to the Empire of which we form a part in this matter of defence.

Why do not the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister proceed at once to carry out the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the whole Parliament of Canada in 1909 and start a Canadian naval force of our own? Supposing we put it off for ten years, we will have to start it then, but we will be ten years behind, and basing my opinion on what other nations have done, we could, in that time, have a small naval force in Canada that would protect both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

The point with me is as to whether it is not the greater wisdom to sow the seed at once and cultivate its growth, as best we may, in our circumstances and with our resources, until at last we arrive at that stage of expansion, which we have reached in other great lines of our country's progress. You will notice that while I have tried to discuss the pros and cons in connection with this method, while I have stated reasons in favour of and others against it, my own mind tends rather towards the employment of another form than that of an out and out money contribution.

I shall also read a brief extract from the speech of the Prime Minister, then the leader of the Opposition, who said:

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country, I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that.

Here were the two great Canadian parties in 1909 at one in connection with this question of naval policy. Here were the two men who are to-day the leading ministers of the Cabinet, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, saying that they were in favour of a Canadian naval service built in Canada, manned by Canadians and built with Canadian money, to protect our unguarded sea-coast. That was their policy in 1909 and 1910 and, I believe, until the Naval Service Act was introduced. Why, since coming into power, have they changed their policy and expressions and ideas in connection with this great question now before the Canadian people? I believe they were forced to change their ideas in connection with the construction of a Canadian navy and take up the policy of contribution by the Nationalist element in Quebec. Let me refer to some of the doctrines preached by these gentlemen who were Nationalists in Quebec in the summer and fall of 1910. We all know that in the province of Quebec there was a strong campaign against the so-called Laurier naval policy and practically in favour of doing nothing at all. Nationalists who occupy seats here to-day went throughout Quebec telling the people of that great province that if the Laurier naval policy went into force we would have conscription in this country, and they endeavoured to scare the people—with success in some districts—from supporting a Canadian navy. Some of the statements made by these hon. gentlemen are a disgrace to the public life of Canada. I have had people in western Canada say: Do you mean to tell us as a fact that these Nationalists in Quebec, in alliance with the Conservative Government, this Government with the great pretence of loyalty, made any such statements in Quebec? This kind of thing is having a very bad influence upon the people who are coming into this western part of Canada. Men coming from other countries say: Is it possible in this great Dominion of Canada that two elements can live together in the Canadian Government, one pretending to be out and out loyalists and the other saying that they will have nothing to do with England and the English? Let me refer to two or three statements made by some hon. gentlemen opposite, but first of all, let me direct the attention of the House to a stock form of resolution that was generally used in the province of Quebec. I find, in the Canadian Annual Review for 1910, page 188, a resolution which was moved, I believe, at St. Eustache on July 10, 1910. I shall only read the important parts of this resolution. The resolution

> Expressed readiness to defend the rights of the Crown and the soil of the country; proclaimed the principles of self-government and strenuous objection to 'any new policy, the result of which would be to draw us into distant wars, foreign to Canada; so long at least as the self-governing colonies of the Empire shall not enjoy with the Mother Country, and upon an equal footing, the sovereign power and authority'; denounced the policy of centralization and apparent Imperial unity.

I wonder what these hon. gentlemen have to say to-day with respect to the whole naval policy of the Government tending towards centralization in England and meddling with the foreign policy of Great Britain. It

> Acclaimed as essential to Canada a policy of peace and material development; urged the right of free discussion and the necessity of the people deciding this issue; denounced the navy policy as having thrown Canada into 'the vortex of militarism' and misappropriated, for the construction of murderous weapons and the preparation for bloody wars, millions 'destined to the development of our agriculture and means of transportation'; censured Mr. Borden as having urged a 'no less nefarious policy' and Parliament for not submitting to the people a proposal involving a 'tribute of blood and a load of military taxation.'

That was the stock resolution passed not only at that meeting but at a number of subsequent meetings. It is a condemnation not only of the so-called Laurier policy, providing for the construction of a Canadian naval service, but also of a policy of contribution without submitting the question to the people. In what position these Nationalist members find themselves with their constituents, supporting as they apparently now do a policy of contribution, I will have to leave entirely to themselves.

I find, that, following up the passing of this resolution, a number of these hon. gentlemen made speeches in the province of Quebec which were designed to stir up the passions of the people of that province and I repeat that some of these speeches and some of the resolutions that were passed were a disgrace to the public life of Canada. I find that even our Deputy Speaker (Mr. Blondin) is reported, in the Canadian Annual Review for 1910, at St. Louis de Blandford, October 29, to have said:

> We owe nothing to Great Britain. England did not take Canada for love or to plant the cross of religion, as the French did, but in order to plant its trading posts and make money. The only liberties we have won are those we won by force, and to-day England tries to dominate its colonies as Imperial Rome once did.

What must you, Mr. Speaker, a loyalist of the loyalists in this country, think of the action of the Government, at the very first opportunity, in taking the hon. member for Champlain and making him the second commoner of Canada, what must you think, Mr. Speaker, of this action of the Government that was elected as a result of flag waving and the cry of no truck or trade with the Yankees. 'Canada for the Canadians' was heard from every platform, the flag was waved from one end of this country to the other and yet one of the first actions of this Government was to take to their arms the man who made statements of the kind that I have just read. I find that even the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) who occupies a very prominent position in the affairs of this country, has been guilty of some remarks of that kind. I find in the Canadian Annual Review, 1910, page 194, that on October 26 the organ of the Postmaster General, L'Evenement, a paper published in the city of Quebec, used the following language with respect to the Drummond-Arthabaska election:

> The spirit of party is so ingrained among us that it is not impossible that certain old Vons would have preferred a Bleu candidate. They fully understand, however, that the question at issue is not one of Bleu or Rouge, but of liberty, of autonomy, of protection against militarism. Two years ago everybody was in accord with this point—no Imperialism. Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself directed, or at least appeared to direct, the opposition to militarism. He hes betrayed us, but the mass of the people remain faithful to the principle of autonomy and hostile to Imperialism.

On October 24, 1910, the same paper said:

Slowly, as Mr. Chamberlain said, we have been brought to the point—thanks to the feebleness and duplicity of Laurier—of spending fifteen millions. In two years they will be asking us for twenty millions Once we are on the train they will make us pay well. We will be in the crime up to the neck.

These are statements published in the paper owned and controlled, I believe, by the Postmaster General. I might point out statements made by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) who opposed any expenditure on a navy in Canada and also opposed a contribution.

Mr. EDWARDS: What about the former members for South Huron and Nicolet?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman did make one speech and I do not think he will take the place of any other hon. gentleman on his side of the House and make another speech. He should give his fellow members an opportunity. What about the position of the Government when they came into office? There is no question but that the leading men of the Government were in favour of the construction of a Canadian naval service. In the province of Quebec the Nationalist end of the Conservative party said: We will not have any navy; we will not have any contribution. The Imperialistic end of the Government were desirous of making the Nationalists swallow themselves but the Nationalists would not do it and so the Imperialists said: We will have to do a little swallowing ourselves; we will swallow the navy, the Nationalists will swallow a little, we will compromise on the question of contribution and then we will all be even because we have all swallowed something. This policy is one of pure political expediency and it was only adopted to save the face of the Government. It has thrown one prominent Cabinet minister overboard and I am sorry he has not been in the House to explain the whole situation. I have no doubt that he could have given us a very excellent address and some very interesting details in regard to this question. There is only one man in that wing of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec who has stood true to his convictions. He resigned his position rather than support this policy of a contribution. He opposed this policy and he wrote a letter to the Prime Minister in which he assures us that the whole thing was unconstitutional and stated that he stood by his principles as enunciated in 1909, 1910 and 1911. It was a political slap in the face to every other Nationalist member who occupies a seat in this House.

In looking over a speech made by the right hon. Prime Minister advocating this policy of contribution, I found that the right hon. gentleman was sensible enough not to say very much about secret information. He did not place very much reliance upon secret information; he left that to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). It is but fair to assume that a private member of this House, in justice to himself and his constituents, must be guided in his opinion on this subject by the information which has been placed before the House. And so, as a private member, I have to be guided by the memorandum of the Admiralty which I say discloses no need, no crisis, no emergency. The Prime Minister, when he addressed the House, did not put much stress on whatever confidential information he may have been supplied with, but two weeks later, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke, just the day before the adjournment for the Christmas holidays, he made a sort of war-scare speech, and he evidently wanted the people of the country during the recess to be under the impression that there was a tremendous emergency in the history of the naval supremacy of the British Empire. When the Prime Minister submitted his proposal to the House, referring to the information he had to present, he said ('Hansard,' page 700):

A portion of this necessarily is of a very confidential character, which cannot be made public; but an important part will be communicated to the House in a document which I shall lay on the table this afternoon.

Here we are told by the Prime Minister that the important part of his information is contained in the Admiralty memorandum, and in that memorandum there is not mentioned any need whatever for a money contribution. The Admiralty did not say they needed ships or money; they simply set forth the situation which exists, pointing out that Great Britain had withdrawn her ships from the outlying dominions, leaving them unguarded. But, when it came to the turn of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he said ('Hansard,' page 1416):

He (the Prime Minister) could not lay more before you because it is not permitted; but let no man run away with the idea that the statements contained in the memorandum of the Lords of the Admiralty, which has been prepared for publication, was all or even the more important part, of the information obtained.

Here we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce in direct contradiction to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister tells us that the important part of the information he has is contained in the Admiralty memorandum and the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that the memorandum does not contain the most important part of the information imparted to the Prime Minister in consultation with the British ministers. There is no question at all but that in the consultations between the Canadian ministers and the British ministers, information might be imparted which would not be given out for publication, but we have the word of the Prime Minister himself that the important part of the information has been communicated to the House. We have a number of Privy Councillors in this country, and we have not heard a solitary statement from any one of them to justify us in coming to the conclusion that there was any confidential information imparted other than that which has been presented to us. Then, when we take the statements made by Winston Churchill, Mr. Asquith, and the other British statesmen in the Imperial Parliament, no sensible man can come to any other conclusion from these statements than that there is no emergency.

A fair reading of the Admirality document must lead to the conclusion that the idea of the British Ministry is that Canada and the outlying dominions should build up small navies of their own to protect their own trade and their own seacoasts, and that should Great Britain need our assistance in the time of war, we will be there to help. The Prime Minister and some of his colleagues went to England last year to get a naval policy, or rather to obtain an announcement from the British Admirality as to what we should do in Canada towards a naval service. It is a mistake, however, to say that they went to England to get a naval policy, because they had their naval policy cut and dried before they left Canada, and that policy was to offer a contribution. What they went to England really for was to induce the British Admirality to give them some sort of a statement that would help them over their political exigency in this country. The Prime Minister gave public utterance in England to the statement that Canada would never construct a navy of her own or enter upon a permanent naval policy of her own until Canada were given a voice in Imperial affairs. There are doubtless a great many people in Canada who want a voice in Imperial affairs; but, speaking for myself, I am opposed to that idea. I believe it would be a mistake on the part of the Dominion to get mixed up in the foreign policy of Great Britain. Great Britain has proven herself in times past amply able to look after her own foreign policy and why should we mix up in her foreign affairs now? Be that as it may, when the Prime Minister of Canada got to London, he asked the Admiralty, in effect: What can we do for you in the present condition? We will not embark on any permanent naval policy in Canada until we are given a vote in Imperial affairs; what can we do for you immediately under these conditions? And it was impossible, of course, for the Admiralty to say anything else than: Under these conditions you can give us ships or money. There is no doubt whatever in my mind that had the British ministers been in a position to give independent advice to the Canadian ministers and were they left unfettered by any conditions such as had been imposed on them, they would have pronounced exactly the same opinion they pronounced in 1907 and 1911, at the Imperial conferences, when they said: Construct your own navies in the overseas dominions, protect your own sea-coasts, protect your own trade, and if Britain is ever in danger, you will be ready to assist us. In support of my contention let me quote the words of the memorandum:

> The Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada has invited His Majesty's Government, through the Board of Admiralty, to prepare a statement of the present and immediately prospective requirements of the naval defence of the Empire for presentation to the Canadian Parliament, if the Dominion Cabinet deem it necessary.

Then paragraph 10 of the memorandum says:

> The Prime Minister of the Dominion, having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering, after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances, that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Of course, under the conditions presented to them, the only answer the British Admiralty could give was to ask Canada for ships or money. In any event, the memorandum conclusively shows that up to the year 1920, in view of the provision made by the British Parliament for the construction of ships, and the maintenance of the British navy, there is no need for alarm. We have this paragraph in the memorandum which shows that the margin of security in the year 1915 will certainly be very ample:

> It is now necessary to look forward to the situation in 1915.
> In Home waters.
> In the spring of the year 1915—
>
> Great Britain will have twenty-five dreadnought battleships and two 'Lord Nelsons.'
>
> Germany will have seventeen dreadnought battleships.
>
> Great Britain will have six battle cruisers.
>
> Germany will have six battle cruisers.

The memorandum goes on to say:

> These margins in new ships are sober and moderate. They do not err on the side of excess. The reason they suffice for the present is that Great Britain possesses a good superiority in battleships, and especially armoured cruisers, of the pre-dreadnought era.

The reserve of strength will steadily diminish every year, actually, because the ships of which it is composed grow old, and relatively, because the new ships are more powerful. It will diminish more rapidly if new construction in Germany is increased or accelerated. As this process continues, greater exertions will be required by the British Empire.

There is no evidence of any emergency in connection with that statement. Another paragraph in this memorandum says:

The Admiralty are assured that His Majesty's Government will not hesitate to ask the House of Commons for whatever provision the circumstances of each year may require. But the aid which Canada could give at the present time is not to be measured only in ships or money. Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness to the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the overseas dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.

I think that paragraph is the crucial part of the memorandum. It speaks about the margin of our common safety. Everyone is aware that during the past few years, in order to increase the margin of common safety in the North sea, ships have been withdrawn from other parts of the British dominions. In view of such a situation and in view of the statement made by Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, that the development of the British navy during the next ten years would be the building up of navies in the various portions of the British Empire, I think the proper course for Canada to pursue is to start a Canadian navy. Let us protect our own trade, our wheat and other food products going across the seas from Canada to Great Britain. Let us build a fleet unit, if necessary, and put it on the Pacific ocean. I cannot understand how any hon. member from British Columbia, representing the people of that province and endeavouring to do his duty by them, can support a policy of contribution as opposed to a policy of building ships to protect the coasts of Canada against the yellow peril, which we have heard so much about. Only one member from the province of British Columbia has spoken on this question so far. I do not think he dealt with it very fully; but I have no doubt other members from that province will express themselves later on this question. Thirty-five million dollars sent across the waters, is that going to protect the coast of the province of British Columbia? Is it not foolish for the Canadian people to send thirty-five million dollars over to Great Britain to build three empty ships, with no men in them, and leave both the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts unprotected in any way, when some fast cruisers from another nation might attack them at some time or other? Almost every prominent man in the Parliament of Great Britain says that there is no emergency at the present time. Three or four pamphlets have been sent to members of this House from across the water in connection with this. Every one of these statements justified us in coming to the conclusion that so far as Great Britain is concerned, there is no need for alarm; the British Government has made ample provision for protection for the next few years. I intend to put a few of these statements on 'Hansard.' In the House of Commons on July 10, 1912, Sir Edward Grey, Foreign Secretary, in discussing the foreign relations of the British Empire, and particularly the relations with Germany, made this statement:

Our relations with the German Government at the present moment are excellent. We are perfectly frank with each other about all questions of mutual interest, and I believe that when questions come up, whether they be, for instance, in connection with our representative interests in South Africa, or whether they be in connection eventually with the Baghdad railway, both Governments are convinced that their mutual interests can be perfectly reconciled.

On July 25, Mr. Asquith, speaking in the British House of Commons on the question of Imperial defence, made this statement:

Our relations with the great German Empire are, I am glad to say, at this moment—and I feel sure are likely to remain—relations of amity and good-will. My noble friend, Lord Haldane, the present Lord Chancellor, paid a visit to Berlin early in the year. He entered upon conversations and an interchange of views there which have been continued since in a spirit of perfect frankness and friendship, both on one side or the other, and in which I am glad to say we now have the advantage of participation of a very distinguished diplomatist in the person of the German ambassador.

Mr. Bonar Law, leader of the Opposition, on the same day in the British House of Commons said:

I am quite sure that if this country really believed that there was danger they would refuse no possible sacrifice which the Government could ask, but in spite of all that has been said, does the country, do the House of Commons, do any of us really believe that there is danger and vital danger? I confess that I have the greatest difficulty in believing it myself—(ministerial cheers)—I confess it.

So far as the question of relationship with Germany is concerned, in view of statements of that kind from the leaders on both sides of the British House of Commons, it seems to me that we are on good terms with Germany. On July 2, Lord Crewe stated:

So far as our existing position in any part of the world is concerned we are not afraid to declare that we consider the security of the country is achieved.

Again he stated:

Taking March 31 of this year, we find that we have sixteen battleships and battle cruisers of the dreadnought type, as against fifteen possessed by all the other powers in European waters. Next year we shall have twenty-four ships of this type as against twenty-one possessed by all the other naval powers of Europe. These battleships represent a distinct margin over the two power standard.

Earl Brassey, who is recognized in Great Britain as an authority on naval matters, said:

The cruisers should not be omitted. In all types, and especially in the most powerful types, we had an overwhelming preponderance . . . The German north fleet had no ships to set against our armoured cruisers. . . . If we steadily built the ships we required, alarmists would be silenced and international relations improved.

On July 23, 1912, Mr. Asquith made the following statement:

I deprecate anything in the nature of panic or scares. I do not think there is the least occasion for it, but it is of the utmost importance that we should see clearly what is likely to happen, and that we should provide in time for our own part in the discharge of our own responsibilities. . . . There never has been a moment and there is not now when we have not been overwhelmingly superior in naval force against any contributions which could reasonably be anticipated. But I entirely agree. We must maintain that position and maintain it to the full.

About the same time, in the British House of Commons, Hon. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, said:

Perhaps I may tell the committee what our forecast is in regard to dreadnought construction. We expect in the fourth quarter of 1913 to have eighteen dreadnought battleships, by the time that Germany has thirteen. In the fourth quarter of 1914 we shall have twenty-four and Germany will have sixteen, according to our calculations.

In the fourth quarter of 1915 we shall have twenty-seven and Germany seventeen. I am leaving the cruisers out. I am not counting the two Lord Nelsons, although those vessels are counted as dreadnoughts by the French, and certainly are vessels of very great merit and power. The House will see, looking at these figures, which omit cruisers, and just give battleships, that the statement that we have only a margin of four ships in the North sea does require to be qualified by a good many other observations.

A little later on he says:

We shall have eight battle cruisers when Germany has four in the fourth quarter of 1913. In the fourth quarter of 1914 we shall have nine when Germany has five, and in the fourth quarter of 1915 we shall have ten when Germany has six, and those are the total figures.

Then, in regard to expenditure, he said the Government had the question of expenditure well in hand and they were asking for all the money required to maintain the supremacy of the British fleet. On this point he said:

We are spending forty-five millions sterling this year. Is that nothing? We are going to spend more next year. Is that nothing? We are raising the personnel of the navy from 133,850—that is what it stood at on March 31, 1912—to 141,150—that is what we hope it will reach on March 31, 1913. Then we propose to raise the number to 146,000 at the end of 1914—another rise of 5,000 men—and there will be further increases in the future. We are creating an immediate reserve, which has already reached 2,000 and which we hope next year will reach 5,000, in order to be able to man this extra squadron.

I will not detain the House with more statements of that kind. But I think that, in view of what has been said by the statesmen of Great Britain, men who know the situation there well, it is useless for any person to rise in this House or to come before the people of this country and try to stampede the people by telling us that there is an emergency, a crisis, in the naval supremacy of the British Empire. I find every reason for coming to the conclusion that the memorandum does not say that there is an emergency.

On March 18, 1912, Mr. Winston Churchill, speaking in the House of Commons, said it was the policy of the Goverment to maintain the sixty per cent standard over every other power. Up to a couple of years ago, it was the policy of the British Empire to maintain what they called the two-power standard—that is, to build ships at such a rate that they would have more ships, more power, than any possible combination of two nations against them. This has been dropped, I believe, and the policy now is to maintain a sixty per cent margin over their chief competitor, which may be, possibly, the Empire of Germany. In making that statement, Mr. Churchill said: 'To-day Great Britain has twenty-two dreadnoughts against Germany's thirteen, a superiority of 69·2 per cent. I find that men who are well versed in naval affairs sometimes compare fleets, not by number of ships, but by total displacement. And, comparing on that basis, I find that the total tonnage of Britain's twenty-two dreadnoughts is 44,695 tons, and the total displacement of Germany's thirteen dreadnoughts is 276,760 tons, a superiority on the part of Great Britain of 61·5 per cent. This is a rather smaller superiority than is shown when we judge by the number of vessels. But, while the British navy has the smaller ships, apparently, it has better guns. Germany possesses in the Kaiser and Friederich der Grosse, two battleships larger in displacement than anything yet completed for the British navy, for, while their displacement is 24,110 tons, the displacement of the King George V is only 23,600 tons. On the other hand the broadside fire of the Kaiser and her sister ship amounts to only 9,310 pounds, while that of the King George V is no less than 14,000 pounds. So, though Germany has some ships that are larger in total displacement than ours, our broadside fire is far above that of the German dreadnoughts. Apparently, Great Britain has been able to put more fighting power into the ships than Germany has been able to do. And apparently Great Britain has always been able to do this, as the following table shows:

	Broadside fire. Great Britain.	Germany.
1906-7	6,800 lbs.	6,080 lbs.
1907-8	6,800 "	6,080 "
1908-9	8,500 "	7,848 "
1909-10	12,500 "	9,810 "
1910-11	14,000 "	9,810 "

The twenty-two completed British dreadnoughts have a total broadside fire of 191,100 pounds as against 96,612 for the thirteen German dreadnoughts, a superiority on the part of Great Britain of no less than 97.7 per cent—almost double. The average broadside fire of Germany's completed dreadnoughts is 7,432 pounds, while the average of Great Britain's dreadnoughts is 8,686 pounds, a superiority of 16.3 per cent per ship. Let us sum up these comparisons in the following table:

British and German Dreadnought Strength at the beginning of 1913.

	Britain.	Germany.	British Superiority. Per cent.
Completed ships	22	13	69·2
Tonnage	446,950	276,760	61·5
Broadside fire—
No. of guns	192	112	71·4
	Lbs.	Lbs.
Weight of fire	191,100	96,612	97·7
Average broadside per ship	8,696	7,432	16·3
Average broadside per 1,000 tons	427·5	348·8	22·6

We find that if Great Britain has 160 dreadnoughts to Germany's 100, which is a sixty per cent superiority, the British ships would have a total broadside of 1,391,360 pounds and the German ships would have a total broadside of 743,200, or a British superiority of 87.2 per cent in actual fighting power. From these figures naval experts conclude that the British fighting power of the British navy is much greater than that of the German navy.

I do not wish to take up much time in referring to speeches made by hon. members on the other side of the House. I wish however, for the purpose of arriving at conclusions of my own, to refer again to the speeches made by the Prime Minister in introducing the resolution and by the Postmaster General and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I found, on reading carefully the speech of the Prime Minister, that there is nothing in it that would justify the ordinary reader in coming to the conclusion that there is going to be a permanent naval policy, that is, so far as the construction of a Canadian navy is concerned. If it justifies any conclusion on the subject, it justifies the conclusion that the permanent policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is to be a policy of contribution. And, in justice to the people of Canada and to the members of this House, I think we are entitled to know what their permanent policy is before we pass this contribution. As the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said, there are only two ways open to any government in connection with the naval policy. The first is the construction of a Canadian navy, as unanimously agreed to in this House on two or three occasions before the introducing of this resolution; and there is the policy of contribution. I do not care how long the Prime Minister meditates on the subject. Hon. members opposite say: We are going to think over this matter. The hon. member for Brantford, however, whom I do not see in his place, and he is recognized as being a man very close to this Government and consulted by them on important matters of policy, had something to say on this subject. His whole speech justifies my coming to the conclusion that his policy is one of contribution. I do not believe the hon. member for Brantford is so irresponsible that he would, without consulting his leader, make that statement on the floor of this House. If I understand aright the remarks of the hon. member for North Perth, they were to this effect: What is the use of a Canadian navy when Britain is supreme on the sea? and the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) arrived, I have no doubt, at the same conclusion. From the information I have been able to gather from speeches made by hon. members from the province of Ontario, I can come to no other conclusion than that the permanent policy of the Government is to be a policy of contribution, and that this first vote of $35,000,000 is the initial dose for the people of this country, to see how they like the taste of it, and later on they will get another dose. From no remark made in the speech of the Prime Minister—except, perhaps, his quotation from his remarks in 1909 or 1910—can it be assumed that he is in favour of a permanent Canadian naval policy; but his whole speech rather justifies the conclusion that his is a policy of permanent contribution. On page 710 of 'Hansard,' I find the following statement as made by the Prime Minister:

There have been proposals, to which I shall no more than allude, that we should build up a great naval organization in Canada. In my humble opinion, nothing of an efficient character could be built up in this country within a quarter or perhaps half a century.

Does that not justify the conclusion that if the Government has any permanent policy at all, it is one of contribution? If, as the Prime Minister has said, nothing of an efficient character can be built up in this country within perhaps a quarter or half a century, that presents an additional reason why we should begin to-day to do something for the protection of our own coasts, and commence the construction of an efficient naval force for the Dominion of Canada. (Reading):

Even then, it would be but a poor and weak substitute for that splendid organization which the Empire already possesses——

Will any hon. gentleman suggest for one moment that, if a Canadian fleet were built, it would be a substitute for the great naval organization of the British Empire?

—which has been evolved and built up through centuries of the most searching experience and of the highest endeavour. Is there really any need that we should undertake the hazardous and costly experiment of building up a naval organization especially restricted to this Dominion, when upon just and self-respecting terms we can take such part as we desire in naval defence through the existing naval organization of the Empire, and in that way fully and effectively avail oursleves of the men and the resources at the command of Canada?

I ask you, in the name of common sense, how we avail ourselves of the men and resources at the command of Canada by sending $35,000,000 over to Great Britain? As I have said, the entire speech of the Prime Minister justifies the average reader in coming to the conclusion that the Government's permanent policy—if they have one—is a policy of contribution, and I think the Government should not cogitate or meditate or ponder on this question any longer, but should take the people of the country into their confidence and let them know what is their permanent policy.

Coming now to the speech of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), there are two features of his remarks which stand out in prominence; one the bogey of conscription held out to the people of the province of Quebec, and the other the statement that the sending of $35,000,000 to Great Britain would be a cheaper policy for the people of Canada. Does that look like a permanent naval policy for Canada, or the establishment of a Canadian naval force? At page 1123 of 'Hansard,' I find that the Postmaster General stated:

I have no doubt that statements of hon. gentlemen opposite that they do not want any money to be voted, but that they want blood shed, and more money voted for the manning of the ships, is the continuation of the policy adopted by them for years.

And, at page 1133:

Is the right hon. leader of the Opposition in favour of increasing pay, or is he in favour of conscription? Let him come out from behind Torres Vedras, for once, and tell us all. Is the hon. member for Roville (Mr. Lemieux)—well, he is not here. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland)—would he vote in favour of conscription?

Then the hon. Postmaster General produced a little Bill, very much worn, which had apparently been carried in his pocket for a number of years, and, no doubt, had seen service in many election campaigns in the province of Quebec. He produced this Bill, so dear to his heart, stating that he had found it among the papers in one of the departments, and that on the face of the Bill was the name of Mr. Prefontaine, who is now deceased. The Bill was never introduced into this House, but the Postmaster General explained that it provided for conscription and was intended to be introduced, but for some reason was smothered. Let me read what the Postmaster General states, page 1133 of 'Hansard':

Now, our hon. friends have told us they are not in favour of conscription. But their theory does not hold together, their policy does not stand on its own feet. I have here something that may help them. I have been handed a little Bill, which never saw the light of day very much but on which I find the following words:

Fourth Session, Ninth Parliament, Edward VII., 1904.

An Act constituting the Naval Militia.

It has the name on it of Mr. Préfontaine, who at that time was Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I find embodied in this Bill conscription, enrollment—and six months in jail for every man who will not be enrolled or go under conscription.

This great speech made by the Postmaster General sets forth as I have said two principles; first, he threatens the people of the province of Quebec with the conscription bogey, and, second, he says we cannot get men for a navy in Canada unless we pay far more than is paid in Great Britain, and that it is cheaper to send $35,000,000 to Great Britain than to establish even a small navy in Canada.

The speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) bears this interpretation: this is only the beginning; we are to have a permanent naval policy. He reiterates that sentiment over and over again, the entire speech was made in order to convey to the people of the city of Toronto—where they think they have a monopoly of all the loyalty that exists in the Dominion, though I am afraid they are sadly mistaken—and to the people of the province of Ontario the idea that this Government intends to bring down a permanent naval policy, and then submit it to the people. This diversity of opinion in the ranks of the Government is an indication that in the province of Quebec in the next election the Postmaster General will say to the people of that province: There is no conscription connected with this $35,000,000 contribution; we send it over to Great Britain, and that is an end of it. They will pursue exactly the same tactics that they pursued in 1911. In 1911 what did they say in Ontario? They said: Laurier is a separatist—and why? Simply because the Canadian Naval Service Act did not contain a provision which prominent Conservatives in Ontario said they wanted inserted in the Bill, to the effect that every time Great Britain was at war, the Canadian navy should automatically pass under the control of the British navy and become part of it. What did we say in regard to that?—and I stand on exactly the same platform to-day.

Are we to be called separatists in Canada? We a nation within the British Empire, a country that has boasted of autonomy and self-government within the British Empire, because we say we must trust the Canadian Parliament to place our navy at the service of Great Britain should necessity arise? Supposing Great Britain were engaged in a foreign war to-day, do you mean to say there are men in the House of Commons whom the people of Canada would not trust to say if we would send troops or ships to help her? Because that section was not put in the Act in the way prominent Conservatives in Ontario wanted, they said in Ontaria: Laurier is a Separatist; while down in Quebec, for exactly the same naval Bill, they said: Laurier is an Imperialist who wants to send your sons into wars with the Chinese and Japanese, to see them disembowelled on the ships of Great Britain. To-day we have the Postmaster General holding out the fear of conscription to the people of Quebec, and saying: We will not send more than $35,000,000; perhaps we owe something for the protection we have had. so we will send this money, and that is the end. But in Ontario they tell the people of Toronto that that is only the beginning of our naval policy, that they will cogitate and ponder and mediate for three years more, and then bring down a naval policy that every Tory in Toronto will be proud of.

At page 706 of 'Hansard' the Prime Minister uses these words:

> There is, therefore, grave cause for concern.

That is from the information in the memorandum placed before this Parliament. At page 707, he says:

> The real test of our action is the existence or non-existence of absolute security.

At page 709 he says:

> Upon the information which I have disclosed to the House the situation is, in my opinion, sufficiently grave to demand immediate action.

How do statements of this kind from the Prime Minister of Canada after a few weeks' sojourn in Great Britain compare with the statements of Mr. Asquith, Prime Minister of Great Britain? Mr. Asquith says:

> There never has been a moment, and there is not now, when we have not been overwhelmingly superior in naval force against any combination which could reasonably be anticipated.

Who is right? The Prime Minister who sojourned in England for a few weeks for the purpose of preparing this naval policy, or Mr. Asquith, the Premier of Great Britain? I think the majority of people will be inclined to take the view that it is Mr. Asquith who must be familiar with the situation. On July 22, 1912, Mr. Winston Churchill stated in the House of Commons:

> Mr. Borden and his colleagues are now in possession of all the facts, and we have discussed with the utmost freedom and confidence the action which should be taken and the way of surmounting the difficulties which obstruct such action.

The statement of the Prime Minister of Canada is at variance with the statements of the Prime Minister of England and the First Lord of the Admiralty. I think we may assume that Mr. Borden received the same information that was given by Mr. Asquith in Parliament, and that the memorandum placed before the Canadian Parliament contains the same information and shows no justification for a large emergency contribution.

I mentioned what had been the policy according to the statement of Mr. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty in Great Britain, for the last few years. I find the same statement made by the Prime Minister in introducing this resolution, indicating that the British naval policy during the past two or three years has been one of concentration of ships in home waters; and the Prime Minister gave out some figures to which I wish to refer. In 1902 there were fifty-five British ships in the Mediterranean; to-day there are nineteen. In 1902 there were fourteen ships stationed around North American and West Indian stations; to-day there are three. In 1902 there were three on the southeast coast of Africa, to-day there is one. In 1902 there were sixteen at the Cape of Good Hope, to-day there are three. In 1902 there were eight on the Pacific stations, to-day there are two. In 1902 there were forty-two on the China station, to-day there are thirty-one. In 1902 there were twelve on the Austrian stations, to-day there are eight. In 1902 there were ten on the East India stations, to-day there are nine. To sum up, in 1902 there were one hundred and sixty-six at foreign and colonial stations, to-day there are only seventy-six. I submit that the conclusion drawn by the Prime Minister from these figures is not the correct conclusion to come to. If England has found it necessary to withdraw these ships that were formerly stationed at the various colonial stations and station them in the North sea and the home waters to render the margin of her security at that point ample, the proper conclusion for us is that we in the outlying dominions of the Empire should begin the construction of small navies of our own and be prepared to protect our coast and trade, and co-operate with Great Britain in the time of peril. I am justified in this conclusion, because of what the Right Hon. Winston Churchill said in addressing a gathering of the Shipwrights' Company in Great Britain in May, 1912, a few weeks before the Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues were to interview the Admiralty and Government of Great Britain in regard to the Canadian naval policy. Here is what Mr. Churchill said to these men, who know more about ship-building than any other organization of people in the world:

The British fleets are now practically concentrated. The recent great review before the King is only one proof of the quality of concentration which the Admiralty has lately brought to its final act, a policy of naval concentration which has given a real measure of security to the center and heart of the British Empire. But there is one aspect of naval concentration which requires the attention of thinking men here and elsewhere throughout the British Empire. The fact that our fleet is not only concentrated in the decisive theatre of European war, but must be kept concentrated, and in a certain sense, tied to that theatre, has been for some years creating a new want, a new need, a new opportunity for the great self-governing dominions of the Crown.

Later he proceeds:

At present, of course, and for some years to come, we are not only able to maintain a sufficient margin in home waters at the decisive points, but we could—by making special arrangements, by effecting partial mobilization we could if need arose—fit out and despatch strong squadrons to the aid of any of our colonies or dominions across the sea, whose vital interests were menaced or attacked.

And here is a great opportunity—the great chance of the self-governing dominions—these strong young nations which have grown up all over the world under the shelter of the British flag and by the stimulus and protection of British institutions, and they have already begun to seize it; already we have seen the development in Australia of a strong modern fleet unit. New Zealand has contributed a noble ship to the general service of the British navy. And in Canada men of all parties and of both races are deeply stirred upon the problem and of the share which the great dominions should take in the means by which it and all other parts of the British Empire are kept from harm. And we are soon to receive, I understand, representatives of the new Canadian Administration, who will come here to consult with the Government and the Admiralty upon the course of policy which should be adopted in the future.

Then he proceeds:

If the main development of the past ten years has been the concentration of the British fleet in decisive theatres it seems to me—and I dare say to you—not unlikely that the main naval development of the next ten years will be the growth of the effective naval forces in the great dominions overseas. Then we shall be able to make what I think will be found to be the true division of labour between the Mother Country and her daughter states—that we should maintain the sea supremacy against all comers at the decisive point, and that they should guard and patrol all the rest of the British Empire.

In face of a statement of that kind, made by the First Lord of the Admiralty in Great Britain, no doubt voicing what was at that time the policy of the Admiralty, and made at a time when the First Minister of this country and his colleagues were expected to confer with the Admiralty and the British Government as to what part Canada ought to take in the naval affairs of the Empire and of the overseas dominions, would any person believe that Mr. Churchill, within a period of seven or eight weeks, had changed his mind with regard to what was the proper policy for the outlying dominions to pursue? If the Prime Minister and his colleagues had gone to Great Britain and asked the British Admiralty what was the best course for Canada to pursue in connection with the maintenance of the naval supremacy of the British Empire, what answer do you suppose they would have got? They would have got exactly the same answer as that contained in the paragraph that I have read from the address of Mr. Churchill delivered before the Shipwrights Company in May of last year. Our Government would have been told, as they were told before: Build up, in the outlying dominions, your own fleet units, your own small navies, protect your own coasts, guard your own trade, use your own materials and money on the construction of a Canadian navy, and co-operate with the British navy in time of war. The Prime Minister went over to Great Britain with a cut and dried policy for the Canadian people to pursue, and he and his colleagues told the British Admiralty that they would have nothing to do with a permanent naval policy. The only thing for the British Admiralty to do was to tell them to send over their money, and that is what these hon. gentlemen propose to do.

I have heard a good deal of criticism of the expenditure of the old Government under the Naval Service Act. I find a reference to this matter by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce at page 1414 of 'Hansard.' Referring to that expenditure, he said:

> Meanwhile, we have paid one and a third millions of good Canadian dollars as capital expense, and we have paid out seven hundred and eighty-eight thousands for upkeep. You have the money paid; you have the result; and you have the right to ask yourselves, how long would it be under such auspices and circumstances, before two units could be manned by properly qualified seamen?

I submit that that is not fair criticism. What was the position when this Government came into power? The late Government had bought two vessels. Hon. gentlemen opposite said these vessels were no good. They talked in the province of Ontario about a tin-pot navy and they said that if they were put into power they would build a navy that would be of some use to the country. If these vessels were no good, why did they not get better vessels? The position to-day is that between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 were spent by the late Government for the purpose of inaugurating the Canadian naval service, and this present Government have absolutely allowed the money to go to waste. The Government did everything after they came into power, to lead the people to believe that this naval service was no good.

It has been said, and has not been denied, that there was a written pledge given to the Nationalists to repeal the naval law. It has been said, without contradiction, that certain gentlemen who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, were pledged in writing to Mr. Bourassa to repeal the Canadian Naval Service Act when this Government came into power. But, I have this to say, apart from all these contentious questions altogether, that the Government, after coming into power did absolutely everything in their power to discourage the young men of this country from enlisting in the navy. Tenders were called by the former Government for eleven warships for the purpose of carrying out the resolution of Parliament of 1909 and the Canadian Naval Service Act of 1910. One of the first things this Government did shortly after coming into power was to refuse to have anything to do with these tenders. A leading member of the Opposition, and a prominent member of the late Government, stated that after the late Government were defeated they did not like to take the responsibility, this being a contentious question, of dealing with the tenders which had been submitted, and they therefore determined to leave them to the incoming Government. This Government, however, have done everything they could to discredit the idea of a Canadian navy in this country. They have allowed $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 of the money of the people of Canada to go absolutely to waste and they have discouraged young men from enlisting in the navy. How could you expect young Canadians looking perhaps for a life in the navy—as a matter of fact a number of them are joining the United States navy—to join a navy that they did not know was going to exist for more than a year or two? If this money has been wasted the responsibility for the waste rests upon the Government. The responsibility for the many desertions from the service that have taken place must rest upon hon. gentlemen opposite because they have given no encouragement to Canadians to enlist in the Canadian navy.

There is no indication that there has been any want of ships in the British navy. On the contrary, the evidence we have before us would lead us to the conclusion that Great Britain cannot man the ships that she is building at the present time. I find that, in the English House of Commons last year, Mr. Winston Churchill made the statement that 'this year we are laying down more ships,' and that the next day, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Selborne declared that they should lay down eight ships. The day following that, July 25, in the House of Commons, the First Lord of the Admiralty replied as follows:

> We cannot lay down the additional ships asked for by Lord Selborne because if we do we cannot man or officer them unless we relegate to the scrap heap ships that are now good enough for the purposes for which they are used, take the crews and officers from these ships and put them on the additional dreadnoughts.

That is the position that Great Britain was in according to a statement made by Mr. Churchill on July 25, of this year. I ask you, if the statement of Mr. Churchill to the effect that they cannot man this year more than four ships is correct, how are they going to man the three additional dreadnoughts that we are sending there empty, either this year or next? I do not believe that the Admiralty were given a free hand.

Statements have been made in the country which would lead us to believe that Great Britain needs money. I do not know whether anybody has made that statement in this House but such statements have ben made by prominent Conservative politicians outside of the House. Last fall I saw the statement attributed to Sir Rodmond Roblin that Britain was on her knees begging Canada to come to her assistance with money. There has been no evidence of that fact presented to this House. On the contrary, when you look at the financial position of Great Britain, you find that Great Britain is in a very favourable position as far as her finances are concerned. The following is a statement of the financial position of Great Britain for the year 1911-12:

Revenue..	£185,000,000
Expenditure	178,545,000
Surplus..	£ 6,540,000	or $32,725,000
National debt—
1911..	£733,072,609
1912..	718,406,428
Reduction..	£ 14,666,181	or $73,330,905

I think that the finances of Great Britain are in a very satisfactory condition indeed. As a matter of fact, the statements of Mr. Churchill, Mr. Asquith, and others on the floor of the British House of Commons, would lead us to believe that they have all the money they want to meet the needs of the British navy for many years to come. Lloyd George, speaking in the English House of Commons last year said:

> We have in this last five or six years wiped out more debt than any administration that ever existed in this country.

In face of such a declaration from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is all nonsense for gentlemen opposite to be going up and down the country stating that Britain is on her knees asking for assistance.

In this day and generation it is a matter of self-respect for the Canadian people to build up in Canada a small navy, to make ourselves strong, to develop our natural resources, to develop our transportation system, to protect ourselves on both coasts, and to be ready as we always have been in the past, to come to the assistance of Great Britain when the hour of need arrives.

As to the bearing which a decision on this question may have on the people of western Canada, I have a few facts to submit to the House. According to the census taken in 1911, the four western provinces are entitled to fifty-six or fifty-seven members in the House of Commons, and at present they have only thirty-five. I represent in this Parliament a constituency which had a population of 70,000 at the last census, and which now, possibly, considering the growth of Regina, has a population of 80,000; the hon. member for Red Deer represents a constituency which had a population of 61,000 at the last census; the hon. member for Moosejaw represents a constituency which had a population of 87,000 at the last census; the hon. member for Assiniboia represents a constituency which had 42,000 people at the last census; the hon. member for Edmonton represents a constituency which had 57,000 population at the last census.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member state what bearing this has on the question before the House?

Mr. MARTIN : I intend to take the position that this measure should not be allowed to go through until Western Canada has proper representation in this House of Commons. If that has not a connection with this resolution, I do not know what has. This proposition is a departure from our constitutional practice, and, although I represent in this House to-day sufficient people to make three or four ordinary constituencies in Ontario, the people I represent have only one voice on this measure. This proposal is a departure from constitutional practice, as I have said; it has never been discussed before the people, and we should have a general redistribution law before it is allowed to go into effect. I will not express my own opinion as to whether this contribution is or is not constitutional; but I will read what the British North America Act says, and then hon. members can take what meaning they like out of it. Section 91 of the British North America Act states the different powers that may be exercised by the Parliament of Canada: amongst others, militia, military and naval service, and defence. I do not think anybody in this House will argue that that refers to the defence of Great Britain; it must refer to the defence of Canada. However, on the question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of this proposal, I shall submit the opinion of a man high in the councils of the Conservative party, no less a personage than the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). Debating this question on the Naval Service Bill, he said:

> What I desire to point out is, that under our constitution there is no obligation on the part of Canada, legally or constitutionally, to contribute to the naval forces of the Empire, and that condition will continue to exist so long as the United Kingdom alone has exclusive control of the foreign affairs of the Empire.

That is the opinion of the Minister of Justice, the highest authority in this country on such a question. I have another very high authority, the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), a man recognized as being a great constitutional lawyer, a professor of constitutional law in the University of Laval. When he resigned his portfolio—and, by the way, he was the only one of the Nationalist wing in the Government who was man enough to stand by his convictions—he wrote as follows to the Prime Minister:

> I regret to find I cannot concur in the decision, arrived at by Cabinet yesterday, to place on behalf of Canada an emergency contribution of $35,000,000 at the disposal of the British Government for naval purposes, with the sanction of Parliament but without giving the Canadian people an opportunity of expressing their approval of this important step before it is taken. Such a concurrence would be at variance with my pledges, and the Act proposed is of sufficient gravity to justify my insistence. It goes beyond the scope of the Constitutional Act of 1867.

I have my own opinions on this question, but I am prepared to subject them to the experienced judgment of such constitutional lawyers as the Minister of Justice and the late Minister of Public Works.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this measure should not be allowed to go through the House until it is submitted to the people by a referendum or a general election. I care not which. If it is submitted to the people by means of a referendum, then it should be provided that all classes of opinion in the Dominion of Canada should have an opportunity to pronounce upon it; and that can be arrived at by the simple submission of three questions, namely, whether they are in favour of a contribution; whether they are in favour of a Canadian navy; or whether they are in favour of doing nothing at all. If three such questions were submitted, I think you would get a full expression of opinion from the people of the country. I again emphasize my contention that this being a new departure in our constitutional practice, before it is allowed to go through Parliament the people of the country should be consulted with regard to it.

We have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the people of Canada are not able to construct a navy. I live on the prairies, and I admit that I do not know much about navies or ships, but I do know that the people of the West, irrespective of political opinion, English, Irish, German, Scotch, whatever their origin, are anxious that Canada should have a naval service of her own. I do not think that any man in this House really believes that the people of Canada cannot construct ships. Of course, I do not think we can build a navy in two or three years; but with the experience of the United States to guide us, we need have no fear. Let us remember that in 1893 the United States had only six ships of war, and that since then the United States has become a great naval power, with some fifty ships, all built in the United States and eight large shipyards, constructed and put in operation all in that short period; with that experience of the United States, we Canadians, who are just as good people as those living in the States, can surely start in a small way to build a navy, and have a navy which, in years to come, our children and our children's children will be proud of. Twenty years ago in the States there was no navy. Canada is growing rapidly; our revenue during the past three or four years has increased tremendously. This Parliament would be much more justified in constructing a navy than the Parliament of 1910, because our revenues have increased by about $40,000,000, and are increasing by leaps and bounds. We are therefore to-day in a far better position financially to take some steps towards protecting our own sea-coasts. There is more reason for spending money on a navy than for spending it on militia. We are spending some $10,000,000 annually on the militia. What are we doing it for? Only one country in the world can attack us by land, and that is the United States. We have had a hundred years of peace with that country. Does any man in the Dominion of Canada believe that the United States is going to attack us at any time? I do not believe it for one minute. I believe the statesmen of both countries have too much common sense to think of war taking place between the United States and Canada. Two and a half million dollars of that $10,000,000 is spent on the permanent force of Canada. If it is worth while having a militia in Canada, it is worth while having a proper one. The other seven and a half million dollars are spent on gold lace and other attributes of the militia, which fact perhaps some other hon. gentlemen can explain better than I can. We cannot think of any other country that would attack us by land, so that we are maintaining this whole militia force in Canada for the purpose of preventing attack on the part of the United States. The possibility of that I believe is reduced to a minimum.

We have before us to-day in connection with the naval question in Canada two proposals. One is to send three empty dreadnoughts to Great Britain, which she does not require, and which the First Lord of the Admiralty says she cannot man. We ask Great Britain to increase the burden of the English taxpayer in order to do something we ought to do ourselves. Using exactly the argument used by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in the year 1909, I think it is a policy of shifting the responsibility of the Government of this country on to the Government of Great Britain. The Government of this country thinks it is far easier to send money to Great Britain, to get it out of the country, so that Canada will have no further responsibility in the matter.

The other proposition is to build a Canadian navy. It may be necessary to begin in a small way, but it will grow, and in the course of ten, fifteen or twenty years we shall have reason to be proud of our Canadian navy. We must make a beginning some day; why not now? The hon. the Prime Minister says it will take from a quarter of a century to half a century to construct a Canadian navy. That is a reason why I think we should begin at once. We have a duty to perform; we must protect our fisheries, our coasts and our wheat. How does the Government policy do this? The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) the other night, speaking in favour of a contribution and of the building of the British navy, said: Don't you believe in protecting your own wheat? I certainly believe in protecting our own wheat; but we will never do it on our own coasts unless we have some vessels at Halifax and in that vicinity with which to protect our wheat.

It is argued that sending money to Britain will have a greater moral effect on the nations of the world. I do not believe that. I believe that if it is announced to the world that Canada is equipping and maintaining a navy to protect her own coasts and trade, and to cooperate with the British navy, the effect will be greater. In a few years, how many nations will remember this contribution of $35,000,000? If, however, we have a dozen warships built in this country in the course of four or five years, we shall have something that we can be proud of in the eyes of the world.

There are two classes of Imperialists in this country. One class consists largely of the men who sit in rich men's clubs in the city of Toronto and build empires. The men who are building the British Empire to-day are not the men who talk imperialism in the Tory clubs in the city of Toronto; but they are the brain and the brawn of this country, the farmers, the labouring classes and the artisans. These Imperialists in the city of Toronto—I do not know whether we have any of them in the House or not of that particular type—say: We want a policy of centralization in the Empire. They are the very same men who like mergers and centralization in all kinds of business. Therefore, considering that a policy of centralization is a good one in connection with business, they consider that it would also be a good policy in connection with the building up of the British navy. It is the old Tory doctrine of centralization. I do not believe that that policy of centralization would work well for the British Empire. If we were mixed up, to use a common expression, in the foreign affairs of Great Britain, it would work up a certain amount of ill-feeling between the colonies and Great Britain, and eventually would threaten the disruption of the whole Empire. What better condition of affairs can we have in the British Empire than we have at the present time?

There is another school of imperialsists, to which the great majority of Canadians belong. This school believes that each colony should work out its own destiny within the Empire; that each colony should develop its own resources, equip its own militia and its own navy, and be ready to assist Great Britain in time of need. This seems to me to be a saner form of imperialism and within our reach to-day. There is not a man in the House of Commons who will see an Imperial Parliament in which all the colonies are represented. We have a form of imperialism within our reach which has grown up in this country. The Crown is the cause of it. After all, the Crown is the great bond which binds together the scattered dominions over the whole world. While it is a bond formed largely on sentiment, it has proved itself stronger than armies and navies; it is so strong to-day that should Great Britain request, we would rush to her assistance with all our moral and natural resources.

In addition to Imperial interests, the interests of Canada must also be consulted on a question of this kind, for, after all, the question is what is the best course for Canada to pursue. Her best course is that of looking after Canada first, last, and all the time, and by this course we shall make Canada stronger and more helpful to the Empire.

We have been talking about Canadian nationality and nationhood. Will anybody say that by sending $35,000,000 across the ocean we are strengthening our nationality and nationhood? Let us build up Canada, I say, and make her great in development, great in nationhood; and then, in time of peril in the Empire, we can make ourselves felt.

What can we do in Canada to-day? I say, as I have already said, we can take steps to protect our Pacific coast, and also our Atlantic coast. We are in a position to-day which is not a very proud position for Canada to occcupy. Our coasts are left unguarded; and I believe that every self-respecting Canadian feels that the time has come when the country should afford its own protection on both coasts. By constructing our own navy, we shall develop our own resources. This is the policy that will make Canada stronger and of more assistance to the Empire. It will be a following out of the policy of Canada for Canadians, which hon. gentlemen opposite have so often talked about. That was their great cry in the last election, the general elections of 1911. 'No truck or trade with Yankees.' 'Build up the home market.' What does this policy of sending $35,000,000 to Great Britain do towards building up the home market? We should commence the construction of battleships. It will take two or three years to get the yards ready to construct them in, but when we begin this work of ship-building, we shall give the greatest impetus to the steel industry that this country has ever known. They would not need to come lobbying around the House of Parliament for a bounty if this were done. The Government should begin at once the construction of a navy; the beginning may be small, but we should begin. We should defend Esquimault and Halifax. We should construct large dry-docks, and Canada should be placed in a position to defend herself against any attack upon her shores. This would be consistent with the proud position of Canada to-day and consistent with our own self-respect.

In conclusion, let me briefly summarize my objections to this resolution:

1. It simply means presenting three empty ships to Great Britain, with no provision for manning and maintenance.

2. It increases the burden of the British tax-payer.

3. It shifts the responsibility for the defence of Canada from Canada, where it belongs, to Great Britain.

4. It reverses the policy of all former Canadian Governments, and is a retrograde step in Canadian progress.

5. It is only an expedient and makes no provision for a permanent naval policy.

6. It will prevent the development of ship-building in Canada and the great impetus to the industries in Canada which ship-building would mean.

7. It makes absolutely no provision for the protection of Canadian coasts and Canadian trade.

8. It is a new departure in the history of Canada and it should be submitted to the people.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Victoria, N.B.): I have no apology to offer for addressing the House at this time. In the Liberal party every man has reasons for what he does, and in order that my reasons may be known I offer a few remarks on this question. We have heard hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House recite poetry; we have heard them recite Scripture; we have heard them tell of their own deeds; we have heard them talk of the change from Nationalist to Imperialist; we have heard them talk of the change of the word 'emergency' into 'need' and from 'need' to 'crisis'; but we have not yet heard any reasonable explanation of 'emergency.' From what I can gather from the silence of the Government just now, their motto is : No speeches, and no navy. Within the last few years Canada has on several occasions sent her representatives to the Mother Country to discuss with the leaders there the best means that this country could take to help herself in the way of defence and also to take part in the defence of the Empire. Up to a couple of years ago, the representatives of this Dominion sent over to the Mother Country were agreed upon a policy for the naval defence of Canada. It was decided by Government of that day that a Canadian navy should be built here in Canada. But it appeared to our friends on the other side that the Canadian navy would not meet the views of the jingoes in London and Toronto; so it was decided to find a scheme whereby the Laurier policy could be abandoned. So, we see the Nationalists of Quebec and the jingoes of Toronto putting their heads together. It was decided that the right hon. Prime Minister of this country, the second lieutenant of Mr. Bourassa in the district of Quebec, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, should go to London to consult the British Admiralty. We understand that on their arrival in London, they went to the Lords of the Admiralty and knocked at the door. They were invited in, and they said: We have come here to offer you our gratitude and our money; we understand that you are in great need of money and as a young nation we are ready to give it to you. I am not going to quote the words of Mr. Churchill in this House, for they have already been quoted on several occasions. But it is well for us to know the views of these great statesmen, and I will refer at greater length to what they have said later on. After being in interview with the leaders of the British Government, our representatives came back to Canada with the assurance that the greatest fleet in the world was in the greatest danger. Our Canadian members then decided there was an emergency, and, in order to convince the country they asked the British Government for a memorandum from the Secretary of State for the Colonies. This memorandum was forwarded, and every one has seen it and knows its contents. I am not going to read it to the House, nor am I going to cite it at any greater length. But I desire to say that it is very important that we should know what our friends went to England for. We have here in section 1 of the memorandum, an explanation:

> The Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada has invited His Majesty's Government through the Board of Admiralty to prepare a statement of the present and immediate prospective requirements of the naval defence of the Empire for presentation to the Canadian Parliament if the Dominion Cabinet deem it necessary.

This last line causes me to believe that if the report had not been properly worded to meet the views of our friends the delegates who went to the Mother Country, this memorandum would not have been presented to this House, because it was for 'presentation to the Canadian Parliament if the Dominion Cabinet deem it necessary.' I wish to refer to section 7 of this memorandum, a portion of which reads as follows:

The rapid expansion of Canadian sea borne trade, and the immense value of Canadian cargoes always afloat in British and Canadian bottoms, here require consideration. On the basis of the figures supplied by the board of trade to the Imperial Conference of 1911, the annual value of the overseas trade of the Dominion of Canada in 1909-10 was not less than £72,000,000, and the tonnage of Canadian vessels was 718,000 tons, and these proportions have already increased and are still increasing.

From this memorandum I am convinced not only that there is no emergency, but that the emergency exists only in the minds of a few members of this House, for political purposes only.

The resolution passed in this House in reference to a Canadian navy was a resolution accepted by the Canadian people through their representatives. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) had a Canadian and a British view in that resolution. Since he attained his present office, he has changed his opinion and is now looking at the defence of Canada in the same light as that in which it is viewed by the Unionists in the Mother Country. Does he want us to believe the words he uttered in respect to the Canadian navy in 1909? Let me repeat them:

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do.

Then he goes on:

It goes still further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve or twenty to thirty years you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck, there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the produce of defence.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce also said in March, 1909:

That is the idea which is in my mind—that when we make our contribution in the way of a fixed sum, and it goes from us, and we are not responsible for it, we have none of the inspiration arising from the growth and development of a system of future defence in our own country. We are deprived of the larger benefit ourselves, and in the future we do no greater service to the Empire of which we form a part in this matter of defence.

The first Canadian-owned vessel, built and equipped in Britain, and sent out to defend our coast would become the nucleus and the training ground of Canadian stokers, Canadian sailors and Canadian officers, and by and-by perhaps of a Canadian admiral on the Canadian coast. How much time would be taken in completing that circle none of us can say, but if we begin the tracing of it and follow it fairly faithfully, the time must come when we get a complete circle, and have an Imperial adjunct to the British navy for the defence of Canada and the defence of the Empire, in which Canada has some of her body, her bones, her blood and her mental power and national pride.

As a young member of this House, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to say anything tending to injure the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite. But will the Canadian people put up with the present attitude of these hon. gentlemen? What a change of mind has been evidenced, in so short a time! The mind of the right hon. Prime Minister was not changed after his arrival in England last summer; he and his colleagues landed in the Old Country with their minds made up that the British Empire was in need of money, and that there was a great emergency. The member for North Toronto had to turn a somersault in order that his speech delivered before the holidays would be different from his utterances in March, 1909. He has had to play a double game on this great question; he nicely fulfilled his part as Mr. Hyde in 1909, and he distinguished himself as Dr. Jekyll on the 18th of December last.

I have been surprised at the attitude of the Government upon this question during the last few days. It would seem that the members on the back benches are not prepared to give us the benefit of their opinions in regard to this matter. After such a failure on the part of the hon. ministers in discussing this contribution; after such a failure on the part of hon. gentlemen of the back benches in connection with such an important question, they have all dropped the discussion, and have refused to give to this House and to the Canadian people their convictions on the subject. We all have a duty to perform towards the Mother Country and towards ourselves as Canadian citizens. We in Canada are like a strong and healthy young man sent beyond the seas to settle on Canadian soil. We, as Canadian and British subjects although subject to the British Crown, have property of our own to defend. As loyal subjects of His Majesty King George V, we have been enjoying the protection of the Mother Country for a long period, and the time has now come when our duty, as of a son towards his mother, should be manifested in a decisive manner. Our policy, from my point of view, should be to have for all time to come, a navy of our own, manned by Canadians who will be ever ready to defend their country and the British Empire. In the northern part of the American continent, there is growing a young nation which had already made its mark on land, and, if given an opportunity to do so, will gladly and willingly show its loyality to the Mother Country on the seas. Let us build a navy in Canada; let us spend our own money on our own soil, let the poor labourer who will pay, with other Canadians, this $35,000,000 have an opportunity of earning a small part of this amount. Let the miner contribute by his labour to the construction of a Canadian navy. Let our manufacturer have his share in the profits accruing from the part he would play in the construction of a Canadian navy. Let the young Canadian work to the front in respect of the defence of his glorious country.

The Conservative party has not been a party of progress in the past, and to-day, on this great national question, instead of encouraging the development of our resources and commencing the construction of ships of war, they are seeking to help the Mother Country at the expense of our treasury. According to the statement of the right hon. the Prime Minister we will have to wait for twenty-five or fifty years and in the meantime Canada is to contribute her share in money for the defence of her own coast. The Canadian people will not wait that long. I forsee in the near future a change of government, for our national pride will not longer support a government which has shown on several occasions weakness in fulfilling its duties towards Canada and the Empire.

Mr. HUGH H. McLEAN (Sunbury and Queens): The resolution moved by the Prime Minister in connection with the Bill to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, have been so thoroughly and exhaustively discussed that I would not consider it necessary to take part in this debate were it not that I wish to place on record the reasons why I differ from my party on some of the most essential features of this question. I have been a Liberal, a strong fighting Liberal for over thirty-five years, and I intend to remain a member of that great party. I am taking now the same position as I did in 1910 in the debate on the Canadian naval question. I then advocated two dreadnoughts to be included in the fleet units that we were to furnish. I then thought, and I still think, that Canada must be represented in the fighting line with the best warships that can be built. I am against the question of naval or military defence being made a political question. The large petitions signed by leading Liberals and Conservatives that have been presented to the leaders of the two great Canadian parties should have received favourable consideration. As far as I am personally concerned on all questions concerning naval and military assistance to be given to Great Britain I shall take an independent, and I hope and pray I shall take a loyal stand. As an ardent Imperialist I may, and probably in the opinion of my friends, will take too extreme a position. Under our great leader members of the Liberal party are allowed to take an independent position and discuss freely all questions that come before the House. No party whip has been used on me in this matter, nor was it used in the debate of 1910; full and free liberty of action and speech is given to all members of the Liberal party.

I am strongly in favour of a settlement of this question. I was very much impressed with the proposal made by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Hugh Guthrie). He suggested as a basis of settlement between the two parties, that two dreadnaughts be built in England, and, I understand, loaned to England, and two fleet units be proceeded with and built in Canada. The hon. gentleman forcibly urged the settlement of this question, even at a sacrifice to both sides. He pointed out that if our action is going to give any moral support to Great Britain, it should be a united action.

I will quote one paragraph from that part of the hon. gentleman's speech:

> My voice may be powerless in the matter, probably will be powerless in the matter, but I think it is a matter which ought to be drawn very pointedly to the attention of the House. If our action is going to give any moral support to Great Britain or to the Empire it has to be on different lines from those we are now following.
> If we can bridge the gulf, the chasm, by all means let us do so even if there be some sacrifice on both sides, both in regard to the Government's proposal and in regard to that of my right hon. friend, upon the line that I have suggested as the only line that now occurs to me and there may be others.

My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) also proposed terms of settlement. He said:

> Let us build the second-class cruisers; let them build the dreadnoughts; $35,000,000 spent on cruisers would be just as valuable to Great Britain as $35,000,000 spent on dreadnoughts. She needs cruisers; she is building cruisers continually. She is building cruisers to-day, and she is spending not $35,000,000, but $135,000,000 on cruisers. Let us build the cruisers which we can build, and let her build the dreadnoughts.

I now come to a plan proposed by the gallant major, my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe), as a basis of compromise. Let me read it:

> In conclusion, I desire to again state, on my own authority as an individual member of this House, and without attempting to commit my party in any way, that I re-affirm the position I took in 1910. I believe it would be proper to have a combination of both the propositions which have been submitted. I think we should have an immediate contribution, as outlined in the proposal of the right hon. leader of the Government to meet the present emergency, and that when the Government forms its permanent policy they should adopt a plan which will involve the principle of a Canadian navy. The two policies now before the House are not contradictory, but are complementary, one to another. The adoption of such a plan as I suggest would remove the naval question from the arena of politics—a consummation so greatly desired by leading members of both parties—and place it upon a plane of enlightened citizenship and patriotism. The fact that the Liberal party has suggested two fleet units as their policy does not necessarily mean that the policy is wrong; it may be that they have at last stumbled upon the right policy. Sir Sir Oliver Mowat, in his early days, would steal the clothes of his political opponents and appropriate from them whatever he could obtain. Whether the Government, in formulating its permanent policy, should adopt, with certain modifications, the proposition of our Liberal friends, is a matter worthy of consideration. If this were done, it would remove these national and Imperial questions from the cockpit of contentious politics, would satisfy the demand for immediate assistance, and carry out what I consider to be the aspirations of the Canadian people for the establishing of a great ship-building industry within the borders of our own country.

As I understand his proposal, it is that both parties should unite to make the offer of three dreadnoughts unanimous; then, that the other vessels required for a Canadian naval service be built in Canada, manned and maintained by Canada. I must say I like the offer the hon. gentleman makes. It is an olive branch held out which, if accepted by the leaders, would bring about a settlement. I am strongly in favour of a settlement of this great question.

I thoroughly approve of the independent and loyal stand taken by the hon. member, and I would join my voice with his, in asking the two leaders to have a conference and try to settle the points of difference. Let us drop politics out of this great question; let us no longer make a football of our Canadian naval service, or of the assistance we should give to the Empire. In England, all matters connected with or affecting the army and navy are discussed and settled by the two great parties in a fair and amicable spirit. Why could not a special committee be selected, and appointed, called the Canadian Defence Committee, composed of representatives of both parties, and including the two leaders, to whom all questions relating to our naval and militia service should be referred? Let us forgive and forget the past and start square. Why not go back to the resolution of March 29, 1909, which was passed unanimously in this House, and unite in creating an effective Canadian naval service giving to Great Britain such naval assistance as that which the Admiralty might advise?

Could we not get together on a plan of settlement, such as the following: Carry out the Government's resolution, and adopt the recommendation of the Board of Admiralty that is contained in their memorandum submitted to our Government, paragraph 10, by building 'the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build, or money supply?' Let us agree to make the number three, instead of two, as suggested by the hon. member for South Wellington; then let this special Defence Committee be appointed, and let them take up and decide all the details of the Canadian naval service, our contribution to Imperial defence, and the form that the permanent naval defence force of Canada should take. This would require very careful study, and the advice and the assistance of the best Admiralty experts. The committee should have power to sit during the parliamentary recess, and should visit England, so as to obtain at first hand the best and most reliable information and advice. They should be prepared to make a full report at the next session of Parliament, and both parties being united as to the scheme to be adopted, it could be submitted to the people by a plebiscite. I believe now, that if the right hon. the leader of the Government, and the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, sat down together for an hour, they could, if they wished, formulate an Imperial defence policy that would meet with the approval of all loyal people, or at least agree on a basis of settlement.

It is the duty of the members of this House, it is the duty of the Liberal members, to accept the word of the right hon. the leader of the Government when he takes the responsibility of making the statement on the floor of this House that the advice which he has given with regard to the form which the assistance shall take and the kind of ships that are to be built is practically the advice that he has received from the Admiralty.

I want the party leaders to show themselves in the true white light of public opinion as Imperial statesmen. Let them rise above the mists of party politics. Let the people of our great parties be united as to the assistance to be given to Great Britain and as to our Canadian naval defence policy. The right hon. the leader of the Government has had the benefit of long consultations with the Admiralty, and there is no doubt that in deciding as to the policy that has been put before the House he has been guided by the advice of the Admiralty, and that they wish us to build three of the best ships that can be built.

In the naval debate in 1910 I advocated two dreadnoughts or battle cruisers, so that Canada would be represented in the fighting line. I was against the proposal of the then leader of the Opposition to simply give money to the British Admiralty to spend as they might see fit. I thought then, and I still think, that we should have the best fighting ships that can be built, and that they should be owned by Canada and as soon as we can train men to man them they should be manned and maintained by Canada. I said then, I say now, that we have a large force of men in Canada that might be trained to man these ships and it is our duty as soon as we possibly can, to get the benefits of the material that we have within our own shores.

Hon. gentlemen who have studied the naval question during the past two or three years will have noticed the great changes made in the construction of battleships, and also in naval strategy. The old maxim of Lord Nelson is now adopted by the Admiralty, namely: 'Concentrate your battleships and scatter your cruisers.' I see that hon. gentlemen of my party propose that cruisers of the Bristol type shall be built for the fleet unit. This class of vessel has been found by the Admiralty to be too expensive for the purpose for which it is intended. Cruisers are the eyes and ears of the battle fleet. The Bristol type is expensive to build, expensive to maintain, and it has been indicated by the Admiralty not to lay down any more vessels of that class. The Admiralty has now adopted instead what is called the light armoured cruiser type. I merely mention this to show the marvellous changes which have taken place in the construction of war vessels. That which was a proper naval policy three years ago, when the right hon. the then leader of the Government was advised by the Admiralty to have two fleet units and to have vessels of the Bristol type, would not be a proper policy to-day, and the British Admiralty would not now so advise the Prime Minister of Canada. Mr. Churchill, in describing the eight small armoured cruisers now under construction for the fleet, said:

> They will be the smallest, cheapest and fastest vessels protected by vertical armour ever projected for the British navy. They are designed for attendance on the battle fleet. They are designed to be its eyes and ears by night and day, to watch over it in movement and at rest. They will be strong enough to overhaul and cut down any torpedo destroyer afloat, and generally they will be available for the purposes of observation and reconaissance.

The Admiralty in the building of these small cruisers are recognizing the fact that wireless telegraphy has largely replaced cruisers for fleet work, and the work of a cruiser to-day is either to support the torpedo destroyer attacks or to protect their own battle squadrons from them. In the Navy League Annual it is stated that the realization of this strategical fact has terminated protected cruiser contribution in England. The Bristol type is what is called the protected cruiser type. The protected cruiser type is the class that has protected deck construction, and without heavy side armour protection. The Navy League Annual, in speaking as to this class of light armoured cruiser, states that they possess several unique qualities:

> 1. Sufficient speed to run down the fastest destroyer except in perfectly calm water.
> 2. An armament against which no destroyer built or projected could stand up.
> 3. Protection along the sides to keep out the shells of any guns as yet mounted in any destroyers, and except at close range, proof against the six-inch gun.
> 4. A displacement enabling them to hold the sea long after stress of weather has driven the largest destroyers into shelter.

This type is to be the screen of future battle fleets, and the number to be built is to be largely increased next year and the year after.

I have brought to the attention of the House the particulars concerning this new type of scout cruisers to show hon. gentlemen how quickly changes are made in the type of war vessels, and to specially impress the fact that the expensive Bristol type is being replaced by these cheaper and more economically run vessels. The Bristol type, as hon. gentlemen will remember, was 430 feet long, 4,820 tons, 22,000 horsepower, 25 knots speed, with two 6-inch guns and ten 4-inch guns, and cost about $1,200,000.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CANADIAN EXPLOSIVES, LIMITED.

House in Committee on Bill No. 9, respecting Canadian Explosives, Limited.—Mr. Ames. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. OLIVER: The promoter of this Bill was not here at the last sitting of the House when the Bill was called. Has he given an explanation of the Bill to the committee?

Mr. AMES: Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to give as full an explanation as members desire to have. The matter was discussed on Monday night and a great deal of information was given by the Prime Minister. I am willing, however, to repeat that information and add possibly something further to it, if the House so desires. If what was already said is taken, and any additional information is desired, I shall be glad to give that on question by any hon. member.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. member simply state what is the object of the Bill?

Mr. AMES: This Bill, No. 9, is to permit Canadian Explosives, Limited, which is a very well known company in Canada with a large capitalization, to issue a certain proportion of the stock in share warrants. This practice prevails in Great Britain and in Europe to a very considerable extent. The Bill, which the hon. members now have before them, follows almost identically the British Act, which the hon. member for St. John has in his hand at the present time, about the only difference being that one clause is omitted which prevents directors from qualifying by the ownership of share warrants; there is an additional clause added here. Share warrants are not yet provided for in our Companies Act. When the Companies Act is amended, in all probability, clauses will be inserted as there have been in the Companies Acts of Ontario, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. Consequently, when a company desires to issue share warrants, the only way they can do it is to have their incorporation by letters patent amended by this House or by a provincial legislature to permit them so to do. This Bill is on all fours, and I think (to do. This Bill is in all fours, and I think is verbally identical with three Bills that have already been passed for instance the Bill passed for the Mexican Light, Heat and Power Company, and the Bill for the Rio de Janiero Power Company. Those Bills were introduced in this House in 1907 by the hon. member for West Middlesex at that time (Mr. Calvert), and some explanations were given, but no very extended discussion. If it is desired, I am prepared to deal with any phase that is spoken of in the several clauses of the Bill. The company simply asks the right to issue a certain portion of stock as share warrants. A share warrant is a stock certificate; it is really a sort of certificate of ownership, the possession of which is sufficient proof of ownership. The name of the bearer need not be inserted in the stock certificate, nor does the name of the man owning the stock need to be entered on the books of the company. A share warrant is transferable like a bank note. Coupons for the interest are usually attached to the share warrants. Where coupons are attached to a share warrant of preferred stock with a regular recognized quarterly dividend, the amount is sometimes specified; where it is common stock in which the dividend is more or less problematical, the dividend coupons are numbered to correspond with the share warrant, and then they are marked: 'Dividend No. 1,' 'Dividend No. 2,' 'Dividend No. 3'; and when the amount of interest and the place where it is payable is advertised in the newspapers, the holder of the coupon presents the coupon for say 'Dividend No. 1' and secures his dividend. The owner of a share warrant at any time can present it at one of the recognized offices of the company, it can be recorded and a general stock certificate issued in its place, with his name registered on the books of the company. The owner of a share warrant for the time being is cancelled out of the list of names of the shareholders of the company. If there should happen to be a meeting of shareholders, he could not vote, unless three days before the meeting he presents his share warrant and receives in lieu thereof a written permission to vote. He votes and then he returns the written permission, and secures his share warrant again.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What proportion of the stock is to be issued in share warrants?

Mr. AMES: The proportion will depend on the demand for the stock in the foreign markets. This is a Canadian company of about $15,000,000 capitalization, $7,500,000 being preferred stock and the same amount common stock. A very considerable proportion of that preferred stock is held by foreign buyers. This share warrant is a form particularly desirable in Belgium, I am so informed, where there are a good many investors. The principal advantage is that the owner of a share warrant does not have to go to the trouble of registering it in his name in the books of the company; but possession of the scrip is taken as legal proof that he is entitled to the dividend or entitled to exchange the share warrant at any time for a regular stock certificate.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Any holder of a share warrant can be a director.

Mr. AMES: No holder of a share warrant can vote as the Bill stands at present, although the Bill does not specify that he cannot become a director. The English Act does specify that in particular. If the House wants to add that to the Bill, it can easily be done. I have a copy of the share warrant that is intended to be issued by this company; it is the one issued by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. It reads:

This is to certify that the bearer of this warrant is entitled to.....fully paid-up share of .....dollars in the above-named company, subject to the regulations of the company and to the conditions endorsed hereon.

Then follow all the regulations connected with it, so that the holder of a share warrant has printed on the back of his warrant the regulations under which it is held, so that there can be no chance of deceit when it is being transferred from one person to another. Share warrants are now sold of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, the Montreal Heat and Power Company, the Mexican Light Heat and Power Company and the Rio de Janiero Company, and I presume other companies, because the provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia have legislation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difficulty that presents itself to my mind in this Bill is that it is not subject to any general provisions either in the Companies' Act, which is silent upon the subject, in the articles of incorporation, or in the bylaws. There is nothing at all definite about the conditions under which share warrants may be issued; that is a matter left entirely to the directors to deal with from time to time. It seems to me that the conditions under which share warrants shall be issued ought to be laid down in at all events the bylaws of the company, so that these provisions would form part of the constitution of the company, which could only be altered by the shareholders. My hon. friend, if he turns to the Companies' Act of England, will see that it is all provided for in the articles of incorporation. I will read section 37, subsection 3, of the English Act:

It is provided that the bearer of a share warrant shall, subject to the articles of the company, be entitled, on surrendering it for cancellation, to have his name entered as a member in the register of members; and the company shall be responsible for any loss incurred by any person by reason of the company entering in its register the name of a bearer of a share warrant in respect of the shares of stock therein specified without the warrant being surrendered and cancelled.

Section 4 was substantially the same as this except that the conditions are not prescribed in the articles of incorporation—of course, they would not be unless they were in this company's letters patent—nor by by-law. But under this section 4 it is provided:

The bearer of a share warrant may, if the directors so determine, be deemed to be a shareholder of the company within the meaning of the Companies' Act.

There is the difference between the English Act and the provisions of this Bill. In this case, the directors may from time to time determine what conditions are to apply. Then, by section 6 of this Bill which is different from the English Company's Act, it is provided more specifically:

The directors may determine the conditions upon which share warrants shall be issued, and in particular upon which a new share warrant or coupon will be issued in the place of one worn out, defaced, lost or destroyed, and the conditions under which the bearer of a share warrant shall be entitled to attend and vote at general meetings, and upon which a share warrant may be surrendered and the name of the holder entered in the books of the company in respect of the shares therein specified.

My hon. friend will see that the directors of the company must issue a vast number of share warrants, even the majority of the capital stock of the company must be held in share warrants, and the holders of the warrants would have no voice in the management of the company, while the board of directors might represent only a minortity interest, and even a very small minority interest, and might determine the conditions upnder which the holders of the share warrants should have the power to vote or take part in the management of the affairs of the company. This clearly is not right. No power should be given to the board of directors to determine these matters from time to time by mere will or the caprice of the moment. I think the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has had a large experience in affairs of this kind and has an unusually great knowledge of company law, will agree that in making a new departure—because this Parliament has not seen fit to embody such provisions in the Joint Stock Companies Act—there ought to be something definite as to conditions under which all the shareholders shall be informed and which cannot be altered from time to time at the will of the directors. I submit that at all events section 4 ought to be changed so as to provide that the holders of share warrants may be under the protection of the by-laws of the company. Make it read, 'If the by-laws of the company so state.'

Mr. AMES: There would be no objection, if the hon. member for St. John thought it desirable, to have the conditions under which these share warrants are issued endorsed upon the warrants themselves. In that way, the holder would understand exactly the terms upon which it is issued.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then it would be necessary to alter the provisions of the Bill, because the directors, while they might put the conditions upon the back of the share warrants, might alter them the next day.

Mr. AMES: Not with regard to the warrants already out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think so under this Bill. That is a great deal of power to give the directors. In the case of a company incorporated under the English Joint Stock Companies Act, it would be provided in the articles of incorporation what percentage of the shares might be issued as share warrants. But in this Bill there is no limit, and practically all the capital stock of the company might be represented by share warrants, the holders of which would have no voice in the affairs of the company, while the actual management might be in the hands of a body of men representing a very small interest. It seems to me that this Bill is worthy of the consideration of the Government, which is responsible for legislation in this House whether that legislation be of a public character or of a private character. I do not wish to raise factious opposition to this Bill, but it occurs to me that it is my duty to throw out these suggestions for the consideration of my hon. friend who is promoting the Bill and of the members of the Government.

Mr. AMES: I think the House will have to consider the position in which the promoters of this Bill found themselves. If there were any legislation on the federal statute books dealing with all share warrants, then the parties who ask for this privilege would be perfectly willing to come under all clauses of any such Act. And if and when this Parliament sees fit to enact as part of the law of the land provisions regulating share warrants, this and other companies which may have secured this privilege, will, I think, be perfectly willing to submit themselves to whatever regulations in this respect Parliament in its wisdom shall impose. But now, this company has only one method of proceeding. This is an old company, chartered by letters-patent, and it is asking for a privilege which it cannot get in any other way. The only way is by engrafting upon their present letters-patent under which they do business the provision desired. It is not as though they could come to this House and ask for a de novo Bill, including a large number of precautionary measures with respect to share warrants. They can only follow the precedent which was set in other cases. The same Bill was passed for the Mexican Light, Heat and Power Company and also for the Rio de Janeiro Company, which, at that time, were promised by Mr. Carvell. That company adopts the identical procedure adopted in those cases. And I understand they are willing to submit themselves to any general legislation that may be introduced. The Bill is open to the consideration of those hon. members who have had experience in corporation matters, and I would be prepared to receive the suggestions of the hon. member for St. John. In order that the conditions of the share warrants should be laid down by the directors, I would be willing to have them proceed by by-law. Or I am willing that the conditions under which these warrants are held shall be inscribed on the share warrants themselves, so that the holder may know exactly the conditions under which he has secured them. This company has two kinds of stock, the preference and the common, in equal quantity; and according to their letters-patent, the voting power is not with the preferred stock, and it is their intention at the present, to issue these shareholders entirely on preferred stock, though they may subsequently issue it also on common stock. Their letters of incorporation say that the preferential shares shall not confer on their holders the right to attend or vote either in person or by proxy at the general meetings of the shareholders of the company, or to have notice of such meeting unless the meeting is convened with respect to a matter which directly affects the preferential shareholders.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the hon. member be willing to change section 3 to read as follows:

The bearer of the share warrant shall, subject to conditions to be determined by the by-laws of the company——

Mr. AMES: Certainly, but I presume the hon. gentleman is willing to allow us to consider the Bill clause by clause, and to make the suggestion when that particular clause is reached.

Mr. HAZEN: Might I ask my hon. friend if he knows what provision there is, if any, in the English Act as to the proportion of stock for which a share warrant could be issued?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think this would be determined by the articles of the company.

Mr. AMES: There is nothing in the English Act on that point, the only provision being that only a limited liability company, the amount of whose shares is distinctly known, can use this privilege.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then, if my hon. friend accepts the view I have presented, he would probably have to alter section 1 so as to correspond in some respects with section 37 of the English Act. This would probably deal with the question proposed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Section 37, subsection 1, of the English Act is as follows:

A company limited by shares, if so authorized by its articles, may, with respect to any fully paid-up shares, or to stock, issue under its common seal, a warrant.

I assume that these articles would provide as to the proportion of stock which might be issued by virtue of share warrants.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it not the intention of the Government to revise the Companies Act?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, but it is doubtful whether this can be done during the present session.

Mr. OLIVER: The promoter of the Bill has stated that in this particular case the company requires or intends to use only the special provisions of this Act in relation to that part of their shares in regard to which they now apply the same provisions. That is to say, as I understand this Bill, the purpose of the share warrant is to exclude the holder from voting.

Mr. AMES: That is not the purpose.

Mr. OLIVER: That is the result, at any rate. At the present time this company does exclude the holder of preferred shares from voting. It is intended that share warrants shall be issued only in regard to preferred shares. If the Bill confines itself to that feature of the case, it would be a special Act for a special purpose, and as the Bill stands at the present time, it is practically a general Act applying only to a special company. It does seem to me that this is not good legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON: It is not of general application.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not of general application, but it is of a general nature. When Parliament decides that it is desirable to pass general legislation providing for share warrants, that will be well and good. Up to the present time, however, Parliament has not so decided, and I think the promoter would be well advised if he restricted this Bill to that feature of the case which it is evident the shareholders actually desire.

Mr. AMES: Perhaps I can give the hon. member the information he desires by reading the following letter, which I have received from the promoter:

My understanding is that Canadian Explosives Limited will probably only issue share warrants with reference to its outstanding preferred shares, and therefore the conditions will refer definitely to fixed dates of payments, which I understand are quarterly.

Further on he says:

In the case of Canadian Explosives Limited the holder of a share warrant covering preferred shares will of course be deprived of the right of voting, save and except in the special cases which are provided for in the company's charter, where the preferred shareholder is to have the right of voting.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Can share warrants of common stock be issued in respect of other companies?

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. AMES: Yes, it is often done in England. The hon. member for Edmonton is evidently under the impression that this Bill embodies unusual procedure, but I have endeavoured to show him that it is very common in England, and that such matters have been covered by legislation in most of the provinces. It is only the fact that such general legislation has not been passed by this House which forces the company to come here and ask for the special privilege.

Mr. OLIVER The fact that Parliament has, whether for good reason or bad, not provided such general legislation, is a sufficient reason why it should not be granted in a special case. I have no desire to obstruct the Bill, but I would suggest to my hon. friend that if he will make this Bill applicable only to the preferred stock, any difficulty that might arise in regard to the matter would be readily overcome.

Mr. MACDONALD: The point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton is one which could have been dealt with by this Bill much more satisfactorily if the company had come to Parliament for the purpose of getting new legislation creating them a company under a special Act. The anomaly of this legislation exists in the fact that a company which has been incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, and which has chosen that particular method of coming into existence, asks Parliament to confer upon it supplementary powers. If it came to Parliament and asked that a special Act be passed declaring that the company had corporate rights and privileges under the same name, but entirely apart from the Joint Stock Companies Act, we would avoid the anomaly which lies at the basis of this legislation. I care not whether it has been done once, twice, or a dozen times, it is bad practice for this Parliament to give by special Act, to a company created under the Joint Stock Companies Act, supplementary powers which other companies cannot obtain.

Mr. AMES: Unless other companies get it in the same way.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not quite see the point.

Mr. AMES: Other companies wishing to obtain it can get it in the same way as it was obtained by this company.

Mr. MACDONALD: They should come to Parliament and be created a company by Act of Parliament apart altogether from the Joint Stock Companies Act. Parliament could create the company giving them corporate rights to take over the property, rights and powers of the Canadian Explosives, Limited, and, by a special Act, set out the rights of the new company. This has been done frequently in the legislatures of the provinces and in this Parliament, and that is the way this legislation should have been initiated, instead of supplementing by Act of Parliament the general powers contained in the Joint Stock Companies Act. How is anyone in the active practice of the law, undertaking to advise a client with regard to the rights existing in respect of the Canadian Explosives Company five years after this, to tell exactly what those rights are, except by means of an exhaustive search through the records of Bill legislation in this House? because this company would be sailing under false colours, under the colour of being a corporation created by the Joint Stock Companies Act, that would be the flag that was flying, whereas if incorporated under a special Act of Parliament you could go to the special Act and know where you were. That was the trouble with this legislation, and I first raised exception to it on the ground I am now stating. My hon. friend has referred to certain other companies that have obtained these rights in Nova Scotia. They have obtained them not because they were Joint Stock Companies Act companies but because they had special Acts conferring these rights on them.

Mr. AMES: The specimen share warrant I have here, intended to be embodied exactly, is that of the Dominion Steel Company.

Mr. MACDONALD: The point is that the Dominion Steel Company did not get the right to issue share warrants by virtue of being incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act or of a special Act passed supplementary to the Joint Stock Companies Act, but because they held a special Act of incorporation granted them under the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia which contains in it the right of issuing these share warrants. That is the ground I take. Where does this company do business and who are its directors?

Mr. AMES: The company does business primarily in Montreal and I think Mr. William McMaster is its president.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are their works?

Mr. AMES: I think there are a number of them. The Hamilton Powder Company were their predecessors. It is an old company. This is an amalgamation of several companies engaged in the manufacture of powder and explosives.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In some respects I entirely agree with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) but not in the application of what he has said to this Bill. Last session and this session one or two Bills were introduced changing the names of companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, and I made the objection at the time that this was very objectionable legislation. The time of Parliament should not be taken up, neither should our statute-books be occupied with legislation of that character when they could have the name of the company changed under the provisions of the Companies Act. In this particular case, as the hon. member for St. Antoine has pointed out, there being no provision in the Companies Act relating to the issuance of share warrants they have no recourse but to Parliament for that power and consequently I think the point taken by the hon. member for Pictou fails in that respect. It would be objectionable to have companies coming to Parliament any more than we can help and obtaining their full powers in the form of a statute, but I would make this suggestion that the Government should introduce a Bill providing for amendments to the Companies Act and empowering the issue of share warrants by all companies and then we would be rid of these special Bills day after day. Such a Bill could be prepared in an hour. I remember that in the second last Parliament a Bill was introduced to amend the Companies Act so as to grant companies the power to issue share warrants. That Bill passed this House but was defeated in the Senate and I have always thought it was unfortunate that it met such a fate. I would suggest that the Government consider this and introduce a Bill at an early date giving to companies the power sought for under this Bill, which are very proper powers, and are necessary in the ordinary course of business of many companies in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think there is anything exceptional or unusual in a company that is incorporated under the Companies Act coming to Parliament for the purpose of getting powers that it is found desirable the company should have for the purpose of satisfactorily carrying on its business and which it is unable to obtain under the Companies Act. There are many precedents for that practice, both in this Parliament and in the legislatures. In New Brunswick, when my hon. friend and colleague from St. John was Attorney General and subsequently when I was Attorney General of that province, certain powers were given to companies originally incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Letters Patent Act, powers which they found necessary in order to carry on their business. It has been recognized by the provincial and Dominion Parliaments that provision be made so that joint stock companies incorporated under the Companies Act shall have the power to issue the share certificates. That would indicate that it is desirable for the proper carrying on of the business of companies such as this that that power should be given to them, and it was only to obtain that power that it cannot obtain under the Companies Act that the company comes to this Parliament. Similar power has been granted in three other cases here. That being the case, what valid objection can there be to this Parliament granting a similar power to the company now seeking it, provided the Bill now submitted by the company is properly drawn and provides the proper safeguards. I think it would be well to guard this Bill in the line suggested making the provision that these certificates can only be issued by by-laws of the company. That could easily be done, I understand the hon. member for St. Antoine is quite willing it should be done and in that case it is hard to understand why this Parliament should refuse to this company the same privilege it has granted to previous companies some years before. We will all agree with the hon. member for Halifax that: it is desirable that companies incorporated under the Companies Act should have the power to issue these stock certificates and that the Companies Act should be amended so as to make provision therefor. There are a number of respects in which the Companies Act will have to be amended. It has not been amended for some years past. New matters have developed, new legislation has taken place in other countries. There have been developments following along the line of the company law of this country and it is evident that the Act, in the near future, will have to be carefully considered with the view of incorporating into it the provisions which are necessary to meet the altered conditions that have sprung up in the last few years. While it would be an easy matter, as pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), to draft an amendment that would simply meet a case such as that under consideration, so as to enable companies that are incorporated under the Companies' Act to issue share certificates, yet, at the same time, it might be better instead of dealing with the Act piecemeal, to have a thorough revision at another session of Parliament in order to have time to consider the different changes that may be desirable in the public interest.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am glad that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) is clear in the view that it is desirable to amend the Bill along the lines which I suggested. But it seems to me that there is one other amendment which ought to be made and that would be along the lines which are followed in section 37 of the regulations which form a part of the English Joint Stock Companies' Act. My hon. friend will see that, if this Bill were to pass, the holders of share warrants would have absolutely no voice in the management of the company. If anything was going wrong and they wanted to have a meeting of shareholders, they could not have that meeting because, under this Bill, to all intents and purposes, they will cease to be shareholders and will be the holders of share warrants.

Mr. AMES: Could they not present their share warrants and get stock certificates?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They might not want to do that. Here is a very valuable provision in the English regulations which forms a part of the English Joint Stock Companies' Act:

> The bearer of a share warrant may at any time deposit the warrant at the office of the company, and so long as the warrant remains so desposited, the depositor shall have the same right of signing a requisition for calling a meeting of the company, and of attending and voting and exercising the other privileges of a member at any meeting held after the expiration of two clear days from the time of deposit, as if his name were inserted in the register of members as the holder of the shares included in the deposited warrant. Not more than one person shall be recognized as depositor of the share warrant. The company shall, on two days' written notice, return the deposited share warrant to the depositor.

This is a most valuable provision. It gives the holders of share warrants the right, if at any time they think there should be a meeting called, to have that meeting called, to attend, vote and take part in the affairs of the company. But under this Bill, if it passes, the very moment a shareholder accepts a share warrant, he, ipso facto, ceases, for all practical purposes, to be a member of the company, has no voice in the administration of affairs, and no right to have a meeting to have the affairs of the company investigated.

Mr. AMES: On the back of the certificate I have here, the clause in the English regulations that the hon. gentleman has quoted is copied almost verbatim.

Mr. PUGSLEY: All the more necessity there is for placing it in the Bill.

Mr. AMES: I will read it:

> The bearer of a warrant, upon depositing the warrant at the office, or such other place as the directors shall appoint, not less than three days before any meeting of the company, shall receieve a ticket or proxy authorizing him to attend and vote and exercise the rights of a member at such meeting in respect of the share or shares for which the warrant or warrants has been so deposited, and after the meeting the warrant or warrants shall be returned to him or to the bearer of the ticket or proxy upon surrender thereof.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no doubt that has been copied from the conditions endorsed upon the share warrant of an English company?

Mr. AMES: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is part of the law in England and while we are legislating for a highly respectable company, by whom the rights of the holders of share warrants will be protected, we are at the same time creating a precedent. We have been told that three other companies have obtained this privilege and if we pass this Bill the next gentleman promoting a Bill of this kind will say there are four companys which have received this privilege. It becomes more and more a precedent and it is one which ought not to be continued.

Mr. BARNARD: Is the regulation that the hon. gentleman is reading from part of table A of the English Companies' Act, or a section of the Act itself?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a schedule to table A.

Mr. BARNARD: I think that the regulations of table A are merely bylaws and in addition there is a provision in the section of the Act relating to share warrants. These regulations are, under the English Act, almost invariably followed in the incorporation of a company, but they may or may not contain the provision of which the hon. gentleman speaks.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That may be so, but it seems to me that is a most valuable provision to make, and my hon. friend who is promoting the Bill seems to admit that it is a proper one. If it is it should be put in the statute. Schedule A forms a part of the statute. What does my hon. friend mean by saying that these regulations can be done away with?

Mr. BARNARD: What I mean is that, in incorporating companies under the English Joint Stock Companies' Act, unless the shareholders who are incorporating the company adopt a different set of regulations, the regulations in table A will apply to the company. But it is altogether optional with the incorporators of the company whether they shall or shall not adopt table A. If they do not they are entitled to make any such regulations for the internal government of the company as they see fit, provided these regulations are not ultra vires and do not go beyond the scope of the Act itself. The sections of the Act which give permission for the issuing of share warrants expressly provide for the inclusion of such a regulation as the hon. gentleman has just read to the House, but it is wholly within the option of the shareholders incorporating the company as to whether they shall or shall not adopt such a regulation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend, no doubt, is right as to that; but that can be altered only by the articles of association which form part of the constitution of the company. Are not these articles of association subject to the approval of the registrar under the Joint Stock Companies' Act of England.

Mr. BARNARD: I do not think so. These articles of association must be signed and printed in the same way as the memorandum of association and every shareholder of the company is held to have notice of the regulations. When he buys his shares he is supposed to know what is in the regulations. As long as these regulations do not give the shareholders power to do anything that is ultra vires of the company under the conditions the regulations are binding on the shareholders.

On section 1—issue of share warrants:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I presume that my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) would move that the section be altered by inserting after the word 'may' in line two, the words 'if so provided for by the bylaws.'

Mr. AMES: Yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—surrender and cancellation:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Section 3 should be amended so as to read:

The bearer of the share warrant shall, subject to the by-laws of the company, be entitled to surrender, etc.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—to what extent bearer is to be deemed shareholder:

Mr. PUGSLEY: This section reads: 'If the directors by by-law so determine.' I would not let the directors make the bylaws; it should read: 'if the by-laws so provide.'

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—directors may vary conditions of issue:

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is objectionable to allow the conditions under which a person holds a share warrant to be altered after the warrant is issued, and I therefore suggest that the words 'before or after' be stricken out.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The same provisions are in the English articles of association, and they have been pretty well tried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If they are in the English articles, I would not perhaps object to them. Line 1 should be amended to read: 'The by-laws shall determine the conditions,' instead of, 'the directors may determine.'

Mr. AMES: Very well.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. HUGH H. McLEAN (Sunbury and Queens): I was very much impressed with the speech of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). I know he is a parliamentary fighter, and I was pleased to see that on this question he is in favour of an understanding between the parties. He is in favour of a Canadian naval service or a Canadian navy; he is in favour of our ships being built in Canada; he is in favour of the resolution before the House, that Canada should build in Great Britain three of the strongest and best ships that money and science can procure. He wants the Government and the Liberal party to unite their policies on this matter, and he gave a very apt illustration, saying:

> I like to see them run
> Like the horses of the sun,
> All abreast.

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be a grand thing if the two parties in Canada should, in all Imperial matters, and on all questions relating to naval assistance to the Motherland, follow that motto, and like the horses of the sun, run all abreast.

I have endeavoured during the last three years, which included two trips to England, to obtain all the information I could respecting naval matters and I must admit that the more I study this subject the more convinced I become of how incompetent the layman is to form a correct opinion as to the requirements of the naval service. The Admiralty are revising and continually changing their policy. The British navy has made greater strides during the last five years than ever before in the history of the nation.

Let me give an example of the evolution of the British battleship, commencing with the year 1856: the Thunderbolt, 1,973 tons; speed, five knots; length, 186 feet; guns, sixteen, muzzle-loading; cost £80,000. The size and cost steadily increased year by year until we come to the best of the pre-dreadnought type, viz., the King Edward VII and Lord Nelson, 1905-1907. There were ten of this class: 16,350 tons, 18,000 horse-power; speed 18 knots; length, 425 feet; armament, four 12-inch guns, four 9-inch guns, ten 6-inch guns; weight of single discharge 5,920 pounds; cost £1,473,245. The dreadnought type was invented in 1906-1907. The outstanding feature of the dreadnought type is its gun power and speed. Hitherto no modern battleship had been constructed carrying more than four 12-inch guns or of a greater speed than 18¼ knots. In the dreadnought ten 12-inch guns were mounted, higher from the water and therefore with a better command than the King Edward type, a greater resisting power, three knots more of speed and increased radius, her bunker capacity being sufficient to enable her to steam about 5,080 sea miles at an economical speed and about three thousand sea miles at 18½ knots. Also, in order to protect the ship from under-water explosion, the hull was divided into an increased number of water-tight compartments. Eight of the 12-inch guns could be fired on either broadside, and four or six 12-inch guns could be fired ahead or astern. The dreadnought herself was sixty-five feet longer and four feet broader than the King Edward; the cost was £1,813,100.

The result of the building of the dreadnought was that Germany and other nations stopped building vessels, and adopted the dreadnought type.

England has gone on increasing the size and efficiency of this class of battleship until we now have the Orion, 1910-1911—four in this class—called super-dreadnought: size, 22,500 tons; horse-power, 27,000; speed twenty-one knots—best speed, twenty-three knots; length, 545 feet; beam, 88.5 feet; armament—ten 13.5-inch guns, sixteen 4-inch guns, three torpedo tubes; weight of discharge, 12,500 pounds; cost, £1,900,000. The King George V class are now being completed and will be ready this year—five of this class. They closely resemble the Orion class in armour and armament. No particulars are available of the designs for the battleships now building and to be built. It is stated, however, that they will show a further increase in size and armament.

The question naturally arises, whereunto will battleships grow? In order that hon. gentlemen will understand the different types of war vessels, I shall give the definitions set out in the Navy Annual.

Battleship: a ship specially designed to face and give the hard knocks of a fleet action.

Battle cruiser: a vessel combining the speed and other essential qualities of a cruiser, with an armament and protection sufficient to enable her to take her place in the fighting line beside the battleships.

Cruiser: a warship of high speed, usually employed in scouting, commerce protection, and special service. They fall into various categories: (a) armoured cruiser, a vessel having vertical external armour; (b) protected cruiser, a vessel with deck protection only; (c) unprotected cruiser, a cruising vessel having no armour. Now let me give an example of the latest battle cruiser type: 'the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply,' called dreadnought battleship cruiser. The latest vessels of this type are the Lion, the Princess Royal and the Queen Mary. For instance, the Lion and the Princess Royal have a length of 660 feet, a breadth of eighty-eight feet six inches, a normal draught of water of twenty-eight feet, a displacement of 26,350 tons, an estimated horse-power of 70,000. It is stated that the Tiger the last vessel to be laid down, the horse-power is to be increased to 100,000; armament, eight 13.5-inch guns and sixteen 4-inch guns. The heavy guns are placed in the centre line, and the eight guns command large arcs on horizontal training on both broadsides. The Queen Mary which was launched in March, 1912, will have a displacement of 27,000 tons, and the Tiger which is now building will be still larger and in addition to the 13.5-inch guns is to be armed with six-inch guns. They are fitted with two 20-inch torpedo tubes, and are the first ships built to cost over two million pounds. The cost of the Lion was as follows:

The hull fittings and equipment.. .. £	987,345
Propelling and other machinery.. ..	499,303
Gun mountings, torpedo tubes, &c...	334,222
Guns..	118,300
Establishment charges..	118,538
	£2,057,708

Look at the tremendous speed these vessels have. The Princess Royal attained a maximum speed of 34.7 knots, almost 40 land miles, equal to the speed of a fast express train, and her mean speed was 33½ knots. This is the type of vessels the Admiralty have mentioned in their memorandum, as the strongest and best ships science can build and money supply. That is the class of ships one would suppose that Canada will build, Canada will own and Canada will loan to the British Admiralty, until Canada requires them.

Lord Fisher, one of the best of our sea lords said:

> Speed is now the weather gauge. It enables you to get into a position of advantage, and as far as the handling goes speed is the first consideration and once you get into a position of advantage with anything like a head on your shoulders, you ought never to let an enemy get out of a position of disadvantage.

Now, let me give a short description of the guns. In this description I have followed what is called the British Rifled Ordnance tables. The guns made by private makers are of greater weight and are longer than the figures I have here.

The 13.5 inch gun has a length of 433 inches, or over 36 feet; weight, 69 tons; throws a projectile weighing 1,250 pounds. This gun has an energy of penetrating 25 inches of wrought-iron at 3,000 yards, has an effective range against an average modern armoured warship of about 4 miles, and an extreme range of 25,000 yards. When we remember that the latest dreadnoughts are to be armed with these mighty pieces of ordnance, the tremendous concentration of their powers of aggresion makes contemplation of the future naval battle simply appalling.

The 6-inch gun is the limit of the quick firing gun series. Its projectile is 100 lbs.; weight, about 7 tons; length, 269.5 inches, equal to over 22 feet; penetrating power at 1,000 yards of 18 inches of wrought iron and at 3,000 yards, 11.6 inches.

The 4-inch gun delivers a projectile of 25 lbs.; penetrating power at 1,000 yards 5·4 inches, at 3,000 yards 3 inches; weight of gun 26 cwt.; length of gun 120 inches, or 10 feet.

This reminds me of the criticisms we have heard of the Niobe. Gentlemen who have made these criticisms cannot have looked into the question. It is true that they are not building vessels of that class to-day. But it is also true that the Niobe is armed with 6-inch guns and 4-inch, besides a full armament of other sizes. Therefore, as a training ship, it is the best that Canada could have for the purpose—only for training purposes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what she was obtained for.

Mr. McLEAN: I would not put the Niobe forward as a fast modern cruiser. But for the purpose for which she was bought, to teach these men to handle that size of guns, she is especially adapted. And let me tell hon. gentlemen that those ships that are used as training ships in Great Britain have no larger guns. They do not put on training ships these great 12-inch and 13·5-inch guns.

Now, we come to the torpedo class vessels. These have increased in size enormously. The Admiralty has settled down now to what are called the 'ocean destroyer' torpedo class. These vessels are of 2,170 tons and 30,000 horsepower. Their speed is 38 knots. Think of that. When it is remembered that a knot is nearly a mile and a third, we find that we have a craft here with a speed of about forty-three or forty-four miles an hour. She is armed with four 4-inch guns. This is the type of vessel turned out to destroy the destroyers. She is sent out to search for torpedo boats and put them out of commission. Such a craft, of course, requires great speed. The latest type of torpedo boats are 170 feet long and have a draught of 66 inches. Their speed is 26 knots and they carry a small crew—33 men. The latest type of torpedo boat is illustrated by the Warrego, built for Australia. She was built in England and shipped in sections to Australia and reconstructed there. So, when you hear about the wonderful things Australia is doing, you have to look into records to find that this vessel had to be shipped in sections from England.

Next we come to the little craft called submarines. It is almost impossible to secure a description of the latest type of these vessels. But I will give the latest described in the Navy Annual. This vessel was built in 1910. She has a length of 135 feet with beam 13½ feet; size 321 tons; she has a speed of thirteen knots on the surface, or, submerged, ten knots.

And now I come to the most marvellous instrument of destruction ever invented, called the automobile torpedo. This is capable of carrying a charge of over 300 pounds of gun cotton at a speed of twenty-seven miles under the water, and running as true as the compass and hitting a ship at a distance of over four and a half miles. This would be a most efficient instrument for coast protection. I mention these things because when I come to the next question under discussion, as to the naval service and the navy of Canada, it is well for us to remember the different types of ships now being used by the Admiralty in England, so that hon. gentlemen opposite can determine what class of ships it would be best to adopt for use in Canada.

The question of our naval service and coast defence should be carefully studied and the advice and assistance of the best experts obtained. I sometimes think that the less a man knows about a question like this the more apt he is to express a very strong opinion about it. I believe that both sides agree on the principle of a Canadian naval service. What we all agree upon is that the Canadian naval service must be effective for the protection of our coast, also that it should be of assistance to Great Britain in case of war. Let me cite paragraph 7 of the Admiralty's memorandum:

> The rapid expansion of Canadian sea-borne trade, and the immense value of Canadian cargoes afloat in British and Canadian bottoms, here require consideration.

It goes on to give the figures, and shows the enormous sum for last year of £72,000,000 and the tonnage of Canadian vessels of over 718,000 tons. Canada to-day is the eighth largest ship-owning country in the world. Over sixty per cent of our entire trade is ocean-borne. Therefore it is about time that Parliament should take up this great question of the establishment of a Canadian naval service, an efficient service and one that shall be useful for the purpose for which it was established. I will again cite from the Admiralty's memorandum:

> Great Britain still has the power, by making special arrangements and mobilizing a portion of the reserves, to send, without courting disaster at home, an effective fleet of battleships and cruisers to unite with the Royal Australian navy and the British squadrons in China and the Pacific for the defence of British Columbia, Australia and New Zealand. And these communities are also protected and their interests safeguarded by the power and authority of Great Britain so long as her naval strength is unbroken.

Hon. gentlemen will see by that statement that, so far as the Pacific coast is concerned, England at the present time, with her large fleet on the China station, can give us the protection we require on that coast. That would seem to dispose absolutely of the question, at least for the next ten years, of our having to do anything for the protection of the Pacific coast by providing battle-ships. On the Atlantic coast, for instance, we would first be protected by the great steel wall of battleships that England has in the North sea, and it would be safe to assume that in case of war, Germany or any other great continental power would not be able to send out to Canada any of her big fighting ships—the smaller class of vessels only could be spared.

In regard to the protection of the gulf of St. Lawrence, one entrance to the gulf is the strait of Belle Isle, which is very narrow and forty miles long. One or two destroyers and submarines could easily guard that entrance, and mines could also be laid, giving added protection. The other entrance to the gulf is the Cabot straits, between Cape Ray and Cape North—that is between Cape Breton and Newfoundland. With two destroyers and a scout cruiser, it would be difficult for any war-vessel, except one of the very largest class, the dreadnought type, to get through that entrance. Then, after leaving Quebec, about six hundred miles of protected water would have to be traversed before the vessel would get out into the high seas. When on the high seas she should be comparatively free from attack, as an effort to find her would be like hunting for a needle in a hay-stack. Then take the bay of Fundy. Vessels would have to keep clear of the Muir ledges, and would be obliged to pass between Gannet Rock and Briar island. The entrance is so narrow—only sixteen miles—that it could be easily guarded and protected, and Halifax harbour, and our other harbours, could be amply protected with land batteries, submarines and mines.

We should own our own torpedo destroyers, torpedo boats and submarines, as it would be out of the question for these types of small craft to be sent out from England when once war has been declared, no matter how pressing might be the need for them. It is recommended by the Admiralty that scouts and destroyers be fitted with turbine machinery, and equipped to burn oil. This method of propulsion is very simple, easily worked, and would mean comparatively small complements both below and on deck, thus enabling higher wages to be paid and ensuring a good class of men entering the service.

In regard to the manning of our vessels, we have the Niobe, which is specially adapted to the requirements of a large training ship. In our fishermen we have the finest possible human element for this purpose: hardy sons of the sea, second to none in seamanlike qualities and courage —men who in the stormy seas about our coasts run risks at the thought of which landsmen would be appalled. With a little training, they would become efficient for the ordinary duties of seamen on a man-of-war. Of course we know that warships need highly trained specialists, such as gunners, engineers, wireless operators and signal men, and until Canadians are trained to that class of work, we would get from England the men required. We should look forward to the time, however, when we would have Canadian officers and men trained to serve on our Canadian ships.

At the Naval Conference in 1907, Lord Tweedmouth said:

> You can have the most magnificent ships, guns, armour and everything else, but if your men are not properly trained, your guns, your armour and your ships are absolutely uesless.

We should be able to train in Canada a large force of men as a naval reserve, thus enabling us to give to England in case of war the finest class of men for ordinary work on board ship. There would be no difficulty in getting volunteers from our fishermen for that service during the three winter months. They are now skilled in seamanship, are of a mechanical turn of mind, hardy and brave, and in three years we would be training a large body of efficient men as a naval reserve, ready to take their places in the fighting line.

A high authority in the Admiralty states as follows:

> In naval discussions, attention is devoted almost exclusively to the providing of battleships to the fleet. The battles are won not by ships, but by men. In an emergency, even the largest armoured vessels can be completed for us in about two years. It takes more than twice that time to train an efficient gunner or torpedo man, and over seven years to educate a responsible junior officer. Men who are needed for the arduous service for the Royal navy to-day are those who, first, are constantly available; second, are familiar with the routine life aboard a man-of-war; third, have an aptitude for mechanical as distinguished from manual work. In a naval war the victory will depend mainly, not on the type of large ships, but on the type of our men. Let it be our task to see that there are enough of them, be the cost what it may, who, when the day comes, will be cheap at any price. The danger lies in the lack of officers and men to man the ships.

Hon. members talk about Canada having a navy, and speak lightly of our establishing a big navy, having ships of our own, manned and controlled by Canada. In theory it sounds well. Let me say that I am in favour of a Canadian navy, but I want it to be efficient, and I have no desire that we shall bite off more than we can chew. Australia has been quoted as an example, and I want to put before hon. gentlemen her scheme and see if they think it advisable to adopt it. The report of Admiral Henderson states that Australia's fleet will consist of eight battle-ship cruisers, ten protected cruisers—which I understand are now to be changed to small, light cruisers—eighteen destroyers, twelve submarines, and sundry auxiliary vessels at a total cost of £23,000,000. This is equal to about $115,000,000, and annual cost of maintenance will be £1,226,000, or $6,000,000. The building scheme is to cover a period of twenty-two years, and she will require a personnel of fifteen thousand men. Australia has so far found it impossible to get the men; she has been obliged to hire them in England. Only a small number of Australians have been induced to serve in the navy, although they are paid almost two and a half times as much as British seamen are receiving. Australia, will, no doubt, be able in time to train the necessary officers and men, and if Canada also started a navy it would take some years to train the men. We must, therefore, make a start as soon as possible, and have a large naval reserve in course of training. The Times of February 24 last said:

> The ship-building programme in this country is well in hand, and by the end of the year the battle cruiser Australia, the second class cruisers Melbourne and Sydney, and the two submarines, all of which are under construction here, will be ready to sail for Australia.
> Materials for the second class cruiser, Brisbane, which is to be built at Sydney, are now being shipped, and it is expected that in April of next year the Commonwealth Government will formally take over the Australian navy.

The following are the vessels in the service of Australia which appear in the February navy list:

Gayunda, gunboat, Lieut. Com. W. H. F. Warren, R.A.N.

Paluma, gunboat, Williamston.

Parramatta, t.b.d., Lieut. H. J. Feakes, R.A.N.

Protector cruiser (naval reserve training ship), Com. A. C. Dunn (retired), R.N.

Tingira, boy's training ship, Com. C. La Lewin, R. N.

Warrego, t.b.d., completing at Sydney.

Yarra, t.b.d., Lieut. Com. T. W. Biddlecombe, R.A.N.

Ships Building.

Australia, battle cruiser, completing by Messrs. J. Brown and Co., Clydebank.

Melbourne, protected cruiser, building by Messrs. Cammell, Laird and Co., Birkenhead.

Sydney, protected cruiser, building by the London and Glasgow Shipbuilding Co., Glasgow.

Then there is an expenditure of £17,000,000 or $85,000,000 on docks and stores, making a grand total projected expenditure amounting to £88,000,000, equal to about $440,000,000. They hope with regard to the personnel, before the expiration of the period of twenty-two years, that they will have senior officers trained and junior officers at a much earlier date. Until that time, they will get from England a loan of officers and men. Australia is now having built in England a battle cruiser, the Australia, and two second-class cruisers, the Sydney and Melbourne. Submarines were to be delivered this month. Her auxiliary ships include a repair ship, a distilling ship, oil ships, a mine laying ship and other auxiliaries. It is interesting to note that while in the Imperial navy ordinary seamen get in England 1s. 3d. a day, in Australia they receive 3s. By this you will see that the pay in most cases is about one hundred per cent higher, and the pay of officers is about thirty per cent higher. It will also require a large sum to provide for the pensions. Australia, as you all know, has a population of about 5,000,000 of people, and has not the great resources and wealth of Canada. Now, when we talk about establishing a Canadian navy we should remember that we are entering upon no light task. Australia is in a different position from Canada. She is afraid of Japan, and being so far from England they may require a larger local naval service.

Then, the Argentine navy is held up to us as an example. The Argentine navy to-day includes the following vessels built and building or projected:

	Built.	Building or projected.	Totals.

Other armoured vessels	4	..	4

The personnel at the end of 1911 was as follows: officers, 763; petty officers and men, 7,147; reserve, 5,962; special reserve, 5,449. Twenty officers have been permitted to join the United States navy for a course of training.

Are we prepared to go into a navy of that size at a prospective cost of over $200,000,000. It may be necessary for Argentine as she is an independent nation. But is it required of us? Argentine has expended for naval purposes during the last two years not less than $65,000,000 to $70,000,000. The United States expenditure is $2.75 per head. This for Canada would mean $20,000,000 a year.

The amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition provides that all the ships to compose the two naval units are to be built in Canada as far as possible. I am in favour of our building all the vessels that we can in Canada if it can be done in a reasonable, practical, businesslike manner. We should have established here a big steel ship-building plant. All our ocean-going vessels are now built in Great Britain, and we should insist on our Government building in Canada all the war vessels and Canadian Government vessels possible even at an additional expense. We can build here scout cruisers and all the smaller vessels that go to make up a fleet unit and all the auxiliary vessels—but we cannot build dreadnoughts or battle cruisers, that is, except at an enormous additional cost, such as practical business men would not approve of. Then if, regardless of cost, we build them, could we be sure they would be as good as these built in England? We cannot, in ships that have to bear the brunt of battle, afford to make experiments. A material defect might be the cause of the loss of the ship and crew and in battle might lose us the fight. Let us commence by building the smaller vessels which we can do. My hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is a strong advocate of these battle cruisers being built in Canada, and uses with great force the argument: Why should we send $35,000,000 to England to build ships which can at say an additional expense of twenty per cent be built here? My answer is: In order that Canada should be properly represented in the fighting line we should have constructed by the best builders and the best experts the finest class of fighting ship afloat. A first-class battleship is too commonly regarded as a hull round the sides of which are placed a series of armour plates, while inside are installed some marine engines and boilers, and then a number of guns placed on deck. It is supposed that she is then ready to take her place in the fleet. Years ago when the construction of a warship was much less complicated than it is to-day, Ruskin declared that a man put into it 'as much of human patience, common sense, forethought, experimental philosophy, self-control, 'habits of order and obedience, thorough-wrought handiwork, devices of brute elements, careless courage, careful patriotism and calm acceptance of the judgment of God as could be well put into a space three hundred feet long by eighty broad.' Later developments have tended to render the work of constructing a man-of-war far more complicated and delicate than it was in the past. The mere space of a dreadnought measures 545 feet in length and eighty-eight feet in breadth, while the length of the Lion type of battle cruisers is 660 feet in length and eighty-eight feet in breadth. A modern ship like a dreadnought has not simply one set of engines for the propulsion, but in addition there are about one hundred auxiliary engines each of which fulfils some definite purpose. It is no slight task to fashion all these various engines and fit them within a single hull, while at the same time making adequate provision for the guns and their costly, heavy, and elaborate fittings; and the torpedo equipment, which in itself constitutes a specialized science to which men devote their waking hours in the race for perfection. It would be a rash thing to attempt the experiment of building a dreadnought even if we could do it without extra cost. We could not afford to take the risk.

Now, let us look at the argument as to sending $35,000,000 out of Canada. This is put forward as if the whole of that amount would really be spent here if we built the battle cruiser. I have here the figures as to the cost of the Lion and Princess Royal class.

Hull, fittings and equipment.....£	987,345
Propelling and other machinery....	499,303
Gun mountings, torpedo tubes, etc..	334,222
Guns.....	118,300
Establishment charges..... ..	118,538
	£2,057,708

Now, let us take the second item: Propelling and other machinery, £499,303. All of this item would be spent in England.

Then take the third item: Gun mountings, torpedo tubes, &c., £334,222. All this would also be spent in England.

Then take the fourth item: Guns, £118,300. This also goes to England.

Establishment charges, £118,538. This also goes to England.

Now, as to the first item: Hull fittings and equipment, £987,345. The armour plate must be brought from England, in fact the greater part of the material making up this item would have also to be brought from England. The steel plates might be rolled at Sydney if a plant were specially put up for that purpose. The manufacture of nickel armour plate has been brought almost to perfection in England with respect to its resisting power, but that has only been accomplished within the last three or four years. Every bit of this material has to be made in England and it has to be made according to, I think, a patented process. We would also have to bring the special expert workmen employed on the big warships out here to put the parts together. As there is a great demand for expert labour in all of the British shipyards it might be very difficult to get a sufficient number of men possessing the experience required for this purpose. It is very doubtful whether we could get these men even by paying them a big bonus. Altogether we would not have actually forty per cent of this item spent here as the result of our building a battle cruiser. Now, add the twenty per cent additional cost, namely, $7,000,000 of building in Canada, and we have, with an expenditure of $42,000,000, about $6,000,000 only spent here; or to put it in another way, we spend $7,000,000 to get $6,000,000 spent here. When we also consider the extra cost of the plant $1,500,000 and the extra time, two or three years, and that the result might be doubtful as to our turning out a ship fit to be placed in the fighting line, I say that it is not a practical businesslike proposition.

Mr. BORDEN: I would like to ask my hon. friend where he gets the information that these vessels can be built in Canada for twenty per cent more than they can be built for in Great Britain.

Mr. McLEAN: I am only taking the statement of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). We were told that they could be built in St. John at twenty per cent additional.

Mr. BORDEN: I have very authoritative figures from various sources that it would cost at least thirty per cent, probably thirty-five percent and perhaps even forty per cent.

Mr. McLEAN: I am putting the figures low. But it comes down to this, that taking the additional cost at twenty per cent, that there is an additional expenditure of $7,000,000. Forty per cent of the whole amount of money will be spent in Canada, or something less than $6,000,000. Then, there is the extra cost of the plant to build dreadnoughts. My hon. friend from St. John, I think, puts that at a million and a half. I am not quite sure whether he put it at that or not, but that would be at least the amount. I will put the additional cost of the plant necessary to build dreadnoughts at a million only. Now we have $8,000,000 as the additional cost. Is it a practical, businesslike undertaking to expend $8,000,000 to have $6,000,000 spent in Canada? I do not want as a Canadian to see this Parliament, or the Liberal party, advocating the building of dreadnoughts here costing, on the basis of the figures that I have mentioned, an enormous additional amount with the doubtful value which may result because, as I have said before, it is very doubtful indeed, that if we did build such a ship, they would allow her in the fighting line. It might be right for us to make this start if Canada were going into that business. If Canada proposed to be independent and required a large navy like the United States or other great nations, or even like Italy and Austria, it might pay us to go into this business of building dreadnoughts, but when we only propose to build three it does not strike me as a practical, reasonable business proposition. The establishment of a ship-building plant sufficient to build cruisers, destroyers and the auxiliary ships required by the Canadian naval service would be sufficient to build any mercantile vessel, and that is the end that we want to arrive at. Other nations recognize the great advantage of having modern war-ships built in England. There are now under construction in England battleships for Brazil and Chili. Japan has also ordered and is now having built in England a battle cruiser of the most modern type. Japan is building ships of war but when Japan wants the very latest models and the very best ships she goes to England for them.

Mr. BORDEN: Does the hon. gentleman know how long it is since Japan first undertook the project of building her own battleships?

Mr. McLEAN: Yes, it is twenty-two years, and let it be remembered that Japan's start as a naval power was due to the genius of an Englishman, the late Sir Edward Reid, K.C.B. It has been recognized that in order to get the most advanced class they must go to England for it. There are also being built three small armoured ships for Brazil, scout cruisers for China and a number of torpedo craft for different countries. British firms are providing for the re-construction of the Russian fleet, in the Black Sea and the Baltic; and the Spanish fleet at Carthagena and Fervol. There is not a navy in the world to which the British ship-builders have not contributed units of one class or another. There has been no naval engagement in the past fifty years in which, on one side or the other, British built war-ships have not been engaged. They fought in the China seas during the struggles between Japan and China; in the Pacific during the contest between United States and Spain; they were used by Japan with such surprising results during the war with Russia. I have mentioned the fact that Japan has given an order for one modern battle cruiser in England. After the war with China, Japan gave orders for a series of six powerful battleships and four swift armoured cruisers in England. She has established her own ship-building yards for building her own small cruisers, but when she wants an up-to-date, modern, first-class battleship she sends to England for it; perhaps as a sample from which she may build others.

When I spoke in this House in 1910, I spoke strongly as regards the danger from Germany, and the more I look into it the more convinced I am that that danger is acute.

A number of my hon. friends say: there is no emergency existing; England is perfectly able to hold her own against Germany and the other nations, and can build ships fast enough to keep her clear of the danger point. I do not think the word 'emergency' is the one to use: the question is: what is our duty? Is it simply to build a small Canadian navy for our own protection, or is it to join with Great Britain in providing for our local defence, and to be represented in the fighting line with three Canadian war vessels: 'the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money provide?' I am in favour of joining with Great Britain for local and Imperial defence. I feel convinced of the fact that when Germany feels that she is strong enough to quarrel with England, there will be one of the greatest naval battles that the world has ever seen. There is no use of us singing the swan song and saying, 'there is no danger.' I hope, Sir, that England in this ship-building war will be able to build the highest class of vessels faster than Germany can, and in numbers to insure safety. We know from the German naval policy what she is going to do, and exactly what she will have ready in 1917 and 1920. She has demonstrated her ability not only to carry out her naval programme, but to do it before the time specified. We cannot rely on the good nature of the Germans. Germany is a business nation. Germany is a warlike nation. Germany will be prepared to take any advantage she can if England gets into trouble. Nothing could avail with Germany if she thought she could succeed in a war with England. The Emperor of Germany is acting now on the maxims laid down by Frederick the Great for the future guidance of the Emperors of Prussia:

> Constant attention must be paid to hiding as far as possible one's plans and ambitions. Secrecy is an indispensable virtue in politics as well as in the art of war.
> If possible the powers of Europe should be made envious and be set against one another in order to give occasion for a coup when opportunity offers.

It is one of the first political principles to endeavour to become an ally of that one of one's neighbours who may become most dangerous to one's state. For that reason we have our back free as long as it lasts.

Reference has been made by some hon. gentleman to the fact that Germany strikes with secrecy. She strikes when her victim is believed not to be ready, as witness Silesia, Denmark, Austria, France. The pretext may be a forged telegram as in 1870, In the latter part of June, 1870, the Premier of France assured the nation that never had peace been so solidly assured as at that time, but in one fortnight war was declared. The ambitions of the Kaiser are boundless. He seeks to dominate the continent as a first step to dominating the world. When hon. gentlemen speak of the peaceful intentions of Germany let them remember what has taken place within the last four years. Thrice in four years has Germany threatened war, and in two of these instances she has achieved her aim. In 1905 she told France that the affairs of Morocco—a country in which she had only the vaguest interest—must be submitted to an international conference. Declasse, the Foreign Minister, refused; finally he was forced to resign and France gave way. Later in the same year Great Britain's support enabled France to withstand Germany's threat in the Casablanca incident in Morocco. The latest instance of German aggression was the seizure of the two Turkish provinces of Bosnia and Herzogovina by Austria, without the consent of the signatory powers. Austria is in the Triple Alliance and Italy is called the cork leg of the alliance. Austria will have to participate in case of war with Germany, and she is given this additional territory as the price of her alliance. Twice in 1911, Germany and England were on the verge of war the British flagship turned its searchlights on German cruisers on the coast of Britain. British destroyer flotillas swept the North sea keeping watch In August, 1911, English battleships had their torpedo nets out and torpedo boats patrolled the fleet. In September all leave was stopped. We know also that when the Navy Bill was being discussed and the British Government tried to come to an accommodation with Germany, the Kaiser and his ministers would not negotiate. By way of reply to Great Britain's overtures looking to a scaling down of armaments, Germany enlarged her naval and military appropriations. These appropriations still increase. What has happened in the year just closed? Six or seven of the nations of Europe have been involved in a most bloody war, which is not yet finished by any means. The little country of Bulgaria, with not half the resources of Canada—not one quarter—and with a population much less than ours, placed within a month 400,000 men in the field; and in this war they have lost nearly as many men as Great Britain lost in the South African war. much time must elapse before we shall know the inside history of the still unarranged dispute with France about Morocco in 1911, but there is reason to believe that the consciousness of the British navy at the back of France has been one of the large factors in the negotiations. At least it is apparent that the bitterness against Great Britain has been even more marked than against France.

I was struck with the warlike speech of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). He strikes right from the shoulder, and his speech has the fighting ring. He is the fighting man on our side of the House, and I think from what he said, the ring he put into it, that he must be in favour of dreadnoughts being given to England, or built by Canada and loaned to England, and that he must in his heart be in favour of Canada being represented in the fighting line with three of the best ships in the world. How can you get stronger statements than he makes? Let me quote a short extract:

To-day we are face to face with new conditions regarding military and naval matters such as the world has never seen before. So long as Britain held the seas, so long Britain and her dominions were safe, although the European countries might number their soldiers by millions, as they do. But that madness, if you like, which has caused the European nations to enrol their whole population as soldiers, having achieved its climax, when France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Russia, are absolutely nations in arms, we find that instead of the idea of military dominion stopping with that, having established the nation in arms on land, forthwith they attempt to procure control of the sea, and each of these nations to-day is building a fleet to do at sea what it has already done by land. For many years the British Islands were protected by the narrow seas and the British dominions were protected by the width of the ocean, but to-day we must recognize the fact that it is merely a matter of time when the millions of men who are or who can be placed under arms in Europe at practically a moment's notice, can be transported over sea as certainly and as quickly as may be necessary to carry out the will of the nation to which they belong.

Let me suggest to this House that a fleet that can sail across the North sea can sail across the Atlantic ocean, can sail around the world, that is to the Pacific, and that Canada has no guarantee from immunity from the presence of such fleets, or individual members of such fleets, and that our fair provinces by the sea stand in just as much danger as the British Islands themselves in case of any outbreak of war in which the British Empire is involved.

Now, what do the hon. members, who cry out that there is no danger, that Germany is our friend, and that Canada is safe, say in answer to what I have read? It will be impossible for any person to put it in stronger or more forcible language than my hon. friend from Edmonton has done in that statement in the debate on this question. We are in just as much danger as the British are. A fleet that can sail across the North sea can sail here. Where is the critical point? The critical point must be in the fighting line. Where is the danger zone? The danger zone must be in the North sea. If Britain is defeated in the North sea why then of course we are absolutely at the mercy of Germany and must either submit to Germany or we can seek protection in the United States and become annexed to them. Let me come to the point about our duty. In view not of an emergency but of the risk that Britain runs at the present time, will Canada be satisfied with a small local navy, or will the men of Canada not rather say: we must be represented in the fighting line, we must be there when the battle rages.

I want also to bring to the attention of my Liberal friends the opinion of the great Liberal newspaper, the Globe; a strong, independent, loyal expression. The Globe of March 24, 1912, says:

> There is not another nation in Europe which would impotently stand by and see an instrument forged for its destruction. They would seize the reptile while it was still weak and strangle it.
>
> But that is not the British way. They have instead endeavoured to keep pace with German activity in augmenting naval power. The contest has become a desperate one. It is a contest between a nation of 65,000,000, and constantly growing, with a nation of 42,000,000, from which its sons swarm across the seas year in and year out. War is deprecated, but, as a matter of fact, war is in progress. The contest in ship-building is war. If the Mother Country were engaged in a deadly conflict, Canadians could not get across the ocean fast enough to the side of the Motherland. The Canadian exchequer would be open to the last dollar in such a cause. But we must recognize that our aid is as much needed now as if a physical war, instead of a war of ship-building, were on. Germany appreciates that if ever she is to challenge British supremacy and break up the British Empire, now is the time. Every year is adding to the might of the British possessions, and ten years hence would be too late. The colonies can show by prompt and decisive action that it is already too late. They have it in their power to proclaim to all the world that the Empire is one and indissoluble. It will be a stroke for peace, for the moment that Germany perceives that the strength of the resources of every colony have been cast into the scale, from that moment she will see that she has lost the game.

Mr. McLEAN (Sunbury and Queens).

As to the kind of war vessel we should build, the Globe on March 26, 1912, says:

> The sort of vessel that is built should be fixed by the circumstances. The competition now raging between Great Britain and Germany is in the direction of first-class battleships. If Canada were to build a little fleet of wasps and hornets, it would have no moral effect on the situation at all. What we would like Canada to do, would be to manifest by a veritable act that in this competition she ranges herself proudly and gladly by the side of the Mother Country.

As to the possibility of the British navy being defeated, the Globe on March 31, 1909, stated:

> While the British fleet is master of the channel, no European fleet could be a serious menace to the shores of Canada. . . . In the days of trial the all-important aim would be to make the Imperial fleet so strong that the issue of a combat would not be doubtful.

Ship-building is being carried on in the navy yards of Great Britain and Germany with feverish haste, and why? Is it for peace or war, or simply for naval reviews? In 1890 the German fleet was the smallest in European waters. In contrast with this we have the German fleet of to-day, which is second only to that of England. Having this pre-eminence among the nations as a naval power, she already possesses the largest army in the world. By her new 1912 Naval Law Amendment Act, Germany is directly and deliberately challenging England as regards naval supremacy. England's sea power is a necessity. To the Germans, supreme as a military nation, it is a luxury. It is a means to an end; and that end is, I believe, the destruction of the British Empire, the disruption of the French Republic and the domination of the world. Germany, when she set out to establish a navy, set apart one thousand million dollars; by her amendments to the Navy Act she has set aside $500,000,000 more. She is pressing forward in this race, confident that she is now entering upon the last lap. She is mortgaging so much in the contest that she must either achieve victory abroad, or meet the storm of strife which her policy has and is still creating at home. She is setting up within four hundred miles of England a fleet placed on a war footing; a more effective fleet than Great Britain has maintained in the past as regards immediate, readiness for war, and she has this powerful engine of war within a day's steaming of the mouth of the Thames and here in Canada we are looking on calmly as though the millenium had dawned; as though Krupp's works, with its thousands of workmen were busy making plough shares and bathing machines; as though the great ship-building yards of Germany were engaged in building racing yachts, and as though the officers and men in the ships of war in the North sea were peaceful fishermen, plying their trade in patient, honest and harmless industry. The provisions of her Naval Bill of 1912, which are of real importance, are those which aim at a higher standard of fleet efficiency in the North sea than any power in its wildest dreams has ever attempted to achieve. Her ships are now to be fully manned by men trained in the highest pitch of efficiency. By the Act of 1912 she is to have one fleet flagship; five squadrons each of eight battleships, the largest under construction displacing 24,100 tons; twelve large cruisers, the largest being 22,600 tons and mounting ten 12-inch guns; and thirty small cruisers. This is equal to fifty-eight ships of the Lion type. This number is to be increased to sixty-one. The oldest ships of war value, nine in number, are to be retained in the reserve. She is also to have in commission eight large battle cruisers and ten smaller cruisers. These are to be for foreign service. Of the eight large cruisers for foreign service, four will constitute a flying squadron for use at home or abroad; two others will remain in the North sea in reserve; two as small foreign cruisers will also be at home. Then, she is to have a hundred and forty-four destroyers and seventy-two submarines, and a total personnel of over one hundred thousand men. In addition to these, she is to have two divisions of coast-defence ships. This is the meaning of the new German Navy Act of 1912; ability to strike the first blow. Let it be remembered always that this Act is a supplement of the Act of 1900, in the preamble of which it was stated:

It is not absolutely necessary that the German fleet should be as strong as that of the greater sea powers, as generally a great sea power will not be in a position to concentrate all its forces against us.

Naval warfare has now reached something of the precision of a game of chess, and an action, or indeed the whole campaign, may be won or lost on the first move. Everything now depends on readiness and promptness. The main increase in German activity under the Act of 1912 is to be in submarines. These craft cost about £80,000 each. Germany intends to create flotillas in the North sea and the Baltic, which for all strategical purposes will, in the course of a year or two, number upwards of seventy. This means that England will have to commence building a far greater number of these under-water vessels, while continuing to lay down each year not less than twenty torpedo boat destroyers, a batch of cruisers to act as scouts for the battle fleet and commerce protectors, and a large number of auxiliary ships. To quote Mr. Winston Churchill's words:

Four-fifths of the entire German navy will be maintained in full permanent commission; that is to say, instantly and constantly ready for war.

He added that such a preparation was remarkable and found no example in the previous practice of any modern naval power. Mr. Hector C. Bywater, of Berlin, states:

Neither the British Government or nation, or the German nation is responsible for the unsatisfactory relations existing between Great Britain and Germany. The responsibility and the strained relations are solely due to the German Government which has deliberately created the present position. The German Government has embittered Anglo-German relations and brought the two nations to the brink of war by trying to destroy Great Britain's naval supremacy, and by engaging upon a campaign of vilification which is probably unparalleled.

Here are a few extracts from speeches made by some of the leading statesmen in England. The First Lord of the Admiralty on March 18, 1912, said in justification of British supremacy:

We should have ample margin (because) the consequences of defeat at sea are so much greater to us than they would be to Germany or France.

There is no parity of risk. Our position is highly artificial. We are fed from the sea. We are an unarmed people. We possess a very small army. We are the only power in Europe which does not possess a large army.

We cannot menace the independence or the vital interests of any great continental state; we cannot invade any continental state. We do not wish to do so, but even if we had the wish we have not got the power.

People talk about the proportion which the navies of the different countries should bear to the commercial interests of the different nations—the proportion of France, the proportion of Italy, the proportion of Germany; but when we consider our naval strength we are not thinking of our commerce, but of our freedom. We are not thinking of our trade, but of our lives.

These are facts which justify British naval supremacy in the face of the world.

We must not conduct our affairs so that the navy of any single power would be able to engage us at any single moment, even our least favourable moment, with any reasonable prospects of success.

On November 9, 1908, Mr. Asquith said:

Every foreign power knows that if we have established, as we have, and if we mean to maintain, as we do, an indisputable superiority on the sea, it is not for the purpose of aggression or adventure, but it is that we may fulfil the elementary duty which we owe to the Empire, to uphold beyond reach, yes, and beyond risk of successful attack from outside, our commerce, our industry, our homes.

Then in June, 1912, Mr. Balfour said:

There are two ways in which a hostile country can be crushed. It can be conquered or it can be starved. If Germany were masters in our home waters, she could apply both methods to Britain. Were Britain ten times master of the North sea, she could apply neither method to Germany. Without a superior fleet Great Britain would no longer count as a power. Without any fleet at all, Germany would remain the greatest power in Europe.

Germany cannot be assailed by sea. She is protected by enormous batteries, by a long line of islands and a small coast line. She has made three great naval stations, Emdem, Williamshaven and Coxhaven, the strongest points in the world, except Gibraltar. Her great warships which formerly could not enter the North Sea by the canals, have now perfect freedom of movement. The Kiel canal has been deepened so as to bring the war vessels from the Baltic to the North sea by the shortest possible route. Take a map of the world and look at the geographical situation of the British Empire. The focus is the Mother Country with a population of about 45,000,000. She is confronted on one side by Germany, a nation of 60,000,000 possessing the largest army and the second largest navy in the world. The whole white population of the British Empire, including the colonies, only about equals that of Germany. Next comes the ring of European states, all naval powers, with a population of about 120,000,000; then comes what might be called the coloured empires, India, China, Egypt, West and East Africa, the West and East India islands; then the white dominions within the outer circle, the United States and Japan. If the German menace were the only thing Great Britain had to deal with, were she not responsible for the peace and security of the dominions over the seas, and her colonies, her problem would be simple enough. Remembering the feeling which arose against us in Germany at the time of the South African war, does anyone imagine that if the German navy had been as strong then as it is to-day we could have got off without a struggle? It is against a repetition of that danger that Great Britain and the whole Empire must guard.

The question for Canada to decide is not the definition of the word 'emergency'; but what is our duty? Is it not clear that our duty is to give every assistance within our power to Great Britain at the present time? Not only, as it is put in the Admiralty memorandum, 'for the material benefit,' but for the moral effect it will have on Germany and the other nations of the world. It would seem to me that the moral effect would be very much greater if the world knew at once that Canada was united in building and giving to England three of the best fighting ships that science can devise and money can build. This surely would be better than a small baby navy, with dreadnoughts to be built in Canada, and to be stationed on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. We should let the world know that we are prepared to help to support British sea power; that we will stand by England as she has stood by us. When Great Britain goes to war, Canada goes to war as well. The destiny of Canada is involved in the result of the war. If British power is broken Canada is left defenceless. We should be eight millions of people in possession of the richest half-continent in the world, and with no fleet.

If Germany were mistress of the sea, where could she find a better colony than Canada? What would keep the Japanese from landing on the Pacific coast, or how long would it be before the billions of regenerated China would flow into our tempting prairies? It is said that we could rely on the Monroe doctrine, and that the United States would protect us. What would be the price that we would pay? Annexation, of course. The question for us, then would be whether we would be Germans or Yankees. Of course, we are not frightened to-day; no one is frightened at the present time. Why not? Because of the great white squadron—and we pay not one cent towards its support and contribute in no way to its strength. Is Canada to retain her do-nothing policy, and be prepared to do something twenty or thirty years hence, or shall we join in the shipbuilding fight, and be in it, so to speak, from the drop of the hat, joining at once in the present building programme of the Empire, and getting our Canadian dreadnoughts ready for action?

Again, I would call attention to the clause in the Admiralty memorandum which speaks of the great moral effect the news of Canada's definite action would have on the world. If Germany hears that Canada is in the fight to stay, and she is building in England three of the finest warships in the world, which will be in the fighting line in the North Sea, it may have a tremendous effect on her future action. Her debt is heavy she is now building with borrowed money; her banks are fearful of the effect of war. Might not the appearance of Canada on the field of battle cause the Germans to decide to confine their ambitions to such parts of Europe as could be reached by her matchless army? The world is at the present time a fierce and dangerous place for those who are not prepared to defend themselves. Canada can not and would not be able to defend herself, by the building of any navy, without England's assistance; she would be at the mercy of Germany, Japan and the United States. It is useless for us to build a navy too small for the work it is intended to accomplish. Germany has the support of the Triple Alliance, and Great Britain must not only have a margin of safety over Germany, but she must have such a decisive command of the sea, that no probable coalition could be brought against her. Great Britain should not be obliged to bear this burden alone; the dominions over the seas and her colonies should assist her. Canada will become the greatest English speaking nation in the world, with the possible exception of the United States. We have room for so many millions of people that we hesitate to fix a limit. England and Scotland could be drowned in one of our great lakes. Allied with Great Britain, we will be the most potent power in the world. Australia must ever be on the fringe of a nation; South Africa is burdened with a black problem and lacks our climate and land. The struggle that is now in progress is largely a matter of money. If Germany could get enough money to out build Great Britain, the contest would be over; but when she finds that she cannot do this, she will probably turn her vast powers in other directions. We have been singing 'God Save the King' for a number of years; now let us show to the Mother Country that our loyalty is not merely 'hot air' but that there is some substance to it. The building of these three dreadnoughts would be an intimation to Germany that she would have to build battleships, not only as against Great Britain but also against the dominions over the seas. German statesmen would probably say: 'We might build against forty-five millions in the British islands, but can we build against the dominions over the seas, and the twenty, thirty or fifty millions of people that in a few years will inhabit those lands?'

When Britain went to war with the Kruger regime, no one knew what Germany's position would be. The Kaiser's telegram to President Kruger was then recent history. The dominions stepped in and made it clear to the world that the entire British Empire was united and were willing, even anxious, to shoulder their share of the responsibility. What effect this had, it is impossible to tell, but the fact is that the nations of Europe did not stir a finger. Several months ago, I read that the Rev. Dr. Milligan, a prominent Presbyterian minister of Toronto, had returned from his annual visit to Scotland. He said to a reporter that the Scottish people seemed to feel that we did a lot of talking out here, but not much else. The sentiment of being united with Great Britain in the maintenannce of her sea power should be a glorious inspiration for us.

Effingham, Grenville, Raleigh, Drake,
  Here's to the bold and the free!
Benbow, Collingwood, Byron, Blake,
  Hail to the King of the sea!

Admirals all, for England's sake;
  Honour be yours and fame,
And honour, as long as waves shall break,
  To Nelson's peerless name!

The collapse of British sea power would put a final period to the history of the Empire. History has written and rewritten this truth. In the struggle between Anthony and Cleopatra on the one side and young Augustus on the other, for the supremacy of the eastern world, the decisive battle was that of Actium, a sea fight: the crippling of Spain commenced when she lost command of the sea to the Red Rovers of England; the fall of Napoleon began with the battle of Trafalgar; Britain secured her Indian Empire by establishing her supremacy in the Indian ocean. Captain Mahon, in his great classic, 'Sea Power in History,' drives home by hundreds of examples the fact that the power which holds the seas holds the land. Why should Holland have its colonies when Switzerland has none? Why should feeble Portugal have a fine colonial empire while Germany is trying to content herself with odd bits of tropical Africa? The answer is that the Portuguese were always a nation of navigators. Spain only recently lost Cuba, Porto Rico and the Phillipines to a new sea power which smashed her antiquated ships at Manila. If Great Britain had not had a supreme navy, she would have lost the South African war. We hold Egypt with our fleet. If we could not send reinforcements to India, how long could we remain in possession of that country? If we were independent of Great Britain, how long could we exist as a separate nation? The Americans could take us whenever they liked; they fought to prevent southern confederacy, why should they not fight to prevent the growth of a great northern confederacy? The truth stands, that while a German victory in the North sea would leave the Union Jack flying over London, it would lower that flag over Canada.

It is argued that we must have Canadian cruisers to watch the lines of communication. The latest naval return shows that Britain possesses one hundred and ten cruisers to Germany's forty-five. Britain has also a lot of pre-dreadnought battleships which could protect the trade in the North Atlantic while her dreadnoughts were meeting the shock of war in the North sea. It is not in cruisers and pre-dreadnoughts that the Germans are catching up. Britain has fifty-one pre-dreadnoughts while Germany has only twenty-nine, and of a very much less tonnage.

The erection of the Palace of Peace by Carnegie was followed by the Japanese and Russian war, and from that time the world has been the scene of incessant strife; the strong have taken wherever they could, without reference to equality. Corea was wrestled for by two giants like dogs tearing at a bone. Who cared for the rights of the Coreans? Britain and France between them quietly disposed of the rights of the Moors.

the Emperor hurried to Tangiers and pronounced his veto and the result was a draw, but who cared for the rights of the Moors? Turkey showed signs of recovery, and immediately Austria grabbed Bosnia and Herzegovina. France determined to go to Fez; Germany sent a gunboat to Agdar; Lloyd George snarled; and what happened? The Germans counted their battleships and decided to wait, but we were very near war. If Germany had been ready, war would now have been declared. Italy gives Turkey twenty-four hours to hand over Tripoli; Russia is advancing her troops on several pretexts into Persia; we are told a British expedition will leave India for Southern Persia. China is in confusion; Russia is making sure of outer Mongolia, and now we come to the quarrel over the spoils in Turkey. People who talk of an era of peace should know that there has not been so much war in the world since Waterloo. But it is said, how do these things affect Canada? They do not affect us, because we are behind a breakwater. We have been left untouched, because, and only because, the British battleships ride between us and every power which might covet our broad prairies and untold natural wealth.

We propose also to train our men for service in the navy. The best training—the best naval school—is in the British navy; by common consent it is agreed that the British navy is the best managed navy in existence.

Germany is playing for greater stakes than any nation since the France of Napoleon.

Germany is playing with borrowed money.

Germany is taxing her people into the arms of social democracy to keep up the interest on that borrowed money.

Germany thinks this is the last lap of the race.

Germany will soon have the greatest fighting navy in history—greater than Britain has now or ever has had—within about a day's steaming of the mouth of the Thames.

Could any series of statements be more startling? Yet is there one of them which can be challenged? England is expending this year $240,000,000 on the navy, and will build four or five battleships, eight light armoured cruisers, twenty destroyers, eight submarines, and the sundry auxiliaries required for the fleet. England has increased her expenditure in the last twelve years to the extent of over $100,000,000 on the navy, and so far we have given her no help.

Statements have been made in the speeches of hon. gentlemen as to what Great Britain has done for Canada. I make out the list as follows:

1. British troops and fortifications were maintained here at an expenditure of $300,000,000 during the nineteenth century.

2. At the Trent Affair, ten thousand British soldiers came out to Canada.

3. When Canada needed roads, canals, and bridges in the early days, British money supplied them.

4. For half a century the Indians required yearly gifts of money, which was provided by Great Britain.

5. Our churches wanted vast sums for relief work, and British societies contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars during the nineteenth century.

6. If railways, such as the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk had to be constructed, Britain sent us the necessary money.

In recent years countless enterprises have been financed in London, until the present total is over one billion, five hundred millions. When we wanted the money to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk, the Transcontinental or the Canadian Northern railways, we went to England. Do you think that this money could have been obtained by a small nation not under the British flag, and not having British power and stability to guarantee its position?

Since Confederation our trade upon the seas has totalled $6,300,000,000 and over, and it is all due to the protection of the Imperial navy. The British Government subsidized dry-docks at Esquimalt and Halifax, at a cost of over $400,000; she has borne the cost of hydrographic surveys in Canadian waters, and the protection of Canadian vessels and Canadian citizens in foreign countries; and to all this, Canada has not contributed one cent. Under the protection of Great Britain, Canada has attained the status and dignity of a nation. Our connection with the Motherland involves no economic features; we have full power of management with respect to Canadian affairs; we make our own laws; we control our trade and tariffs; and no treaties are made which may indirectly affect our interests without our consent. Canada manages her own military affairs; she faces the world in every essential as a free imperial power. The sea-borne commerce of Canada has now assumed very considerable proportions, both eastward and westward, on the Atlantic and the Pacific. Canada stands today as the eighth largest ship-owning country in the world; sixty per cent of our trade is ocean-borne, and all protected by the Imperial navy.

Now, let us look at what the other colonies and Australia have done for England:

New Zealand:
Contribution of $200,000 a year from 1902 to 1907....	$1,000,000
Contribution of $1,000,000 a year from 1907 to 1912....	5,000,000

New Zealand has also presented the Royal Navy with a battle cruiser and three destroyers (estimated)..	$13,000,000
Total for New Zealand	$19,000,000
Australia:
Contribution of $1,000,000 a year from 1902 to 1912....	$10,000,000
Australia is building a fleet unit in accordance with the 'second best' suggestion of the Admiralty in 1909 (estimated)..	20,000,000
Total for Australia ..	$30,000,000
South Africa:
Contribution of $425,000 a year from 1902 to 1912.. ..	$4,250,000
Newfoundland:
Contribution of $16,000 to $24,000 a year from 1902 to 1912 (say)..	$200,000
India:
Maintenance of warships in Indian waters (500,000 a year) for ten years...	$5,000,000
Other naval services (standing last year at $330,000) for ten years..	$3,300,000
Total for India..	$8,300,000
Canada	nil.

That is the record up to date. How do you like it?

I shall now refer to the memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the naval situation and sent to Canada in November last. If I had any doubts as to the course I should take on this great question, they were settled when I read this statesmanlike document. Let me cite several paragraphs:

> The Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material and still more important moral assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy upon the high seas.

Now, the question naturally arises, what material assistance can we give? The question is set out in paragraphs 8, 9 and 10 of the Admiralty memorandum:

> Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness of the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the overseas dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.
>
> Anything which increases our margin in the newest ships, diminishes the strain and augments our security and our chances of being left unmolested.
> The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

This is the last word from the Admiralty. It shows what they want Canada to do now, and cancels all previous statements or advice. They do not ask us to provide two fleet units; but to build 'a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.' Naval strategy has changed within the last few years. It is now a policy of concentration and not the maintenance of a number of separate fleet units. For example, do you think they would now advise us to provide a fleet unit in the Atlantic and one in the Pacific? Let me call the attention of the House to a letter written to the Times by Mr. Macauley, who is an authority on naval matters. He puts very plausibly the reasons why a fleet unit on the Pacific would not be advisable. He says:

> A cruising range of fourteen thousand miles would evidently entail an enormous expense, and 'very intermittent training,' especially as regards the terminal units. The method you advocate would again be better applied if the Canadian naval force were in the Atlantic, not on the Pacific.

He says also:

> The nearest British port of any naval value to the west coast of Canada is five thousand, six thousand miles away. This distance is only traversible by the largest war vessels (cruiser or battleship) at low speed. . . . . The connection of the Canadian fleet with the rest of our naval forces would be entirely dependent in war on the good will of the only powers that, for very many years at least, can possibly threaten her Pacific coast. In a war with the United States, a Canadian fleet, placed as you suggest, would be at once isolated. In a war with an East Asian power, the naval defence of the west coast of North America can be best carried out by a fleet operating from Singapore and Hong Kong.

After describing the efforts made by England to get Germany to agree to stop naval rivalry, the Admiralty memo. deals with the the German Navy Law of 1912, the main feature of which, they say, is the increase of the striking force of the German warships which will now be maintained in full commission and immediately available at all seasons of the year. Let me quote from paragraph 4 of the memo:

> Taking a general view, the effect of the law (1912) will be that nearly four-fifths of the entire German navy will be maintained in full permanent commission, that is to say, instantly and constantly ready for war.

The Admiralty memo also refers to the important increase in the personnel—that in 1898 officers and men amounted to 25,000. The new law of 1912 increases it so that in 1920 they will have 101,500. The present strength is 66,000.

The Admiralty also calls attention to the important fact that the great German fleet is not dispersed all over the world for duties of commerce protection or in discharge of colonial responsibilities, but that it is concentrated and kept concentrated in close proximity to the British coast. The Admiralty then refers to the German Naval Law of 1900 and cites the preamble:

> Germany must possess a battle fleet of such a strength that even for the most powerful naval adversary (this means Great Britain) war would involve such risk as to make that power's own supremacy doubtful.
> For this purpose it is not absolutely necessary that the German fleet should be as strong as that of the greatest naval power, for, as a rule, a great naval power will not be in a position to concentrate all its forces against us.

The Admiralty memo sets out the present relative strength of the German and British navies and the estimated strength in 1915 and 1920. I have already given these figures and I propose putting on 'Hansard' a tabulated statement. But I want leave to draw attention to the significant remarks the Admiralty made as to the increase in strength of the navies of Austria and Italy. They point out that they will possess in 1915 a formidable fleet of four and six dreadnoughts respectively, ten in all, together with the strong battleships of the pre-dreadnought type and other units such as cruisers, torpedo craft, &c.

It is evident that Great Britain must be prepared to meet the united fleets of the triple alliance. As to the protection of the dominions, let me quote another paragraph from the Admiralty memo:

> It is the general naval supremacy of Great Britain which is the primary safeguard of the security and interests of the great dominions of the Crown, and which for all these years has been the deterrent upon any possible designs prejudicial to or inconsiderate of their policy and safety. . . Larger margins of superiority at home would, among other things, restore greater freedom to the movements of the British squadron in every sea, and directly promote the security of the dominions.

In conclusion, I want to quote to the House from a speech by Lord Roberts, the great war lord of England, the successful leader, one of the most successful generals that the world has ever seen during the last forty years, a man who practically never lost a battle, a man who has not only had great experience but who has the brain power to deal with such questions as these. The result of his study and experience was put forward in a memorable speech that he delivered at Manchester to which I want to call the attention of the House. The speech from which I shall quote an extract certainly made a tremendous impression upon me. He said:

> Germany has within the past ten years sprung up at a bound from one of the weakest naval powers to the greatest naval power save one upon the globe. But yesterday, so to speak, the British fleet did not feel the furrow of the German war keels on the high seas. To-day every British war-ship and every British merchant vessel thrills in all its iron nerves to that mighty presence. I point to the gradual displacement of the British fleet before the German menace. I point to the Mediterranean bereft of British battleships, and the gradual narrowing year by year of Britain's once far-flung battle line. Germany always advances towards complete supremacy on land and sea. . . . How impressive is this magnificent unresting energy! It has the mark of true greatness. It challenges admiration even from those against whom it is directed. . . . There is one way in which Britain can have peace with Germany and every other power, namely, to present such a battle front by sea and land that no power, or probable combination of powers, dare attack her without the certainty of disaster. That is the only reply worthy of our past or wise for our future. But there is a way in which Britain is certain to have war horrors and calamities, namely, by persisting in her present unpreparedness, apathy and unintelligent, blind disregard of warnings of a most ordinary political insight. . . . What is the lesson which history enforces? We must abandon the Empire and with it our commercial wealth or be prepared to defend it. We have a great fleet but that fleet is rapidly becoming unequal to the fleets by which we may be opposed. . . . A paramount navy we must possess whether of two keels to one or three keels to one. That is a self-evident truth. . . . What then is my ultimate counsel to the nation in this solemn hour? Gentlemen, it is a message burnt into my mind. . . . That message is arm, prepare, quit yourselves like men for the time of your ordeal is at hand. . . . Remember war does not begin nor end on the day of battle. There is a kind of war, a war of preparation which goes on silently and unperceived amid apparent peace. . . . If once you permit any one state to be your undisputed superior on sea or land that hour, even if not a shot be fired, you cease to be a free nation. . . . I ask myself, how can I even at this late solemn hour best help England? Again I say, arm, be prepared to quit yourselves as men, for the day of your ordeal is at hand.

This solemn warning of the greatest military authority now alive and one of England's most successful generals should not fall on idle ears. We should follow his advice and arm, be prepared and quit ourselves as men for I believe with Lord Roberts that the day of our ordeal is at hand. We are rapidly approaching the day foreshadowed by Herr Massermann, leader of the Nationalist Liberal Party of Germany in his historic speech at the Congress of Erfurt in the summer of 1903:

> In our attitude towards England we must keep cool until we have a strong fleet; it would be a mistake to allow ourselves to be driven into hostile policy towards England.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that the day will come when the Motherland and the overseas dominions shall be united in one great federation of British nations, for the purpose of consolidating power against foreign countries, and the moral influence on all international questions.

Nations can only enjoy their freedom by being able to defend it. A true policy for us is to be closely united, to be thoroughly organized and equipped and to be able to use our whole strength to the greatest advantage for the common safety of Great Britain. Canadians desire to be free and safe. It must be in an empire to which we are attached by every tie, to which we must render effective service, and to which if necessary we must give our all for the common defence, if we are to expect the forces of that mighty empire to be at our back when our lives as free people are threatened. We should show a square front to any enemy that may attack us. We must be ready to play our part towards the security of our country and if occasion offers be ready to fight. We may have war upon us at any moment. Take the last words of that great statesman, Lord Dufferin:

> Nothing, neither a sense of justice nor the precepts of religion, nor the interests of humanity would prevent any nation from attacking us at the first favourable opportunity.

And Joseph Howe, forty years ago, wrote in his essay on the 'Organization of the Empire':

> Security for peace is only to be sought in such an organization and armament of the whole Empire as will make certainty of defeat a foregone conclusion to any foreign power that may attempt to break it.

Love of country is deeper than a sentiment, deeper even than our instinct. It is the absolute self-renunciation and complete identification with another which Ruth expressed. 'Where thou goest I will go; where thou livest, I will live; where thou diest, there will I die also.' Perhaps I might be able to better express my sentiments by quoting from (our young Canadian Poet) Mr. Robert J. C. Stead's poem 'The Empire Builders':

> It's well to boast of the Empire, and brag of Britain's might,
> It's well to sing of her soldiers or hurry them into the fight,
> It's well to raise your anthem for the King upon his throne,
> While you leave your Mother Country to bear the load alone.
>
> Many the winds that rise and fall to the flag that ye call your own,
> And ye walk secure to the ends of the earth wherever that flag is known;
> Safe as a child in its mother's arms ye come and go at will,
> And ye take it all for granted, and your mother pays the bill.
>
> Never a wave that beats your shores but knows her floating steel,
> Never a sand in your harbour fronts but knows her iron keel,
> Never a child in your inland towns but lisps of her 'hearts of oak,'
> And the breath that you breathe as the air of God is thick with her sulphur smoke.
>
> Dreaming your dreams and visions—making your dreams come true—
> Offering not of your substance, offering words in lieu—
> Large in your little dealings, small in your great affairs,
> Proud of the land that bore you, but blind to the load she bears.

I have prepared certain statistics which, with the permission of the House, I should like to have placed on 'Hansard' without delaying to read them. These figures show the position at the present time of the dreadnoughts in the navies of Great Britain and Germany; the position of the world's dreadnoughts; the situation of naval powers in March, 1913, in ships built, building and projected; the speed of the fastest warships in the world; the tonnage of armoured warships of the five principal naval powers; and the personnel of the principal navies. I would like permission to have them printed in 'Hansard.'

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not usual to print anything in 'Hansard' except what is read in the House, unless it be some special documents which are brought down by ministers of the Crown.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is customary, with the consent of the House, to allow such matter as my hon. friend from Sunbury and Queens refers to, to be placed on 'Hansard.'

Mr. SPEAKER: It can be done with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. BORDEN: There would be no objection to the request of my hon. friend being complied with.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it for granted that the unanimous consent of the House is accorded.

Mr. McLEAN: I feel strongly on this question; I feel that it is the duty of Canada to give the assistance to the Motherland outlined in the resolution moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister. I say further that Canada and the loyal men of Canada owe a great debt of gratitude to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, for blazing the trail, so to speak, as he did when he provided for a Canadian naval service. It is true that service did not come up to what some of us wanted; it did not include the ships we thought should be included; but nevertheless Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the courage at that time to lay down the principle of naval assistance to the Motherland, knowing full well when he did so that it would lose him a number of seats in his native province.

Canada will also owe great thanks to the Prime Minister, now head of the Government of Canada, for his action at the present juncture. It seems to me that it would be wise if these two right hon. gentlemen, the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, loyal as they are, strong in the purpose of affording, as I know they are, assistance to Great Britain, should come together on a common platform, so that the people of Canada may proclaim themselves united in the assistance now about to be given to the Empire.

The following schedules are those I wish to have printed in 'Hansard':

The above statement shows the numbers of dreadnoughts, including dreadnought cruisers, either built or building or authorized by the United Kingdom and Germany, respectively, at the beginning of June, 1912, giving in the case of each country the name of each ship, when laid down or date of giving out contract, date of launch and date of completion.

These figures are obviously only approximate, the totals in each year being exaggerated if the past tendency to delay be accepted as a criterion of probable future progress.

The following tables show that Great Britain's position has improved in recent years; the tonnage of armoured warships of the five principal naval powers launched in the five years, 1902 to 1906 inclusive, being as follows:

	Tons.	Per cent.
Great Britain	87,977	35.3
Germany	36,106	14.5
France	30,210	12.1
United States	73,184	29.4
Japan	21,648	8.7

In the subsequent five years, from 1907 to 1911 inclusive, the amount of armoured tonnage launched declined slightly to 243,440, thanks to the great reduction of American ship-building. Of this total—

		Tons.	Per cent.
Great Britain	accounted for	89,450	36.8
Germany	"	63,050	25.9
France	"	39,290	16.1
United States	"	33,530	13.8
Japan	"	18,120	7.4

The greatest increase was, of course, in the case of Germany, whose share advanced from one-seventh of the whole in 1902-6 to just over a quarter in 1907-11, while the proportionate share of the United States fell from nearly a third to less than a seventh.

PERSONNEL.

With the provisions of the Supplementary Estimates (1,500 officers and men) the total personnel provided for this year is 137,500 as against 134,000 in the last Estimates—an increase of 3,500. This is not enough. Even with the natural restrictions arising from lack of accommodation for training, or difficulty in absorption, &c., it should have been possible to add at least 5,000 to this number, and thereby endeavour at the earliest moment to remedy the present serious shortage.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie and Napierville): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the motion of the right hon. Prime Minister which we have had under discussion since December 5 last, is of such importance that I believe I would be remiss in my duty, as representative of my constituents in Laprairie and Napierville, if I did not make known to you my views concerning this gift of thirty-five millions towards the building of three super-dreadnoughts in Great Britain, for the purpose of strengthening, as the statement of the Prime Minister goes, the British navy.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the speeches delivered from both sides of the House in reference to this motion, and the more I hear of such speeches and the more I read them, the more I am at a loss to find any justfication for such a tribute to the British Government, a tribute levied not at the request of the British ministers, but at the suggestion of our Canadian ministers, when in conference in London with the British ministers, as stated in the memorandum laid before Parliament by the right hon. Prime Minister when he made known his policy to the House and the country at large.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side who have so far taken part in this debate tell us that the British Government accepts with pleasure and gratitude that gift of thirty-five millions. I never suspected anything else, and as a matter of fact it would be difficult to find any one on this broad earth to refuse such a gift. I believe the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues would be glad to accept it themselves, if they had the chance, and I would congratulate them on the occurrence.

Now, Sir, I would like to know why we should make such a gift when the Admiralty experts and the British Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, and Mr. Churchill, state that the British naval forces are able to cope with the combined forces of the two greatest powers, and not only at present, but for several years to come. The object of it all is to get out of trouble several hon. members on the other side, some of whom occupy seats in the cabinet, and who had promised that nothing would be done in the way of building a navy or sending a contribution, previous to consulting the people. Such was the policy advocated by nearly all the Nationalist candidates in Quebec, during the election of 1911, and I do not think that a single one of these gentlemen came out at the time frankly and openly as Conservatives, endorsing the policy of the then leader of the Opposition and advocating the gift of two dreadnoughts.

In 1909, a resolution was introduced by the present Minister of Customs (Mr. Foster), stating that the time had come for Canada to take steps towards protecting itself, and that the best way of going about it was not a contribution, but the providing of a Canadian navy.

The former Government following on the 1909 session, sent two of its members to London, the Hon. Sir Frederick Borden and the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, to confer with the Admiralty experts and the British Government towards deciding what types of ships would be the most suitable for our Canadian navy. It was resolved that eleven ships would be built, viz., four cruisers of the Boadicea type, and six destroyers. Matters were getting on well; all were satisfied. The right hon. Prime Minister of to-day, then leader of the Opposition, addressed meetings in Great Britain about that time and approved the idea of building a Canadian navy. Shortly after, he returned to Canada, and he was still in favour of a Canadian navy. The date of the summoning of Parliament for the session of 1909-1910 was approaching. A banquet which was arranged for at Lachine in honour of Mr. Monk changed the condition of things. Mr. Monk stated in his address that we should maintain the statu quo and abstain from doing anything before the people had been heard from. Such a stand was bound to capture constituencies in the province of Quebec, and that was all they were after. From the viewpoint of the English-speaking provinces, we were not doing enough; they termed our navy a tin-pot navy. They wanted us to do more, to grant a contribution right away, and at the same time they allowed our Quebec friends to say that Borden was worse than Laurier, or rather that they were both conniving and that both should be discarded. Monk will be the next Prime Minister, they said, and as a matter of fact, my opponent in the election of 1911 pledged himself to cast his vote for whoever undertook to recall that obnoxious Navy Act passed by Laurier.

I am satisfied that every Nationalist candidate pledged himself similarly. That gentleman promised, even previous to the formation of a new ministry, that the Navy Act would be repealed. For, would he say, only return twenty independent representatives such as myself, and right after the elections, we shall proceed to Ottawa and there call on whoever is chosen to deliver the goods. I presume, and I have reason to believe that every candidate in the province of Quebec made a similar promise to his constituents. I think the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue spoke in that strain; I understand the hon. Postmaster General voiced similar views in the presence of his leader, Mr. Armand Lavergne, in Quebec county. He cannot deny it, I think; and after his return subsequent to accepting the portfolio of Postmaster General, addressing a meeting at Jeune Lorette, he advocated a plebiscite, and stated that if he could not get anything better he would be content with that. Does he prefer the 35-million vote to a plebiscite? As a matter of fact he made some such suggestion in a speech delivered before a political club in Quebec. If so, he is easily satisfied. I fear his electors will not approve of the view he has taken, when given a chance to assert themselves. During the 1911 election, my opponent and his friends in Laprairie and Napierville told the electors that this war navy—he never referred to the navy without prefixing ' war ' to the name, so as to make it sound more terrible to those poor mothers of family whom they had frightened so during the electoral campaign in Drummond and Arthabaska—that war navy will cost more than the total amount which the lands are valued at in both countries! Merely for construction, maintenance, the firing of the guns, the smallest require an expenditure of $80, and in proportion to the gauge the expense increases, and may reach $400, and even $1,000. I would enquire what they thought of the Borden amendment, and they would reply all together: We are against it. Mr. Borden is only Sir Wilfrid's valet, they would say in 1911. Now, I wonder what these gentlemen will say of him now that he calls on the House to vote thirty-five millions to His Majesty, without consulting the people, and without there being any urgency.

Are you aware, Mr. Speaker, that this contribution amounts to three times as much as the expenditure provided in the Canadian Navy Act of March, 1910? Accordingly, besides the valuation of the lands comprised in Laprairie and Napierville, the land values in St. Johns and Chateauguay should be included, and I fear I shall be obliged to cross the Richelieu river and take in as well the land values in Iberville.

Sir, that is the way Nationalists have instructed our people as regards their duty towards themselves and towards the Empire; and I am not a little surprised to hear the hon. Postmaster General entreat the Liberal party to set aside all partisan spirit in the consideration of this question. I wonder which party is to blame under the circumstances. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have lots of trouble ahead of them, and they will have only themselves to blame for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was stating a moment ago that, as far as I am concerned, my party connections are of no personal advantage. While I do not wish to be obnoxious to those hon. members who belong to the legal profession and who may count on political preference, I will say there is nothing in store for me to expect. However, I am sorry to say that my constituents whom I have the honour of representing in this House are in a very different position. The defeat of the former Government is going to cost them a great deal: five dollars a head for every man, woman and child in the family, and families of ten children are not scarce in my constituency. Add to that the father and mother, total twelve, at $5 a head, that is $60 per family; and the population numbering 20,000, we get a total of $100,000 for the first contribution.

It is very seldom that I take part in the debates; I am an Opposition back-bencher, only a plain farmer; but from the outset I have been asking to myself why we should vote that grant if we are to build a Canadian navy, especially when the British Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, and the First Lord of the Admiralty, Mr. Churchill, state that it is at the request of the Canadian ministers assembled in London, that they declare themselves satisfied of the generous gift tendered by the Dominion Government.

There is no evidence of urgency in the memorandum, and the Prime Minister himself has not endeavoured to show that there existed any. The move was simply intended to relieve a very embarrassing situation for the two wings making up the cabinet, English-speaking Conservatives, and Quebec Conservatives, who were known under the name of Nationalists previous to September 21st, 1911.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind it would have been very easy to settle that question. There is no emergency. Mr. Churchill states that Great Britain is still in a position to defeat any combination of the two greatest powers, and that she is constantly increasing the strength of her navy to keep up with the development of foreign armaments. The Admiralty experts state that until the year 1920 is reached, the British fleet will stand towards Germany, as regards large battleships, in the proportion of 15 to 10; that is to say that for every 10 German dreadnoughts, Great Britain will have 15, and for every 20 German dreadnoughts, Great Britain will have 30, and so forth. So we have lots of time ahead of us in Canada to build our own ships, starting with the smallest, and later on, when our revenue will have considerably increased, we will be in position to build two dreadnoughts to complete each unit.

Sir, as far as I am concerned, I must admit right away that I am not in so great a hurry as hon. gentlemen on your right. The longer it will take to build that Canadian navy, the happier shall I be. I am opposed to any expenditure, either in the shape of a contribution or of ships built abroad for our Canadian navy. And what induces me to take that stand is the fact that in shipbuilding 70 per cent of the cost goes into labour. So should we spend thirty-five millions, within the next ten or fifteen years, to build our Canadian fleet, our Canadian workmen will earn through that new industry, close on twenty-five million. That will be so much money coming back to Canada; all will profit thereby, and the Government, as the great Canadian wholesaler, will have this year 100 millions of customs receipts and nearly 20 millions in excise duties.

Besides, it should not be forgotten that in 1897 the customs receipts amounted to barely 20 millions, and that through the Fielding adjustment of the tariff, the duties were on an average cut dwn by 3 per cent. Our people were leaving us, and those who remained had not enough money to provide for the necessaries of life, to keep them from starving. Thanks to the carrying on of important public works and to a large influx of immigrants, we are now in a period of great prosperity. Do you think, Sir, that if our large public works had been carried through by means of foreign labour, of workmen who would have returned home every fortnight to spend their earnings there, our country's revenue would be as large as it is to-day? No, Mr. Speaker, and that is one of the reasons why I am opposed to any contribution.

The Prime Minister calls on us to vote 35 millions to Great Britain, without having any good reason to offer to justify such a demand, no emergency, no semblance of emergency just now, and for several years to come. The Prime Minister wishes us to make a gift to a people twenty five times, to say the least, as well off as we are. Great Britain within the last seven years has cut down her public debt by 365 millions. We have increased ours by over 100 millions. The per capita debt of the British people is less than ours; their debt per head is also much smaller than ours. Great Britain is not as we are under the necessity of carrying out large public works over such a vast extent of territory as we have. In the older European countries, where the whole territory is occupied, conditions are quite different from those to be found in this country, where everything yet remains to be done, railways and canals to be built, harbours to equip, &c.

Sir, to my mind the Government should, in the first place, bring about the establishment of dockyards in this country. Not only warships, but also merchantmen could be built in such places, and that would start a new industry, while dockyards were being equipped towards the turning out of ships for the Canadian navy.

A moment ago I heard the hon. member for Queens and Sunbury (Mr. McLean) state that we were not just now in a position to build dreadnoughts in Canada. I am aware of it, Mr. Speaker, but I am also aware of the fact that we are not just now in need of any. Besides, we will do exactly like those countries where it was found impossible to build dreadnoughts from the start, but which later on secured the necessary equipment, like Germany, for instance, where dreadnoughts are to-day being built. I noticed that while that hon. gentleman was giving out that statement, the right hon. Prime Minister's countenance was beaming, and that the Nationalist members from the province of Quebec, who were returned on the understanding that they would vote against the navy, thumped their desks almost too hard for safety, simply because the hon. member for Queens and Sunbury was contending that we could not build such large ships in Canada. I for one rejoice that it is so, as I see no necessity for building them hastily. But those Nationalist members who would not have any ships or any navy, countenance a proposal whereby such dreadnoughts will be built in Great Britain. I wonder how they will explain the matter to their constituents, and it is just possible that when the day of retribution comes they will have cause for regret.

I would suggest to the Finance Minister, if he be at a loss to properly spend that money, to apply it as I have stated above. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister appears to be pretty much in the same position as the child who on a sudden falls heir to a large estate, without his having had any share in building it up. He is at a loss how to squander it rapidly enough, thinking that he can never get through such a fortune, and spending right and left. I very much fear that the Finance Minister will take after that young fellow, in the spending of the surpluses secured through the policy of his predecessor; and to begin with he gives away 35 millions.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard several hon. gentlemen on the other side refer on the floor of the House to the former Government's tin-pot navy. They stated that such a navy would be Canadian in time of peace and Imperial in time of war. I may be allowed to express here my view of the matter. Great Britain does not and will not require the assistance of our navy even in time of war. But, supposing Canada were to be without ships either on the Atlantic or the Pacific, it might happen that the power waging war on Great Britain should send one or two of its old, out-of-date ships, of no use in an actual encounter at sea, to block our seaports and prevent our merchantmen from getting out. And, Mr. Speaker, those are just the ships which Great Britain needs the most to protect; in time of war Great Britain will need provisions and supplies of all kinds more than she will want dreadnoughts or any other kind of ships.

I for one, Sir, submit that it is incumbent on the Government, in the fulfilment of its duty towards the country, the Dominion of Canada and the Empire, to see to the strengthening of our land defences, and the equipment of dockyards, for the purpose of building up a Canadian navy; and as far as I am concerned, it will be a Canadian navy in time of war as well as in time of peace. And should at the time our Government deem it necessary to send out our navy to assist the British fleet, they will be the judges in the matter.

Before closing my address, I wish to make a statement on my own behalf. Sir, it has been shown that there is no emergency, and, besides that Great Britain is in a position to hold her own; moreover the British Government and Admiralty, in conference with our Canadian ministers assembled in London in 1910 have come to the conclusion that the Canadian Government should build its own navy. This contribution of 35 millions, as stated by the hon. Minister of Marine, will be levied on our current revenue. That is so, but we will be under the necessity of borrowing that amount in England, and with a view to carry through our great undertakings, such as the Transcontinental, the Hudson Bay railway, the Welland canal, the deepening of the St. Lawrence, the improvement and equipment of our harbours, viz., Montreal, Quebec, St. John, Halifax. Since we have so many millions available for gift-making to Great Britain, I for one, seeing there is no emergency and that we are not in a position just now to start shipbuilding, would suggest to the Government to expend these 35 millions on the Georgian Bay canal. You might make a start at this session by asking for a vote of ten millions in the supplementaries, and by the end of the third year you would have thirty millions expended on that canal. By that time work on the Transcontinental would be at an end, and the Government would then be in a position to provide for termination of that canal. And once the dockyards have been built and equipped, we may start building ships for the Canadian navy.

As I was saying a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, should we take off 30 millions to start building the Georgian Bay canal, there would still be left five millions of that 35 million gift. That amount might be distributed in the form of grants to the provincial governments towards helping on the good roads movements. These governments would thereby be enabled to construct 200 miles of macadamized roads in this country, with the help of grants from their own legislatures and the various municipalities. Thus every one would profit by that expenditure and the improvement of our highways. Do not lose sight of this other fact, that the improvement of our highways would help materially in reducing the cost of living in large centres. Then, Mr. Speaker, all would approve, because all would profit thereby. If we had good roads, I am satisfied that the Laprairie farmers would go in more for truck farming, as Montreal would provide a good market for such products.

I wish to define my position in this House and in my constituency in regard to this contribution for the navy. I voted for the navy in 1910, as I expected that such a navy would not require for its maintenance more than three per cent of our total revenue, as stated by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, the then Prime Minister. That Canadian navy was to cost $11,700,000, in round figures $12,000,000.

The Government is now making the offer of three dreadnoughts, and the 1911 Nationalists will say in Quebec, at the next election: of two proposals we chose the less expensive, the payment of 35 millions once for all. The hon. Postmaster General stated in his speech that the Opposition members were desirous of exacting something more than the mere expenditure of 35 millions, they wanted blood, the sacrifice of human lives, as politicians are fond of saying on the hustings of the province of Quebec.

The hon. Mr. Foster stated in Toronto that we will soon have a Canadian navy. That statement was made in order to satisfy the Ontario jingoes, and even those from New Brunswick, such as the one we have just listened to, the hon. member for Queens and Sunbury (Mr. McLean).

The amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) proposes the building of a Canadian navy. On the other hand, the right hon. Prime Minister proposes that the House should make at once a gift of 35 millions to Great Britain for the building of three dreadnoughts. But it will be necessary besides to find three or four thousand men to man these ships, and provide for their pay, as well as for the maintenance of these dreadnoughts. Do you expect, Sir, that the men who will man those three dreadnoughts will not be taken from our midst, through the instrumentality of the Government and paid out of the public exchequer of the Dominion? It is a well known fact that Great Britain complains of not having enough sailors to man all her ships. Ships are not wanting, but rather the men, as stated by the British ministers. They will have to find them somewhere, and an effort will surely be made to secure them in Canada. I surmise that is the content of the secret document which these hon. gentlemen on the other side will not give out.

Let us see what Mr. Churchill stated in the British House of Parliament on July 24 last: Lord Selborne asked that eight dreadnoughts be built instead of three. If they were constructed, it would be impossible, as far as I know, to provide these vessels with officers and men at the time they would be ready to launch; unless other good ships, still capable of doing excellent service, were discarded. Now then, Mr. Speaker, if we should make to the Government that gift of three dreadnoughts, without the sailors to man them, we would not be assisting the Empire, since the Admiralty officers state that it is useless to build new dreadnoughts, if men cannot be had to man them. So I must conclude that the Canadian Government have promised to supply Canadian sailors to put on board these vessels, once they are built and ready to launch.

Not only am I opposed to the giving of those 35 millions; I am even more opposed to increasing the expenditure for military purposes as proposed by the hon. Minister of Militia. The estimates for the Canadian militia for the year 1913-14 aggregate $10,500,665, an increase of $1,604,268 over those of last year. In 1910-11, six millions and a half were expended on the militia, and our opponents in the province of Quebec stated that we were extravagant. The hon. minister will have something more to put in the supplementaries, and that with the $10,500,665, will make up a total amount of eleven millions. Add to that twelve millions for a dreadnought, that will give a total outlay of $23,000,000 for military purposes.

Mr. Speaker, the people of this country are against such extravagance. During the last election, in Quebec, the Nationalist candidates, so-called, carried on their campaign, having as the main plank in their platform the condemnation of the policy of the Laurier Government in connection with the militia. Will these same gentlemen who were returned in 1911, clamor as loudly against the enormous military estimates forced on the right hon. Prime Minister by his Minister of Militia? If they are sincere they will do so.

Mr. Speaker, we are going to spend 23 millions this year. Let us suppose that our revenue reaches 200 millions; we are thus spending one-eighth of our revenue for military purposes. In a young country such as ours, where there is still so much to be done for the development of its resources, I say it is a crime to follow such a course.

Here is the stand I propose to take on this question of military expenditure. I oppose and shall continue to oppose any Government that spends more than $1.50 per head of population for military and naval purposes. Whatever party is in power, there is no justification for spending more than 7 millions for our militia at the present time, and if we put the population down at 8 millions, that would give a total grant of 12 millions for both the militia and the navy. The farming community which I represent, and more particularly the electors of Laprairie and Napierville, are opposed to such heavy outlay for military purposes.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with the granting of this vote of 35 millions, I say the Government is not backed by one half of the electorate. As a matter of fact hon. members on the other side who hail from the province of Quebec, when they went up for election pledged themselves, with very few exceptions, that nothing would be done either in the way of contribution or in the way of ship-building, without an appeal to the people.

Before resuming my seat I wish to state that I am at variance with all the suggestions made by the hon. member for Queens and Sunbury (Mr. McLean), and especially to that in regard to the appointment of a committee to bring about a compromise between the two parties, whereby dreadnoughts would be given to Great Britain and the building of a navy started in Canada. I am opposed to granting those 35 millions, and to the building for the present of battleships, for which there is no need. I am content with the naval proposals of 1910; I abide strictly by the policy then propounded and put through by the Laurier government, a policy based on the resolution unanimously adopted by this House in 1909.

I think I have said enough to define the stand I propose taking on this question, a stand similar to that taken in 1909, 1910 and 1911. If in the course of the last election, I had gone from house to house in my constituency telling people that if elected I would vote for instance for the repeal of the Laurier Navy Act, I am satisfied I would have captured one hundred more votes. But I was averse to catching votes under false pretenses. I always said that I was in favour of a Canadian navy and that I approved the provisions contained in the Navy Act. I was unwilling to express a certain view to one elector and the contrary view to another. I believe my constituents will acknowledge in due time that I have acted squarely and that, after taking my seat in this House, I did not break my pledges.

On motion of Mr. Lemieux, debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 9, respecting Canadian Explosives, Limited.—Mr. Ames.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 20, respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—Mr. Lespérance. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On section 1—increase of capital to $15,000,000:

Mr. LANCTOT.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): This Bill is of vital importance to the whole country, inasmuch as it deals with the capitalization of a public service corporation. This Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company is very well known in the part of the country from which I come, in the city of Toronto, and in the Niagara district. This company lately took over the Niagara Steamship Line, which has a number of boats plying between Toronto and Niagara which carry a large portion of the fruit of the Niagara district in which western Canada is very much interested. This fruit trade is one of the growing trades of this country; and the fruit growers of Ontario have a very serious grievance in the express charges on their shipments. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company control this Niagara line and now have control of the navigation on the St. Lawrence route from below Quebec to the Welland canal. The company's vessels are increasing in number and size and its service to the public is increasing in importance; and therefore the public has all the greater direct interest in the capitalization of this company. Whether its charges for carriage by water alone come within the purview of the Railway Commission I do not pretend at this moment to say But, so far as concerns its freight on the shipments partly by water and partly by rail, the charges come within the control of the Railway Commission, and certainly within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. One axiom in connection with transportation—it may not be accepted in this House, but it is accepted elsewhere—is that the capitalization charges are the first that must come out of the service tolls that the public pay. And it follows that if the capitalization of a transportation company is extravagant or is wrongly organized, then the charges put upon the public for transportation must be unduly high. It is by no means a new doctrine, though it seems to be new in Canada, that the capitalization of a public service corporation is of first consideration to the community and ought to be of first consideration to the legislature representing the community. This doctrine applies to banks as well as to transportation companies, it applies to telegraph companies, to telephone companies and to all the great public service corporations that are in the hands of private investors. The view has been accepted in the United States and everywhere else that the regulation of the capital of these corporations is of the very first importance.

Now, I have no prejudice against the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. I am not in any way interested in the struggle which is said to be going on for the control of that company; that matter is wholly immaterial to me. But the capitalization of this company is of great concern to the people of Canada; and I intend to show that unless Parliament exercises some control over the capital of the great public franchise companies, it will be bad for the public, as I think I shall be able to establish.

I understand that the present capitalization of this company is $10,000,000, and it is proposed to increase it to $15,000,000. It may be that this company needs this money. But even so, is it going the right way about getting it? The people of the United States have found that an issue of common stock is not always the right way; and in certain states of the union, companies of this kind have to go before a public body to justify any proposed increase of the capital. It may be that this company can get all the money it requires by an issue of four per cent bonds. At present, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company pays a dividend to its shareholders very much greater then four per cent; and it is not limited to any rate of dividend. If it makes this large issue of common stock, and pays its shareholders dividends of ten or fifteen per cent, it follows per force that the service charges to the general public must be higher than they ought to be. Now, I contend that a company with the resources, assets and business of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, if it requires five millions of additional capital for the purposes of the undertaking, can get it by means of a bond issue at four or four and a half per cent. The bonds are better than common stock in the market, because they rest on the security of all the assets of the company. It must be remembered that these vessels carry the fruit in Ontario from the Niagara district not only to Toronto, which is a great central market, and not only from Hamilton to Toronto, but also to Montreal and to Quebec. One of the important questions to the fruit growers of Western Ontario is how they can get into the market, not only of Toronto and of Ontario but also of Montreal, Quebec and the Maritime provinces. And the more reasonable these capitalization charges in such a company as this, the more the likelihood of reasonable control by the Railway Commission, the greater is the certainty, that there will be lower freight charges. Therefore this company ought to be compelled to state to Parliament, or, as I would like it better, state to some commission appointed for that purpose, and preferably the Railway Commission, how they propose to raise this additional capital, to what purposes they intend to apply it, what prospects they have of making reasonable earnings on the capital to be raised. This measure relating to the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company raises the whole question of the capitalization of public franchise companies. It brings before this House and the people the recent capitalization manipulation of the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has been raising enormous quantities of capital by issuing common stock, not by putting it on the market for what it would bring, but as 'a melon-cutting proposition,' to use the current phrase, through the distribution of these shares to existing shareholders at a lower price than would have been paid for them in the open market. I am not prepared to take up the time of the House with a statement of facts in connection with the Canadian Pacific railway, as hon. gentlemen have heard a great deal in regard to the matter; but if this kind of financing is permitted to continue in this country, I fear the result will be the same as that in connection with the capitalization of public service companies in the United States. The transportation companies of the United States to-day—I refer chiefly to the railway companies—cannot enter into financial dealings in the money markets of the world. They cannot sell stocks or bonds, and are obliged to borrow the money required for the purposes of their respective undertakings by means of short-date loans at six per cent. The reason for this condition is that so many of the American railroads have been over-capitalized; so many melons have been cut; so much common stock has been distributed among the shareholders, and especially among the promoters of the companies, that their securities are discarded in the money markets of Europe; and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has set this most evil example in Canada. That company has unnecessarily increased its capitalization and its issue of common stock; it has cut melon after melon, and if this Bill goes through unchallenged, and if the Government does not face the proposition and state what it intends to do in regard to the capitalization of this and other companies, the result will be the giving of a free hand to these transportation companies, the Bell Telephone Company included, in regard to this very important matter. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company may do the same thing, as there is no guarantee in this Bill that the stock is to be sold at the highest price; it may be distributed as a melon. No information has been forthcoming to the effect that this stock is not to be given as bonus stock to the shareholders, and that is one of the great features of the melon cutting industry in Canada to-day—giving new issues of stock as bonuses to the shareholders. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has not done this openly, but it has given stock worth 260 to its own shareholders for 175, and it offered the stock at 175 because of the fact that a few hon. gentlemen in this House directed public attention to this great scandal. When the Canadian Pacific Railway Company first started this melon cutting, giving the stock to their own shareholders at par, I raised a very strong protest in this House in respect to such procedure; but it has been continued, and the same issue is now raised in regard to another company which proposes to follow along the same lines.

I desire to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the result of this system of capitalization which is obtaining in Canada at the present time, and becoming so general. When Canadians went to the London and European money markets in the old days, they went with securities at three and a-half and four per cent. Since this procedure, to which I have referred, has been inaugurated in Canada, the entire capital stock of some of these companies has been designated as bonus stock, the company has been put on a bonding proposition, and has sold these bonds at a price as near par as possible. In order to induce the English purchaser of these securities to take the bonds, they gave them a big gift of free stock. Whether the corporation is a railway company, telegraph company, telephone company or electric railway line, the people served by it are paying dividends on the capital stock that was given away; they are paying interest on the bonds, and, naturally, feel that they are under a monopoly. A time there was when ordinary bonds of the Government of Canada were a three per cent or three and a half per cent proposition on the London market. Legislation was introduced this session whereby bonds endorsed by the Government of Canada were quoted at less than ninety on the money market, to save ourselves from the awful loss resulting from the London and European money markets being vitiated by this new system of finance, we have had to buy back these Grand Trunk Pacific bonds ourselves. When the Government of Canada goes to-day to the London money market, it finds it harder than ever to sell the ordinary bonds of Canada, as the London investor invariably makes inquiry with reference to the bonus stock. In dealing with this matter, the whole question of capitalization must be considered. The careless kind of capitalization we have had here is proved by the fact that even the provincial governments find trouble now in financing their securities. The municipalities of Ontario are finding trouble in financing debentures because of this new kind of stock propositions that are being put on the market, either stock that carries melons, or bonds that carry free gifts of common stock; and that may be the intention of this company in this Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York).

Not only has Canadian credit, Dominion, provincial and municipal, been impaired by this kind of capitalization, but the very men who introduced into this country this kind of stock manipulation are, through their organs in this country and in the old country, publishing literature, some of which is summarized in the Monetary Times of last week, to the effect that owing to the craze for municipal ownership in this country municipal securities are worth very little in England, and the very men who have made this criticism are the men who have overloaded the English market with bonds carrying gifts of common stock, mainly for propositions that are outside the jurisdiction of Canada. Canadians to-day are going to the money markets of Europe with propositions of this kind for different parts of the world. They vitiated the market, and now they are telling that market that the municipal securities of this country are not good. Certainly they are not good as compared with these melon stocks. They are good securities; but these men whom we have incorporated here in Ottawa and in the various provincial capitals are going to the European market, and saying: Here is a public service in Canada or out of Canada, and we will give you the securities at a certain price, and then give you this free gift of common stock. The result is that the credit of Canada has gone down in the British market as compared with these propositions; the credit of the provinces and of our municipalities has gone down; and if we do not stop this kind of financing and stop the great Canadian Pacific railway from doing it, if we do not regulate this Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, disaster is ahead of us in floating our reasonable securities.

In the United States they have attacked this evil and I have given notice that when this Bill comes up for a third reading I shall move that a clause from the law of Massachusetts, which was designed for this very purpose, shall be inserted. That clause says:

> Such stock as issued shall be offered for sale by auction, and any shares not sold for want of bidders may be sold by the company at private sale, but for not less than their market value.

We should have that clause on our statute-book in regard to the Canadian Pacific railway. That railway has put out securities in the way of common stock which it did not want; when its treasury was overflowing it put out stock, as the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company will do, to its own shareholders, at a less price than could be got for it in the markets of the world. Massachusetts has dealt with this, and the state of New York is even more far-reaching in its reform. It must be remembered that New York is the place now where the great public service companies of the United States have to do most of their financing. Before they can finance they have got to go to the Public Service Commission in the state of New York and comply with the following requirements: Before authorizing new issues the Public Service Commission has to be satisfied that there is a reasonable prospect that the venture is commercially feasible and that the amount to be expended is not in excess of the actual requirement.

Another very necessary provision is that accummulated profits contributed by the public should not be made the basis of additional capitalization imposing further burdens on that same public. That is what they propose to do with the Richelieu and Ontario if they are like the Canadian Pacific railway—and they have their headquarters in the same city. They will use this issue of stock in the way of distribution of accummulated profits which are in the treasury of the company. This is directly against the public interest and it has been found against the public interest in the states of New York and Massachusetts. There cannot be the same kind of issues in any part of Europe as we have in this country, they have been found to be against the public interest. We have been up against it here in Canada and, as I say, the only way that you can finance any Canadian issue in the Old Country is to have a melon or rights in connection with it. The great thing with the Canadian Pacific railway to-day is the rights that go with the stock. The English investor is ready for the Canadian Pacific railway rights or the Canadian Pacific railway melon, but the ordinary, everyday security that is offered to the British public, whether it be bonds of the Dominion or of a province or of a municipality, is discredited and discounted in the market to-day, and will be much more so if we do not stop the process.

Another matter in regard to the Canadian Pacific railway comes up in connection with the next clause of this Richelieu and Ontario Bill. It says:

> The company may invest and deal with moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may seem expedient.

I wish to direct the attention of western members of this House to the use of the accumulated capital of the Canadian Pacific railway. The Canadian Pacific railway has immense savings in its treasury at Montreal. It has probably $40,000,000 of savings in Montreal and it is issuing stock that is earning ten and twelve per cent dividends when it could get that money at four per cent or less, and the Richelieu and Ontario company want to do what the Canadian Pacific railway have been doing. If I am wrong, I want the Minister of Finance or somebody who knows something about the financial operations of the Canadian Pacific railway to correct me. The Canadian Pacific railway is very closely associated with the Bank of Montreal. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, president of the Canadian Pacific railway, is a director of the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. BORDEN : Mr. Chairman, there is not the slightest objection to the hon. member discussing the Canadian Pacific railway or its increase of stock; but this is not a Bill relating to the Canadian Pacific railway, but a Bill relating to the Richelieu and Ontario company. While my hon. friend may use illustrations, I do not think a specific discussion of that company is in order.

Mr. MACLEAN : My illustration is immediately applicable, because I am going to show that if this Richelieu and Ontario company is allowed to issue stock without being regulated, and then to employ its accumulations in its treasury for investment as the Canadian Pacific railway employs its savings, we have a wrong going on in this country that certainly must be met. The point I wish to make is that the Canadian Railway Company have these enormous accumulation which the Richelieu and Ontario Company now proposes to have, and they are put in the Bank of Montreal which lends the money, $62,000,000 of it, on the New York Stock exchange in order to uphold the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway, instead of using these profits for the benefit of the system. That is the plan that is now being proposed by the Richelieu and Ontario Company. That is the practice followed by the Canadian Pacific railway. As far as I can gather, the Richelieu and Ontario propose by this legislation to be put in a position by law to follow the example of the Canadian Pacific railway, and to use its accumulations in its treasury in call loans in connection with its own stock. Now, that is rather a serious charge, but that is the practice we are asked to recognize and to put on our statute-book. We have the example of the Canadian Pacific railway, which, as I have said, instead of devoting its immense cash reserves to the betterment and extension of its roads, has been issuing more common stock which must pay a dividend of at least ten per cent, and which must be the measure of the charges imposed on the people of Canada in connection with freight rates. So it comes to this House. I know it may be an objectionable thing to bring this out in this House, but I do not know of any other way of calling attention to it than by pointing out that the Richelieu and Ontario, by this proposal which they have before the Parliament of Canada to-day, intends to embark on a similar course to that followed by the Canadian Pacific railway. It is not in the interests of this country that we should allow any transportation company to accumulate great reserves and to use these accumulations for investment. The reserves of the Canadian Pacific railway, as well as the reserves of this company, ought to be devoted to two purposes—to the betterment of the service, and to the reduction of rates. If anybody tells me that these companies were incorporated for any other purposes than these, I shall be surprised. The Canadian Pacific railway was enfranchised to give a great public service. It was not enfranchised to create a great reserve of money in Montreal which could be used or loaned in connection with stock speculation. The people of this country do not intend that the Richelieu and Ontario Company should in the same way accumulate great reserves and be empowered by Parliament to make investments from time to time as the directorate see fit. It is not in the interests of transportation that it should be allowed to do so. There will never be any reduction in the freight rates in the West unless a remedy is found for this cardinal evil, which was inaugurated by the Canadian Pacific railway, of issuing stock that must pay at least ten per cent to the shareholders, when they could get all the money they wanted at four per cent. If this practice is to be allowed, or if any other company is to be allowed to follow the example of the Canadian Pacific railway, hereafter our finance will be turned upside down, and we shall find it impossible to get money for any purpose. So I am going to ask this House to pass upon this question when we come to the third reading of the Bill, and to declare whether this kind of financing is to be allowed in the country—whether a company is to be given the right to issue stock without any provision being put in the legislation declaring that that stock when sold shall be sold at the highest price, and that the proceeds shall be devoted to the purpose of the undertaking instead of being used as stock speculating money in Wall street or in the stock exchanges of Canada. That issue has not been settled in this country. The Canadian Pacific railway has not yet apologized for its practice, or said that it intends to stop this method of finance. It intends to pursue it,and this House will give the Canadian Pacific railway a whitewash of all that it has done if, it puts in the Bill that is now before it, the right to issue common stock without any explanation of how it is to be sold, or of the purpose to which the money is to be devoted.

The people in the West say they are burdened with freight rates. They have been before the Railway Commission a long time trying to get relief from excessive freight rates. One of the reasons they say, why frieght rates are excessive in the West is this great accumulation of money which the Canadian Pacific railway has, and which it is not devoting to the purposes of the undertaking—to the betterment of the road or to the reduction of freight rates. That money is being kept in Montreal and used on the stock exchange. The Richelieu and Ontario Company are going to do the same thing. The people of my own riding and the people of the West have a grievance in the matter of railway rates, and Parliament ought to regulate these things. I am going to read what the Montreal Gazette says about this proposal of mine. The Montreal Gazette is the organ of many big corporations or rather a newspaper very friendly to those that are carrying on this new kind of finance, this high finance, as it is called, a kind of finance that has practically ruined the United States, so far as having the confidence of the money markets of the world is concerned. We only want to do a little more of this sort of thing in Canada, and we will find our financial propositions in London ranking with those of the United States. The New York Central cannot issue a bond to-day, because of melon cutting in the past; the Pennsylvania road has had great trouble in putting out its bonds, and has been reduced to raising money on short-date loans at six per cent. Here is what the Montreal Gazette says of this proposal:

> It is proposed to incorporate by amendment in the Bill of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, now before the House of Commons, a proposal that the new stock it is proposed to issue shall be sold to the public by auction. The idea is one of the most extraordinary heard of for a long time, even coming from the home of Cobalting finance and radicalism, Toronto.

I do come from Toronto, and maybe I am a radical. Maybe I am preaching some new doctrine, but if so, I am glad to preach it in this House. There has to be regulation of those transportation companies in the matter of their financing, and it has to start with the Richelieu and Ontario Company here to-day, or the public ought to know of it. The Canadian Pacific railway must be regulated in regard to this financing, and I intend to make it an issue as far as I can on the third reading of this Bill. The Gazette continues:

> Anyone who knows how widely the stock of a big company is distributed throughout the country and often throughout other countries, will know how ineffective a method of putting out a new issue, a sale by auction in one city would be. The thing would simply make it impossible for the company concerned to get a reasonable price for its securities, if it could sell them in quantity, and would work directly, where it would work at all, to inflation of capital. If when the issue is joined the proposal gets four votes the House of Commons will suffer in the public esteem.

The Montreal Gazette, the organ of these great corporations, says in its issue this morning that if there are four men in this House who will vote for such regulation of the capitalization of public utilities as I propose, or any reasonable regulation which any one else may suggest, the reputation of the House of Commons will go down. Are there four men in this House who believe in the regulation of the capitalization of these companies?

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary): There is one, anyway.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Lots of them.

Mr. MACLEAN: There is a gentleman here who says there is one member in the House who believes in it, and perhaps who made the speeches in the West with regard to this very thing?

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary): I am.

Mr. MACLEAN: Then there are two.

Mr. EMMERSON: You will find some if you look over here.

Mr. MACLEAN: I hope I will find some. And yet the most conservative paper in this country . . . I do not use that word in the political sense but in the financial sense . . . says this House will be disgraced if there are four members who think that public service corporations should be regulated with respect to their capitalization. It makes fun of the idea of auctioning this stock on the market, but, they do it in Massachusetts. In Toronto, we have a most successful local company, the Consumers Gas Company, and its dividend is limited to ten per cent and anything higher than that must be applied to the reduction of the price of gas, and the price of gas is going down in Toronto steadily because of that regulation. And when that company issue new stock for the benefit of the undertaking, it is sold in the auction room. I remember when it used to be sold at 150, and then went to 180, and then 190, and then 200, and recently it sold almost as high as Canadian Pacific railway stock, and they had no trouble in getting the money. But, according to the Montreal Gazette, there is only one way of disposing of such stock and that is the old-fashioned way. If anyone convinces me that the Canadian Pacific railway could not get on the public market more than 175, for the stock it was recently empowered to issue—or as I contend which it empowered itself to issue,—then I will give up my case.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon member is not confining his discussion to clause 2.

Mr. MACLEAN: I have made my point, Mr. Chairman. I ask the gentleman who is promoting this Bill if it is the intention of the Richelieu and Ontario Company to sell this stock on the market and to devote all this money to the purposes of the undertaking, or, whether the company will issue the stock in whatever way they please.

The CHAIRMAN: I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that clause 2 which we are now discussing, deals with the investment of moneys which the company may have on hand.

Mr. MACLEAN: Then if you keep me to section 2, I will say that this company intends to invest this money for other purposes than that of the company and the upholding of its franchise, and having said that, I have said what I have to say. The Montreal Gazette attacks the people of Toronto and calls them radicals, because we want to regulate these public companies. Is it because we have public ownerships in Toronto that the Gazette seeks to ridicule us? Let me tell hon. gentlemen that Joseph Chamberlain was one of these kind of radicals, and he has quite a reputation in the Empire. He believes in those radical ideas which cause the Montreal Gazette to attack the people of Toronto. I say that the responsibility is on the Government to introduce some kind of regulation as to the issue of this stock and as to the use of the capitalization of this company, and I intend, when the Bill gets to its third reading, to move the amendment of which I have given notice.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know that I would like to follow the hon. member for South York to the full extent he wishes to travel in this case, but there is a great deal in what he has said which requires very careful consideration from this House. I have not yet been able to get any satisfactory information from the promoter of the Bill or from anyone else as to why this extraordinary power should be granted to this company by Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Without regulation.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has stated that the proposition as to putting the stock up at auction is not new and while I do not know as to that, I do know that it is not a new thing to regulate the power of these companies and to say that the shareholders shall not be entitled to receive a dividend above a certain fixed amount. We have an important example of that in New Brunswick. Probably the largest public utility in that province is the New Brunswick Telephone Company, and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) was a member of the New Brunswick legislature, and the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) was Attorney General, when legislation was passed providing that the stockholders of that company should not receive more than eight per cent; and if more than eight per cent be earned the Government has a right to step in and control the rates. I think in fact that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) was the promoter of that legislation. Why should a public utility which can only operate by a charter received from the people be in a position to take exhorbitant rates from the people? We know that certain public companies have increased their capital largely by cutting melons, and stock-jobbing, and so on, and when the people go to a public utility to-day and ask for a reduction of rates, the answer is: Oh, we have got so much stock, and we are compelled to pay dividends on it, and it would be unfair for you to interfere with our business so that we could not pay dividends. That would be all right if the stock represented all money, but more than half of it in some cases is watered, and it is unfair that the people of this country should be compelled to pay exorbitant rates so that dividends may be paid on this watered stock. I cannot understand why it is necessary for this company to get this five million dollars' worth of stock and to sell it according to the sweet will of the president of the company—because that is practically what it means in this case—for any price he wants to. He can cut a melon every day during the selling of the stock, if he so chooses. I think it is due to this committee that some reasonable cause be given before we pass this legislation. I raised this question on the second reading of the Bill and the promoter was not here, but he finally came to me and told me that in selling bonds it was practically necessary to sell the whole issue at the one time because you could get a much better price for it by doing so. Possibly he did not think I knew anything about selling bonds. I called his attention, however, to the fact that this did not provide for an issue of bonds. No man need try to tell me, if the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company require a million dollars worth of stock to build a new boat, that they are compelled to sell $5,000,000 worth of stock. You can see how absurd such a proposition is. If it is necessary to sell even $2,000,000 worth of stock for the purpose indicated, is it necessary to sell the whole $5,000,000? If the company are receiving the power to sell $5,000,000 worth of stock when they only require one million, you may rest assured that something is wrong, which is not in the interests of transportation, and which they are holding back from the committee. I wish to know from these hon. gentlemen what is the true reason. A reason was given that the company might, at the end of the year, have a little money left over, which was not required for paying dividends; and they did not want to deposit it in the bank at the nominal rate of three per cent, but they wanted a chance to invest. Does my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Lesperance) think that he is talking to a lot of school children? It is up to my hon. friend from Montmagny to tell us the real reason why he wants Parliament to give the company this exceptional power, the right to sell $5,000,000 worth of stock. He will not tell us what they are going to do with it; he does not say that they are going to build a new boat or even to repair an old one. In the absence of any reason, I believe that my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is almost right in what he has stated.

Mr. LESPERANCE: If my hon. friend will read over 'Hansard' of last Tuesday, when I explained the Bill, he will find I said that the new capital will be used for the purpose of buying or equipping terminals or buying new boats, and not for repairs.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend made that statement; but he did not add how much; he admitted that it would not take the whole of the increased capital, and he said: whatever is left over, we want the right to invest. Invest it in the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company? Invest it in the Banque Internationale or in what? I do not know; I am only offering these as suggestions. My hon. friend should tell this committee how much of this $5,000,000 is proposed to be used; what price it is proposed to sell the stock at. Is it to be sold at par, 110 or 117, which it is worth to-day? Where are the company going to build the terminals? How many boats are they going to buy? Are they going to use the whole or only half of the $5,000,000? If they are only going to use half, what are they going to do with the other half? These are pertinent questions. I think it comes back to the proposition of my hon. friend from South York, that the object of this company is to get hold of this stock; to sell it to the directors; to create a fund which will be put into the bank and will be used by the directors for other purposes than bona fide transportation in the Dominion of Canada. I have placed this proposition as trenchantly and as pointedly as I am able; and I think we are asking questions which should be answered. I wish to tell the hon. member for South York that two members of this House will oppose this proposition. I am satisfied that he will, and I know of another one. I think also that a good many members on both sides will vote against this proposition when it comes up. The hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. Minister of Finance, the three members of this Parliament who ought to be here to see that justice is done are not here this afternoon. It seems to me as if there had been some sort of an understanding that this Bill would be forced through. I hope not, I hope this will not be made a party measure; I hope that it will be tried on its merits, and that sufficient protection will be thrown around this Bill that the promoters will not be allowed to hold stock without protection being given to the shareholders; that it will be sold for all it is worth, and that nothing will be left for the directors to use in connection with any other transaction which they may have in view.

Mr. TURRIFF: This Bill is one that certainly interests every western member, every member who is interested in the transportation of wheat and other products of western farms. To my mind it is one of the most peculiar Bills that has ever been introduced in this House. We have heard from the hon. member for South York a great deal about the way in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company raised their funds; but this method is very much worse than anything that has been attempted of late years by the Canadian Pacific railway. Here the promoters ask for the right to issue $5,000,000 worth of stock, and no reason is given as to what they are going to sell it at, whereas in the case of the Canadian Pacific railway, their stock is being sold at seventy-five per cent above par. This stock may be sold at twenty-five cents, fifty cents, or seventy-five cents on the dollar, according to the sweet will of the directors of the company. We have seen in the press during the past year that this company is endeavouring to amalgamate with and control other navigation companies operating in Ontario waters. The result will be a further increase in the cost of bringing wheat from Fort William to Montreal.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): More mergers.

Mr. TURRIFF: Last year every bushel of wheat that went from Fort William to Liverpool cost the farmer from six to eight cents more than it cost two or three years ago. Why? Just because of such legislation as is going through this House to-day. Yet my hon. friends, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Railways and Canals, and the Minister of Finance, who should take an interest in this matter, deliberately walked out of the House, simply because the Government have no idea of doing anything to protect the farmer or the workingman. Their whole idea and their whole interests are to protect their friends who are promoting this Bill, the millionaires, the mergers and the combines. I wish every farmer in Canada was here to-day to see this legislation going through the House, and the reception which it is getting from the Government of this country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You might add the stock jobbers.

Mr. TURRIFF: Oh, stock jobbers, they are all in it. This company is asking for an increase of $5,000,000 in its capital, and absolutely no restriction is being placed on the issue of that stock. They may issue the $5,000,000 worth of stock at any price they see fit, buy a big boat or a little boat or buy nothing at all; and we are giving them special powers to invest that money according to their own sweet will, while the people of Canada, more especially the western farmers, are going to pay dividends on all that money. Surely it is time a halt was called. It was bad enough when the Canadian Pacific issued $60,000,000 worth of stock the other day, when they did not need a dollar, and issued it at $175 a share.

Mr. OLIVER: It is worth $270.

Mr. TURRIFF: Here there is no restriction whatever, not even one million dollars out of this $5,000,000 might go into the treasury of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, and yet the people of Canada, through the exorbitant and extortionate freight rates, will be compelled to pay dividends on the whole $5,000,000. That is the state of affairs, and I commend it to my right hon. friend.

Mr. BORDEN: What is the hon. gentleman's authority for stating that this stock can be issued below par?

Mr. TURRIFF: I say it may; there is no restriction.

Mr. BORDEN: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that it can be legally issued below par?

Mr. TURRIFF: My right hon. friend is a very clever lawyer. He knows perfectly well that millions of dollars worth of stock are issued at par and sold at par that does not bring ten per cent into the treasury of the company. Suppose this company wanted to buy a vessel really worth $100,000, the owners of the vessel say: All right, we will put on the vessel a valuation of $500,000 and we will take $500,000 worth of paid-up capital stock. That is the way it is done, and my right hon. friend knows it.

Mr. BORDEN: I did not know that anything of the kind could be done without a special statutory provision. Will my hon. friend say it can be done with such provision?

Mr. TURRIFF: Certainly; it is done every day of the week. How is it done in the case of mining companies?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend, the promoter of this Bill can laugh. He can afford to laugh; he knows how to put it over the public. And if he does not know, he does not have to go far to get the information. My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) may make himself easy on that score; the gentlemen behind this proposition and behind all the other propositions —this is no worse than the others— know how to get rid of the stock paid-up and at par, and yet, perhaps not to yield to the treasury more than twenty, thirty, forty or possibly fifty per cent of actual value. But still the company will have to pay dividends on the face value; because, in a few years—the promoters do not hold the stock but turn it over to others —the innocent purchaser may say 'I paid ninety per cent, or one hundred per cent for this stock, and I am entitled to my six, seven or eight per cent dividends. I believe that it is time a halt should be called to proceedings of this kind. Take the issue of the stock last year by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I doubt very much that they had the authority of Parliament to issue it; I do not believe they had the right to issue it. But, at least, they had some decency about it, they sold the stock at $175 a share——

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): After protest.

Mr. TURRIFF: After protest, certainly. But in the case before us, we do not know anything about it. These people may get par, they may get fifty cents on the dollar. But it will make no difference—the people of this country will have to pay for it, and the people of the West will have to pay. Look what happened last year, as I was pointing out. It cost eight cents a bushel more to have wheat carried from Fort William to Liverpool than it did the season before or the season before that.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Because of the merger of the trans-Atlantic lines.

Mr. TURRIFF: A merger on the ocean and also on the lakes—part and parcel of this very proposition that is now before the House. And what has been the result? In the West, we had one of the best crops we have ever produced. Yet I have been told by scores of farmers, men whom I know well, that while they had a big crop, yet so far as the profits resulting from the crops were concerned, it was the worst season they had ever had since they began farming in the West. When you take the cost of production and extra freight rate, the result has been a big crop, the handling of a lot of money, but no profits to the men who grow the wheat. And if legislation now before us passes, it will mean simply tying one more millstone around the necks of the farmers. Yet hon. members on the Government benches pay no attention to this sort of legislation, but let it through simply because it is promoted by the big interests and by their friends sitting behind them.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): It appears to me that this Bill should be discussed altogether aside from political consideration. But, judging from the warmth with which it is discussed on the other side, hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to inject into it a great deal of politics.

Mr. TURRIFF: With the hon. gentleman's permission, I would like to say, I took exactly the same ground against the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill when I was sitting on the Government side.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): I remember that when two similar Bills went through the House, promoted by friends of the hon. gentleman, no adverse criticisms emanated from that quarter. The Ottawa Electric Light Company's Bill, a similar Bill to this, was passed without adverse criticism from these hon. gentlemen. The Ottawa Gas Company was increasing its capitalization from $1,000,000 to $3,000,000. And in the Private Bills Committee the promoter stated they would not require the additional capital for twelve or fourteen years. I asked him why they proposed the increase now, and he said that they desired to have the capital on hand in case they wished to expend it.

Mr. CARVELL: Was there any provision there that the directors could use the money for any other purpose?

Mr. SHARPE: That is a feature of the Bill I will come to. I am speaking now simply of the increase of capitalization. And I am inclined to be somewhat suspicious of the bona fides of some of these hon. gentlemen opposite and to think that perhaps their attitude is due to the fact that this Bill is promoted by an hon. gentleman in this House friendly to the Government. This Bill is a business proposition, not a political proposition, and should be considered altogether on its merits. When this Bill together with the Ottawa Electric Light and the Ottawa Gas Company's Bill were before the committee, I raised a protest on the ground that there should be some public utilities commission, or some public board to which these companies should go, even after they had got our consent to an increase of capital— they should lay their plans before that board, show why they desired to raise money, and to get the permit of that board to issue from time to time the stock as desired. I do not think we should allow any of these companies that hold franchises or charters from this Parliament to issue securities for the raising of large capital to be held in the treasury. The capital should be raised for a specific purpose, and it should be used for the purpose for which Parliament gives permission to raise it. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), last session, say, that over-capitalization was a live question and one that should be considered by this House. I hope that he, or some other hon. member will bring in a Bill on the subject. This is a live question, and one that the House ought to consider and settle. But it is not right to discriminate against this particular company. This company is on the same basis as the others, and we should not pick it out and say that it is likely to engage in stock watering and others are not. This is the common practice of all these companies. We should consider the question altogether apart from politics. We should deal with all alike and should deal with them under some general legislation. I find that this Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company started in 1875 with a capital of $2,000,000, which they have since from time to time increased. The company is engaged in a public service, and that fact should be kept in mind. At the same time, this tendency to over-capitalization in the part of these companies exists, and it is the duty of the Government to deal with the problem and bring in a Bill to cover all such cases. In the absence of some general measure applying to all companies, I am in favour of the general principle that there should be some regulation of the capitalization of these concerns, and until there is some better provision made, I am in favour of the principle of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Representing a western constituency, I think I have quite as much interest in the welfare of the people of the West, although I do not speak very frequently in this House as some hon. gentlemen who do a great deal of talking. The question of the restriction of capitalization of companies is one the solution of which involves very great difficulties. I would like to commend to the attention of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) the nature of the legislation he has assisted in placing on the statute books of this country regarding the increase in the capitalization of companies, and if he can reconcile his attitude with his confession of faith here to-day, he will indeed square a circle. Let me direct that hon. gentleman's attention to the Companies Act of Canada, under which many of the large companies of Canada have during the last few years been incorporated. By sections 52 and 53, chapter 79 of the Companies Act of Canada, I find that the late Government placed upon the statute books an Act whereby it is provided:

52. The directors of the company may, at any time after ninety per centum of the capital stock of the company has been taken up and fifty per centum thereon paid in, make a by-law for increasing the capital stock of the company to any amount which they consider requisite for the due carrying out of the objects of the company.

No by-law for increasing or reducing the capital stock of the company, or for subdividing the shares, shall have any force or effect whatsoever, until it is approved by the votes of shareholders representing at least two-thirds in value of the subscribed stock of the company at a special general meeting of the company duly called for considering the same, and afterwards confirmed by supplementary letters patent.

53. Such by-law shall declare the number of shares of the new stock, and may prescribe the maner in which the same shall be allotted.

In default of the manner of the allotment of the shares of the new stock being prescribed by such by-law, the control of such allotment shall vest absolutely in the directors.

That is the legislation which the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), in his zeal for the West, placed upon the statute books; that is the legislation which the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) helped to place upon the statute-books of this country, but because, forsooth, this Bill is promoted by one who owes his faith to the Conservative party, hon. gentlemen opposite see fit to raise objections against it. It ill behooves the hon. member for Assiniboia to lecture this House on over-capitalization, when he assisted to place this legislation upon the statute books of Canada. Let these hon. gentlemen look at the matter fairly, and not make a political issue of a business proposition. It would look much better, and be more in keeping with their professed zeal for and interest in the welfare of the farmers of the country. I would assume from the observations the hon. gentleman just made, that he knows more about stock-jobbing and circumventing the law than he does about the interests of the farmers. Was it a timber company the hon. gentleman had in mind? Was it the Imperial Pulp Company? I will admit that so far as that company is concerned, the records show that a very large block of stock was given for a timber limit; as to how it was gotten, the less said about it the better.

So far as the first section of the Act is concerned, it coincides in every respect with the general provisions of the laws of Canada as placed upon the statute books by the Liberal Government. When the hon. gentleman from Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell), deals with this matter, he is lawyer enough to know—judging from his ability to get into this House, and the way in which it was done—he is lawyer enough to know that the first section of the Bill now under consideration is an exact reproduction of the corresponding section in the Companies Act, with the necessary changes made for the purpose of adequately covering the ground. The section of the Companies' Act which I have just read and the section of the Bill now before the House are identical in terms in so far as general provisions are concerned, except that in the Bill now before the House the amount of the increase is restricted by legislation, and in the other case it is not. If the hon. member for Edmonton desires to increase the capital stock of the Edmonton Bulletin, he does so under the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act of the province of Alberta, without any such restriction as he now seeks to impose by legislation. If the hon. member for South York desires to increase the capital stock of the Toronto World, he is subject to no restrictions such as have been suggested. I have given some little time and attention to the consideration of this question, and I have as yet been unable to arrive at any method by which we can solve the difficulties attendant upon it except that which I shall presently suggest. This section of the proposed Bill is far more restrictive in its operation than that of the present Act. Under the general law, you can do as you please; under this section there exists a limitation. When the hon. member for Assiniboia speaks of peddling stock out at ten cents on the dollar, I assume that long experience has given him the necessary knowledge in respect to the matter, but I know of no method by which under the law it can be done. The court of last resort in the British Empire has held that a company cannot issue stock at less than par, and aside from any provision in the statutes, the courts have repeatedly held that this cannot be done. When my hon. friend speaks of the issue of stock at ten, twenty, and thirty cents on the dollar, I can quite readily understand the reason for his statement. There was, I think, a company known as the Saskatchewan Land Company, and there have been other companies in western Canada which have devised ways and means by which to circumvent the law.

Mr. TURRIFF: I rise to a question of privilege. Is the hon. gentleman in order in stating that another member of this House has circumvented the law? If my hon. friend makes such a statement, I may tell him that it is absolutely false. As far as any of the companies he has mentioned are concerned, I never was interested in any one of them, or never had a share of stock in any one of them. The hon. gentleman's friends tried very often in my constituency to advance such an argument but they were beaten every time.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary).

Mr. BENNETT: I am delighted that we have had so clear an explanation of the hon. gentleman's knowledge of company law. He posed a few moments ago as an authority; he now withdraws any claim to a knowledge of the subject with which he was dealing, and virtually states that he was discussing it for political reasons only. The only gentleman I had in mind from whom there came any information the public might regard as valuable as concerning the attitude of the hon. member for Assiniboia, was Mr. Richardson, and it was from him the information came that the hon. gentleman was somewhat of a company promoter. Perhaps Mr. Richardson was mistaken, and as my knowledge was derived largely from that source, I will withdraw any statement reflecting on the hon. gentleman's propensities in that regard.

Might I now direct the hon. gentleman's attention to section 2 of the Act, which reads as follows:

> The company may invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may seem expedient.

I desire to refer indiscriminately to the articles of incorporation of some of the different companies, as appearing in the Canada Gazette, and the first one I see is that of Griffiths & Company, Limited, page 2552. We will see what it says as to the powers that are given. Power is given to every company under the Joint Stock Companies Act of Canada to do just what is provided for in this case, that is, temporarily invest its moneys in any scheme or manner desired; and I have no doubt that if a long-suffering constituent of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) were to approach the management of the Edmonton Bulletin when they had a surplus of cash in the treasury, the Bulletin Company would lend a few dollars on mortgage for six months or so. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman, in the exercise of his power as controlling director, would be glad to do so, and the hon. member for Lethbridge, I am sure, would not see a constituent suffer if he could lend him a few dollars for three months on a chattel mortgage. I am sure that the bowels of compassion of the hon. member for South York would not permit him to refuse a constituent a temporary loan if he had the surplus cash. So I take it that the section is merely a provision common to every company under the Companies Act. The ex-Secretary of State knows this perfectly well. Here are the words in connection with the first company I come across, Griffiths & Company, Limited, at page 2552 of the current Canada Gazette:

To invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required upon such securities as may from time to time be determined, and to lend money with or without security to customers and others having dealings with the company, to guarantee the performance of contracts by any such person or company, and to allow time for the payment of any debt that may be due to the company.

In every one of these companies that have been incorporated during the last five or ten years you will find just such a provision as is asked for in this Act.

But there is no doubt that, when dealing with a great transportation company, other impracticable and impossible. I devoted arily prevailing with a mercantile or trading corporation, and the problem which this country has sooner or later to face is how to regulate the increase of the capital stock, having regard to the rights of the people as well as the rights of shareholders. My hon. friend very properly directed attention to the fact that during a speech in western Canada I made some effort towards the solution of this problem; but in England I made inquiries and ascertained that if you sold stock of the Canadian Pacific railway by public auction it could not be quoted on the London Stock Exchange, and as its chief market was there, it was impossible to adopt that method as a solution. I found that this was true on most stock exchanges. It is true that for a purely local company incorporated in Alberta or Saskatchewan or in any of the states of the American Union the necessary legislation could be passed; but in the case of a large transportation company, with business throughout the country and with its stock listed on the great stock exchanges, I was advised, and I believe properly advised, that it was not possible to sell by public auction and get the benefits I have pointed out, because the stock could not then be sold on the stock exchange. Then the Government could not fix the price at which the stock could be sold. I looked up the figures with regard to the Great Northern Railway Company. A few years ago it sold at $350 a share. Yesterday it sold at $125 and only a few days ago that company increased its capital stock and gave to those shareholders who took up their allotment the right to purchase at par. Obviously, if any government anywhere should endeavour to fix the price at which the stock should be sold, those who could not subsequently sell their stock at that price would have a just claim against the Government for leading them to believe that the stock was saleable at that figure.

Another difficulty arises in connection with the matter. I find that although public service commissions have been created in New York, Massachusetts, and other great states of the American Union which regulate matters of this kind, this year, when the Canadian Pacific railway put its stock on the market at $175 to shareholders, an old, well established transportation company that had great assets, a rich company, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, whose stock was selling at a very high price, nearly $200, was permitted by the public service commission of the state of New York to issue its stock to shareholders at par, although it made thereby a very large sum of money in what we have been pleased to call rights.

The only solution I see is this. I have learned from inquiries in London that it would be quite impossible to maintain the public credit of our great companies if we required them to sell the shares at public auction. I know how fatal it would be for any government to attempt to fix the price at which stock should sell, because I have ascertained that to-day a stock may be worth a great deal and to-morrow may be worth very little. I remember when Union Pacific was worth $10, but the genius of Harriman made it worth $217. His death and the subsequent dissolution of the Southern Pacific combination has sent the price down to $155. If a government had fixed the price and there had been such a loss, it would have been greatly embarrassed. All of these considerations must commend themselves to the thoughtful business men in this House. What way is there out of this difficulty? It is a serious problem with which we have to deal, and the only suggestion I have is to establish a court of commerce, presided over by a man with a large knowledge of finance and mercantile transactions, and to require every company seeking to increase its capital stock to obtain the approval of this court; and the public should be given an opportunity to oppose any such issue. I would appoint some person who would correspond to the public prosecutor in England, who would always be prepared to appear before that tribunal on behalf of the people and urge their rights against the proposals made by a company asking for power to increase its capital and to fix the price at which it should be issued. I think that would be a fair way. When I was in England I heard a hundred times in the last six months complaints about the price at which the Canadian Pacific railway were issuing their stock. Oh, they said, they have no right to sell it to shareholders at $175; we should get it at par. The only way to deal with it that way is by creating some tribunal, impartial, free, unfettered by restrictions or restraints amenable only to Parliament, presided over by some person who has the capacity of a great mercantile lawyer, the knowledge of a great judge or jurist, and who will be able to determine the questions as they come before him, having regard alike, to the interests of the shareholders and of the public. I see no other method of dealing with it. I am perfectly satisfied that the remedies that have been sometimes suggested will not be effective. Selling by public auction was my own method; I used it in the West and was told that it was impracticable and impossible. I devoted a lot of time to the effort to ascertain whether that statement was correct or not, and I am satisfied that it could not be done, having regard to the financial interests of the country and of the companies which have to get their money in London, Berlin and Paris. I am also satisfied that no government could take upon itself the responsibility of fixing the price at which stock should be sold. I am therefore satisfied that the evil is such that there should be some method by which some independent tribunal can fix the terms and conditions by which stock can be sold, the extent to which capital stock may be issued, and the rate of issue.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): And the form of the issue.

Mr. BENNETT: And, if you will, the form of the issue. But I disagree with the hon. member for South York when he says that you could throw $60,000,000 of bonds on the market as the Canadian Pacific railway has thrown its shares. Such a large sum as $60,000,000 of bonds, I am told, could not possibly be absorbed and we all know the great difficulty experienced last week by the reason of the Southern-Union Pacific combine or merger placing on the market $126,000,000 worth of stock. It well-nigh staggered the market, and called into being an underwriting syndicate the largest in twenty-five years.

All these are problems that must be settled. What do they do in England? They flatter themselves that they have one of the finest financial systems in the world and the best administration of the Companies Act, but if you take the trouble to read the English Companies Act as it now stands, you will find no such restrictions as we are endeavouring to place here; and the majority of the men who come into new companies in England on an increased capitalization come in at par. I do not know whether that is generally known to the members of this House or not, but it is a fact, and any hon. gentleman who will take the trouble to read the financial reports—they will be found in the library—will find that all the companies whose capital stock was increased last year in England gave shares to their shareholders at par, and that the power of increasing their capital was given without restriction or limitation to the directors who fixed not only the amount of the increased capitalization but the terms on which that stock should be issued. Finance is a very complicated matter. I know very little about it, and I think that members of this House know very little about it. Those who have to maintain the high credit of great transportation companies, of great public service companies, of great commercial or mercantile undertakings, well know the anxiety and worry incident to such work, because you have to decide whether or not you shall increase your capital for the purpose of carrying on your business by adding new shares to your common stock, whether or not you shall issue preferred stock, or debentures, or bonds, and what form your security shall take. All that depends on the attitude of the public to a particular class of security at a particular time. Sometimes a bond is chosen, sometimes a stock. The public is exceedingly fastidious these days and exceedingly critical, and it is a matter of great difficulty in the minds of those responsible for carrying on vast enterprises to decide how money is to be obtained. All I can say is that we should do something to place such restrictions as I have suggested in order to prevent abuses. After all the credit of our great corporations is the common property of every man in this country. Some people think that the credit of a corporation is a personal matter. There could be no greater fallacy in the world than that. The credit of the Canadian Pacific railway, of the Grand Trunk railway, of the Canadian Northern railway, of our banks, of our great milling companies and navigation companies is an asset to every man in Canada, and a greater asset to the farmer in the West than to any other man. There is no man interested more than the farmers in maintaining the high credit of our great corporations, for once credit is destroyed money becomes difficult to obtain. The man who is getting along quietly with small loans feels the pinch first, because it is the small man that has to pay. That has been my observation and my experience, and I give it to the House for what it is worth. We should not attempt in dealing with one single measure, or with one single company, to lay down a rule which has not been tried, which has not and cannot be used, at least in England, or on the bourses of London and Paris, and which cannot be put in operation without striking at and destroying the credit of the company, and the company with impaired credit is worse than no company at all. Therefore I say, we should be very careful in what we do in relation to this matter. I support many of the suggestions made by the hon. member for South York. The only objection I have is that some of these contentions are not made from any desire to serve the public weal, but rather with a view to attacking a gentleman who has been of great use to the Conservative party. That is the attitude I take. The matter is of such importance as to merit not the casual consideration of a few minutes, but the careful and studied consideration of every hon. member of this House, and of all those who are responsible for the carrying on of great business concerns. I would suggest to the right hon. the first minister the advisability and the desirability of appointing a royal commission which might make the closest possible investigation into all those matters, and lay before this House at the earliest possible moment a report that would enable us to devise means whereby we would be able, without in any way restricting the powers of great public service and transportation companies, to enable them to serve that public from whom they must derive their income; whereby without restricting or lessening the powers of those companies, we could safeguard the interests of the public and prevent them from paying too high a price for the services which those companies are giving. I have no solution other than that which I have suggested. I am very glad to have an opportunity to make a few observations on a matter which is of such very great importance to this country.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from North Ontario must have been rather disappointed with the response to his appeal for non-partisan consideration of this subject.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): You started the ball rolling.

Mr. OLIVER: For I think that not only has there been an exhibition of partisanship from the member from Calgary (Mr. Bennett), but he has exhibited a personal animus that is not creditable to this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: And which is not usual in debate in this House. I agree with my hon. friend that the question is important, but I do not agree with him that it is insoluble; nor is it a question for the solution of which we can afford to wait until the stars in their courses change; because when we get a public service commission from this Government, judging by its record up to date, we shall have two moons in the sky. I would suggest to my hon. friend from Calgary that, inasmuch as the question before the House is one that relates immediately and intimately to the transportation of the products of the West to their ultimate market, it is not quite good enough to say that there is an Act on the statute-book, passed a number of years ago, that contains provision similar to that in this Bill. A great deal of water has run under the bridges since that Act was passed. New conditions have arisen since that Act was passed. I would ask my hon. friend from Calgary whether it is his conception of the purpose for which we meet in Parliament that we should give our endorsation to legislation that was passed two, three, four, five, ten, or twenty years ago? I take it that the purpose of our coming to Parliament, the reason that elections to Parliament are held, the reason that Parliament meets from year to year, is that Parliament may meet conditions as they arise by suitable legislation; and the fact that this or that law is on the statute-book, placed there by this or by that party when in power, is not evidence either of dereliction of duty on the part of the Government which placed that legislation on the statute-book, or that there is no other legislation required at the present time. The purpose of the Bill is to give the right to a certain transportation company to increase its capital by one-half. Now all that has been said on behalf of this transportation company I am quite prepared to endorse. It is a perfectly legitimate business enterprise; I have no doubt it has been well conducted, I have no reason to believe that it has not done good service to the Dominion of Canada. But it is coming to Parliament now and asking for authorization to increase its capital, to issue stock to which the people may subscribe, and upon which the public interested in transportation must ultimately pay dividends. Speaking for myself, and I am sure speaking for the whole House, there is no objection in the world to allowing the Richelieu and Ontario Company to increase its capital stock by one-half, provided the Richelieu and Ontario Company will employ the money that is raised by the sale of that stock in enlarging its transportation facilities. When the Bill was last before the House I said that its promoter should place in it a provision in accordance with the statements he made, so that the members of the House could say to their constituents that they had discharged their duty in agreeing to the passage of the Bill only when they secured tangible assurance, which could be enforced in law. I suppose, that the money would be expended in the extension of transportation facilities and not in the restriction of these facilities. That is the point that is in the mind of the people. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has said that today the western country is suffering as it has not done in many years, largely because of the increased cost of transportation, and here is a proposition before Parliament which on the face of it may be for the purpose of laying an increased burden upon the people of the West in connection with transportation on the great lakes. And all my hon. friend from Calgary has to say about it is, that the Liberal Government put just such legislation on the statute-books ten years ago.

Mr. BORDEN : Not ten years ago. It was the Act of 1910.

Mr. OLIVER : I accept the correction. I presume that the legislation of 1910 followed the legislation of previous years ?

Mr. BORDEN : I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I am wrong; it was 1911.

Mr. OLIVER : Well, I presume the legislation of 1911 followed that of previous years.

Mr. CARVELL : There is no clause 2 in the legislation of 1911.

Mr. OLIVER : It makes no difference to the responsibility of this House what the Liberal Government did in 1911 or in any other year; we are here to answer to our constituents for what we say and do on legislation that is before this House to-day, and the question before the House to-day is: Shall the House take care that these powers asked for by this navigation company shall be used for the lessening of the cost of transportation and not for the establishment of transportation monopolies on the lakes. That is the question before us, and the answer my hon. friend from Calgary has given is that you cannot do anything about it, and that you ought not to if you could.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary): I did not say that.

Mr. OLIVER : I say that answer is not good enough.

Mr. BENNETT : It is not true that I gave such an answer.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not enough to say that some time in the distant future an arrangement may be made whereby something can be done to regulate transportation companies. Here is a question for consideration to-day and the answer to it is wanted to-day. There were one hundred million bushels of wheat shipped from last year's crop in the West, and an increase of transportation charges on that wheat of one cent per bushel would mean one million dollars. If the suggestions of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) be correct; I do not say they are correct, then there is one million dollars in the pockets of this company, and a million dollars out of the pockets of the western farmer as a result of this legislation. If there is no such suggestion in this legislation as was mentioned by the hon. member for South York, the promoter of the Bill ought to agree to the insertion of such provisions as that the country may know that the members of this House have done their duty in protecting the public interest. I had occasion at a previous stage of the Bill, to mention the subject of the sale of stock which it is proposed should be issued. My hon. friend from Calgary says that you must not put any limitation upon the sale of this stock; that the company must do as it pleases with that stock; that you cannot do business in London, or Paris, or Berlin, unless you let the company do as it pleases in the disposal of the stock. He did me the honour to suggest that in a company in which I am interested I could do the same thing and that possibly I might do it. Let me tell the hon. member for Calgary that he had better have a discussion with his friend the Minister of Finance, because in the Bank Act the Minister of Finance has made provision for the sale of stocks held by shareholders in banks, and it seems to me it is a perfectly sound provision. If bank stock can be properly put to forced sale—because it is a forced sale under the provisions of the new Bank Act—there is no reason in the world why company stock generally should not be publicly sold so as to bring whatever the market price at the time may be. If that provision in the Bank Act is not right, let it be struck out, but if it is right then it is a good one to apply to other companies. If what the hon. member for Calgary says is correct, then there is no way to prevent the undue magnifying of the assets and burdening the earnings of a company through the issue of stock below its market price. If that be so, it is a serious proposition for this country to contemplate.

In the past five years the cost of living has been increased through the laying upon the people of the country of burdens to the amount of several hundreds of millions of dollars by the issue of stock for which money was not paid but upon which earnings are demanded. If the only answer to that problem is: you cannot do anything, I say it is most unfortunate for the people of this country; and I submit that there must be some other answer. I wish to disagree entirely with my hon. friend, when he says that the farmer is the first man interested in the stock market.

Mr. BENNETT: I said in the credit of the country.

Mr. OLIVER: In the credit of the country which he interpreted as being the standing of the stock market. If the suggestion of my hon. friend from South York is correct, the farmer is the man who will have to pay directly for the increase in the value of this stock. So it is in regard to the large majority of these stock quotations. The farmer is the initial producer and the ultimate consumer; it is out of the farmer that the profit has to come and does come, the farmer and the artisan, the wage earner. It is upon the farmer and the wage earner that the burden of all this frenzied finance in the last resort rests; they are the men who are carrying it; and it is because of this frenzied finance that the high cost of living exists in the towns, and that the farmer is unable to farm with profit.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: After listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), I feel that I must say a few words. Anything affecting the question of mergers or trusts seems to act like a live wire upon them, a wire which was dead when they were on this side of the House. Since this debate began, I looked up the statutes of 1909. In that year, when my hon. friend from Edmonton was a member of the late Government and my hon. friend from Assiniboia was sitting on this side of the House as a supporter of the Government, I find that that Government increased the capital stock of this same company from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000. My hon. friend from Asssiniboia and my hon. friend from Edmonton in the debate on that subject said not one single word in opposition to the increase of the capital stock of that company. The reason was that the Bill was brought in by Mr. Prefontaine, a Liberal member of the House of Commons at that time. In the year 1910 a Bill was brought in and passed, chapter 157 of that year. We all know that whenever trusts and combines are mentioned in this House, the hon. member for Edmonton is their strenuous opponent. I want to say to the hon. member for Edmonton that he was a member of the Government which made it possible for a trust and combine if there is such a one, with respect to the present company, because by clause 10 of chapter 157 of the statutes of the year 1910, this legislation was passed:

> The company may take, hold and dispose of shares in, and enter into agreements with, any company having objects similar to those of the company, and may manage the affairs, or take over and carry on the business of any such company, either by acquiring the shares or other securities thereof, or otherwise howsoever, and exercise the powers of the holders of such shares or securities, and receive and distribute as profits the dividends and interest on such shares or securities.

If there is anything in the nature of a merger, security, trust or combine, in connection with the present Bill, the responsibility of that is the active legislation which was passed by the late Government, of which my hon. friend from Edmonton was a member. As late as the year 1911, when my hon. friend from Edmonton was a member of the late Government and my hon. friend from Assiniboia was a staunch supporter of that Government, not one single word was said in that debate by either of those two gentlemen in opposition to a proposition, which was to increase and which did increase the capital stock of this same company from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. Not a single word was said by them as to trusts or combines, not a single word in opposition, because the Bill was introduced by a supporter of the late Government, Mr. Bickerdike. I think it ill becomes my hon. friends to criticise this Bill, which is nothing more or less than a permission to increase the capital stock from $10,000,000, at which they left it, to $15,000,000. The same thing has been done time and time again with respect to other companies. As far as that is concerned, I see no objection whatever to the Bill. The company is enlarging its sphere of operations; it is not as though this company had got some franchises from this Government; it is sailing upon the high seas, upon the free waters of this country, and any other company has a perfect right to do the same thing. If this company were like a railway, asking for a franchise which would give it special rights or privileges over certain territory, there might be some objection to giving it such powers. In regard to clause 2, in looking over the Canada Gazette, I find similar privileges are given to practically every company that is being incorporated. I have in my hand the Canada Gazette for January 18, 1913, and I find that such powers are given incidentally under the charters issued to these companies, which charters are given to these companies by virtue of the General Companies Act. For instance, the Spring Water Company, Limited, has the power:

> To invest and deal with moneys of the company not immediately required upon such securities as may be from time to time determined.

Practically word for word with the power which is given in this Bill. Then I find with respect to the Joliette Steel Casting Works, Limited, they are given power:

> To invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner as may from time to time be determined.

Similarly, the Quebec and Orleans Corporation, Limited, are given powers:

> To invest and dispose of the funds of the company which are not immediately required in any manner which shall be decided from time to time.

The Western Canada Public Utilities, Limited, are given powers:

> To invest and deal with the moneys not immediately required upon such securities and in such manner as may from time to time be determined.

I could go through the whole of this Canada Gazette and point out companies which are given powers similar to the powers given in clause 2 of this Bill. Under these circumstances, I do not see why this attack is made on the identical clauses in this Bill which have been found in Bills passed by the late Administration.

Mr. CARVELL: Once again from the Government side of the House we have presented this beautiful argument: You did it, no matter how, no matter whether good or bad. I am surprised that my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), who usually takes such a high stand, would come here and advance an argument like that. We have also had the pleasure of listening to my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett), who has had the opportunity of being in London for the last six months, who has hobnobbed with financiers there, and who has been on the Paris and Berlin bourses. He knows that you cannot sell $60,000,000 worth of Canadian Pacific stock in one day on the London Stock Exchange. It is very interesting to get this information from such a high source as the hon. member for Calgary; but we are discussing the stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, which they are asking this Parliament to authorize them to issue. My friends on the other side seem to take it for granted that the gentlemen who are discussing this Bill are opposing the issue of this stock. My hon. friend from North Grey has taken the trouble to look up the statutes, and finds that during the Liberal regime the same company was given authority to increase its stock. Of course it was, and if this company had come here to-day the same as in 1911, the same as in 1899, and simply asked for the increase in its capital stock, in all probability you would not have heard any of this discussion. But a new element has come forth in the last three or four or five years, a new element that has become, to my mind, the greatest menace to the people of Canada. I refer to the merging of transportation companies, banks and other great concerns that control the business affairs of this country. They are finding the same thing in the United States, and in many other parts of the world. As new conditions arise it is our duty to face them and to try to overcome the difficulties that they involve. My hon. friend from Calgary admits that there are difficulties in the situation. He admits there are very serious difficulties in the transportation affairs of this country. I do not know that there is any business in this world which ought to be guarded as carefully against mergers as the transportation business. I do not need to tell my hon. friend from Calgary where the trouble comes in. The whole trouble is that, if these concerns are allowed to issue watered stock, then, when the application is made to the public commission for the regulation of rates, people come forward, many of whom have paid high prices for the watered stock, and say: If you reduce the rates we are allowed to charge, you are going to reduce our profits to a minimum. That is the difficulty and nobody knows it better than my hon. friend from Calgary. It is true that Parliament, up to this time, has not stated, in granting charters to these concerns, that they must put up their stock to public auction. It is true that in many cases the companies that have been cutting these melons have put their stock up for sale at something above par. But they always give it to their stockholders at probably one-quarter or one-half the difference between par and the actual value, and so the shareholders get a big rake-off out of it. Take the case of the Canadian Pacific railway. The stockholders paid for the stock recently issued $175 a share. But they could turn round to-day, and even in the present state of the market, could sell that stock with the rights at about $255 or $260. That is, they got $90 out of each share to which they were not entitled. But suppose they sell that to the ordinary investigating public, when we ask for a reduction of freight rates, the man who bought that stock in the market, comes to us and says: I paid $260 for that stock, and on the basis of a ten per cent dividend, I am getting something like four per cent on my money. If you reduce the rates below the present level, I shall not get four per cent, and I shall not be treated fairly.

Now, I come back to this Bill. As I said, nobody objects to the increase in the capital stock of this company. If it is necessary in order to carry on the business of the company, I say increase their capital to $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. If they were in a position to increase their capital to $20,000,000 and use that money to buy boats, make terminals and otherwise provide facilities for their business, and do business accordingly, it would be a grand thing for the company and a grand thing for Canada as well. But every hon. member on the other side who has talked about this matter has tried to get away from the real trouble, away from what we are arguing against, away from the thing which does not look right on the face of it, the thing on which their promoters would give us no real information. They are allowed to sell this stock for any money they decide upon. I say that advisedly. And they can take that money and do what they like with it. My hon. friend from Calgary and my hon. friend from North Grey, come here and read extracts from the Canada Gazette concerning charters granted to Joint stock companies. But these are only trading companies. Take the case of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). That hon. gentleman is the owner of a newspaper. What difference does it make to anybody if the owners of that newspaper wish to give their stock away? What difference does it make if they sell it at 200? What difference does it make if the stock thus issued is invested in a roller rink or in any other business they please? That is their private affair. They cannot increase the price of the Edmonton Bulletin to the public, because there is competition in that business and they can only get what the state of the business will yield. The case of the Griffiths company has been mentioned. Why, they are a construction company; they have come from London to make what money they can. I understand they have one company chartered in British Columbia and another one in Montreal, and that they have now got a Dominion charter. Thev are building wharfs and docks, wherever they can get contracts. Whether they give their stock away or whether they sell it at 200, makes no difference to the public, for when the Griffiths tender for a public work they have to tender against the world; and they have to give the lowest tenders—if things are honestly carried on —before they can get a contract.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman think that the public is not concerned in the over-capitalization of business corporations?

Mr. CARVELL: Not very much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Many business authorities are against the hon. gentleman on that point.

Mr. CARVELL: I say the public is very little concerned. These companies have to carry on their business under competition, and they can get only what the condition of the market in their business will afford them.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Is the public not interested if they get into a trust?

Mr. CARVELL: That is another side of the case. That is where the tariff comes in. And on that, I am afraid, my hon. friend and I should disagree. However, we will not discuss that to-day. But, when you come to a transportation company or a public utilities corporation, you have a different condition of affairs. Take, for illustration, a case that may not be known to my hon. friend from Montmagny, the promoter of this Bill. Not long ago, a Quebec corporation, I think it is called the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company, amalgamated with another railway company, called, I believe, the Quebec and Saguenay. Now, suppose a ratepayer of Quebec came before a public utilities commission and asked to have the rates reduced on the Quebec Electric railway. What would be the answer of my hon. friend? I think he would say: We have amalgamated with the Quebec and Saguenay; true, the Electric is a fine paying proposition, and the Quebec and Saguenay is the reverse; it is not fair to reduce rates on the Quebec Electric railway, because if you do so the stockholders will not receive their usual dividends. That is what it means to have a merger of public utilities companies. That is a very different affair from the case of an ordinary trading company. I am not so positive that my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) is right, but I am positive enough to vote for it if he will move an amendment that this stock shall be sold by public auction.

But that is not the point on which I have had objection to this Bill from the beginning, or to which I particularly object this afternoon. This second clause of the Bill is the one I find fault with. As I have said, commercial companies may sell their stock for what they please, but they cannot increase the charge upon the public. It is a different thing to allow a transportation company to increase its capital stock by fifty per cent and sell it for what they have a mind to. Notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. leader of the Government, I say this company can sell this stock for what they have a mind to, practically, and he knows it. When he proposes to make the people believe that the company cannot sell the stock for less than par, he knows better. I refer to the cement company. Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary could tell how much the cement company's stock brought at the beginning of this institution. Perhaps other hon. gentlemen could tell how much it cost them. This is paid-up stock, remember, and they issued something like $15,000,000 of it; and I make the statement here that not a man of the original holders ever paid a cent for it. It is not necessary that I should go into details as to the way this scheme is worked, as hon. gentlemen opposite very well know how it is done.

I was much interested in one of the sections of chapter 157 of the statutes of 1910, read by the hon. member for North Grey. It so caught my attention that I looked it up, and I think that section 10 is particularly applicable to the matter under discussion. I had a suspicion—I say it frankly—that there was something held back in relation to this legislation. If all the company wanted was the right to add to its capital stock to the extent of $5,000,000, the law presumes that such amount would be used for the purposes of the undertaking. If the directors, in the absence of clause 2, attempted to use that money for anything else, the courts would prevent them from so doing. As I have said, I had a suspicion, therefore, that there was some other purpose in view—I do not attribute an ulterior motive, as I have no desire to use an offensive term—but some purpose aside from the interests of Richelieu and Ontario navigation. This brings me back to the minority stockholders—and I understand there is a large body of such stockholders in this corporation—men who are not in sympathy with the way things are managed, and whose rights ought not to be gambled with or trampled upon. By legislation which was enacted respecting this company in 1910, it was given power to take hold and dispose of shares in and enter into agreements with, any company having objects similar to those of the company. What are the objects of the company? The transportation of freight and passengers. What is the object of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company? The transportation of freight and passengers. I leave it to my hon. friends to make the necessary application. I think the House should hesitate before giving to this company such enormous powers as those proposed to be conferred upon it under subsection 2 of this Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. gentleman read the section again?

Mr. CARVELL: It reads as follows:

> The company may take, hold and dispose of shares in, and enter into agreement with, any company having objects similar to those of the company.

It goes farther than that, and states:

> And may manage the affairs or take over and carry on the business of any such company, either by securing the shares or other securities thereof, or otherwise howsoever, and exercise the powers of the holders of such shares or securities, and receive and distribute as profits the dividends and interest on such shares or securities.

We should, as I have said, consider the matter very carefully before passing legislation of this character. I am opposed to subsection 2 of this Bill and I will vote against it, and, in so far as it is possible—I do not know whether we can defeat it or not—but we will certainly bring the matter to the attention of this country and will do whatever can be done to prevent, I was almost going to say, a fraud of such magnitude being exercised upon the minority shareholders of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.

Mr. LESPERANCE: I think the hon. member has no right to call this Bill a fraud.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say it was a fraud; I said I was afraid it was, or something to that effect. If my friend objects to the remark, I withdraw it, and leave the House and the country to infer whether or not the procedure is fraudulent.

Mr. BLAIN: Are we to understand that a protest has been made against this Bill by some of the small stockholders of the company?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. BLAIN: To what extent—a very large number?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I desire to refer for a moment to the matter under discussion. I have for some years taken a great interest in questions of this nature, and, because of the interest I have taken, I have been obliged to detach myself almost absolutely from politics, and deal with the matter in an entirely unprejudiced spirit. I have spoken to my constituents in reference to the matter, and have received from them every assurance of co-operation in bringing these questions forward, and endeavouring to remedy the abuses existing in this country. We all have a great interest in maintaining the credit of our large corporations, but that credit is not to be maintained at the price of the continuation of those abuses under which the people of this country suffer. I desire that these abuses shall cease, and I am, as I have said, bringing this matter forward absolutely without prejudice, political or otherwise. The extent of the markets of the fruit growers of Ontario is absolutely dependent on the competition in the matter of the transportation of fruit. The Richelieu and Ontario Company has given a good service, we must admit, but I do wish to see in the legislation of this country some general provision that will regulate the issue of securities. The hon. member for Calgary suggested that a royal commission, or a court of commerce be created for the regulation of capitalization, but in the meantime we have to deal with these matters as they come up. If I were not to raise my voice in this particular case, I would be told I was not doing my duty. I am invariably charged with not introducing a broad general principle, but I have tried to introduce a principle at times, and have been told it was too sweeping. If something particular is introduced, the query is made: Why don't you have general law? It has been generally admitted that there must be some regulation of the capitalization of these companies, and, pending the creation of a court of commerce, why should we not change the law to such an extent as to provide that any company wishing to increase its capitalization must come to the Board of Railway Commissioners, state its needs, specify the form of the proposed security, and give to the people interested an opportunity of being heard in connection with the proposed increase of capitalization. The Canadian Pacific railway did not need stock to carry out their undertaking, they had plenty of cash in the bank at the time. They could have done all they are doing this year and next year without increasing their capital stock and yet they are allowed to issue this capital stock against the wishes of the people of this country. They could have got money on a bond issue at 4 per cent and yet they are allowed to issue stock, the proceeds of which will lie in the bank for years and the consequence is that the people of Canada who use the Canadian Pacific railway will have to pay the additional cost of capitalization in this way. An unnecessary charge has been put on the people of the West and the duty of the people of the West and of the East is not to maintain the credit of these companies so much as to get the public service at the lowest price. The companies can look after their own credit and they are looking after their own standing. We are here to look after the interest of the people of Canada and to see that they get a square deal from the companies who have been enfranchised. If the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) could persuade the Government to make a general amendment and have a provision that in the meantime all these transportation companies must come to some authority to obtain sanction for their issue. In going to the Public Utilities Commission of New York they must say why they need the capital, giving the specific purposes for which it to be used and if they can show that they can get it more easily and better by a stock issue they are allowed to issue stock, whereas if bonds will secure the money they are told to issue bonds. I want to see some court with power to regulate this capitalization and until we have such court we must try to regulate it in some other way. I intend to propose the law of Massachusetts, which is that when a public service corporation proposes to issue stock it must sell that stock in the open market. That has been done both in this country and in the United States and it can be done in Canada; then when the hon. member for Calgary succeeds in having the commission to regulate matters of this kind we can repeal this law but in the meantime it is up to this Parliament to deal with this question in some way and to impose on the Richelieu & Ontario some regulation as to how this stock shall be issued and what it shall do with the surplus money it finds in its treasury.

Mr. McKENZIE: I took part in the previous discussion on this Bill, and I am sure I had no knowledge of partisan purposes in the discussion then, nor do I know of any now. There is no doubt now as to who has thrown this into the very vortex of party policies and discussion. That has been done not by any gentleman on this side of the House, it was left to an hon. gentleman on the other side. I have heard about a certain gentleman who is usually in active service about the barrooms in this country, a man whom they call a 'chucker-out,' that is a gentleman of big proportions, largely rum-fed, who stands around to throw out the poor fellow who becomes drunk and incapable. I was reminded to-day when we had this torrent of police court oratory from the hon. member for Calgary that the Government has found a chucker-out. But the Government and the supporters of the Government may find that they would do much better without a chucker-out and that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are not to be chucked out or chucked aside even by so eloquent a police court orator as the hon. member for Calgary.

I presume that the hon. gentlemen who are promoting this Bill would not suspect the Prime Minister of having any sinister motives on this legislation or of being prompted by any ill feelings against them. We have been told that our reason for talking from a partisan standpoint is that an hon. gentleman who is somewhere behind this Bill has done herculean service to the Conservative party and for that reason, forsooth, we must defeat the Bill, and that all the criticism of the Bill comes from motives of that kind. The Prime Minister certainly would not be actuated by such motives but when this Bill was before the House on the 4th February, the Prime Minister said:

> It seems to me that this is a very ordinary provision for the increase of the company's capital stock. The capital can be only used for the purposes of the company. I think that many Bills of that kind come before Parliament which are passed without very much discussion.

Speaking of clause 2, the Prime Minister said:

> So far as section 2 is concerned, that is a rather unusual clause. I am not at all sure that the view taken by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is a correct one.

That is, he was not satisfied it was subject to the general Act at all.

> I should be rather inclined to think that, unless it were otherwise specified, section 2 would be governed by the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act. . . . Often, powers are given to a company different from those contained in the Joint Stock Companies Act. I do not know what is the particular object of the section as to temporary investment. That is not a thing usually provided for.

The Prime Minister says that this is a Bill which contains unusual clauses and conditions and that temporary means of investment are not usually provided for. That is the opinion of at least one lawyer on the other side of the House, it is the opinion of the Prime Minister, and yet we are told that we are animated by party spleen in criticising the terms of this extraordinary Bill. I submit this provision has no business there at all. If the only purpose of this Act is to increase the capital, then why not let the company do that under its former legislative powers. There is no reason why this clause should have been in the Bill at all. I submit there is sufficient machinery in the old charter to let them carry on the business as they have hitherto carried it on. But this section 2 gives them extraordinary power,—'unusual power' according to the Prime Minister—and this power should not be granted. Whether this stock should be sold above par or below, I do not know. One thing I know is that, if an agreement be made and filed for the information of those concerned, it is possible to sell the stock of a company for other than a cash consideration. That is the condition of the law in England, and it is the condition of the law here.

Mr. EMMERSON: The principle we have been discussing and which my hon. friend from South York has so ably expounded is indeed of very great inportance, and the note of warning which he sounded, I think, is worthy of the attention of the members of this House. My own views with respect to the matter are somewhat pronounced, and I have expressed them on former occasions in this House, not merely during this Parliament, but during preceding Parliaments. And, at the risk of having my motives impugned—political or other motives—I propose to reiterate the views I hold. I am sorry we have reached the stage when on the discussion of private Bills it is found necessary to impute motives to hon. members who express their views. Political gratitude, I think, should not be a motive in the discussion of any Bill. But it might as well be said that hon. members who happen to sit on the other side are moved by political gratitude to support the Bill as to say that hon. members who are not quite in accord with the Bill are actuated by political resentment. As to the authority given in the first section of the Bill I do not wish to say a word against it. It is our right and our duty to grant applications for power to increase the capital stock of a company under proper conditions. But there must be good reasons shown for it. That is the rule that has governed the Railway Committee of this House for very many years. When a company comes before that committee asking power to construct a railway, its capitalization is named. Frequently, the committee, in its judgment, increases the capitalization; at times, it decreases it. We act upon well understood principles and usually calculate the capital on the basis of a certain amount per mile. Frequently companies come and ask for increased capitalization, based on facts that are submitted to the committee. I had not the pleasure of listening to the previous debate on this Bill, but I have listened very attentively this afternoon to learn why it was necessary that this company should have its capital increased from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. If it is in the minds of those who promote the company or control it to expend that money in connection with the betterment of the transportation facilities which they wish to afford or to extend the operation of the company, why should not they have that power? And I certainly say they should have the power, provided they show to this committee good purposes for which the money is required. Take the second clause:

> The company may invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may seem expedient.

The directors may do this. If they do not require that $5,000,000, they will have that money on their hands or if they wish they can invest it for some other purposes.

Mr. LESPERANCE: The section has been amended in committee so as to allow them to invest that money temporarily.

Mr. EMMERSON: They could have done that without any such clause as this.

Mr. LESPERANCE: It has been done by the company in the past, but their solicitor advised the directors that it was better while they were getting this Bill through Parliament to insert a section which would allow the company to temporarily invest this money as was done by all other incorporated companies.

Mr. EMMERSON: In my opinion the company has already sufficient power to invest that money temporarily, to place it in safe keeping, not, of course, to invest it in other companies. Would my hon. friend tell the committee the estimated cost of the works for which the company require the extra capitalization. The company may have in mind the construction of additional terminals, or wharfs, or steamships, or the exploiting of new routes, and if that is so the hon. member should tell us what the intention is. It seems to me that the second clause of the Bill as it is now, would give power to this company, or rather to the directors, to buy stock and to invest in other outside companies. If it is not the intention to ask for that power, it should be so stated in the Bill. No one of course would take exception to their investing money in some liquid form which they could call on at any time for use in their undertaking. The proposition as at present incorporated in the second clause should not be approved by this Parliament unless very strong reason is given.

Mr. BORDEN: I understood the hon. member (Mr. Lesperance) to state that the company required very considerable working capital during the months in which this navigation line is in operation. On account of climatic conditions for a number of months in the year the line is not in operation and they want authority to invest temporarily the money during that time. The very fact that they would require the money immediately at the opening of navigation is pretty good evidence that the money would not be invested in any form in which it could not be made immediately available.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not take exception to the temporary holding of the money for safe keeping, but what I asked the promoter of the Bill was, what he intended to do with the extra capital asked for.

Mr. CARVELL: The promoter of the Bill might also tell the committee why and how they come to have so much money lying idle in the winter, which is required to be used during the summer months.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The right hon. gentleman stated the other evening that he found clause 2 quite unusual; has he changed his mind?

Mr. BORDEN: A number of illustrations have been given this afternoon to show that such a provision is quite usual.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have been accused of approaching this matter as a partisan. I had absolutely no such idea in my mind, and if I spoke a little warmly it was not because the Bill was introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Lesperance) or that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) was interested in it, but because it very seriously affects every one of my fifty thousand constituents. These people are interested in the transportation on the lakes. This Bill purposes to allow the company to issue five million dollars more of capital stock to which nobody in this House has objection if they want the extra five millions for the legitimate purposes of the company and for developing its carrying capacity in freight and passengers.

At six o'clock, Committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 2—investment of moneys of company.

Mr. TURRIFF: When we adjourned at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to point out to the committee that nobody on this side of the House was objecting to the increase in the capital stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, but that we were objecting that the stock is being issued and can be used for any purpose whatever, not only that but a special jeker has been put in this Bill, a special clause has been added to it, by which the funds that are produced from the sale of this $5,000,000 worth of stock may be used for any purpose whatever outside of the business of the company. This is a public utility company; it is one of the great transportation companies of the country, with a large capital, with a large number of vessels engaged in the carrying trade. As I pointed out earlier in the afternoon, the charge for carrying grain has been very materially increased during the past year; and as this particular company has been engaged in amalgamating and merging with other companies, it seems to me that some special provision should be made in this Bill that the stock should not be sold at less than the par value and that the money resulting therefrom should be used for the legitimate purposes of a navigation company engaged in the carrying trade. If the money is used for such purposes, not only would I not oppose the Bill, but I would hold up both hands for it. If we can do anything to reduce the cost of carrying wheat from Fort William to Montreal and from Montreal to Liverpool, every western member will be anxious to assist in every way he can. Why has the cost of carrying wheat gone up from six to eight cents per bushel in the past two years? Simply because of combinations and mergers by the different navigation companies both lake and ocean, which are carrying this wheat. We are bringing this matter to the attention of the House in an endeavour to improve the legislation. If the legislation of the past has been wrong, are we to continue that wrong? Why should we not rather try to improve it? Because we bring it up and endeavour to improve it in the interests of the country, and in my particular case in the interest of my own constituents, I am accused by hon. members on the other side of the House of taking a partisan view of the matter and of opposing the Bill because it has been brought in by my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Lesperance) and supported by my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Forget). There is absolutely not one word of truth in that statement. My hon. friend, the member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) went out of his way to make a personal attack on me. I was not interfering with anybody; I was not attacking anybody; I was simply making some references to the general policy of the Government in standing by the combines. If ever a member was justified in making the remarks I made this afternoon, the justification came within half an hour afterwards when three prominent members on the other side of the House, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) and the hon. member for Calgary, one after the other, pointed out to their leader that the time had come when something must be done along just the lines which we on this side of the House were advocating this afternoon. I had therefore, ample justification in pointing out to the Government what was taking place, and in asking that provision be made in this Bill so that what the promoter of the Bill says is going to happen will happen. I think we have very good reason to be sceptical that everything will be carried out just along the lines that have been suggested. Here is what the Montreal Star, a paper supporting my hon. friends who are supporting this Bill, said about this matter on the 5th instant:

Richelieu fight nears climax. Mr. Claude G. Bryan who reached New York the latter part of last week, and who is the representative of the Furness interests in Richelieu, is expected in Montreal to-morrow. It is said that the support of the English group in the navigation merger has been definitely pledged to the Northern Inland interests and the programme of the western people will, in consequence, be carried out. Although it is understood that the financial reorganization plans of new control are more or less definite, it is improbable that there will be any public announcement in this regard for several months yet. The new board will in all probability devote its first energies towards drawing together the different ends of the merger——

They acknowledge that this company is engaged in merging:

—and the first steps will be in the direction of centralizing the administrative branches of the organization. It has been forecasted already, there will undoubtedly be some radical changes, the western men being committed to these before the opening of navigation this year. A meeting of Richelieu directors will be held to-morrow when it is expected the opposing factions will lay down their hands to avoid actual hostilities at the annual meeting of the company two weeks from to-day.

That is two weeks from February 5, which would bring us to February 19. You see that probably a large minority interest is opposing this increase in the capitalization. Let me read a paragraph from the Montreal Herald of two days later:

New R. and O. interests are now divided—Friction said to have arisen over increased capital plans.

'A house divided against itself,' gathered from reports on the 'Street' to-day is the position in which the new interests seeking R. and O. control find themselves to-day. It is believed that trouble has arisen over the passing of the Bill now before the Dominion House. Some of the big interests in R. and O. are against the increased capital.

Mr. James Carruthers returned to the city to-day from Ottawa and declined to say anything on yesterday's report that he had been asked to accept the presidency of R. and O. under the new control. It is very possible he will decline, however. It seems to be generally thought that Sir Rodolphe Forget will again be president, but it is almost certain that several of the present directors will 'walk the plank.'

Mr. Claude G. Bryan, representative of the Furness interests, arrived in the city last night. This afternoon, it is understood, there will be a meeting of the interests seeking control, Mr. Playfair, head of the western group, being in the city for the purpose. A definite stand on the new Bill and other plans for reorganization will be discussed.

It is understood that at the annual meeting, February 19, the annual report will show earnings for the past year at 9¾ per cent.

Large interests, therefore, connected with this company, which is a big company, are opposed to this increase of capitalization. If this report is correct as to the earnings of the company for the past year, and this being a public utility company, a transportation company, would we be asking too much that, in the interest of the public, not in the interest of either faction to the fight, it should be provided in this Bill that this new issue of stock be sold at not less than par; and, further, that every dollar which comes into the treasury of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company should be used for the legtimate purposes for which the company was organized? I ask the leader of the Government; I ask my hon. friend the Postmaster General, who is now leading the House to take into consideration the fact that three of the members supporting him this afternoon said that the time had come when something must be done. I do not altogether agree with my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) in the view that it did not make much difference so far as commercial companies were concerned. I think it makes a difference in all companies, and I think action ought to be taken in connection with transportation and public utility companies. It would be well to look closely into the capitalization of mercantile companies as well. I do not think it could possibly do any harm.

Just a word in reference to the attack which has been made upon me by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett). I wonder if my hon. friend from Calgary and the right hon. leader of the Government think that they are going to facilitate the business of the House by attacking an hon. member without any justification whatever? My hon. friend from Calgary made all sorts of insinuations that he dare not put into plain words. He tried to lead the House to believe that in the formation of companies I was accustomed to evade the law. I want to tell my hon. friend that if he wants fighting along that line he can get all he wants. In not a single case of the two or three commercial companies with which I am connected has one share of stock been sold for less than $100, with the cash paid into the treasury, and in not a single instance has one cent of commission been paid to anyone who sold that stock. It ill becomes my hon. friend from Calgary, the understudy of Sir Max Aiken, who did up the people in the cement business to the extent of millions of dollars, and who, with the hon. member, is engaged in merging the elevator companies in the West, to make attacks on anybody. But as I have said, if he wants fighting along that line, he knows where to get it. My record in connection with the formation of companies will bear comparison with his any day of the week. I challenge him to come forward at any time to show up my record in connection with companies. If he would keep just as straight to the line in his mergers and promotions as I have in connection with the companies I am interested in, he would do very well.

There is just one question I want to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister. As three of his prominent supporters have pointed out this afternoon that the time has come when something should be done in the way of regulating the promotion of companies, more particularly transportation and public utility companies—that intimation came from my hon. friend from Calgary, and I agreed very much with what he said in that connection, and also from my hon. friends from North Ontario and South York—I would like to ask the Prime Minister if, in view of the recommendation made by his own supporters, he proposes to do anything in connection with the particular Bill that we are now discussing.

Mr. BORDEN: I may say to my hon. friend that I do not propose general legislation in connection with this Bill, because that would be manifestly impossible. I do realize, however, that the subject which has been alluded to this afternoon is one of importance. As a matter of fact, it has been under the consideration of the Minister of Justice for several months past. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, and others who have given it careful consideration, will understand that it is a subject which is by no means free from difficulties. It is surrounded with difficulties. At the same time, one cannot help realizing that there is a good deal of force in the suggestion that there ought to be control over some companies at least, particularly those that are performing quasi public functions. I do not think there is any reason why we should begin legislation of that kind in individual instances, although it is perfectly proper to bring up the subject in connection with this company. The provisions with regard to the increase of stock in the case of this company are precisely those which have been made over and over again by this House, and which have passed without comment, in respect to a great many companies, and indeed, in respect to this very company itself, on at least two occasions within the past thirteen or fourteen years, one of them no later, I think, than 1911.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think there was nothing in the provisions of the Acts referred to giving the company special authority to expend the money for any purpose it liked outside of legitimate work.

Mr. BORDEN: I looked at the Act of 1899 and the other Act, and, as far as I recollect, there were no greater restrictions in those Acts than are to be found in the present Bill. That is my recollection; I speak subject to correction. So far as the general question is concerned, I can only say that we shall be very glad to consider it, and indeed, as I have already mentioned, the subject is receiving consideration. But it is one upon which it would be undersirable to bring in any immature or rash legislation. When anything is done along that line, it should be done after very careful consideration and due deliberation, and it probably would have to be submitted to some appropriate committee of this House for the purpose not only of considering it, but of threshing it out by the interchange of views between gentlemen whose opinions may point in one direction and those whose opinions may point in the opposite direction.

Mr. CARVELL: My right hon. friend talks about there being no restriction in the previous legislation. I have also looked up these statutes. Nobody is complaining that there were restrictions. They were ordinary Bills such as have been passed by this House on many occasions, granting the company right to increase its capital stock. We are not complaining of the restrictions in this Bill; we are complaining of the extensions.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend has misunderstood me. What I said was that I could not find any greater restrictions in previous Bills—any additional restrictions. Speaking from recollection, I think they were in precisely, or at least substantially, the same terms as the provisions for the increase of capital in this Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: It is not the restrictions we are complaining of in this Bill; it is the extensions. It is true that the Bills of 1899 and 1910, by which this company received the right to increase its capital stock, are practically in the words of section 1 of this Bill. But that is not what we are finding fault with; what we are finding fault with is the extension provided by section 2, which provides that this company can take the money received from the sale of stock and spend it in any way it sees fit.

Mr. BORDEN: I understood the question put to me by the hon. member for Assiniboia to relate to the capital issue in section 1, and I answered accordingly.

Mr. CARVELL: I understood my hon. friend from Assiniboia to refer to the extension. That is what I am finding fault with, and I think that is what he was finding fault with.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is what I meant.

Mr. CARVELL: There is a great deal in what my hon. friend says. This is a big subject, and it is going to require expert attention. We do not deny that it is surrounded with great difficulties, and we realize that it takes much consideration to provide machinery by which these companies may be restricted in the issue of their stock, and to institute such measures as will prevent the injection of so much water upon which the people must pay dividends. As far as I am concerned—and I think I speak for most hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—there is no objection to the company having an extension of their stock. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) entertains another objection, but that is not a point in which I am interested so much as that of giving to the company the right to deal with $5,000,000, or an increase of fifty per cent, just as it sees fit, and allowing it to put the amount into any scheme the directors may deem advisable, without the knowledge or consent of Parliament.

Mr. BORDEN: Does my hon. friend think that the word 'company' in the last clause means directors?

Mr. CARVELL: It practically means directors.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not so understand it.

Mr. CARVELL: I have had enough to do with companies, and so has my right hon. friend, for that matter, to realize that if the directors do not control the company, they would not be directors; and that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the word company' means directors, and vice versa. I do not think, therefore, my right hon. friend will get very much comfort by trying to crawl out of a difficulty in this manner. If my hon. friend would consider the suggestion of throwing out section 2 of the Bill, I think much of the opposition to the Bill would be abated.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: As president of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, I desire to offer a few words of explanation in regard to the Bill now under discussion. The company was established in 1845, and has been running for sixty-eight years. We have 1,560 miles of water route, and own seventy-two steamers. Our capital has been increased from $1,300,000 to $10,000,000, and we want more money for the extension of our system. The money to be spent this year will be spent, first at Fort William, where we intend to build a terminal at a cost of half a million dollars, for the purposes of which the land has already be obtained; second, a steamer is now being built at Port Arthur at a cost of $750,000; third, a terminal is to be built in Toronto and a coaling station established for our steamers. We are now coaling with wheelbarrows, and find the method too expensive.

Mr. CARVELL: What will be the cost of that?

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: $200,000 to $250,000. We intend also to build a larger steamer for the Montreal-Quebec line, to cost between $750,000 and $1,000,000, as well as putting another steamer on the Quebec and Saguenay river route.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you not a new one there already?

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: Yes, but we want another one.

Mr. CARVELL: How much will that cost?

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: About half a million dollars. Referring to the statement of the hon. member for Carleton respecting the sale of stock at ten cents on the dollar and fifty cents on the dollar, I may say that there has never been a drop of water put in the issue of Richelieu and Ontario navigation capital; every dollar of stock was paid for by one dollar, and the company has no right to issue a dollar of stock at a discount. As far as melon cutting is concerned, the stock sells at 116, and a bonus to shareholders of one or two million dollars at one and five-eighths per cent. is surely not very much. The capital stock will be issued only as the company wants more money for the purpose of building terminals and boats. A navigation company is not like a railway corporation. We take all our money in during four or five months of the year—say from June to October—and we need it for twelve months, to meet interest on bonds, pay dividends, provide for outfitting, salaries, &c., and during five or six months of the year we have to loan money which is not capital, but simply earnings. We have been doing this for the last twenty-five years, but our attorney has called our attention to the fact that we have no right to do so. We are obliged also to advance money at times to our subsidiary companies; for instance, the Richelieu Company may advance money this year to the Northern Navigation Company, the Inland Navigation Company, and so on, simply for the purposes of these companies. Under our contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, we are obliged, upon receipt of twelve months' notice, to build a boat at any time the company is in need of one, and we thus do not know when we shall be called upon to build another vessel, and that is why we ask for a little more money than we actually need. I expect, however, that within three years the $5,000,000 will be spent. I would be very glad as president of the company, to issue our stock at 175, but it is selling at only 116, and when it goes up I have no doubt that we shall ask a little more from the shareholders.

Mr. OLIVER : I do not altogether agree with the statement of my hon. friend for Carleton to the effect that if section 2 were cut out of the Bill there would be no objection to section 1. The two sections have to be read together, and my suggestion is that if section 1 were amended to meet the views of hon. gentlemen who have raised objections to it, section 2 would not then be objectionable, but if section 1 remains as it is, section 2 certainly is objectionable.

Mr. BORDEN : If the hon. member for Carleton is willing to leave one section in, and the hon. member for Edmonton is willing to leave the other in, we might perhaps in that way effect a compromise.

Mr. OLIVER : My right hon. friend has spoken too quickly. If it is desired to meet the views of the different members on this side of the House on a question which the right hon. Prime Minister has admitted to be of great importance, I desire to make the suggestion that it be provided in section 1 that the money derived from the sale of the stock shall be used specifically for such purposes as have been indicated by the hon. member for Charlevoix. If this is done, no serious objection can be urged against section 2, but if it is not done, and section 1 remains as it is—a blanket proposition whereby the company can raise $5,000,000 whenever it pleases, and, by section 2, can expend it as it pleases—then undoubtedly section 2 is entirely objectionable.

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET : It cannot be raised unless the shareholders approve of it.

Mr. OLIVER : I assume to be speaking on behalf of the people interested in transportation on the lakes, and I consider that there should not be an authorization by Parliament for the raising of $5,000,000 for the purposes of restricting competition in transportation upon the lakes. If we are assured by the terms of section 1 that the money to be raised will be used for extending and improving the transportation service on the lakes, then, if melon cutting exists, we would waive that objection We recognize the difficulty of dealing with that but we do insist that Parliament shall have reasonable assurance that the additional money that is to be raised by the company shall be used for the purpose of extending and improving transportation facilities upon the lakes and not for the purpose of restricting competition in transportation. It is not necessary to wait until the Minister of Justice and the Government have decided by what means this question shall be met generally. Here is a specific case where special interests are involved. We know that this company is part of a merger, is in fact the head and front of a merger which has been able during the past summer to increase the cost of transportation on the lakes, to the very great injury of the people of the western country. It is not good enough to tell us that some time in the future something is going to be done that will prevent other companies from doing the same thing. What we, as members of Parliament, here and now charged with the responsibility of protecting the interests of our constituents, want is that that protection shall be afforded in this Bill, as it can be without in any way injuring the company.

Mr. BARKER: If the hon. gentleman wants only what he has said two or three words will make it absolutely clear. I would suggest that sub-clause 2 of section 1 shall read this way:

> But the stock shall not be increased until the resolution of the board of directors authorizing such increase for the purposes of the company.

Adding those words. Then in clause 2 there are the words: 'Already authorized by the Committee.' Sub-clause 2 reads:

> The company may temporarily invest and deal with the moneys of the company.

In the first part of that clause it is provided that the increase shall be for the purposes of the company and in sub-clause 2 the company may temporarily invest money. I can only say I do not think there will be a shadow of doubt as to the legal liability of directors who misapply that money.

Mr. OLIVER: My objection is that it might be the purpose of the company to use the money in order to restrict competition, which is not a proper purpose.

Mr. BARKER: There is no such purpose in the Act of any company created by this Parliament that any money shall be used for the prevention of interference with the objects of the company. The amendments I have suggested, I think, will meet his purpose, and the first amendment would prevent the possibility of misappropriation.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not suggest misappropriation. It was pointed out on a former occasion that when the Canadian Pacific railway were given authority to issue twenty or twenty-five millions of stock it was specifically stated in the Act that the money must be used for certain specific purposes. If that was necessary and proper in the case of the Canadian Pacific railway why not in this case?

Mr. BARKER: The Canadian Pacific railway may have known the particular purposes to which they were going to apply the money. In this case if we insert the words I suggest they can only apply it to the authorized purposes.

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid the suggestion would not help much. The words 'for the purposes of the company' add nothing because under the law if the company sell stock they are presumed to sell it for the purposes of the company.

Mr. BARKER: Here is a specific direction.

Mr. CARVELL: Then you put a specific direction in clause 1 but by clause 2 you authorized the directors to do something else. Temporarily might be three months or three years, it covers any period of time until they need the money.

Mr. BARKER: If the hon. gentleman is arguing that way he is objecting to clause 2 as a whole, good or bad.

Mr. CARVELL: I am objecting to clause 2 as a whole and I think it is bad.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Carvell) as to the amendment suggested. I cannot see that a clause saying they must invest for the purposes of the company would do any good because they must do that or they are liable to be stopped by injunction. The company cannot invest the money other than for the purposes of the company, under the first clause of the Bill. What then can be the objection, is it that the powers of the company are too wide? Is it that the company is already armed with legal powers with which it should not be armed? Is it that they have already been granted by this House the privilege of making investments in other companies to the detriment of the public interest? If that is the case, would it not be well to ascertain who were the authors of the enactment that gave them these extraordinary powers which they have exercised to the detriment of the public interest; and if my hon. friend is in earnest, would it not be better for him to rise in his place and say: I was a member of the Government that put through the Act that gave them those extraordinary powers; I think we made a great mistake and we had better get to work and repeal clause 10 of the Act of 1910 which gave them those powers of investment. Would that not be the manly way to go about it. The Government of which the hon. member for Edmonton was a member, apparently convinced that the Richelieu and Ontario Company had not sufficient powers in the public interest, added in 1910 the very power of which he now complains to the rights of that company; and now he says it is the duty of the Government to clip the wings that they themselves affixed to that company. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) takes serious objection to the second clause. Why is he so much exercised over the second clause? This is a steamboat company. It plies boats from port to port. It is not a railway company in any sense. This company could have got incorporation under the Companies Act. It did not require to come to Parliament for the powers that it asks for in this Bill; and if this company had come to Parliament under the Companies Act, it would have secured the very powers granted by clause 2 of this Bill. Company after company, incorporated within the last two years by the Government of which the hon. member for Edmonton was a member and which was ardently supported by the hon. member for Carleton, were granted the very powers, word for word, which are granted by clause 2 of this Bill, and which have been granted up to this very hour. Let me read the phrasing of the powers granted under the Companies Act at the present time. I refer first to the charter granted under the Companies Act of Canada, and gazetted on the 18th January last to the Spring Water Company, Limited. I ask the committee to remember that this company, not being a railway company or one of the other companies prohibited from incorporating under the Companies Act. might have secured the same powers in the same way. Clause M of the charter of that company reads as follows:

> To invest and deal with moneys of the company not imediately required upon such securities as may from time to time be determined.

That is not only word for word the same as clause 2 of the present Bill, but it does not even contain the restriction inserted in clause 2 by the Private Bills Committee, namely that they must be limited to temporary investments.

Now, let me take the case of the Joliette Steel Casting Works, Limited, gazetted on the 18th January last also. They have power

> To invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner as may from time to time be determined.

Showing that the wording of the second clause is the standard wording. Take again the National Builders Supply and Enamel Concrete Brick Company, Limited, also gazetted on the 18th January last. They have power to invest the moneys of the company not immediately required, in such manner as may from time to time be determined by the company.

Mr. EMMERSON: Does the hon. gentleman note any distinction between a company that is a strictly transportation company and a company which is purely industrial?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will come to that in a moment. I go on to the case of the Quebec and Orleans Corporation, Limited. They have the same powers to invest the moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner as may from time to time be determined. Take the Western Canada Public Utilities, Limited. That is a special case. The wording in their charter is in these terms. It shall have the power:

> To invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required upon such securities and in such manner as may from time to time be determined.

And this Western Canada Public Utilities Limited has powers in their charter similar to those in that of the Richelieu and Ontario Company. They have powers:

> To purchase, take in exchange, or otherwise acquire and hold, ships, vessels or ferries or any shares or interests in ships, vessels or ferries, and also shares, stocks or securities of any companies possessed of, or interested in any ships, vessels or ferries, and to maintain, repair, improve, alter, sell, exchange or let out to hire or charter, or otherwise deal with and dispose of any ships, vessels or ferries or shares, or securities, aforesaid.

Mr. EMMERSON: Only to hold shares?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, they may invest in them; the same powers as this company has. That makes it clear at all events that any company coming to the authorities in Canada under the machinery framed and incorporated in the Companies Act, may obtain the very powers granted here; and since we concede that a company of this character could come under the general machinery which this Parliament has provided, and get the power they are asking for, we establish, if we intend to be fair, that we are bound in the case of a special incorporation to grant that power to that company. Because to do otherwise would be to say: 'If you come to Parliament and get a special Act, even if you are a company of a class that might have been incorporated under the general Act, you must beware, or Parliament will afterwards take vengeance upon you and abbreviate the powers that you might have secured under the Companies Act.' Surely that would not be fair. Surely we must follow and follow rigidly the principle, that so long as we have a general Act under which companies may secure general powers, we are bound in the case of a special company to grant the same powers, no matter how that company is incorporated; because to do otherwise, would be to establish a distinction for which there is no ground. If we want to do otherwise, we should limit the operations of the Companies Act in such a way as to altogether exclude public service corporations or natural monopolies.

The hon. member for Westmorland has asked me if I do not see a distinction between the case of a company which is of a public service character, or which is fulfilling a quasi public office, and a purely industrial corporation. There is for many purposes a difference, but for the life of me, I have not been able in the course of this debate to see how any such difference can apply to the present argument, that is so far as clause 2 is concerned. The company under clause 2 has power to make only investments. It has no special power under clause 2 to make investments of a character that would be detrimental to the public interest; none whatever. To reduce the powers granted by clause 2 would, to my mind, operate as a serious handicap; and if we want to secure the object which is in the mind of the hon. member for South York and in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which I believe is just as deeply imbedded in the minds of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the only way is to take our Companies Act and so reform it as to make it clear that public service corporations cannot get incorporation under that Act; and secondly, that when quasi public institutions come to this House for legislation they must come knowing that this Parliament will not grant them any powers which may be exercised to the detriment of the public interest. There is one way and one way only of doing it; but to pick out one corporation which is in competition with others and to in any way limit the power granted it as compared with the power granted its rivals, is to establish a system of invidious distinction which no Parliament should be asked to establish.

I have very great sympathy with the object sought to be obtained by many hon. gentlemen who have spoken. That object is, to see to it in behalf of the public that all the quasi-public institutions shall so use the money derived from their shares as to advance the interest of each company in its public service capacity; and furthermore, to see to it that, in the sale of these shares in the form in which they are offered to the public and sold, the interests of the public are conserved to the extent even of seeing that the utmost possible return is secured from them. I feel like going further even than would some hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) would limit the operations of Parliament to companies of a distinctly public character; to railroad corporations, whose operations if successful have not been, are not now, and I believe cannot be on a purely competitive basis and which therefore assume more of a monopolistic character and perform as a result functions that are largely public functions. I believe for my part that not only in the case of such companies, but that now and with more certainty with the advancement of time, the public servants of this country, the Parliament of this country, should conceive it a duty to look into the stock issue of industrial concerns, because there is very considerable authority for the assertion.

Mr. CARVELL: I would control that by means of the tariff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says he would control it by means of the tariff, but to that doctrine he is a very recent convert. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says that for five years in this country, by reason of overcapitalization, the cost of living has gone up, and hardships have been entailed on the workingman. Well, if we take this period of five years, then, after this same thing had gone on for three long years, the hon. gentleman and his Government came down to Parliament and specifically invited this corporation to proceed still further in the merger process, and to purchase the franchises of its rivals and thus enhance the cost of living. The hon. gentleman could not have acted in the dark at that time, because by his own estimate, given to-night, this process which was so highly detrimental and injurious to the public, had then been in operation under his own Government for three years at least. And the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), who now says that by means of the tariff he would reinstate the principle of competition and utterly strip this Parliament of any interest whatever in the stock issue of industrial corporations, talked very little on that subject during the fifteen years the Liberal Government was in power. The tariff which is responsible, according to him, for enabling watered stock corporations to secure dividends, is what tariff? It is the tariff in force to-day; it is the Fielding Tariff which the hon. gentleman vigourously supported. I do not look for relief in tariff matters to the hon. member for Carleton or for any support in that regard of a sincere character from him.

Si WILFRID LAURIER: You expect it from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I look to the Minister of Finance with very great hope for fair treatment in tariff matters. I am affirming that this or some future Parliament would conceive it part of its duty to regulate in some way, through the appointment of a commission or otherwise, the issue and the sale of securities of corporations whether of a quasi public character or not.

Hon. gentlemen will remember that, before a commission appointed by the United States Government many years ago, evidence was adduced to show that the amount of stock issued by large corporations had a distinct effect upon the price of commodities produced by these corporations; and hon. members will also remember that of recent date there is a very lofty if not distinguished authority writing in the magazines, and he has made a very considerable case in support of the assertion that the public is just as much interested in the stock issue of industrial corporations as it is in the stock issue of quasi-public corporations. This gentleman shows that by means of the operations of the stock exchange conducted as they are to-day, issues are placed at a more or less fictitious value, and that as a direct and necessary result, tariff or no tariff, the public are affected thereby and the price of the products of these corporations is enhanced. The machinery now provided for the sale, disposition and transfer of stock makes it possible to so increase the apparent value of stock issues of all corporations, and, by means of understandings between these corporations, to enhance the value of their products to the detriment of the public interest. But at the same time I affirm that it is clearly the duty of this House to address itself to this question in its broad sense. I am quite aware that it is surrounded in every respect with difficulty. I am not in a mood to criticise the Government in power at the present time. They have been in office only one year; but the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, whose public enthusiasm has received a wonderful stimulus since the 21st of September, 1911, sat in this Parliament and in the Government very comfortably for a great many years, and we then heard no allusion to this subject from him. He did not talk then of the mergers, the trusts, and the combines, with tears in his voice, as he does now. But I can tell the hon. gentleman to-night that he will not have to wait fifteen years for the present Government to take action in this regard; he will hear less talk and see a lot more of legislation on the subject if he sits in this House for another fifteen years. I have in mind something of the character suggested by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) that without undue restriction on the issue power of corporations, after such issue power is granted by this Parliament, there will be some authority in the public interest to see to it that the issue takes the form most calculated to serve the public interest, which is after all identified with the interests of the company, and to see to it also that after the form is decided upon the best possible results shall be obtained. I do not think there is perhaps so great an evil existing as some would lead us to believe. It is true that a public service corporation at the present time has apparently in violation of statutes—perhaps not in violation of statutes but in violation of what at present prevails generally speaking—issued stock at a price below the market value. At the same time we must remember that if that very company had not power to issue the stock in the way it did and if the shareholders of that company did not know that that power rested in it, the price of the stock would be altered accordingly. The price of the stock would fall, because of necessity the public, knowing that that company may issue stock in this way, put a value on that power and add that value to the stock. As a consequence, the stock of the company rests at a figure above what it would if the issuing power were not as it is. At the same time, I do not think that destroys the position; I do not think that removes the charge; I do not think that removes the argument that the public are interested; most certainly it does not, because the better position to put the company in is this, to see to it that the public knows, that the public is certain, that the company's stock must be sold at its market value; and then we know exactly the position which the stockholders and the public are in, when we come to regulate the rates of that company. I think we have already spent too much time over this particular Bill. The hon. member for Carleton is astonished, and shrinks in terror from clause 2; but the hon. member for Westmorland says that in the form it is now it is meaningless, because the company could do anyway all that the clause provides. Having come to that state of conflict of opinion on the other side, surely there is not much to worry about. We should not make any special case of the present company. When we come to legislate in this regard, we must do so in a spirit of fairness to all companies that now exist and that shall exist; and see that the legislation shall apply the same to one as to another.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): We are getting away from the issue as brought up this afternoon. Some very important statements have been made during this discussion; it is the most valuable and the most fruitful discussion we have had in this House for some days; and I do not think the House could have been better occupied this afternoon than it has been in discussing this question of capitalization of companies. The hon. gentleman, who has just spoken, says that we should not discriminate; but we constantly do that in the Railway Committee and in legislation as it goes through this House in dealing with companies. In the Railway Committee we have several model clauses which we can apply to new companies or to any new legislation that comes up. In view of the statement made by the right hon. the leader of the House to-night, in view of the statements made by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and by the speaker who has just taken his seat, I say that we would be doing our duty if we put a clause in this Bill that its capitalization should be subject either to the proposal that I have made or to one based on the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary, namely, that this company's capitalization should go to the Railway Commission for approval, and that the form of the securities to be issued by that company should be approved by that commission. That is what has been done in the United States, and it is what has been done in the state of New York. It is true that in this case we would be dealing with only one company; but I hope the view will not be taken that by reason of what has been said since dinner time we are white-washing the Canadian Pacific for what it has done. If we insert a clause that the capitalization of this company must be subject to the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners, along the line of legislation in the state of New York, we can insert a similar clause in the next Bill of the Canadian Pacific which comes up in this House, and that is what I want to see. It is all very well to say: You must wait for a general Act; the best way to reform legislation is to begin with a special company, and take the companies up one after the other as they come before the House. We will gradually work out the experiment and the public will know that Parliament has begun at last to regulate the capitalization of these companies. The hon. member for Calgary made a very good suggestion this afternoon; but he wants to wait until we can create a 'court of commerce,' as he said. We have got the very commission at an enormous cost, well equipped, with trained members on it, with high officials at their disposal; and we have the legislation of other countries to go by, and no injustice would be done to any of these companies or to this particular company, if we put a simple clause in this Bill that they have power to increase their issue of securities subject to the approval of the Railway Commission.

Mr. GERMAN: Why does the hon. member not move an amendment to change the Bill in accordance with the suggestion which he is making ?

Mr. MACLEAN : I am quite willing that the Bill should be reported to-night on the understanding that I have the opportunity, say next Monday, when we go into private Bills, of introducing an amendment of that kind, which will apply to this company, but which will be of such a general character that it can be inserted in the general Railway Act. I shall have to take some time and care in drafting the amendment, because the former Minister of Justice told me that the drafting of a Bill of mine was quite incompetent. If it is understood that the Bill is to be reported to-night and to stand till Monday next for its third reading, I will have an amendment ready to propose by that time.

Mr. OLIVER : My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), during the course of his remarks, did me the honour of alluding to myself and my responsibility as member of a former government. First of all, let me remind the committee of the position which he laid down, that because the Companies' Act made provisions, which he said were the same as those contained in this Bill, therefore Parliament should not interfere with this company, when it comes forward and asks only for such powers as are covered by the Companies' Act. He says it is not fair that we should deal especially with powers in this Bill which the company could have secured under the Companies' Act. My appreciation of the responsibility of Parliament is entirely different from his. The Companies' Act may be right or wrong; it may be good or bad; but the Companies' Act is not up for the consideration of Parliament at this moment; this particular Bill is what is up for our consideration. If the company sees fit not to take advantage of the provisions of the Companies' Act, but to come to this Parliament and get the direct authorization of Parliament, then the responsibility necessarily, unquestionably, and absolutely rests upon each individual member of this Parliament as to the action that he shall take. My hon. friend cannot shirk his responsibility as a member of this House in dealing with this Bill, because a Companies' Act exists. I think my hon. friend will appreciate that position when he comes to look it over. We are dealing with a concrete question before this House at the present time. It does not make any difference whether there is or there is not a Companies' Act, or what is or is not in the Companies' Act; the question is, what are we going to put in this Bill or what are we not going to put in this Bill.

Mr. PELLETIER : Then you have to discriminate ?

Mr. OLIVER : It is not a question of whether you discriminate or not; it is a question of whether you do justice by the people you represent. If the Companies' Act is wrong, there is a government sitting on the Government benches, of which my hon. friend is a supporter; and it is up to him and his friends to make the Companies' Act right. It is not good enough to say that that Act was passed by a previous government. That government is not in power now; it is not responsible to the people of the country at the present time; it is our friends who are responsible.

Mr. PELLETIER : Not even responsible for what they did.

Mr. OLIVER : They are responsible for what they did at the time they did it: but they are not responsible for what is done now; my hon. friends are to-day responsible for what they do or for what they leave undone, and they cannot place that responsibility upon their predecessors in office. It is amusing to see my hon. friends undertake to place on their predecessors the responsibility that they demanded at the hands of the country. The country, I think foolishly, granted them their demands, and now they say: Why, you did it; therefore it is right for us to do it. They did not make that argument when they were appealing to the country.

Mr. PELLETIER: Perhaps my hon. friend will appreciate the argument put in a somewhat different form, that this Bill applies to a particular case which my hon. friend has declared to be good for all cases.

Mr. OLIVER: At the time the Companies Act was passed, it was the mind of Parliament—of our friends who sat on this side of the House as well as of those who sat on the other. I never heard my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, who was in the House two years ago, objecting to the provisions of the Companies Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Companies Act was not passed then. The Act that was passed was the special Act of the late Government granting the special powers of this company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was private legislation.

Mr. EMMERSON: Was it a Government Bill?

Mr. OLIVER: It was private legislation to which my hon. friend did not object.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not objecting now.

Mr. OLIVER: No, certainly not. We will deal with that in a few minutes. My hon. friend cannot escape from his responsibility because of action taken by a previous Government, which was the mind of Parliament at that time, and for which the Opposition of that time must share the responsibility with the Government; because it must be remembered that members of Parliament are to answer to their constituents for what they say and do in regard to all measures that come before the House. It is not enough to say that the Government did so and so; the question is: what did you do? If the Opposition supported the Companies Act as it was passed, then members of the Opposition are in no position to criticise the Government for having been a party to the passing of that Act.

My hon. friend drew special attention to the position of the Government in passing an Act two years ago to increase the capital stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. He said that what we did two years ago we were wishing to undo now; and that properly we ought to try to repeal the Act of two years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The Act of two years ago is the Act which enabled this particular company to purchase shares in any other concern doing a like business.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely so. My hon. friend suggests that if we wish to take a logical position upon this Act, we should ask for the repeal of that Act of two years ago. When that matter was brought into Parliament as a private Bill, it received the assent of Parliament, of my hon. friend as well as of other members, on the representation, if representation was made at all, on the understanding precisely that has been put before this House at this present time, that the money to be raised by the increase of the stock would be used in expanding the legitimate business of the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why pass clause 10 of the Act?

Mr. OLIVER: I am stating my case just now. When the Bill was passed by Parliament, it was in the belief that the money would be used for the expansion of the transportation business of the company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why pass clause 10?

Mr. OLIVER: Never mind clause 10.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it is distinctly against that.

Mr. OLIVER: Never mind whether clause 10 was passed or not. The understanding of Parliament in regard to that Bill was exactly the understanding that has been given to Parliament to-day by the promoters of the present Bill, but the understanding was not made good; the money that Parliament authorized the company to raise by an increase of stock was used, in part at any rate, for the purpose of restricting competition and not for the purpose of expanding transportation facilities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under clause 10.

Mr. LESPERANCE: In what way did the company use its capital in the past to restrict competition?

Mr. OLIVER: To merge companies.

Mr. LESPERANCE: Were they competitive companies, or simply companies to extend the line?

Mr. OLIVER: I understand they were competitive companies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: They were not.

Mr. OLIVER: Admitting for the sake of argument that they were not. The point is that other companies were acquired by this company after that legislation was passed, and that the present position in regard to matters of transportation on the great lakes is inimical to the best interests of this country. It is because of what has taken place since the legislation of 1911 was passed, that we urge so strongly that provision be made in this Bill that the money that the company is empowered to raise shall be used for the purpose of transportation and not for the establishment of monopolies. I think that is a sufficient answer to my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie as to the consistency of action of members of the then Government, who were parties to the authorization of that increase of capital, and who are now opposing this increase of capitalization. At any rate it is the answer I am satisfied to stand by. If we had known then what we know now, we would have done then what we want to do now, but which our hon. friends will not have done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask my hon. friend, after reading clause 10, to state whether the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company could have done anything else under that clause than it has done?

Mr. OLIVER: This is not the court in which my hon. friend generally practices, and he will have to pardon me if I continue my remarks. In regard to the establishment of mergers, my hon. friend stated that during the last five years mergers have been established under the regime of the late Government, and that the tariff to-day is the tariff of the late Government. That is true, but my hon. friend is not fair when he suggests that the present tariff is the tariff that would have existed to-day had the late Government remained in office. My hon. friend knows that the late Government went out of office on the question of reducing that tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. LESPERANCE: I think we are getting rather far away from the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member is departing from the matter under discussion.

Mr. OLIVER: I was replying to what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie had said, as some of the remarks he made were decidedly unfair, and it was merely a courtesy on my part to make the necessary explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Tell us what merger you were after on the reciprocity question.

Mr. OLIVER: We were after every merger that had to do particularly with the food of the people; the food trusts were the interests particularly attacked by the reciprocity arrangement. I was very much struck with the strong assertion on the part of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and also the hon. member for Calgary, regarding the necessity of regulating these combinations and this melon cutting now under consideration in this House. They gave excellent reasons why something should be done and how it should be done; the only trouble with these two hon. gentlemen is that they talk one way and vote the other. They tell the people of the country that they are sympathetic with them; that these mergers and this issue of watered stock should not be permitted, but they always vote against the public when the occasion arises. I think that on this question hon. gentlemen will have some difficulty in explaining how their speeches, eloquent though they are, logical though they may be, will comport with the vote they give on the other side. As to the pertinence of this question, let me read an article from the Montreal Daily Herald of February 10, showing how closely this particular organization is associated with the transportation interests that are of first and highest importance to the constituencies represented by the hon. member for Calgary, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and myself:

It is perhaps too early to predict regarding the outcome of the season 1913, but there seems little doubt that steamship owners themselves are looking forward to several years of good business. The volume of freight moved on the Great Lakes in 1912 was the greatest in the history of the trade, and no season ever closed with better prospects for its successor.

They had quite a whack at the northwest farmer last summer, and this summer they will have even a better one than before!

There was a movement of 45,000,000 tons of ore on the upper lakes laste season; the coming summer, it is expected, this will reach 50,000,000 tons. From the standpoint of grain cargoes, 1913 is likely to rival that of 1912, which was an exceptionally good year.

For the transportation companies, but not for the farmer.

The stocks of grain at Fort William and Port Arthur at the present time aggregate 22,174,630 bushels, compared with 17,746,459 bushels at the same time last year. By the time navigation opens, the stock of grain will, of course, have very materially increased.

Our friends are already sharpening their knives; they see the carcass there, and they are going to cut to the bone!

There is always the possibility that the Interlake and the St. Lawrence companies may be gobbled up by the R. and O. merger. The two, possessing some very fine boats, would be an excellent complement of the other, which is particularly strong in the matter of passenger boats. But whether anything develops along that line or not, the outlook for the securities of all three would appear most promising.

Especially if the Bill now before the House goes through in its present form.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the hon. member for Charlevoix tell the House what companies are to be absorbed in this merger?

Sir RODOLPHE FORGET: None whatever.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend assures the House personally that there will be no obsorption of other companies, what can be his objection to saying so in the first clause of the Bill?

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall this Bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: At the next sitting of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. SPEAKER. At the next sitting of the House.

Mr. PELLETIER: There are no amendments, and that being so I understand that the Bill may pass.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there are no amendments to a Bill, the usual custom is to pass it; but the rule provides that it is read the third time 'when the House determines.' So that, if objection is taken, it is usual to hold it over.

Bill stands for third reading.

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 55, to incorporate the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners.—Mr. Taylor.

On the preamble:

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this to be a free port?

Mr. TAYLOR : This has been a harbour for fifty years.

Mr. McKENZIE: Very often when a harbour is organized and put under control of a commission, fees are charged. After this harbour has been organized and put under a commission will it continue to be a free port?

Mr. TAYLOR : I did not understand or catch the hon. gentleman's first question. It is intended, as provided in this Bill, that the usual fees shall be charged at this harbour.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are no usual fees; every harbour has its own fees.

Mr. TAYLOR: If the hon. member is so precise, I shall say the customary fees.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are no customary fees. Every harbour is a law unto itself, so far as its fees are concerned. They are usually so much a ton on shipping, and if my hon. friend will be more precise and say what the tonnage charge will be—

Mr. TAYLOR: The hon. member is only trifling with the committee. No one on earth can tell what the fees in such a harbour will be.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Chairman, I ask your ruling if the hon. member is in order in saying that an hon. member is trifling with the committee?

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend may think himself parliamentary, and it does not disturb me whether he is or not, but it is important for the shipping of this country to know what the rates of that port are going to be. I think it quite proper that I should ask at this stage how the rates are to be taxed and shipping is to be regulated. It is a matter for the Minister of Marine to deal with. This Bill has gone through this committee in a very slipshod way, and I charge the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with giving it very little attention. It is a very important Bill dealing with an important harbour on the western coast, and when I ask a question as to what the rates on shipping will be I am told by the gentleman promoting the Bill that I am trifling with the committee. The men who go into that port with their ships and who will have to pay so much a ton according to the whim and caprice of this board will not think it is trifling with the committee to ask for this information before the Bill goes through. It is not a slight matter to create a close corporation and give them power to deal as they please with the shipping on the Pacific coast. The hon. member who is promoting the Bill thinks he has a monopoly on this House and on this committee and that any one who interferes with his high and mighty proclivities is trifling with the committee. I am not of those whom he can wipe aside so simply as that.

Mr. TAYLOR: I am sorry that the hon. member takes my answer in that way. I did not attempt to take the role of a chucker-out in this Parliament, but he must see it is impossible for any person to tell off-hand what the harbour rates will be in any harbour because these rates will be a very long schedule, perhaps it would take an hour to read them and no person could answer off-hand a question like that, not even the harbour-master of any harbour. This Bill is in all respects the same as a long series of harbour bills already passed by this House. It follows their wording in every particular. The control of the harbour is to be in three commissioners, two of whom will be appointed by the Government and one by the corporation principally concerned and they will fix the harbour rates. Of course, if they fixed them unreasonably, they would discourage trade to their harbour, and their object is to cause traffic to come to the harbour, not to get the harbour tolls but to get trade. So, I think we can take it for granted that ordinary business sense will compel the governing board of the harbour to make their tolls just as attractive as it is possible to make them, and just as low as it is possible to make them. The Harbour Board would make the tolls but I think hon. gentlemen will see that if they made them excessive they would simply drive trade to other harbours, and so defeat their own ends which is to make their harbour popular.

Mr. McKENZIE: Now that the responsible head of the Marine Department is in his seat, I wish to call to his notice the fact that in connection with the organized harbours of this country, such as St. John, Halifax, Sydney, North Sydney and other harbours which are controlled by commissioners, there is a cry coming from the ship owners that the harbour dues are very high, and are a tax upon the shipping of this country. With this new organization about to be created in what I regard as a very important port, of a very important province, I think it would be only right for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to make that port free if possible. I think it is the popular idea to-day, that we should have free ports in Canada; at all events, the minister should see to it that the dues upon shipping in the harbour of New Westminster are very small. I do not think I am out of place, coming as I do from a marine part of the country, and knowing the feelings of mariners, in calling the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that the interests of shipping and ship owners should be safeguarded as far as possible, and that it should not be left to town councillors or city councillors, who as a rule know very little about the interests of shipping, to make regulations and fix harbour dues without their being at least subject to the approval of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. TAYLOR: If the hon. gentleman will read the section which has just been passed, he will see that the tolls are to be imposed by by-law, and that:

No by-law shall have force or effect until confirmed by the Governor in Council and published in the Canada Gazette, and every such by-law shall, at least ten days before it is submitted to the Governor in Council, be served upon the city clerk of New Westminster.

So that the tolls are made absolutely subject to inspection by the Governor in Council by the section which we have just adopted.

Mr. EMMERSON: There was some discussion when this Bill was up on a former occasion as to the boundaries of the harbour. Were the boundaries ever setteld?

Mr. TAYLOR: Yes, that was the amendment proposed to section 4. I may say that in conformity with that, when we reach the next Bill, I propose to amend the corresponding section there, so as to make the boundaries fit.

Bill reported.

NORTH FRASER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

House in Committee on Bill No. 59, to incorporate North Fraser Harbour Commissioners. Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.

On section 4—harbour limits defined:

Mr. TAYLOR: With the permission of the committee, I would like to strike out the amendments proposed by the Private Bills Committee, and leave this section as it appears in the Bill, because it corresponds exactly with the amendment we have just made in the other Bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—appointment of commissioners:

Mr. TAYLOR: This section was held over to provide for an amendment suggested by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), I propose that the following be added as sub-section 4:

In default of appointment of a commissioner by the said municipalities within thirty days of the publication in the Canada Gazette of the names of the commissioners appointed by the Governor General in Council, the Governor General in Council may appoint the third commissioner also; and any person so appointed shall hold office in all respects as the person in whose place he was appointed would have held it.

Section, so amended, agreed to.

On section 15—profits of operation to belong to city:

Mr. TAYLOR: This section stood over for the same reason. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) suggested that at the commencement of section 15 there should be added the words: 'subject to the limitations contained in section 12 of this Act.' Then, Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to go back to section 12 to add at the end of the section the words: 'or the right to enter upon or deal with any property of the Crown except when by Order in Council authorized to do so.' These two amendments must be read together. I move their adoption.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the Minister of Marine followed these amendments?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 19—borrowing powers:

Mr. TAYLOR: The hon. member for St. John suggested to insert after the word 'harbour' in the sixth line, the words: 'and subject to the approval of the Governor General in Council first obtained.' I move that that amendment be adopted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

ALBERTA RAILWAY AND IRRIGATION COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 38, respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company.—Mr. Buchanan.

(Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On the preamble:

Mr. OLIVER: This Bill seems to provide for a number of branches. Has the location of these branches been considered fully in the Railway Committee?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes. The committee spent a great deal of time on the Bill and heard everything that could be said, and the committee were unanimously of the opinion that the Bill as drawn by the promoters was in the best interests of the country. There are three amendments to be added to the Bill for the protection of provincial rights, in regard to water-powers, and the model clauses as to highways and generating electricity.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

OTTAWA NORTHERN AND WESTERN RAILWAY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 49, respecting the Ottawa Northern and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Fripp.

(Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. OLIVER: Are we to understand that these clauses that are being added to these Bills are exactly those which have been adopted in the Railway Committee and are in accordance with certain fixed principles?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes, they are the standard or model clauses. They are modified in the last two Bills. The companies referred to in these Bills originally had provincial charters. So we say that so far as they had that power they shall have exercise of it except thus and so. That makes them, to all intents and purposes, the standard clauses.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

COLLINGWOOD SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 64, respecting the Collingwood Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Currie.

(Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. LANCASTER: There are four sections here, the first one being necessary because this company had rights in respect of water-powers that are not in accord with our present policy. We have to repeal that, then we enact the other three.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BRAZILIAN TRACTION, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 63, respecting Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Macdonell.

(Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. EMMERSON: This is one of a number of Bills on the Order Paper which in my judgement are examples of very objectionable legislation. I took occasion before the Railway Committee to call attention of that committee to one of these Bills. The Bill under consideration seeks to give the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited, a company that was incorporated under the Companies Act, certain powers with a view to carrying on certain works in Brazil. I do not know why it is that these companies first apply to the Secretary of State seeking incorporation there, and then come before Parliament asking additional powers. I am bound to say that in the past we have acceeded to the application of three or four different companies of this kind within the past five or six years. But on every such occasion I have persistently raised a protest against such procedure. In the first place, why is it that they take that course? Why is it that they go first to the Secretary of State and get their corporate powers, and then come to the Parliament of Canada and seek for certain other powers? A great many say, 'Oh, they cannot get such powers to carry on railway operations in these foreign countries.' Well, in the first place, they cannot get powers from this Parliament to carry on railway operations except as that power is given them by the foreign country in which they seek to operate. This Bill says:

> Subject to the laws in force in the republic of Brazil and with such legislative, governmental, municipal or other authority, concession license or consent as is necessary, the Brazilian Traction Light and Power Company, Limited, hereinafter called the Company, may within the republic of Brazil, survey, lay out, construct, complete, equip, maintain, and operate—— —certain railways. Now, we had considerable discussion with respect to banks; we have had considerable discussion with respect to the financial affairs of this country, the lack of funds, the use of funds of banks, trust companies and other financial institutions in a way that is detrimental to the business interests of this country. Now, by this instrument an opportunity is afforded to certain gentlemen who have a corporate existence to float bonds, to issue stocks, to issue share warrants, and generally to do a stock jobbing business in Canada in respect of works that are to be constructed and operated, in this instance, in Brazil, in other instances in Mexico, in other instances in the United States—in Louisiana—and there is one, I think, that will come up for the consideration of this committee wherein it is proposed to construct works in Spain.

Mr. LANCASTER: The Mexican Bill was last year.

Mr. EMMERSON: Yes, there was one last year, and in the previous years there have been such Bills; and in the past, when such Bills have been under consideration, I have opposed them. I took objection to the one that was discussed the other day when I was present. The hon. senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) took occasion to animadvert upon the Bill of the New Orleans and Grand Isle Traction, Light and Power Company. He took very strong ground and gave cogent reasons why the committee should not proceed. The committee did not take action and the Bill stood over. I had hoped to be present at the committee last week, but was obliged to be out of the city, and I could not, when the Bill was reached, take exception. This kind of legislation is wrong in principle. It is wrong, first of all, because of its inconvenience. A company is brought into existence in the office of the Secretary of State, with certain limited powers. Then it is wafted over to this Parliament, perhaps at a subsequent session, or it may have been incorporated since the commencement of the session. Its promoters come here and seek additional powers. That cannot be, surely, with a view to the avoidance of the fees. Is it because they get all the powers they require, or many powers they might not get here?—they can get almost anything from the Secretary of State offices; that is my experience and observation in past years, and I venture to think the same continues to-day. I take exception to this legislation for the reasons which I have stated, and also for many other reasons. One very strong reason is that the public have the right to have all the corporate powers and authority given to a company centralized in one place. If the creation of a company has been had in the Secretary of State's office, and then supplemented here in Parliament, you must go and search the Secretary of State's office for the powers given there and then come and search the statutes of Canada for what additional powers we have given it in this Parliament. I ask if there is a single member of this committee who has any knowledge of the powers that have been granted this company by the Secretary of State.

Mr. LANCASTER: That was discussed in Committee. They are all set forth in the marginal note.

Mr. EMMERSON: I submit that nothing is to be found in the Bill to indicate what the powers of this company are. They ask for certain additional powers which they admittedly could not get from the Secretary of State; they ask for powers to build railways and tramways, telegraph and telephone lines, and acquire properties of other companies——

Mr. LANCASTER: Subject to the laws of the country.

Mr. EMMERSON: Precisely so; but where is it stated in this Bill that they have any powers except those granted by the Bill?

Mr. LANCASTER: The Railway Committee looked into the matter very carefully, and the preamble sets forth that the company is incorporated by letters patent under the Companies Act, etc. These letters patent were explained before the Railway Committee, and the members of the committee, in view of the fact that a marginal note was inserted referring to the Canada Gazette of 13th July, 1912, which defines just what those powers are, were unanimous in the opinion that the extent of these powers could easily be ascertained. The matter resolved itself into the question as to whether we as a legislative committee of this House should give to this company power to build a railway in Brazil subject to the laws of that country. A foreign country would not allow them to build a railway because they are incorporated in a British country without specific power to build a railway anywhere, and they therefore, ask this Parliament to give them power, subject to the laws of the country concerned, to build a railway as set forth in the Bill.

Mr. EMMERSON: I am speaking not merely of the Railway Committee as it is now constituted, but of the committee as it has been constituted for the past six or seven years. I have stated that this is objectionable legislation. We are ratifying the existence of a body corporate created under the general laws of Canada through the medium of the Secretary of State, and we are giving to that corporate body the power to build a railway in Brazil. Where do you find in the Bill any evidence of the amount of the capital that has been subscribed or is required to be subscribed, or of the powers to issue bonds, or anything of the kind? My hon. friend the Chairman of the Railway Committee states that they had the original letters patent before the Committee. We have not got them now before us, and they have not been embodied in the Bill. There might be no objection to the Bill if the preamble set forth all that the letters patent contained, so that everyone could appreciate the powers conferred upon the company. But there are no statements that throw any light upon it, and we are asked to give a corporation power to go into Brazil and construct a railway, providing they can get enough people in Canada or Great Britain to subscribe stock and purchase bonds.

Mr. LANCASTER: There is not a word about that in the Bill.

Mr. EMMERSON: That is true, and I am objecting to the Bill because of that very fact. Who is to exploit this stock? Who is to exploit these bonds? The authority of the Parliament of Canada is proposed to be given to this company for the purposes set forth, without one jot or tittle of evidence as to the capitalization or the amount of bonds proposed to be issued. Every other Bill coming before the Railway Committee is scrutinized closely as to the amount of securities the company is authorized to issue, and with respect to the capitalization of the company that proposes to construct the line of railway in Canada.

Mr. LANCASTER: How could the committee scrutinize these matters in regard to Mexico, for instance?

Mr. EMMERSON: We have no power of restriction with respect to Mexico; let these gentlemen go to Mexco and get their legislation. The truth of the matter is that they want to have the authority of the Parliament of Canada in order to exploit the financial markets of this country and of Great Britain. This legislation in my judgment, does not amount to a hill of beans, only in so far as the wrong impression it has created is concerned. What powers can we give them with respect to the construction of telegraph and telephone lines, railways and tramways, in Brazil? We cannot do it; they have to get the power from the legislative authorities of that country.

Mr. LANCASTER: Possibly my hon. friend misapprehends the Bill, or perhaps, I did not explain it at sufficient length. The letters patent distinctly state the company cannot build a railway. The object of the Railway Committe has not been to give them power, but to remove what creates a false and fictitious impression in that country. In these letters patent the world has noticed that this company cannot build a railway; and then the company ask us to say that as far as we are concerned, as long as they comply with the laws of that country, they can build a railway.

Mr. EMMERSON: I appreciate what my hon. friend has said, but I say that this gives them no powers which they can exercise there unless they get power from the legislative authorities of Brazil to do all this work. They do not need to come to this Parliament for these powers and a false impression is created by their doing so. If that be the case why did they go the office of the Secretary of State in the first instance? It is not treating the Parliament of Canada with proper respect and is only making use of the Department of the Secretary of State, and of the Parliament of Canada for purposes that are not in the interests of the people of Canada and that may prove detrimental to the interests. We have had in the past the Mexican Light, Heat and Power and other companies, but the fact that we have had that fashionable legislation is no reason why we should send out a deluge of like legislation at this time. These Bills do not come all from the same source, it must be for a purpose and for the purpose is not a good one; otherwise they would come originally to the Parliament of Canada as do other companies with relation to railways.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would ask the promoter why the company has taken this circuitous route of going to the Secretary of State first, instead of coming to Parliament to have the charter amended?

Mr. MACDONELL: The Bill stands in my name, and in that way I suppose I am promoting it; but if hon. gentlemen had attended the meetings of the Railway Committee when this was discussed they would have obtained all this information given at that meetiing. This Bill asks the Government to give the company the power of operating railways in the Republic of Brazil. This company was incorporated under our Companies Act in the usual way. For reasons best known to themselves the company decided that they would like to operate railways in addition to their general powers under the Companies Act. The Companies Act confers no power to operate a railway and therefore as this is a Canadian corporation the only place where the company can obtain railway power is from this Parliament. They ask to be given power to build and operate railways in the Republic of Brazil, always subject to the laws of Brazil and whatever rights they are given here give them no rights in Brazil. But this is a Canadian company and it is on the lines of other Bills that have gone through this Parliament on a good many occasions. Similar Bills went through the House while Mr. Emmerson was Minister of Railways. By chapter 153 of the statutes of 1903 Parliament incorporated the Mexican Light and Power Company. By chapter 119 of the statutes of 1904 Parliament incorporated the Rio De Janeiro Tramways, Light and Power Company, Limited; by chapter 126 of the statutes of 1905 Parliament incorporated the Monterey Railway Light and Power Company, Limited. By chapter 50 of the statutes of 1909 Parliament incorporated the Brazilian Electric Steel and Smelting Company, Limited, by chapter 110 of the statutes of 1909, the Mexico Northwestern Railway Company, Limited; by chapter 59 of the statutes of 1912 the Alabama Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited; by chapter 65 of the statutes of 1912, the Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited; by chapter 117 of the statutes of 1912, the Mexican Interurban Electric Traction Company, Limited; by chapter 118 of the statutes of 1912 the Mexican Northwestern Transportation Company, Limited. Was the hon. member for Westmorland Minister of Railways in 1905?

Mr. EMMERSON: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did all of these companies start by getting a charter from the Secretary of State and then coming to Parliament?

Mr. MACDONELL: That is my belief.

Mr. OLIVER: In what way is that statement of fact an answer to the objections raised by my hon. friend from Westmorland?

Mr. MACDONELL: I leave that to the sense of the Committee which is very evident on that point. Let me follow this matter to the end. Here is a Canadian corporation operating in a foreign country. There is no objection to that; our Companies Act recognizes that right and gives companies power to do so always subject to the laws of that country. Bear in mind that every incorporated company which operates under the general Companies Act is incorporated and operates under the authority of this Parliament just as much as it would under a special Act. In addition to the powers which the general Companies Act gives to every company that chooses to pay its money, they are asking in this case, as in prior cases, to have super-added to the general powers the power to operate a railway in a foreign country, subject always to the laws of that country. Now if Canadian capitalists, men of enterprise in this country, choose to embark in an enterprise in a foreign country, and to use their money for that purpose, it is their own affair. Any individual can do it in his individual capacity; any hon. gentleman in this House or out of it can embark in any enterprise in any foreign country, so long as the laws of that country are recognized That is the power that is being asked for in this Bill. They are not jeopardizing the good name or the money of this country. The enterprises which have been incorporated in the past have been uniformly successful as business enterprises. I believe that not only have they been profitable to those who own and operate them, but they have been of use and service to the country in which they have operated. Some of them have developed from small beginnings in those countries into very large and influential public service corporations. Canadian enterprise is identified with those concerns, and money has been made for those who put their investments into them. As a member of this House I see no reason why this legislation should be restricted. To my mind there is nothing in it that in any way interferes with any man's rights or with the rights of this country, and as a promoter of the Bill I ask the Committee to adopt it in view of what I have said and of the precedents which this Bill is following.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend has not even touched the question I have raised. It is all very well to say that some time when I was Minister of Railways similar legislation went through. I know that the Rio Grande and the two first companies mentioned went through previous to my day as minister. I know that some other companies from that time to this have gone through. I have invariably opposed them. I must repudiate the idea that because private legislation happened to go through at a time when I was Minister of Railways, or when I was supporting the late Government, that is an answer to objectionable legislation introduced now. I do not hold Governments responsible for private legislation in this House.

Mr. LANCASTER: Does it not show that the legislation is not objectionable?

Mr. EMMERSON: To say that because similar legislation went through at a time when another government was in power, or when I happened to be a member of that Government, or a supporter of it, is no answer to any objections that I raise with respect to this legislation. As minister I have sat in the Railway Committee and opposed legislation with respect to private Bills, which notwithstanding, have gone through. I do not hold the Minister of Railways responsible for every piece of legislation that goes through that committee. I conceive this to be wrong legislation. I have no exception to take to the granting of powers by this Parliament to a company to go to Mexico or to Brazil or to Spain or anywhere else to carry on business. But I do object to the circumlocution of the legislation, to a company going to one branch of the Government of Canada and getting powers, and then coming to this Parliament and getting supplementary powers. I would ask my hon. friend to tell us now what the capitalization of this company is and what bond issue it is authorized to make?

Mr. LANCASTER: As a railway?

Mr. EMMERSON: In connection with the company?

Mr. LANCASTER: That has to be settled by the country to which it is going, Brazil. We do not undertake to settle that.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not conceive that my hon. friend, even though he is chairman of the Railway Committee, is serious in giving that answer.

Mr. LANCASTER: Tell us what your objection is.

Mr. EMMERSON: If we give a company corporate existence, surely we fix somewhere its capitalization. It will not go to the legislature or Parliament of Brazil to have its capitalization fixed.

Mr. LANCASTER: As to the railway. If you read the Bill you will see.

Mr. EMMERSON: I submit that this Parliament must do it. This Parliament, giving this company a corporate existence, must have its capitalization and its powers in respect to the isssue of bonds fixed. The Parliament of Brazil will have nothing to do with that. The Parliament of Brazil will have the right to say where they shall construct the railway and upon what terms they may construct it; but so far as the internal affairs of this corporation is concerned, the Parliament of Brazil will not be asked in the first instance to regulate them, and it will not attempt to regulate them in any respect whatever. I have no objection to companies incorporated in Canada operating in foreign countries, not the slightest. It is the form of legislation to which I take exception, and I think my exception is well founded. It is no answer to say we have something similar before. I have been consistent in that; I have uniformly taken exception to it, and I take exception now, not because my hon. friends are sitting on the treasury benches for they have nothing whatever to do with it. But I invite their attention to it.

Mr. LANCASTER: Would the hon. gentleman, for our future guidance in dealing with Bills of this kind, suggest what form such legislation should take? If he is not satisfied with this form, what form would suit him?

Mr. EMMERSON: I object to promoters of such legislation rushing to the Department of State and getting a charter there, and then coming here and having powers conferred upon them by Parliament.

Mr. LANCASTER: What is the evil?

Mr. EMMERSON: One objection is, that all this circumlocution is gone through with a view to stock jobbing. Another point is, that those who become interested in the company should not have to search in the records of the State Department and in the statutes for the powers conferred on a company.

Bill reported.

EBRO IRRIGATION AND POWER COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 69, respecting Ebro Irrigation and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Ross.

Mr. EMMERSON: This Bill is subject to the same objection as the last Bill. I protest against the character of this legislation.

On section 2—issue of share warrants:

Mr. EMMERSON: What are the securities which this company is allowed to issue?

Mr. LANCASTER: I really do not know.

Mr. EMMERSON: The member in charge of the Bill should be able to give explanation.

Mr. LANCASTER: The member in charge of the Bill is Mr. Ross of Middlesex.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): He is on your own side.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not look to see from which side of the House private legislation comes when I want to take objection to it in the public interest. I think that is a very uncalled for remark.

Mr. LANCASTER: That whole thing was explained in the Railway Committee. I do not remember what the capitalization of the company is. We have a marginal note here in the Bill to say the company was incorporated on the 16th of September, 1911, by letters patent.

Mr. EMMERSON: The responsibilities of the Chairman of the Railway Company are very onerous and I do not expect that he would be able to keep all these details in mind, but the gentleman who is promoting the Bill ought to be in a position to give the information to the House.

Mr. LANCASTER: The Railway Committee thought the legislation could not do any harm in Canada and it might strengthen the ability of these people to develop their business in a foreign country. Section 8 of this Bill is an additional clause, by which we allow them for good cause shown to increase the number of directors to not more than twenty; that clause is not in the other Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: What objection would there be to having the legislation before the House contain the full particulars of the rights granted the company?

Mr. LANCASTER: Do you mean by the letters patent as well as by this Bill?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. LANCASTER: That could be done, but it would make a very long Bill. We say in the preamble that the company is incorporated by the Companies Act, and then we give the reference, namely the Canada Gazette of the 16th September, 1911. The moment you look at that reference you would naturally refer to the Companies Act. It would be too cumbersome to recite it all in the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it would be more convenient for all parties concerned if the full powers of the company were stated in the one Act.

Mr. MACDONELL: I sympathize with that view, and I agree that it is better for the company, as well as for all parties concerned if you could have all the powers of the company in the one document, so that it might be easily accessible. But where a company is incorporated under a general Act, it has all the powers of the general Act, some two hundred or more sections; and if you are going to print or publish anywhere the powers of the company that it has under the general Act, you would have to practically reprint as a special Act the entire general Companies' Act. That would be almost impossible, as the hon. member can easily see.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. member who is promoting this Bill just came into the House, and when he found out what it was, he ran out. I think the Bill had better stand.

NEW ORLEANS AND GRAND ISLE TRACTION, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 11, respecting the New Orleans and Grand Isle Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited, and to change its name to New Orleans and Grand Isle Railway, Light and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Macdonell.

On section 1—name changed:

Mr. MACDONELL: The hon. member for Westmorland has asked a question, which is reasonable, as to the amount of capital and as to the bond issue. I am unable to give him that information offhand; but if the hon. member would permit the Bill to go through the Committee, I will procure the information for him and for the Committee, if necessary, before the Bill is read a third time or otherwise proceeded with. I should like to get the Bill advanced.

Mr. EMMERSON: I wish to have the information with respect to the matter. I think it is but due to this Committee that other members should have it as well.

Mr. MACDONELL: That material was all before the Committee; but unfortunately the hon. member for Westmorland was not there. If I had the information here, I would gladly give it. I will give it to the Committee on the third reading, and also any other information asked for.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) said that if we were to give the particulars of the powers of the company as contained in the Joint Stock Companies Act, we would add very greatly to the length of the Bill, as there were some couple of hundred of sections in that Act. Is this the position; that, by incorporation under the Joint Stock Companies Act, a company gets powers that it would not get by incorporation as a railway company following the lines of the railway company's model Act; then having got these powers under the Joint Stock Companies Act, it comes to Parliament and gets supplementary powers as a railway company, thereby getting a number of powers by using first the Joint Stock Companies Act and then the legislation of Parliament, which powers it would not get if it came straight to Parliament as a railway company?

Mr. LANCASTER: No.

Mr. OLIVER: As there are over two hundred clauses in the Joint Stock Companies Act, it would be strange if some of those clauses do not contain provisions that are different from the powers contained in an ordinary railway charter. I think that is a point very well worthy of consideration.

Mr. LANCASTER: They are all powers that will follow as a matter of course in a railway charter; they are not powers that we set out in any railway Act, but by virtue of the granting Act of the general railway Act, which of course is read with every special Act, the special Act would work out all those powers the hon. gentleman speaks of.

Mr OLIVER: Would it not be better to give these people a general Act that would cover the powers they have under the Joint Stock Companies Act, and let us have it all before us in the statutes? It need not be a copy of the general Stock Companies Act, but it might be a railway companies' Act, just the same as any other railway companies' Act. We would then have the matter before us, and it would not very seriously increase the labour of printing or make the Act more cumbersome.

Mr. LANCASTER: It would be a distinction without a difference, because here we are simply dealing with something they have already got in this company a year ago. We have never yet in this country embarked on a policy of cancelling letters patent in an Act. I do not say that it could not be done, but it would be a new departure entirely. We have thought it better to refer to the letters patent, showing that we know they are before us, and we add so much to them. That is the custom in this country and in Great Britain.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to strongly express myself in favour of the principle as suggested by the hon. member for Westmorland that the Act should contain full particulars of the powers of the company at one place on the statutes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The difficulty could very easily be got over by reciting the few essential matters that everybody wants to know, such as the business the company intends to carry on, the amount of capital, the amount of bond issue and matters of that nature. The other sections of the Joint Stock Companies Act could be made to apply generally by simply referring to them afterwards. I think it would be better legislation and more easily understood. We have not been able yet to understand the reason why the people who are asking for this legislation did not come straight to Parliament, although there certainly must be some reason. Companies which intend to act out of Canada, usually take this course of going to the Secretary of State to obtain letters patent, and then come to Parliament to have amendments made. I have not the slightest objection to that course; but I think the Chairman of the committee, or some other gentleman who is familiar with these questions, could tell the House why these companies do not take the course that Canadian railway companies take of getting their legislation direct from Parliament.

Mr. LANCASTER: The Railway Committee understood the matter in this way, that the company had apparently no intention of building a railway when they took out the letters patent. They were incorporated mainly for light, heat and power purposes. When they came to do business in that country, they found they could do it very much better if they also had a railway. That was the way they explained the matter to the Railway Committee. Their letters patent distinctly say that they cannot build a railway; it is notice to the world that, although they can do the other things, they must not build a railway. Therefore they ask us by a subsequent Act for the power to build a railway.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does my hon. friend approve of this method of incorporating a Canadian railway company?

Mr. LANCASTER: No, certainly not; but we are not intending to do any harm to any Canadian interests, because we say: you can do it subject to the laws of that country and in that country only. We are removing the embargo; and if the company can get permission in New Orleans or Brazil to build that railway, they can do it.

Section agreed to.

On the preamble:

Mr. EMMERSON: Will the hon. gentleman furnish the information with respect to the capitalization of the Brazilian Traction Bill?

Mr. MACDONELL: Yes.

Bill reported.

HULL ELECTRIC COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 56, respecting the Hull Electric Company.—Mr. Devlin.

On section 1:

Mr. LANCASTER: This is a body incorporated under Quebec provincial authority for a good many other purposes than that of operating a railway. But the Railway Committee thought it had no right to give the company incorporation here, and allow them to exercise powers under a Dominion charter at the expense of provincial rights, except so far as their railway is concerned. Therefore we struck out the words works and undertaking so that it applies only to the railway of the company and not to its other works, the railway being declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. The same amendment will be necessary in section 3.

On section 3:

Mr. LANCASTER: The clerk called my attention to the fact that in the hurry of signing this Bill I had not initialed the exclusion of the words 'and undertaking.' To make it regular I formally move that these words be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN: I would call the attention of my hon. friends opposite to the fact that this Bill seems to be a good deal more like a merger than that of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.

Mr. OLIVER: But this line is not transporting Western wheat.

Mr. LANCASTER: The Bill is promoted by a different member.

PACIFIC AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the motion for second reading of Bill No. 113, respecting the Pacific and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Clements.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not know whether the promoter of this Bill is in the House, but I would like to obtain some information in regard to it.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I am correct in saying it is the usual application to Parliament for an extension of time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have no objection to urge against the Bill, but I may say that some years ago there was in London a syndicate exploiting a charter which ran under this or some similar name. I remember having read quite an extensive correspondence which was exchanged between the editor of Truth and Lord Strathcona. The company placed some stock on the London market, and succeeded in obtaining quite a sum of money on the strength of the claim that the Government of Canada had guaranteed the bonds. I would ask whether this is the same company as the one to which I refer.

Mr. STEVENS: The company my hon. friend refers to was the Hudson Bay, Peace River and Pacific Railway, but the one to which this Bill pertains is an entirely different company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Government received a copy of the following report adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal:—

The humble petition of the Council of the Chamber of Commerce of the district of Montreal respectfully represents:

1. That for some years back immigration to Canada has considerably increased.

2. That Canada has every interest in receiving only subjects worthy of participating with her own inhabitants in all the rights and privileges accorded by the constitution;

3. That the business men of Canada are especially interested in seeing that the immigrants afford all necessary guarantees in relation to business;

4. That under the present system of immigration and naturalization strangers come into the country under any name whatever and take another or other names when they commence business;

5. That the business men have no means of protecting themselves against these abuses of changing of names, which frequently engender considerable frauds to the detriment of trade;

6. That often civil rights are accorded to a stranger without any precautions being taken to know whether or not the requirements of the law have been fulfilled;

7. That strangers have usurped the rights of British subjects without having fulfilled the condition of three years' residence in Canada;

Wherefore the Council of the Chamber of Commerce of the district of Montreal humbly requests the Right Hon. R. L. Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, and his honourable colleagues, to amend the immigration and Naturalization Acts so as to require:

(a) That each immigrant must produce, on coming into the country, a card of identification and his passport, signed by the authorities of the place whence he comes, and bearing his name, given names, age, profession, nationality, the name of the port of embarkation and the name of the company that brought him, as well as a description of the bearer of the card.

(b) That the said card and said passport be entered verbatim in the registers of the immigration officers, on his coming into Canada, and that then and there an identification card be given to the stranger by the Canadian authorities; the latter card being an exact copy of the one entered in the register of the immigration office.

(c) That the stranger who desires to do business in Canada shall again present this card when registering his business place, thus giving his real name, with his firm name: that the same card be required in the case of real estate transactions;

(d) That to obtain his naturalization papers the stranger shall present his identification card to establish that he has been three years in the country;

(e) That he apply in person for naturalization and that he produce a certificate of two British subjects attesting to the good character of the applicant;

(f) That a severe penalty be imposed for all violations of the law in this regard.

And that justice may be done.

The Chamber of Commerce of the district of Montreal.

The whole respectfully submitted.

N. PERODEAU,
Chairman of the Council.

Referring to the answer of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fesheries on page 2802 of unrevised 'Hansard,' what report did the arbitrators make as to the annual value of the fishing rights of Charles H. Gauthier on Fighting Island, in the Detroit river?

Mr. HAZEN: Messrs. Albert T. Healey and Alfred Miers signed an instrument, professing to award C. W. Gauthier $2,401.90 for certain fishing gear and buildings, and $9,990 per annum, for the relinquishment of certain alleged rights and privileges under a license of occupation from the province of Ontario, during the unexpired period of said license, which was granted on February 15, 1909, and was

How many men in the employment of the Department of Public Works have been dismissed in the county of Rimouski since September 21, 1911, and what are their names?

In the answer given by the Minister of Public Works to the above question, I am made responsible for the dismissal of Achille Durette, who was dismissed by the Liberals. That man was dispensed with previous to September 21, 1911. I am quite ready to take the responsibility for any dismissals made at my suggestion, but I object to being made responsible for any others.

In connection with another enquiry for returns, dated January 14, 1913, asking that there be laid on the Table of the House a list of the messengers of the House of Commons, with the date of appointment in each case.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member risen to a question of privilege? A debate on any subject at this stage would not be permitted, and I wish the hon. member would be good enough to state whether he has risen to a question of privilege.

Mr. BOULAY: I think I am in order in saying what I am saying.

Mr. SPEAKER: I want to know whether the hon. member is rising to a question of privilege or whether he is asking a question.

Mr. BOULAY: It is a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member be good enough to state the question of privilege to which he has risen?

Mr. BOULAY: (Translation.) It has reference to a return giving the names of the messengers of the House of Commons. I find that the list with which I have been supplied is inaccurate; for instance, the names of some of the messengers are missing. I see no reason for leaving out their names. Now, Mr. Patry, who has been a permanent messenger for a great many years is not mentioned in that list. Elsewhere the name of Coffin is included, and he is represented as having been appointed on the 15th of November 1911, while as a matter of fact he has been here since January 23, 1912 only.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member is criticising a return which was brought down. It is not permissable to do so at this stage or by that means. He may put a notice of motion on the Order Paper to bring it up, but it is not proper to bring up in this way.

LENGTHY ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Last week the Minister of Railways laid on the table an answer to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) about collecting agents on the Intercolonial railway. I do not see that report printed in 'Hansard.' I would like to have a decision on the point whether this report should be printed in 'Hansard.'

Mr. COCHRANE: I answered the question as fully as it was possible to do.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The minister is not in fault.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the usual custom is not to print in full answers which contain lengthy statements or elaborate tables of figures. In such cases a copy is sent to the hon. member who asks the question, and unless the Printing Committee in their judgment think it desirable that such answers should be printed as returns they are not printed.

Mr. GAUVREAU: How are the public to know about that public document? I want it to be printed in 'Hansard,' if possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless I am mistaken it is not customary to print such answers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am afraid there is a misunderstanding somewhere. I think it has been the rule that the answers to all questions are printed in 'Hansard.' Such an answer is in response to a question put by a member.

Mr. GAUVREAU: This is a very interesting document, and we want it.

Mr. BORDEN: I have always understood that the answers, whether long or short, were printed in 'Hansard.'

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed it has not been the custom where answers are long and contain a great many figures to print them in 'Hansard.'

Mr. BORDEN: I was not aware of that.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the rule?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The rule is that they should be printed. We shall probably have a large surplus this year, and surely we can afford to print them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, it must be understood that I am only the servant of the House, and I am quite willing that anything should be done that the House decides or determines; but I am endeavouring to carry out the rules and customs which I found in practice at the time I took the Chair, and I know that in many of these cases they have not been printed, because I have had occasion to look over them—that is, where they were very lengthy.

Mr. BORDEN: There is, of course, not the slightest reflection on your honour. I merely said it had been my understanding that the answers to questions were always printed, because they formed part of 'Hansard,' and I was not aware that any different practice had ever prevailed. If there has been a different practice perhaps it would be as well for the officers of the House to reconsider that practice. An answer to a question should in the ordinary course form part of 'Hansard.' Up to the time that we adopted the written answers to questions the answers were printed as part of 'Hansard.' A question is asked and an answer is given in the House as part of the proceedings of the House. I cannot see that the new practice of written answers would alter that in any respect. I was a member of the committee on the amendment of the rules which brought that change about, and I do not think it was in the minds of any of that committee or of the House that any such change should be made.

Mr. EMMERSON: I put the question. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals answered it in writing. A portion of it was printed in 'Hansard,' but the remainder was not. He has sent me a copy of his answer. That does not satisfy, I think, the rules of the House. Of course, the minister is not to blame.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I wanted this document; I have been obliged to go to the clerk and translate it myself. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that it is the rule, but a rule which has not been observed by any means in the past, but since it is apparently the express desire of the House, and I frankly concur in it, believing it to be right myself, I shall see that they are printed in future.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, resumed from February 7.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I need make no apology for the stand I intend to take on this measure, which I consider the most important that has come before the Canadian Parliament since Confederation. As my hon. friend from Sunbury and Queens (Mr. McLean) prefaced his remarks on Friday evening by stating that he was approaching this question as an ardent imperialist, I will preface mine with the statement that it is as an ardent Canadian that I speak, and it is because I am an ardent Canadian that I am imbued with that sane imperialism so well described by Lord Rosebery. A man who serves Canada serves in my judgment the British Empire. If I were an enemy of the British Empire I would raise both hands in favour of the proposition which is now before the House. Sir, it may be that the Canadian people will once pay tribute to the Mother Country, it may be that they will pay it twice, but do you not think that if the tie is strained too much, the breaking of the tie may ensue?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: No danger; nonsense.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With the resolution, if carried, dawns at once the first glimmerings of a new system in our relations with the Mother Country. The resolution passed unanimously by this House in March, 1909, should have been the bond to hold all Canadians together in matters of naval defence. The Government, however, has receded from that position. The moorings of the much-vaunted Canadian navy have been cut, and we are now told that as a substitute, we must pawn three dreadnoughts so as to secure our loyalty to the Mother Country. As a Canadian, as a free British subject, I oppose that policy, and I oppose it unalterably.

I approach this question with some diffidence, with some reluctance. I feel that, belonging to the minority in this House and in this country, I am handicapped in treating such a question. However, truth must prevail, and let me say at once, speaking as a member belonging to the minority, that the French-Canadians fully realize the rights, the privileges and the franchises which they enjoy so freely under the British flag, and as a consequence they honour the flag that honours its obligations. Sir, it is no secret—it is obvious to everyone, and I am pleased to state it before the House and before the country—that no element of this heterogeneous nation is more interested in maintaining unimpaired the British tie than the French-Canadian minority. We know the history of this country, and we realize that no minority under any regime in any other part of the world enjoys so many rights or so much freedom, as the French-Canadians enjoy in this Dominion of ours. We owe this to the bounty of the Motherland, to the generosity, the liberality of the British Crown. We know, Sir, what happened in Louisiana after its annexation to the United States; we know also that at the time the Quebec Act was passed by the Imperial Parliament, the American colonists stated as one of their grievances against the Mother Country the very fact that the Imperial Parliament had passed the Quebec Act, which conferred rights, privileges and liberties upon the new subjects of the King. Therefore, we are British subjects, we are proud to be British subjects, but at the same time we are sensitive to any change that may be brought about. There are no annexationists in the province of Quebec and there are no separatists either.

Let me recall an incident which happened a few years ago. One of our late governors, speaking to one of the most distinguished prelates of French Canada, was extolling the advantages of Imperialism and was urging him to lend his influence in favour of that cause. The prelate answered: 'My lord, we are so happy as we are that the suggestion that any change which may be brought about makes us nervous.' That is the actual state of mind of every French Canadian in Quebec. The French Canadians speak their own language, they maintain their own national traditions, but at the same time they are imbued with the idea that the British form of government is the best, and that British institutions as they are applied to themselves should not be altered. They know the strength of responsible government, the great conquest of the nineteenth century; they respect British traditions, and it is because this responsible government is a binding force as between the component parts of the Empire that they object so strenuously to the change that underlies the present proposal of the Government. The question, as I said a moment ago, is a most important one, fraught with difficulties and dangers. There are more salient facts and dates, in the history of Canada, but no question is more important than the one now submitted to the House, and our hon. friends on the other side must not be surprised if we on this side, before coming to an issue, discuss it on all its phases.

We are, so to speak, at the turning point of our history. We have to take a step forward or a step backward. Need I say that I was shocked to hear the right hon. the Prime Minister, when introducing the resolution in this House state that in his judgment, not in twenty-five years—nay, not in fifty years even—would Canada be in a position to have a navy of her own. The words of the Prime Minister, in my estimation, will cost to Canada's prestige more than the $35,000,000 which are offered by this resolution. I was surprised and shocked also to hear my genial friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who is at the head of the naval service, declare that our men could not serve in the Canadian navy—that it would take years for Canadians to become fully equipped for that service. I confess that I was not surprised, however, to hear my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) state that it would be cheaper to hire men, to hire Hessians as of old, because, forsooth, Canada could not afford to pay so much for the services of her blue jackets. He belittled the issue; shall I say that he reduced it to his own size? My hon. friend reminds me of that famous conventionnel, l'Abbé Sieyes, who had passed through the horrors of the French revolution, who had sat at the convention, who had voted the death penalty to King Louis XVI, and who had been a witness to all the turmoil of those tragic days. When the Empire had capped the climax of the French revolution, he was asked: 'Monsieur l'Abbé, what have you done during all this time?' and he answered: 'J'al vécu' —'I have lived.' I am asking myself if the hon. gentleman, who probably has played more the part of a Robespierre or a Marat in guillotining the Grits since he has been in office—if he has ever lived, as l'Abbé Sieyes had lived during the revolution. Has he read the history of Canada? Has he read the history of Canada for twenty-five years? The way in which he has discussed this question, the manner in which he has approached it, and the importance which he has attached to it, make me believe that he has not lived or read the history of the country during the last twenty years. If he had read the history of his country, he would know that there are more acute problems than that of paying fifty cents a day for a blue jacket. Reverting to the past, he might have read that Canada settled on a permanent basis the question of responsible government, and that Confederation was accomplished by the man whom he claims as his ancestor, and I pity the shades of Cartier for that. He would thus have learned that during the last twenty-five years Canada had emerged from a Crown colony to a leading dominion among the allied nations which to-day form the British Empire, and that Canada made rich and prosperous thanks to a Laurier administration, it is not a paltry and picayune question of twenty-five cents a day, more or less, which counts in the solution of a problem such as the one which faces us at the present time.

Sir, the genesis of this hybrid policy is the divergent views held by the members of this Government. We all know—you, Mr. Speaker, better than anyone else, because from this very seat which I now occupy, during twenty-five years you followed political events in Canada; you watched from here the great naval debate in 1909, and you remember that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) introduced his famous resolution on the 29th of March in that year, it was at the time of the famous German scare. There was then a real emergency; the people of Canada, the people of the whole British Empire, believed there was an emergency; and yet the Prime Minister of to-day and his friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce refused to be stampeded by that scare, ignored that emergency, and fought valiantly and nobly in favour of a Canadian navy as against a policy of tribute. To our surprise, this year, the Government have submitted this policy of tributes, because, forsooth, they have discovered an emergency. Nobody in England dreams of an emergency; nobody here thinks there is an emergency; yet the Government choose to say that an emergency there is—or, rather, that there was one; because since Christmas the much-dreaded emergency, like old furniture of the Jacobite period and old Sheffield plate, is relegated to the antiquarian shop. We have not for some weeks past heard much of the emergency. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is a pathfinder, has discovered that there was the word 'need' in the resolution of March, 1909, and he now clings desperately to that word, and spells it out—n-e-e-d. Yes, Sir, there is a 'need.' How and whence did that need arise? Sir, it arose from purely political exigencies; it arose as the result of the sordid compromise between the high jingoes and the extreme Nationalists. Oh, no, not all the Nationalists, but the weak-k-n-e-e-d Nationalists, the faint-hearted, the patronage-hunters, the office-seekers; those who appeared in Drummond-Arthabaska 'tragedianti,' and who to-day stand behind the Postmaster General 'comedianti.'

I must do the Postmaster General the justice of saying that he is learned in law and in constitutional history. He will not of course admit it openly, but I know that in his heart of hearts, he will admit that the present combination in this Cabinet is the greatest living constitutional scandal that has ever dishonoured a British Parliament. Mr. Speaker, when have you ever seen men united together in one Cabinet yet holding on the most important political question of the day absolutely divergent views? You have seen George Brown united with Sir John Macdonald; they were united on Confederation, which was the big issue of the day, and when Confederation was accomplished George Brown returned to the fold of the Reform party and headed the Liberal forces. You have seen in England, Mr. Chamberlain, a radical of radicals in the early eighties joining the Tory forces against the Home Rule Bill. In both cases it was an honourable alliance. Chamberlain fought for what he thought were the best interests of the United Kingdom when he joined the ranks of the Unionist party; he allied himself with Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, and others on that great issue. They had held divergent views on other questions, but these other vanished before that one. Home Rule in the case of Mr. Chamberlain, Confederation in the case of George Brown, justified their alliance with their opponents. But, Sir, in the present instance, I repeat, it is a scandal against British parliamentary institutions to see ministers of the Crown united in a Cabinet when we know that they hold radically divergent views on the all absorbing question of the day. Hon. gentlemen will remember what Lord Melbourne once said to his colleagues: 'Gentlemen, it dosen't matter what views we hold, but, mind, we must hold the same views before the public.' Sir, you have in this Government the Royalists and the Republicans, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister reminds me of Mirabeau coquetting with the Royalists and flirting with the Republicans. You have a combination of Guelphs and Ghibellines, of Lancasters and Yorks, a most unholy alliance indeed. It reminds me of the composite nature of Lord Chatham's administration as described by Burke in one of his great speeches; and let me read it to you, Mr. Speaker; as it will perhaps refresh your classic memory. Burke, speaking of Chatham's administration, said:

> He made an administration, so checkered and speckled; he put together a piece of joinery, so crossly indented and whimsically dovetailed; a cabinet so variously inlaid; such a piece of diversified mosaic; such a tesselated pavement without cement; here a bit of black stone, and there a bit of white; patriots and courtiers, King's friends and republicans, Whigs and Tories; treacherous friends and enemies; that it was indeed a very curious show; but utterly unsafe to touch and insure to stand.

That the members of this Cabinet hold divergent views on the naval question is self-evident. Shall I refer to what I heard, to what I read, to what the people of the province of Quebec heard and read, during the memorable campaign of 1911? Sir, if I did not blush for my province, I would read long extracts from speeches delivered during that memorable campaign. Suffice it to say, that the hon. gentlemen who represent the Nationalist faction, the weak-kneed Nationalist faction, in the Cabinet, were opposed to any navy, to any tribute, in fact to any policy; but, above all, they said: 'We must have a plebiscite or a referendum.' They declared that on every hustings in the province of Quebec. If I did not blush for my province, I would repeat what the Postmaster General said, what the Secretary of State said, and what the Minister of Inland Revenue said.

Some hon. MEMBERS : Repeat it.

Mr. LEMIEUX : I would repeat what every one of the gentlemen who sit behind the Government benches said before the 21st of September, 1911; but again I feel that it is a blow to the fair name of the province of Quebec. Let me, however, remind you of one sentence from the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce before the Christmas recess. He said: Granted that there are two factions, granted that the Nationalistic faction was opposed to our emergency contribution; but, he triumphantly asked the House, who won at last? Who won? Do you believe that it is the high jingoes who alone won? I say that both factions won; Canada lost.

Under what circumstances did my hon. friend the Prime Minister leave for England during the holidays? You remember his promise made during the dying days of last session—nay, during the dying hours of last session first, that the Naval Act would be repealed; second, that he would go to England and there seek a voice for Canada in the affairs of the Empire. Here again the Prime Minister and his Nationalistic allies were concocting a plan in order to please, if possible, both factions. One of the foremost Nationalists, I should say the foremost Nationalists in Canada, of whom I speak very freely because he has no lost love for me,—I refer to Mr. Bourassa, who sat in this House for several years,—in 1910 put this resolution to a meeting of the electors of St. Eustache. A few weeks ago he stated under his signature that this resolution had been penned, not only by himself, but by the late Minister of Public Works, my friend Mr. Monk, whom I am sorry not to see in the House, by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), and several others of the Nationalist allies. Mr. Bourassa moved at that meeting:

> But confident in the greatness and efficiency of the principles of centralization and of autonomy as solemnly proclaimed and recognized since more than half a century by the authorities of Great Britain and those of Canada, we are opposed to any new policy which would entangle us in distant wars, foreign to Canada, so long, especially, as the autonomous colonies of the Empire do not share with the Mother Country upon a footing of equality, the Sovereign authority in matters relating to the Imperial army and navy, treaties of peace and of alliance, foreign relations, the government of India and the possessions of the Crown.

Mr. Bourassa carved out quite a task there for the Prime Minister of Canada; but the Prime Minister of Canada was equal to the task. He accordingly said that he would proceed to England and seek to obtain that voice in the affairs of the British Empire. This is not all. During the last contest, the member who preceded the Minister of Railways and Canals in his constituency, and who is now in the red chamber, invited this same Mr. Bourassa to speak in Northern Ontario, where there is quite a sprinkling of French-Canadian votes. There I saw not later than last fall some of the old badges with the slogan, 'Hurrah for Bourassa and for Borden.' At Sudbury, Mr. Bourassa spoke on the 18th of September, 1911, as follows:

> I say that no government, whether Tory or Liberal, whether headed by an Englishman or by a Frenchman, has the right to come to us and plunge us into a war beyond Canada's border altogether, until Canadian people in Canada have the same voice in the declaration of such wars as have the people of Great Britain.

Mark the language of Mr. Bourassa, practically the same language as that of the right hon. the Prime Minister before leaving for London, England. Mr. Bourassa however is not always a safe customer. He carved this task for the Prime Minister: but as soon as the Prime Minister had left, he took his pen and wrote a very able article in the Canadian Courier destroying the very argument he had adduced in favour of having a voice in the affairs of the Empire. The Prime Minister was gone, and probably he did not read the article, but let me tell him that Mr. Bourassa, who moved that resolution at St. Eustache, who used that language at Sudbury, in an article published in the Canadian Courier, said that this policy was utterly fallacious and impracticable as far as Canada was concerned.

You have here in a nutshell, Sir, the genesis of this emergency contribution. How do I reach this conclusion? It is only too obvious. This policy, as propounded to-day, that we shall have a voice in the affairs of the Empire, pleases the jingoes. My friend, Mr. Denison, of Toronto, has been preaching assiduously for many years to obtain for Canada that voice in the affairs of the Empire. First, it pleases the jingoes and the scaremongers, in so far as it differs from our own policy of a Canadian navy. The appointment of a minister to the Committee of Imperial Defence is supposed to be the first step towards Imperial federation. I can see my hon. friend the member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) discussing with the ministers of Great Britain the affairs of the Empire. Surely it must rejoice the heart of the member for Argenteuil to think that he will have his say on the question of Thibet, on the treaties with Abyssinia, on the carving of Persia, and on the war clouds in the Balkans. It placates the Nationalists. How? 'Because it is only a gift of money,' says the Postmaster General, and once for all. You shall never hear of any more contributions.' That is what he says in the province of Quebec. 'No men, mothers and sisters will ever be disembowelled! There will be no navy; and there will be no war; we will get hirelings at twenty-five cents a day to do the job for your husbands and your brothers.'

Mr. Speaker, do you think I exaggerate? Sir, the real culprit, the man who has the sanguinary instincts, according to the Postmaster General, when he addresses the people of Quebec, is my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Sir, I have here the book of books, L'Evenement, owned and controlled by my hon. friend the Postmaster General. And here in the issue of the 19th of December, 1912, we have the publication in extenso of the fiery jingo speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in this House; it is prefaced by a few lines in which I can detect the fine Italian hand of my hon. friend (Mr. Pelietier). What does he say? Oh, he lays on with a vigorous hand upon those infernal fellows, Laurier, Beland, Bureau, and Lemieux—I was not here at the time as a matter of fact—who we are told, were frothing and foaming under his lash. And let me read you the heading of the speech, translating it exactly: 'Les liberaux veulent l'impôt de guerre et le tribut du sang'—'The Liberals are exacting a war tax and a tribute of blood.' You have here an illustration of what we may expect at the next general election in the province of Quebec, when, frothing and fuming under the lash of the Postmaster General, we shall be scourged. He will declare to the habitants of the province of Quebec: 'Oh, my compatriots, this emergency contribution means nothing. It is only a few dollars; you will never hear any more of it; Ontario will pay for it; the West will pay for it; you will never pay for it; and your sons will not be taken from you, as that infamous Laurier wants to do. No tribute of blood, no war tax, is our policy; no, the lovers will never be snatched away from their belles in dear old Quebec.' Sir, all this is very ingenious, because, as I have stated, it pleases the jingoes and it placates the Nationalists. But, as a matter of fact, no one is deceived; it bears its own condemnation on its face. It is not a Canadian policy; it is not by any means a British policy; it is, at most, a vociferous policy of cheering the pulpit and evading the collection. It is adding $3,000,000 to the load now borne by the British taxpayer for naval defence. We are sending them three empty ships, three phantom ships; we send a cheque, and tell Britain: 'leave us alone.'

We were asked the other evening by my good friend from Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) to accept the right hon. Premier's word as regards the emergency. In England, he said questions of this kind and importance are above party politics. Naval policy, land defence, foreign policy, in England are fortunately above party politics. There are many ethics we should borrow from the dear old Motherland, the classic land of sound government.

But when my hon. friend begs us to accept the word of the Prime Minister on this policy, has he forgotten the language which that right hon. gentleman used in this House in 1909? When he says we must accept the Prime Minister's word—and as a gentleman speaking of another gentleman, I would, of course, accept his word; at present I speak only of the leader of 'the unholy alliance'—but how can we accept his word? Does the hon. member for Queens and Sunbury imply that we must accept the word of the gentleman who sat on this side of the House, or the word of the right hon. gentleman who now sits on a treasury bench? In 1909, he said:

> But, Sir, from a constitutional and political standpoint, I am opposed to it——

To contributions.

> —for many reasons.

He should never have given the reasons. There are judges in India who never give any reasons in order to avoid the dire consequences of an appeal court:

> In the first place, I do not believe that it would endure. In the second place, it would be a source of friction. It would become a bone of partisan contention. It would be subject to criticism as to the character and the amount of the contribution in both Parliaments. It would not be permanent or continuous. It would conduce, if any thing could conduce, to severing the present connection between Canada and the Empire.

Someone interrupted a moment ago when I prefaced my remarks by stating that straining the silken tie binding the Mother Country to the colonies means perhaps the breaking of that tie. But I have just read the language of the Prime Minister of Canada when he sat on this side of the House. 'It would conduce, if anything could conduce, to severing the present connection between Canada and the Empire.' And yet he is doing that very thing to-day. We are asked to believe the Prime Minister of Canada. I believe the Hon. Mr. Borden when leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition. I find in his language the very argument, the very logical argument, why I should oppose unalterably the policy which he now presents to the people of Canada. My hon. friend from Queens and Sunbury says that the right hon. gentleman is in good faith, and that we should believe he is in good faith.

As to an emergency, I need not quote what has been so often quoted in this House—the language of Mr. Asquith, the language of Mr. Churchill, of Lord Crewe, of Lord Morley—of any of the leading statesmen of Great Britain who have said, not only on one but on many occasions, that the relations between England and Germany were under very happy auspices, that nothing justified the various scares worked up by the jingoes. On the one hand, we have the language of these statesmen, and, on the other hand, we find the right hon. gentleman allied with those who clamoured during the last election campaign that we owed nothing to England; that we should do nothing for the Mother Country; and yet we are asked to trust his good faith.

But, Mr. Speaker, we must not overstrain our good faith. Who is the best authority with regard to an emergency? Mr Asquith, who says:

> There never has been a moment and there is not now, when we have not been overwhelmingly superior in naval force against any combination which could reasonably by anticipated.

Mr. Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, who has stated:

> Germany in the course of the next eighteen months is laying down 21 destroyers; we, 43. There is no cause for panic or alarm.

Mr. Bonar Law who also said:

> But, in spite of all that has been said, does the country—do the House of Commons, do any of us—believe there is any danger, and vital danger? I confess that I have the greatest difficulty in believing it myself.

The President-elect of France, Mr. Poincaré, stated a few days ago that the entente between France and England is as firm as it ever has been in the past—and I hope it will ever be so in the future. The German ambassador in London has expressed his willingness to concede that Great Britain by reason of her naval strength, should occupy the foremost position among the sea powers of the world. The London Times declare that the establishment of local navies will meet the necessities of present conditions in Great Britain.

From these statements three facts stand out in prominence. First, nothwithstanding Sir Rodmond Roblin, Great Britain is not on her knees begging; second, she views with pleasure and pride the establishment of local navies to guard and patrol the rest of the British Empire; and, third, knowing the Britons as we do, there is no craven fear existing in their minds, and no desire for a tip of $35,000,000 from any of the colonies.

The statement has been repeated by some of the Tory speakers in Canada—in the heat of political contests, I grant you, but it has nevertheless been repeated—that England is in need of money to maintain her naval superiority. The gross national debt of Great Britain under Liberal and free-trade administration, has been steadily reduced since 1906, a reduction of about $55,000,000 a year having been made in the six years following that date. During the same period, the expenses of the British navy have been paid for out of current revenue, its growth outstripping that of the rest of Europe, which was borrowing for increased armaments. I have here the last budget speech delivered by Lloyd George, in the course of which he establishes clearly that the national debt of Great Britain has been reduced under his regime more than it had ever been reduced by preceding chancellors of the exchequer; more than it was ever reduced under Mr. Goschen; more than it was ever reduced even under Mr. Gladstone, Sir Stafford Northcote or Sir Michael Hicks Beach. Notwithstanding all the reductions made, they have been able to take out of their current revenue sufficient sums to enable them to look after the navy in such a manner as to place it at the head of the navies of the world; they have besides accomplished several social reforms; they have established old age pensions and insurance against unemployment and illness. All this has cost money, but England nevertheless remains the richest of the rich countries of the world.

I was surprised to read the other day a speech reported to have been delivered in England by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) before the Imperial Maritime League. He said:

> A mere gift of cash will have no useful effect at all. . . . The giving of money for the navy by the Dominion of Canada will merely have the effect of saving the pocket of the Liberal Government for other schemes of so-called social reform, which, being interpreted, means further sops to the United Kingdom electorate, and will be of no advantage whatsoever to the navy. The Liberal Government here would only spend on naval defence by so much the less as would coincide with the extent of the Canadian gift.

I do not refer to the contradiction between the present policy of the Government and the expression of opinion on the part of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as to a gift of money on the part of Canada, but I do deprecate the indication of a sneer in his reference to the so-called social reform accomplished by the Liberal Government in England. It seems to be a fashion amongst Tories and jingoes to sneer at Lloyd George, who is, perhaps, the most remarkable British statesman of our generation, and one of the noblest and loftiest characters that have ever adorned the British Parliament. Let me quote what Lloyd George himself has said:

> The stain on the national flag is just as deep if that flag floats over slumbering children, and ill paid, ill fed, ill housed men and women, as if it were to droop on the field of war.

And, speaking the other day of the beneficial effects of insurance against unemployment and illness, he said:

Henceforth there are not five millions, but fourteen millions of working men not receiving abundance, not receiving sumptuous allowance, but receiving something to enable them at any rate to swim through that dark flood which is submerging them and their household. . . . The Empire is going round the slums at the present moment—the greatest Empire in the world. It is paying a visit to the humblest homes of the land with benefits in its hands.

My hon. friend goes to England; he is the guest of the Imperial Government, and he sneers at the Chancellor of the Exchequer who has reduced the national debt of Great Britain more than Mr. Goschen, more than Mr. Gladstone, more than Sir Stafford Northcote, more than all the other great chancellors of England, and who, with all that, has paid out of the current revenue the expenditure for the navy, the greatest in the world. He sneers at the statesman who is spending millions to save the poor, the ill-fed, the ill-paid, and the ill-housed. My hon. friend sneers at that policy, an economic revolution which England alone can accomplish without shedding any blood in the streets of London. Let me say that I strongly deprecate the language used by the hon. gentleman in England. He had no right to speak of one of His Majesty's ministers in England as he did. I deprecate also the language of Mr. Long and the language of Mr. Smith, who came to Canada as pilgrims of jingoism to teach us how to rule Canada.

We are told that this policy will not be without some benefits to Canada. First of all, we are told that it will give us a Canadian preference on the British market. We are promised also that there is another quid pro quo—namely, a voice in shaping the destinies of the Empire. The Prime Minister of Canada hastened the other day to write to the press to deny what had been asserted on the other side, namely, that there was as regards preference, an alliance between the Canadian Tories and the English Tories. I accept the denial, but I say that during my practice in the criminal courts the best evidence for me was circumstantial evidence and never direct evidence. I accept, however, his denial.

But, Sir, from reports which are appearing from day to day, and which are opening the eyes and the minds of the Canadian people, it is easy to see that there it is a deep laid plot between politicians on the other side of the water and politicians on this side of the water. Mr. Bonar Law said a few weeks ago:

The Canadian naval contribution which has been so sympathetically received by all the other colonies is the cause of the cabinet crisis in South Africa to-day.

Of course, jingoes must stir up trouble in all the self-governing colonies, and South Africa is not excepted.

The Canadian contribution is magnificent but it cannot be permanent on this basis. If the whole Empire is ever to become in reality as well as in name a united Empire and a united nation it can do so in one way only, by the establishment of a real federal system by the United Kingdom with the colonies in proportion to their population contributing to the defence of the Empire, and sharing in the glory of governing the Empire. The way was not easy but it was not impossible; it will not become easier, as time goes on, it will become increasingly difficult and I feel sure that if some arrangement of that kind is not made within the next ten or fifteen years it will not be made at all.

Then he propounds his policy of a food tax in order to win the heart of Canada. Mr. Bonar Law delivered that speech at a meeting presided over by a great Canadian statesman, Sir Max Aitkin, but there was such a hue and cry in Great Britain that Mr. Bonar Law was obliged to recede. In Great Britain, after all, they understand their own business. They love the colonies; they treat them well; but if the colonies will intrude into John Bull's business, John Bull will not like it, and even the thunderer, The Times, condemned Mr. Bonar Law for suggesting to the colonies even the idea of intruding into British politics. Others also condemned Mr. Bonar Law; in fact, he has been obliged to take back what he said. First of all, the patriots from the prairies, our western grain growers, protested. They wired to Mr. Asquith: 'No, the united Empire can be lasting and lasting for ever, but not at the cost of a food tax, although we may be the first to benefit by that tax. The unity of the Empire does not rest on an additional burden to be borne by the poor consumer in Great Britain.' That food tax policy propounded by Mr. Bonar Law is opposed also by the manufacturers in Canada. Why? Because Mr. Chamberlain, who is the father of the whole scheme, did not forget when he advocated that policy to say that if the Government of Great Britain would impose a tax on food, it was on the condition that our Canadian manufacturers would not compete with English manufacturers in certain lines of goods. Therefore, against Mr. Bonar Law, you have the poor consumer in Great Britain, you have the patriot in the west who has the courage to say: I do not want a food tax against my fellow-subject in Great Britain, and you have that super-loyal, jingo, patriotic manufacturer of Canada who does not care for British competition and who not later than a few months ago refused even to consider the proposal of increasing the British preference. Sir, the loyalty of the jingo springs from the stomach, and not from the heart. Here you have, Sir, the stumbling-block to Mr. Chamberlain's system. As I said, Mr. Bonar Law has been forced to recede from his position, and he now speaks of a preference of manufactured goods. He has received some very severe blows from his own side. He has antagonized men like Lord Avebury, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and Lord Hugh Cecil, all men who represent something in British politics and British Toryism. Listen to what Lord Avebury said:

As to the preference, whether it was desirable or not, as proposed, it was impossible. They admitted duties imposed by foreign countries interfered with trade, though more with their own trade than with ours. But the barriers would not be removed by erecting fresh obstacles. No commerce improved by imposing duties which we ourselves should have to pay.

He appealed to his tariff reform friends to give a little more information as to what was in their minds, and as to how they thought they could apply the preference.

Lord Balfour, who challenged in principle the idea that a system of preference would make for a greater unity, said that communities did not trade with one another; it was individuals living within communities who traded. It was proposed to give the preference upon wheat to the Canadian producer. No suggestion had been made that timber, equally produced in Canada, though by another set of individuals, would be the subject of preference, nor wool from Australia. Timber and wool were raw material; wheat was food; did they suppose that no distinction would comfort the man who produced wood in Canada or wool in Australia, who found his neighbour, who happened to deal in wheat, put in a more favourable position than himself? How would it be a bind-force on our side if the humbler classes had to pay more for bread?

Imperialism based on trade appeals appealed only to traders. Just consider the amount of British capital which has been supplied for the development of Canadian interests. It had been for the advantage of Canada and our own advantage. Business and politics were in antithesis.

Let my hon. friends, the few there are on the other side, listen to this, for it is the language of a Tory:

Our Canadian fellow subjects would not become Americans or Germans because they traded with the United States or because they trade with Germany. The Empire had no worse enemy than the man who said: 'We must tax ourselves for the benefit of the Canadian people.'

Now, Sir, Lord Hugh Cecil, the hope of the Unionist party in England——

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say to the hon. member that I cannot see any close connection between this and the question before the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was alluding to trade and defence; because the Prime Minister stated that we would have a voice in the affairs of the Empire, and I accepted his denial that there was any bargain between the Tories in England and the Tories in Canada, and was proceeding to show that there was strong circumstantial evidence against the present Government in the fact that, in connection with this naval contribution of Canada, the militant Conservatives in England are advocating a food tax. I was about to quote what some sane Imperialists in England are stating as against such a foolish proposition.

Mr. MURPHY: The Prime Minister said trade and defence run together.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Lord Hugh Cecil says:

Preference is a mechanism for giving a non-natural profit to favoured sections and classes of the people. The duties imposed by this country will cost exporters the advantage of the treatment of a most favoured nation in foreign countries. The shrinkage of imports from the foreigner will cause a shrinkage of exports to the foreigner, and so on. Here surely is a fertile seed-bed for discontent, grumbling and recrimination.

Sir, the position of the Unionist party in England on this question of trade and defence has been aptly and graphically described by a writer in the Round Table for December, 1912, who says:

The Unionists are not unlike a man coming to a stream, who, with a run and a leap, lands on a stone which seemed to him, as he took-off so light-heartedly, to lie right under the opposite bank—as if a mere step would be enough to land him dryshod. But as he balances himself upon the small and slippery boulder, he realizes that he he has miscalculated, and that still another leap is needed to bring him safe to shore. There is no space for a run. He looks back across the gurgling waters and understands that to return is at least as hard as to advance. He looks forwards, and then backwards with doubt and misgiving. The Liberal spectator upon shore hopes sincerely that panic will breed confusion in his adversary's mind and lure him into choosing the greater evil, whichever that may be; but in any case, the Liberal holds the cheerful view that a ducking is more than probable in any event.

Sir, we shall not have a preference, because the present Government in England is opposed to it, the British taxpayers are opposed to it, and also the sanest among the imperialists in England.

But we are told by the Prime Minister that the other quid pro quo is to be a voice in the affairs of the Empire, in questions of peace and war. This is the bribe for the permanent policy promised by my right hon. friend to his followers in Ontario and the other English-speaking provinces; this is the condition put by the Prime Minister on a permanent policy; this is the co-partnership dreamed of by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). Let us examine this point.

This is not the first time the question of the colonies having a voice in the affairs of the Empire has been discussed. Since 1884 when the famous Imperial federation league was started, we have found men of ability, men of talent and merit, who have endeavoured to write constitution after constitution for the British Empire; but the plan has always failed. The latest failure is that of which we were practically eye-witnesses at the last Imperial conference in 1911. Sir Joseph Ward appeared before the Prime Minister of England and of the overseas dominions, and propounded a bold scheme described as a parliament of defence, military and naval. That parliament of defence was to be composed of three hundred members, and there was to be an Imperial Council composed of twelve members. The parliament of defence, according to Sir Joseph Ward's idea, would deal with defence, would negotiate peace treaties at the conclusion of war and would provide revenues for defence. That plan was discussed, and it was opposed by all the representatives of the overseas dominions. It was opposed also by the Prime Minister of England, the Right Hon. Mr. Asquith, in a very remarkable speech. But let us first consider the proposition of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister now before us. He said on December 5, when he introduced his naval contribution:

No thoughtful man can fail to realize that very complex and difficult questions confront those who believe that we must find a basis of permanent co-operation in naval defence, and that any such basis must afford to the overseas dominions an adequate voice in the moulding and control of foreign policy. . . . I have alluded to the difficulty of finding an acceptable basis upon which the great dominions co-operating with the Mother Country in defence can receive and assert an adequate voice in the control and moulding of foreign policy. . . . I am assured by His Majesty's Government that, pending a final solution of the question of voice and influence they would welcome the presence in London of a Canadian minister during the whole or portion of each year.

I need not refer to the famous Imperial Defence Committee, which has been in existence for several years, which is only a consultative body, and has no executive voice in moulding or shaping the affairs of the Empire. It meets only occasionally. It is not an executive body; as I said, it is simply advisory; it does not determine a policy. But when my right hon. friend says he is seeking to obtain an adequate voice in the moulding and control of foreign policy, I say that he goes against the judgment of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Let me read the admirable answer made by Mr. Asquith to Sir Joseph Ward in 1911. Mr. Asquith said:

That authority cannot be shared, and the co-existence side by side with the Government of the United Kingdom of this proposed body——

The Parliament of defence—

—it does not matter by what name you call it for the moment—clothed with the functions and the jurisdiction which Sir Joseph Ward proposes to invest it with, would, in our judgment, be absolutely fatal to our present system of responsible government.

Somebody, on the other side, hinted the other day, that Mr. Asquith had used some expressions in the House of Commons of Great Britain not long ago showing that he had changed his mind since the right hon. gentleman had paid his visit to England. Is it possible that a man of Mr. Asquith's position, a man whose words are always weighed, would have modified his views after having said that this proposal would 'in our judgment be absolutely fatal to our present system of responsible Government'? That is, from the Imperial point of view.

Now, from the point of view of the dominions, I cannot do better than read what was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier—

—The separatist, according to our friends opposite, but, according to Mr. Asquith the Nestor of the Imperial conference:

So far as the dominions are concerned, this new machinery could impose upon the dominions, by the voice of a body in which they would be in a standing minority—that is part of the case only—in a small majority indeed, a policy which they might all disapprove, a policy which would in most cases involve expenditure, and an expenditure which would have to be met by the imposition on a dissentient community of taxation by its own government. We cannot, with the traditions and the history of the British Empire behind us, either from the point of view of the United Kingdom or from the point of view of our own self-governing dominions, assent for a moment to proposals which are so fatal to the very fundamental conditions, on which our Empire has been built up and carried on.

Can it be possible that Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister of England, the undisputed master of diplomatic language, receded from the position which he took only two years ago? It is not possible, and he has not receded from that position, because the last rebuke—or should I say the last rebuff?—has come through the regular channel from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Harcourt. In his letter to the Prime Minister not very long ago, he used the following language:

Mr. Asquith and I had subsequently several conversations with him——

Premier Borden—

—at which he expressed the desire that the Canadian and other dominion ministers who might be in London as members of the Committee of Imperial Defence should receive in confidence knowledge of the policy and proceedings of the Imperial Government in foreign and other affairs. We pointed out to him that the Committee of Imperial Defence is a purely advisory body and is not, and cannot, under any circumstances become a body to decide on policy, which is and most remain the sole prerogative of the Cabinet, subject to the support of the House of Commons.

That is the British idea of Government—everybody master in his own house, John Bull included.

What then?—No preference, no voice. The result is now more apparent than ever. Failing to have a voice, there will be no permanent naval policy. That is where the Nationalists are triumphing.

But, we are to have a permanent policy of tributes. To that policy I am opposed as a Canadian, as a British subject, and need I say as a Liberal?

We are asked by the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. McLean): Why not compromise? Why should not my right hon. friend the Prime Minister meet my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition? A compromise on what, Mr. Speaker? Do we compromise on essentials? Can you compromise night and day, black and white? Can you compromise jingoism with Canadianism? This policy strikes at the very root of our constitutional Government. The better instincts of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden), in his heart of hearts, are against that policy. It is a makeshift policy; it is a step backward. Ours is a step forward. Jingoism means restriction of our freedom and distrust of the Canadian people; Liberalism means expansion of our liberties and trust in the Canadian people as British subjects. You cannot reconcile both policies. There can be no compromise. One is the old policy of concentration dear to Mr. Chamberlain, to Mr. Bonar Law, and to Mr. F. E. Smith; the other is the traditional policy of co-operation which makes for the true unity of the British Empire. The policy of concentration lost to the Mother Country the thirteen colonies; the policy of co-operation won Canada to the British Crown, won the hearts and affections of the French Canadians in days gone by and there, yonder, won the hearts and affections of the Afrikanders. It makes for British unity. The proposed policy means an organic change in our constitution. A compromise under such circumstances would be a surrender. I am opposed to any surrender. It is a blow to the very foundation of our colonial system; and if we study the history of Canada for the last sixty or seventy years, we cannot but view with alarm any curtailing of the sound principle of self-government.

The modern idea of the British Empire is that its unity is based on the freedom of each of the component parts; that freedom breeds the loyalty of the dominions. The Government policy in the present instance shows a lack of confidence in Canadian loyalty. Let me pause for a moment and give a few historic facts. At the time when this country was governed by a select few, by the bureaucrats, by the family compact, there were men who claimed for Canada the right of self-government. A good old Englishman, Sir Francis Bond Head, reared and bred in the old fashioned school, thought that Canadians should never dream of self-government. In the Emigrant, he wrote the following lines about Lord Durham's report:

> There is a considerable section of persons who are disloyal to the core——

This same language I have read somewhere in the Tory press during the last election.

Mr. BUREAU: Everywhere.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The old Latin adage is not applicable in this case—'Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis'—time changes, but humanity is always the same. Mark his language:

> There is a considerable section of persons who are disloyal to the core; reform is on their lips, but separation is in their hearts. These people, having for the last two or three years made responsible government their watchword, are now extravagantly elated because the Earl of Durham has recommended that measure. It was Mackenzie's scheme for getting rid of what Mr. Howe called the baneful domination of the Mother Country; and never was any better devised to bring about such an end speedily.

Responsible government was granted to Canadians, thanks to Her late Majesty Queen Victoria and to the statesmen of the Victorian era. With all the forebodings of Sir Francis Bond Head, the separation never came. Lord Durham's report of 1839 was the result of the rebellion of 1837; responsible government in 1846 was the result of Lord Durham's report; Canada's subsequent advancement has been the consequence and effect of responsible government.

Let us go a little further. In 1859, one of Canada's greatest men, Sir Alexander T. Galt, was Minister of Finance in the Government of the day, he chose to impose a duty of twenty per cent on foreign goods; and immediately in England loud protests arose from Downing Street, and the chambers of commerce also protested, and petitioned the British Government to disallow the unheard of legislation of that impudent colonial government somewhere in North America. The answer of Sir A. T. Galt to the Duke of Newcastle is worth remembering; it is published in the Sessional Papers of Canada, No. 38, 1860:

Self-government would be utterly annihilated if the views of the Imperial Government were to be preferred to those of the people of Canada. It is, therefore, the duty of the present Government distinctly to affirm the right of the Canadian legislature to adjust the taxation of the people in the way they deem best, even if it should unfortunately happen to meet the disapproval of the Imperial ministry. Her Majesty cannot be advised to disallow such acts unless her advisers are prepared to assume the administration of the affairs of the colony irrespective of the views of the inhabitants.

In 1860, after the Crimean war, England decided to withdraw her troops from Canada, and the Imperial authorities demanded that Canada in the future should control her land forces. To-day, in the year of Our Lord 1913, we are begging the home Government to accept a tribute and to do what we declare we are utterly unable to do, furnish the men to man the ships. This was written in 1860, by a statesman whose name does not belong only to the Mother Country, but to humanity—by Mr. Gladstone himself:

We consider that this immunity, throwing as it does the defence of the colonies almost entirely on the Mother Country, is open to two main objections. In the first place, it imposes an enormous burden and inconvenience on the people of England, not only by the addition which it makes to their taxes, but by calling off to remote stations a large proportion of their troops and ships, and thereby weakening their means of defence at home. But a still more important objection is the tendency which this system must necessarily have to prevent the development of a proper spirit of self-reliance amongst our colonies, and to enfeeble their national character. By the gift of self-government we have bestowed on our colonies a most important element of national education; but the habit of self-defence constitutes a part hardly less important of the training of a free people, and it will never be acquired by our colonists if we assume exclusively the task of defending them.

What a lesson to the Government of to-day! The granting of responsible government was, in the words of Mr. Gladstone, to be the paramount national education of the Canadian people of the time.

In 1861, another incident, a fruitful incident took place. The War Office had suggested the establishment of a militia corps, composed of 50,000 soldiers, with a reserve of 50,000 more. Sir George Etienne Cartier introduced a Bill in the Canadian Assembly, and the Government of the day was defeated. It was succeeded by the administration of Sandfield Macdonald. The Duke of Newcastle wrote to Lord Monk, the Governor of Canada, suggesting that the appropriation for a militia should be voted, not annually, but in a lump sum for a series of years. Here is the answer of Sandfield Macdonald, the first Prime Minister of Ontario after Confederation:

What the British Commons would not under any circumstances of danger entertain, is not likely to be entertained by the legislature of Canada, for whatever evils are incident to representative institutions, the people of a British province will not forget that they are trivial in comparison with those which are inseparable from arbitrary authority.

And a new Bill, framed on Canadian lines, was introduced. It was the foundation of our Canadian militia, and, it was completed under a Liberal Government by the establishment of the Kingston Military College; yes, it was completed by the late Alexander Mackenzie, Liberal Premier of Canada from 1874 to 1878.

Mr. Speaker, we have outgrown the old colonial policy. We have won responsible government. Formerly, England drafted our tariff; managed our post office; looked after our public works; involved us in her commercial treaties; defended Canada with her regulars. We have outlived that policy. To revive it would be to ignore our own national dignity. Formerly, a British officer commanded our troops; he has been replaced by a Canadian. And there has been no separation. For eighty years Canada has been working towards greater efficiency, greater self-reliance, and more complete self-government. In trade matters we have taxed even British goods, and it was a Conservative Premier who said: 'So much the worse for British connection,' when it was suggested that England would not be satisfied with our tariff. We have made immense strides in trade matters, and since the reorganization of the Imperial Conference, Canada has been every year expanding in power. In matters of defence, we have to-day the right to control our forces, our land forces as well as our naval forces. The Liberal party, Sir, stands for the policy of 1909 and 1910, because it means the creation of a new national institution responsible to the demands of the future; the taking on our own shoulders of the burden of national defence; the development of national life and of self-government within the Empire, which have brought us liberty and peace; the expenditure of money in our own way, the employment of our own sailors and our own mechanics, and the opening up of new channels for the activity, ambitions, and the enthusiasm of our young men.

We are told that we, Liberals do not understand our Imperial duty, and we are taunted with being 'little Canadians,' as the Liberals in Great Britain are taunted as being 'little Englanders.' Shall we allow our friends on the other side to exploit in this North American continent the British Empire as it is being exploited by a certain section of the jingoes in Great Britain? I was reading the other day a speech delivered by Mr. Asquith on that very subject, and I feel I must read it again for the benefit of the House. He said: That there were people who thought that the Empire only meant militarism, who in fact only tasted the wine of militarism every day, and went on:

What is the attitude of the bulk of the Liberals to the British Empire? Do they look upon it as a regrettable necessity, to be apologized for as being a heavy crime, or to be acquiesced in as an inevitable and unwelcome addition to the load which weighs down the stooping shoulders of the weary Titan? It would be strange if it were so. Empire is a word which means different things in different mouths and to different ears; but what does it mean to us Liberals? It does not mean a syndicate for the exploration and exploitation of the rest of the world; it does not mean a mere commercial partnership, founded upon a basis of profit and loss; it does not even mean a simple mutual insurance society for the protection of its members against external attack. Its significance and value to us are these—that with all its failures and shortcomings, with all its weak places and its black spots, it is the greatest and most fruitful experiment that the world has yet seen, in the corporate union of free and self-governing communities. . . .

Then he goes on:

They all say to me, how is it that you, the Liberal party of Great Britain, with whose social aspirations, with whose legislative programme we are in complete sympathy—how is it that you have allowed your opponents to monopolise and exploit for their own party purposes the name and prestige of the Empire? Gentlemen, if the Liberal party is to become, as I believe it can and might be made, not the only dominant political force in this country, but the acknowledged centre and fountain head of Liberal ideas throughout the length and breadth of His Majesty's dominions, we must be firmer in our faith, or, at any rate, more articulate in its expression.

He says further: ,

I am laying down no programme. I have neither the authority nor the inclination to do so, but I have mentioned those topics, taking them merely by way of illustration of my general theme to establish my two cardinal propositions, which are first of all, that the Liberal party must not only recognise the Empire as a fact, but must welcome it as a trust, and that if it is to be anything more than barren profession of homage, before an empty shrine, it must do the best in its power to make the Empire a strong and live Empire, worthy of Christian civilization.

Sir, that is our conception of the Imperial ideal. We acquiesce in the weighty words of Mr. Asquith, and we say that imperialism, sane imperialism as described in these words, is the policy, the faith, the tenet of the Canadian Liberal party.

There are people who speak of the Empire and who dream of it only through military glamour—under Sam the Tetrarch. They mistake militarism for imperialism. I claim that full constitutional and commercial development of Canada makes for imperial unity. Confederation was a decisive step in the right direction. The construction of the Canadian Pacific railway was another; the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was another. Other steps in that direction are the carving out of new provinces in the West, the organization of our own militia controlled by Canadians and commanded by Canadians, the giving of the British preference and freedom of interimperial trade, the promotion of which is due to the right hon. leader of the Opposition at the last Imperial conference. And I am glad that the one to profit by it is the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who opposed British preference in 1897. Cable and postal reductions were effected within the Empire, tending towards Imperial unity, and, lastly, there was inaugurated a Canadian naval service, the ships to be built in Canada, equipped by Canada, manned by Caanadians, primarily to defend Canada and her trade routes, and subject to the control of the Parliament of Canada, to aid the Mother Country in case of a real emergency.

Who is to decide as to the reality of the alleged emergency? Shall we leave it to the various British political parties? Three elections have been held in England since 1906. The Liberals said during the last campaign that there was no emergency, while the Tories of England stated that there was occasion for great alarm, and that England was on the verge of war. What has taken place yesterday and the day before yesterday in the German Reichstag, proves completely that there was no reason for such alarm. Cheap telegraphic communication has been established between England and Canada, and, in the event of a real emergency, we shall know and appreciate the situation, and the people of Canada will not hesitate to stand by the Mother Country. Let Great Britain trust her Dominions. I read the other day in a book published by Lord Brassey a description of what took place in Australia when the hour of danger came in South Africa. Listen to this.

There was no fear of separation during my residence of five years—five happy years—in Australia. Nowhere could we look for more loyal demonstrations than were made on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee of Her late Majesty. The Irishmen were conspicuous with their green scarfs in every procession. I was serving in Australia when the first contingents were despatched to South Africa. I was an eye-witness of those moving scenes.

There was the same disinterested patriotism, the same loyalty to the old flag, in free-trade Sydney as in protectionist Victoria. It was no question of tariffs. Men do not lay down their lives for their country for a two-shilling a quarter duty on corn. When the reverse came in South Africa and the Empire needed help from all her sons, with one heart and one voice they responded to the call. They were moved by no sordid considerations—Amor patriæ ratione valentior.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, when an emergency arises, no power on earth will prevent loyal Canadians, Liberals as well as Conservatives, French and English, from aiding in the defence of the flag and the maintenance of British supremacy.

I need not dwell upon the undoubted effect of the policy of the right hon. gentleman upon our ship-building industry. It is well known that fifty years ago clippers from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, could be seen on each of the seven seas of the world; but, with the decline of the construction of wooden ships, they have gradually disappeared. John Bull saw his opportunity, and started the construction of iron and steel vessels, with the result that he is now the master of the seas, the expressman and the carrier of the world. He has a mortgage on everything that floats. He collects tolls from the United States to the extent of $300,000,000 a year for freight and passenger service; from Canada he collected last year tolls to the amount of $50,000,000. If we are true sons of Great Britain we should imitate the action of John Bull, and make a similar start. In years gone by, we of the maritime provinces—I consider myself connected with the maritime provinces, for I represented the old county of Gaspé for fifteen years—in proportion to population, stood at the head of the world's ship-building industry. If we desire to establish in Canada a first-class ship-building industry, we have the means of doing so: we have the coal, the iron ore, the steel, and a monopoly of the nickel. Let the Government do what it can to encourage the establishment and development of this great national industry, and I have no doubt that, true sons of Britain as we are, we can do as much on this side of the water as much as was done in the Old Country.

I dare not quote the remarks of the President of the United States, Mr. Taft, for to-morrow I would be branded as an annexationist; but allow me for a moment to quote the language of the late President McKinley:

> Foreign ships should carry the least and not the greatest part of the American trade. The remarkable growth of our steel industry, the progress of ship-building for the domestic trade, and our steadily maintained expenditure for the navy, have created an opportunity to place the United States in the first rank of commercial maritime powers.

Let us start a Canadian navy, with the object of defending our coasts, aiding Great Britain in times of emergency, and commencing the construction of a merchant marine. Ex-President Roosevelt has used language expressive of the same convictions as those of Mr. McKinley, but I need not read his remarks to the House.

A question that has often arisen in connection with this discussion is, have we the sailors to man our navy? The Postmaster General stated the other day that it would cost too much money; that the ships could be manned cheaper in Great Britain. It is true that we could hire from other countries the men for this purpose, men from the inferior races of central Europe; but would it be a self-respecting policy? Should a matter involving twenty-five cents a day interfere with the national dignity of Canada? To be logical, the Postmaster General should bring back the regulars of old to garrison Canada, and dismiss all our Canadian volunteers, but then we would lose the services of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes).

We are told that ours is a separatist policy. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition has been branded in many a back concession as a separatist, not because he used the language of Disraeli, who said that 'the colonies were a millstone around our neck;' not because he used the language of Gladstone; not because he used the language of Lord John Russell; who all spoke of the Colonies in a similar vein, but because forsooth, he favoured the idea of a Canadian navy. If ours is a disloyal policy, I charge the right hon. the Prime Minister and his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce with being disloyal. Nay, more, I charge the Parliament of Canada, I charge you, Mr. Speaker, with being disloyal; because we, the Commons of Canada, adopted the policy of a Canadian navy unanimously in 1909. What is more, Great Britain, through her statesmen, Mr. Asquith, Lord Crewe, Lord Morley, and all the other distinguished statesmen who are to-day at the helm of British affairs, accepted that separatist policy. The memorandum which was published after the conference of 1911 is the evidence of it. It recognized the autonomy of the overseas dominions, their right to control their own fleets; it determined the areas in which Canada and Australia should fly the flag, protect the commerce, maintain the honour of the Empire. It gave Australia a portion of the Southern Pacific. It gave Canada the west half of the North Atlantic and the east half of the North Pacific; and the agreement further provided that in time of war, so soon as the dominions placed their fleets at the disposal of the Admiralty, they remained at its disposal until the war was ended, thereby securing unity in control. Australia is building her fleet. The first unit will appear in the waters of Sydney and Melbourne on the 1st of April next.

The hon. member for Queens and Sunbury said that we could not think of having a navy. Did Australia think of having a navy before the conferences of 1907, 1909 and 1911? Yet Australia, with less population and less resources has already a royal Australian navy, flying the white ensign and the star of Australia. I remember the speech delivered by Sir George Reid, the ex-Prime Minister of Australia, before the Canadian Club at Ottawa, in the presence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He boasted that Australia, the last of the overseas dominions to form a confederacy, had done more to help the British Empire in building a navy of her own than Canada, although Canada had been confederated since 1867. I know that there are people in England and in Canada who think that Australia might well have a navy but who object, forsooth, to Canada having one. Reading the United Empire Review of January, 1913, I find the following:

The Australians, of course, having also heard what the Admiralty had to say about it, have taken quite a different view.

Of course, Australia had been paying contributions for years back.

And perhaps they find encouragement in the examples of Germany and Japan, but this again is not a question which admits of any generalized answer. If Australia can reasonably hope to build up an effective naval service through the co-operation of the British Admiralty, in a comparatively short time, it does not necessarily follow that Canada will be able to do likewise. The conditions are different in the two countries. Canada may seem to start with an advantage over Australia in having larger material resources and also extensive deep-sea fisheries which are the traditional nursery of seamen, but Australia has two advantages which Canada lacks. Her population being homogeneous, her Government is handicapped by no such problems as those which arise from the dualty of race in Canada.

It is because there is a duality of race in Canada that my English-speaking friends, the lovers of self-government are denied the pride of having a navy of their own. Let me tell the right hon. gentleman that if these are his views, he has only to do what the right hon. leader of the Opposition did during the last campaign—go into the province of Quebec, and educate public opinion to its British duty. But no, this is not needed. We, the French Liberals, have succeeded in bringing public opinion in the province of Quebec to stand for a navy to defend Canada and the Empire. The right hon. gentleman should have joined hands with his great rival in 1911. This is a greater issue than everyday politics. It is a national issue; it is a truly Imperial issue; and if he would understand his duty as the leader of the Opposition did, the duality of race would not stand in the way of giving Canada, the oldest and greatest of British possessions, a navy of her own to patrol the seas and fly the flag.

An Australian officer discussing the question of the Australian navy, in the Times of August 14, 1912, said:

The Australian navy, whose first floating units are already flying the white ensign along with their own distinctive flag, is not properly a thing about which there can be any useful argument. There has been some subdued debate in English circles at home as to whether a local and separate Australian navy ought to be permitted to exist.

In the clubs, don't you know, they discuss whether these colonials should be allowed to have a navy.

But that debate is futile, and, it is hardly necessary to add, quite without official weight. Touching the main principle, it is about as useless to question here in England whether Australia should be allowed to own a navy as to whether Germany should. It is a matter over which England has humanly no control. The establishment of its own fleet by the younger British nation arises from popular demand, which is to say, popular instinct. Reasons in support of, or objections to it, are of purely secondary value. But before discussing further the state of local opinion in Australia, it will be as well to set out what the Australian navy really is and means to be.

It is and means to be what Canada's navy would be if we had a Government worthy of the name. Again, I say, Mr. Speaker, this policy is an invasion of our rights as Canadians; it is the beginning of the curtailing of our rights of self-government. We are asked to contribute to-day; another election will take place, and we shall again be asked to contribute, as the flag will be waved. Will that help the British Empire?

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) truly said the other day that the Government had against it at least one-half of the public opinion of Canada, and I say that many Conservatives are against that policy, because it is un-British, un-Canadian.

We have heard before to-day, about this invasion of our rights. Mr. Chamberlain, a great statesman, one of the greatest of this century, boldly took up the gauntlet of military contribution when the Imperial Federation League was dissolved. We all remember the objects of that league. Its members were to evolve a new constitution for the Empire. When the Imperial Federation League dissolved, Mr. Chamberlain took up the cudgels and espoused its principles. Thank Heaven, he met on his way the representative of the Dominion; a scion of the French Canadian race who knew the value of British traditions. Thanks to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir, the battle was won for the dominions and for responsible government. What were the objects sought by the Imperial Federation League? It started in 1884, and it set out to secure by federation a permanent united Empire, the maintenance of common interests, and to provide for the organized defence of common rights. A conference was summoned in 1887, but very little was done. The propaganda went on until 1891, when a deputation approached Lord Salisbury, asking him to convoke a conference, and what was Lord Salisbury's answer? He said:

I do not know what the meaning of the adjective may be, but I think we are almost come to the time when schemes should be proposed and when without them we should not go very far.

And what happened? The league appointed a committee and began searching constitution after constitution, travelling from one colony to another, in order to find a modus operandi. In 1892 it had drafted a report which gravely stated:

The voice of the Empire in peace when dealing with foreign powers shall be as far as possible the united voice of all its autonomous parts. The defence of the Empire in war shall be the common defence of all its interests and of all its parts by the united forces and resources of all its members. It may be laid down as a leading principle that as all parts of the Empire enjoy the benefit of Imperial defence they should contribute to its cost; money spent upon local defence to be deemed a contribution.

We were told by Sir Charles Tupper that he, single-handed, in 1892, opposed a contribution from Canada to the British navy. In 1893 the league approached Mr. Gladstone, but he demurred and no conference was summoned, and finally the league was dissolved. Why was it dissolved? Because there were dissentions amongst its members. Some of them were for an Imperial federation for trade purposes, whilst others, like the Minister of Militia and Defence here, were in favour of an Imperial federation for military purposes only. It was at that moment that Mr. Chamberlain appeared on the scene, and for Mr. Chamberlain I have the very greatest possible respect, because he spoke quite openly. In his speech at the Canadian Club, London, on March 25, 1896, after having referred to the fact that the league had dissolved, he said:

But it does not follow that on that account we should give up our aspirations. It is only a proof that we must approach the goal in a different way; that we must seek the line of least resistance. To create a new government for the British Empire—a new government, with large powers of taxation and legislation over countries separated by thousands of miles of sea, in conditions as various as those which prevail in our several dependencies and colonies—that, indeed, would be a duty from which the boldest statesman might shrink appalled. We may, however, approach the desirable consummation by a process of gradual development.

And, Mr. Chamberlain went to work with unrelenting patience, and with characteristic doggedness.

At the Conference of 1897, Mr. Chamberlain boldly asked that Canada should send cash contribution to the navy. His proposal was negatived. Again in 1896, he wanted Canada to agree to interchange regiments in time of peace with a view of sharing in the dangers and the glories in time of war. This also was negatived.

In 1902, he succeeded in obtaining cheques from the other colonies as a naval tribute. Canada demurred but instead, took over the management and control of Halifax and Esquimalt and declared that later on she would consider the contribution of ships of her own.

In 1902, he suggested that Canada should send military contingents in case of European war. The Prime Minister of Canada simply answered: 'The matter will be considered when the need arises.'

Mr. Chamberlain, again in 1902, begged of Canada to set apart certain of her forces for foreign service if the United Kingdom would contribute to their pay. The answer was: No. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: 'Acceptance of such proposals would entail an important departure from the principle of self-government.'

Sir, was there ever in the British Empire a better British subject than Sir John A. Macdonald? With his wit and, I should say, his genius, he described the whole scheme, of an Imperial federation and the whole scheme petered out after his description of it. In 1891 he was asked his opinion about the policy which is aimed at by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), and here is what Sir John answered:

We are told that we want Imperial federation. I will not trouble you with a disquisition on that subject now, but I will tell you Imperial federation is utterly impracticable. We would never agree to send a number of men over to England to sit in Parliament there and vote away our rights and principles. I am, so far as that question goes, up to the handle a home-ruler. We will govern our own country. We will put on the taxes ourselves. If we choose to misgovern ourselves we will do so, and we do not desire England, Ireland or Scotland to tell us we are fools. We will say: If we are fools we will keep our folly to ourselves; you will not be the worse for it and we will not be the worse for any folly of yours.

That was the pithy description of this Imperial federation by the statesman who once said: 'a British subject I was born, a British subject I will die!' A Canadian navy, no more than Canadian self-government, no more than a Canadian militia controlled by Canada, no more than a Canadian tariff framed by the Canadian Government, could or would imperil our British connection.

Sir, the genius of our British constitution can be summed up in the three words: equality, freedom and self-government. Let me quote in conclusion the words of Burke when discussing a question quite similar to this one, the question of taxation without representation. He said:

My hold of the colonies is in the close affection which grows from common names, from kindred blood, from similar privileges and equal protection. These are ties which, though light as air, are as strong as links of iron. . . . As long as you have the wisdom to keep the sovereign authority of this country as the sanctuary of liberty, the sacred temple consecrated to our common faith, wherever the chosen race and sons of England worship freedom, they will turn their faces towards you. The more they multiply, the more friends you will have; the more ardently they love liberty; the more perfect will be their obedience. Deny them this participation of freedom, and you break the sole bond, which originally made, and must still preserve, the unity of the Empire. . . . . It is the spirit of the English constitution, which, infused through the mighty mass, pervades, feeds, invigorates, vivifies, every part of the Empire, even down to the minutest member.

No loftier, no nobler ideals were ever presented. They have created that grand spirit of self-reliance which has made the British race sturdy, vigorous and manly. They have made the Empire a striking reality, the wonder and admiration of the world. The present policy of tribute is in direct violation of the principles that have thus far obtained through the history of the British Empire. The duty of the Liberal party is to resist such a setback to our national development. Historically, this is its task. It was its duty at the time of responsible government, at the time of Confederation, and it was its duty when Canada was invited at the various Imperial conferences. Our great leader might well let well enough alone. He has done his noble share for the country during the last forty years. But, like the traveller who has reached the top of the hill, his journey is not at an end. His, is only a halt. He may rest his weary limbs and contemplate for a time with gratitude and admiration the space he has traversed and the prospect around him. Indeed, he may dream of making a perpetual bivouac on the summit. Yet he may only hope that his future course may be less arduous, the rocks less steep, the torrents less difficult, the marsh less unsafe to cross, but he must still move on and pursue his journey, all the more confident in his path from the success he has already achieved. A voice is heard which murmurs: 'Excelsior! Onward!' It bids him to fight the cause of the people. Defeat would not discourage him, because the upholding of British institutions, the defence of self-government, must and will, sooner or later, triumph in Canada.

In my humble judgment an appeal to the country is necessary, because this policy is against the spirit of our institutions. This policy was not in issue during the campaign of 1911. It is a new departure, and we cannot commit the country to it without asking the country what it thinks of it. To my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, I say: You cannot and you will not involve the country in foreign politics without consulting it; you must avoid friction for the future if you are a true Britisher; you owe it to Canada and you owe it to the Mother Country. We must not rush into the maelstrom of European politics, fraught with all its dangers. The people must weigh all the consequences of this new venture before having it endorsed by a Parliament which has no mandate from them.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 55, to incorporate the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 59, to incorporate the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners. — Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 53, respecting Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 56, respecting the Hull Electric Company.—Mr. Devlin.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 45, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—Mr. White (Renfrew. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

Mr. OLIVER : When this Bill was before the Committee last, the Prime Minister promised an official answer to a question which I asked him. I do not wish to hold up the Bill, but I would like to get that answer before the Bill goes through.

Mr. HAZEN : What was the hon. gentleman's question ?

Mr. OLIVER : The question was as to whether the passage of this Bill, allowing the company to increase its bond issue by $75,000,000, would in any way increase the difficulty of the country in taking over the enterprise at a later date; that is to say, would the position of the Government towards the company be altered in any way by the increase of bonding powers provided in this Bill ?

Mr. LANCASTER : I think the matter was cleared up before. Of course I cannot prevent my hon. friend, if he insists upon it, from asking the Prime Minister to say what is quite patent. In 1906, when we were increasing the bonding powers of this company, gentlemen on the Railway Committee, I among them, noticed the very objection that my hon. friend makes, that some claim might arise for larger damages in case the Government might wish to take over the work. Therefore the original section 43 of the charter, which gave a wider claim for damages and a claim which might be increased in accordance with an increase in capitalization, was repealed, and a drastic section was passed which makes the claim just the same, no matter how much the bonding powers might be increased. The original section 43 which was in force until 1906 was that:

Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, may at any time assume the possession and property of the said canals and works, and of all the rights and privileges and advantages of the company, all of which shall after such assumption be vested in Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, on giving to the company one week's notice thereof and on paying to the company the value of the same, to be fixed by three arbitrators or the majority of them, one to be chosen by the Government and another by the company, and a third arbitrator by the two arbitrators; and the arbitrators may in such valuation take into account the expenditure of the company, its property, the business of the canals and other works hereby authorized, and its past, present and prospective business, with interest from the time of the investment thereof.

I have a very vivid recollection of what took place in the Committee. It occurred to us then that, with that clause standing, as you increased the capital of the company, you were increasing the value of the concern which the Government would have to pay for; and that if we were going to continue increasing the capital, we should repeal that section and have a drastic section passed, so that no matter how much the capital was increased, the company would not get a cent more when the Government expropriated the work. I think the Committee will see that no other answer to the question could be imagined than that the Government cannot be embarrassed in any way by this increase in capitalization. This is the drastic section which was passed:

His Majesty, his heirs and successors may at any time assume the possession of, and the property in, the said canals and works, and of and in all the rights, privileges and advantages of the company on giving to the company one week's notice of intention to do so; and thereupon all property in the said canals, works, rights, privileges and advantages shall become, and thenceforward shall be vested in His Majesty, his heirs and successors; and by way of compensation His Majesty shall pay to the company the value of the work actually done up to the time of the giving of such notice in surveying, and in the making of plans, and otherwise upon the ground, together with the value of all tangible property of the company of which possession may be so taken, such values to be fixed by three valuators, or the majority of them, one valuator to be chosen by His Majesty, another by the company, and the third by the two so chosen.

The Committee will see that instead of the Company having any right to damages in respect to good will or franchise, its right is clearly limited to the work actually done on the ground, no matter what the capital may be. When we reported this Bill, we inserted that clause so that there would be no doubt that a strict limitation would be put on the damages. That is the way it is in the Bill before the Committee.

Mr. OLIVER: I appreciate my hon. friend's view; but I do not attach the same meaning to the section that he does. I think everybody will agree that it is not so important what a section of the law says, as what the Government of the day is going to do about it. I think it is a fair question. The hon. the Prime Minister considered it a fair question when he was in the House, and promised to give an answer as to what his official opinion, as the head of the Government, was. I do not insist upon the presence of the Prime Minister; but what I do ask for is a statement from a member of the Government as to the view the Government takes of the effect of this section, which view of course would carry with it the action of the Government, if action should ever be called for in connection with it.

Mr. HAZEN: All that the Government can do is to carry out the law. Speaking as one member of the Government, I would say that I attach the same meaning to that section of the statute as my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), who is the chairman of the Railway Committee, and who has given very close atten tion to the matter. I fail to see how the Government can be embarrassed in any way by that section, or how it can become more difficult for the Government to take over the work because of an increase in the capitalization of the company.

Mr. OLIVER: Not to delay the Bill, but to get the matter absolutely clear, will the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries say on behalf of the Government that, in his judgment as a member of the Government, the proposed increase of capitalization provided by this Bill will not be any obligation upon the Government for——

Mr. LANCASTER: Any greater obligation.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, any greater obligation —for consideration?

Mr. HAZEN: I only could give my own opinion as a member of the Government, and in my opinion it would not lay any greater obligation upon the Government.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to insist on the presence of the Prime Minister, though there was a distinct understanding that he should give the answer. I am ready to accept the answer of my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) if he gives it as from the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hope the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will take the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who speaks not only as a minister but as a lawyer who knows well the interpretation to be given to the clause of the Bill. It seems to me absolutely clear that the increase in the powers of the Company to extend its undertaking can in no way increase the obligation of the country for the works which the company may construct as provided under section 42. The obligation of the country is absolutely limited to the actual value of the works constructed, the moneys expended in surveys and in constructive work. No matter whether the bonding privilege is $100,000,000 or $100,000, that is not what governs the arbitrators in determining what amount should be paid. It seems to me absolutely clear that the country is safeguarded and that there is no increase of obligation placed upon the country by these increases of stock or bonds.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

KOOTENAY AND ARROWHEAD RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 43, respecting the Kootenay and Arrowhead Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On section 2:

Mr. LANCASTER: Perhaps a little explanation should be given in this case. Clause 2 is not in the Bill as printed. You have, I think, Mr. Chairman, three added clauses, Nos. 1, 2 and 3. They are the standard clauses in regard to preventing the expropriation of water-powers and municipal control of highways and of light, heat and power upon the highways.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GOLD MEDAL FURNITURE MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 71, respecting the Gold Medal Furniture Manufacturing Company, Limited.—Mr. Macdonell. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. CARVELL: I desire to register a protest against the passing of a Bill of this kind, because it seems to me to be establishing a principle of renewing patents regardless of the circumstances of the case. In former instances some reasons, alleged to be beyond the control of the owners of the patent, were invariably advanced as to why legislation of this kind should be passed, and apparently genuine reasons were given for the application. It appears to me that we are drifting away even from that rather farcical position, and owners of patents are coming to this Parliament and practically pleading their own negligences and their own errors as reasons for the renewal of their patents. This is a patent with respect to spring beds or mattresses. The matter was rushed through the Private Bills Committee the other afternoon in about fifteen minutes, and the only objections raised against the Bill were my own and those of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). I was asked if I would not withdraw my objection, and allow the matter to go through while the House was sitting, which I did. The company had three patents; one expired in 1912, one in 1909, and one I think, in 1910. As far as we could ascertain, the patents were practically the same. The manager of the company stated that he had instructed the secretary or treasurer to send a cheque to the department in connection with one of these patents, and when received by the department it was applied to the patent expiring in 1910. There was a good deal of correspondence in reference to the matter, and the cheque was returned by reason of some informality. A new cheque was sent, the money was finally applied to the patent that expired in 1910, and the company made no attempt whatever to renew the patent expiring in 1909, which is the one provided for in this Bill. In 1912 the third patent expired, and other manufacturers of the same articles contended that there was no practical difference between the patent expiring in 1909 and the one expiring in 1912. The company has had eighteen years' protection under the 1912 patent, and they are now asking for a renewal which will give them another twelve years' protection or, as is contended by other manufacturers, a protection on the same device for thirty years. A very strong protest against the renewal of this patent has been registered by a number of the most important manufacturers of this class of goods in Canada. They were represented at the committee meeting by a patent attorney of high standing from Montreal, but the committee seemed to be disinclined to take any notice of this gentleman's statements, and railroaded the matter through. If this Bill passes, the effect will practically be the extension of protection for a term of twelve years to a company which has already enjoyed protection for eighteen years. A man who invents a new and useful device is entitled by law to the protection given him by a patent for a period of eighteen years, but the practical result of this Bill will be extending this period for twelve years, giving a total of thirty years' protection. This will enhance the price of the article to the consumer, and I submit that if we are to renew these patents under such conditions, we should give the Commissioner of Patents the right to renew them in his discretion, so that the public will not know we are going through this farcical performance about twenty-five times every session. If I were the holder of a promissory note, and had failed to present it and notify the endorser when due, I might just as well ask Parliament to renew my rights and give me another chance of notifying that endorser as to ask for the renewal of a patent under such conditions as I have described. Some thing should certainly be done to prevent this straight abuse of the patent law, and avoid extending to certain persons rights to which they are not entitled.

Mr. MACDONELL: I am rather surprised at the attitude of the hon. member for Carleton with respect to this Bill. The hon. member was present when this Bill was discussed in committee, and, with the exception of the hon. member for St. Antoine, was the only member who took exception to it; but the hon. member for St. Antoine, upon hearing an explanation of the matter, was apparently satisfied. The company applying for this legislation was represented at the committee meeting by their attorney and the president of the company. The fullest possible explanation was given, and there was not a dissenting voice in the committee when the Bill was finally passed—not even that of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. The fullest possible explanation was given and there was not a dissenting voice in the committee when the Bill was finally passed, not even the member for Carleton.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, I beg pardon, I voted 'nay.'

Mr. MACDONELL: That is the fact. The applicant for this Bill proved, and his solicitor was there with a sworn declaration of the facts, that this patent was originally to run for eighteen years; it ran its first period of six years and then the applicants, being manufacturers of certain springs for mattresses or other uses, sent to Ottawa a renewal fee on another patent which they owned, believing they were sending the fee for the renewal of this patent. The solicitor who appeared there proved that the office itself at Ottawa was guilty at least of some degree of carelessness in not advising the applicants that they had paid the fee on the wrong patent. The applicants did not discover for some time afterwards that they had paid a fee on a patent which did not expire for several years to come. The applicants proved that they had invested between $27,000 and $30,000 in exploiting this patent, in advertising goods made under it and promoting the patent generally. The only opposition to this Bill was made by gentlemen for whom my hon. friend apparently acting as sponsor. They were, on the admission of their attorney, practically pirates, simply waiting to have the patent expire in order to manufacture the articles and get the benefit of the applicant's invention without paying anything for the rights. That position did not commend itself to the committee. They properly thought that where these men were lurking around for this patent to expire in order to profit by it and manufacture under it and take the benefit of the inventor's brains they were not worthy of consideration; so when the motion to report the Bill was put by the Chairman there was not a dissenting voice. Lest some one should have acquired a bona fide interest under the patent since its expiry the usual protection clause is inserted under section two. The House has for years been renewing patents that have expired through inadvertence owing to a mistake of a clerk or something of that kind and this is quite in line with that practice.

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry my hon. friend chooses to make a personal attack on me in this matter. I have a right to speak here on this matter or to go before the Private Bills Committee and present my views. I asked for a reason why the Bill should go through and the hon. member says because the Private Bills Committee were unanimous in reporting it except for myself. The facts are that the patent on which this money was applied expired within a year. I am prepared to admit that this company has as much right to a renewal as dozens that have come here within the last five years. It is the principle I have objected to in the committee and since my hon. friend has referred to the committee I will state the facts. The committee was called for 11 o'clock but owing to a Conservative caucus we received notice that the committee would meet at 2.30. When I arrived I found the committee room full. I asked a few questions and some time before 3 o'clock I asked to have the right to examine the president of the company who was there. Oh, they said, you don't want to examine him; here is an affidavit. He was there with his solicitor and I was asked what right I had to examine him and was not allowed to examine him.

Mr. MACDONELL: My. hon. friend is absolutely mistaken.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I can narrate a fact as well as the hon. member for Toronto, and I tell him I am not mistaken.

Mr. MACDONELL: You are mistaken.

Mr. CARVELL: I asked two or three times and was shunted off every time. Finally three o'clock came and I wanted to examine the witness and again I was shunted off. I raised the objection that we had no legal right to sit after the House was in session without permission, but the hon. member for Toronto laughed at the idea. Fortunately the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee is a pretty good lawyer and he knew that under the law and the practice and the rules we had no right to sit while the House was in session without the consent of the House. They appealed to me: Why do you oppose it? They appealed to me not to act the part of a blocker. I did not want to put myself in that position and the thing went through and I voted 'no.' I repeat that as a matter of principle I do not think any company which has been negligent in complying with the requirements of the law should have the right to come here and be reinstated. He talks about pirates. I do not know who the companies were. I could not name one of them to-day I never spoke to the gentleman who was representing those who protested; I do not even remember his name, but he was there in the committee with a genuine protest from responsible manufacturers in this country against this patent being renewed, and the committee would have done itself more credit had it allowed members of that committee, myself included, to have investigated the matter further and ascertained the facts from the president of the company who was in attendance. I could not help the Bill being rushed through the committee, but I have the right of free speech, and I have the right to come here and give my reasons for objecting. It would be well that the matter should be given further consideration and that it should not be railroaded through to-night as seems to be the intention of my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Macdonell.)

Mr. ROGERS: I agree with my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) that this House should not be put to the trouble of renewing patents such as this unless the very best possible reasons can be given for such renewal. The reason given by my hon. friend from Toronto was to the effect that the lapse of the patent was caused by a mistake on the part of a clerk in one of the departments and that I believe to be sufficient reason for the House acting in the case. The statement made by my hon. friend from Carleton should be taken notice of by those applying for renewals of patents from time to time, and generally speaking I am disposed to endorse the views he has put forward. However, in view of the strong case made out by my hon. friend for the passage of this Bill, I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. NESBITT: Was there anything before the committee to show that the lapse of the patent was due to neglect on the part of the department?

Mr. MACDONELL: I do not desire to reflect on the department in any way. It was proved that the renewal fee was sent to Ottawa by the proprietors of this patent, but that fee was applied to the renewal of another patent which did not expire for some two years. Correspondence ensued extending over a period of two months and the proprietors of this patent believed that in the course of that correspondence their attention should have been called to the fact that the fee was applied to a different patent.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think the Commissioner of Patents is running his department by rule of thumb and I would have liked to have had an opportunity of seeing the correspondence to ascertain why the fee was applied to the second patent and not to the first. I asked for delay in the committee but I was told I was going to be a blocker — not a chucker-out this time—and I did not insist on preventing the passage of the measure in committee, knowing that I would have another chance to speak about it in this House. I believed then and I believe now that the Patent Office did with this fee just what they were told to do with it. Since I have been in Parliament I have never seen anything railroaded through committee as was this little patent Bill that morning. In view of the very able argument advanced by the Minister of Public Works as to the passage of this Bill I have no doubt the member for Toronto will get it through, but I think he would be well advised if to-night he would allow it to stand so that we may have an opportunity of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from Carleton says that according to his understanding this legislation gives these people a thirty years term for their patent. Is that correct?

Mr. MACDONELL: My hon. friend from Carleton made some errors in his statement, one of which that is. The total length of the patent is eighteen years from its date. It has now run nine years, and its term is only nine years more.

Mr. CARVELL: As I stated the other day, the best information I could get was that the patent which expired in 1909 covered almost identically the same thing as that which was covered by the patent which expired in 1912. That is what all the manufacturers thought. The manufacturers thought that when the 1912 patent had run its full eighteen years the coast was clear and they would be entitled to go on and manufacture. I believe that they cover identically the same invention but I have had no chance of finding that out. I would like to have had a chance of examining the president of the company as he was there. I think I know enough about the patent law to have done that and I could have satisfied myself as to whether these two patents covered the same thing. The Commissioner of Patents was also there and I would like to have had a chance of examing him. But I did not have time as we only had twenty-five or thirty minutes and they were bound that this Bill should go through. There are a great many potent reasons why this Bill should not pass but should go back to the Private Bills Committee. I think my hon. friend would do well if he would move that the order for the consideration of the Bill in committee be discharged and that the Bill be sent back to the Private Bills Committee. He will get his Bill through all right before the session closes.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, on the naval question I take exactly the same stand as has been taken by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) this afternoon, and have no apology whatever to offer to this House for going on with the discussion. To me, as a Canadian through and through, it is the biggest question that has ever come before the people of Canada; it is fraught with great results; it carries with it perhaps greater consequences than any other question, at least during the time that I have been in public life, that has come before this or any other Parliament of this country. Under these circumstances it strikes me as odd that there should have been and is now such a reticence on the part of the members on the Government side of the House to discuss this great question. It has that side of the House absolutely plumbfull of hush to the brim. Therefore I take more pleasure in discussing this question as a Liberal and Canadian, because I know that the Liberal party have never yet been the least bit afraid to nail their colours to the mast, to discuss every question thoroughly, to let the people know exactly what they think about these questions, and at all times to appeal to the people of the Dominion of Canada upon them.

In this question there are two distinct policies. There is the policy that was brought down in 1909, which was unanimously agreed to in this House, there is the further policy that was brought down during the present session, upon which this debate has occurred. There is a distinct line of cleavage between the two policies, and there seems to me to be absolutely no comparison, either from a Canadian standpoint or from an Imperial standpoint, as to which policy is the better for the people of the Dominion of Canada. There are three reasons why we have heard no particular comment from the Government side of the House. The first is that the members individually, in view of the discussion of 1909, are afraid to commit themselves; the second is that there is not a shadow of an emergency; and the third is that there is absolutely no defence for the present proposition. Why are they afraid to commit themselves? for this reason, that the country approved of the resolution which was unanimously passed by this House in 1909. That resolution was brought forward in consequence of a speech made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), a speech to which I listened with perhaps as much attention as any speech I ever listened to or read during the course of my public life. It made upon me a most distinct impression as a young Canadian. I had not thought much about the question before; but I am bound to say that, after listening to that speech and after reasoning it out in my own perhaps crude way, I was under the impression that it expressed the best Canadian and Imperial thought. I am not going to quote that speech in extenso: but there are two or three passages in it which I think are well worth again reading to the House, even if they have been quoted once or twice before. I am quoting from page 3486 of 'Hansard,' of March 29, 1909:

Sir, into this world of trouble, of uncertainty, amongst this world of nations, Canada has pushed forward to her place. She has taken a position which is important now, which will become more and more important as the years advance. Her ship of state is launched on the world's waters, it is open to every storm, it is exposed to every danger. She cannot escape the common burden, she cannot neglect the common duty, she cannot ignore the common responsibility. I do not believe that she wishes to. Having entered the game, I believe that it is the disposition of the Canadian people to play it valiantly, to play it honourably, and to play it successfully. If her sons have the pride of manhood, as I believe they have, if they know what the stern joy of contest means, if they have proper faith in their high destiny, if they visualize any adequate picture of the future, it seems to me it is up to the people of Canada and to the manhood of Canada to prove their faith and their worth by their works, to grasp the full meaning of their heritage and its responsibilities and to prepare to defend it as well as to develop it.

A further passage in his speech was this:

For five centuries the patient, toiling British taxpayer has paid the bill and paid it with a cheerful countenance, and so far without grumbling. Can you find in the history of the world any more sublime figure and any more beneficent instrumentality for good worked in so unselfish a way and borne so cheerfully and unstintingly by the few millions of people that live in the islands in the North sea? What rank ingratitude in us, of all people, to shield our selfish indifference to the sacrifices of such a mother behind such an argument.

Then, he made what to me was probably the strongest declaration in the whole speech:

The point with me is as to whether it is not the greater wisdom to sow the seed at once and cultivate its growth, as best we may, in our circumstances and with our resources, until at last we arrive at that stage of expansion which we have reached in other great lines of our country's progress.

These were absolutely Canadian sentiments —first, last and all the time. But, two short months ago, we listened again to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and heard him turn down and directly oppose every sentiment he had uttered in March, 1910. This must have made his hearers realize that politics indeed make men do queer things at times. It appeared to me that one could not listen to that speech without feeling that, as a matter of fact, it was not spoken from his heart of hearts, but that he was simply endeavouring to square himself and his party with the people of this Dominion. That appears to me to be the net result of that speech, able as I admit it to have been, made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, two months ago. At the time when the hon. gentleman spoke in 1910, we had some other speeches also. We had a speech from the present Prime Minister. I quote from that speech, at page 1740 of 'Hansard,' January 12, 1910:

Then it has been argued that the creation of the so-called Canadian navy would have a tendency towards the separation of this great dominion from the Empire.

I should like my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) to digest these words, if he is capable of it.

I do not see that it has such a tendency more than the organization of the militia force; less, I say, because the resolution of this House in March, 1909, expressly declared that the organization of the Canadian navy should be along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial conference. That resolution as introduced by the Prime Minister was slightly modified in the end and was finally passed.

And he proceeds to read that resolution. That was one of his declarations during the session of 1910, and he said—it will bear repetition:

That the creation of a so-called Canadian navy will have a tendency towards separation of this great dominion from the Empire.

Then he said further:

The British Empire is in some respects a mere disorganization, and I for one believe that co-operation in trade and in defence are essential to its future development and even to its future existence. Permanent co-operation in defence, in my opinion, can only be accomplished by the use of our own material, the employment of our own people, the development and utilization of our own skill and resourcefulness, and above all impressing upon the people the sense of responsibility for their share in international affairs.

That is what the Prime Minister said in this House. Further, in July, 1909, at the Dominion Day banquet in London, England, he said:

Some feeling was created in the British Islands owing to the fact that Canada had not by a resolution or by a speech from the Prime Minister vouchsafed an offer of one, two or three dreadnoughts. The resolution in the form in which it was passed, while it might not on the surface seem to be as significant at the moment as the offer of one or two dreadnoughts would have been, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada which would serve a more logical purpose than any offer of dreadnoughts.

He then thought that the policy which we had adopted unanimously in 1909 was a far better policy than the policy which he is bringing forward in the resolution of to-day. My hon. friend from Brantford, in speaking the other night, was good enough to say that the policy which we stood by in 1909, and the policy which we on this side stand behind to-day, is a separatist policy. He said, quoting from his speech in 'Hansard,' at page 1686:

We know Sir Wilfrid Laurier from twenty-five years' experience of him and the statement I have made is the statement that holds good in the province of Ontario at any rate, and that is, that whenever he has had an opportunity of choosing between greater Imporial unity and a separatist policy, he has always chosen the separatist policy, as he is doing now.

Did not the right hon. leader of the Government in his speech at the Dominion Day banquet in July, 1909, promulgate the very policy that the Opposition is promulgating to-day? If my hon. friend from Brantford is so willing to indulge in epithets, I want to ask who was the separatist in July, 1910; was it the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition or was it the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government? Just before the words that I have quoted, the hon. gentleman made the remark that Earl Grey in something he had said, had allowed his good nature—I think that was the expression—to run ahead of his zeal. I think that in making the statement he did, the hon. member for Brantford was allowing his political zeal and his political bias to run away with his good real sense. I can look at it in no other way, for the facts are there; they speak for themselves; and I leave it to the House and the people of this country. With all the declarations on the Government side of the House regarding this navy question, it is no wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite are silent, that they do not like to commit themselves. I say I am not surprised because it has been one year, one thing, and another year another; one session this, another session that. It is like the old story of Eli, Huli and Babi, who appeared upon the stage with lighted torches. Babi jumped down Huli's throat; Huli jumped down Eli's throat; and Eli, seizing the last of the lighted torches, jumped down his own throat and left the audience in utter, darkness. Surely it is so with hon. gentlemen opposite, and why? In 1909 all were unanimous on the question of a Canadian navy. But in 1909 the wind commenced to veer a little, and the Prime Minister and other hon. gentlemen opposite commenced to square their sails to catch the breeze the other way. In 1911 the alliance with the Nationalist party was effected, and in September, 1911, by reason of that alliance, and on account of the propaganda carried on at that time, the Conservative party went into power.

Mr. PARDEE: Hon. gentlemen say hear, hear, but I may tell them that so long as I am in public life, be the time long or short, I would despise the day I drifted in under such auspices as those under which hon. gentlemen opposite obtained power. They are in power; the pledge is there, and I believe that pledge is a hard and fast one as concerning the Postmaster General, the Minister of Inland Revenue, and Mr. Bourassa. There exists to-day, without the shadow of a doubt, an iron-clad agreement which binds the present Conservative Government to stand absolutely by the proposition they have brought down, un-Canadian as it may be, and against their own best thoughts, as I am sure it is. Some sections of the Canadian people may say to-day that we must do nothing; that we must not contribute, nor build, man, maintain, or equip. For my part, I think that the people of Canada are bound to do something; they have to take one course or the other; they have to express confidence in the resolution now before the House, or in the proposition submitted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I cannot see the force of the argument that we should not have a Canadian navy for the reason that we cannot build the ships, that we cannot man, equip and maintain them. During the short period of her history, Canada has carried out some of the largest works undertaken in any part of the wide world. We have built our canals and waterways; we have built our vast transcontinental railroads; we have built—

An hon. MEMBER: The Quebec bridge.

Mr. PARDEE: Yes, the Quebec bridge, and, perhaps, had the Government in office at that time given the contract for the Quebec bridge to a Canadian firm, the result might have been different. These huge engineering works have been carried on by Canadians; they are being carried on to-day, and are being brought to a successful conclusion. Were we obliged to send to England for the brain and the brawn necessary for the successful carrying out of these works? No. We did it ourselves, and, so far as the Canadian navy is concerned, we can do that ourselves. I admit that it cannot be done at once, but is it too much to say that the Canadian people, with what they possess of vital endowments and abilities, physical and mental, are able to do anything that the people of any other nation are capable of doing? If the matter is started in the right way, I submit that Canadians can build as good warships as any other nation, and ought to be given the chance to do so. What did my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce say in that same speech from which I quoted a few moments ago? Listen to this:

The first Canadian-owned vessel, built and equipped in Britain, and sent out to defend our coast, would become the nucleus and the training ground of Canadian stokers, Canadian sailors, and Canadian officers, and by and by, perhaps, of a Canadian Admiral on the Canadian coast. How much time would be taken in completing that circle none of us can say, but if we begin the tracing of it and follow it fairly and faithfully the time must come when we get a complete circle, and have an Imperial adjunct to the British navy for the defence of Canada and the defence of the Empire, in which Canada has some of her body, her bones, her blood, and her mental power, her national pride.

These words express my opinion better than if I occupied the time of the House for an hour, because I would not be able to voice these sentiments in the same terse language as that used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What does this 'circle' mean? It means the establishment of shipyards, for the construction not only of ships of war, but of every type of vessel required for Canadian trade and commerce. The development of your resources—your iron, nickel, timber and coal—must follow in natural sequence the building of ships in Canada and the employment of thousands of the most skilled mechanics, both in the building of ships and in the development of industries allied with their construction must inevitably result. What about Sydney and Sault Ste. Marie? What about Hamilton, with her immense steel mills? Would it not, in these particular places, give employment to thousands of men? Would the people of these cities not engage in the manufacture of the component parts of battleships and vessels for commercial purposes? With that state of affairs prevailing, would there not be greater prosperity in the Dominion of Canada than exists to-day, or ever has existed? It must necessarily be so. Ship-building plants would in all probability be established in Montreal, St. John, Halifax, at one or two ports on the great lakes, and in British Columbia, having the effect of building up our cities and towns, and developing Belfasts and Newcastles right here in the Dominion of Canada, with all their attendant benefits and advantages. These are the things which should be embodied in a Canadian policy of this kind, and these are the features of the policy which the Opposition are desirous of having adopted.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that they propose to send to Great Britain $35,000,000, a large sum. What does it mean? If, Sir, my information is correct, seventy per cent of that $35,000,000—that is, $24,500,000—will go into the pockets of wage-earners. If that goes into the pockets of the workingmen, surely it is going to benefit practically every other class of the community, and, above and beyond all—a solace to the hon. gentlemen opposite—surely with that great band of industrial workers built up, their home market will be better than it ever has been before. Then I ask you, Sir, why in Heaven's name we should here as a Parliament take upon ourselves the right to send out of the Dominion the huge sum of $35,000,000 in order that the people of other countries may benefit by it, and not the artisans, the farmers and every other class in the Dominion of Canada? It is absolutely un-Canadian, both from the monetary standpoint and from the fact that the minute this Parliament votes that money, it publishes to the world that Canada, forsooth, will contribute to the fleet of the British Empire; but that she has not to-day the brains, the resources, nor, above and beyond all, the faith in herself to say: We shall spend that money, but we shall spend it within the precincts of our own country. That is a fact which cannot be got away from. If that is so, is it inspiring or in the least elevating to the generations of Canadians who are to come? A country is not made merely by the fact that it has enormous resources. A country is made primarily by the power of its citizens to have faith in themselves and pride in their country. That is the greatest heritage any country can have.

A spirit of the kind I have mentioned must be fostered; it must be grounded deep. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, the roots must be struck, and that is the greatest root you can possibly strike. It is a queer kind of imperialism that would say: If you build up your own country, if you give faith and pride to your own people, that is not the best imperialism. It has appeared to me for a very considerable time that the great trouble amongst many of the people of Canada is that constant talk of imperialism has developed a maudlin imperialism as against a good self-reliant Canadianism; and I believe the sooner the people of Canada get rid of that idea the better for them and for the country.

The hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. Hugh H. McLean) says he is a strong imperialist. It struck me that perhaps he had been with the right hon. the Prime Minister, and had libated some of that atmosphere of which the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke; and that, having lived in the atmosphere, he had changed his views and had come back an entirely different sort of imperialist. He said we must have ships in the fighting line, and he swelled his chest up and said: I for one believe in paying to have ships in that fighting line; that is the proper imperialism, that is my idea of what we should do rather than develop a Canadian navy and a Canadian spirit. It looks to me very much like nickel-in-the-slot imperialism: he pays and he gets, but he does not do. You do not man, you do not equip, you do not maintain, you do not send out your brawn and your blood. There is something which builds up a pride in ourselves and in our country; but instead of that, you take the dollars; you pass them over, and say: We have paid our shot, we are immune. It does appear to me, speaking in all sincerity, that that is not imperialism and not empire-building in the true and absolute sense of the word. It is nothing more nor less than going back and back and back, pursuing a policy of centralization, and not a policy of every dominion taking care of itself and being self-reliant.

I shall read to the House a short extract from a speech of Sir George Reid, the Australian commissioner. It has been said, and is laid down even to-day by hon. gentlemen opposite, that one of the reasons we are doing this is to relieve the British taxpayer, that patient, toiling, steadfast British taxpayer. What does this mean? Are we relieving the British taxpayer or not by the course this Government is pursuing? Sir George Reid said:

> The Australian navy will not cost the taxpayers of the Mother Country a farthing. The Canadian navy will cost them $1,900,000 annually—the up-keep of three dreadnoughts. Our fleet is being rapidly put together. Admiral Henderson's scheme involves a very large expenditure during the next few years. When the scheme is completed there will be a fleet of about fifty-four vessels. I think it is very important that the British dominions should answer the call of the sea. It will be a bad day for the British race when it does not. One of the arguments in favour of colonial navies is that in days to come the dominions will undertake the defence of the seas adjacent to them, thus relieving the Mother Country immensely. I can see no reason why the North Atlantic and Pacific stations should not be handed over to Canada and the China station to India. Australia has already taken up the guardianship of the southern seas, and doubtless South Africa might develop some sort of naval force. That would leave to Great Britain the work of defence in the North sea and the Mediterranean, and, of course, the leading share in defending the ocean tracks of Imperial commerce. I think that would probably be a better arrangement than having only admiralty fleets, and no fleets in connection with the dominions. At the rate at which the dominions are now developing such a state of things could not last. It is only natural that communities, like individuals, should spend their money much more freely upon things which they can call their own than in buying things for the 'old man.'

That is what Sir George Reid has been saying and in that connection I wish to quote the following despatch which gives the opinion of the Manchester Guardian:

> London, Feb. 7.—The Manchester Guardian to-day, discussing the naval policies of the dominions, says that the Australian plan of having its own fleet in its own waters puts the whole strength of the nation into the fleet, whereas the present Canadian plan divides it, and has already set party against party.
> 'The Australian plan is likely to produce new ideas, whereas the Canadian plan will produce deadening uniformity in naval ideas,' the paper adds. 'Increase in the force at the disposal of the Admiralty would be dearly purchased if it divorced the strength of the colonial nationality from the sea. The present Canadian Bill is in some danger of doing that.

When you read that speech of Sir George Reid, and when you take into consideration the fact that one of the main objects of this proposal is that Canada should relieve the British tax-payer, you see that you send Britain nothing but an empty hull; you do not man, you do not maintain, you do not equip these ships. Does it not remind you of the cartoon which represents old John Bull standing by the side of a small stream with strings attached to three dreadnoughts, pulling them up the river and saying to himself, 'Three more pups to feed.' Surely Canadians ought to have more national pride than to allow it to be said for one instant that when we had a man's job to do we did not do it in a man's way. We are told that it would cost more if we did not go about discharging our duty as it should be discharged; but suppose it cost fifty million dollars as against your thirty-five million, what great difference would that make in view of the abundant revenue resources of this country? Not only would it make little difference in the yearly expenditure, but suppose you did spend your fifteen million dollars extra, you would simply be putting it back into the pockets of the taxpayers of the Dominion, who would build your ships.

We were told with a great flourish of trumpets that the Prime Minister when in England said that Canada would not be an adjunct even to Great Britain, and that if we were to furnish these three dreadnoughts and give the thirty-five million dollars, we were to have a representative upon the defence committee and a voice in the question of peace or war. Much Canada wants a voice in peace or war! You have only to look at the present state of affairs in Europe to realize how infinitesimal for good or evil would be the voice of a Canadian member on that defence committee. Suppose for the sake of argument other European countries including England should become embroiled in the Balkan war, does anyone think for a moment that the voice of Canada on the defence committee would have any effect at all in deciding for peace or war? It will be a sad day for Canada if she thus becomes embroiled in European politics. I do not believe such was ever intended to be the mission of the colonies of the Empire; I believe our duty to be to do our share for the Empire's sake when the Empire calls us. In view of the unanimous resolution passed in 1909 it is no wonder that hon. gentlemen on the Government side do not care to commit themselves upon this policy; it is no wonder, as indicated by their silence, that they shrink from a declaration in favour of it.

I now come to the question as to whether or not British statesmen or leaders of public opinion in Great Britain desire that we should do what is proposed to Parliament by the right hon. the Prime Minister. I cannot do better, in that connection, than read an article from the Times weekly edition of November 29, 1912; not during the proposed emergency in 1909, but in November of last year. The Times said:

Firmly as we trust that peace will be maintained, a moment has come in European affairs when every nation with interests and friendships to preserve must look to its resources and strive to appraise their work. Is British power still adequate to hold its great position and guard its heritage? We believe that it is. It may be said—and said, we fear, with justice—that the nation has not profited as it should by the trials and reverses through which it passed in the early months of the South African war. There is much that remains to be done which should have been done before. Our military forces, effective though they are in proportion to their strength, are below the standard which our interest requires; and the British people as a whole, far as they have moved towards that ideal, have not as yet accepted the universal duty of manhood in its country's defence. But when these admissions are made, there yet remains the strongest ground for confidence in the spirit of the people and the power which their rulers wield. The last ten years have witnessed an immense increase of efficiency throughout the British fleet. It has never reached a higher pitch of training and readiness for war. The service believes in itself and in its ships; the nation believes in them too. We are ready in our own eyes to meet the emergencies of the moment in any form which reason suggests that they may take; and we know that as a people we do not stand alone. The action of the dominions in stepping to our side at the crisis of the South African war was a sign to all the world that in any great emergency the self-governing Empire is one. The signs are even clearer to-day. Every great dominion has undertaken, or is now to undertake, the creation of a fresh centre of naval power. Their growing strength is our strength, as ours has always been theirs. As a material factor that movement already means much; as a moral factor its value is inestimable.

The need of joint security is plain enough to all, but the principles are still to be worked out. It is Great Britain's task for the present to maintain the naval strength required by Imperial interests in European seas, and Great Britain is fully equal to it. But Imperial interests stretch beyond the boundaries of Europe; they stretch across the Atlantic from end to end, and right across the other two great oceans of the world. Though the sea indeed is all one, it is not sound strategy to urge that a North sea standard should be posed as our universal criterion of naval power. Let us fix a European standard according to our European needs, which this country alone is able and ready to meet; and let us then in consultation with the dominion governments decide the needs of security elsewhere. The dominions will require our help even there; but let up keep the two spheres distinct, and reckon on dominion ships only in the wider extra-European sphere. Each of these systems will make for the highest possible efficiency in the conditions of each sphere; but they will not easily amalgamate. Mr. Churchill has already stated his belief in such a division of the Empire's naval work, and we look to him to make his declaration good.

This article shows conclusively that the best thought of Great Britain favours the policy propounded by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as the best for the Empire. I want to read one more, and I am through, I think, with quotations. Although this is from that obscure paper, as the Minister of Finance terms the Canadian Courier, it strikes me that it is one of the sanest imperial articles that I have read upon this subject. It appears in the issue of January 18, 1913:

This is more than a national question. It is an imperial policy which we are called upon to aid in deciding. Our decision on the navy question must be duplicated by the people of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. That famous non-partisan resolution of March, 1909, passed by the Canadian House of Commons, was duplicated in the same month of the same year in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. That resolution did not originate in Canada; it came from London. Its authors intended it to show to the world that the overseas dominions were behind the United Kingdom in the defence of the Empire and in the maintenance of the world's peace.

To-day, as in March, 1909, Canada must do what Australia and New Zealand are willing to do. The three countries must act in concert or the effect will be spoiled. If Mr. Borden decides to ignore the wishes of Australia and New Zealand, then he is striking a deadly blow at the Empire which he professes to admire.

Canada has no right to act alone or in opposition to the other dominions. All the colonial and Imperial conferences of the past have had but one object—to unify the internal and external policies of the different parts of the Empire. If Canada to-day decides to ignore Australian and New Zealand ideas in the matter of separate fleets, then she is up setting the good work of the past twenty-five years in behalf of Imperial unity and Britannic co-operation.

That strikes me as being absolutely sane, logical and, in the very highest sense, imperial. They simply say that if the other dominions of this Empire are proceeding along the same lines that we intended to proceed along by the resolution of 1909, Canada, by adopting any other course, is adopting a selfish course, and is stultifying herself not only in her own eyes but in the eyes of the Empire. It appears to me that the sentiments in that article breathe true Canadianism and true imperialism, and that they do not, as the present shift of the Government, breathe only party imperialism, as the Government resolution does. I cannot help thinking that the Government and their supporters in this House are in their own hearts not particularly in love with the policy that to-day they are advocating. I am perfectly satisfied that if they were left to their own sweet will, good Canadians as I know many of them are, and as I hope they all are, would, one after the other, get up and declare their Canadian sentiment and their belief in a Canadian navy. They are pursuing the policy which they are now following because political exigencies are driving them to it. They are doing it as a makeshift for the purpose of doing something as a salve to their consciences, so that at least they may say: Oh, we did something, it was not much good, but it helped along, and we did it. It is very much like the old David Harum proverb that flees are good for a dog because when they get upon his back they keep him from brooding on being a dog. They are salving their political consciences, they are making a makeshift of this policy, and they are doing it for party purposes to cover the exigencies of the moment.

That this is a permanent policy there is absolutely no doubt. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) let the cat out of the bag when he spoke of 'contributions,' not of 'a contribution,' and up to the present moment, although this debate has gone on for the past month or more, we have never had one single syllable from one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House intimating that a permanent policy was contemplated or was in process of being arranged. It is all contributions; it is permanent. This year it will be so if the money is voted; next year it will be again, and in two or three years there will be another, and so it will go on until we have come to consider ourselves as Canadians only in so far as we can say that we have a member on the Imperial Defence Committee, we simply paying our shot year after year and doing nothing in the way of empire-building or in the development of the country.

An emergency! I do not believe the stoutest-hearted of the Government supporters will stand up and say in this year of grace 1913 that there is an emergency. An emergency was all right in December, or in November; then, there was a great flourish of trumpets about the emergency. We had a memorandum read to this House that disclosed absolutely nothing in the way of an emergency; but it was made to do sturdy duty. It has gone on from week to week and from month to month until this the 11th day of February, 1913, when, to the bitter chagrin of hon. gentlemen opposite who are still holding to the position that this contribution must be made because there is an emergency, an article comes out in all the leading morning papers on both sides of politics that to-day practically the entente cordiale has been reached as between Germany and Great Britain, in so far as naval programmes go, and that henceforth the huge race in armaments is to cease. This emergency came from Germany; it was always the German people who were going to attack England, who were going to attack the colonies over the seas, who were going to attack Canada. Now, in face of this, what becomes of the emergency? It has vanished into the thin etheral atmosphere; there is nothing left of it. There is absolutely no justification now for Canada offering that $35,000,000 to Great Britain for the building of three dreadnoughts, because forsooth there is a German peril. It has gone the way of all good things that rise up now and then to relieve the exigencies of a political party. It helped them for a day or two, but the time was soon over. To-day they are back to where they were, with no emergency; and in so far as that part of it is concerned, no argument whatever can be adduced.

Taking all these matters into consideration, I maintain that there is no defence for the proposition of the contribution of $35,000,000. It is bad as a Canadian proposition; it is bad as an Imperial proposition. There is no justification whatever for the right about face on the part of the members on the Government side of the House from their position of three years ago. They have not shown any justification for it, and they will not be able to do so to the people of the country, when they appeal to them, if they have nerve enough to do so. Although party exigencies may be great, a political party should be greater than two short years ago to lay down a policy which was good, a policy which was Canadian in the utmost sense of the word, a policy which was Imperial enough to satisfy the most imperialistic, and then merely for party purposes, to turn right about face and give us an entirely different bill of fare. What says Lord Charles Beresford, the man whom the Conservatives of this country two years ago heralded as the man who was to come here and say that the naval policy of the Laurier Government was not the proper policy for the needs of the Empire? He has been quoted by members of the opposite side of the House as one of the greatest living naval authorities. No later than December 6, 1912, he said:

> What I recommended that the Dominions do was to defend their end of the trade routes with strong naval bases, mines, torpedo-boat destroyers and light cruisers. The trade routes are unprotected, and now our danger is starvation, not invasion. The country was deceived and fooled by statements regarding the dreadnoughts of other nations. We were insulted by being told a dreadnought could sink their whole fleets. The people speak of nothing but dreadnoughts, quite forgetting that a fleet is composed of a variety of units, any one of which being defective or short jeopardizes the whole.

Sir Charles Tupper, as was shown by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), endorsed most heartily the resolution of 1909. With the rest of the Conservative party, he is right about face to-day. So is Sir Richard McBride. Sir Richard McBride, in England and elsewhere, was giving interviews day after day, endeavouring to the best of his ability to get himself into the newspapers by saying that the Pacific coast must have a fleet unit. To-day he is right about face with the rest of them and says: Mr. Borden has indeed risen to the height of his opportunity by giving $35,000,000, and leaving the Pacific coast without a fleet unit. For my part I cannot see it in that light. The true policy for Canada to pursue is to maintain her own local self-government in all matters military or naval, at all times ready for the call of duty to her own country or to the Empire at large, at all times ready to take her share, but that share always being commensurate with what is best for the Empire and for Canada. My Imperialism is of this sort. I am a believer in the idea of the Canadian nationality, holding with the utmost persistence to the Liberal view that the Dominion of Canada would reach its best development and would best maintain its prestige and maintain the integrity of the Empire by claiming and exercising the maximum control of its own affairs, while trusting to the sole bond of sympathetic admiration and intelligent appreciation as a means of keeping the Dominion of Canada within the Empire as one of its integral and more influential parts. There is, as I said in the beginning, an absolute line of cleavage between the two policies. I see no compromise whatever. We are fighting for the essence of Liberalism, self-government and self-control.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I thoroughly support the amendment of the hon. the right hon. leader of the Opposition, believing as I do that it is Canadian and Imperial in the very best sense of the words; and that it is worthy of the man who brought it forward, the greatest statesman that the Dominion of Canada has yet produced.

Mr. A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention at first to take part in this discussion; but three things have forced me to a certain extent to do so, in order to let the House know my views on this very important question. The first is the utterance of the Prime Minister when he moved this resolution in this House, when he mentioned that he thought it would take from twenty-five to fifty years for Canada to be in a position to set a navy in operation through the shipbuilding industry of this country; the second one is the absolute silence of the French Canadian members on the other side of the House on this very important question; and the third one is the speech of the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLean), who has put the finishing touch of imperialism in this House. I wish to speak, of course, in the name of labour. Labour organizations are on record in so far as navy armaments are concerned; the farmers as well as the grain growers of this country have also passed resolutions in that respect, and different church societies have done the same thing. None of them have yet gone so far as to say that we had not to get police protection. Police protection, in the sense in which it is understood by the labour men of the country, is easily understood by every member in this House. We acknowledge that police protection is needed for the country, just as it is needed for a small town or for a city.

Of course, there is an enormous difference between police protection and very heavy armament. We are in favour of police protection in our cities; we are in favour of police protection on our coasts, that is, we are in favour of having to some extent ships to safeguard our trade on the Pacific and on the Atlantic. We have discussed this matter for quite a length of time; and I have heard a great deal said about war, but very little said about peace. Of course, I will not speak of war, for I think enough has been said on that subject—about German scares and all the other scares of the world. First, I would ask: who wants this war? Who wants all this armament? We have been told here more than once that the ship-builders of Great Britain are very anxious to build as many dreadnoughts as possible. I suppose that anyone in business would like as much work, in order to make as much profit as he can regardless of the burden that may be imposed upon the people that are supposed to pay for it. Now, the labour men not only in Canada, but of Great Britain, of Germany, of France, and of Switzerland, are on record lately as stating that before a war is declared between England and Germany, or between England and France, the labour men of these countries, who are supposed to be behind the guns, will know what the war is for. They have made up their minds, that, instead of going to fight for the pleasure or the benefit of a few, they will declare, at the right moment, a general strike so as to keep the army at home to maintain peace in the army's own country. The different labour congresses have passed resolutions in this sense; and I believe that what I have read in some papers in the last few days about a German scare is exactly the result of what I have just mentioned. A year ago or a little more we heard of that Moroccan affair in Europe, and Germany was going right into the fight. But in Berlin the capital of Germany, there was a gathering of a hundred thousand people who protested against having the German soldiers go against their fellowmen without knowing something about it. Let me illustrate the idea by referring to pictures which I saw in the Literary Digest of last December. On one page a poor soldier was represented lying on the ground while over him another was threatening him with his bayonet. The poor soldier on the ground, looking up says: 'You are a brother of mine; what harm have I done you that you wish to kill me? And the other answers: I know you have done no harm.' 'Why, then, do you wish to kill me?' 'I do not know; I have been ordered to do it.' Another picture represented labour as a giant with his arms folded, and beside him a little, wee fellow representing the crowned heads of Europe, and under the picture the question, 'Suppose he will not go?' That illustrates how it is that we are to have peace; for the labour men of these countries have made up their minds that before they go to war—and they are willing to defend their rights and their country—they want to know what they are fighting for. The forty-one members of the House of Commons of Great Britain have brought about the same state of affairs which we now see in England. The one hundred and ten labour members in the legislature of Germany, have done the same. Coming wars are supposed to be in the industrial as well as on the economic fields. If we devoted one-half, or even one-quarter of the time now given to discussing war to making war on the economic and industrial evils, we could do a great good for mankind and for our country.

It has been said here that Great Britain had not men enough to man her warships, but no reason has been given why they had difficulty in getting men. The difficulty in getting men is exactly what I have stated. You can get men to man your warships in order to keep peace and order. You can get good men for your ships in this country, as many as you like, but not for twenty-eight cents a day. They will go on the ships on one condition, and that is to maintain order. At the same time, if they are supposed to be sent anywhere they want to know why they are sent?

One thing I wish specially to refer to is what has been said about the necessity of waiting twenty-five or fifty years for work to be done. This has been weighing on my mind ever since we heard about it in this House. I have travelled in a good many parts of this country, and also in the United States, and, though I have found very few workmen as good as Canadians, I have found none better. I would not like to say that it was an insult to the workingmen of this country to speak as some hon. gentlemen have spoken in this House. But, at the same time, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he would be willing to go to the city of Halifax and say to the 28,795 employees in the 1,480 industries in Nova Scotia that they are not competent to do the work that they are called upon to do in the old and new industries going up there. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) whether he would be willing to go to St. John and tell the 24,775 employees in the 1,158 different industries in that province of New Brunswick that they are not competent to administer the business and produce the very best kind of goods that can be produced. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), if he were in the House, if he would be willing to go into his own riding, or the adjoining riding in Montreal, and tell the employees of some of the works in that city that they are incompetent to roll plate, to do the rivetting and the other work in connection with the construction of ships. I would like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) if he would be willing to go into his own riding and tell the working people of the great textile industries, the Canada Car Works and many others, that they are not competent, that they are not intelligent enough for their work, but must send across the water for men competent enough to carry on the work in their own industries. I would ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) if he were here if he would be willing to go to Quebec and tell the men of the industries there that they have not intelligence enough for their work. I refer especially to the city of Quebec, for that is exactly where the old shipyards used to be in days gone by, where the very best wooden ships in the world were built. And to-day in the different shipyards of the country, they are sending to Quebec every now and again to find whether possibly there may not be a man or two idle who will take part in the building of wooden vessels. I would ask the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) if he is willing to go to Ste. Thérèse, in his riding, and tell the proprietors of the furniture factories in that little town that they are not competent enough or sufficiently intelligent to do the work they are called upon to do? I would ask the ministers from the province of Quebec if they are willing to state that 158,207 employees in 6,584 different industries in that province should be classified as incompetent? Would they be willing to tell the Dominion Bridge people that they are not capable of constructing large iron works and carrying out important engineering projects; that they were not competent to build the Victoria bridge, the second largest structure of its kind in the world, and one of the finest pieces of engineering of its kind in existence; that they were not competent to build the Canadian Pacific railway bridge at Lachine? Does the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) believe that the persons engaged in the shoe industry at St. Hyacinthe are incompetent and incapable of carrying on the business connected with that important industry? Would the Minister of Railways and Canals be willing to state that 238,817 employees connected with 8,001 industries of the province of Ontario are not fitted for the work in which they are engaged, and for the work which would be involved in the carrying out of a proper policy in regard to the important matter now under discussion? Surely the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) is not willing to say that the Kingston locomotive works are unable to supply the engines necessary for the construction of big ships? What does the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) think of the Collingwood shipyards, and will he state that they are not properly carrying out the work in which they are engaged? Does the member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) consider that the great steel works in his constituency cannot produce the steel necessary for the construction of ships for a Canadian navy? The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), who often speaks in favour of the lobouring man, would surely not attribute incompetency to the workingman in the plough works of his city. I do not wish to forget the Minister of Finance in this argument, and I would remind him that when the Dominion Iron and Steel Company issued its second allotment of bonds for $1,000,000, they were all taken up by the Bank of Montreal, and they still remain in the vaults of that bank. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company has ordered and received all the machinery necessary to roll plates of all kinds for all classes of cruisers, the expenditure for which was decided upon by the directors and accepted by that great financial power of the country, the Montreal Bank. Will the Finance Minister say by his vote that the directors of this steel corporation and of the Bank of Montreal were altogether wrong when they relied on the skill of their workingmen and employees? I am firm in the conviction that the workingmen of this country are able in a short time to do the work connected with a Canadian navy for Canada. In this connection I might mention the fact that the number of industries in Canada in 1905 was 15,796, with a capital of $846,585,023, the number of men employed being 392,530, who received a total salary of $165,100,011. The productive value of these industries was $718,352,603. In 1910, after a lapse of only five years, there were 19,218 industries, an increase of 3,522, with a capital of $1,247,583,605, an increase of $400,998,586—almost five millions a year. There were employed 515,203 workmen—an increase of 122,673—who were paid a total salary of $241,008,416, an increase of $75,908,405. The productive value of these industries in 1910 was $1,165,975,639, an increase of $447,623,036. These figures, to my mind, strongly indicate the fact that the workingmen of this country, as employed in the different industries, are capable of undertaking and successfully carrying out any work pertaining to the construction of ships in Canada. We are asked to send $35,000,000 to Great Britain, and at the same time the great Manufacturers' Association advertise throughout the old country for workmen, they say to mechanics, 'Come to Canada, things are prosperous, you can make a good living, there is lots of employment.' On the other hand, the Government say, 'Never mind, we will send $35,000,000 across the water to keep you home, we do not want you here. It sounds that way to me. If we are advertising for mechanics on the other side of the water let us keep that money right here and furnish them work when they come, in building the necessary ships. I claim also that the shipbuilding industry must absolutely be established here. If there is a country in the world that should have a good shipbuilding industry it is Canada. It has been said again and again that we have all the material necessary to construct ships; it has also been stated that seventy-five per cent of the cost of these ships is paid out in wages. I shall not go into detail of the wages paid as it would take too long. To show that this contribution is not the last but the first I would refer to the speech of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee). It is evident from his reading of the resolution of 1909 that it was exactly the same resolution that was to apply in the different dominions. They have also in other dominions their majors and their colonels, they also have great supplies of materials. Only on January 25 I read in the London Times the following:

In the Union House of Assembly to-day Major Seiburn gave notice that he would move on February 4th a resolution that the Union should make an annual contribution to the Imperial navy based upon a percentage of the total revenue of South Africa and varying yearly in accordance with the fluctuation of the exchequer.

Mr. Hagga- (Labour) intimated that he would move on January 28 a resolution deploring the enormous waste of capital on naval amendments and expresing the opinion that should the Government decide to increase the naval contribution such increase should be raised by a special tax and not by the general revenue.

I would not ask this House to impose a special tax for the $35,000,000, but I strongly believe that the majority of the people of Canada, and a good big majority at that, would like to be consulted on this important question. I believe if the electors of Canada were consulted in the proper time the great majority of them would pronounce against the sending of our money to Great Britain to have the ships built there. As between the two policies now before the House, if one must be adopted I would very much prefer to adopt the second one, but surely common sense teaches every sound thinking workingman in the country that they would rather have the work done here at home than to send the money to let other people do the work for them. I would, therefore, move, in amendment to the amendment:

That the following words be added at the end thereof:—'and the consent of Parliament should not be given to this resolution until it has been submitted to and received the approval of the electors.'

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South): I rise to make a few observations from a sense of duty to the people who sent me to represent them in this House. This question is, to my mind, the most important that has engaged the attention of Parliament since Confederation. In addition to being an important question it is a new departure. The Canadian people are asked to make a new departure from the well-beaten paths, which they have been taught to tread since the days when we were given to understand that we have all the blessings and rights of responsible government. This is not, of course, a new question in this Parliament. It was discussed in 1908 as well as in 1909 and 1910. It took formal and definite shape in 1909 by a resolution which passed the Canadian Parliament unanimously. Although that resolution has been read more than once during this debate I shall read it again in order to place it upon 'Hansard.' It was as follows:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service—in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

To me, a young member of this House, it does seem passing strange that hon. gentlemen like the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who supported that resolution of 1909 with all their ability and force of eloquence at their command, should, two short years afterwards, be found contending for a policy entirely different, and in so doing turning the greatest political somersault in the history of political acrobatism. I would like to know what has caused these gentlemen to so readily change their views. Has anything occurred within the Empire or without the Empire to make the good policy of two years ago a bad policy to-day. In 1909 the Empire was supposed to be in peril, and Germany was making such rapid strides in naval construction, that many held the view, honestly no doubt, that the ultimate design was the conquest of England. The newspapers were full of scare headlines announcing the emergency, but strange to say in that crisis the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce supported a resolution which had in view the building of a Canadian navy as a policy sufficient to meet that emergency. Again I ask, what has since occurred to cause these hon. gentlemen to take such a political somersault. Is there a greater scare in 1912-1913 than there was in 1909; is there a greater emergency? Sir, I contend that there is absolutely not a shade of reason for saying that any emergency exists to-day. I have given this subject considerable attention. I have read the speeches delivered in this House in 1909; I have listened to the speeches delivered by these hon. gentlemen this year, and I fail to see wherein they have given any cogent reason for this sudden reversal of policy. If the only adequate way to meet the supposed existing emergency is a contribution of $35,000,000 to the treasury of the Empire, how does it come that the genuine emergency which existed in 1909 could be met by the building of a Canadian navy. Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that there is no emergency existing now, and even if an emergency did exist, I hold that the policy announced by the Prime Minister is not adequate to provide against it. If the British Empire is threatened by Germany or by a combination of European powers, can any sane man think that because Canada sends $35,000,000 to the Imperial treasury, the enemies of England are going to call off their dogs of war? Thank Heaven no real emergency exists, and judging by the outlook of European affairs at the present time, it will be many and many a long year before England is confronted by any emergency. It is true that the Prime Minister in presenting his proposal to Parliament did not argue very strenuously that there was an emergency, and it is also true that he gave few reasons in explanation of his change of mind on Canada's naval policy. There is nothing in the Admiralty memorandum which he submitted to show that an emergency exists, and so we have to look elsewhere for an explanation of the latest Conservative policy. It is well to remember that in the last days of last session of Parliament, the Minister of Marine, in reply to a question as to what the intentions of the Government were with regard to the Laurier Naval Service Bill, answered: we intend to repeal it. The fact is that the Quebec Nationalists insisted on the repeal of the Naval Service Bill, in order to save their faces. Canada can only assist the Empire by building her own navy or by sending contributions to the Imperial navy, and forced by the Nationalists to abandon the Naval Service Act which provided for the building of a Canadian navy, nothing remained for the Conservatives but to send a cash contribution; a thing which was vehemently and vigourously condemned in 1909 and 1910 by the Prime Minister and by his lieutenant the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The ministers went to England after having made the public announcement that the Laurier naval policy was to be repealed. I presume that they told the Admiralty this fact. What was there left but that the question should be put to the Admiralty as to what they thought best to do? What answer could the Admiralty give? Could they tell the right hon. Prime Minister that the best policy would be to build a Canadian navy? They could not. It was a matter of publicity on this side of the water that the Canadian Government had no such intention. They could give only one answer and that answer was: Give us a cash contribution and we will build the ships.

It has been argued by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that there is a real emergency. My hon. friend from Queens and Sunbury (Mr. McLean) who, it is said has broken with his party on this question, has told us that we should believe that the Premier has some secret information to the effect that there is some real emergency and that this information is of such a secret character that it could not be divulged to the public Well, Sir, where would the right hon. the Prime Minister get such information? He certainly would get it from the responsible ministers of the Crown in Great Britain; he certainly would get it from such men as Mr. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, and he would probably get it from the Premier of Great Britain. These are the men who hold the state secrets of Great Britain. If either of those gentlemen, or any responsible member of the British Government, gave the right hon. leader of the Government of this country reason to believe—and these reasons were to be held secret—that there was a real emergency, then I say that these hon. gentlemen are not fair to themselves as responsible Ministers of the Crown, that they are not fair to the people of Great Britain or of the British Empire, because all their public utterances on this question since 1909 down to this year of grace 1913 would go to show that they have had every confidence that the navy of Great Britain is at present and will be as it will be constituted in a few years, perfectly capable of defending Great Britain against any and all enemies who may threaten her. You need not depend on my word for this. I have the utterances of some of these British statesmen whom I have mentioned and which have already been read to this House, but a good story can never die of age nor of frequent telling. I wish the House to bear with me while I read to show that there is no reason in the world why we should think that there is any justification for panic, for alarm, or for thinking that the British Empire is threatened with any sort of naval or other emergency. On July 10 last, Sir Edward Grey, Foreign Secretary, speaking in the House of Commons regarding England's foreign relations, said:

Our relations with the German Government at the present moment are excellent. (Cheers.) We are perfectly frank with each other about all questions of mutual interest, and I believe that when questions come up, whether they be, for instance, in connection with our respective interests in South Africa, or whether they be in connection eventually with the Baghdad railway, both Governments are convinced that their mutual interests can be perfectly reconciled.

Speaking in the House of Commons, July 25, 1912, just a year ago and about the time that three or four members of this Government went to England seeking an emergency, Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister of Great Britain declared that:

Our relations with the great German Empire are, I am glad to say, at this moment—and I feel sure are likely to remain—relations of amity and goodwill. (Cheers.) My noble friend, Lord Haldane, the present Lord Chancellor, paid a visit to Berlin early in the year. He entered upon conversations and an interchange of views there which have been continued since in a spirit of perfect frankness and friendship, both on one side or the other.

That is as far as the friendship or enmity, if you like, between England and Germany, is concerned. In so far as Great Britain being able to take care of herself is concerned, on July 2, the eve of the arrival of the Canadian Ministers in London, there was a debate in the House of Lords upon the naval position in the Mediterranean, and, speaking officially on this occasion on behalf of the Government, Lord Crewe said:

So far as our existing position in any part of the world is concerned, we are not afraid to declare that we consider the security of the country is achieved.

And proceeding to explain the basis of this emphatic declaration, Lord Crewe added:

Taking March 31 of this year, we find that we have sixteen battleships and battle cruisers of the dreadnought type, as against fifteen possessed by all the other powers in European waters. Next year we shall have twenty-four ships of this type as against twenty-one possessed by all the other naval powers in Europe. These battleships represent a distinct margin over the two-power standard.

I could go on citing the statements of other ministers of the Crown to the effect that England is well able to protect herself, that there is no panic, no alarm, no emergency. I take the ground that if there is an emergency at the present time, the remedy proposed by the Government is not an adequate one. We send $35,000,000 to the Old Country to be constructed into battleships. These battleships will be built three years hence. At the present time one of the greatest difficulties which the Admiralty have to contend with is not connected with the building of ships, is not in getting the money to build the ships but it is in connection with the manning of these ships. At the present time the shipyards of England are busy, they are overworked, building not only dreadnoughts, not only cruisers, but merchantmen to carry the commerce of England. How is this contribution of $35,000,000 going to overcome any emergency if one exists? Well, an answer has been given; the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) told us in this debate that it was going to have a moral effect inasmuch as this contribution of $35,000,000 would dissipate all this war talk in Europe. They would point to Canada and say: Oh, we must not go to war, because Canada has contributed $35,000,000 to the treasury of Great Britain; borrowed it from millionaires in England and handed it back to the treasury. That was the moral effect. In my humble estimation, as a young Canadian, the moral effect would be greater if this Government and this Parliament would undertake to build warships, and construct docks and shipyards in this country for the construction of ships. If ever the time comes when there is a real emergency, when the shipyards of England will be full to overflowing, and when they will be working overtime and cannot give attention to the building of the warships which would be required, if we had both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coasts large shipyards where dreadnoughts and other ships of war could be built, it would be of a greater moral support at the present time and also a greater material support in the future than any contribution scheme of $35,000,000 or more would be.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated in his speech that we owe a great deal to the British Empire, that Great Britain has spent thousands upon thousands of dollars, yea millions upon millions of dollars, in years past for the defence both naval and otherwise of Canada. He pointed out that fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt were maintained for years by the British Government, and we contributed not a cent. He gives this as an instance why at the present time we should pay $35,000,000 to the treasury of Great Britain. We on this side of the House admit quite as freely as hon. members opposite that we owe a great debt to Great Britain; but we go further and say that we owe a greater debt to Great Britain than the one indicated by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The debt he indicated took the shape only of money; but we owe a debt of gratitude to Great Britain, which we could never pay if we gave them the revenues of Canada for a hundred years to come, because they have given us in this country that excellent British institution, responsible government, that boon of responsible government, which I say is at least threatened to be destroyed by the present idea of sending $35,000,000 to be spent across the water without the people of Canada having any say as to how it is to be spent. We admit we owe this debt of gratitude; but I would rather say, if this $35,000,000 is going to pay this debt of gratitude, as was indicated by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that it is rather a poor payment, because, when we needed it, Great Britain contributed to the peace and safety of Canada not by money alone, but by men. I think, if this is going to be a payment, that we should also contribute men. The Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) tells us: Oh, no, we must not contribute men; why should we contribute men, when we can get men for twenty-eight cents a day to join the British navy, whereas it would cost, forsooth, $10? No, Mr. Speaker, but fifty cents a day on this side of the water. Well, that is a serious matter. It is a serious thing for a responsible minister in this country to give as his greatest argument why we should not contribute Canadians, brave as the bravest of the English, that, forsooth, we can get men for twenty-eight cents a day in the Old Country, and we would have to pay fifty cents a day if we got good young Canadians. I rather think we would have to pay them more. It does not come with very good grace from a gentleman, who is receiving in the vicinity I should say of $35 a day, to complain that fifty cents a day would be too much to pay the people who, acting in the naval service of this country, would be defenders of Canada and of the Empire. That is the imperialism, the high-toned imperialism, which comes from hon. members of the Government. If it came from some humble individual like myself, it would not be so bad; but coming from a man who is supposed to look at these questions in a broad and national aspect, I think, as the Irish woman said, it is very small potatoes.

Comparing the proposals of the Government and the proposals as outlined by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, to the mind of a Canadian there can be no doubt as between a cash contribution of $35,000,000 or a Canadian navy built, maintained and manned by this country. I think that a very fair idea may be had from the English press in regard to this matter. I am going to read extracts from two of the most prominent papers in Great Britain on this question. Mr. W. H. Massingham, editor of The Nation, writing in the London Daily News and Leader on the subject of Canada's participation in naval defence and the manner of that participation as advocated by the Borden Government, says:

> We are in no danger from Germany, we never have been, we never shall be. We can always hold our own. If the colonies come into a free demonstration of naval sympathy, and even of material support, that is very fine and very encouraging, and it will be duly noted and weighed in the chancelleries. But do not let us have an element of falsity, of exaggeration, in this important episode in our Imperial life.
> For, after all, the offer itself is not without its great peril to Canada, to ourselves, to the Imperial connection. Let us think of it as we will—it is a form of tribute. Well, that was not the original idea of Canada. It is that Imperialist form which commends itself to our Imperialist and Conservative Ministers. The Liberal idea was the exact opposite —a national development of sea power in close harmony with our own, but with a local base and control. Surely this was more consonant with our own revolution in sea strategy. We have decided to concentrate in the North sea, thinking that there we are nearest to the point of danger, or rivalry or what you will. Then it is an obvious development of that policy to leave the distant stations and strongholds of the Empire to the younger communities. Such a plan is quite as significant a relief to the Imperial navy as that proposed by Mr. Borden, and morally it has a still greater import. But now the Mother Country has almost asked for a colonial benevolence. The response is singularly prompt and ungrudging. But is the notion wise? Does it not contain grave possibilities of friction in the future?

Mr. F. W. Hirst, editor of the London Economist, one of the greatest financial journals in the world, in dealing with what he calls 'Naval Imperialism,' says with reference to Mr. Borden's proposals:

> The Canadian offer of three super-dreadnoughts goes to show that Mr. Borden's Gov- ernment is not very anxious to bring about a protectionist and preferential tariff in England. Such a tariff would end in the taxation of many Canadian imports which now come in free. On the other hand, the stipulaitons accompanying the offer are not liked by the Liberal press here. In the first place a loan of seven millions will be a severe strain on the London capital market, which (as your municipal borrowers are now learning) is already overburdened. Money, in fact, is getting dearer and dearer. Secondly, Mr. Borden's stipulation that the gift is not to relieve our naval programme makes it positively onerous, seeing that the cost of maintenance is to fall on the home taxpayer. From our standpoint the Laurier proposals were infinitely preferable to those of Mr. Borden. The gift of a motor car to a person who is already spending more than he can afford is generous, but embarrassing, if no provision is made by the donor for the cost of maintaining it.

Oh, but, says my hon. friend from Sunbury and Queens, we Canadians should be in the fighting line. I wish to ask him, I wish to ask other hon. members of this House who say that we are going to be in the fighting line to consider this for a moment. Are Canadians going to be in the fighting line with this policy? I say, no. Three battleships may be in the fighting line but not a Canadian. That is the kind of fighter my hon. friend from Sunbury and Queens is. He would send empty hulks, but not a Canadian aboard. And he would tell Parliament and this country that the reason he has broken with his party on this question is that he wants to be in the fighting line. That is about all the fighting these great imperialists are willing to do. I would rather my hon. friend would endeavour to give this House some better reason why he has broken with his party on this question. He says he has been a Liberal for thirty-five years. Well, Sir, he is not a Liberal of the school I was brought up in, or he would not be in favour of a contribution of $35,000,000 to the Imperial treasury as against the building up of a Canadian navy in this country with all the industries that would follow in its wake. I come from a constituency that is very much interested in this naval defence. I may be told that they are interested in it because they are selfish. But we have been told also that the idea of the Liberals in this country fighting for a Canadian navy is a selfish one, that it is a matter of commerce. Well, I take the stand, and take it openly—and I have no authority outside my own choice for taking it—that if two policies are offered side by side, each, in my estimation of equal benefit to the Empire, but one inestimably more beneficial to Canada than the other, my choice is easily made. I have the right to ask concerning this policy: Is it in the interest of the commerce of this country that we should spend $35,000,000 to the treasury of Great Britain? Now, Sir, we are not the only people to take this stand. The right hon. leader of the Government, in 1910, was not satisfied with denouncing this idea of sending contributions on the floor of this Parliament, but he went down to the city of Halifax, and, speaking there in October, I think it was, 1910, he made use of the following language:

> One governing principle at least should control—that out of our own material, by our own labour and by the constructive skill of our own people, all necessary provision for our naval defence should be made, so far as may be reasonably possible. To-day should be Nova Scotia's opportunity in that line. Providence has endowed this province with the material, with the men—— > —and with the maritime situation which are essential not only for the development of a scheme of naval defence and protection, but for the resuscitation of that ship-building industry which once made Nova Scotia so famous throughout the world.

Mark that, Mr. Speaker, with the men.

That was the language and those the sentiments of the right hon. Prime Minister of this country less than one year before the election of September 21, 1911. And I take it, Sir, that the right hon. gentleman, when he went down to the city of Halifax, realized that if he had propounded any other policy before the people of Halifax, his seat might have been in danger, he would run the risk of the same defeat that overtook his colleague in September, 1911. He told the people of his own constituency in the city and county of Halifax, that he was in favour of a Canadian navy, that we had the material, the men, the maritime situation, for the building of ships; and he led these people to believe, right up to September 21, 1911, that that was his policy. I have no doubt, and no man who knows the situation in the city of Halifax can have any doubt, that the right hon. gentleman, got many, many votes in that constituency for propounding that policy. He did not change his mind, or did not tell the people of his constituency or of Canada that he had changed his mind up to the election of 1911. Now, he has brought down in this House a new policy, an altogether different policy; and does he not think that it is due to his constituents and to the people of Canada as a whole who misunderstood him—if you will—his sentiments on this question up to September, 1911, to ask them if they are in favour of this policy which he said he was in favour of, or whether they prefer the policy he has propounded at the present time. I take the ground that he was elected on an altogether different policy from that which he is now propounding, and that he at least should appeal to the people of his constituency to see if they will still follow him in the new policy he has brought forward. I make the same general observation as to the country at large. I say—and I am speaking for myself alone in this—that on a great question like this one that will undoubtedly change the government of this country, one that will change our sentiments, a new line, a new road, to be travelled, the people of Canada should be asked how they view the matter. I take that ground and take it sincerely; and I believe that if the people of Canada to-day were asked as Canadians, as Britishers, if you will, what they think about the proposal of the Government as distinguished from the proposal of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, they would vote in great majority for the proposals which were laid down in this House by the right hon. leader of this Government in 1909, and followed up by his amendment to the motion which is now under discussion.

They tell us that we cannot build ships. They tell us that it will take from twenty-five to fifty years to get ships in course of construction in this country. I was walking into the library the other day when I noticed a bronze slab in the wall at the entrance. I read the inscription on that slab, and found it to be as follows:

In honour of the man by whose enterprise and skill the Royal William, the first vessel to cross the Atlantic by steam power, was wholly constructed in Canada and navigated to England in 1833.

After reading that inscription, this thought came to my mind: is there less enterprise, courage and skill in the Canadian people to-day than there was in 1833, when they launched the first ship that crossed the Atlantic by steam? I am convinced that an even greater degree of courage, enterprise and skill exists in the Canadian people to-day than ever before, and if at that time they showed their enterprise in building the first ship to cross the Atlantic by steam, surely they have the skill and the industry to-day to build battleships.

I may say that in 1731, over 100 years previous to the date I have mentioned, on the banks of the St. Lawrence, in the province of Quebec, the people were constructing warships, not for Canada, but for France, and at that time these men-of-war, as they were then called, were recognized as the best in the French navy. And yet we are told that we of this century, with our modern ideas, are unable to build Canadian ships! The right hon. leader of the Government did not think so in 1910, and, I am sure, does not think so to-day; if he does, he is not a Canadian, and does not know the Canadian people. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) did not think so in 1909, and does not think so to-day. I wish to read from a speech delivered in this House by the hon. member for North Simcoe in 1909, which appears in 'Hansard' of that year at page 3544. We have not heard from this hon. gentleman in regard to this question; will he follow the example of his right hon. leader, and tell us it would take twenty-five or fifty years to construct a navy in this country, notwithstanding the remarks he made in this House on the resolution of 1909? This is what he said:

Now, carrying out the idea first involved in naval defence for Canada, I do not see any reason why we should not immediately institute some system of naval defence along the lines of torpedo boats, or torpedo destroyers, and destroyer cruisers, which would be invaluable to us in case of war. A great many members suggest or imply that it would be impossible for us to build these at home.

They not only suggest or imply the same thing to-day, but also that it would take thirty-five or fifty years to build the ships. He continues:

Now, I do not wish to be considered local in any way; I have always taken a national or Canadian view of every subject; nevertheless, I may be permitted to say that within the riding which I have the honour to represent there is a shipyard wherein they have launched ships over 500 feet in length, which is said to be the length of the dreadnought. They have built ships, and they laid down the keel of one ship on the 26th June last——

That would be June 1908.

—and launched her on the 1st November, all complete, 375 feet long, 7,000 horse-power, 22-knot ship, with complete equipment, in that short time. If it was necessary for this Government to ask them to supply four speedy cruisers 250 feet long, which would go through the canal, with a speed of 26 knots, I can assure you that I have it on the word of the men who design these ships, and have built twenty-two steel ships in the last four years, that it would be only a small matter for them to assemble the material, provide four ships and have them in the water by the 1st October. The dock they use is 550 feet long, and would accommodate the dreadnought.

No twenty-five years there! No half century there! The hon. member for North Simcoe realizes that Canadians can do things as expeditiously as a Britisher who happens to be born in the isles across the sea. It will be noted that the dock used in connection with the shipyards referred to was 550 feet long, and would accommodate a dreadnought. That is what can be done in our country thousands of miles from the sea! What could we accomplish in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or British Columbia, when they can build dreadnoughts in the woods of Ontario? He stated further:

I regret very much that as Canadians we have not fostered more of this spirit of shipbuilding on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We are now manufacturing steel, the best steel in the world. We have two large steel plants. The steel plant at Sydney is a greater plant than any they have in Great Britain, with larger and better furnaces, and in every respect a greater and larger steel plant. They have had there, for four or five years,——

I would particularly commend this to the attention of the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens.

—a plate-rolling plant to roll plates for ships, which they have housed away and never placed on the foundation, because nothing has been done to encourage this most important industry. I feel that we should seriously, as a House of Commons, consider the advisability of adopting some system whereby ship-building would be encouraged in the maritime provinces, and also on the St. Lawrence and on the Pacific coast.

The hon. gentleman evidently has some knowledge of Canadian enterprises and Canadian skill. This country has spent upwards of $20,000,000 in fostering and developing the steel industry. This money has not been paid out of the treasury of Canada, and after these steps have been taken to ensure the development of the industry, the Canadian Government sends this work over to the shipbuilders across the Atlantic, notwithstanding the fact that the industries on this side, on which this vast sum was spent, were obliged to house their machinery for rolling plates because there was no work for them to do. Is that the spirit that should animate young Canadians? As a young Canadian I resent it, and I think I know the public sentiment in Nova Scotia. Down there they will resent this idea of turning over $35,000,000 to the British treasury and allowing the great steel industries at Sydney to starve for want of a market.

Mr. STANFIELD: The Dominion Steel Company have more work than they can do.

Mr. CARROLL: They have not more than they can do; The Steel Company in Sydney are clamouring for more contracts. They have material there, as was pointed out by the hon. member for North Simcoe in 1909, that is wasting for want of work. If they had the contracts they could build bigger. We can build ships in Canada surely when Japan, Brazil, Spain and all those countries are building ships, building navies in their own dockyards. Think of it for a moment. The hon. members for British Columbia will tell us that the Japanese are not fit citizens to enter this country, that they are an inferior race and should be debarred and in the same breath they will tell us, at least by their silence which shows acquiescence in the proposition, that we are not able to build battleships although these same people who are not fit to associate with Canadians are able to do so, and so are better, more enterprising, more skilled than ourselves. They started iron ship-building in England in 1877. Since then they have built up an industry that is unequalled and is likely to remain unequalled in the annals of ship-building and commerce. Austria-Hungary has twenty-two armoured ships all built since 1885. It does not take them twenty-five years or half a century to at least start the nucleus of a navy. China, Italy and Japan are all in the same category. What has been the record of Japan?

In 1894 when Japan went to war with China she had not a single battleship. Ten years later, in 1904, when Japan went to war with Russia, she had six battleships, eight armoured cruisers, 44 other cruisers, 19 destroyers and 80 torpedo boats, with a total displacement of 283,742 tons. Four years later, in 1909, Japan had 13 battleships, 12 armoured cruisers, 47 other cruisers, and coast defence vessels, 55 destroyers and 77 torpedo boats, 204 war vessels with a total displacement of 515,082 tons, with all the necessary dock and shipyard facilities for building and repairing.

It is true that at the start some of these ships were built in England but the ones built since 1904 have without any exception all been built with Japanese labour, with Japanese money in their own shipyards and by their own people. What Japan can do, what China can do, surely we as Canadians can do. There can be no doubt about that. Still they say we want to be on the fighting line; they do not believe in building up Canadian industries. During the election of 1911 the slogan was 'Canada for the Canadians.' Why not Canada for the Canadians at the present time? Are not the Canadians as good to-day as they were in 1911, and if it was Canada for the Canadians in 1911 it should be Canada for the Canadians on this great question. I have pointed out that ships sent over to England without men are of not very much assistance to Great Britain. I omitted to refer to an extract which I took from a publication issued by the Imperial Maritime League in December, 1912. The members of this league banquetted the Canadian ministers when they were over in London and this is taken from a book published by them as late as December, 1912.

Moreover, a fleet does not consist of dreadnoughts alone any more than a football team consists solely of backs;—and apart from the question of dreadnoughts, we are gravely deficient in cruisers, in destroyers, in reserve stores, in men, and in dockyards on our east coast. And curiously enough—reverting to Canada—only within the past few days recruiting for the Canadian navy is stated to have been indefinitely postponed. Men (as we shall find stated hereafter on page 141) take five years to be made thoroughly efficient. For nearly seven years past we have been gravely undermanned. Ships without men are useless. Seamen must be enrolled in large numbers at once—if the new ships, suggested by Canada, Malay, and (if rumour be true) the Indian princes are not to be as useless as they will certainly be expensive.

That is the view of the Imperial Maritime League of England, that these ships without men will be as useless as they are expensive.

We are told that the policy propounded by the leader of the Opposition is a separatist policy, that it will lead to Canada becoming separated from the British Empire. There was no separatist proposition in that in 1909 when it was endorsed by the very men who are to-day cursing it. A separatist navy? And there was an intimation from the other side that the right hon. gentleman who propounds this proposition of building a Canadian navy of our own materials by our own men and by our own skill is a disloyal subject.

For the past two years Conservative newspapers and Conservative speakers throughout the country have charged that the great cheiftain of the Liberal party and his followers are not loyal to the British Empire. Scan the pages of the political history of Canada since Confederation and point out if you can any legislation placed on our statute books tending towards the unity of the Empire, which would lead anyone to believe that the Conservative party is a truer friend of the Empire than is the Liberal party of Canada. Look at a few of the things the Liberals of Canada have done for the Empire: they introduced Imperial penny-postage which though a small thing in itself helped in some measure towards Empire unity. Under the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he controlled the destinies of Canada, the Liberals took over the maintenance of the fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt and thus relieved the Motherland from responsibility and expense. It was a Liberal Government which introduced the British preference allowing British goods to come into this country at a preferential rate and we know that the Liberals of Canada asked nothing from the Motherland in return for that boon. And Sir, what was the course taken by the Liberals of Canada during the South African war when a real emergency confronted the Empire. At that time the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who to-day is slandered by the Conservative press as disloyal to the Empire, from his place in Parliament exhorted the people of Canada to send the best of their blood and brawn to the veldts of South Africa in defence of the Empire. We know Sir, that our fellow countrymen fought side by side with the trained soldiers of Great Britain with credit to themselves and glory to Canada. These are but a few of the things which the Liberals of Canada have done for the Empire, and yet in face of that the slander is hurled at us now that the naval policy we have propounded is a separatist policy. Well, Sir, actions speak louder than words, and the student of political history for the last fifty years in Canada will have no trouble in ascertaining how in many ways the Liberals of Canada have shown their loyalty and devotion to the Empire.

I wish to say in conclusion that in my humble opinion the policy of a direct money contribution of $35,000,000 is not only bad in principle and useless as a measure of assistance to the Mother Country, but is likely to be positively harmful. Canada owes the duty to the Empire and to herself to contribute to the naval defence of the Empire, and the only rational and effective way in which Canada can do that is by carrying into effect the policy of a Canadian navy propounded by the revered leader of the Liberal party. There is no alternative worthy of a self-respecting people, and surely there is no hon. gentleman in this House and no class of people in this country who will say that the Canadians of the present day are not a self-respecting people.

On motion of Mr. Marcile (Bagot), the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Express statistics of the Dominion of Canada for the year ended June 30, 1912. —Mr. Cochrane.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE.

On motion of Mr. Borden, the following members were added to the Select Standing Committee on Private Bills: Messrs. Broder, Marshall, Turiff and Thomson (Qu'Appelle).

LENGTHY ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to refer to a matter which was brought to the attention of the House yesterday and to make an explanation. It is with regard to the printing of answers to questions in 'Hansard.' When I spoke of it first I had reference to the printing of answers separately. Therefore I said that my understanding was that it was not the practice to have them printed unless recommended by the Printing Committee. I was referring to the printing of these answers as separate returns or sessional papers, when it is the practice to send a copy to the member asking the question. I applied to the Clerk of the House for information as to why these answers were not printed in 'Hansard,' as I understood that the rule required they should be printed. He drew my attention to the fact that it would be almost impossible to print some of them in 'Hansard,' as they were so voluminous and so largely made up of figures. To print them in 'Hansard' would require a much larger staff at the Printing Bureau and might prevent 'Hansard' from being issued on time. I produce to the House a number of these answers. It will be observed that they are of great length and are in the form of elaborate tables that would involve difficult typesetting, and would either have to be inserted in 'Hansard' as maps or be cut down to the size of 'Hansard' page. This one would take up many pages and would require a long time to set. It relates to the tariffs of the British West Indies and extends over seven or eight pages of very large paper. I have here a number of others relating to tenders for the purchase of various articles for the Intercolonial railway, such as kindling wood, electric wiring, fencing, pine, cement, rubber goods, &c. Here is one with reference to dismissals on the Intercolonial.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is the list so long as that?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is is of considerable length. I have selected only a few of these answers to let the House see what it would mean if we insisted upon the rule being carried out inflexibly. It is for the House to decide what course shall be adopted.

Mr. BORDEN: I was not aware that the answers to questions were so voluminous or that the practice had been introduced of not printing them in full. What has been mentioned by Your Honour requires, of course, to be taken into consideration. It would seem to me that one remedy would be to have questions of that character stand as notices of motions for returns, and to limit the answers given to questions to those which can be comprised within moderate dimensions so that everything may appear on the pages of 'Hansard' as it used to do. However, I shall be very glad to discuss the question with my right hon. friend and see if we cannot arrive at some satisfactory solution.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You and I, Mr. Speaker, who are old members, remember very well the olden days when all answers were given fully in 'Hansard.' I am quite sure that the old system should still prevail. In the old days if a question elicited a long and elaborate answer, we would certainly dispense with the reading of long lists of figures by the minister making the reply. I think that we can approach the matter with common sense. Nobody expects that long lists of statistics shall be published in 'Hansard.' They are probably of no interest except to the member asking the question, and if he insists on their being printed subsequently, the matter may come before the House and he can speak to Your Honour. As a rule those on this side of the House who represent the minority will be quite satisfied if statistics are not included, but it will be for the member to say whether they should be printed subsequently.

Mr. GAUVREAU: What you have said may be all right, but in so far as the document in question is concerned, it does not apply; it is not a lengthy document, and there are not many figures in it. It could easily have been reduced in size so as to have been printed in 'Hansard.' We need that document, I need it, and I would like to have a decision of how we are going to have it printed and translated.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have always understood that where a member desired an answer in which he was interested, copies of it would be made and given to him through the branch where these answers are collected and kept. That, I understand, has been the custom in the past, and I do not see any reason why it could not be done at any time, even though translation might be required.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

EMPLOYMENT OF J. E. LAFORCE.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. Is Mr. J. E. Laforce in the employment of the Inland Revenue Department?
2. What are his duties?
3. What salary does he receive?

Mr. NANTEL:

1. Not at present. He was employed for six months from 10th July, 1912.
2. Special duties for the Minister of Inland Revenue and in addition, assisting in the Accountant's Branch.
3. He received while employed $100 per month.

ACCOUNT OF MR. A. SIMARD.

Mr. ACHIM:

1. What is the amount of the account of Mr. Arthur Simard, notary of Quebec, who was the returning officer at the election in Quebec East in September, 1911?

2. Has the account of Mr. Arthur Simard, as furnished, been paid him? If not, why has this account been reduced or not paid in in full?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. $1,276.67.

2. (a) No. (b) The returning officer has been allowed $197.30, payment being made in accordance with the tariff for acclamation elections. Items amounting to $859.50 have been disallowed, as the tariff for an acclamation election does not provide for fees of deputy returning officers, rent of polling booths, &c. A statement showing $219.87 in suspense, with questions relating to each item, was submitted to the returning officer on January 8, 1912, and he was asked to furnish the necessary explanations. To date no reply has been received.

SHEET HARBOUR—SHERBROOKE MAILS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What was the yearly amount payable by the Post Office Department to M. McGrath for carrying the mails between Sheet Harbour and Sherbrooke, N.S., under the contract that was cancelled by the present administration?

2. How much is now being paid by the department per year to J. S. Cameron for performing the same service?

3. Why was McGrath's contract cancelled?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Mr. McGrath was paid $3,334 per annum. His contract was not cancelled. It contained a clause providing that it could be terminated by giving three months' notice. This notice was given and tenders were invited. Mr. Cameron's tender at $3,293 per annum was the lowest and was consequently accepted.

2. Cameron is not now performing the same service. He did for a time at the rate of his tender which was $41 less than McGrath received for the same work. Some time after the contract was awarded, it became necessary to increase the mileage from 64 miles to 65.31/40 miles, and according to the rule always followed in such cases, the pay was increased proportionately. The amount paid is now $3,384 per annum.

APPOINTMENT OF A. B. CARSON.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Has Mr. A. B. Carson, of Kent county, New Brunswick, been appointed to any position under the direction or control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries? If so, to what position and when was he so appointed?

2. Has his position, if appointed, anything to do with a fishery advisory board, as a representative on such board of the counties of Northumberland, Kent and Westmorland, in New Brunswick?

2. What experience has the said A. B. Carson to qualify him for holding such a position, and what are his qualifications for such an office; what was his occupation, by whom was he employed at the time of his appointment, and who recommended his appointment?

4. Did he ever have any connection with the fisheries in Canada beyond retailing fish, such as herring and codfish, in a country store, and what salary is paid him?

5. Is the Government or the Department of Marine and Fisheries aware that the said A. B. Carson is said to be an American citizen?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes; a member of the Fisheries Advisory Board. He was offered the appointment by letter of January 28, and accepted it on February 1.

2. Yes.

3. The qualification asked for was an intimate knowledge of the branches of the fishing industry in the district represented. The department is not aware what occupation Mr. Carson was following at the time of his appointment, nor by whom he was employed. His appointment was recommended by Mr. F. J. Robidoux, M.P., who represented him to have the required qualifications.

4. The department is aware that he has been for a long period intimately associated with the developmnnt of the fisheries along the Gulf shore of New Brunswick, and is thoroughly conversant with all phases of the industry. No salary; but members will receive an allowance of ten dollars per day exclusive of Sundays when attending the meetings of the board committees thereof.

5. No.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY BRANCH LINES.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Has the Government yet reached any decision with regard to the policy of acquiring the branch lines of railway, or any of them, connecting with the Intercolonial railway, with a view to operate same as a part of the Government system of railways? If so, what conclusion has been reached and will it be announced to Parliament?

2. What is the total amount of expenditure involved in the acquisition of such railways, and in improvements of same?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The matter is still under discussion.

2. Answered by number one.

MOULIN BASINET POST OFFICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Why did the Post Office Department direct the closing of the post office at Moulin Basinet, in the parish of St. Jean de Matha?
2. Who asked for this closing?

Mr. PELLETIER: The post office inspector reported that this post office was of no public service whatever, and that, in fact, the only person to whom it was of any use was the postmaster himself. The Postmaster General directed, therefore, that the office should be closed.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY GAS PLANT.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Has the Intercolonial railway ceased to operate its producer gas plant at Moncton since the installation of the use of natural gas at the works there in connection with the railway?
2. How many men were employed in and about the operations of the producer gas plant?
3. Will these men be given other employment in connection with the railway works at Moncton?
4. If not, will they be dismissed? If so, will they be retired in the enjoyment of the privilege of the Provident Fund Act?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.
2. Four.
3. Yes.
4. Answered by No. 3.

REPATRIATED CANADIANS.

Mr. PAQUET:

1. What is the number of Canadians repatriated by Mr. Allan Laferrière, repatriation agent since the appointment up to this date?
2. Towards what part of the Dominion have these repatriated persons been directed?
3. What is the number of conferences held by Mr. Laferrière and under his patronage in New England since the 1st April, 1912?
4. Where were these conferences held?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. According to his own reports, Mr. Laferriere has issued sixty-eight certificates for railroad rates to families and individuals numbering all told 180 souls, men, women and children. Nineteen of these certificates, representing thirty souls, have thus far been reported by the railroad companies as having been presented and used.

2. The thirty persons who used their certificates were destined as follows: to Manitoba, five; Saskatchewan, nineteen; Alberta, six.

3. Fifteen.

4. At Manchester, East Manchester, North Manchester, West Manchester, McGregorville, Concord, Derry, Laconia, Nashua, Hooksett, Simcook and Franklin, all in the state of New Hampshire.

Mr. COCHRANE.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—RETURNS.

Mr. EMMERSON: I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the Government if any steps have been taken towards having members notified when returns are brought down? I think the suggestion came from the right hon. gentleman himself that it would be good practice to have members notified of returns by having sent to them a duplicate copy. A difficulty occurred recently with respect to a return in connection with the Department of Customs. I had tried to find the reference to it in the Votes and Proceedings, but it escaped my notice. Had I received notification I would not have been ignorant of the fact that the return had been brought down. The Prime Minister stated that it would be a good idea to have duplicates of these returns sent to members. I heartily concur in that suggestion.

Mr. BORDEN: With regard to the latter suggestion of my hon. friend it would be impractible because it would entail more or less delay. No return can be brought down except in so far is it has been prepared by typewriter.

Mr. EMMERSON: You might have carbon copies made.

Mr. BORDEN: The services of a large number of persons would be required to prepare these returns. In so far as notice is concerned, I understand it is the rule and practice of the officers of the House of Commons to send a notice to each member of the bringing down of any return for which he has moved. If it has not been done in the case of my hon. friend it is an oversight. I would be glad if he would give particulars of it to the Clerk in order that it might be brought to the attention of the persons who are responsible for giving the notice and who should have given it.

AGRICULTURE CREDITS.

Mr. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the question of bringing about a better and cheaper system of agriculture credits should receive the early attention of the Government.

He said: Inasmuch as the question of credits brings up one of the most conspicuous defects in our banking system, the House will readily agree that no more opportune time could be selected for the discussion of this resolution than the present, when a revision of the Bank Act is under the consideration of one of the important committees of the House. The terms of the resolution, whilst specific enough, simply go to the extent of calling upon the Administration to direct their energies towards what the resolution calls for and what I, as its mover, claim deserves careful consideration with a view to bringing about a reform. I am aware that this Government, as all governments, have continually pressed upon them matters of more or less importance, and in sufficient numbers to render it impossible to cope with all cases requiring substantial remedies. I agree that a considerable burden rests on the shoulders of a member of this House who takes upon himself to prove that there is any sphere of this country a sufficiently general evil to demand at the present time, when so much is under consideration, the attention of Parliament and of the Government. The matter concerns our entire financial system, and I address myself with some diffidence to the task of showing that, in the matter of affording credits to a large proportion of the agriculturists of Canada and to almost as large a proportion of the poorer classes in other spheres, there is a serious defect in the financial system, the remedy for which is made clear by recent experiments or by the recent ratified and confirmed experience not only of parts of this country but of practically all countries of the civilized world.

As I approach the subject permit me to say that in general I am not a critic, but an admirer of the Canadian financial system. What is the evil of which I speak? The defect that strikes most strongly and most injuriously the part of the country from which I come, and which after all, I believe, involves the chief criticism that can be levelled against the system, consists in this: We have in this country a system of branch banks, with centralized head offices. We all agree that the great advantage of that system is that it permits of the fluidity of capital and the mobilization of money in such a way that the wants of one part of the country can be served by the surplus of another and in such a way that what one has to spare can be used to supply what the other requires There is no question but that a system of branch banks has in it the possibility of that supreme advantage; but inasmuch as the control is necessarily in the head office, I believe the charge can be fairly made that that control can be exercised—not perhaps throughout a period of normal years, but exercised chiefly in time of stress and strain —to take advantage of the fluidity of capital thus obtained to curtail the resources of the smaller and more distant sections of the community in order to assist enterprises at the larger points. It will be manifest to the House, it is manifest to all, that the Canadian banking system at least admits of management with that end in view, and it would be almost too much to expect that those who have control of that system—be they even above the average in public spirit and honour among business men—would not naturally so conduct the flow of capital as to protect enterprises where their sympathies are most centered; as to protect those perhaps in which they were personally interested or at all events to protect those at points where their interests and their sympathies lay, and not to the irrigation of the district from which the moneys come. The charge I think can be proven that this does go on and that it goes on with special hardship when the money market reaches that stage commonly known as stringency. Periodically, in this as in every country, there comes a time of stringency and stress when those in charge of financial affairs meet with considerable difficulty, and it is in those times that the first to suffer are the citizens of the country, dependent upon the credit facilities afforded by the banks, and living at the more distant points served by the smaller branches.

I listened with approval at the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) made some nights ago in this House, when he stated very fairly that the first to suffer in any period of real or apprehended stress are those at points more distant from the head office of the bank and not directly under the eye of those in control. It would not, of course, be asked of me to bring to the attention of Parliament specific instances of hardship and suffering, but I can assure the House—and there are several hon. members of this House sitting in front of me and opposite to me, who will at once endorse what I say—that within a very few months of the hour at which we are sitting now, there have been cases of severe hardship, suffered especially by smaller borrowers from the banks of Canada, and suffered principally at points far distant from the central office. I can tell the House myself of instances where credit has been refused to the financial ruin of honest people, people who under ordinary circumstances would not have been refused credit at all. The managers at the various points, while money is fairly plentiful are in competition with each other for the securing of business and they adopt schemes more or less successful to induce or to invite into their banks the custom and business of the district. The result is that the citizens of that district, and particularly the farmers, come to depend on what they feel is an implied warranty, that at any time they may at the especial branch which they have chosen secure a line of credit, provided of course there is no impairment of their own resources. But they find, after they have got into this position and after they have adjusted their affairs accordingly, that just as soon as something occurs across the water or on this side of the line that brings about conditions of stringency,—not in the minds of the branch managers or themselves when they went to the bank to get credit—and after they have made their arrangements, these arrangements are wrecked and they are denied what they had every right to expect to receive. The result has been that within very recent months, many an agriculturist, many another not an agriculturist, many of the honest people of this country not of great resources, have been compelled to sacrifice their meagre belongings, have been compelled to sacrifice securities at very great discounts, have been compelled to sell chattels and to sell property, simply because of a reversal in financial conditions the stress and the penury of which they are the first to feel. As I have said, I cannot be called upon to give individual instances. Those instances do not reach the House because men are a little averse to state any too openly that they are denied credit which they believe they have the right to, but I can assure, especially those who have the very great honour of being in charge of this branch of the affairs of the country, that I can take them to the most prosperous agricultural community of our western country—I say that simply because it is the oldest and the one which has not met with any reverses—I can take them to the oldest and most prosperous agricultural community of the western country, and I can show them to-day the serious hardships that have been inflicted just in the way I have stated, by means of the present system of our bank management. As I say, I can take those in charge of the financial affairs of the country to that district and I could point to instances which would speak much more eloquently than I can speak here this afternoon. Our branch banks are offshoots; they are controlled absolutely at the head office; they cannot dictate to the head office. That is the principle of our banking system, and, as I have said, it has very great advantages but it carries with it very great disadvantages, which it is my duty at the present time to bring the attention of the public to.

This same evil has been met with in other countries besides our own. We are perhaps, the most outstanding instance of the branch bank system in the world. We have 2,800 branch banks in this country, all controlled by a very small number indeed of central banks or branch offices, and that small number of head offices is diminishing, while the branch banks are increasing in number. In Great Britain they have I think, some 6,000 branch banks and about 116 banks which operate these branches, a much smaller number in proportion to population than we have; but Great Britain is also a striking example of the branch bank system. In the United States, as everybody knows, they have not that system, but the individual bank system, a system which is without the very great element of strength which our system enjoys, but which carries with it an advantage which we have not, in that the management of these individual banks is located where the services of the banks are to be given, and as a result those in charge of the funds to be distributed and of the credit to be given are resident in the locality and have the interest of the locality at heart—they are engaged by every tie of residence and sympathy to do the best they can not only for the locality but for the customers of their institution. Consequently, the United States does not suffer to the same extent in this particular that a country does that depends entirely on the branch bank system. At the same time, in the regard which I am now considering, and in relation to the reform that I purpose urging, the authorities in the United States of America find out, even under their large and extensive system of individual banks, there is a huge class of the population that are utterly underserved by the banking system. The president of that country and the members of his staff have addressed themselves to the enormous task of so extending the banking facilities of the country as to reach down to the lowest strata of society now altogether unserved with credit.

I would draw the attention of the House for a moment to the means adopted in other countries to reach that class of people and to secure the country against the concentration of credit in times of stringency of which we now complain. In Germany, they have a very limited number of banks indeed. The total number of banks is some 490, and their branches number about 1,730. The House will see that the total number of banks in the whole Empire is only about sixty per cent of the number of banks, including branches, that we have in Canada. The remainder of the banking facilities of Germany consist entirely of co-operative banks which have been utilized in that country, as all over the world to make up the deficiency of which I complain here. But in France the Bank of France, being the backbone, the very life-blood, of the banking system of that country, is so constructed and so organized that the state through its means protects itself against the evil complained of in this country. The state has taken care that the extremities of the country and the smaller towns shall not suffer in comparison with the larger points in the distribution of credit. The Bank of France has some 30,000 shareholders. These elect a council who control the affairs of the Bank. But the governor and the sub-governors are appointed by the government; and in addition to this, the state takes care of the outlying districts by appointing the comptrollers or managers of the branch banks. Thus precaution is taken that no injustice shall be done to the extremities as against the larger centers.

Under the banking system of Germany, even greater precautions are taken. The Bank of Germany, the Reichbank as it is called, holds the same relation to the banking machinery of Germany that the Bank of France does to the banking machinery of France. The Reichbank is run by some nine directors, and these directors are named by the federal council, in other words, they are named by the government, and the governor himself and the sub-governors are similarly appointed. And over these directors sits a Curatorium of five members all named by the government of Germany. And, while the funds are entirely private funds, while the shares are owned altogether by individuals, the state has taken care that each and every branch of the bank of that country is directly controlled by the office of state with the result that they are able to protect the credit-seeking public from any concentration of bank assets, especially in times of banking stringency. The state has even gone further, and, in the last panic or semi-panic which was feared in that country, but which really did not befall with any great severity, the state deposited its funds in the small co-operative institutions among the agricultural population, so as to fortify them first and foremost against the effects of the panic.

In Belgium, which was selected by the plenipotentiaries of Japan as having the most perfect banking system in the world, the chief bank—because there as well as in other countries there is one to which the others are mere adjuncts, one which is the backbone, the centre of the banking system—the governor and sub-governors are named by the state. Furthermore there is a bank commissioner whose duties it is to go from branch to branch of that bank to see that each and every part is duly served and to see that the public functions of the bank are duly discharged. In all the banks I have named, those of Germany, France and Belgium, care is taken that the needs of the outlying parts are served. These needs are under the special care of those interested in serving them, because special committees are appointed, and are compelled to be appointed by those in authority, consisting of prominent mercantile, industrial and agricultural citizens resident right at the point. It is their duty thus to control, to enlarge or to restrict the credit of any point. This important matter is thus in charge of those with local interests and local sympathies, and who stand themselves to gain or to lose by the success or otherwise of the point so to be served.

The same might be said of Sweden; indeed, in that country they have actually subsidized many of the banks, as a direct precaution against their leaving the smaller parts of the country. In Europe, therefore, in addition to the many great advantages provided, care has been taken that the smaller parts of the country, and especially the agricultural sections, do not suffer at the hands of those charged with the responsibility of distributing the funds centred in the banks.

In the United States they do not suffer as we do, and the report of the Comptroller of Currency for that country for the recent year makes it very clear that the multiplication of these small unit banks is proceeding at a wonderful rate. The individual banks have increased in number from 10,000 in 1900 to about 24,000 at the present time, and the amount of capital resident in the city of New York, which in 1900 was eleven per cent of the total banking capital, was reduced to nine and a half in 1912; the total of the bank resources located in the city of New York in 1900 was 23·2 per cent, and this was reduced in 1912 to 18·9 per cent. It is evident, therefore, that in the United States they have guarded to a considerable extent against the extreme tendency of money to flow to the large centres, especially under abnormal conditions or at financially stringent times.

We come now to the heart of the present discussion, namely, the remedy. That which I have to suggest is not new remedy. I simply desire to urge upon the House the enactment of legislation which has already been before it in more than one form, but which has never yet succeeded in obtaining the sanction of Parliament. I refer to legislation to provide uniform machinery throughout this country for the operation of co-operative banks. I purpose to show the House that if due encouragement is given to the inauguration and dissemination of co-operative credit banks, the result—which will gather force as time goes on—will be to meet and entirely overcome the present tendency of banking capital to flow to the larger centres. The tendency will rather be to produce the effect resulting from the principle which I now lay down, with very great confidence, as a desideratum in banking; namely, that there shall remain in any particular locality such an amount of currency and capital as will provide normally for the potential needs of that locality, and that the fluidity and mobilization of our banking assets shall not be so great as to draw from any locality its entire banking capital and place it in the hands of those not specially interested in that locality. It is impossible to say whether this principle, which has been laid down by very high authorities, could be carried any further than I have stated. Certainly it is an obvious advantage that an institution should be sufficiently large to draw from the surplus moneys of a certain community in order to utilize the amount in some other portion of the country where sufficient funds are not at hand, but, as I have said, such an amount of the credit and capital of a locality as is normally required for its needs should not be moved from that locality and be placed at the disposal of other interests.

In endeavouring to expound, not at great length, the advantages of the co-operative system of banking, I desire to do full justice to others who have blazed the way which I now intend to follow; who have been pioneers in the work, and whose arguments I propose virtually to expound. Amongst its own members the House is chiefly indebted in this matter to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) whose inability through illness to be present on this occasion is undoubtedly to be very deeply regretted. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has endeavoured for several years to secure legislation that will produce a uniform mechanism for the establishment of co-operative credit banks, but his efforts have so far been unsuccessful. I would not do justice to all those connected with this great work if I did not refer to the strenuous efforts of a gentleman well known to us all, though not a member of this House. I refer to Mr. Alphonse Desjardins, of Levis, one of the members of our 'Hansard' staff, who has borne the burden of a great endeavour in this country to establish upon a firm basis a comprehensive system of co-operative banking. These co-operative banks, which are very simple in their organization and operation, consist of an aggregation of people, all resident within a circumscribed and defined area, who get together and form on a co-operative basis a credit bank, each subscribing, in this country at least, for a small share—say $5, thus instituting an initial capital, and inviting from their own members subscriptions by way of deposits, which are used for the advantage of those members and no one else. The membership is decided upon by a board of supervisors, who will allow no one to become a member who has not a reputation for fair dealing, however poor he may be, and will admit, subject to this condition, anyone who takes a share of stock within the circumscribed area. Nothing could be simpler than that. All members are eligible to apply for loans, all loans are passed upon by a credit board elected by the shareholders and all loans are small, they are limited to a maximum fixed by the shareholders themselves. This, in short, is the same system that has been in operation in European countries for now about fifty years. Half a century's experience is behind it, and I shall ask the attention of the House for a moment while I give the result of that half century of experience in Europe, as also the result of the experiments conducted in our country since 1901.

It may be a surprise, it reads to myself like a fairy tale, to learn what has been achieved by co-operative banks in Europe. There are in Germany 490 ordinary banks and only 1,730 branches. In France there are only 27 banks and 1,552 branches, about the number of banks in this country and about half the number of branches; so that the whole of the banking facilities of France, the credits of France, are served by co-operative banks, outside of that very limited number of other banks, joint stock banks and branches. In Germany the rest of the banking of the country is also done through co-operative banks. In Great Britain there are 116 banks and some 6,935 branches. Co-operative banking has not taken the hold in Great Britain that it has in the other countries; co-operation in that country has taken the form of co-operation in distribution, but chiefly the reason is that it is in a younger period of development in Great Britain than in other parts of Europe; it only took root there in the nineties, between 1885 and 1900, whereas in Austria, Sweden, Belgium, Germany and France these co-operative banks have been in actual operation and meeting with unqualified success since 1862. There are at present in Belgium 500 such banks, in France 3,000 such banks or about double the number of branches of other banks. In Austria there are no less than 6,000 separate and co-operative banks, and in Germany between 16,000 and 20,000 separate and co-operative banks doing business. And the loans made in 1909 in Germany actually amounted to $4,888,000,000 or about five times the total amount of all the banking done by all the banks of this country; so I did not overstate the case when I said that what I had to propose to the House was not something in the experimental stage, but was something that had grown to enormous proportions, that had been tried in the furnace and had proven pure, that had been weighed and had never been found wanting. Because I have read on the best of authority, uncontradicted, that the amount of losses suffered by co-operative banks in all the countries of Europe and in this country has been so small as to be utterly negligible. In this country there has been no loss at all. In Germany the losses are less than one-half of one-tenth of one per cent. Indeed, in all the works on the subject it is noticeable that the authors do not pay the slightest attention to losses. The whole principle of co-operation is such as to shield the banks against loss and when to that is added the additional rampart of geographical limitation the chance of loss is practically nil, so that the success of these banks is phenomenal and what can be said against them, read from their history, is a negligible quantity.

I want to refer for a moment to what has been done in the republic to the south of us, a country whose agricultural and industrial conditions, and the genius of whose people are more akin to our own, a country which reproduces the conditions which obtain in Canada. In the United States of America President Taft two years ago instructed Commissioner Myron T. Herrick to collect information as to what had been accomplished by co-operative credit banking in the older lands. He collected information as to the variety of conditions obtaining in the United States and consequently as to the applicability of the banking system as it is developed in Europe to the United States of America. The report of Mr. Myron T. Herrick is a comprehensive document. It was obtained by the most thorough investigation conducted by the ambassadors of the United States in these various countries and it coincides, in every paragraph it agrees, without a shade of contradiction, with the universal testimony of the representatives of every country that has investigated this system. It agrees in detail with all the claims of the promoters of co-operative banking and all the text books on the subject in any language. Let me read from the report of Mr. Herrick what has been achieved in Europe in this regard:

The investigation conducted thus far warrants the conclusion that land and agricultural credit are so thoroughly organized in most of the European nations that real estate securities are as liquid and sound as municipal bonds, while the honest, capable, and industrious farmer is able to supply himself with working funds for short or long time when desired. The institutions and also the systems devised for these objects have certain basic features in common but vary considerably in type, and thereby show a remarkable adaptability to all sorts of social and economic conditions, such as exist in America. The rates of interest at which they are able to obtain and lend money fall even below the European commercial rate and are about one-third to one-half less than what prevail in the United States.

It is quite true that our rate in this country is necessarily higher than is the rate in the old land, but there is no reason why agricultural credit, why small credit in this country should bear a different ratio to commercial credit in this country than agricultural credit in Europe bears to commercial credit there. The instrumentality of co-operative banking has brought the rate of agricultural credit in Europe below the rate obtained in commerce, below the commercial rate.

And this report goes so far as to say that there is no reason at all why it should not bring it below the commercial rate in America, the simple reason being that the securities hedged about it against loss are greater and the risk is less. I want to read further:

Personal credit in agricultural Europe is obtained usually by means of the co-operative credit associations. They are also used by artisans and small tradespeople in the towns and cities. These associations are in fact the only banks which the farmers will patronize for short-time loans in the nations where they abound in the greatest numbers. With their aid poverty and usury have been banished, sterile fields have been made fertile, production has been increased, and agriculture and agricultural science raised to the highest point. Their educational influence is no less marked. They have taught the farmers the uses of credit as well as of cash, given them a commercial instinct and business knowledge, and stimulated them to associated action. They have encouraged thrift and saving, created a feeling of independence and self-reliance, and even elevated their moral tone.

As a result of this report, which is a most useful and instructive document and which, with deference, I submit every member of Parliament should read, ex-President Taft of the United States, a man who I am sure none of us will regard as a dreamy enthusiast, who does not suffer from the reputation of being over-progressive, who is not a lover by any means of innovation, takes the responsibility of urging in the strongest terms the immediate enactment of a law uniform throughout all the States of the American Union, providing for the incorporation of agricultural banks. As a result of that report he goes further. He takes the responsibility of advocating the immediate introduction into the United States of a still more startling reform namely, what are known as the Landschaften banks of Germany. To that feature of his report I shall come later on. As the result of that investigation ex-President Taft comes to the conclusion that, notwithstanding that in the United States, as in this country, there exists not the same fixity of social conditions, there does not exist the same permanency of domestic relations, the same permanency of neighbourhood; there does not exist the same fixity of values of real estate. Notwithstanding the elasticity of these banks, he says, they adapt themselves with equal success to the conditions of one country as to those of another, and they could be made just as successful in the United States as in any country of Europe.

The agriculturists and labouringmen of Canada have been besieging this House for the last ten years in favour of co-operative banking. When the matter was first broached, a special investigation was instituted by this Parliament, and in the months of December 1906 and January, 1907, a committee took evidence with a view to ascertaining whether or not the principle of the Reiffeisen banks of Germany and the Schultz banks of Austria could be imported into Canada to the advantage of the poorer people and of the farmers as well. That committee took evidence extending over several months, and it is embodied in the Journals of the House, in Journal 42 of 1906-7. The effect of that evidence is so clear, so broad, and so plain that he who runs may read. No evidence was given that for a moment threw any doubt upon the applicability and advantages of the Reiffeisen banks to this country. There was some opposition, but no fair-minded man, I venture to say, can read the evidence and feel that there was a single shadow of an argument against their applicability to Canada. So unanimous was the really valid testimony of the witnesses before that committee, that the committee reported without hesitation in favour of the Bill that was then before the House, and that Bill went further than merely providing for the establishment of co-operative banks. It provided machinery for the establishment of co-operative institutions for distribution and production. However, objection on constitutional lines was afterwards raised to these features of the Bill; they were eliminated, and another Bill was introduced and passed this House. Unfortunately it was defeated in the Upper Chamber, so that today we stand where we did ten years ago. I say to the discredit of Parliament we have provided as yet no machinery whatever of a uniform character, which is the first essential, to give the people of this country the advantage of co-operative banking as it obtains in almost every civilized country on the face of the globe. I should have said a few moments ago, that not only has it done great service in all the countries of Europe, but this last year in Japan alone, I believe, some five hundred banks were organized. The system has been introduced in India; it is doing remarkable service there. The testimony to the work which it is doing is just as unanimous from one country as from another. Surely if the British committee looked into this matter with great care and thoroughness, if they and Lord Curzon, who acted upon it, were not afraid to entrust the custody of the people's money under the co-operative system to the Bengalee of India, surely this Parliament should not hesitate to entrust the same machinery to the hands of the plain people of Canada.

Let me read some of the authority that was adduced before that committee in 1907. I gave the number of the banks that I understood were incorporated last year in Japan. I have just been informed that the total number actually doing business in the Empire of Japan is 1,880, and I might add that the total loaning business done in Europe alone by this system of small co-operative banks has amounted to the stupendous aggregate of $15,900,000,000. Let me read this from the first authority which was adduced at the committee. The first authority so far as text-book writing goes on the subject is Mr. W. H. Wolfe, the English expert, and Mr. Wolfe speaks from the elevation, not only of a painstaking student, but of a thoroughly experienced man who, for twenty years has himself conducted the operation of co-operative banks in the old land, and who was recently and I believe still is, chairman of the International Co-operative Union of Europe. He says that the present banking facilities of that country minister in normal times sufficiently to the needs and welfare of the wealthy and medium classes, but ministers not at all to the needs of the poorer people, and that the advantages, the whole instrumentality of credit which is the very basis upon which a man builds his success in this world, is denied under our system and under the British system to the poorer classes. No one can controvert that position. It may be that occasionally a poor man, if he is honest, can get a small loan, but the practice obtains in so limited a degree as to be negligible. The poorer classes of this country, if they be ever so honest, do not as a matter of practice, and cannot as a matter of possibility, secure the credit to which their honesty entitles them in the commerce of the world. There can be no greater benefit, there can be no greater blessing given to the humbler classes of any community, than to so press out the machinery of our banking system, to so extend it, as to reach those classes of people who are not now served and to enlist in the service of the state and in the full plentitude of citizenship, with all their potentialities and possibilities, the poorer classes of the country. By doing so you perform an educational work the advantage of which it is hard to over estimate. More than that, you teach self-reliance, you teach the great principle of mutual help, than which there is nothing more efficacious in securing the common advantage. You implant in the poor man the thought that this honesty of character, known as it is amongst his fellows, has been sufficient of itself to enable him to get a small loan, and, having implanted that in him, you give him an encouragement that is worth not a little. He knows he is placed upon his honour and his honour is open and plain before the gaze of his neighbours. Before his friends and his neighbours he is placed upon his honour to repay and there is nothing like an extension of credit upon the basis of a man's honesty and the placing of him upon his honour in the plain light of day to add to the fibre of his moral character. The result has been as beneficial in adding to the comforts of the poorer classes as in adding to their personal character and moral fibre upon which their claim to consideration must be mainly built. It is the plain duty of this House, as of every Parliament, to do everything it can to extend our financial machinery so as to give the advantages of credit to the humbler classes of the people. It is not too much to say that the class which I have in my mind constitute the majority of the people of Canada. That the majority of the poorer people of the country are to-day without adequate and, in large measure, without any possible credit facilities at all, and as a result, being stripped of that power, they are not doing the service to the state which they otherwise might do. Mr. Wolfe, referring to those people, says:

Give 'the million' that productive power which is to be found in the command of working capital, and though the millenium cannot be expected to arrive at once in consequence, there can be no doubt that many of our social and economic troubles will be mitigated, if not wholly relieved, that employment is likely to become more steady, and more remunerative, comforts are likely to become more attainable, therefore contentment may be expected to become more general and pauperism more circumscribed than they are now.

Let me draw the attention of the House to the report of Mr. Dodge, statistician of the United States Department of Agriculture, who writes on this subject as follows:

These people's banks have a success that justifies their existence, as they fill a virtual vacuum in banking opportunities for the agricultural and industrial classes. Perhaps equally needed in this country are such facilities for self-help, through small savings which are the basis of small loans to those who are by their circumstances practically excluded from the ordinary credits of the banks. Possibly such facilities here may lead to self-reliance, financial co-operation and thrift, and thus improve the condition of large numbers of men of limited means and isolated position who are now beyond the present stimulus to enterprise and economy of existing savings banks, national banks, trust companies, and other financial institutions.

Mr. Wolfe says further:

We pride ourselves, on both sides of the political boundary line, upon our 'popular' institutions, which make us, as we think, the most 'democratic' nation in Europe. Nevertheless, in respect of the main supports of the two great divisions of our economic fabric, we are distinctly anti-democratic. As the basis of agriculture we have land laws which, for good or for evil, are from a democratic point of view, a century at least behind those of other countries. And as the basis of commerce we have credit still almost the monopoly of the rich. We do not, accordingly, know that which, thanks to their people's banks, the Germans and Italians have well learnt, namely, what an ample and practically inexhaustible resource of productive power there lies hidden in the labour, the frugality, the honesty of the nation's workers, as material for what Commendatore Luzzatti calls 'capitalization'—just as people who have not seen rivers like the Danube or the Rhine, could not possibly estimate from the little rills and driblets which go to make them up, what a vast volume of water may be collected from those insignificant sources.

A word from Mr. E. A. Pratt who, writing as late as 1904, on the organization of agricultural credits, says:

Another factor in the situation is the absolute need that agricultural credit should go hand in hand with agricultural organization. The necessity for this dual arrangement has been proved over and over again on the continent of Europe, and though the financial position of British agriculturists in general may be more favourable than that of the peasantry in various other countries where an easy agricultural credit was established years ago, the extreme desirability of such credit being available in Great Britain, also, is beyond any possible doubt.

I do not need to add testimony to testimony. As far as establishing the actual results obtained in various countries goes, I think I have succeeded and I shall conclude by a reference to the results obtained in our own country. I call the attention of the House to what has been going on in Canada even since that investigation of 1906, and I will ask the House to compare the results that have actually been achieved with the dangers foreboded by certain hon. members of this House when the matter was under discussion before. At the time this matter was investigated by this House there were only some four or six credit banks in actual operation in Canada and the largest of these credit banks had a very limited capital of $44,957.15. That was the extent that this movement had reached in the province of Quebec which was the pioneer province in Canada in regard to this matter. What is the condition of affairs to-day? At the present time, without any law enacted by the Dominion Parliament but operating only under the authority of a statute passed by the province of Quebec, there are in that province no less than one hundred and five co-operative banks actually doing business; and there are outside that province, operating under the authority of no statute at all, at the present time, six co-operative penny banks.

But the crying need of those who have the progress of this movement most at heart is for a uniform banking law, such as this House has undoubtedly the power to pass; a uniform banking law applicable to all the provinces providing clear, plain, and simple machinery for the incorporation of these banks in each and every province of Canada. At the present time those doing business in Quebec are under the statutes of that province and those doing business in Ontario are utterly without the protection or aegis of any statute whatever.

In the province of Quebec the first of these banks organized was in Levis, which is a town of about 7,000 people. The operation of these banks in the province of Quebec is for the most part confined to single parishes. The bank at Lévis has a share basis of five dollars per share, and there have been paid in in shares since its organization $144,881.29. These shares are withdrawable—and that was one of the chief objections raised to the Bill that was before this House; but the total amount withdrawn since 1901 amounts to only $9,950, or not much more than twelve per cent of the total amount paid in. The balance on hand of share capital is $124,931.29, and the total amount of share capital paid in when this House had the matter under consideration before was only some $44,000, so that from the tremendous advance made by this one institution in the town of Lévis, there is a lesson which we can take some instruction from. The total amount of deposits—because, as I have stated these banks have power to receive deposits but only from their own members living within the circumscribed area in which the bank operates—the total amount of deposits is $549,699 or about four times the total amount of the share capital. The amount of deposits withdrawn was $493,190 leaving a balance of $56,208.77. The loans —and this is what they are organized for—the loans amounted to a grand total of $989,079.41, or almost $1,000,000 of loans made by this small co-operative bank at Lévis within a period of about ten years, and all these loans were made in very small amounts. As a matter of fact the total number of loans made by that bank was five thousand six hundred and seventy, and of that number three thousand nine hundred and twenty-six consisted of loans of between one dollar and one hundred dollars.

From these figures can be obtained a very clear idea of the nature of the business done and of the nature of the need satisfied by these small banks. The interest charged, according to the evidence before the special committee of this House, averaged up to that time at the rate of six and a fraction per cent, and, they pay their shareholders five per cent on their money and have accumulated at the present time a large and substantial reserve. They pay their depositors three per cent as in the other banks. Now, an important thing in connection with this is, that not one cent has been lost by any of the one hundred and five co-operative institutions in the province of Quebec, which for some ten years, have been doing business. It is also a fact that not one cent has been lost by any co-operative bank that has ever done business in the Dominion of Canada. What I mean by that is, that the small individual borrower, the man who borrows on his honesty of character, the man in whom his neighbours have confidence and who borrows a small amount to buy his tools or his implements, has proven true to his trust and in no case has there been a loan made where the borrower has failed to return it. There has not been one cent lost in loans in all the years of the operation of these banks, and under the aegis of their statute in the province of Quebec they have increased from six in the year 1907 to one hundred and five in the year 1913. And when I say they are increasing in Germany at the average rate of two and a half per cent per day, one can understand what may be expected in this country if these banks are afforded the facilities which flow from the sanction of Parliament. If we enact a uniform law so that the citizen of one province passing to another and desiring to avail himself of the advantages these banks afford, without compelling him to learn a new system of regulations, then an enormous impetus will be given to these banks. This is not a small matter; it is a matter of very great importance, and it is demanded with importunity by those who are at present operating under that lone provincial statute in Quebec, and it would be welcomed with very great enthusiasm by citizens of other provinces and, I believe, by the poorer classes of Canada generally.

Mr. AMES: What security does the borrower give?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the first place, in so far as the system I have heretofore been endeavouring to portray is concerned, there is no such thing as long term loans on land security. The banks as introduced in the province of Quebec are on a personal credit basis and that is the central feature of the Reiffeisen bank. In Germany, these banks are borrowing banks as well, and they actually issue debentures and are themselves borrowers and loan to their customers. In this country so far as I know, these banks are not borrowers at all. They provide themselves through their own membership in share capital and in deposits what money they loan, and they loan all that money on personal credit and on nothing else. That is to say, there is no money advanced on land, and I believe no money advanced on chattel security. But the credit board who dispose of applications for loans may, if they desire, demand the endorsation of one or two other members, but of no one else, before they grant a loan. Perhaps I should add that it is a uniform practice, and embodied in their by-laws, that no member of this credit board shall be himself a borrower; the member excludes himself from the privilege of borrowing by permitting his election to the board. Furthermore, it is the uniform practice that no officer of the society shall receive any remuneration whatever, unless it be the manager. That is the uniform practice in Germany, and I believe it is the uniform practice here. That is as much a principle of Reiffeisen banking as anything else. The advantage is that it enables the smaller borrower to relieve himself of the additional load of the profit of the middleman in banking. I have nothing to say against the middleman. So long as our financial system, the commercial fabric of our country requires the middleman, he is as good a citizen and is doing as honest a business as anyone else. But I think I shall not be contradicted when I say that it is the business of legislation, as far as possible, to bring the producer and the consumer together, to eliminate, as far as we may, the necessity of the middleman. Doing this we benefit the whole community. Let us commence in the financial sphere first; let us provide the machinery that shall enable the producer of money and the consumer of money to be their own middlemen, to do their own business and in that way not only save great expense but add to their knowledge of business, add to their appreciation of capital, add to their conviction that it is worth while to save pennies and make dollars.

I have referred to the success so far attained in Canada. With that my relations of the practice of this class of banking ends. Let me go now one step further. Where this practise is developed to its fullest extent it has led to the result that the state itself has organized a central bank, an institution to do the business of these smaller banks. Let me repeat that, because I am now coming to a great principle which I think is at the bottom of the advantage that has been reached through this class of banking; the state organizes the central bank which does the banking business of its customers, namely, the smaller co-operative banks. What is the result? All the moneys that these societies have on hand are deposited in that central bank, which I repeat again, is their bank. I do not call for the establishment of such a bank in this country at the present time; it would be insane to do so; we are not up to that point yet. But if these institutions spread in Canada as they have in other countries—as they are almost sure to do—the time must come, as it has come elsewhere, for the institution by this Parliament of a central bank to receive the deposits and do the banking business of these smaller individual societies. And there would be no reason in this country why that central bank should not have the note-issuing power, like other banks. The result would be to give a great uplift to the system of small banking and greatly to benefit all the people. What is the principle, I have indicated a moment ago? It is this: Under the banking system of this country, as under the banking system of England, branch banks are the property, the adjuncts of the central banks, they are under the control and do the bidding of the central banks. This is control by the centre and is the source of the suffering I complain of at the extremities. If what I have pointed to should materialize in the co-operative societies, if they should so multiply and prosper as to need the central bank to do their business, the reverse will be the case. The larger bank will be the adjunct and will do the bidding of its customers. It will be the central bank which will be controlled by them—the very reverse of the other case. And I think it will offer a magnificent and useful complement to our banking system. We shall then have the strength and the stability, and the ability we now have to mobilize capital where it shall do the most good; and at the same time there will be reasonable protection for the smaller man.

I had not intended taking up anything like so much of the time of the House, but I should not be doing justice to the resolution if I did not refer, even for a few moments, to another feature of co-operative banking, namely, co-operative banking on the basis of land credit as distinguished from personal credit. And, as I approach this part of the subject, let me premise that I am not convinced that the time has come in this country, as yet, when the application of the principle of the landchaften bank as now successful in older countries can be made to advantage in this country. I think we should proceed first along the line of personal credit societies, and that, at least so far as the provinces with which I am more intimately acquainted are concerned, the time has not yet come when we can import into Canada the central principle of the landchaften bank or land banks as existing in Germany and all the older countries. I say this notwithstanding the fact that the report of the American commission is distinctly favourable to the importation of this system into the United States; I say this notwithstanding that even so high and conservative an authority as President Taft has distinctly and emphatically recommended to the Congress of governors the immediate application of the land mortgage banks to the American Republic.

What is the principle of these banks? The principle is simply analogous to that I have been detailing as regards personal credit banks. That is to say, land owners and farmers get together and constitute themselves a co-operative society. Those who have money deposit it in the society, and those who desire money and are members of the society borrow on the security of mortgage for long term, at low interest. The institution itself issues debentures, and secures money in the home or foreign market. And the end is that the land mortgages in that way secure a reputation for mobility and liquidity equal to other debentures, municipal or state debentures, the final outcome, and of course and the desideratum looked for, being the lowering of the rate of interest. That has been secured, but what I fear at the present time is that in our country—at all events in the western portion—the variations of value are so great and so sudden, and conditions are so unsettled as regards real estate values, that we could not reasonably ask the Government to take steps at the present time in that direction. But it seems to me that when we are considering the first part of the subject, we should give thought also to the second, because the system is undoubtedly capable of such extension as will give to the people of this country, from one end to the other, a system of co-operative land-banks, with, perhaps, special encouragement by state legislation to take as part of their securities long-term mortgages.

An essential feature of co-operative banking, in so far as land loans are concerned, is what is known as the amortization plan, and I think that even at the present time something might be done to put a premium on amortization loans, and discourage as far as possible the present system of short-term land loans, which are very disastrous to the rate of interest, greatly inconvenience the farmer in very many cases, and bring him to ruin in many others. The principle of amortization is this: A loan is made on the security of a mortgage, and that mortgage stands for twenty, thirty, fifty, or, as frequently happens in the older countries, seventy-five years. It is paid for in equal amounts annually, similar to municipal debentures. A sinking fund and interest is provided, and in France the sinking fund and interest amount to seven and a half per cent when the term is twenty years, the result being that the farmer holding an amortization mortgage for twenty years, paying at the rate of seven and a half per cent per annum, has his entire loan discharged at the end of twenty years, whereas in this country he would pay more than seven and a half per cent annually as interest on the loan, and would owe the entire principal at the end of the twenty year period.

What is the amount we are now paying in the way of interest on loans; what is the extent of our suffering in that regard? I have found it impossible to obtain the exact figures; if others know of the source from which they can be obtained, I would be very glad to receive the information. Our loan tables say that the loan companies of Canada have loaned on real estate about $222,000,000, but I am informed that only a comparatively small number of loan companies have reported, and that there are a great many companies organized under provincial charters, so that no reliance can be placed upon these figures as being significant of the total amount of loans on farm lands in this country. Furthermore, a great deal of loaning is done privately and from banks and, of course, the mortgage company rate dictates and controls the private rate, so that, from our blue books, full information cannot be obtained as to the amount of mortgage loans and the interest thereon. But the Monetary Commission of the United States, which sat for some months two or three years ago, reported that the farmers of the United States are annually adding to the capital of the nation about $8,400,000,000, that they are doing this on a borrowed capital of $6,000,000,000, and that on this borrowed capital they are paying an annual interest charge of $510,000,000. Comparing this country with the republic to the south, and taking into consideration the fact that in Canada the predominance of agriculture is proportionately greater than it is in the United States, I think I am well within the mark when I say that the total amount of borrowed capital of the farmers of Canada is not very far from—and is certainly not below—$750,000,000. The rate of interest fixed by the Herrick Report surprised me very much. That Report is authority for the statement that the rate of interest on farm loans in the United States average 8½ per cent, and that the rate of interest on the amortization land mortgage plan in Europe is below the commercial rate—between 3½ per cent and 4½ per cent. If the rate of interest on farm lands in the United States averages 8½ per cent, it undoubtedly averages at least that amount in Canada. From my own experience, I would not be disposed to say the average is more, but, having regard to the light thrown upon the subject by the United States Commission, it would appear that our farmers are paying an average rate of, perhaps, 9 per cent, and undoubtedly, many borrowing parts of this country are paying 10 per cent on first mortgage loans. That is a statement which I will ask hon. members from the farther West to challenge if possible, and to affirm if they agree in its correctness. The farm rate, however, averages considerably higher than the commercial rate, whereas under the operation of co-operative banks in Europe the average is lower than the commercial rate in that country. If, therefore, by our enterprise in this regard, we could reduce the rate by even one per cent, we would be effecting a saving to the agriculturalists of this country of at least $7,500,000 a year, and, if we could effect anything like the saving that has taken place in Europe, it would amount to many millions of dollars annually. Whatever can be done will be appreciated, and, with every possible confidence, I make the statement that if we launch out vigorously and carefully on an organized system of co-operative credit banking, we take a long step towards reducing the rate of interest at least to the poor people of Canada, and, undoubtedly, to the farmers generally.

In the town of Lévis there are, I am informed, some four branch banks, about the average number for a town of that size. There were that number when co-operative banking was first commenced there. Co-operative banking has since that time done the business I have indicated and in that ten years not one of these branches has ceased to do business and each of them has had the benefit year after year of deposits by these co-operative institutions. There is nothing to fear from the shark. The double protection of geographical limitation and the interest of neighbours, added to the whole principle of co-operation, has proven sufficient in days gone by to protect the public against the shark, and to protect these banks against loss, not only against destruction themselves but against loss in loans and surely if the poor Bengalee, who, according to Macauley at least, is the very personification of deceit, whose chief weapon it is, as necessary to him as horns to the buffalo or beauty to the woman, surely if he is to be trusted with co-operative banking the people of Canada may be trusted. I do not expect any more than Mr. Wolfe does to see the institution of any millennium by this system but I do look for substantial relief. They have done much in fifty years for the creation of wealth in one way. They have not made any huge fortunes it is true, but they have done what is infinitely better, they have made the modest fortune of many millions of people. If they have not done much in the way of the creation of wealth they have done service in what is a far better cause, in a cause that is challenging attention to-day, in tones more imperious than ever before in history, the cause of the distribution of wealth; and if they have done that in other countries let us enlist their services in this.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): I think the hon. member for Portage la Prairie is entitled to the thanks of this House for bringing up the very important question involved in this resolution and I confess I am in sympathy with most of what he has to say on this question. As he is an influential member on the Government side I hope he will be able to influence the Government to do something in this direction either to encourage agricultural banks or adopt the system that is in vogue in the Antipodes, that is state loans to farmers. Some of us, when we advocate these ideas of assistance to our people, are considered somewhat socialistic, but this is an age of progress, this is an age when we are anxious to legislate so that the greatest good will be done to the greatest number of our people, I believe that that is the object in view in this particular proposal which has been brought before us. I wish to speak more particularly of conditions in western Canada. In the West there is general complaint that the rate of interest is high and that money is difficult to get by the people who are located on the land. We all realize that the development of this country depends upon the development of our agricultural resources, because the prosperity of the whole country depends upon the development and the advancement of the agricultural industry throughout Canada. We have in western Canada still a great amount of land unsettled and untilled. We want to encourage the people to go into that country, to till the soil and become productive citizens of Canada, to increase the riches and wealth of the nation. There is a general feeling which has been expressed during the debate on the Bank Act that the rate of interest charged by the banks is far too high and that it is difficult for the farmers to secure money from the banks. We have in the Bank Act, it is true, a rate of interest fixed at seven per cent, but I know and I believe it is the general knowledge of every western member that the rate of interest is much higher, that the rate charged by the banks will average ten per cent at least. If we could provide by our new Bank Act this year and have it absolutely fixed that the interest should not be more than seven per cent and that there should be a penalty when more than that is charged, we should then do something in the direction of eliminating the high rate charged for money in Canada. But with the experience of other countries brought forward by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie and the experience in Australia in recent years, it is found that money can be borrowed considerably cheaper than the rate fixed in our Bank Act. There is a difficulty in the way of our farmers securing money from the banks. They must really be intimately acquainted with the bank manager, he must have a thorough acquaintance with the character and history of the person wanting to borrow money before he will advance any. In western Canada it is difficult for the bank manager to acquire information about people who have just recently come from eastern Canada or any part of the continent.

Then, again, the mortgage companies are large lenders of money. They charge a considerably higher rate of interest. There are also private loans. Only a short time ago I wrote to a leading legal firm in Lethbridge to ascertain the average rate secured from all loans and the reply was that the average current rate on loans of private funds to farmers was ten per cent. That may be a surprise to some hon. members, but I know from personal experience that a few years ago it was very difficult to get eastern Canadians to lend money in western Canada. Probably they have more faith in the country now than a few years ago. When I first went to the West I borrowed money from a friend of mine in the East. I suggested to him that he should lend more frequently in the West. He said that his clients as a rule preferred to take the smaller interest given in Ontario than to risk money on loans in western Canada. It is difficult to get the low rate which farmers in western Canada would like to get and as a result the organizations of farmers in my province have been taking up this problem with a view to solving it and putting the farmer in a position to borrow money at the lowest possible rate. One of their plans is that which has been adopted in the states of Australia and in the Dominion of New Zealand. That, of course, is more or less paternal legislation but we are running a great deal in this country to state ventures and I believe this matter of state loans to farmers is worthy of the consideration of this House and, as the matter is now being brought before the House more for the purpose of enlightening members of Parliament on this particular question and endeavouring to convince the Government that some action should be taken along this line, I intend to refer later on to the system in vogue in Australia and to give some figures in regard to it. Now I claim that if money could be secured in western Canada at a smaller rate of interest than at present, it would add greatly in the development of the country. I think that every member of this House will agree with me in that regard. Hon. members are acquainted with the fact that the Canadian Pacific railway secured a great land grant when they constructed their transcontinental line. As soon as the development of western Canada commenced, the Canadian Pacific railway disposed of those lands in a great many cases to speculators. At the beginning of this year, however, they put into effect a policy that in the future land was to be sold not to speculators, but to the actual settler, and to enable him to go on the land they allow him a considerable period, I think twenty years, in which to pay for this land. They are also quite willing to advance enough money to the man who takes up this land to enable him to erect buildings on his farm and to purchase live stock. The Canadian Pacific railway is practically going into the loaning business, in order to encourage the settlement of its lands in western Canada, and I believe that the system will work out with success. In western Canada we are anxious to develop mixed farming, and I believe that the question we are discussing to-day is related to mixed farming. Speaking generally the people who have gone on those lands are people who have taken homesteads with very little capital. They have faced the adverse conditions which prevailed in the early days, they have met with reverses on certain occasions, and they have practically no capital. It would be their salvation to get some advance of money to enable them to buy some live stock and to go into mixed farming in a small way and it would put them in a better position to face reverses that might come in the future. But they are unable to do this because they have no capital. It is difficult for them to borrow money; the homesteader practically finds it impossible to do so. I claim that some system of this kind would be of inestimable value in the development of mixed farming in western Canada. I have just noticed that the legislature of the province of Alberta intends to introduce legislation in regard to the notes which the farmers in western Canada have to sign in payment of agricultural implements. It struck me while the hon. member for Portage la Prairie was speaking, that if the farmer was in a position to borrow money to enable him to buy his agricultural implements outright he would be in much better position, for those who live in western Canada know that the notes which the farmers sign, and many of them sign in ignorance of their effect, remain a grip on them for many years. Indeed, it is a system which has caused a great deal of distress in western Canada this year. When a farmer buys an agricultural implement in western Canada, he mortgages his farm and everything else to the implement company. They are very anxious to dispose of the implements to the farmer, but when the payments fall due, those companies are almost relentless in making him foot the bill. They do not consider his position or the conditions which he has to face during the season. Under a system which will enable a farmer to borrow money, he would be in a position to pay cash for those implements and then get his loan either from a state bank or from a co-operative agricultural bank.

Let me briefly refer to the system in vogue in the Antipodes. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie dealt more particularly to-day with the systems adopted in the older countries of Europe. With the Australian plan many hon. members are no doubt familiar, and I think it is one worthy of the attention and consideration of this House and of the Government. I have known it to be called somewhat socialistic, but as far as I can ascertain it seems to have been profitable in that country. The system is familiarly known as one of state loans to farmers, and it is in vogue I think in all the provinces of the Australian Commonwealth. It is also in vogue in New Zealand. Let me take the case of South Australia. The South Australian Advances Act was passed in 1895. The lending office established by it is called the State Bank; the members of the Board of Supervision are termed trustees; and the general manager is called inspector-general. The business of the State Bank is to lend money to farmers and graziers in aid of rural industries. The Government reserves power to define rural industries by proclamation. The Advances Act itself, however, specifies that they shall include meat freezing, wine growing and dairying. Wine growing I may mention, is a highly important industry in South Australia just as meat freezing and dairying are in New Zealand. Advances to farmers are not to exceed three-fifths of the value of the property, which must be freehold or leasehold held from the Crown. Where it is a leasehold, the state loan must not exceed half the selling value of the lease. In no case is the bank's valuation of unimproved land to exceed the figure at which it is assessed for the Government land tax, a very sound precaution. The trustees are colonists of standing. They receive a fee of £2 2s. for each meeting of the board which they attend, and a very moderate travelling allowance—10s. 6d. daily. Statutory penalties are provided for jobbery or misconduct. The trustees are authorized to lend money, not only to settlers, but to municipalities and other local bodies for all purposes coming within the scope of ordinary municipal enterprise, or to pay off former loans. In the South Australian scheme, and I take it because it gives the most lucid illustration of the system generally in vogue in Australia, we find a system of instalment loans and repayment by sinking fund as in New Zealand. As in New Zealand, too, the mortgagee may pay off the whole of his debt at any time on giving notice. This is a summary of the act given by a man who is well known in the politics of Australia, the hon. W. P. Reeves. I have taken his views from a book which he recently published on the progessive legislation of Australia and New Zealand. Instead of a regular stipulation for seventy-three half yearly payments, with a right to the borrower to hasten the end by depositing sums at any time to go in liquidation of the principle, the South Australian Act presents a complex schedule, defining the terms for which the borrower may agree to mortgage his land at the outset. The least of these is three years and a half, the longest twenty-one years. The one involves seven half-yearly payments of interest and principal, the other forty-two. The arrangements for raising the capital for the boards to lend out is ingenious and economical. Instead of raising a large loan in London as the New Zealanders did at the outset, and having difficulties with the employment thereof until it is absorbed in the advances applied for by settlers, the South Australian board raises money locally by issuing debentures called mortgage bonds. These mortgage bonds yield three and a half per cent, and are guaranteed by the government of the colony. They have a five years' currency, are negotiable, and interest on them is paid to the bearer. The board issues blocks of these as it requires money, and, so far, they have been taken up without difficulty chiefly by savings banks and insurance companies. Hence it comes that the board is able to claim that it does not borrow more money than is absolutely required, and does not have capital lying idle on its hands. On the other hand it pays three and a-half per cent for its capital, whereas in New Zealand, the rate paid is from three and one-eighth to three and one-quarter. From the borrower's point of view, however, the South Australian advances have one great advantage over those of New Zealand. The rate of interest is less by one-half per cent. Instead of five per cent, four and a-half per cent only is charged. The office fees, too, are even lower.

At the end of March, 1902, the South Australian trustees had been at work six years and two months, and had lent out £713,000. Between £175,000 and £176,000 of this had been repaid, and £176,000 of mortgage bonds had been repurchased and cancelled. Two-fifths of the sum lent was put out during the first fifteen months after the Act began to work; since then the pace has slowly slackened. In March, 1902, I find in the statement of liabilities and assets £711 put down as arrears of interest, but there is no entry of arrears of principal. I think it is a remarkable tribute to this system that during five years, up to 1902, there is no entry of arrears of principal and only £711 arrears of interest. The interest received by the bank in the year amounted to £23,000. The net cost of management of the South Australian Bank is £3,400; that of the New Zealand Advances Office, £3,933; that of the Victorian Advances Department and the West Australian Agricultural Bank, £4,465 and £1,450 respectively. In South Australia just over £3,200 of this is set down to officials' fees and salaries. In New Zealand salaries amount to nearly £3,200. I said 'net cost' just now because I had deducted from the total expenses of management the various fees received by the offices. The South Australian fees are extraordinarily light. All mortgages there are prepared for nothing.

I am bringing this matter to the attention of the House because it is the system that has been adopted throughout the states of the Commonwealth and, as far as I can ascertain, it has worked successfully. I just want to refer to the case of Tasmania to show that the adoption of what may be called a paternal system has not been taken advantage of in the least by the people who have borrowed from the state banks. I would refer to the Official Year Book of the Commonwealth of Australia for an outline of the system in vogue in Tasmania:

Tasmania. (i) Legislature. Under the State Advance Act 1907, assented to 22nd November of that year, authority is given to make advances to persons holding land on credit purchase. Three persons called the Trustees of the Agricultural Bank of Tasmania have power to administer the provisions of the Act. Funds were raised by the issue of debentures or inscribed stock for a sum not exceeding £50,000, interest at 4 per cent per annum being payable on same.

(ii) Purposes for which advances may be made. Loans may be granted for any of the following purposes:—(a) payment of liabilities already existing on the holding; (b) carrying on agricultural, dairying, grazing or horticultural pursuits; (c) making or adding to improvements.

(iii) Amount of loans. The minimum amount of any loan is £25, and the maximum £500. No advance may exceed one-half of the amount actually paid to the Crown in respect of the land held by the borrower under purchase upon the credit system, plus one-half of the present value of any improvements upon such land.

(iv) Repayment of loans. Interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum is payable on all advances made. After five years the borrower must begin to pay off the principal in fifty half-yearly instalments, but the advance may, at the option of the borrower, be repaid at any time sooner than is provided, and in larger instalments.

(v) Particulars of the operations of the Agricultural Bank. During the eighteen months ended 30th June, 1909, seventy-seven applications for advances were made, which, with forty-nine carried over from the previous year, made a total of 126 applications, representing £11,110. Of these, 94, of a value of £6,571, were granted, the amount advanced being £5,687. The amount repaid during the period was £30, leaving a balance of £5,657 outstanding. For the year 1909-10, the number of applications for loans was 82, totalling £5,845. The trustees of the bank approved of 61 of these, amounting to £3,593, and refused 11, representing a value of £850, owing to the applicants not being entitled to loans in accordance with the Act. During the year one borrower failed to comply with the requirements of his mortgage deed and his selection was sold.

I believe that the matter now brought before the House is worthy of serious consideration. I trust that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie will be able to influence the Government to do something in this direction, to offer some encouragement to this movement, because it will be an inestimable benefit to the farmers of the country and particularly to the farmers of western Canada. It is the duty of the Government to assist and encourage the farmers who have located in Canada, to make life as easy for them as possible and to enable those who have settled on our western prairies to make the best of their efforts to provide a competence for themselves and at the same time to add to the wealth of the country. I believe it can be done to a great extent in this way. I agree with very much that my hon friend from Portage la Prairie has said with regard to co- operative agricultural banks as they exist in Europe. I have read about them and I have satisfied myself that they have been of great service to these countries. Surely in Canada we can at least be in as advanced a stage as the countries of older Europe and as we have more modern ideas we should adopt anything from the older countries which would be helpful to the people of this new country.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I have been listening very carefully to the last two speakers. I cannot quite understand how they are going to form little co-operative companies in the West, we will say, around a township, let the farmers deposit their money with them, and at the same time expect that these societies are going to be of much benefit to the people who require such assistance. I was always led to believe that money was taken from places, such as my own locality which has been long settled, and utilized in other parts of the country where there was a greater demand for it. I could understand farmers in my section of the country forming a little co-operative bank and depositing their money in it; but what good would it do the farmers of the West if the bank could only lend the money out to the farmers in the section of the country in which it was located? As a matter of fact, farmers do put their money in the banks and the banks carry it off to the West, as also do the loan companies, and lend it out there very freely. There are places, no doubt, in the West, where they could form a local bank, such as hon. gentlemen have been talking about this afternoon, and these banks could perhaps supply money when it was needed. But it reminds me of the story of a mining camp which was blocked up for the winter; they had one fifty-dollar bill and somebody suggested the idea of passing it from hand to hand and thus paying their debts. It was passed from hand to hand until finally it came back to the first person who had possessed it. My hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) talks about the scarcity of money in the West and the great help it would be to get cheap money. Let us see what my hon. friend would accomplish if he formed little societies amongst the people, if the people put their money into these little societies and if the societies loaned it out again to the people. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) worked himself up to a pitch of enthusiasm in describing how easy it would be to obtain loans if those banks were established, but he spoiled it by quoting from some man named Wolfe, that the millennium would not arrive for a couple of years even if this plan were adopted. That shattered my hope because I thought that perhaps I might be enabled to borrow some money myself.

An hon. MEMBER: And keep the wolf from the door.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, to keep the wolf from the door, and by the way that is not a very appropriate name for an authority on banking. My hon. friend always speaks well, but I was surprised that while he was urging Parliament to do so much for the farmer by abolishing the middleman, he did not dwell for a few minutes on abolishing the duty on farm implements which we used to hear him speak so much about a couple of years ago. However, I suppose he must have something to dangle before the eyes of his constituents and we can therefore forgive him from a party point of view. I remember listening to the exponent of a co-operative system some time ago, declaring that they had formed a co-operative society with the object of doing away with the middleman, and when I asked him who marketed the fruit for the society he told me, they paid a man five per cent for doing that. I asked him what they called that fellow, and he said he didn't know, but I would call him a middleman. I have no particular fault to find with the retailer, such as I have known him; I was in the retail business myself once and anyone is welcome to all I made out of it. The retailers with whom I have been acquainted have never made a very profound fortune, although, perhaps if they get large enough, and have a large departmental store, they may make a great deal of money. They may do away with a certain number of middlemen in that way. My experience is that everybody was not intended for a farmer, any more than everybody was intended for a banker, although a great many people have the idea that they are heaven-born bankers or heaven-born something else. If we had our own money to invest in the banks, the probabilities are we would not be very keen to loan it at three and a half or even five per cent. My experience has been that the poor man, if he be honest, is able to get money just as cheaply and in proportion to his needs just as easily as the rich man. The hon. member (Mr. Meighen) told us that the credit system by these credit banks was based entirely on the honesty of the individual, and if you consult men of large experience in the manufacturing or wholesale business in this country, I think they will tell you they depend more upon the report as to the character of the man than the report as to his means. I can quite appreciate that a small co-operative bank run by high class men in a community would not lose money because those in charge of the bank would and should know the character of the people to whom they loan, and they would not run any risk in trusting them. It may be that this proposition of the hon. member for Portage La Prairie may be a solution of the discrepancy between the wealth of one man and the poverty of another, and if it is I hope it will be adopted by the Government. I believe there are a great many co-operative societies of one kind or another in this country which have done well; but it all gets down in the end to a question of proper management by one person. You have to trust some person to manage all kinds of business, and if he is upright and trustworthy and knows his job he will make the business a success, but if he has not those qualifications, the business will fail. The great banks of this country have to trust to a large extent to their managers, and so the co-operative credit banks will have to trust to their management also. So long as there is not more money than there is demand for, the probability is that rates will stay very much where they are. It is a matter of supply and demand whether the money is to be loaned by a co-operative society or a bank, or a private individual. In my section of country there happens to be a certain number of people who belong to the country that we are somewhat afraid of, and they have the habit, peculiar to themselves perhaps, of loaning money to one another at a very cheap rate of interest—just about what they would get today if the money were deposited in the bank. But they will not loan money to anyone else. If a man happens to live even five miles away, they will not loan to him no matter what he is worth. They do not even take the trouble to take a mortgage; they accept a man's note, or even word. We could not have such little communities all over the country, or the great commercial business of the country would certainly suffer.

Mr. CARVELL: It would be the millennium.

Mr. NESBITT: It would. I should like to have got in to borrow some money from them myself. But they knew too much about me, and would not loan to me. The fact is, the ordinary money lender around our section does a large share of the business. There is a great deal of money loaned by private people. About one-half the demand for mortgages is satisfied with money from private people. Until the demand came from the West for money, that is, until about two years ago, many of these private individuals loaned money at five per cent. But it was not very long after the trust companies and loan companies raised their rate of interest when these private individuals got wise to the fact that they could get more for their money, and they raised their rates also. So, now, it is difficult to borrow money for less than six per cent. There are a few people still, people who are not willing that their money should get immediately out of their sight, that it should not leave their own close community, who will loan money probably at a little less. I only make these few remarks, lest some of my fellow-members who have not had as much experience in trying to borrow money as I have had might begin to think that from this date there would be no difficulty in borrowing.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): After listening for somewhat over an hour to the very lucid and exhaustive address of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), I feel sure that the members of this House will agree with me that very little information could be added on the subject so ably treated by him. Coming, however, as I do, from a constituency that is not agricultural but is rather industrial, I think, perhaps, it is not unfair that I should draw the attention of the House to the fact that the condition that the hon. member says exists in the agricultural districts also exists—perhaps in a less degree—in the industrial centres of Ontario. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) seems to discuss this measure with the idea that it would bring about the millennium. I doubt that any of us will live to see the millennium, because, like the horizon, it will always be beyond us. But, if I understand the function and opportunity of Parliament, it is not to seek the millennium, but to take such steps in legislation that advancement may be possible and the condition of the people somewhat bettered. I agree with what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie says that at the basis of all credit is the integrity, the honesty and the worth of the borrower. But when you come to borrow from the large financial institutions of this country, something more than honesty, integrity and worth of character is demanded—that is, a tangible security. And it is just here that the ordinary worker fails. He has the integrity, the honesty and the worth of character, but in the period of pinch he is unable to produce the security upon which the loan is necessarily made. If I understand the position of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, it is this—and I may say I have dabbled a little in the subject myself, and have read pamphlets upon it—that in the dealings of the working classes and agricultural communities with the banks there is no readiness in their management to make loans because the local managers are apt to deal in big things and do not know the worth of the individual worker. The hon. member offers as the solution of this difficulty that men should bind themselves together in small groups, each known to the other as a man of worth and honesty, and, as each does not at the same time require to borrow from the central fund, they establish that each in time of need borrow from the available funds for the advancement of his interests. I believe that this is sound in principle. The banking system of Canada as worked out, is a series of institutions, and there is no one of us who will dispute that there has been a tendency in the past few years to gather together the funds of the community in the less populous districts and carry them to the great centres, not for the advancement of commerce or the general interest of the people, but rather for purposes of promotion and flotation. As compared with the small places in the United States where they have the unit system of banks, I think the small centres of this country suffer considerably. Where some $50,000 or $60,000 or $100,000 is collected from the people of an immediate neighbourhood, a board of directors chosen, each of whom knows the constituency to be served, ready means of credit is offered. It would be useless to cite instances here and there, but those who know the American as compared with the Canadian system cannot be blind to the fact that many of the small centres of the United States, more particularly the border towns, of which I have some knowledge, have made tremendous progress through the industrious activity of the boards of directors of these small banks and the loan of money for the industrial activities of the district.

I will not take up the time of the House with any further comment beyond saying that the scheme outlined by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie is one that meets with my most hearty sympathy; and I think its adoption under carefully drawn regulations would do much to extend to the labouring and agricultural classes of this country the credit they much need and which at the present time they are denied.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): It is always interesting to listen to my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie. I admire very much his great ability, an ability which he displays in a very close and accurate study of any question to which he directs his attention and in the power of lucid statement by which he brings the result of his accurate study to the consideration of this House. I am glad that opportunity has been afforded him to unburden himself after what must have been the exercise of a very considerable power of self-restraint in connection with a subject closely allied to that which he has propounded this afternoon. I thought I observed symptoms in my hon. friend, of whom I have been a close watcher during the discussion of the Bank Act, indicating that he would have liked to have spoken on the subject, and I offer him my congratulations that he has found this much needed relief for a mental condition from which many of us at times suffer, and in regard to which a lack of legitimate relief is liable to be serious. I have one criticism to offer my hon. friend and that is that he has too many pious opinions. I understand a pious opinion to be one upon which we bestow a great deal of labour in its acquirement, and a great deal of energy in its presentation, but we hesitate very much before taking the necessary steps to put it into practice. My hon. friend delivered in the last Parliament a speech of greater analytical ability, I think, than that which we have just heard—not that I desire in this statement, to lessen the ability of to-day's speech—on the subject of the reduction of duty upon agricultural implements. In his action upon that occasion, we have a splendid example of a pious opinion, because, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) has pointed out, the party of my hon. friend is now in power, and he has, I am sure, very great influence with that party, but when the party comes in, the pious opinions seem to go out. We have never heard a remark from the hon. member for Portage la Prairie since this Government came into power, regarding the necessity for a substantial reduction in the duty upon agricultural implements. I would counsel him to get rid of this frame of mind. I am one of the lenient judges of the present Administration. I have from time to time expressed my very great interest in my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I think I may claim a personal friendship with the head of the Administration, and I can certainly proclaim very honestly a sincere regard for his personality, but in a candid moment, I am bound to say that although the present Administration has been in power for eighteen months I do not know of any good that has come to any man, woman or child in Canada during that time, unless it be the benefit to a large number of civil servants who have been provided with their livings by the dismissal of others from office.

With regard to my hon. friend's remarks on this subject, I think he expressed too great surprise—if I rightly followed him—at the magnificent results of co-operation in banking. He told us that only honest men participate in this business, and that the first action of those undertaking the working of the system is to inquire with the utmost care as to whether those proposed to be admitted to membership are thoroughly honest and upright persons. It is evident that good financial and moral results are very likely to accrue amongst people of that description—the very basis upon which the movement is started ensures this condition. Of course, the power of benefiting humanity along this line of organized effort, if this care is always exercised, would clearly be limited by the number of honest and upright people there are in society, and I very much fear that there is considerable room for exclusion in the choice of the members who would be permitted to join such a society, even in so upright and honest a country as Canada. However, I merely desire to express my surprise at the remarks of the hon. gentleman in this regard, and, with that surprise, I am bound to express a doubt as to how far he will be enabled to extend the benefits of this system in Canada at the present juncture in her history.

I am not sure that there was not some false reasoning in what my hon. friend said on this subject. He seemed to attribute the good results of the system entirely to co-operation, but I think the good effects of the system result from the character of the people who are engaged in that system. There was another point in my hon. friend's remarks which I could not quite follow. He was careful to impress upon us very emphatically the fact that he had no objection to the middleman, and he went on to make what, to my mind, was a somewhat sweeping statement. So far as I was able to note his remarks, he said, 'Nevertheless, it is the duty of this Parliament to bring the consumer and the producer as nearly together as possible.' In my ordinary operations as a producer, I have no objection to following that course of action, and I think that if a producer can get the profits of the middleman as well as the original price of his own products, so much the better; but I never thought that in so disposing of my products I was very partial to the middleman. In fact, I dismissed him from my consideration, and saw that he ceased to be a factor in my financial universe. If it be our duty to bring the consumer and the producer as nearly together as possible, and if it be true that the more we do this the more we benefit the general community, I should say that we are not very friendly to the middleman; and so I could not quite understand why the hon. gentleman was so anxious to say he had no objection to the middleman. I think if you entirely eliminate a man from the sphere of operations, you are objecting to him in a very practical manner. I very much doubt whether my hon. friend is right in his general opinion that the more we eliminate the middleman the more good we confer upon the general community. I am not now making any remarks that are calculated to help me with my producers, but I will have a chance to explain that to them when I go out among them. On private members' day we can discuss these questions in a philosophic spirit. For once, at any rate, I am a theorist, and I feel that I am in good company, for, as I have just pointed out, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, in so far as he entertains a pious opinion, is a pure theorist. The hon. gentleman has sometimes chaffed me good naturedly for being a theorist, and I think I have now caught him in the same company.

I think that good arguments could have been advanced on the other side of the question, but in so far as my hon. friend's remarks are calculated to breed false hopes and discontent in the minds of the producers of the country, his arguments are not to be approved.

I, like my friend, have no objection to the middleman and I go further than that, it is only with the evolution of the complexities of modern society that the middleman has developed. In the elementary stage of society, when trade is hardly known in a country and when it is totally unknown between different countries of the earth, there is no middleman, but I submit to you in that stage of development you have not the highest good that comes to a community and you certainly have a very elementary condition in the production of the wealth. It is by a wider cooperation than that which my hon. friend discussed this afternoon that the wealth of nations is produced. It is trading that produces the wealth of nations and to trade in its widest development, whether within a country or between the various countries of the earth, the middleman is as absolutely a necessity as either the producer or the consumer. It is by this wider cooperation of all classes, bringing into the pool the varied faculties of all classes of men, that you produce the greatest wealth and the greatest good to the whole community and I would say in that connection that the poorest of the poor in a country that has reached the stage of civilization at which we have arrived in Canada to-day are better off than the richest of the rich in the earliest stage of society where no middleman exists at all. I commend that to my hon. friend and I think if he looks around it well he will see that with the strong protectionist bias which unfortunately he has in view he sometimes takes a false line in his thinking. I certainly cannot understand how he sets out with the statement that he has no obection to the middleman but nevertheless proceeds in his system of philosophy to eliminate him, to rub him off the slate altogether. I should certainly think that if anyone wanted to do that to me he had some objection to me somewhere in his make-up. You might just as well tell a man that you like him very well, but at the same time hound your dog on him. That would not be a good way of showing the liking you have for the middleman.

In regard to what the Government will do in this matter we shall, I suppose, hear presently from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I certainly think that my hon. friend from Portage has made out such a case, by the statistics he has given of the operation of this principle in other countries, that we have a right to expect that this shall not be a mere forensic exercise on the part of my hon. friend but that the Government will go on to show that this is not a process of dangling something before certain sections of the community, as cheap agricultural instruments were dangled before the farmers of the West prior to September 1911, never to be heard of since. I hope this is not a case of dangling something; I hope the minister will give us an assurance that the Government give these poor people, for whom my friend is the eloquent and able advocate, all the facilities they can for adopting this principle, for carrying it out and for getting any of those benefits that it contains and which have been so eloquently portrayed by my hon. friend.

Mr. F. R. LALOR (Haldimand): I desire to compliment the hon. member for Portage la Prairie on the able address he has given this afternoon. As others have already stated, the member for Portage la Prairie speaks on a subject only when he has prepared himself with great care, and I am sure that he deserves the thanks of the House for his able and careful address. But I must say I do not altogether agree with him in the argument he has used as applied to business and banking in Canada. I fear that in the discussion of the Bank Act and banking questions before this House we perhaps sometimes have too many members with too strong and too radical ideas upon what the banks should do and upon banking conditions in Canada. I speak as a business man and as a manufacturer. I have always been a large borrower of money from the banks and have never reached that time when I was a money lender. I have always been in the position of being a money borrower and the only difficulty I have had has been in trying to borrow more than the banks would lend in order that I might expand and my business grow. I want to speak in complimentary terms of the banking system of Canada. It is probably to-day as fine and as good as can be found in any country of the world. I have heard men state to-day that the banking system of the United States was preferable to ours. I do not agree with that at all. I come from a border constituency where I know something of the banking in the United States and have had some experience. Our banking in Canada is upon a very much more liberal and more generous plane than that of the United States and while I must say I think that the banks do not pay enough interest on money, especially in times of stringency to depositors, in the United States they do not pay nearly as much as our banks do, they are not nearly as liberal with depositors as ours are. The banks in Canada have built up and made the great manufacturing and mercantile interests of this country and have done more to increase the business interests of Canada than any other influence. I do not think it is or should be the object of the Parliament of Canada to do anything that would tend to lessen the influence of the banks but rather to stimulate them and increase the good they are doing in this country, if it is possible to do so.

I do not know whether the House realizes to-day just the position we are in in Canada. We are face to face with one of the greatest money stringencies we have ever known. I believe to-day that the money stringency in Canada is as great as or greater than it was in 1907 when we passed through such a crisis and the conditions to-day are different to what they were then. In the United States in 1907 they had a much greater stringency than we had, conditions were more acute than in Canada, and we complimented ourselves in Canada that they were in so much better position than they were across the border. But that is not the case to-day. Unfortunately in Canada to-day the money situation is worse than in the United States. Money is much easier over there than it is here and, so far as I am able to judge, and from what I can collect in the way of information from banking sources, I think the situation in Canada to-day is alarming for business men, manufacturers and farmers alike who want to borrow money. It is not up to us to-day to pass radical measures in this House that will hamper and do harm to the great business interests of this country. I think it is not the proper time to take up measures of this kind that may tend to do us harm in the future.

Our friends in the West talk about the farmers there not being able to borrow money. My experience with banks has been that the farmer who wants to borrow $100 or a small amount, whatever it may be, from a local bank, is able to obtain it from the bank if he has good credit and good character behind him, and so far as the West is concerned, in respect to the money the farmers want to borrow, I believe that a very large amount of money is sent from eastern Canada to the West in order to help them out there with their financial troubles. I would not be surprised if more money goes West to assist the farmers in the way of banking and money borrowing, than comes from the West to the East to assist us in eastern Canada.

So far as concerns co-operation in small banking concerns, such as my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie suggests, I am not able to say that that is going to be of any great advantage to us. I cannot understand how local people can start a very small bank with $5 subscriptions, such as my hon. friend speaks of, and raise enough money to do very much in the way of relieving the situation in respect to money borrowing in that particular locality. My experience is that local money lenders who have money to lend to people by note for small amounts are not philanthropists by any means, or men who are anxious to lend that money out at a very low rate of interest, in order to relieve the people who desire to borrow. On the contrary, they are generally people who want a higher rate of interest. Judging from my experience in my own locality I cannot see how any relief could be granted in that way that would assist the farmers to any great extent. I believe that to-day we have the best banking system in the world. The banks of Canada are generous in lending money, and I believe they do everything possible to encourage and assist the manufacturer, the merchant and the farmer, in all sections of this country. It is a system of which we may well feel proud, and in place of having radical ideas of banking, and of surrounding the banks with conditions and circumstances that would make it harder for people to borrow money, we should be generous in our legislation, but at the same time we should use care to see that the public interests are safeguarded. To-day when money is so scarce, and conditions are so severe, we should move with very great care in the matter of banking and banking legislation.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): It was not my intention to make any remarks in connection with the resolution now before the House, but in view of some statements that have been made by the last speaker, I do not think we should allow the discussion to drop at this stage. I feel that we owe a debt of gratitude to the mover of this resolution for dealing with the matter so fully as he did. He showed that he had studied the question more thoroughly possibly than most of us. I have followed carefully for a few years the system that has been adopted in the European countries, particularly with regard to co-operation, not only in banking but also among the agricultural people of those countries, and the success that has resulted from that system is such, I think, as to justify careful consideration of the resolution that is now before the House.

I was somewhat surprised at some of the remarks that fell from the lips of the last speaker. He said that this was not the proper time to introduce radical legislation with regard to our banking system, and that our banking system had built up the great manufacturing and merchantile industries of Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite apparent to every one in this country that there is something radically wrong in connection with our basic industry, agriculture. If there is any one thing more than another upon which Canada depends it is upon agriculture. No country has ever been more richly endowed from an agricultural standpoint, and yet the great difficulty that confronts not only the Dominion but the various provinces, is getting the people on the land or to prevent them from flocking into the industrial centres. Notwithstanding the satisfactory prices that they are obtaining for their produce to-day, I believe that those engaged in agriculture are hampered to a greater extent in carrying on their operations than at any previous stage of their existence. I believe that the co-operative system which has been adopted in Germany, in France, in Belgium, and in Denmark, is one that is bound to come into effect in this country and that it is going to overcome the difficulties we have now to contend with. I would not like to suggest what ought to be done with our banking system; I would not like to say that it is the duty of the Government to do a great deal towards inaugurating co-operation in banking. I believe that should originate and will originate among the people themselves. I do not believe that it comes within the province of a Government to do those things, but when any hon. member of this House says anything that will discourage co-operation in banking or in the marketing of agricultural products in this country he says what is not in the interests of our country nor yet the producers or consumers. When you look around to-day you find, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, that our branch banking system is draining to the very dregs, one might say, the products of our country. The wealth of our country is being centralized; it is being drawn into the large centres of industry, and it is not being invested there to promote or to carry on agriculture. Go to any of the large cities, or even to the small towns of western Canada, or take any of the cities in the province of Ontario with a population of 100,000 or more, and you will find that one hundred feet of land in those cities or outside of them will realize as much money as one hundred acres situated conveniently to shipping facilities in old Ontario, and possessing it may be, $5,000 worth of buildings. You will find one hundred feet of land that is non-productive in a city or adjacent to a city, commanding as great a price as the one hundred acres of rich agricultural land with $5,000 worth of buildings upon it. For any one to say that there is not something radically wrong is to say something that is not in accordance with the facts I hope that this matter will receive the attention of the Government and the serious consideration of the Minister of Finance, and that some measure will be evolved that will assist the farmers of this country to co-operate not only in the carrying on of their business but in getting the money that they are producing circulated for the advancement of agriculture. Anyone who knows anything about agriculture, for instance in the province from which I come, must realize that the lands now under cultivation ought to and perhaps would double what they are producing if conditions were what we would like to see them. I know that many people will say this is a fad, and that it is radical legislation; but we must look at conditions as they are, and I quite agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that the branch banking system is a detriment to our country, that it is drawing to the large industrial centres the wealth of our country, and that instead of assisting agriculture it is handicapping it in such a way as to result in great injury not only to the people living in those industrial centres, but also to those engaged in agriculture. Why is it that in this great province of Ontario we find that the agricultural population is declining from year to year notwithstanding the immense area of rich agricultural land which we have in the province? We find that there are about 120,000 less people on the land to-day than there were fifteen years ago. In the old settled counties the decrease has been in a much greater proportion, because in many of the newer districts, they have had an increase in population during that time. This is one of the most serious questions that this country has to face and I hope it will receive the careful consideration of this House. I have no doubt that the resolution that has been moved will result in good. I would not have spoken upon this question had it not been for some of the remarks which were made in opposition to the motion before the House.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire not only to congratulate but, if I may do so, to compliment my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) for the very admirable and, indeed, fascinating manner in which he has presented this important subject to the attention of the House. This resolution requests that the matter should receive the early attention of the Government. I may say that, not only is the Government prepared to accept the resolution and to give the matter its early and careful attention, but that this question is one which has already engaged my attention. I have done a considerable amount of reading in reference to it, not so much, I think, as my hon. friend from whom I have derived, in common with other members of the House, to-day, a great deal of useful information.

The principle of co-operation has achieved great triumphs in Europe; there is no question about that. This is the case not only with regard to the credit organizations and the landschaften banks, to which my hon. friend has specially alluded, but also in connection with the buying and selling of commodities by farmers. For example, the farmers in Germany, France and other parts of Europe, will co-operate jointly in buying their supplies, fertilizers, agricultural implements, the principle being that they buy to better advantage if they buy in large amounts. They also co-operate in selling, they form co-operative societies and they engage managers who are experts. It is the business of these managers or experts to advise the farmers as to the best time for marketing their produce and in that way the farmer derives benefit from the expert knowledge of the manager of the association. Farming in Europe, as in this country, has become very much more of a business than it used to be, and it is necessary not only that the farmer should produce but that he should know the methods that will give the best results in his agricultural operations and that he should be able to dispose of his product to the best possible advantage.

I think we should not lose sight, however, of the fact that co-operation, as it is known in Europe to-day, is, like all other institutions useful to mankind, the product of gradual growth. It really sprang from the necessities of the people in Europe. There the farmers were to a very large extent the victims of usurers and in the marketing of their produce they were at a great disadvantage by reason of the interposition of so many middlemen. The co-operative system has been devised and perfected from time to time with the view of giving the farmers money for productive purposes at a low rate of interest, for enabling the farmers to organize their credit, to use the technical term, and to market their products to the best advantage. In reality it is the principle of the division of labour and of co-operation. The results, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, have been exceedingly striking. The credit society, or the credit association, or the credit bank, is based largely upon the principle that joint credit is much more efficacious than individual credit. A number of farmers who know each other, who are confident of the trustworthiness of each other, who are desirous of furthering the interests of the community, get together and form a credit association. That could only be done in a community in which there is a fixity of conditions, in which the people know and trust each other, because, of course, one man will not be willing to pledge his credit, even jointly with another, unless he knows and can trust the other; nor will men be willing to loan money to the individual members of the association unless they have confidence in the integrity of the member to whom the money is to be loaned. But given a community in which there is a fixity and stability of conditions, an old settled community, in which, let us say, land values are fairly stable and in which the people know each other and know that a man is not going to depart from the district overnight, we can realize how easy it is to form these credit associations, the principle of which is the value of joint credit.

As pointed out by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, the members may contribute a small sum or fee, or in some cases, they may become members without the payment of a fee. The society, when formed, borrows money either by way of deposits from its members or from the public and loans that money in the manner which he has indicated to the members of the society. But it must be borne in mind that a loan is only made for a productive or provident purpose; it would not be made for an extravagant purpose. The idea is that the man who is preparing certain of his produce for market may obtain a loan in order to have the necessary capital to prepare his produce. A man may desire to drain or otherwise improve his farm and the money is loaned to him for that purpose. The expenditure is always productive or at least provident. Under the conditions I have mentioned and with the members of the community having perfect confidence in each other, and carrying on business for the mutual advantage of the members, one can quite realize how advantageous this is not only to the community but, when multiplied by the number of societies that my hon friend has mentioned, one can understand how valuable it is to the nation.

But we must bear in mind that certain conditions are essential to the success of a credit association. As to the landschaften banks, in this country funds are loaned to farmers and to others by way of mortgage. The average mortgage is for five years. Sometimes there is a provision made for a small annual payment on account of principal but generally speaking, the entire loan matures at the end of five years with a rate of interest payable in the meantime. Rates of interest vary in different parts of the country and for reasons which I think will be within the knowledge of the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Buchanan) said that lenders did not so readily lend their money in a remote community, and that is obvious. I remember some years ago, when I had a good deal of money to loan, I used to recommend the lenders to loan it in the West where the rates were considerably higher than in the East and where in my judgment the security upon farm lands was adequate. But, I found they would rather accept five or five and a half per cent in Ontario than eight or nine per cent in the West, not because the security in the West was not as good as in the East, but because they were not so well acquainted with the conditions as they were with those which prevailed nearer home. It must be remembered that Germany and France have vast accumulations of capital and are lending communities, whilst speaking generally, Canada is a borrowing community. Where these co-operating societies flourish on the continent of Europe, there is capital readily available to take up the debentures of the landschaften companies, because the investors know the value of the land. It occurred to me when I read the message sent by the President of the United States to the governors of the different states in regard to this matter, that it would not be as easy as the president thought to obtain the money for land mortgage societies or banks loaning upon land in Texas or the western States, as it would be for the landschaften banks to obtain money in Germany or France where the value of the land was known and where they had confidence in the security. Of course, if the securities of the societies organized in the United States were to be sold abroad, the investors would have to be satisfied as to the land values in these remote districts. It is no doubt on account of considerations of that kind that my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) intimated that at present it might be premature to consider the incorporation of institutions analogous to the landschaften banks. As to the credit associations, they have been brought to the attention of Parliament for some years, and they have had a very considerable degree of success in the province of Quebec. Where you get a community fairly densely populated and where the need exists, these banks ought to be successful. But the success of these institutions and their development in European countries is due to the need which existed: usurious interest, and the necessity of improving worn-out and impoverished soil. Where you have in Canada populous communities needing the money for improving land, or for other productive purposes in connection with agriculture, I see no reason why these credit banks should not succeed. Whether they would be successful in districts sparsely populated and in which the residents do not know each other, is a question that would have to be carefully considered, and that of course would develop in the working out of the system. I appreciate the desirability of a uniform system brought about by general legislation which would enable these credit associations to incorporate subject to the same general regulations and by-laws throughout the country. I believe that, not only for the reason given by my hon friend (Mr. Meighen) that a citizen coming from one province to another should find the same conditions prevailing, but also because of the fact that it is necessary for the successful operation of the credit associations on a large scale, that there should be central institutions which become their bankers. Germany has a population of over eighty millions, and yet the area of Germany is not as great as the area of Saskatchewan or Alberta, which brings us to a realization of the size of Canada. Although the provinces have jurisdiction, it might be well to consider the question of a general Dominion Act, with the necessary safeguards, under which this system might be given a trial. I have given the matter some attention already. I shall be very glad—I may say the Government will be very glad—to give the matter careful study; to take into consideration all that has been stated here to-day, and to inform ourselves with a view of seeing whether a uniform system, such as my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has referred to, would be feasible for the whole country. The average mortgage loan in Canada is for five years with interest in the interim at a stipulated rate, and my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has quite properly called attention to one prominent feature of the landschaften system, under which amortization takes place so that the farmer is paying not only his interest but at the same time a portion of the principle each year over a period of years, until the principal is all paid back. I should think, although I am not quite positive as to it, that they are enabled to do that in Europe by reason of the fact that there these institutions sell their debentures running over long periods. The average debenture of the loan companies in Canada is for five years, and while loan companies frequently make loans at ten years, especially if the rate of interest is good, the system of a mortgage running thirty or forty years, during which provision is made in the annual payment for the extinguishment of the principal as well as the interest, has not been adopted here. I hardly think that system is likely to be generally adopted by the loan companies, trust companies and insurance companies that do business in the West. I was much surprised to hear the figures given by my hon. friend as to the amount loaned on mortgages in Canada. I think he stated it at $750,000,000; I should not have thought that it was so large. I looked into the question not very long ago for my own satisfaction and found from the returns, which I think are not very full, that some $200,000,000 was loaned by life insurance companies, loan companies and trust companies in the three prairie provinces. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) raised the very interesting question whether the Federal Government could make loans to farmers. Of course, that is a very wide question indeed. The amount mentioned by my hon. friend as representing the entire amount of loans to farmers in Canada is so very large—two and a half times the national debt—and the requirements of the country so very great, with our large public works that must receive continually increasing expenditure, that I think my hon. friend will realize that there would be a great difficulty in the way of carrying out his suggestion. For it must always be borne in mind that any legislation of that kind would have to be general in its character, that particular communities or individuals could not be favoured. Altogether, while I was glad to hear from him with regard to the matter, I am afraid I could not hold out any hopes of the Government engaging in the business of making loans, by way of mortgage or otherwise to individuals.

Something has been said with regard to the branch bank system of Canada and the unit system of the United States. I shall not deal with that at length. No doubt, something can be said for both systems. But I believe that both in Canada and in the United States the branch bank system is favoured as superior to the unit system. In periods of stringency the unit system experiences tight money conditions just the same as the branch bank system. But I believe that the system in the United States has been that in such periods—as in 1907 and 1893—the unit system is less able to withstand the money conditions that prevail than is the branch bank system. The merit claimed for our system has been adverted to in the House. Under that system the money is gathered from various sections of the community, and is available for use in such sections as need it. Take, for instance, the fall of the year and the moving the crop in the West,—there is no doubt that immense sums flow from the eastern part of Canada to the western part for the purpose of moving the western crops. In my inquiry last fall in connection with the question of the advisability of giving the western farmer the privilege of borrowing against grain, I ascertained that in the case of two banks alone no less a sum than $50,000,000 was loaned to farmers in the West in sums varying from $25 to $30 to $20,000 or $30,000. I have no estimate—nor do I believe such an estimate is available—of the amount of money loaned by all the chartered banks in the West, but I believe that the total sum loaned in the fall would run into very large figures indeed. It has been brought to my attention this afternoon by communication from one of the largest of our banks to one of the members of the House that the deposits of that particular bank in the West are just half the money they have loaned in the West. So, I hardly think it is fair to the existing situation—and I am sure we all wish to be fair—to say that the money is deliberately taken away from any particular section of the country and thrown into other sections. There is, of course, a flow of bank money going on continuously throughout Canada; it flows West to move the crop, and flows East again for the purposes of commerce. It is a fact that, especially in the stringent money conditions that have prevailed during the past year or more—and especially in periods when money is tight—that all sections of the community suffer from lack of bank accommodation. It is also true that some sections suffer very much more than others. But I do not believe you can make a sweeping general statement either way. I think possibly there is something in what has been said, that the remoter districts suffer more than those that are more central. But it is an undoubted fact that if, at times, no money is available for loaning to farmers also, at times, there is very severe curtailment of business credit, as stated by my hon. friend from Kingston. In other words, what I think happens from time to time is this: Let money stringency, which is generally world-wide, exist, as at the present time, and there is a curtailment of credit all around, and all classes of the community feel it. No doubt, there are many distressing cases. But the cause of it, I think, is that, with the enormous expansion and development that we have had in this country of recent years, our credit and the money available to carry on the business of the country has had a very severe strain put upon it. Many causes enter as factors into tight-money conditions. It has even been stated that the high cost of living is one of the factors. Good times, the demand for money all over the world is another great factor. There is still another factor which I have never heard urged in this House, but which in my judgment, has played a very great part indeed in causing the high rates of interest that have prevailed generally for the last ten years, and that is the enormous aggregate expenditure made by nations at war. I do not believe that we realize what a factor this is in the situation. Looking back over the past twelve years or more, we find, first the Spanish-American war, the Boer war, the Russo-Japan war, the Turko-Italian war, and now the Balkan war. So we see that there has been a series of wars in which an enormous amount of money has been expended unproductively, and of that money the commerce of the world has been deprived.

I must apologize to the House for speaking under such disadvantages with regard to my voice. I should have remained at home, but on account of the interest I have in the subject, and as it was more particularly in my department, I desired to put in an appearance and deal with it, if only briefly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With your kind indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to offer a word or two by way of reply. I have to thank the Minister of Finance for his very indulgent treatment of my remarks, and I have only one or two statements to make with reference to what he said as to my remark that the mortgage loans of Canada to farmers would amount to $750,000,000. I think he has misapprehended my statement, as what I intended to say was that the borrowed capital of the farmers of Canada could be safely estimated at $750,000,000. I took the $6,000,000,000 estimated by the Monetary Commission as the borrowed capital of the farmers of the United States, comparing the larger proportion of farmers in Canada to those in the United States, I thought that one-eighth of that would fairly estimate the borrowed capital of the farmers of Canada.

The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) interpreted my speech as an attack on the branch bank system. I made no such attack, and I stated clearly that I thought it an admirable system in many ways, but that it was in sad need of complement in the way of co-operative banks.

I appreciate the honesty and sincerity of the convictions of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) as to the merits of our present system, but I think he also misapprehended what I was urging upon the House. Surely it cannot be said, at this stage in the world's history, that co-operative banking is a radical innovation! Surely it cannot be said that it has no purpose to serve, when it has already served a purpose compared with which very few of the movements of the world can present so great results. As to whether it will be of any benefit in borrowing communities as against loaning communities, this, at any rate, can be said: it will retain in the borrowing community a reasonable amount of the savings of that community, whereas under present conditions the funds are capable of being moved to other and more distant centres.

I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer. (Mr. Clark) and would thank him for his very kind references to myself. He thinks however, that, under the cover of one sentence, I have made an attack on the middleman, and endeavoured to entirely eliminate him and wipe him off the earth. I said I had no quarrel with the middleman, and that so long as certain trade operations demanded his services, his functions in the world was as much to be respected as that of any other man. I did say that there existed a necessity for bringing the producer and the consumer as closely together as possible, for by doing so it is clear that in so far as you liberate the middleman from his office you add him to the producing community, and contribute to the wealth of that community. There was no intention on my part of attacking the middleman in any way, and certainly, with the progress of civilization, he has a function to perform. I think the House will observe in the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer a very strange inconsistency. He concluded by enthusiastically supporting the co-operative bank system, whereas one of the main purposes of co-operative banks is to eliminate the middleman in banking. When he supports this resolution, he is dealing just as deadly a blow at the middleman as I could possibly do. It is the unnecessary middleman that should be eliminated, not the necessary one. As to the reference of the hon. gentleman to my influence with the Government in reducing protection, I may say that I have never pretended to be other than an advocate of moderate protection in this country, and I believe that a system of moderate protection requires adjustment in individual instances, as conditions demand. This principle, which I advocated two years ago, I adhere to still, and the hon. member for Red Deer may be assured that my influence with the Government will be directed towards securing the adoption of that principle. I have witnessed with pleasure the fact that the Government has lent a very ready ear to the call of the people for a reduction of the duty when it is in the interests of the public, and I earnestly hope that the Minister of Finance, when at any future time he hears the same call, will keep in mind what happened in respect to the reduction of duty on cement, and will not be deterred in his duty through apprehension of resistance from the leader of the Opposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I want it permanent, not spasmodic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I sat under the Liberal Government in this House with the hon. member for Red Deer, an ardent free trader, for three years. I witnessed the exertions he made on the Government of the day in bringing about his ambitions. Now I have certain hopes that do amount to a little but the least the most modest hope I have is that my influence with the present Government will not be less than his was with the last.

PORTSMOUTH PENITENTIARY.

*Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Have charges against D. O'Leary, deputy warden, and Doctor Phelan, surgeon of Portsmouth penitentiary, been submitted to the hon. the Minister of Justice? If so, when were such charges submitted, and what were the charges against each?
2. Has an investigation been asked for? If so, when?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a commission to investigate the aforesaid charges? If so, when?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a commission to investigate generally the administration of affairs in Portsmouth penitentiary? If so, when?

*Mr. DOHERTY:

1. A letter was received by the Minister of Justice about the 3rd of December last, containing charges against the persons mentioned. Pending investigation, it is not deemed desirable to publish the charges.

2. The said letter did not ask for an investigation as regards these charges, but requested serious consideration of them, as in the opinion of the writer warranting his asking for the removal from office of the said parties accused. The minister stated in reply that the charges appeared to call for enquiry and pointed out that it would appear proper that before appointing a commissioner to make such inquiry, the accusations, should be submitted to the parties accused, for the purpose of eliciting any reply they might desire to make, and that before communicating with the said parties accused, he desired to be informed whether the writer was willing that he should transmit them copy of his letter, or if he preferred that the accusation be communicated to them in some other form. To this a reply was received to the effect that the party making the charges quite agreed that copies of the accusations should be sent to the accused, but was not sure that it would be in the best interest of a fair investigation to do more than that, and that the commission of inquiry which the minister proposed to appoint would bring out the facts and that he was quite willing to go before that commission and restate what he had written. He further intimated that there were other officials whose conduct should be investigated, and expressed the hope that the commission would be given wide powers. This reply was dated December 6, 1912.

3 and 4. The Government has in contemplation the appointment of a commission to investigate generally the administration of the penitentiary, and this at the earliest moment at which such investigation can conveniently be made. An opportunity will thus be afforded the person accusing to bring forward the particular charges above referred to.

*Mr. EDWARDS:

1. When was Major W. S. Hughes first appointed as an official on the staff of Portsmouth penitentiary, what positions has he held there, and how long in each?
2. Has the said Major Hughes been recommended, either verbally or in writing, for the position of warden of Portsmouth penitentiary by twenty-five or thirty members of this House from Ontario, by eight or ten members of the Ontario legislature, by several Conservatives executives in the province of Ontario, by inspectors Douglas Stewart and George W. Dawson, or by the Deputy Minister of Justice?
3. Has the hon. the Minister of Justice received a paper favourable to Major Hughes, signed by a number of officials of said penitentiary? If so, what was the wording of such paper and by how many officials was it signed?
4. How many officials are on the staff of the said penitentiary?
5. Has the hon. the Minister of Justice received a paper favourable to Major Hughes from ex-officials of said penitentiary? If so, how was it worded by how many signed, and how many of the signers were Protestants, and how many Roman Catholics?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. January 13, 1893. Warden's clerk, one year; warden's clerk and clerk of industries, two years; chief keeper and clerk of industries, seven years; accountant and clerk of industries, ten years.
2, 3, and 5. Recommendations from different sources have been received in favour of Major W. S. Hughes, as well as of other persons. It is neither usual nor desirable to make public such recommendations, more particularly before any appointment has been made to the position in question.
4. Total number of officials, 94.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not catch any answer to the third question. I do not see any reason why I should not have that information. I am not asking for the names of any officials; I am merely asking for the number. I did not hear that I got any answer to No. 5 either.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question No. 7.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I rise to a question of privilege, then. If members are privileged to ask questions they are privileged to get answers, and I do not see any reason why I should not get an answer. I want to know if I am going to have an answer or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is that the minister gives such answers as he thinks desirable, and no member is entitled to insist on anything beyond that.

GATROS WHARF.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Is the Government aware that just previous to the holding of the provincial general election in the province of New Brunswick in June last, that a number of men were said to be engaged and employed in building a side bed to the Dominion Government wharf at Gatros village, county of Westmorland, New Brunswick, and that an expenditure of about two hundred dollars was made in the construction of said side bed for said wharf, and that the work was undertaken under the direction and instruction of Mr. James P. Sherry, of Memramcook, N.B., who, as alleged, authorized the same and instructed the employment of the men engaged on the work?
2. Was the said work authorized by the Department of Public Works, or the Minister of Public Works, or by any officer of the department? If so, by whom?
3. Has the department paid out any sum or sums of money in connection with said works? If so, to whom and what amount?
4. Is the Government, or the Department of Public Works, or the minister thereof, aware that the workmen who were said to be employed or engaged in such work have never been paid therefor, and that not a cent has been received by them, as alleged?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.
2. The chief engineer authorized the district engineer to expend $300.
3. No.
4. Vouchers and paylists were received to-day the 13th, for work done, amounting to $169.50

HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. MARTIN:

How many inspections were made by homestead inspectors Brandt, Balfour and Ouellette during the months of June and July, 1912?

Mr. ROCHE: Brandt, 8; Balfour, 21; Ouellette, 15.

CROSS ROADS, OHIO AND JAMES RIVER MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

1. Who is the contractor for carrying the mail between Cross Roads, Ohio and James River station, Antigonish county?
2. When was the contract awarded to him, and at what figure?
3. Were tenders called for the service before the contract was entered into? If so, who were the tenderers and at what figures, respectively?

4. Were any complaints made against the late contractor? If so, what were they, and by whom made?

Mr. PELLETIER: This contract not being yet completed, it is not deemed advisable to give particulars now. They will be given as soon as the matter is closed.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings):

1. What will be the nominal and indicated horse-power of the steamer now being built in the Old Country for the proposed car ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and what is the meaning of the word collectively, used in the answer to this question on page 2800 of 'Hansard' of the 6th instant?

2. What will the said steamer cost when completed and ready for service, this part of the answer to this question being omitted in the answer given on the 6th instant?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. 7,000 indicated horse-power. This car ferry, being designed for use under the worst possible ice conditions to be met with in the Straits, is provided with the above mentioned high power to cope with these conditions. Under less trying conditions and in open water much less power is required. To meet these varying conditions the power is derived from three sets of engines furnished with steam from six boilers.

2. The amount of the accepted tender is £138,000. Certain changes, however, are considered desirable by the department and this may somewhat increase the cost over that amount.

NEW CHESTER POSTMASTER.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Who is the postmaster at New Chester, Guysborough county, Nova Scotia?
2. When was he appointed?
3. Was the former postmaster James Bezanson dismissed?
4. If so, for what cause and on whose complaint?
5. Was there an investigation?
6. If so, what expense was incurred in the investigation?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Nathan Bezanson.
2. On the 1st November, 1912.
3, 4, 5 and 6. The former postmaster was not dismissed. He tendered his resignation.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. RICHARDS:

1. Was Joseph J. D. Gallant, lighthouse keeper at Cape Egmont, Prince county, P.E.I., dismissed from office? If so, for what cause?
2. Was a charge laid against him? If so, by whom?
3. Was an investigation of such charges held?
4. If so, is the evidence in the Department of Marine and Fisheries?
5. Is the evidence open to the inspection of members of this House.
6. Who was appointed to the position?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish).

2. Was a charge laid against him? If so, by whom?
3. Was an investigation of the charges held?
4. If so, is the evidence in the Department of Marine and Fisheries?
5. Is the evidence open to the inspection of the members of this House?
6. Who was appointed to the position?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. (a) Yes; (b) Political partisanship.
2. (a) Yes; (b) Dr. P. C. Murphy.
3. Yes.

2. Was a charge laid against him? If so, by whom?
3. Was an investigation of such charges held?
4. If so, is the evidence in the Department of Marine and Fisheries?
5. Is the evidence open for the inspection of the members of this House?
6. Who was appointed to the position?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. (a) Yes; (b) Political partisanship.
2. (a) Yes; (b) Dr. P. C. Murphy.
3. Yes.
4. Yes.
5. The evidence will be produced on Order of the House.
6. Mr. Donald Handrahan.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That on Monday, the 17th February, and on Wednesday, the 19th February, instant, and on all succeeding Mondays and Wednesdays until the end of the session, Government notices and orders shall have precedence immediately after questions and notices of motion for the production of papers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER : I am prepared to admit that the time has come when we may fairly consider that Wednesdays should be taken for government business, but I would submit to my right hon. friend that, with regard to Mondays, the motion seems to be altogether premature. By a rule of the House, government measures have precedence on two days in the week, Tuesdays and Fridays, for the first four weeks, and, after the first four weeks, on Thursdays also. At the present time Government orders have precedence on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays; private members' business on Mondays and Wednesdays. The period has about come, I admit, when it is usual to take Wednesdays for the Government. There is no rule upon this question; but it has been the custom almost as old as Confederation itself, that when Parliament has been in session a couple of months, government business shall take precedence on Wednesdays. I would observe, to my right hon. friend, however, that this year the Order Paper is unusually charged; there are still forty-five notices of motion to be disposed of, some of very great importance. The whole of Monday was given up to a discussion of the private Bill of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, and the whole of yesterday was taken up by a discussion upon a very important matter. If my right hon. friend were to take Wednesdays and Mondays, private members would be deprived altogether of the opportunity of discussing other matters which, in our judgment are of at least equal importance. Upon this side of the House we are not many, we cannot do very much with our votes, but we think we can do something with our speeches and discussion. It is only fair that we should be given some opportunity of presenting our views to the people in the only way which is left open to us. There is another consideration. I think public Bills and orders have been called only once and that just previous to the Christmas recess, when comparatively very few members were present. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) has on the paper a Bill with respect to the pollution of rivers, which under present conditions is of the greatest importance, as everybody in Ottawa will realize. I think a day should be given for going over the Order Paper, so that we can have at least some of these matters taken up. I would suggest that my right hon. friend do not take next Monday and that he give at least one more Wednesday to private members.

Mr. BORDEN: My right hon. friend will admit that we have been most considerate to hon. gentlemen on the other side, when we have allowed them the whole of the past ten days for a presentation of their views on the very important matter which has been before the House. More considerate conduct could not be imagined, although I am bound to say we are receiving very little thanks for it. My right hon. friend says that the Order Paper has been very greatly charged during the present session, but he must remember that it has also been very greatly discharged. I find that four hundred and twenty-five questions have been answered and five hundred and sixty-two motions by private members adopted, and I do not think the record of any Parliament, since I have been in public life, equals that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There never was such a lively Opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN: I must confess that I have not been very much impressed with their liveliness up to the present, although, as we like to see the business of the House carried on after a more or less animated fashion, liveliness on the part of the Opposition is not at all objectionable to us. My right hon. friend says there is no precedent for this proposal, but there is the best precedent in the world, in that, during the session of 1911, the right hon. gentleman himself took Mondays and Wednesdays at about this stage of the session. However, my right hon. friend was always very courteous to me in these matters, and, while I do not feel that I can accept all he has said, yet I would be willing to modify the motion so that private members shall have Monday next.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What about Wednesday?

Mr. BORDEN: I think we shall have to take Wednesday.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Might I appeal to my right hon. friend to leave Wednesday next for public Bills and orders?

Mr. BORDEN: I admit that the Bill of my hon. friend from Selkirk, with reference to the pollution of waters, is important, and I will either have it called and discussed, or I will make an announcement of action by the Government in respect to it in the near future. If there is any other public Bill which my right hon. friend considers of special importance, I shall be glad to discuss with him the propriety of taking similar action with regard to it.

Mr. EMMERSON: There are two resolutions on the Order Paper, the debate on which stands adjourned; one, adjourned at the personal request of the Postmaster General, to give the hon. member for the county of Kent, New Brunswick, (Mr. Robidoux) an opportunity of speaking with regard to it.

Mr. PELLETIER: I asked to have the debate adjourned in case the hon. member for Kent should wish to speak on it.

Mr. EMMERSON: I am solicitous that the hon. member for Kent should have an opportunity of being heard on that question. The other resolution is with respect to the acquisition by the Government of the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway. The Minister of Public Works, who was leading the House at the time, stated that the Prime Minister wanted to speak on that question, and had the debate adjourned for that purpose. The House and the country would like to hear the right hon. gentleman on that subject. Then, there is a motion of mine on the Order Paper relating to express rates, in which the people of the country are very deeply interested. I have been ready on several occasions to proceed with that motion, but was precluded on account of an argument made across the floor that other matters should have precedence. I have been seeking to get information with respect to the three Canadian express companies, as well as the American express companies operating in Canada, and the statistics with reference to them were only laid on the table and made available yesterday. This is a question of great public interest, non-party and non-partisan, and several members of the House on both sides have expressed to me a desire that they might have an opportunity of speaking on it.

Mr. KYTE: I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to the adjourned debate on a motion made by me for some papers in connection with the expropriation of land for the St. Peter's canal. No purpose can be served by resuming the debate. Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals will be good enough to intimate that the papers will be brought down and the motion passed as a matter of course. There is another adjourned debate in regard to the dismissal of certain officials in the county of Richmond, Nova Scotia, and the release of a man named Landry, at present in jail. Perhaps some discussion might arise on that question, and I am not disposed to press it at the moment. I should like very much, however, if the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals would state whether or not he will bring down the papers in regard to the St. Peter's canal.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend from Westmorland will remember that I am proposing that next Monday remain as a private members' day, when there will be opportunity for debate on his motion.

Mr. EMMERSON: We would not likely reach public Bills and orders on Monday. That would afford me an opportunity to bring up a motion relating to express companies.

Mr. BORDEN: So far as the adjourned debates are concerned, I will see what can be done. I do not think there will be any difficulty about bringing down the papers. In regard to the proposed resolution regarding branch lines, and the expropriation papers in connection with the St. Peter's canal, I will speak to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. As to the papers in regard to Mr. Landry, we desire to pursue the course which has been pursued in all similar cases by Ministers of Justice. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice desires to look into the practice pursued by Sir Allen Aylesworth, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick and previous Ministers of Justice. I can assure my hon. friend that there is no objection to bringing down the papers, except that which relates to considerations of public policy, and the practice which has been observed by all governments in this country. I have seen the papers and, from the standpoint of the Government, we would prefer to bring them down, if we would not be establishing a precedent which might be against public interest on some other occasion. My hon. friend may rest assured that the Minister of Justice and I shall be very glad to discuss with him what should be done in the matter, and to treat his application with every consideration that is possible in view of the practice which has prevailed in the past.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would suggest to my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte), and to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, that it be left to the discretion of the Minister of Justice to decide whether he shall bring the papers down or not. He can do just as he thinks best.

Mr. BORDEN: I see no objection to that course.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As we are to have only one more Monday for private business, I should like to suggest to my right hon. friend that we might do, what we often have done in the past, take notices of motion and public Bills and orders in the evening.

Mr. BORDEN: I think that suggestion is very well worthy of consideration. I will speak to my hon. friend privately about the matter.

Motion, amended to take effect on the 24th of February instead of the 17th, agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES ACT.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he will cause to be published in the Labour Gazette the report of Sir George Askwith, as to the working of the Industrial Disputes Act, which I see by the newspapers, has been published in England.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not seen the report yet; but, after seeing it, I will consider the matter.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PARDEE: I should like to draw attention to the fact that on the 5th of February, 1912, I moved for the production of papers in regard to the Prince Edward Island car ferry, and they have not yet been brought down.

Mr. COCHRANE: So far as I am aware, the papers have all been brought down.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Before the Christmas recess, I drew the attention of the Government to the fact that a large number of orders for returns made during last session had not yet been complied with. On looking over the records I find that some forty-two orders have not been complied with, among them one for the production of papers relating to the Farmers' Bank, moved by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and one for the production of papers relating to the granting of fishery licenses in British Columbia, moved by myself on February 28, 1912. During the present session, I find that one hundred orders passed prior to the holidays, have not yet been complied with. I hope the Government will endeavour to give us some of this information with as little delay as possible.

Mr. BORDEN: I think there must be some mistake about the number of orders standing over from last session and not yet complied with. I will, however, make inquiries. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals informs me that he is under a very strong impression, although he cannot speak positively, that the papers with regard to the Farmers' Bank were brought down. We will make inquiries as to what the other orders are, and endeavour to see whether the papers cannot be brought down immediately. As far as the present session is concerned, if we have brought five hundred returns out of six hundred ordered, I should say that we have been doing remarkably well.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Some of the orders may have been duplicated during the present session; and perhaps the book is not properly kept; but I know that a number have not been complied with.

TECHNICAL INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION

Mr. VERVILLE: I should like to ask the Minister of Labour when we may expect the report of the Technical Industrial Commission?

Mr. CROTHERS: It was stated a few days ago that the report was expected early next month.

BARRY'S BAY DROWNING DISASTER.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to a circumstance in connection with the appalling disaster which occurred on the Madawaska river, near Barry's Bay, on November 12, last, by which, through the sinking of the steamer Mayflower, nine persons lost their lives. A commissioner, Mr. R. A Pringle, K.C., of Cornwall, was appointed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and immdiately undertook an investigation with a view to ascertaining the cause of this disaster, and, if possible, fixing the blame. With the permission of the House, I desire to read a quotation from his report:

> Why was the Mayflower permitted to run and carry passengers from early in the season of 1912 until the night she sank, without authority? It was a matter of common knowledge throughout the country that she was running and carrying passengers. This question presents difficulties to my mind. The inspector of hulls, M. R. Davis, in his evidence, page 39, Q. 63., is asked: There was no certificate issued for 1912? No, sir. êQ. 64: Then as a matter of fact, he was contravening the law in operating his boat at all? A. Yes sir, and I warned him about that. Q. 65: And in carrying passengers? A. Yes, and I warned him of that, and he promised me he would stop carrying passengers. It also appears that M. R. Davis, Esq., wrote Hudson Bros., of Combermere, on the 10th of June, 1912, (see copy of letter being exhibit No. 1 attached) advising Hudson Bros. to drop the passenger business and telling them they had no right to carry passengers until they had a proper captain, and that he was unable to issue certificate.
> I am irresistibly drawn to the conclusion that when Hudson promised M. R. Davis that he would stop carrying passengers, as M. R. Davis says he did, that he, M. R. Davis, must have known and did know that Hudson was acting illegally, and I consider that it would have been at least wisdom on the part of M. R. Davis, when he saw that no proper steps were being taken to stop the running of the Mayflower, to have notified the Department of Marine and Fisheries so that the minister could have directed some person or persons to take the necessary steps to seize and detain the boat.
>
> If is only fair to say that M. R. Davis takes the ground that it was not his duty, but the duty of the chief officer of the customs, and in this he may be right, but he, as an inspector, knew that the Mayflower was not entitled to a certificate, and evidently knew that she was running, and it would have been a very simple matter for him to have notified the customs office at Ottawa, if he considered that they were the proper parties to intervene.

In view of the fact that the neglect of a government official is so strongly pointed out, and that the commissioner intimates that, had this official fully performed his duty, the calamity might not have taken place, could not the Government reasonably consider the advisability of rendering some aid to the families left destitute by this disaster?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): The report from which my hon. friend has quoted has not yet been fully considered by the Government.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of and concurrence in the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Verville, resumed from February 11.

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the resolution now before the House, I have not much hope of contributing many new ideas, but I am rather impelled by a desire to fulfil my duty towards my constituents who have constantly stood by me since 1898, and especially during the last general election on the 21st of September, 1911. Mr. Speaker, the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House being largely composed of French Canadians, most of them farmers, they are, I am proud to say, faithful and loyal subjects of His Majesty, ready to defend their country whenever an occasion offers.

Let me now, Sir, consider with you and honourable gentlemen in this House the resolution introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister on December 5 last, setting forth a proposal for the granting of $35,000,000 towards the building in Great Britain of three warships, called super-dreadnoughts, to be incorporated in the British navy and be for all time part and parcel of it.

A question which perplexes me is whether this resolution is in harmony with the constitution under which we live, and also whether this proposal is a development of the ideas of the fathers of confederation who were instrumental in binding together the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and others. I do not think it is. And not only that, I think the exact opposite is nearer to the truth. Indeed, if we look up the reasons given by Sir George E. Cartier to the people in New Brunswick and elsewhere, for the purpose of inducing them to accept the new order of things, we will find these words spoken at St. John, N.B., on September 14, 1864:

> Under a federal government, the central authority may have at its disposal large land and sea forces and exert great power in respect to foreign countries. That central power disposes of the means whereby it can command respect, both for itself and for the people placed under its rule.
>
> On the other hand, each state included in the confederacy having full control over all internal matters, there is no occasion for friction arising between conflicting authorities or out of the grievances that such disputes bring about.
>
> It will be seen at once that the federal system is likely to insure both the strength of a great nation and that consideration for local interests which is one of the strong points in the government of smaller communities.

And further on:

> Another consideration of the highest import is the defence of the country. Under our present system, one province cannot claim assistance from her neighbour in case of war; but should we have confederation, we shall dispose of an army of 200,000 men, and of a navy of 60,000; and with such forces, Great Britain would be very much more likely to help us in case of need than if we were dependent upon her.

This statement of Sir George E. Cartier is evidence that the policy in vogue at the time was not a policy of contribution, but a policy of Canada for the Canadians. In spite of their reliance on the patriotism of Cartier and other French Canadian representatives at the time, the people of the province of Quebec hesitated for a moment, and, in fact, several of Cartier's friends went back on him. However, Mr. Speaker, Cartier was not discouraged thereby, and at a large meeting which was held in Montreal, he said among other things, on September 22, 1864:

> Confederation will give us a broader outlook, but at the same time, it will instil in our family life, prospects of happiness and enjoyment which have been denied us heretofore. Confederation will make us free and masters at home, in the management of our own special affairs.

And farther on:

> No country can ever expect to attain greatness if it remains in such a position as to be unable to resist onslaughts from outsiders. The Imperial Government has been blamed for having so hurriedly recalled from Canada its regulars. But, however regrettable that decision in the eyes of a large number, it should not prevent Parliament and the Canadian people from organizing and maintaining in accordance with the means and resources of this country military forces sufficient to ensure our being respected.

It was by means of such utterances worthy of a statesman and a true Canadian that victory was ensured to the Government forces at the election which took place in the month of July, 1867.

In the report of that same speech, we have the following words:

> The province of Quebec has no right to interfere with the political progress of the country and the spread of a great idea. Should she take such a stand, it will soon be over with her; we will have a recurrence of the struggles of 1837, with this difference that she will no longer have to deal with British soldiery, but with fellow-citizens of other nationalities who will never pardon her obstinacy.

Let us avoid narrowing down too much our people's outlook on this continent. Let us rather widen our country's horizon; in that way will we succeed in endowing her with greatness and beauty by developing the opportunities of her children and defenders.

Although I was at that time a young man, I have not forgotten the speeches which were then delivered by the leading men in that campaign. The constitution of 1867, Mr. Speaker, was discussed, particularly section 91, sub-section 7 of which provides that the Government will organize a militia force on land and at sea. That right, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you, was, to my mind, delegated by the people to the Canadian Parliament at that very time; and the representatives of the people at the time understood it that way, since, during the session which followed the election of 1867, they carried through the Militia and Defence Act. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the revenues of the country at the time did not allow of both the land and sea forces being organized at the same time; but a reading of the Act shows that such was their intention, as may be ascertained by referring to the Revised Statutes of 1886.

But before we proceed to a consideration of that Act, I may be allowed to read the statements made by Cartier at the time of the introduction of the Militia Bill in 1868:

I hope the Imperial government will be satisfied with the number of men for which this bill makes provision. A force of 700,000 men is no mean thing. At a time when the 4,000,000 white men inhabiting the southern states were labouring under the greatest distress, they succeeded in recruiting 400,000 men to defend their country during a period of four years against the advance of the Northern people, who numbered 24,000,000 and put on foot, during the war, an enormous force of 2,600,000. Should we find ourselves under the necessity of resisting an invasion from the United States, we would be in a much better position than the Southerners with our 700,000 men ready to take up arms independently of the assistance which would be forthcoming from Great Britain and of the opportunities afforded to our fleet.....

Now, Sir, let us refer once more to the Act, which is to be found in the Revised Statutes of 1886, and let us see how it reads:

3. The Command in chief of the Land, and Naval Militia, and of all Military and Naval Forces, of and in Canada, is vested in the Queen, and shall be exercised and administered by Her Majesty personally or by the Governor General as Her representative.

4. There shall be a Minister of Militia and Defence, who shall be charged with and be responsible for the administration of Militia affairs, including all matters involving expenditure, and of the fortifications, gunboats, ordnance, ammunition, arms, armouries, stores, munitions and habiliments of war belonging to Canada.

10. The Militia shall consist of all the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty—not exempted or disqualified by law, and being British subjects by birth or naturalization; but Her Majesty may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in case of a 'Levée en Masse.'

11. The male population so liable to serve in the Militia shall be divided into four classes:—

The first class shall comprise those of the age of eighteen years and upwards, but under thirty years, who are unmarried or widowers without children;

The second class shall comprise those of the age of thirty years and upwards, but under forty-five years, who are unmarried or widowers without children;

The third class shall comprise those of the age of eighteen years and upwards, but under forty-five years, who are married or widowers with children;

The fourth class shall comprise those of the age of forty-five years and upwards, but under sixty years;

And the above shall be the order in which the male population shall be called upon to serve.

12. The militia shall be divided into active and reserve militia—land force; and active and reserve militia—marine force; the active militia—land force—shall be composed of—

(a) Corps raised by voluntary enlistment;

(b) Corps raised by ballot;

(c) Corps composed of men raised by voluntary enlistment and men balloted to serve.

The active militia—marine force—to be raised similarly, shall be composed of seamen, sailors and persons whose usual occupation is upon any steam or sailing craft, navigating the waters of Canada;

The reserve militia—land and marine—shall consist of the whole of the men who are not serving in the active militia for the time being.

79. Her Majesty may call out the militia, or any part thereof, for actice service either within or without Canada, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them; and the militiamen, when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do, or for any longer period which Her Majesty appoints;

2. Her Majesty may, from time to time, direct the furnishing by any regimental division of such number of militiamen as are required, either for reliefs or to fill vacancies in corps on active service;

3. Whenever the militia or any part thereof is called out for actual service by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, Her Majesty may place them under the orders of the commander of her regular forces in Canada.

4. The active militia of any corps thereof, or any part of a corps, shall also be liable to be called out for active service, with their arms and ammunition, under special or general regulations made by the Governor in Council, to act as guards of honour, escorts, or as guards and sentries, or to fire salutes in any of the following cases:—

(a) The opening or closing of any session of the Parliament of Canada or of the Legislature of any Province of Canada;

(b) For the purpose of attending the Governor General of Canada, or any member of the Royal Family while in Canada;

(c) For the purpose of guarding any armoury or other place where arms, guns, ammunition or other military stores are kept.

5. The Governor in Council may make regulations for calling out for active service as guards or sentries at the residence of the Governor General, or of any member of the Royal Family while in Canada, any corps or part of a corps of the active militia.

That Act, Mr. Speaker, remained in the Statute-book until 1910 when it was amended; that explains, Sir, why the Bill referred to by the Honourable Postmaster General in his speech never materialized.

But before going into the merits of the Act of 1910, let me refer to another period of our history.

I am bound to acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that although the Constitution, in my view, enables the Canadian Parliament to organize a naval militia, and although the Act in reference to it existed in our Statute-book, nothing was done previous to 1910.

Let us review briefly, Mr. Speaker, the reasons which induced Sir Wilfrid Laurier to start the organization of a naval militia which had been in expectancy since Confederation. Under the Liberal rule of 1896 the country's revenues had increased to such an extent that every year the honourable then Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, was in a position to announce at the close of each fiscal year surpluses varying from $5,000,000 to $30,000,000. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, at the Imperial Conference of 1902, a proposal having been made by Lord Selborne, in connection with the navy, and by Mr. St. John Brodrick, in connection with the militia, we find that the following answer was given on behalf of the Canadian ministers (at page 73):

Memorandum by the Canadian Ministers Concerning Defence.

The Canadian ministers regret that they have been unable to assent to the suggestions made by Lord Selborne respecting the Navy and by Mr. St. John Brodrick respecting the Army. The ministers desire to point out that their objections arise, not so much from the expense involved, as from a belief that the acceptance of the proposals would entail an important departure from the principle of Colonial self-government. Canada values highly the measure of local independence which has been granted it from time to time by the Imperial authorities, and which has been so productive of beneficial results, both as respects the material progress of the country and the strengthening of the ties that bind it to the Mother land. But while, for these reasons, the Canadian ministers are obliged to withhold their assent to the propositions of the Admiralty and the War Office, they fully appreciate the duty of the Dominion, as it advances in population and wealth, to make more liberal outlay for those necessary preparations of self-defence which every country has to assume and bear.

* * * * * *

At present Canadian expenditures for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian Government are prepared to consider the naval side of defence as well. On the sea-coasts of Canada there is a large number of men admirably qualified to form a Naval reserve, and it is hoped that at an early day a system may be devised which will lead to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of need.

In conclusion, the ministers repeat that, while the Canadian Government are obliged to dissent from the measures proposed, they fully appreciate the obligation of the Dominion to make expenditures for the purposes of defence in proportion to the increasing population and wealth of the country. They are willing that these expenditures shall be so directed as to relieve the taxepayer of the Mother Country from some of the burdens which he now bears; and they have the strongest desire to carry out their defence schemes in co-operation with the Imperial authorities, and under the advice of experienced Imperial officers, so far as this is consistent with the principle of local self-government, which has proved so great a factor in the promotion of Imperial unity.

That stand of our Canadian ministers during the conference was approved by this House unanimously, if I am not mistaken, in the course of the session of 1903, and subsequently by the Canadian electorate at the general election of 1904 and 1908.

Despite that approval, Mr. Speaker, the Government of the day did not think fit, or rather, did not judge that the time had arrived to carry out the proposal made at that conference, and one of the grounds taken—I do not think I am far astray—was that the country had undertaken in 1903 the building of the new transcontinental which was likely to absorb any surpluses forecasted and even more than that. That is why on March 29, 1909, we had not yet made a start in the organizing of our naval militia, when the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) introduced the resolution with which we are acquainted and which was amended on motion of the right hon. Prime Minister of the day, now the leader of the Opposition in this House. It reads as follows:

This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the immediate organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

That motion was carried unanimously in this House, the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk) approving of it as all other hon. members, for he stated on the floor of the House in his speech on the address, at the opening of the session of 1911-12, that he had not voted on that motion, having retired previous to the vote being taken, but that he accepted it with all his heart and that should it be put once more, he would be glad to vote for it.

It was subsequently to the carrying of that motion, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the time set their minds in earnest to providing a naval militia. During the following session, in 1910, the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the Navy Bill, repealing that already in existence, as I have shown at the opening of my remarks.

You will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that the new Act does not contain any new or very striking enactment, and in order to make good my contention I shall quote the statement made in this House by the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier, at the session of 1909-10, p. 2991 of 'Hansard,' as follows:

I find nothing extraordinary in the Bill under discussion, nothing that is not already contained in our statutes, with the exception of section 18, to-day section 22 of the Act of 1910.

Let us ascertain, Mr. Speaker, what difference there is between section 79 of the old Act and section 22 of the new Act which has replaced it:

22. The Governor in Council may place the naval forces or any part thereof, on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

23. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal Navy, the Naval Service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the Naval Service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the Naval Service.

24. Whenever the Governor in Council places the Naval Service or any part thereof on active service, as provided in the two preceding sections, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall issue for a meeting of Parliament within fifteen days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

Now, section 79 of the old Act reads as follows:

Her Majesty may call out the militia, or any part thereof, for active service either within or without Canada at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them; and the militia when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do, or for any longer period which Her Majesty appoints;

2. Her Majesty may, from time to time, direct the furnishing by any regimental division of such number of militiamen as are required, either for reliefs or to fill vacancies in corps on active service;

3. Whenever the militia or any part thereof is called out for actual service by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, Her Majesty may place them under the orders of the Commander of Her Majesty's regular forces in Canada;

4. The active militia or any corps thereof, or any part of a corps, shall also be liable to be called out for active service, with their arms and ammunition, under special or general regulations made by the Governor in Council, to act as guards of honour, escorts, or as guards and sentries, or to fire salutes in any of the following cases:—

(a) The opening or closing of any session of the Parliament of Canada, or of the Legislature of any Province of Canada;

(b) For the purpose of attending the Governor General of Canada, or any member of the Royal Family while in Canada;

(c) For the purpose of guarding any armoury or other place where arms, guns ammunition or other military stores are kept.

5. The Governor in Council may make regulations for calling out for active service as guards or sentries at the residence of the Governor General, or of any member of the Royal Family while in Canada, any corps or part of a corps of the active militia.

It has been contended in this House and in certain provinces of the Dominion that the legislation referred to savored of separation and that this was due to the fact that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a French Canadian and, on that account, disloyal to the British Crown, while in the province of Quebec our opponents clamored on the hustings that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was sold to Great Britain and was sacrificing our autonomy secured against such heavy odds, for the pleasure of receiving a decoration from the Imperial Government or His Majesty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, French Canadians are no separatists. Far from it, Sir, if there is in Canada a section of men who are distinctly opposed to separation, they are the French Canadians. There is no inducement for us, Mr. Speaker, to change our allegiance. We are allowed to live in peace, our rights and privileges are guaranteed, we are keeping up our French language, our traditions and our customs, and we are let free to practice our religion without the slightest stricture being put upon us. Therefore, though we are not imperialists as my hon. friend from Queens and Sunbury would have us, we are not separatists, we are first of all Canadians.

I stated a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that the Navy Act of 1910 does not differ from the previous enactment we had in the same connection. However, there is one point of difference, and it is this: the former Act provided for compulsory service, while the new Act provides for voluntary service only.

As regards section 22, which provides that in case of emergency the navy, or part of it, may be put at the disposal of His Majesty for service in the Imperial navy, the old Act positively granted that privilege. However, Mr. Speaker, although the Government of the time was not making any new departure, a campaign based on appeals to prejudice was started against it and its supporters. The first shot was fired in April, 1910, at a public meeting which took place at Upton, in my county, when charges of all kinds were levelled at Sir Wilfrid Laurier and myself. A second onslaught was made in the course of July, 1910, in my own town, and the same charges launched against us. I shall abstain from acquainting the House with the references made at the time to myself and the Administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I shall be content with quoting a few of the rash utterances emanating from some of the speakers at these various meetings:

When in fifteen years from now your wives will see the Government recruiting agent enter the house with that cursed statute in his hands, and say: My poor lady, you will have to give up your children, not for the defence of your native land, but for the purpose of battling under various climes, and over every sea, for the glory of British arms; and when a few months later, your wives will learn that an Austrian shell, or a Japanese cannon ball, or a broadside from a German ship has disembowelled your children, or that they have fallen into some precipice, or that they have met death on the deck of some warship, do you think that they will then comfort themselves by saying: 'Very well, my husband was a Liberal, and that legislation was introduced by Mr. Laurier. He was all right'? No, they will curse that legislation and it will be only justice.

Great Britain has even gone to the point of grinding down her colonies, as in olden times the Roman emperors were apt to do. The only franchises which we enjoy, we have had to wrest from her. Great Britain has not conquered Canada for the fun of it, or with a view to spreading a knowledge of the gospel, as was the case with France; but for the purpose of establishing trading posts, and securing profits thereby. She has spread over the earth's surface, hatred, enmity and warfare. We have no more use for Great Britain and the British.

I allowed those aspersions to go unnoticed, and pardoned those accusers, as many of them did not realize what they were doing, for lack of brains. A certain number of my supporters were carried away by such statements and utterances; but to-day, Sir, it would not be possible to deceive them again in that way.

Now, Sir, an effort is being made to vindicate these accusers in this House, by repudiating the statements attributed to them. And even in cases where such statements have been made within our own hearing, we are bound to accept the denial so made. However, Sir, I may be allowed to recall an incident. It occurred in the month of November, 1910, during the by-election in Drummond and Arthabaska. One morning the telegraph boy brought to my house the following message:

J. E. Marcile,
Acton Vale.

Be at West Wickham after mass without fail; you will meet Nantel.

(Sgd.) J. E. Perreault.

On receiving this message I proceeded to West Wickham, as requested, and to my great surprise I found there the hon. member for Terrebonne, to-day Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel). A public meeting was called after mass, and I give herewith the views expressed at the time by that hon. gentleman on the navy question. I took note of his utterances, having a strong suspicion that they might be of use later on. They read as follows:

The Laurier Government has during the last session provided for a navy, a navy which will be Canadian in time of peace and Imperial in time of war. Millions are going to be expended on that navy, and to what use is it going to be put? To take away your children and have them butchered for England's sake on the seas of China and Japan. Borden's policy is just as objectionable as that of Laurier. (And in answer to an interruption to the effect that Borden was his leader): I have nothing to do with Borden; I condemn his policy as I do that of Laurier. My leader is Monk, and I call on you all, Liberals and Conservatives as well, to join hands towards inducing the Laurier Government to give up their naval policy and apply that money to developing the country. Assist us in securing the repeal of that cursed naval legislation.

Such are, Mr. Speaker, the statements which were made by the hon. member for Terrebonne, to-day holding a portfolio in the cabinet under the leadership of the hon. Mr. Borden. His erstwhile chief, Mr. Monk, has resigned father than accept the present policy of the Administration, but the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, who, in 1910, insisted on being his faithful and devoted servant and follower, has not thought fit to imitate him in this resolve. He preferred remaining with the man in whom, in the year 1910, he placed no reliance whatever, stating his policy to be even more objectionable than that of the now right hon. leader of the Opposition. But, Sir, that hon. minister is not the only one who is forced to give up professions of political faith made while sitting on this side of the House. I might quote from the speeches of all hon. members on your right who hail from the province of Quebec. But I do not wish to uselessly take up the time of the House. However, there is another meeting which I happened to attend and which I would like to recall to the memory of the House. It took place on December 10, 1910, in the city of St. Hyacinthe. My regretted friend, Mr. Beauparlant, since deceased, was then the representative of that constituency and he requested me one day to be with him at St. Hyacinthe, on the evening of December 10, there to meet the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) and two others. Sir, I accepted with pleasure the invitation, and having attended the meeting I had an opportunity of listening to the following utterances from the mouth of the hon. member for Champlain, as reported in Le Devoir, on the date of December 27, 1910:

This Government does not settle great questions, it kills and buries them.

Its favourite way out of a difficulty is to say that a question is dead and buried.

Dead and buried the Manitoba School Question, in spite of the eloquent voice which says: 'My wound will ever be with me, and my grave is a cradle.'

Dead and buried the question of the sending of contingents, which caused your sons to be enlisted and to shed their blood on African soil. No, no!

You will be called upon to decide on the navy question. (Cries from the audience: We shall not vote for the navy.). . . . .

We entreat you to overthrow a moribund Government.

Send forth leaders, bound, not by the dictates of a chieftain, but by unalterable principles and the pledges they have taken.

The directing principle of this campaign inspires and controls all our actions. It is: 'Canada for Canadians and Canadians for Canada.'

We wish to remain loyal subjects of the British empire, we long for that fruitful liberty which is productive of greatness, and we revolt against the tyranny of despots and potentates.

We are willing to fight only when the Canadian frontier is threatened, but never when Africa is menaced.

We wish that from ocean to ocean, and in all the provinces, all nationalities should be on the same footing, that there should be no distinctions of victors and vanquished.

We want an honest Government that will consult the people and follow their dictates.

We will not find on that platform the fascinating emblems of power, or those men who have committed treason to obtain preferment and lay hands on the spoils; but patriots who have come to do homage to a loyal and unsullied flag and to defend a holy cause, the cause of liberty. . . . . .

Gentlemen, neither strength nor numbers are on our side, but we will battle for the triumph of eternal justice. . . . . .

There is something worth more than the title of Prime Minister, than decorations and preferment in high circle, it is a good name.

There is something preferable to power; it is the approval of the people.

We are not calling for your assistance to help us to reach power and then gorge our friends with favours; we are only anxious to be judged and seconded.

And our cause will triumph, and we shall succeed in killing the naval policy.

In our cemeteries our great men are laid to rest, founders of the Canadian fatherland, who have shed their blood and sacrificed their lives for its well-being; we have rapped at the entrance of their last resting place and requested them to speak out.

And the great shade of Mercier made its appearance and said to the supporters of the Government: 'I no longer recognize you.'

Baldwin and Lafontaine, also arose to say that unjust legislation is of no avail and may at any time be repealed.

And Papineau, the great and immortal ancestor of Bourassa, shaking the dust off his shroud, came forth to tell us that it is our duty to fight for justice and liberty.

Sir, such statements made before a numerous audience had no doubt the effect of making people believe these gentlemen were serious and in good faith. As a matter of fact, a goodly number of Liberals took the cue; satisfied as to the sincerity of their advisors, whose stand was nevertheless prompted by hypocrisy and deceit. Hardly had such statements been made than they were forgotten; and this is still, and to a greater extent, what is going on to-day, the people thus deceived having put into power those who deceived them.

But, Sir, in the same way that God's justice is bound to have its day in regard to each one of us, in the same way the people who scold, the people who are biding their time, the people will some day come to their own.

I have shown you, Sir, that under our country's constitution, and according to the views and measures taken by the fathers of confederation, there is nothing that can justify this Government to force through the House this resolution introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister. That resolution is unconstitutional, and at variance with the policy propounded by all governments who have had in hand the affairs of the Dominion up to this day, whatever their political colour.

I submit that we have no right to take this $35,000,000 out of the pockets of the Canadian people and make a present of it to outsiders.

It has been alleged that such an expenditure is urgent; such was the statement made when the Prime Minister introduced his resolution. Later on it was realized that the emergency theory would not go, and the word 'need' was substituted. What 'need' is there, Sir, of giving away $35,000,000 to a people who are quite in a position with their ordinary revenue to meet all current expenditure, and besides, through surpluses, pay off $275,000,000 off the national debt in a period of four or five years. That is an extraordinary contention, everyone will admit. I say, Sir, that a people whose financial condition is such as I have stated is surely not in need.

Oddly enough, whenever some new departure is contemplated in Great Britain, invariably the German peril crops out. And in this connection I was rather amused to hear the honourable Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) insist that we should vote that $35,000,000 in a hurry, because Germany is not more than twelve hours away from the British Isles, and was only waiting for an opportunity to pounce on Great Britain; but that by means of that $35,000,000, Canada would satisfy Germany that she would be running a great risk in carrying out such a plan, seeing that we were going to take part in the fray; and such a consideration, he stated, would ensure universal peace for all time to come. Indeed, Sir, I would never have suspected that Canadian money had such power, and especially that the Postmaster General nursed that delusion.

Surely, if an outlay of $35,000,000 was a sure guarantee of universal peace, many a country much more interested than we are in the maintenance of world-wide peace would willingly contribute twice, three times, four times that amount towards securing that end, and deem themselves the gainers at that.

No, Sir, what the Government were anxious for was to satisfy the people that their views differed from those of their predecessors. They resolved to have nothing to do with the legislation of 1910 in regard to the construction of warships. But then they were bound to do something and accordingly launched out the German peril as an excuse for this vote of $35,000,000.

Whoever has kept posted with newspaper talk since December 5th last has a pretty good idea of what that so-called peril amounts to. If I am to judge by newspaper reports of a recent date, the German Chancellor is quite willing to conclude an 'entente amicale' with Great Britain as regards the building of warships. The danger then is not so pressing as it was made to appear. And, Sir, if we are to form our opinion of the German people from those who live in our midst, that opinion should differ materially from that voiced by the Postmaster General.

So then, Mr. Speaker, there exists no immediate need, still less any emergency, and therefore, I do not see why we should require the farming and industrial classes of this country, who pay the greater part of taxation and contribute the greater part of our revenue, to sacrifice five dollars for every man, woman and child, in order to make up that contribution of $35,000,000—that is about what it would amount to—to go into the pockets of British workmen.

What would you think, Sir, should the city of Ottawa, without any fire protection for itself, vote a certain amount, say $500,000, or even $100,000, as a grant towards providing protection against fire in the city of Montreal or that of Toronto? You would agree with me, I think, that the city of Ottawa should, to begin with, provide itself with the necessary means of protection.

In various localities of the Dominion bonuses are offered to induce the establishment of various industries, thereby helping on the growth of the town and providing opportunities for the working people. Why should not the Government imitate such action, and assist in providing dry docks at various points, since they will not on their own account engage in the building of steel ships. I am satisfied that by offering assistance in proportion to the importance of the undertaking, they would meet the wishes of hon. members of this side of the House.

Sir, this contribution policy has not to my knowledge been approved by the people heretofore; no Government has ever taken such a stand; accordingly I find that the motion introduced by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) is justified, and I shall gladly cast my vote in support of it, seeing that it recognizes the desirability of submitting the question to the people by means of a general election.

I shall vote against the resolution and motion of the right hon. Prime Minister because I deem such a policy anti-Canadian, contrary to the interests of the country, and likely to bring about results similar to those achieved in regard to the thirteen colonies to the south of us.

I shall vote then, Mr. Speaker, in support of the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, because it upholds fundamentally Canadian principles, as well as those principles of self-government and control by the people over public expenditure, for which our forerunners have fought and spilt their blood. I shall vote in favour of the amendment, Sir, because it maintains the policy voiced by a whole people in this House through their representatives on March 29, 1909, while the policy of our friends sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, is merely that of a certain clan and is not at all in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian people. I shall say in concluding, with the poet, Mr. Speaker, 'Oh Canada, my country, my fatherland and my true love.'

Mr. JOSEPH DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, It I venture to address the House on a subject almost thoroughly threshed out, it is because the question under discussion just now is of so great importance, that to my mind it is incumbent on all those who hold a mandate as representatives of the people to express fully and plainly their views, so that it may not be stated later on that on a question of such import, so full of possibilities for the future, any of us has shown rashness, indifference or cowardice; and I venture to hope that before this debate is brought to a close, we will have an expression of opinion from all the various groups making up the House of Commons, a result which has not so far been obtained. In fact, Sir, what is our object just now? Is is not to give to Canada a new political ideal? Why not call things by their proper name, why not speak out what is in one's mind? This is not a passing whim, an exigency of the moment, to meet an emergency; on the contrary we are called upon to lay down a rule which will be considered as the deliberate and well matured expression of a principle of government, sanctioned and ratified right away by a grant of $35,000,000 to Great Britain.

Such is the view that should be taken of the policy of this Government, now that the emergency question is not even discussed and has been laughed out of court.

Should we consider as being made under conditions of emergency such a contribution as the Government proposes to make: $35,000,000 to Great Britain, that is to say, $1,000,000 per month during three years, or $33,000 per day or, $1,500 per hour during a period of about eleven hundred days, to use the arguments of our opponents in the province of Quebec, in the course of the last general election, the whole representing the total land values in three counties? Let us not be satisfied with words but rather look into the emergency feature of this contribution.

And in dealing with that point, I shall not make comparisons between the naval forces of Great Britain and those of European or other foreign powers; I shall not inquire whether Germany has altered its programme of naval construction within the last ten or twelve months. No, I shall keep within the following limits.

We are called upon to vote a grant of $35,000,000 to Great Britain, and that on the ground that there is an emergency. Can there be any emergency which the granting of $35,000,000 to Great Britain can do away with, unless Great Britain be in need of money? And can Great Britain be in need of money unless she is incapable of finding any at home? Now, nobody would be so unkind as to claim that Great Britain is without money; and especially in our case we are aware that this $35,000,000, we will never have in hand; we will never have to send the cash across the sea, but directly or indirectly we shall have to borrow it in Great Britain and, as a matter of fact, we will be content with saying to those who lend us the money: 'Keep your $35,000,000; we acknowledge having received the amount, here is our promissory note, we undertake to pay to you both capital and interest.'

Can there be any emergency connected with the sending of $35,000,000 to England when we know for the past five years she has cut down her indebtedness by over $300,000,000, while we are getting deeper into debt year after year?

Can there be any emergency in connection with the sending of that money, knowing as we do that the capital required for the development of our country is supplied to us from Great Britain?

Emergency, you say? When England through her recognized representatives (and she has no others) states that she is in a position for years to come to cope with any emergency.

No there is nothing in that which resembles in any degree an emergency; and what we are now considering is nothing else than a miserable piece of political expediency.

And how was such a policy ever conceived? Indeed I deeply regret that the Conservative leaders should not have shown more dignity, and should appear to be as little worthy of confidence as the erstwhile Nationalists who just now occupy seats in this House.

As a matter of fact what has been going on under our eyes? Such occurrences should be recalled now and then so as to be constantly present in the minds of all. There was unanimity in this House on March 29, 1909, when the then leader of the Government proposed the establishment of a Canadian navy.

And not only that. The Laurier proposal was not sufficiently far-reaching; it was stated in the resolution that the intention was to promote the organization of a Canadian navy; but the present leader of the Government considered that the duty thus imposed was not laid down in sufficiently plain terms; accordingly he requested the right honourable then leader of the Government to insert the word 'immediate' before the word organization.

Then he delivered on that question a great spech against the idea of a contribution; I cannot resist the temptation of quoting an extract which is familiar to many, it is true, but which, in the French language, will have its peculiar flavour; heretofore it has been quoted in the English language only. Besides, even as an actual repetition it would not be objectionable; in matters of this kind 'Bis repetita placent.'

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country, I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that. The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the Mother Country and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory. In Australia it failed, in the end, to meet with the approval of the people for the reason that Great Britain felt constrained to ask Australia that the field of operations of the squadron should be extended to the China and Indian seas; and when the operation of that squadron was so extended, the Australians felt that the contribution which they had been making for some years past was not really being used to give that protection to Australia which her interests demanded. So that the policy of Australia at the present time is to build up a flotilla of submarine and torpedo boats which, in case of war would co-operate with the armed cruisers and battleships of the British navy. It was pointed out in discussing this question that Australia in providing a force of that kind would provide a force which it would be very difficult if not impossible for Great Britain to send across the seas, and that in thus protecting themselves they were providing the best possible force for the protection of the empire. So I am at one with the Prime Minister as far as this is concerned. I am at one with him in this respect also that I think that an expenditure of money designed for that purpose, ought, in the main at least, to be under the control of our own Parliament, and that by making an appropriation of that kind and attending to the defence of our own coasts, by co-operation and co-ordination, with the imperial naval forces, we would be rendering a real service in the defence of the Empire, and we would be doing our duty not only to Canada but to the Empire as a whole.

On July 1, 1909, Mr. Borden, at a largely attended banquet in London, spoke thus:

> The resolution of March 29, 1909, as adopted, though its wording apparently does not expressly imply the offer of one or two dreadnoughts, has, however, laid down for Canada a policy in regard to which both parties are united, and which will give better practical results than the offer of dreadnoughts could possibly have.

And now we have the right hon. Prime Minister posing in this House as the champion of a policy of direct contribution. One is naturally led to inquire how such a change of front has been brought about. I shall not undertake to explain what is inexplicable; however, I will state what appears to me to be the reason.

That group of men which was called Opposition previous to September 21, 1911, comprised elements which could not possibly be reconciled. All were agreed on one point, the desirability of overthrowing Laurier. Extremists who were in large numbers in that group realized at once what a great field of prejudice and fanaticism was being closed to them as a result of the stand taken by their leader; I mean the acceptance of the naval policy of the Liberal Government. Of course they were bound to make to the then leader of the Opposition representations, suggesting that an Opposition leader should never be in agreement with the views of the Government, but should fight every proposal. At any rate he did not stand by his previous statements; gradually and labouriously he came around and the final somersault was accomplished after six months of wriggling, and took the shape of an amendment to the Naval Bill of 1910, an amendment which is full of all sorts of things, since it was the essence of what it is possible to extract from a mixture of fcontradictions. For instance, in order to grant twenty, thirty-five or forty millions, that is twice, or three times the cost of a Canadian navy, there is no need for a plebiscite, no need for consulting the people; but to construct a Canadian navy which would have cost $15,000,000, which would have remained our property and the building of which would have meant for the Dominion the development of our industries and considerable earnings for our labouring classes, a plebiscite was necessary, the people should be consulted. The gift was for the jingoes and ultra-loyalists, the plebiscite for the Nationalists. The jingoes were satisfied, considering that they had the promise of an immediate grant of a considerable amount to Great Britain; they were fully satisfied, the more so because they inferred from it that there would not be much left for the establishment of a Canadian navy.

Apparently the Nationalists were not satisfied, although, if we are to judge by what we have seen, and by what we see to-day, from what we have heard and particularly from what we have not heard, we should say that they were satisfied at least in their own mind. But, from a tactical point of view, they were not supposed to be satisfied, and in fact they stated that Borden's policy was even more objectionable than that of Laurier, leaving the people to believe that they were more averse to Borden than to Laurier, realizing that their people were closer to Laurier than to Borden. However, the Borden tactics met with some degree of success, for some of the so-called Nationalists making use of that part of the Borden amendment which related to the plebiscite would say: 'Mr. Borden is also in favour of a plebiscite, since he has rallied to Mr. Monk's views.' Alas, yes, but what a rally! Mr. Monk has not found his way to stay in the cabinet, and the Minister of Inland Revenue would have resigned had it been possible to have another minister elected in his place. The same may be said of the hon. Postmaster General. What a rally! considering that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was able to exclaim in this House the other day, without any protest forthcoming, without a twinge showing on the faces of any of the honourable members on your right, Mr. Speaker; 'How can the right honourable leader of the Opposition contend that the Nationalists have come on top when the very thing which the Nationalists abhor is engraved in the Bill, and when the only thing which, strictly speaking, they might admit, a Canadian navy, is not mentioned at all in the Bill'? But let us not go ahead of time; I now revert to my former trend of thought.

What spectacle have we not been gratified with at the very opening of the first session following on the election of 1911? The group of Nationalist members who had secured their election solely for the assumed purpose of fighting any government propounding a naval policy of any kind, and to fight mercilessly as they were wont to do in the case of the Laurier government, not only previous to the carrying of the Naval Bill, but still more so subsequently, that group of members who had restricted their political campaigning to the naval question, making of that question their only subject of address, who referred to it as the only inducement for their entering politics, and who accordingly should have been sitting in the ranks of the Opposition, that group, I say, requested to be seated on the Speaker's right, and without any compromise, without any promise being made, became the hearty supporters of this Government whose great mainstay they are, seeing that the cabinet would not last two weeks without them, and that an appeal to the people would then be in order.

And now, through the assistance of that group, the leader of this Government has set his mind to carrying out the jingo part of his policy, that is to say, the proposal of a direct and permanent contribution to the navy represented as a case of emergency, it being so repugnant in itself that it is necessary to clothe it with the mantle of emergency to make it acceptable; for, after all, Mr. Speaker, since that grant of $35,000,000 cannot be considered as a matter of urgency, for the reasons which I have given above, it amounts to a precedent and to the announcement of a permanent policy. Without the emergency excuse, it has and can have but one meaning, the acknowledgment by Canada of its obligation to contribute to the maintenance of the Imperial navy by means of money grants. What other meaning could it have? What other conclusion could one draw from it? Now, Sir, I would inquire whether such a system is consistent with the dignity of Canada, an autonomous colony of Great Britain? The levying of a tribute is not in accord with the principle of responsible government which we enjoy.

Canada is a nation, it has been stated and stated over again, if not in theory, at least in practice; and does one nation pay tribute to another towards defraying the cost of the latter's defence? When in the history of the world has such a thing been witnessed?

The contribution system is a blow at our autonomy; it is an almost fatal blow at responsible government, one of the fundamental principles of which,—I might say, the fundamental principle—consists in the absolute right, and duty, as well, to control the expenditure of public money, so as to allow of a thorough accounting of them to tax-payers. The sending of a contribution is just as inconsistent with autonomy as would be the action of Parliament should we decide to hand over to the British government the administration of our militia, of our railways or of our customs. The contribution system implies a delegation of powers and duties incompatible with the principles of constitutional government which we enjoy, and that is why we stated to the electors previous to September, 1911, that it would be a serious mistake to overthrow Laurier. That is what satisfied the Nationalists that the Borden policy was the most objectionable of the two from the point of view of the country's future.

What stand will the Nationalists take when the question is put in connection with the resolution now under discussion? It is not necessary to be a very acute observer to foresee what it will be.

What have they done heretofore in reference to that important naval question? Have they fought the government proposal nail and tooth? Did they endeavour to defeat it by keeping up the discussion, by opposing it at every turn, as their convictions, had they been sincere, should have induced them to do? No, they remained as mute as fish, and if any one of them has the courage to raise his voice, it will be to express regret at seeing himself under the sorry necessity of breaking away momentarily from their party; momentarily of course, and that will be the real measure of their sincerity.

Then a certain number of them, to save their lives, will vote against the Government, but not in sufficient numbers to defeat the Government, and immediately after a vote of confidence in the Government will be proposed, to give these gentlemen an opportunity to express without delay their admiration and love for that same Government which, from their point of view, will have the moment before committed almost an iniquity; and thus will the stray lambs be returned to the fold.

No doubt that is what will happen; and in spite of all that, the Nationalist organ Le Devoir, will continue denouncing the Laurier-Borden conspiracy, not realizing apparently that it is itself the prompter of the only real conspiracy that exists.

Now, let us briefly look into the policy of the Liberal party. In 1909, the—I shall not say unanimous—but very prevalent opinion, was that it was time for Canada to begin doing something in the way of naval defence. It was generally believed that we had reached that period foreseen by the fathers of confederation when Canada should think of completing its means of defence. In the same way that, since 1867, we had, in agreement with the views of the fathers of confederation, organized our militia, that is our land forces, in the same way was it believed then, and it is still believed to-day, that, owing to the increasing importance of our country, the increase in its population and in view of the bright future in store for it, we have reached the point when we should take further steps for our protection and defence at sea as we had previously taken for our defence on land.

From the date of the cession of Canada up to about fifty years ago, Great Britain took direct charge of our territorial defence, but having withdrawn her troops, it naturally devolved upon us, a duty which we have fulfilled, I may say with satisfaction and pride, to see to it ourselves. Accordingly, as regards naval defence, up to five or six years ago, we relied solely on the protection of Great Britain, the Mother Country having established two naval stations in the Dominion, one at Esquimalt, on the Pacific, and the other at Halifax, on the Atlantic.

No one will believe that Great Britain maintained here two naval stations for the only pleasure of spending money. On the contrary, all will admit that if she did so, it was through necessity; and if that necessity was felt at a time when the country was poor, unknown and sparsely inhabited, the need is much more pressing to-day, in proportion to Canada's increased importance.

Particular circumstances have induced Great Britain to recall her ships, and we have been left without any protection. Hence the necessity, which no one can gainsay, to provide protection at sea, in the same way as we have already provided protection on land, since there are no other means of defence but the army and navy, and that these two systems should work concurrently to be effective, in a country such as ours, surrounded by three oceans and cut up by great waterways.

So the Liberal Government had decided to replace the warships which Great Britain had been obliged to recall, and that, by means of legislation vesting in the Dominion full control over our navy, asserting fully our autonomy in that respect. Such is our policy and our whole policy, and who will claim that it is not wise and patriotic?

There is in that Act a clause which enables the Government to put our navy at the disposal of Great Britain, should her supremacy be imperilled, whereupon some have appeared shocked. I say purposely 'appeared,' believing them to be too intelligent to seriously hold such a view. I would like to point out here that it was that only clause allowing us to assist Great Britain in an emergency which estranged from our party the Nationalist group, as may be seen by a statement of their leader, Mr. Henri Bourassa, which reads as follows: 'If the proposal was for a Canadian fleet for the defence of Canada, under the control of the Canadian Government, I would object neither to section 17, nor to section 19, nor in fact to the Bill as a whole.' Therefore, the reason for their estrangement was that authority conferred on our Government to help Great Britain.

What! we living in a British colony, we should not have inserted such a provision!

What! you think you have a grievance, though we have not even gone in that direction as far as some absolutely independent nations, such as France and Russia, for instance, who undertake, do you hear, to assist Great Britain in case of emergency. And those who took offence at that, were nevertheless advocates of the maintenance of the colonial tie.

Why should we assist Great Britain in maintaining her supremacy? A moment's thinking over the matter will show that the rejection of such a duty is altogether out of question. We are a British colony, happy and content to be such, and nothing in the world could induce us to transfer our allegiance, as we only wish for the continuation of the present state of things, and we are aware that the overthrow of Great Britain's supremacy at sea would mean the loss of all that.

It is in our interest to uphold that supremacy, because we are closely bound to Great Britain by political as well as business ties, and we realize that were Great Britain defeated on the high seas, that would mean the dismemberment of her empire, and consequently the upsetting of our national existence, a calamity more particularly to be feared by us French Canadians and Catholics enjoying religious liberty, and the right to speak our tongue even in the councils of the nation.

We realize that the defeat of Great Britain would mean the ruin of her trade, and consequently the ruin of ours, and we cannot overlook the fact that one third of our total exports go to Great Britain. Accordingly we would not be so ungrateful and foolish as to remain indifferent and unmoved in times of emergency and danger, and that is why we said that we were ready to do our share, since we had such a direct interest in doing so.

So much as regards the obligation; now let us look into the efficiency of the system established under the Act. The establishment of a Canadian navy will be, to my mind, by far the most efficient means not only of protecting ourselves, which goes without saying, but also of assisting the Empire, whenever called upon to do so. Indeed the principle of a local establishment of the navy is bound to prevail, that is as clear as daylight.

In some quarters the Laurier navy has been ridiculed; though it was the same system as that adopted by Australia, and whose efficiency the leader of this Government admired. To build a navy at home for our own protection, is to rid Great Britain of the task of protecting us, that is our contribution. Great Britain has no need for whatever battleships we may have, as an adjunct to her own immense fleet, to take part in set encounters on the high seas; but what she does need, is protection for the merchantmen.

If we had on the Pacific coast four or five good warships, and on the Atlantic coast six or seven of them, our enemies would not even think of molesting our merchantmen, for this very simple reason that the nation at war with us would have to concentrate against the British fleet all her available ships, while on the other hand if we have no warships for the protection of our merchantmen, then the enemy might and would naturally content themselves with patching up, repairing some old ships, some old out-of-date gunboats and by means of such insignificant craft block our shipping, seize our ships, etc., and that would not happen if only we had a few warships along our coasts, the enemy being without good ships available to send out aganist us, since all those at her disposal would be employed without exception to oppose the British fleet at the critical point.

So then a local navy would be effective, nay, no other organization would be effective. We hear people saying: Oh, but it requires a great deal of time to build a navy. Mr. Pelletier stated in the House on December 13 last, that it would take twelve years to build the Laurier navy of 1910. Even should it require twenty years, what about it? There is no country in the world where a navy was found ready made; it required time to build it; it will require time to build one here, and we will take it, spending yearly in proportion to our means, but we have to make a start. Such is the policy of the Liberal party and I believe it to be wise and far-seeing.

The proposal of the Conservative party is the absorption of Canada in the Empire, with the absolute loss, not only of our money and of our political franchises so dearly earned by our ancestors. The proposal of the Liberal party is the logical development of our national autonomy, the assertion of our existence as a nation, and the assent willingly given to an expenditure of money towards the carrying out of a duty which the Canadian people are in decency bound to fulfil, the burden of which sacrifice will however be lightened through the development of a new and important industry that will contribute to the prosperity of the country.

With the Conservative policy we shall be Canadians, if any remain. And the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) has given expression to the state of mind of his party, when he exclaimed: 'It is a great thing to be a Canadian, you are proud of it, and so am I; but there is something still better, it is to be an active member of the British Empire.'

With the Liberal policy, we shall be Canadians first of all, and the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has thus expressed the mental attitude of the Liberal party: 'I am proud of my British citizenship, but still prouder of my Canadian citizenship.'

As for me, in the name of my constituents, whose faithful spokesman I believe I am just now, I protest with all my might against the action just taken by this Government, and I have no hesitation in saying that the stand taken by the supporters of the policy of direct contributions is reactionary, retrograde, anti-national, and I deeply regret to see how little headway has been accomplished towards the development of a Canadian spirit.

Mr. P. E. LAMARCHE (Nicolet): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to wait until the second reading of the Bill to give my views and those of the people I represent on the question of naval defence. The sub-amendment introduced by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) deals with such an important side of the problem that I feel it will not be out of place for me to give a few words of explanation at this stage as to the vote I intend to cast when that sub-amendment is placed before the House. I became an opponent of the present Government's naval policy when that policy was only in a stage of embryo; it was disclosed in a speech uttered in this House by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister then the leader of the Opposition. From that speech it was possible to foresee the contents of this Bill, but the amount of our contribution was fixed at approximately $20,000,000. The increase of this contribution to $35,000,000 has affected the measure materially. It has not modified the principle and it has not changed my attitude or my views on the subject.

The policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition I have opposed in the past, and the fact that a suggestion has been made by that right hon. gentleman in the form of an amendment to the resolution providing for the building of two squadrons around the Rainbow and the Niobe has not made me a partisan of the Opposition's proposals. I agree, however, with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) when he says that this legislation should be submitted to the people; but I do not agree with him when he practically implies by his speech on the sub-amendment that the policy of his party, which he praises, should be exempt from such reference to the people. If the amendment of the hon. member for Maisonneuve was not linked to a policy which I do not approve, it would receive my hearty support, but as it is made a part of the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition I shall cast my vote against it. I shall also vote against the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. May I add that before this debate goes very far those members who really believe in a consultation of the people will have an opportunity to vote on an amendment which shall serve not to help any political party, but to find out who is really in earnest and who is not?

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. B. B. LAW (Yarmouth, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, I have no apologies to offer for taking part in the discussion of this great question which has occupied the time of this House for many weeks past. I do so for several reasons. The first is that I am afraid that perhaps my constituents might think that I had joined the deaf and dumb club which has been formed on the other side of the House, led by the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane). In the second place, I consider I would be recreant to the duty which I owe to the maritime provinces, from which I come, if I did not have something to say on this question.

In the first place, I deplore the fact that in this the twentieth century of Christian civilization the time of this House as well as that of other parliaments should be occupied in discussing ways and means to build warships for the destruction of life and property. I think that our time would be much better occupied in discussing ways and means to build up our country by enlarging our markets and taking away the restrictions on trade which at present exist, so as to enable our farmers and fishermen to sell their products in the highest market. I desire to discuss the proposal of the Government and the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition from a layman's and businessman's standpoint.

It is not necessary, perhaps, for me to say that I am opposed entirely to the proposal of sending to Great Britain the sum of $35,000,000, I think it is an insult to the loyalty of the Canadian people and is doing them gross injustice in the eyes of the whole world while at the same time it is deceiving the people of Great Britain. I can imagine the Prime Minister and his cohorts when visiting old England last year going to the foot of the throne and saying: We love thee, oh England, especially at election times when we can wave the flag and cry loyalty to catch votes. At such times we would do anything for you, but now our loyalty has cooled off, and the most we can do is to give you money to build three empty dreadnoughts, the largest and strongest ships that science can build and money can buy. But do not ask us to build them in Canada because we do not know how; we have not the brains and the ability; and besides if they are built in England, our Nationalist friends in Quebec cannot hear the sound of the hammers and the various noises incidental to the building of a ship. You must know I have some men in my Cabinet who do not like to hear anything about battleships for England, and except for the $7,000 salary which bolts and bars them to their seats, they would no doubt follow Mr. Monk. If we give you ships we will give you the guns too, but do not ask us to give you the powder or the men to touch the powder off because men are awfully scarce in Canada who would risk their lives unless you would agree not to fire the guns. We can give you the money all right, thanks to the Fielding tariff which left the treasury overflowing when we took power, and we have enough money to pay for the three ships; but we want to stipulate that in case we get hard up a little later on, you will agree to lend us those $35,000,000 back.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a humiliating position for Canada to be placed in. It is un-British and un-Canadian. I cannot bring myself to believe that any emergency exists at all. I am perfectly willing, and I believe that the people of this country are willing, to take the words of the Right Hon. Mr. Asquith, who, only a few weeks ago, speaking at a banquet in London, said:

There has been no time in the history of Great Britain when she was on better terms with all the great powers of the world than she is to-day.

I am prepared to take his statement in preference to the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite who pose as naval experts, but some of whom are so loyal and brave that they would turn pale at the explosion of an ordinary fire-cracker. Of course, Sir, I do not include in that statement the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes), because we all know that he went to South Africa and came back with no bullet holes in his armour and no smell of powder about his clothes. I was pleased, as every hon. member of this House must have been pleased to hear the leader of the Opposition discuss this great question on broad and patriotic lines, and I am sorry to say that members of the Government have gone out of their way to drag into this question petty party politics of the smallest kind. The greatest offender was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and Naval Defence. From him we might have expected a better example. I would have expected the Minister of Naval Defence (Mr. Hazen), with whose department this great question is more intimately associated, to have discussed it in a broad and statesmanlike manner. It was most amusing to hear the hon. Minister of Naval Defence trying to deceive the people of the little province by the sea, by suggesting to them that under the fostering care of the Government's naval policy they would see in the province the ship-building industry revived. Let me read you, Mr. Speaker, what he said, in speaking on this resolution, as reported on page 1095 of 'Hansard':

I come, Mr. Speaker, from one of that group of little provinces by the sea, where bold and hardy seamen are reared, where the salt breath of the sea is ever in our nostrils, where the limitless road of the ocean lies at every man's threshold, tempting him beyond the horizon to lands afar. In the days gone by those provinces excelled in ship-building; the products of their skill were found in every sea and in every port. The coming of the iron age killed that industry; the former days of romance are gone. But it is a peculiar pleasure to me to be able to point to that feature of our policy which provides for the revival of our ship-building industry, and provides for it upon a sound, a well considered and a businesslike plan. Under its fostering care, Mr. Speaker, we may look forward with confidence to the day when we again may see our own ships plough the distant oceans, when once more to the man of the maritime provinces the sea will be his rightful heritage. When that day comes, those trading ships under the Canadian ensign, those peaceful merchantmen gliding backwards and forward like shuttles binding the countries of the globe together in a web of harmony and history will cross oceans guarded from molestation by the white ensign of the Imperial navy. The trade routes our steamers will follow will be protected by the warships of our navy—ours in reality henceforward—and among those great policemen of the ocean will be Canadian ships, helping to secure our trade from interruption and our flag from insult.

I was amused to hear those eloquent remarks from the Minister of Naval Defence. I would like to ask him, how will the ship-building industry be revived by sending $35,000,000 in cash out of Canada, money which belongs to the farmer, to the fisherman, to the labourer, and to the mechanic, to help the ship-building industry of Great Britain and to give the mechanics of that country the labour which rightfully belongs to the workmen of Canada. I am honoured by representing a constituency that for fifty years or more built, owned and manned and managed their own ships. These ships ploughed every sea and visited almost every port in the world, and I wish to say for the information of some hon. members of this House, who perhaps do not know, that at one time in the history of the little county of Yarmouth with a population of only 23,000, we owned more ships in proportion to its population than any other place in the known world. In those days the ships were built under very hard conditions and were manned by men who endured many hardships, and officered by men of indomitable will, many of whom have occupied the highest positions in the maritime world. Ships bearing the name of Yarmouth have been seen in every part of the world, and yet, Sir, we are told that large steel ships cannot be built in fifty years in this country. That statement does a gross injustice to the intelligence, ability and perseverance of the people of that little province by the sea whose ancestors were of indomitable will, and who surmounted difficulties not thought of in these days. We are a maritime people and equipped in every way with the raw materials and the brains to build ships of any class or size, and to man them from the commander down to the smallest position on board; and if the Laurier Government had not been defeated we should to-day have been building in Nova Scotia warships and merchant vessels, giving employment to large numbers of men, developing our natural resources, and spending the money in our own country, which, under the policy of the present Government, will be spent in Great Britain in maintaining British shipyards instead of inaugurating a new era of ship-building in Canada. I may say that the money that will be sent to England will be partially spent in obtaining armour plate, the largest part of which I am informed is got from Germany, the country about which most of this discussion has taken place. We have those raw materials, in Nova Scotia and other parts of Canada, and it would be far better to keep that money at home and spend it. The Prime Minister in introducing his naval policy, spoke as follows, as reported at page 710 of 'Hansard':

Where shall these ships be built? They will be built under Admiralty supervision in the United Kingdom, for the reason that at present there are no adequate facilities for constructing them in Canada. The plant required for the construction of a dreadnought battleship is enormous, and it would be impossible at present to maintain ship-building in this country on such a scale. In any case, only the hull could be built in Canada; because the machinery, the armour, and the guns would necessarily be constructed or manufactured in the United Kingdom.

The statement I have just made that a large part of this armour plate is got from Germany does not quite agree with the Premier's statement:

The additional cost of construction in Canada would be about $12,000,000 for the three ships, and it would be impossible to estimate the delay. No one is more eager than myself for the development of ship-building industries in Canada, but we cannot, upon any business or economic considerations, begin with the construction of dreadnoughts; and especially we could not do so when these ships are urgently required within two or three years at the outside for rendering aid upon which may depend the Empire's future existence. According to my conception, the effective development of ship-building industries in Canada must commence with small beginnings and in a businesslike way.

In reply to this I would say that even at the additional cost I would be prepared to have those ships built in Canada by all means, and for the reasons which I have stated. I am told on the best authority that British shipyards are so busy to-day, it is impossible to make a contract for the construction of a tramp steamer for any reasonable delivery. This then, Sir, is surely an opportune time for Canada to embark in the ship-building industry and to demonstrate to the world that we can, and will, establish shipyards to build our own warships, and maintain them as well. I have no sympathy with the statement made by the leader of the Government that it would take Canada a quarter or half a century to build up a naval organization, and that even then it would be but a poor weak substitute for the organization which the Empire now possesses. I wish to ask the right hon. gentleman if Great Britain always had those shipbuilding plants and the ability to build ships that it has to-day. Because, Sir, I fail to read in the Book of Genesis—which is the first book in the Bible, I may say, for the information of hon. gentlemen opposite—that England was building ships at that time. Then let us start, and, with brain, ability, and determination, second to no people in the known world, we are bound to succeed. If the United States had not commenced building her own ships, she would have to-day been building them in some foreign country. Let us follow her example and build ships ourselves as she is doing to-day.

The right hon. Prime Minister, page 708 of 'Hansard' deplored the fact that the British flag has been withdrawn from the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Let me read what he said:

> The withdrawal of the British flag and the British navy from so many parts of the world for the purpose of concentration in home waters has been necessary but unfortunate. Our navy was once dominant everywhere, and the white ensign was the token of naval supremacy in all the seas. Is it not time that the former conditions should in some measure be restored? Upon our own coasts, both Atlantic and Pacific, powerful squadrons were maintained twelve years ago. To-day the flag is not shown on either seaboard.

I cannot see that under the right hon. Prime Minister's policy this is going to be remedied; and, if he is sincere, I would strongly advise him to adopt the policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, which will give us ships on both oceans, protecting Canada, giving labour to Canadians, and at the same time rendering substantial aid to the Empire. I find in the English Parliamentary Debates, volume 41, No. 102, July 22, 1912, a speech by the Hon. Winston Churchill, in which, while discussing the navy estimates for the year 1912, he says:

> Cool, steady, methodical preparation, prolonged over a succession of years, can alone raise the margin of naval power. It is no use flinging millions of money about, on the impulse of the moment——

Which hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to do

> —by a gesture of impatience, or in a mood of panic. Such a course only reveals your weakness and impotence. Those who clamour for sensational expenditure, who think that the kind of danger with which we are faced needs to be warded off or can be warded off in that way, are either ignorant themselves of naval conditions or take advantage of the ignorance of others.

Which remarks I commend most seriously to the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite as well as to that of the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. McLean), whose speech must have made the people of Germany tremble or wonder why they had never heard of this gallant colonel before. I also commend to him the following clipping dated London, February 8, to show how much of an emergency exists at this present time:

> London, February 8.—The morning papers give great prominence, both in their news and editorial columns to the statement of Admiral von Tirpitz, the German Minister of Marine, that Great Britain's naval programme, as outlined by Winston Churchill, is satisfactory to Germany.
>
> 'Change of front by Germany' 'first step toward detente in Anglo-German relations,' 'considerable step towards friendship,' and 'fraught with momentous consequence' phrases which are used to show how the statement is viewed here. Even the least demonstrative of the newspapers welcome it as opening the way to consider the naval rivalry of the two nations in a calmer spirit, and augur that it will result in a lull in the ruinous competition of building big ships and armaments.
>
> Some newspapers build the assumption that a definite agreement has been reached between Great Britain and Germany, especially as the official report of Herr von Tirpitz's statement is accompanied by a similar one ascribed to Herr Jagow, the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, an emphatic declaration that Germany's relations with all the powers are good. To this unofficial reports add that Herr Jagow referred particularly to the relations between Germany and England. This has deepened the impression that a special understanding has been reached between the two countries although this is no solid ground for the assumption.

My opinion is that if any war ever occurs between Germany and England, it will be caused almost entirely by the cheap politicians in Great Britain and the cheaper politicians in this country.

Now, I desire to say a word in reference to the tinpot navy, so-called by our friends opposite. This so-called tinpot navy will float, but it will be a long while before a navy belonging to hon. gentlemen will ever float. I commend to hon. gentlemen opposite a short statement which I took from the Halifax Recorder in reference to a statement made by the Halifax Herald that there were no Nova Scotians on board the Niobe. That is about as near the truth as some of these statements are, I am sorry to say, because we have two or three young men from Yarmouth, which I may say for the information of some hon. members of this House, is a county in the province of Nova Scotia, who had been on board the Niobe from the time that she came to this side. I was very pleased to learn that the young men who were on board of her have passed their examination in a very satisfactory manner indeed. The paragraph to which I refer is as follows:

'There were never any Nova Scotians on the Niobe,' says our contemporary (the Halifax Herald) categorically. We answer there have been and there are still Nova Scotians on the Niobe. We also state that the Nova Scotian applications for enrollment in the Naval College were considerably more numerous than could be admitted——

I can substantiate that statement, because there were some young men from Yarmouth who applied.

—and every British naval officer who has had anything to do with Canadian sailors will invariably speak of them in the highest terms. If it is a glorious thing for a British sailor to serve in the navy of this country, why should it be regarded as mean and contemptible for a Canadian sailor to serve in a Canadian navy? If cruisers like the Niobe and Rainbow are to be jeered at as tinpots, why should not the same class of vessels, of which there are a hundred at least in the British navy, be called tinpots? Does the mere possession of them by Canada make them 'tinpots?' Should sailors serving in a Canadian cruiser be subjected to contempt and insult when sailors serving in a British cruiser of the same class are lauded as heroes genuinely serving their country? If all save dreadnoughts are to be regarded as tinpots, then out of the entire British navy at the present time there are only eighteen vessels which cannot be classed as tinpots; and the British Admiralty continues to build ten or twelve tinpots to one dreadnought.

Reference has been made on several occasions in this House, and several of the Tory newspapers of Canada have taken great delight in referring during the last two years, to the visit of H.M.C.S. Niobe to Yarmouth. In order to bring the matter fully to your attention, I desire to read an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Star on November 23, 1911:

Once more the Niobe.

The inquiry into the grounding of the Niobe has been concluded and the special cruiser squadron which came to Halifax for the purpose of holding a court-martial is at liberty to go on its appointed business. Having a navy—or the remnants of a navy—of our own, British warships are no longer of special interest to us—in time of peace.

The commander of the Niobe is acquitted of all blame; one lieutenant has been reprimanded, and one dismissed from the service. So far, the immutable law of the British navy, which takes no account of any actors but those under its own jurisdiction or any circumstances except those of the sea and of ships, has worked out a definite result from certain given factors. Whether the court of public opinion with greater latitude and wider powers cannot go a little deeper and place the real responsibility on more guilty shoulders remains to be seen.

It is not necessary to go again over the shameless correspondence, by letter and cable, in the course of which Messrs. Fielding and Brodeur set forth their conviction that the business of the Canadian navy was to make votes for the Government of the day, and that it did not make much difference what training the officers and men had in seamanship so long as the first could dance and the second parade streets to the advantage of a hard-pressed but deserving member of Parliament. The well-meant quavering protests of the Board of Naval Advisers were drowned in the bluff and hearty roars with which two such thorough-going old salts as Skipper Fielding and skipper Brodeur backed up mate Law's demand that the Niobe should take a hand in the game of politics. So the Niobe was sent jogging up and down the coast of Nova Scotia and just what the sailors of the Marine Department warned the politicians of the Cabinet might happen, did happen. The most outrageous part of the whole affair is its result; one young officer ruined, another disgraced, and Messrs. Fielding, Brodeur and Law left as complacent and undisturbed and happy as if the responsibility had really rested on Commander Macdonald and his unfortunate lieutenants.

I regret exceedingly that the Conservative newspapers of this country have stooped so low as to put a political bearing on the visit of the Niobe to Yarmouth. I can assure the members of this House that I have no apology to make for asking H.M.C.S. Niobe to visit Yarmouth. Even my hon. friend the Postmaster General referred to the visit in a derogatory way; and some hon. gentlemen stated in this House last session that the vessel was too large to come into the port of Yarmouth and that she grounded in the harbour. That statement was made also by a gentleman who represents a constituency not far from Yarmouth; and I would advise that hon. gentleman to look more after the wood piles in his own county, and he will find that he is a better judge of spruce gum than he is of the geography of the port of Yarmouth. The occasion on which the Niobe visited Yarmouth was a most important one, not only in the history of Yarmouth itself, but also in the history of the province of Nova Scotia. The occasion was the 150th anniversary of the settlement of Yarmouth, one of the most important ports in the Maritime provinces. Tory newspapers and hon. gentlemen opposite have thought it most strange that a warship, or at least a training ship, should visit Yarmouth on such an occasion as that. Not many years ago, when a celebration was held at Louisburg, Cape Breton, one of His Majesty's gunboats went there, and the officers and crew participated in the parade and celebration. Why should not Yarmouth be favoured with a visit from the Niobe as well as any other port of this Dominion? She was not purchased to lie in a harbour; she was purchased to give the crew on board practice; and for that purpose the boat was supposed to go up and down the coast and visit the different ports. I might say that the visit of the Niobe was asked for by the committee which was appointed to get up the celebration, which we called the Old Home Week. That committee consisted of Conservatives and Liberals; and I defy any member of this House to go to Yarmouth and find any decent, respectable Conservative who will say that there was any political reason in connection with the visit of the Niobe to Yarmouth. I have yet to hear one reason why she should not have visited Yarmouth. Nobody regrets more than I do the unfortunate accident that happened to her after she left Yarmouth, but the accident did not occur in Yarmouth, and I deny in toto the statement that it did. While that vessel lay in Yarmouth, she lay there——

Mr. LAW: If hon. gentlemen opposite would wait until I finish my sentence; it would be better. She lay in safety while she was there. Instead of my requiring a warship to come to Yarmouth to win me an election there, as the Montreal Star puts it, I want to tell the editor of the Montreal Star that in 1908 I was returned to this House with the largest majority ever given to a member from the county of Yarmouth since Confederation; and, thanks to the magnificent policy which the Laurier Government gave us to go to the country on in September, 1911, in which was included the reciprocity agreement with the United States, the vote in the county of Yarmouth was one of the most intelligent given in any county in the Dominion of Canada. Under that policy I was returned by the magnificent majority of 1,184, three hundred more than I had in 1908. If I had a very few votes more, the gentleman who opposed me would have left $200 in the Dominion treasury, as a forfeited deposit, to add to the Laurier Government's surplus. Instead of my requiring this warship to secure my election, if hon. gentlemen opposite ask the gentleman who ran against me—and he is a man whom I respect in every way—how he felt at the conclusion of the polls on the 21st of September, 1911, when the votes had been counted, he probably would tell them that he felt as if a warship had struck him.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I am opposed to and will vote against the Government proposal as an emergency proposition, because I do not believe that any emergency exists. I will support the proposition of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition because it is based on the true Canadian idea of helping the Empire, and at the same time helping ourselves.

Mr. DAVID WARNOCK (Macleod): I am glad to have an opportunity at last of speaking on the momentous question now before the House. I have heard it stated by hon. members behind the treasury benches that Canada cannot man a navy. But, Sir, listening, as I have to almost every speech delivered on both sides of the House, I have come to the conclusion that there are more embryo admirals sitting in the Canadian House of Commons than will meet the requirements of all the navies of the British Empire for many years to come. If our German friends have any sense of humour, they must have had many a quiet laugh while reading the discourses of these would-be naval experts on naval strategy. I have no theories on naval strategy, but I do entertain convictions on what I think is Canada's duty in the matter of naval defence.

Listening as I did to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, I was much impressed by the diversity of opinion prevailing among them. Some hon. members tried to lead the House to believe that the Government policy is a contribution now, to be followed later by a Canadian navy; others that the policy of the right hon. the Prime Minister is one of continued contribution; and others that it is a contribution now, and that there will be nothing further until we are given a voice in Imperial politics. It was all very edifying, and I am sorry the Prime Minister found it necessary to impose the ban of silence on his followers; but I am surprised he did not do so earlier in the debate.

I do not purpose quoting the 1910 speeches of hon. members opposite. The pages of 'Hansard' are already replete with quotations from those speeches and I agree to some extent with the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) when he says that what hon. members said in 1909 and 1910 is of little consequence. In most cases that is true; but there are some exceptions. I believe that the right hon. the Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) laid down sound principles in their 1910 speeches, and that those speeches are the best and most complete answer to their speeches of to-day. I am sure that both these hon. gentlemen deep down in their hearts still believe what they said in 1910 to be true. Their words of to-day are not the words of the patriots of 1910. but are dictated by the influence of political expediency; and in departing from their principles of 1910, I believe they have made a great mistake. In my humble opinion, their policy of contribution is all wrong and will not find favour in the eye of the people of Canada.

I have said that I have no theories to offer on naval strategy; but I desire to put on record the opinions of eminent men representing both sides of politics in the United Kingdom and who are well qualified to judge correctly what is the best policy for Canada and the other overseas dominions to adopt in giving effective aid to the Empire. I quote from the speech of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill at the Shipwrights' banquet, on the eve of Mr. Borden's visit to London:

If the main development of the past ten years has been the concentration of the British fleet in decisive theatres, it seems to me—and I dare say to you not unlikely that the main development of the next ten years will be the growth of the effective naval forces in the great dominions overseas. Then we shall be able to make what we think will be found to be the true division of labour between the Mother Country and her daughter states—that we should maintain the sea supremacy against all comers at the decisive point, and that they should guard and patrol all the rest of the British Empire.

The Right Hon. Mr. Balfour, at one time leader of the Unionists in Great Britain, used this language, speaking on principles underlying true imperialism:

The people of Canada and the other overseas dominions must have and will have their feeling of nationality. Every Canadian ought to want to feel that Canada has got its own principles for the development of the future. Do not let us discourage that local patriotism. Let them cultivate their own feeling for the nationality of Canada, Canada for the Canadians, Australia for the Australians, but the whole for the Empire. It was the misconception of this principle that led to the great disruption between Britain and the American colonies a century and a half ago, and perhaps after all it required that lesson to teach us what we know.

Then, no less authority on naval matters than Lord Charles Beresford, speaking on the proposal submitted by Mr. Borden to this House, said:

I see grave danger in the Borden idea. What I recommended that the dominions do was to defend their end of the trade routes with strong naval bases, mines, torpedo boat destroyers and light cruisers. The trade routes are unprotected, and now our danger is starvation, not invasion. The country was deceived and fooled by statements regarding the dreadnoughts of other nations. They were insulted by being told that a dreadnought could sink their whole fleets. The people speak of nothing but dreadnoughts, quite forgetting that a fleet is composed of a variety of units, and one of which being defective or short, jeopardizes the whole.

In face of the statements of the eminent authorities I have just quoted, is any hon. member of this House justified in saying that those of us who are opposed to a policy of contribution and in favour of a Canadian navy are separatists?

I heard the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) make the statement that the policy of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition is a separatist policy. If you will pardon a personal reference, Mr. Speaker, I may say that, born and brought up as I was on the banks of the Clyde, I descended from forefathers who fought and bled under Wallace and Bruce, my loyalty cannot be questioned when I say that I am absolutely opposed to a policy of contribution, and am in favour of the policy of my right hon. leader, that of a navy for Canada, manned and maintained by Canada. Are the British-born of Australia separatists when they elect to construct a navy as being the best means of assisting the Motherland? When they found that a policy of contribution was not the right one, they abandoned it, and are now constructing a navy of their own. Let me read an extract from the report of an interview given by Sir George Reid, ex-Premier of Australia, and now High Commissioner in London for that Commonwealth.

Our fleet is being put together. Admiral Henderson's scheme involves a very large expenditure during the next few years. When the scheme is completed there will be a fleet of about fifty-four vessels.

Just think of it—fifty-four vessels, and Australia has but half the population of Canada!

I think it is very important that the British dominions should answer the 'call of the sea.' It will be a bad day for the British race when it does not. One of the arguments in favour of colonial navies is that in days to come the dominions will undertake the defence of the seas adjacent to them, thus relieving the Mother Country immensely. I can see no reason why the North Atlantic and Pacific stations should not be handed over to Canada and the China station to India. Australia has already taken up the guardianship of the southern seas, and doubtless South Africa might develop some sort of naval force. That would leave to Great Britain the work of defence in the North sea and the Mediterranean, and of course the leading share in defending the ocean tracks of Imperial commerce. 'I think that would probably be a better arrangement than having only Admiralty fleets, and no fleets in connection with the dominions. At the rate at which the dominions are now developing such a state of things could not last. It is only natural that communities, like individuals, should spend their money much more freely upon things which they can call their own than in buying things for the old man.

Sir George Reid was asked:

If the dominions contribute otherwise, will they not demand a large voice in the settling 'questions of foreign policy'?

To this Sir George made reply:

That question raises many matters upon which it is impossible to be dogmatic at present. Looking at things, as they stand at present, it seems to me that while it is easy to talk of sharing foreign policy between governments thousands of miles apart, it is also full of difficulty. A crisis might arise in the course of a few hours which would call for an instant decision, but if the Imperial brains are scattered all over the face of the globe, how are they to be gathered together in sufficient time to arrive at a united resolve? How are colonial statesmen, who have never been trained in diplomacy, to be expected suddenly to take a leading part in Imperial emergencies involving foreign relations? One thing is to be said about such a proposition, and that is that it is new. I myself would like some responsible statesman, instead of merely talking in this way, to suggest some definite scheme. Then we would be able to discuss the matter to some advantage. At present my profound conviction is that Australia would never dream of accepting a small part in some such scheme of Imperial control. There would be, presumably, members from Canada, South Africa, New Zealand and Australia. If the representation was arranged on the basis of population, there would be forty-five members for Great Britain, seven or eight for Canada, one for New Zealand, two for South Africa, and five for Australia. Put the whole of the dominions together, and the forty-five would still be masters of the situation. At present Australia has a national voice, which is far more influential than if she was only a humble member of an Imperial orchestra.

We should come dangerously near to getting back to the state of things which prevailed at the time of the North American rebellion in 1770. Such a parliament without powers of taxation would be rather idle. Let us suppose that a method of taxation is proposed in this Parliament which the forty-five British members think to be admirable, but which the Australians members think detestable. You would then find, if the tax was carried, that the dominions were being taxed, by a method which they would consider most objectionable. Is this the way in which we are going to promote harmony and solidarity in the Empire? I do not want to say that an Imperial Parliament is impossible, but I want to see a definite scheme which I could consider. The onus of change is so tremendous and on the other hand the present state of the Empire is something which is even miraculously harmonious.

I ask again, can anyone justify the statement that the policy of the right hon. leader of the Opposition is a separatist policy, when it is good enough for the British-born people of Australia? Such statements as those made by the hon. member for Frontenac are the height of absurdity, and should not be taken seriously, but I know that in the last election many of my countrymen—aye, and many sons of Canada—were influenced by these statements and inveigled into voting for the 'loyal Conservatives,' or remaining away from the polls. However, the people know better now, and, at the next election, which is, perhaps not far distant, the separatist cry will have little effect.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), speaking on this question some time ago, imputed venal motives to hon. members on this side of the House because they favoured the spending of this money in Canada. If the Canadian manufacturers had been capable of producing even the semblance of a battleship, I venture to say that the hon. member would have been the last man to support a policy of contribution. He would have been one of the first to voice a vehement protest against that profit of three and a half, or four, or perhaps five or six millions, escaping the Canadian manufacturers. Even his double-ply brand of imperialism would not have withstood the strain of seeing that money leave Canada. And it remained with the hon. member for Brantford to discover a new peril. He said that in the event of the British navy being annihilated by the German navy, the United States would be the greatest naval power, and we would find the guns of that country trained on Canada. That, in my opinion, is a strong argument in favour of a Canadian navy, but, surely it is a rash and uncalled for statement just at a time when the people of the United States and the people of Canada are preparing to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of peace between the two countries. Such statements are on a par with the imputations against Germany, are ill-judged, and likely to do much harm.

I am not one of those members who hold the opinion that a voice in the shaping of the foreign policy of Great Britain would tend to strengthen the bonds of the Empire. I entirely agree with hon. members on this side of the House who have said that preference advocates are the worst enemies of the Empire, and that Imperial preference could only lead to disruption and disintegration of the Empire. Let me quote what Lord Avebury, speaking in London some time ago, said:

Lord Avebury, who challenged in principle the idea that a system of preference would make for greater unity, said the communities did not trade with one another, it was proposed to give a preference on wheat to the Canadian producer but no suggestion has been made that timber, equally produced in Canada, though by another set of individuals, was to be the subject of preference, or wool in Australia. Timber and wool were raw materials, wheat was food; did they suppose that distinction would comfort the man who produced wood in Canada or wool in Australia who found his neighbour who happened to deal in wheat, put in a more favourable position than himself? How would it be a binding force on our side if the humbler classes had to pay more for bread? Imperialism based on trade only, appealed to traders. Just consider the amount of British capital which had been supplied for the development of Canadian interests; it had been for the advantage of Canada and for our advantage. Business and politics were in antithesis. Our Canadian fellow subjects would not become Americans or Germans because they traded with the United States or because they traded with Germany. The Empire had no worse enemy than the man who said we must tax ourselves for the benefit of the Canadian people.

In this regard it would seem that the visit of the right hon. the leader of the Government and his ministers to the United Kingdom last summer has done a great deal of harm. Since that visit the impression has been growing in the minds of the people of the Old Land that some understanding was arrived at between the Prime Minister of Canada and Mr. Bonar Law, leader of the Unionist party regarding Imperial preference. The injudicious speech of Mr. Bonar Law in Sir Max Aitken's constituency strengthened this belief and Mr. Bonar Law was taken to task by his Unionist colleagues for his error of judgment. But that gentleman to save himself, promptly put the blame on Canadians, and the Prime Minister of Canada just as promptly repudiated all responsibility. But, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Rouville said yesterday, there is strong circumstantial evidence that such an agreement or understanding existed. And what is the result? Hitherto Canada has been patted on the back, so to speak, and applauded as the brightest gem in the overseas group, has been paraded as the good child of the Empire until, I fear, we have been carried away and have been guilty of much self-laudation. The result is that some of the English journals have taken to telling us that we are too precocious, altogether too presumptious, and some of these journals are more candid than polite. I have here an excerpt from the Westminster Review which a friend sent me and as it will do some hon. members opposite no harm to read what is being said of us I should like to put the article on 'Hansard':

We confess ourselves unable to join in the chorus of fulsome eulogies with which the press, Liberal as well as Conservative, has hailed Mr. Borden's offer. For many years we have been growing into the habit of surrounding every Canadian action with a halo of Imperial greatness. It is a very bad habit; bad for Canada and bad for ourselves. It is bad for Canada because it has caused Canadians to imagine that their community with all its political immorality and undesirable electoral and parliamentary corruption is the chief star in the Empire troupe.

Evidently the editor of the Westminster Review had heard the details of the Macdonald election. He must be afraid that if Canadian statesmen are sent to represent Canada in the Imperial House they will contaminate our Imperial statesmen.

It is bad for ourselves because we have altogether obscured our vision of what Canada really is and what Canadians really mean.

We desire to make our position quite clear. No one who has read these notes for the past two years can doubt the vigour of our devotion to the Imperial idea. It is second only to our devotion to the real principles of imperialism. We are imperialists in the truest sense of the word because we are Liberals, because we believe that a free federation of Anglo-Saxon communities linked together for common ends would form the most powerful instrument for progress the world has ever seen.

Considered in that light, Canada is a blot on the escutcheon of the Empire. It is not Liberalism that animates her policy, but money; not love of freedom, but greed for success; not disinterested public spirit, but personal ambitions of the lower type. It is deeply regrettable that it should be so; but no one who knows Canadian politics from the inside will contest that it is so. It is natural then that we have no desire to see Canada in her present state acquire an influence in the Empire disproportionate to her position in it; it is an influence that spreads rapidly and imperceptibly. There has been too strong a flavour of Canadian politics about certain recent transactions, not only of the Opposition but even of the Government.

As to the gift itself acceptable though it is, it need not give occasion for the undignified tearful slobberings of eternal gratitude in which the press in this country has been indulging. Canada knows perfectly well that no wealthy community can exist to-day without means of self-defence; she knows that so long as Anglo-German relations are in their present state the bulk of the British fleet must be concentrated in home waters. She sees quite clearly that, under the circumstances, if she wishes to remain an independent entity she has only two alternatives: to pile up armaments on her own account, or to help the Mother Country to defend her. She has chosen the latter alternative; it is enormously cheaper and more practical. It also has the advantage of being clothed in the garb of Imperial loyalty. That is all.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is enormously cheaper, infinitely cheaper. As my hon. friend the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) said the other day, it is so cheap that we are endeavouring to pay our indebtedness to the Mother Country for defence over a long term of years at the rate of 3½ cents on the dollar—with a string on the 3½ cents.

That is what we get for interfering in Imperial politics. Politicians and party papers in Britain show partisan bias in speaking of Canadian politics; and there is a return given in kind. One can hardly pick up a Canadian newspaper to-day without finding, if it is Liberal, that it is berating Bonar Law, Austin Chamberlain or F. E. Smith, and if it be Conservative that Earl Grey or Mr. Bryce or Premier Asquith are being roundly criticised. And so friction is developing.

But, Mr. Speaker, in the midst of turmoil it has been left to the Manitoba Grain Growers to hold out the olive branch; it has been left to them to memorialize Premier Asquith and to assure him that western farmers have no desire to benefit by the imposition of taxes on the food of the people of the Motherland. These are the western farmers who were stigmatized by the Big Interests as being annexationists, disloyal to the Empire, and desirous of handing Canada over to the United States because in 1911 they supported and voted for a trade agreement which would have been of inestimable benefit to this whole Dominion. The action of these western farmers at once stamps them as the leading patriots and true imperialists in Canada. Only yesterday I received from friends in the Old Country, from men who are well informed, letters which tell me that the action of these western farmers has done more to dispel the feeling of resentment in the Motherland than any disavowal by the Government could possibly have done. Will the Canadian Manufacturers follow the example of the western farmers and disclaim any desire to procure Imperial preference? No, Mr. Speaker, they will not; their motto is 'Preference for preference'; their so-called imperialism emanates from the pocket, not from the heart. So much for preference within the Empire.

With regard to the proposed contribution, what do our our British-born citizens think of the proposal to send $35,000,000 for the purpose of building battleships which are to be manned and maintained by our kinsmen across the sea? Do they approve of it? I do not think so. They know that such a policy must increase the burden of the British taxpayer. During the past fifteen or twenty years, hundreds of thousands of emigrants have left the shores of Britain to adopt pioneer life in Canada. Many of these settlers brought all the available family capital with them, and are expected to support or assist in supporting aged parents or other relatives in the Old Land. Many have invested every dollar they possessed in homestead improvements; they have been grievously disappointed with the small returns from the sale of their crops and now have difficulty in meeting their financial obligations. Their relatives at home know well their circumstances, and, I have reason to know, are advising these British-born settlers to demand a vote on this proposed policy of contribution, and to vote against it. Their relatives in the Old Land have no desire to see Canada send that contribution to the British Admiralty for the purpose of building superfluous battleships, and, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if the people of the Mother Country were given an opportunity to vote for or against the acceptance of the proposed contribution it would be overwhelmingly rejected. But I may be asked, if that is so, then why has the Admiralty accepted it? Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill was well aware of the Government of Canada's position. He knew that their Nationalist allies in Quebec had pledged themselves to repeal the Laurier Naval Act, and that a contribution was all that the Government of Canada could give. And, further, Mr. Speaker, the First Lord of the Admiralty loves a demonstration; he possesses a weakness which is very evident in Canada's Conservative Government, a weakness for spectacular display; and the more spectacular it is the better he likes it. No, Mr. Speaker, a policy of contribution will not appeal to the British-born; it is too un-British, The British-born have never asked anyone to fight their battles; they are prepared to defend themselves.

And what of our German settlers, these thrifty, industrious, law abiding people who are warmly welcomed wherever they go? What do they think of all this railing at Germany by hon. members on the Government benches, this imputing of sinister motives because Germany chooses to build a navy? Has not Germany a perfect right to build a navy, just as much right as Russia, Austria, Italy, or even Great Britain herself? Why should hon. members opposite say that Germany is building her fleet for the purpose of smashing the British Empire? It is an insult to our German settlers to ask them to vote a contribution. The German jingoes tell their people that Britain is building her fleet for the purpose of attacking Germany, and so the competition is perpetuated from year to year. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any hon. member in this House will live to see the day when Great Britain and Germany will come to blows, unless such a deplorable contingency should arise through a general European conflagration. No, Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid of Germany. I am more inclined to agree with Sir Richard McBride, Premier of British Columbia, when he points to a menace on our Pacific coast. Speaking in the provincial Legislature a few days ago, he, good party man that he is, endorsed the contribution policy but went on to point out the necessity for adequate naval protection on the Pacific coast. I will read a paragraph of his speech as reported in one of the British Columbia papers. Dealing with the question of naval protection for the Canada Pacific coast, he said:

Every day is pointing out to the world the rich variety of our resources and the magnitude of our potentialities as a great nation of the future, while across the sea that wonderful people, the Japanese—and the Chinese as well—are intensely engaged nation-building. They cannot but be interested in the great resources and potentialities of this land.

They are not to be blamed if they take more than a healthy interest in this part of Canada, and if in an unguarded hour the naval forces of those countries or either of them should cross the seas, and take possession of some of our so-desirable territory, we in Canada have ourselves to blame.

Surely that is a strong argument for the construction of a Canadian navy for the defence of our own shores.

Mr. Speaker, there may be much truth in Sir Richard McBride's warning, and it may be that in ten, fifteen or twenty years Canada's greatest menace will be on the Pacific coast. We know that Japan is already a naval power not to be ignored. She demonstrated that against Russia a few years ago and she is rapidly expanding that naval power. I think it behooves Canada to endeavour to meet the wishes of Australia and New Zealand, come to some agreement with these sister dominions and join hands with them in patrolling Pacific waters for the protection of our Pacific shores.

Under these circumstances I am surprised that we have not heard more from hon. members from British Columbia . There are seven hon. members from British Columbia in this House, yet only one has spoken, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) and he is opposed to a Canadian navy. He has told us that men could not be got in British Columbia or Canada to man a navy. But, the hon. gentleman's provincial Premier does not harbour any misgivings on that point and I am sure that if he had been a member of this House he would have voiced a strong and convincing argument in favour of a Canadian navy. Of what value would Canada's three dreadnoughts in the North sea be to British Columbia if the Japanese or Chinese navies began dropping shells into Vancouver or Victoria, or Nanaimo, just by way of acknowledging the many more or less complimentary things said of them by hon. members from British Columbia? I think there would be considerable consternation in these cities and the inhabitants would have to dance to Japanese music.

I have said nothing of the emergency. In my humble opinion the so-called emergency is a myth, a figment of the be-fuddled imaginations of club idlers in London, England, and, I am sorry to say, in Montreal and Toronto. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) abandoned that cry, he even abandoned the need and in his efforts to defend the contribution policy, fell back upon confidential information given to the right hon. the leader of the Government. But, Mr. Speaker, against that confidential information, we have the statement of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill who when addressing his constituents only a few days ago told the good people of Dundee, that there is no emergency, no need, that Great Britain is ready and able to defend her supremacy and that neither the people of the Motherland nor the people of the overseas dominions need have fear of that supremacy being challenged. For myself I accept the assurance of the First Lord of the Admiralty.

As one of the British-born, I am unalterably opposed to the proposed contribution for the following reasons:—

1st. It will add to the already heavy burden of the British taxpayer by compelling him to man and maintain three superfluous battleships, but yet leaves the shores of Canada defenceless.

2nd. It is humiliating for Canada to hold up the Motherland and say we will give a contribution of thirty-five millions but nothing more until we are given a voice in Imperial affairs.

3rd. The best authorities are agreed that Canada's duty is to defend her own shores and thereby leave the Motherland free to concentrate her fleet in the North sea.

4th. The Government have no right to ask Parliament to vote this contribution until they have disclosed their permanent policy and assured the people that Canada is not to be plunged into the mad race for armament which prevails in Europe.

I believe the great majority of the people of Canada are opposed to this contribution. Organized labour is against it, the Grange of Ontario, the Grain Growers of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, the United Farmers of Alberta, and the majority of religious denominations are against it. I should like to read for the benefit of hon. members opposite, some paragraphs from a resolution, passed by the Presbytery of Vancouver a short time ago, a copy of which resolution, I understand, was sent to the right hon. the First Minister. The portion which I propose to quote reads as follows:

(2) That the Parliament of Canada should approach the President and Congress of the United States, looking toward joint action in making overtures to the European nations, to call at once a council of their representatives to consider afresh their international relations. This council should proceed with an exhaustive investigation of the causes of of the present situation, and should honestly and earnestly seek to find some method of adjusting international differences more in harmony with the spirit of modern civilization, and recognizing the fact that the ties that bind all peoples into one world family are now so many and so intricate that no two nations can even prepare for war without seriously affecting all others. The refusal of any European nation to enter such a conference, being an unfriendly act, may be followed by economic penalties, such as the surtax on its commerce with the United States and Canada.

(3) That it be arranged by the United States and Canada that as soon as an understanding has been arrived at between European powers, they will call a council representing the world's powers to establish a permanent court for the settlement of international disputes by reason and righteousness, and not by blind passion and brute force.

There are a great many people—perhaps a majority of the people of Canada—who would welcome the expenditure of a portion of this $35,000,000 for the purpose of bringing about a great international peace movement. I would commend this resolution of the Vancouver Presbyterians to the consideration of the Government.

There is need, urgent need, but that need is not in the Motherland. It is here in Canada, and it is the need of a commonsense business policy of better trade relations with our neighbours to the South, and need for a national spirit of pride in a policy of a reasonable amount of defence of our own shores. I am sorry that there appears to be a lack of interest among the people regarding naval policies and more particularly in the prairie provinces.

The Conservative party of Canada, assisted by the 'Big Interests,' attained some success in stampeding the people in 1911. If the Conservative Government of to-day think that with the assistance of European manufacturers of munitions of war, and the assistance of itinerant jingoes from the United Kingdom, they can again stampede the people, then let them give the various provinces the representation to which they are entitled, appeal to the country, and let the people decide.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not rise with the intention of adding anything to the general discussion which has taken place on the motion now before the House. There has been an agreement between the two whips that the resolution, concurrence in which is now sought, would be disposed of this day, and we intend to stick by that agreement. I would not rise at all were it not for the fact that a new element has been introduced by the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville). This sub-amendment is:

Mr. Verville moved in amendment to the proposed amendment, that the following words be added at the end thereof:—'and the consent of Parliament should not be given to this resolution until it has been submitted to and received the approval of the electors.'

I do not know if I rightly appreciate the tenor of the remarks which were offered this afternoon to the House by my hon. friend from Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche). If I understand him aright, he stated that in his opinion that sub-amendment would cover the resolution moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister, but would not cover the amendment moved by me. It seems to me obvious that this amendment was meant to cover the resolution which is now before the House, whether it is voted as it is proposed to amend it or whether it is voted without the amendment. At all events, that is the way I interpret the view of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve. As to the amendment of my hon. friend, it seems to me it is one which the Government cannot refuse, and which they are bound by their pledges before the election, made more than once in this House, to accept now.

The question of the creation of a Canadian navy is as old as Confederation itself. The idea of the creation of a Canadian navy was introduced into the first Militia Bill which was adopted by this House in 1868, under the leadership of Sir George Etienne Cartier, The question was also taken up in the Imperial conference which sat in London in 1902, on which occasion the Canadian ministers, myself and some of my colleagues, laid before the conference a state paper from which I quote:

At present Canadian expenditures for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian Government are prepared to consider the naval side of defence as well. On the sea coasts of Canada there is a large number of men admirably qualified to form a naval reserve, and it is hoped that at an early day a system may be devised which will lead to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of need.

In conclusion, the ministers repeat that, while the Canadian Government are obliged to dissent from the measures proposed, they fully appreciate the obligation of the Dominion to make expenditures for the purpose of defence in proportion to the increasing population and wealth of the country. They are willing that these expenditures shall be so directed as to relieve the taxpayer of the Mother Country from some of the burdens which he now bears; and they have the strongest desire to carry out their defence schemes in co-operation with the Imperial authorities, and under the advice of experienced Imperial officers, so far as this is consistent with the principle of local self-government, which has proved so great a factor in the promotion of Imperial unity.

This document has been before the Canadian people since 1902. The views which are therein expressed were never to my knowledge challenged in this House nor anywhere else. They came before this House in a concrete form in March, 1909; and at that time, as is well known—I will not refer to it except to enable me to bring out the argument I want to make—a resolution was unanimously adopted affirming that the time had come for the creation of a Canadian navy. I confess it did not occur to me then, nor did it occur to anybody, that the idea which had been so long before the Canadian people, which had been set forth in Acts of Parliament, and which had been reaffirmed by the statement I made on behalf of the Canadian people at the Imperial conference, need to be submitted to the people. All parties held that view at the time; no one in 1909 expresed the view that the policy which was then adopted by the Canadian Parliament should be referred to the people. But there came upon the other side of the House a change of heart and a change of tongue, and it was decided as party tactics that there should be a demand that that policy should be referred to the electors.

I know what my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will answer. He will probably tell me that he anticipated this very motion of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve in the speech with which he introduced the present measure, on the 5th of December last, when he recalled that in a previous speech of his he had stated that he would confer with the Imperial authorities, and, after having conferred with them, would submit his measure to Parliament, and if it were defeated by Parliament, he would then submit it to the people. But in answer to this I have to say that my right hon. friend made more than one declaration upon this very subject, and that he has pledged himself before this House that no measure of this kind should be submitted to Parliament until it had been submitted to the people themselves. At the opening of the session of 1910-11, the debate on the address, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) moved the following amendment to the Address:

> The House regrets that the Speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy, and, second, question of the contribution of Canada to Imperial armaments.

Mark the words. Two ideas are there set forth by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier as to which regret was expressed first, that the Government did not consult the people on its naval polciy, and, second, that it did not consult the people on the general question of contribution by Canada. Two days after, my right hon. friend, then leader of the Opposition, moved an amendment to this amendment, in these terms:

> We beg to assure Your Excellency of the unalterable attachment and devotion of the people of Canada to the British Crown and of their desire and intention to fulfill all just responsibilities devolving upon this country as one of the nations of the Empire. We desire, however, to express our regret that Your Excellency's gracious speech gives no indication whatever of any intention on the part of Your Excellency's advisers to consult the people on the naval policy of Canada.

You will notice that this amendment eliminates one of the two propositions of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). The hon. member for Jacques Cartier wanted the people to be consulted. not only upon the naval policy but upon the general question of contribution to Imperial armanents, whereas the amendment of my right hon. friend eliminates the question of contribution to armaments, and limits the question to the naval policy only. That amendment was submitted to Parliament and was defeated, the whole Conservative party with the exception of the member for Jacques Cartier voting for it. This amendment being eliminated, there came before the House the amendment of the member for Jacques Cartier embodying in its turn the desire for a reference to the people not only on the question of contribution to Imperial armaments. On that resolution, my right hon. friend and his party with the exception of two or three members, all I believe, from the city of Toronto, adopted the view expressed in the amendment of the member for Jacques Cartier. That was in the month of November, 1910. The elections came on shortly afterwards, and each party went before the country with its policy. My right hon. friend went before the electors, pledged by his vote on the amendment of the member for Jacques Cartier, that we should consult the Canadian people not only upon the question of the navy but upon the question of contribution to armaments. I need not recall the fact that my right hon. friend triumphed on that occasion. It was his policy which was adopted by the Canadian people. It was not the policy which I had advocated, which had been supported at one time by my right hon. friend, but it was the policy which he had later adopted, and which was the last policy which had been before the people, and which was approved of by the people. In the face of such a condition of things, can my right hon. friend refuse to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville). If the words and the pledges of men, when they are before the electors, mean anything, it seems to me that on the present occasion we have the right to expect that the policy which my right hon. friend laid before the people and on which he triumphed, is the policy which he must adopt at the present time; and that to depart from it would be a breach of faith with the electorate. The defeat I have accepted already; the people have decided in favour of the views of my right hon. friend; and it seems to me that there is nothing for this House to do but to carry out the pledges given to the electors.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all very much indebted to my right hon. friend for the lecture which he has just delivered upon the extreme desirability of public men fulfilling their pledges. We appreciate the great significance of a lecture from my right hon. friend in that regard more than we would a lecture from any other source. I shall not go over ancient history in respect of certain pledges that were made between 1887, when my right hon. friend assumed the leadership of his party, and the year 1896, and as to their fulfilment thence up to 1911, when he went out of power. If I desired to occupy the time of the House in a little review as to the extent to which these pledges were fulfilled, I am sure that every hon. member on this side of the House would be at once constrained to say that a lecture from so authoritative a source must be taken to heart by every member on this side of the House.

My right hon. friend seems disposed upon this question, although he has not made it very plain, to accept the leadership of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), and to declare to the House that his own resolution by way of amendment was not the proper resolution, but that it should have had embodied in it the clause which has been moved by the hon. member for Maisonneuve. He did not make himself very clear on that point, just as on some other occasions he had retired within the lines of Torres Vedras.

I should like to remind the right hon. gentleman that in the very speech, delivered on the occasion which he has brought to the attention of the House, I stated that we would undertake precisely and exactly the policy that we have carried out, and that we propose to carry out with this resolution; and no one knows that better than my right hon. friend himself. On that very occasion to which the right hon. gentleman has alluded, I said that if we came into power we would go to the British Government and to the Admiralty; we would endeavour to obtain from them a plain, unvarnished statement as to what were the needs of naval defence of the Empire; and if the answer which we received expressed urgency, emergency, or need, we would come to the Parliament of Canada and ask Parliament to do Canada's fair share in providing for that need. We have taken that course; but my right hon. friend says that we are pledged, in respect of that course, to first seek the mandate of the people of Canada. Does the right hon. gentleman remember that when the question of a permanent policy involving the destiny of this country for all time to come was before this Parliament, it was urged by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that that question should first be referred to the people of this country for their mandate? What was the answer of the right hon. gentleman? His answer was that there was absolutely no need of submitting that question of a permanent policy to the people of Canada for their voice and opinion thereon. And now, without precisely stating that he will vote for the amendment offered in opposition to his own resolution, he ventures to suggest that we ought to support something which he himself is apparently afraid to support. I would like to tell my right hon. friend and the House that we do not propose to do anything of the kind. I would tell him further, if he has forgotten it—for his memory seems to be somewhat defective in this regard—that on the third day of February, 1910, I moved in this House a resolution so plain that any man might understand it, declaring, in terms as clear as the English language could make them, that a proposal of this kind was not, in our opinion, one which should be submitted to the mandate of the people of Canada. My right hon. friend smiles at that. If he had been quite as easily amused a few moments ago he would, with regard to some of his own suggestions, have been laughing all the time he was on his feet. Let me read the resolution I have referred to:

> The proposals of the Government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the Admiralty, and, in so far as they empower the Government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from those of the Empire in time of war, are ill-advised and dangerous.

I said the same thing during the last election campaign when that question was before the people of Canada:

> That no such proposals can safely be accepted unless they thoroughly ensure unity of organization and of action, without which there can be no effective co-operation in any common scheme of Empire defence.
>
> That the said proposals, while necessitating heavy outlay for construction and maintenance, will give no immediate or effective aid to the Empire and no adequate or satisfactory results to Canada.
>
> That no permanent policy should be entered upon involving large future expenditures of this character until it has been submitted to the people and has received their approval.
> That in the meantime the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the Empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the Imperial authorities as a free and loyal contribution from the people of Canada, such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or armoured cruisers of the latest dreadnought type, giving to the Admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purposes of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the Empire and thus assure its peace and security.

That was the motion which was proposed and voted for in this House on the date I have mentioned, and the course proposed by the Government to-day—the resolution upon which this House will shortly be called to vote—is exactly in accordance, in the first place, with the declaration I made in November, and in the second place, with the resolution I have just read.

My right hon. friend has proposed an amendment, and the hon. member for Maisonneuve has offered a sub-amendment. I do not intend to discuss these to-night at any length; but I simply desire to assert our belief that the expenditure of this sum of money, in accordance with the facts stated and in accordance with the views expressed by the Admiralty, is a step which the people of Canada are at the present time called upon to take in token of their self-respect, and in testimony of the fact that they are determined that the ties which unite this country to the Empire shall not be broken. The amendment of my right hon. friend, as I understand it, is to the effect that the sum of $35,000,000 shall be expended, but that it shall be used in the organization of a Canadian navy by means of ships to be built and manned in this country. Later on in this debate, but not to-night, I shall be in a position to give my right hon. friend some information as to what his proposal, as far as time is concerned, really means. I recollect very well that during the debate of 1910 my right hon. friend expressed the opinion that the ships which he proposed to construct could be built in Canada within about a year, and my right hon. friend may be under some similar hallucination with regard to the time within which the ships proposed by his amendment could be built in this country. I want to say to my right hon. friend, and to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that those who talk very glibly—I use the term without any desire to be disrespectful—regarding matters which they have not, perhaps, studied very carefully in connection with naval organization, the establishment of great shipyards, and the building of huge dreadnoughts, are speaking, to some extent at least, without, perhaps, a full knowledge of the facts. Later on I shall be able to give them some information which will make good what I am now stating. I venture to say that the proposition of the right hon. gentleman would practically mean an almost indefinite postponement of any effective aid to the Empire. We have at present no naval organization whatever, and other countries, which have had at least the semblance of a naval organization have found it very difficult indeed, and an exceedingly costly and tedious process to build up any such organization as my right hon. friend proposes.

My hon. friend speaks of manning these ships in Canada. No one in Canada would for one moment deny that the Canadian people possess as true a desire to fight in the defence of their country and the Empire as is possessed by the people of the British Isles or any of the great dominions of this Empire. Everybody knows that. But we know that in a new country like this, a rapidly developing country where there are all kinds of attractions for the energies of men, you cannot possibly expect that men will be attracted to a naval service in the same way as they are in an old and thickly populated country like Great Britain; and it is no discredit to the people of Canada, and no discredit to my right hon. friend, that during the years in which the Liberal Government were endeavouring to secure men for the naval service in this country, and to train them as they must be trained for many years before they can properly perform their duties, their efforts were so slightly successful as they have proved to be by the records already adduced to this House. And when the right hon. gentleman says, in the first place, that we are to do nothing until we can build ships ourselves, and, in the second place, that we are to do nothing until we can train men and have them ready to man these ships, he is not seized with an adequate conception of the situation, and he does not seem to be inspired by a sincere desire to do something at the moment of need and urgency.

What, after all, have we been discussing in this House for the last ten days or two weeks? A proposal on the one hand that $35,000,000 shall be expended for the great purpose set forth in the resolution; a proposal on the other hand that $35,000,000 and a very large additional sum shall be expended in the upbuilding of a naval organization and in the maintenance of these ships—in their maintenance at a much greater cost than that at which they can be maintained under our policy. These are the two proposals.

But there is something else to be said, namely, that the proposals of the Government are not, as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have said they were, that we should hand over $35,000,000 to the British Government or the British Admiralty to expend. Certain hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House do not seem to have read the resolution which we are considering. We propose that that sum of money shall be expended by the Government of Canada, although any man who realizes the conditions must also realize the eminent wisdom of seeking in the proper expenditure of that money the very best expert assistance that can be procured in the world. The expert assistance we believe we can find in the British Admiralty and we propose to find it there if this measure passes the House. We do not propose that those ships shall pass out of the ownership of the Canadian people or Government. It has been many times unwarrantably repeated in this debate that such was our proposal. Our proposal is that those ships shall be in the ownership of the Canadian people, but that they shall stand and be used for the common defence of this Empire of which Canada forms a part; and, further than that, if at any time the Canadian people desire to create a naval organization of their own, these ships shall be subject to recall by the people of Canada through their Parliament and through their Government, subject always to the most reasonable proviso, that they shall not be recalled from any important theatre, where the whole existence of the Empire might be at stake, without reasonable notice to the British Government and Admiralty. That is our proposal. We say that we do not believe that the people of Canada desire to have this measure submitted to them. We say that everything that is in this measure has already been submitted to the people of Canada before the last general election, and that the people of Canada pronounced upon that question with no uncertain voice when they gave the verdict that they did give on the 21st day of September, 1911:

House divided on the motion of Mr. Verville, in amendment to the proposed amendment.

'That the following words be added at the end thereof:—' and the consent of Parliament should not be given to this resolution until it has been submitted to and received the approval of the electors.'

House divided on the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

That all the words after the word 'That' be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:—

'This House declines to concur in the said resolution and orders that the same be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend the same in the following particulars, namely, to strike out all the words after clause (a) and substitute therefor the following:

'The memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the general naval situation of the Empire and communicated to this House by the right hon. the Prime Minister on December 5 shows that several of the most important of the foreign powers have adopted a definite policy of rapidly increasing the naval strength.

That this condition has compelled the United Kingdom to concentrate its naval forces in home waters involving the withdrawal of ships from the outlying portions of the Empire.

'That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without further delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence.

'That any measure of Canadian aid to Imperial naval defence which does not employ a permanent policy of participation by ships owned, manned and maintained by Canada and contemplating construction as soon as possible in Canada, is not an adequate or satisfactory expression of the aspirations of the Canadian people in regard to naval defence, and is not an assumption by Canada of her fair share in the maintenance of the naval strength of the Empire.

'This House regrets to learn the intention of the Government to indefinitely postpone the carrying out by Canada of a permanent naval policy.

'It is the opinion of this House that measures should be taken at the present session to give effect actively and speedily to the permanent naval policy embodied in the Naval Service Act of 1910 passed pursuant to the resolution unanimously approved by this House in March, 1909.

'This House is further of the opinion that to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy by the addition by Canada under the above Act of two fleet units, to be stationed on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada, respectively, rather than by a contribution of money or ships, is the policy best calculated to afford relief to the United Kingdom in respect to the burden of Imperial naval defence, and in the words of the Admiralty memorandum, to restore greater freedom to the movements of the British squadrons in every sea and directly promote the security of the dominions; and that the Government of Canada should take such steps as shall lead to the accomplishment of this purpose as speedily as possible.'

Amendment (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) negatived.

Mr. A. A. MONDOU (Yamaska) moved in amendment:

This House, while prepared to adopt effective measures for the protection of the territory of Canada, declines to concur in the said resolution because it contains provisions tending to impose upon Canada, which has no voice in Imperial affairs, a share in the external responsibility and the naval defence of the Empire outside of the Canadian territory, the only portion of the Empire over which the Canadian people may exercise any political or constitutional authority.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment does not differ substantially from the one I submitted to this House while discussing the address, and as the majority of the House are not familiar with the French language, I intend to reiterate in the English language the remarks I made in French, when it was first moved. As the procedure on the present resolution authorizes me to do so, I will supplement the remarks which I made in my speech on the Address as much as possible and as shortly as possible, in order not to waste, uselessly, the time of this House.

The present resolution, as of course every member of this House is aware, while calling for a vote of $35,000,000, deals with a question of a more far reaching importance than a vote for a certain amount of money, however large may be the amount involved. It deals with the constitutional relations existing between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and one cannot properly deal with this question without knowing first what these constitutional relations have been in the past, one hundred and fifty years or since Canada has become a colony under the British Crown. What was the administration of this colony at first? It was exercised by military officers and irresponsible officials, but this administration, failing to give satisfaction to the Canadians, whether French or English, they joined their efforts in order to obtain from England a system of self government. That page of our Canadian history has always been and will forever be a glorious one indeed. It teaches that Canada was the first English colony to secure for itself responsible government. The question of ascertaining what was the nature of our constitutional relations was first raised under the McNab-Taché Administration, and during the Crimea war in 1855. The Imperial Government, if it may be so called at the time referred to, had requested Canada to send soldiers and troops to take part in this war. This request was categorically rejected by the Administration which I have just mentioned. A few years later, Sir George E.

Cartier introduced a Canadian Militia Bill in order to organize a Canadian system of defence on land. The principles set forth in that measure were, as much as possible, in compliance with some of the letters addressed to the then Governor of Canada by the Secretary of War and Colonies under the administration of Lafontaine, in 1862. Such is the importance of these documents that I cannot refrain from reading to the House a few extracts therefrom:

Canada (as also the other provinces of British North America) enjoys as fully as possible the advantages of autonomy in its own affairs. The Government realizes that these advantages carry with them similar responsibilities and that the time has come for the Canadian people to assume a larger part than previously, of the expense incurred from that source, and for their own advantage.

Mr. MARTIN (Montreal, St. Mary's): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I want to know if the hon. member (Mr. Mondou) is reading his speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Members on your side read their speeches to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member (Mr. Mondou) is reading his speech it will be out of order. I have not been watching him particularly.

Mr. MONDOU: I was quoting.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on, go on.

Mr. MONDOU: I would also refer my honourable colleagues, for further information, to the sessional documents of 1871, vol. 4, No. 46. Moreover, the above doctrine was often reaffirmed and never denied. The duty of national defence was always accepted by the Canadian people, even in some circumstances where our wars could have been attributable solely to British diplomacy.

Pursuant to the historical part of the question, I may say that the above Militia Bill, as submitted by the Government of Cartier and McDonald, was defeated on its second reading, which fact determined an appeal to the people, and the Cabinet of John Sanfield Macdonald and Sicotte was called to office after the general elections. The new administration introduced another Militia Bill, but based on the same principle, and Parliament assented to it. It was after the adoption of that Bill, which was considered by the Imperial government as not affording an adequate system of national defence, that the Duke of Newcastle, then Secretary of War and Colonies, in a despatch addressed to the Governor General of Canada, on August 21, 1862, requested the Government of Canada to form a more efficient military organization, enabling Canada to call 50,000 men under arms, and especially to pass a Bill providing for the maintenance of same during five years, without requiring the annual advice and consent of Parliament. The manly way in which the Canadian Statesmen have answered the above message deserves special mention and can be considered fully as representing the aspirations of the Canadian people at the time. May I be permitted to quote the answer itself. I read the French version:

We feel that, confronted as we are with a question which so deeply affects the present and future welfare of the province, all arrangements based only upon sentiment or upon a plan where the rights and the interests of the people would not be recognized, should be avoided.

* * * *

Another proposition contained in the despatch of His Grace (the Duke of Newcastle) is very apt to cause surprise. The councillors of Your Excellency mean that part of the despatch in which His Grace proposes to withdraw from the domain of parliament the control of the funds required for military purposes. His Grace knows evidently that this proposition looks like an encroachment upon the privileges of the representation of the people, and surely no measure susceptible of being thus construed shall ever be and must not be accepted by a people who have inherited the liberties warranted by the British institutions. The Imperial parliament retains with a jealous care the means of maintaining the effective military and naval force of the Empire. Its estimates are voted annually, and even the most powerful minister has never dared propose to the House of Commons that they should give up their controlling power for a period of five years. If the disturbing action of ordinary politics is a valid reason for depriving parliament of the final direction of military preparatives, this should apply as well in England as in Canada. That which the House of Commons would never admit even in time of danger, would probably not be admitted by the legislature of Canada. Whatever may be the evils inherent to representative institutions, the people of a British province will never forget that they are inoffensive as compared with those which are inseparable from arbitrary power. The people's liberties are in safety but when the action of the people restrains and guides the policy of those who are vested with the power of governing the affairs of the country. They are sheltered from military despotism which a corrupt government may make use of but when it has in hand the means of distributing as he likes the subsidies required for the maintainance of the military organization.

His Grace the Secretary of State for the colonies proposes a union in view of the defence, a union of the provinces forming part of the British possessions in North America, for the formation and the maintainance of a uniform system of military organization and instruction, having a common defence fund, and approved of by Her Majesty's government ,a union of details of which should be dependent on the Secretary of State and the direction of which should be absolutely independent of the several local legislatures. The councillors of Your Excellency have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that an alliance of that nature could not, for the moment, be in question.

—Comptes et Papiers, colonies.—Vol. 36, 1862, p. 607.)

Replying to the above remarks, the Duke of Newcastle admits clearly that the only duty of Canada, as a colony, should lie in the equipment of her sea ports and in the general defence of her territory, as contended by the Canadian statesmen who wrote the document in question, and who were those men:—John Sandfield Macdonald, Antoine Aimé Dorion, U. J. Tessier, D'Arcy McGee, John Abbott, and many others, irrespective of party affiliations.

May I be permitted before concluding the history of those important debates which took place previous to Confederation, to quote the appreciation of a renowned English historian, John Charles Dent:

Some of the foremost English journals expressed themselves strongly upon the subject of the defeat of the Macdonald-Cartier Government's Militia Bill. The prevalent feeling in the Mother Country seemed to be that Canada was disposed to shirk her responsibilities and to leave England to provide for her defence against foreign aggression. At such a distance from the scene of action, and with very inadequate knowledge of public opinion here, Englishmen have always been conspicuous for shooting wide of the mark where Canadian affairs are concerned. At this juncture they would seem to have been further astray than usual. Mr. Macdonald's measure had been defeated, partly because its enactment would have involved an expenditure greater than the necessities of the case demanded, greater certainly than the pecuniary condition of the province would have justiefid, and partly because it had been introduced under the auspices of an administration whereof the Canadian people had begun to grow weary. There was no want of loyalty among us; no desire to avoid our responsibilities, pecuniary or other. But the tone adopted by the English press—which of course echoed the opinions of many leading statesmen and scholars in the kingdom—during the summer of 1862, struck a blow at Canadian loyalty from which it has never fully recovered. One journal declared that we were a colony of greedy self-seekers, and that neither credit nor advantage to the Mother Country was to be derived from any longer continuing with us. Another more coarsely remarked that our loyalty was in our breeches pockets. At least a score of widely read journals took occasion to gird at us. The Premier himself—Lord Palmerston—asserted from his place in the House of Commons, with a considerable appearance of ill-temper, that Her Majesty's Government had done as much for the defence of Canada as they intended to do, and that it rested with Canadians themselves either to do the remainder or to disgrace the stock whence they had sprung. The Governor General, Lord Monck in more diplomatic language, expressed similar opinions at a public dinner in Montreal. Canadians generally felt that they had received a succession of unmerited slaps in the face. Assuredly there is loyalty in Canada at the present day, but it is a sentiment of radically different stripe from that which animated us during the discussions arising out of the Trent affair; and any one who has carefully watched the progress of public opinion among us during the last twenty years will admit that a change first began to be apparent during the summer of 1862.

After Confederation, Sir George Etienne Cartier introduced another Militia Bill, which would be more in harmony with the new conditions. In fact the Bill contained special provisions to the effect that our Canadian militia was organized for the sole protection and defence of our Canadian territory. That part of the Bill as contained in the revised statutes of Canada reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may place the militia or any part thereof on active service anywhere in Canada for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Canada, like all other nations of the world, has to provide for two systems of defence—on land and on sea. By the above law, she had provided for her defence on land.

Later on in the course of my remarks I shall discuss whether there might be any good reason why she should adopt, with respect to her defence on sea, a system different from the one which she has adopted for her defence on land. Before I proceed any further, I might, perhaps, remind the House that our system of national defence on land, as initiated by Sir George Etienne Cartier, was approved of by his old and worthy colleague, Sir John A. Macdonald, a few years later, when, recognizing that the Militia Act in force at the time should be the only rule, he declined to send Canadian troops to take part in the Soudan war.

I support the Conservative party. I believe in the principles of this party, as set down by its noble leaders, Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald. I may add, without fear of ever being contradicted, that my allegiance to this great political party has never failed; and it has never failed because it has always adhered, as much as the circumstances would permit, to the policy or policies laid down by those great leaders, and so ably upheld in the last years of Conservative administration under the most lamented Sir John Thompson and under this veteran of our public life, Sir Charles Tupper, whose energy and courage, even in his extreme years, cannot be beaten down as in fact, they were not beaten down after the defeat of the Conservative party in the general elections of 1896, after which date a Liberal administration took charge of the affairs of this country. During the period from 1896 to 1909, the Liberal party itself thought proper to yield to the very principles laid down by the previous Conservative administrations in circumstances which I have already referred to in this House.

I now come to the position of our defence on sea. It was first raised in this House during the session of 1909-10 by the hon. member for North Toronto (Hon. George E. Foster), the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, then sitting at the left of the Speaker. It may not be out of place to remind the House that the resolution was moved during the afternoon sitting of Monday, March the 29th, 1909; and as we all know there are always very few members present in the House on Mondays. Of course, the leader of the Government did not readily agree to the proposition as presented; but he thought fit to move an amendment to it, which was rather mild and seemed to leave an open door for conciliation. In fact, after an amicable interview between the leader of the Government and the mover of the resolution, who called to his assistance the leader of the Opposition, the resolution and the amendment were withdrawn and the leader of the Government, himself, presented another resolution, embodying the same principles and features as those which he first thought should be amended.

This resolution, the offspring of the above conference, is well known, but it is so puzzling that I think it may be quoted at any time with renewed interest. Here it is:

This House is of opinion that all the words after 'that' be struck out and the following be substituted thereto:—

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

As you see, Mr. Speaker, in the last paragraph is enunciated a principle, the existence of which was even unsuspected up to that date, namely: That the defence of the Empire on sea has precedence over the defence of Canada. Hardly anything more was heard in this House up to the end of that famous session, except, this short question and answer, both very inoffensive, apparently; but at the same time, not so very unimportant, if we consider the circumstances. Lest the leader of the Government failed to understand the scope of his own resolution re Naval Defence, he thought fit, on the 15th of April, that is, about a fortnight after the resolution had been moved and adopted to put this unexpected question on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. Foster asked:

What interpretation does the Government place upon the resolution re naval defence, passed unanimously by the House on March 29? What steps does the Government propose to take towards carrying out the purport of the resolution, and when is it proposed to commence action in this respect?

Being called upon to answer this question, which had fallen upon certain heads like a thunder-bolt in a clear sky, the leader of the Government stood up and answered as follows:

The Government have decided that as shortly as possible after prorogation, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) and the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) shall proceed to London for the purpose of conferring with the Admiralty as to the best means to be adopted to give effect to the resolution of March 29.

The answer of the Government was setting forth in Canadian politics a principle unknown up to that date; although it turned to be very dear to the heart of the member for North Toronto: 'Ottawa will go to London,' and for the sake of dignity after engaging her word to that effect, Ottawa had to go to London on a question of Naval Defence for the first time in Canada's history. I may say that the hon. member for North Toronto never criticised the travelling expenses or others of the ministers who went to London during the year. I would not like to say too much one way or the other with respect to the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is now absent from this House on public duty, but I feel that I have gone far enough to intimate that that question was put in April, 1909, to make sure that the Government should not go back on their own resolution, and that the resolution embodied the same meaning as that in which he understood it in its relation to imperialism—an ideal which the leaders of his own party had for ever forbidden him to entertain and which he did continue then, and still continues to deam of now, although too much of this good thing seems to have brought uneasiness to the leaders of both parties in this House to-day. The delegates of the late Government returned from London with London's conception of what should be our national system of defence on sea. Had they escaped the dangers of London hospitality, as was questioned by the present leader of the Opposition last summer regarding the present Prime Minister? On the 12th of January, 1910, the then Prime Minister moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 95, concerning the naval service of Canada. That Bill as introduced and adopted did not contain the words 'for the defence thereof,' whereas our Militia Act does contain these words. They were purposely omitted from Bill No. 95, otherwise the resolution unanimously passed on March, 1909, would have been, in my humble judgment, a mere piece of nonsense. Here is the section of the Bill to which I have referred:

The Governor in Council may place the naval forces or any part thereof on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

A comparison of the Militia Act and the Naval Service Act should give hon. gentlemen opposite something substantial to think about. During the last campaign they claimed—and still claim, but falsely—that the Naval Service Act involved the permanent defence of Canadian territory by Canadian people, on sea as well as on land. The difference between the two acts was, however, clearly demonstrated by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, then leader of the Conservative party of the province of Quebec, and when the Bill came up for second reading on February 3, 1910, he proposed a sub-amendment to the amendment moved by the then leader of the Opposition, as follows:

This House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the Empire, and ought in consequence to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.

This sub-amendment, needless to say, was defeated by the House, but it obtained the full support of the Conservative party from the province of Quebec, then sitting at your left, Mr. Speaker. On November 22, 1910, the same hon. member moved the following amendment:

The House regrets that the Speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy and the general question of the contribution of Canada to Imperial armament.

This amendment had same effect as the one I have already referred to, but it received the full support of the Opposition at that time.

Such was the position of both political parties, when, all of a sudden, a genera election was announced for September 21, 1911. That election resulted in the downfall of the Government which had passed the Naval Service Act, the Conservative party winning by a very large majority. I shall not undertake to give all the reasons why the Government was defeated in nearly all the provinces. I shall only state the main points of the contest. The Government having been for a pretty long time in office, had become imbued with the idea that they could do almost anything, and in order to wipe out the several blunders that they had made, and which might be attributed to their carelessness and their unscrupulous methods, they thought of gratifying the people with new commercial arrangements of some kind. However, I may say that the main issue in the province of Quebec was the 'Naval Service Act,' —and that province, withdrew the great confidence it had shown in the late Government for the last fifteen years, returning to Parliament no less than twenty-seven supporters of the Opposition.

Public meetings were held throughout the province on the navy question, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, Mr. Monk and the present leader of the Opposition, challenging and fighting one another before large and enthusiastic audiences. In many a case, resolutions were adopted with loud cheers and applause, and especially so at St. Eustache, where the following was carried without dissenting voice: I shall quote this resolution in the original language in which it was written lest the translation which I might make would not be absolutely accurate:

THE NAVAL BILL.

Protest—The Autonomy of Canada—The real unity of the Empire—Resolutions passed at St. Eustache, on July 17, 1910.

We, citizens of Canada, faithful subjects of His Majesty, King George V, declare ourselves ready to defend, at the sacrifice of our lives, our own territory and the rights of the British Crown in Canada, as our fathers have done in 1776, against the English speaking subjects of His Majesty; in 1812, against the armies of the American republic, and in 1885, against our own fellow-citizens who had revolted.

But relying on the greatness and effectiveness of the principles of decentralization and autonomy, solemnly proclaimed and recognized for more than half a century by the British as well as by the Canadian authorities, we are opposed to any new scheme likely to involve us in warfare in distant and foreign lands, especially as long as the autonomous colonies of the Empire are not admitted to participate, on a footing of equality, in administering the Imperial army and navy, in concluding treaties of peace and alliance, and in looking after foreign affairs, the Government of India and that of the Crown colonies.

We sincerely believe that such a policy of concentration and apparent Imperial unity, of which the recent Naval Bill is only a first instalment, would, as regards the Empire itself, be a source of misunderstanding, rivalry and conflicts which would endanger the peace and union of numerous countries and of the peoples of all nationalities who to-day are glad to live under British rule.

Never having been for Great Britain and for the Empire the occasion of any conflict, we believe that a policy of peace and of moral and material development is necessary to Canada, its growth and its cohesion, and, as a result, to the glory and security of the Empire.

Free citizens of a democratic country, we claim the right to express openly our opinion on this question as well as on any other which has a bearing on the destiny and interests of Canada. We recognize to the majority of the Canadian people the right to effect a rearrangement of our relations with the other parts of the Empire, provided they do it with a full knowledge of the facts. But we protest against all attempts to deprive the Canadian people or any section of it of the right to freely consider this important question.

We repudiate the statements made in Toronto, in December last, by Mr. Alexandre Taschereau, Provincial Minister of Public Works, who falsely contended that the people of Quebec were ready to accept with closed eyes any policy for the naval defence of the Empire, and we blame the members of the Provincial Government and Legislature who approved of those statements by their vote of June 2 last.

We blame the Dominion cabinet and the majority of Parliament who imposed on Canada that new naval legislation, launched the country into the vortex of militarism (in recent times so strongly denounced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who have endangered the peace of Canada, and diverted towards the building of murderous war machinery and the preparing of bloody wars millions which were destined to the development of our agriculture and of our transportation facilities.

We condemn at the same time the stand taken by Mr. Borden and those members of the Opposition, who, following in his lead, have insisted on the adoption of a policy just as sinister.

We contend that Parliament had no right to thus engage the future of Canada in regard to a policy that has never been submitted to the people who are expected to supply the men to do the fighting as well as the funds to meet the war expenditure.

We approve unreservedly the courageous and loyal stand taken by Mr. Monk and the few representatives of the people who, true to their mandate, pointed out the dangers of such a policy and claimed for the Canadian people the right to make known their will previous to their representatives imposing on them this heavy burden.

In that resolution adopted at St. Eustache the principle of a plebiscite is advanced. A few minutes ago I had an opportunity to vote against a demand for a plebiscite because that was upon the naval policy of the late Government. When the general election of 1908 was held the people of Canada had never heard that the policy of the Government would be to embark upon a naval service during the four years in power the people then conferred on them. The people of Canada had never been consulted in any way and the Opposition then said to the Government: You have no right to adopt such a system of defence on sea because you have not submitted the proposition to the people and let them express their opinion. I have explained to the electors of my county that I was opposed to any system of defence on sea that would be of a different character to our system of defence on land. I stated that I was opposed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's naval policy and that I could not accept the programme of the opposition with reference to a naval contribution. I am taking before the House and the country absolutely the same stand that I took before my electors. I must remind the House of the very important fact that a plebiscite is not a remedy, it is a means. If a member has exhausted all the opportunities at his disposal to defeat a Bill and it has passed its third reading, then he may say: Here is my last chance. Let the matter go before the people and I am sure the people will sustain my proposition. That was the position taken by the Opposition. Nobody will deny that members of Parliament have the right and the duty to take a stand on every question submitted to them. Having done so they could, if they deemed fit, on a new question so important as this, ask Parliament to go to the people as the Opposition did when the Naval Service Act was first introduced to this House.

I have made this little digression because in the resolution adopted at St. Eustache some reference was made to a plebiscite and to the Naval contribution policy. In October 1911 the present Government took office, and so far as the naval question is concerned, no steps were taken during the first session of this Parliament except that information was given to the House that the present Prime Minister would proceed to London after prorogation in order to consult the Admiralty as to the most practical means to be adopted for our defence on sea. Four hon. Ministers went to London with that object in view. They were in favour of a contribution when they left, and they were in favour of a contribution when they returned. On the other hand, the late Prime Minister had the idea of building a navy prior to his departure from Ottawa to London. He went to consult the Admiralty, and he came back to Ottawa with the proposal to build a navy, which I think goes a great way to show that the Admiralty gave to each Prime Minister the answer he longed for. But there is a difference, and it is a very important difference which I want the House to note. The difference between the two cases lies in the fact that the late Prime Minister brought back to Parliament no memorandum or document whatsoever, expressing the views of the Admiralty, whereas the present Prime Minister has thought it proper to do so for the purpose of having the views of the Admiralty considered. The late Government passed the Naval Service Act while the present Government has introduced a resolution for a vote of $35,000,000 which is intended as a free gift to the Mother Country in case of emergency reserving the question of a permanent Naval Policy to be voted on by the people when the time comes. In both cases the constitutional relations between Canada and the Mother Country are changed but what is the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition to-day? It reaffirms clearly and positively the principles contained in the Naval Service Act. So far as an emergency is concerned, I do not think it exists at present, if I am to accept the information at my disposal. The hon member for Rouville stated the other day that he had no opinion of his own regarding the meaning of the word 'emergency' and that he had referred to Webster's Dictionary. He stated that when he was in difficulty about any English expression he referred to Webster. There he found that the word 'emergency' meant 'a sudden or unexpected appearance, a sudden occasion, a pressing necessity, an exigency.' I rather think that the hon. member for Rouville glanced at Webster more for the purpose of embarrassing the Government than with the view of finding the meaning of an English expression. If he really intended to deal with the question on its merits, he could have referred to another authority which ranks high, and which he is the first to consult on political matters. I want to cite Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the meaning of the word 'emergency.' The right hon. leader of the Opposition said the word 'emergency' means 'war, invasion, or insurrection real or apprehended.' Hon. members will find that what I say is true by referring to the speech of the then Prime Minister when he explained for the first time to the House the Naval Service Bill. That was the expression he used, and it must be the only definition of the word emergency because it was what was in his mind when he framed the law. It is the expression that should be used because it was applied to the principles of the Naval Service Act. Every lawyer knows what I mean. If the hon. member for Rouville will turn to 'Hansard' of session 1909-10, he will read the definition I have quoted on page 1733. Now, if it be true that 'emergency' means 'war, invasion or insurrection real or apprehended,' why did the whole rank and file of the Opposition, from head to tail, take up the time of this House from November 21, 1912, in opposing the present resolution on the ground that there was no war, no invasion, or no insurrection real when by their amendment they say clearly that there is war, invasion, or insurrection apprehended? For, if emergency means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended, and if there is emergency in either of these two cases, and no emergency at all in any other case, their amendment practically approving of the expenditure of $35,000,000 for two fleet units as an addition to the Imperial navy, the said two units to be Canadian in time of peace but Imperial in time of war, would, as stated not very long ago by the ex-Minister of Finance, Hon. Mr. Fielding, be altogether out of place and constitute a mere piece of nonsense, because there would be no ground, first, for approving the contribution of $35,000,000; secondly, for maintaining that two fleet units should be added to the Imperial navy, and, thirdly, for stating that Canada must help towards the maintenance of the naval strength of the Empire.

Is it not amusing, after we have been gratified with such an expression of opinion on the part of our hon. friends to the left, to hear their present chieftain exclaim not against the purport of the present resolution but in favour of it, to a greater extent than any member of this House ever went; not only in the case of war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended, but at a mere sign of alarm on the part of England, he is ready to go four better and give, not for fleet units but in hard cash and ready money, not $35,000,000, but $140,000,000?

How is that for a change of opinion at a moment's notice, and how is it that all their flock stepped in and followed suit not only without a sign of their being scandalized at their own deed but with such a rattling enthusiasm? However strange this may appear, it is only natural after all to anyone who is conversant with their political traditions. Are they not the same men who, at one time advocated commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, annexation, independence, larger or wider markets when in opposition, protection when in power and reciprocity again when afraid of not being returned on the strength of their famous Naval Service Act which will forever work on their minds like the vision of Macbeth? Are they not the same men who, actuated only by a desire for power, bitterly criticised the present Prime Minister for taking the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) into his Cabinet when they had no hesitation in discarding the most prominent of their old time friends and in finding a county for the late Mr. Tarte who had been defeated in Beauharnois, with the special intent and purpose of taking him into their Cabinet although they knew him to be a staunch Conservative and to have been so for all his lifetime, a man who, at the very time when he was their colleague, would not declare even under oath, in the case of Grenier, that he was anything like a Liberal? Are they not the same men whom we see to-day flouting those men and newspapers whom they call Nationalists with a contemptuous smile, when as early as 1885, under the guidance of Mercier, they thought fit to give up at one stroke and all of a sudden, even the name of their party, in order to climb up the golden stairs of power?

They are the first Nationalists whom Canada has ever known, they cried out in the remotest parts of the province of Quebec the words of Mercier as a motto 'Let us all unite in one national aim, let us bury the acts of war, let us be national.' 'If I come to power, my Government shall be national and shall remain so as long as it is under my leadership.'

How could any of these men from the first to the last reproach the so-called Nationalists of the day with their present principles? Are they not perfectly in keeping with their own doctrines and their own teachings? How could they blame their own pupils for having protested in Arthabaska, the late Prime Minister's own battlefield, against the principles of the Naval Service Act, against the idea of eventually sending out Canadian ships and men to take part in wars where Canada was not concerned, when they, themselves, and by their newspapers such as Le Soleil and Le Soir had thought it proper in 1896, to raise the feelings of the French-Canadian people against the idea of purchasing rifles to equip the Canadian militia for the defence of Canada as provided by the Militia Act 1868?

Why did the province of Quebec so largely contribute to putting them out of power?—for the sole reason that she had been deceived long enough by all such men and had finally decided to put an end to that game. All the efforts of the Opposition to play it any longer will be vain and useless, even if any one of them should venture to consult Webster to prove that it is good tactics to deny Papineau in order to make political capital for his party and himself.

Let me tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that the province of Quebec, of which I have the honour to be a representative in this House, has not changed its ideals regarding our national defence. It gave its full support during many years to the leaders of the Conservative party, and I hope and trust that it will, in the future, give its allegiance to the political party that will stand more closely attached to the principles of self-government for this great and important colony, whose future is so bright and promising, if we only know how to preserve and maintain it. I cannot close my remarks without referring to some of the speeches made on both sides of this House. In most of the speeches both proposals are construed as favouring Canadian autonomy, in a few of them the opposite view is taken. It is stated by some that Imperial autonomy instead of Canadian autonomy should be preserved. It has been advanced in certain quarters that this amendment, if adopted, would indicate a step towards Imperial federation. I deny that absolutely. The amendment does not stipulate that if Canada had a voice in the Councils of the Empire she would agree to change her present constitutional relations. The amendment only declares that acting under the constitutional relations existing at present she cannot change her status. I shall even go further and say that England will never consent to share her responsibilities with her colonies, but if she did, it would then be the proper time for Canada to study carefully whether such representation would be effective. In the meantime, Canada can have no hope of co-partnership as long as there does not exist an equality of interest. The main argument resorted to by the advocates of Imperialism in this country, and especially by the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), against the present amendment, gives to it the meaning that we are to have independence, or in other words, separation. Canada's self-dependence does not mean separation. There can be no separation where there is no dissatisfaction. I claim to be unalterably attached to British institutions and British connection, and as ready to work for them as any man in Canada. So long as Canadian and British statesmen will not be separated by more than an imaginary boundary from national patriotism it is not to be expected that the views expressed by the member for St. Antoine, and others in this House or outside, shall prevail, although they may continue to express those same views as long as the present controversy exists.

In conclusion, I have but one remark to add. As I have said, the Militia Act contains the words: 'For the defence thereof'; let those words be inserted in any measure pertaining to our naval services, and no matter by which party the addition shall be introduced, I shall vote for it, even if that party is thereby committing a 'crime,' and if by my vote, I am committing a 'suicide.' Just one word I say to my friends from the province of Quebec, that during the last campaign they stated that the law adopted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a law protecting Canadian autonomy. I say that it is not. I said before, as I say to-day, that if they are in favour of uniting the Empire, if they are against the self-government of this country, they are within their rights; but they should come before the House and state frankly and openly the position they are really taking on this question. If I have been able to make them clearly understand this point, I have shown that I require their help, I require a vote not only from them, but from the whole House of Commons. I make a last appeal for the maintenance of the principle involved in this amendment respecting self-government, self-dependence for Canada, or for any colony in the British Empire.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I have very great doubts on my part that this is an amendment. According to the authorities an amendment is one of three things:

1, by leaving out certain words; 2, by leaving out certain words in order to insert or add others; 3, by inserting or adding certain words.

The motion of the hon. gentleman is simply a negative; it simply says that the House should decline to affirm the resolution, giving reasons, but not setting forth any motion, taking nothing from or adding nothing to the motion. In my judgment it is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am rather inclined to the opinion that this resolution as it is drawn, to leave out all the words after 'that' and substitute instead the words stated, affirms a principle which is not the principle of the resolution; but for another reason I am inclined to the opinion that the amendment is out of order. It is this: The hon. member, in moving it, drew attention to the fact that it was substantially the same as an amendment that he had moved to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Bourinot in his third edition says, in regard to the renewal of a question during a session, that when a motion has been stated by the Speaker of the House and proposed as a question for determination, it is then in the possession of the House to be decided or otherwise disposed of according to the established forms of procedure. Then he goes on to say:

It is, however, a usual form of procedure that no question or motion can regularly be offered if it is substantially the same as one on which the judgment of the House has alrealy been expressed during the current session.

The hon. member said himself that it was substantially the same motion as the one which he had moved on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I took occasion to look up the motion; and I frankly agree with him that it substantially expresses the same principle. I take up the English Manual of Procedure and I find that the English rule is much the same. Rule 124 says:

A motion must not raise a question substantially identical with one on which the House has given a decision in the same session.

For that reason I must rule that this amendment is out of order.

Mr. J. P. O. GUILBAULT (Joliette): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the House divides on the motion proposed by the right hon. the prime minister, I wish to propose, seconded by my hon. friend from Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche), the following amendment:

That this House do not now concur in the present resolution, but that said resolution be referred back to the Committee of the Whole of this House, with instructions to add the following:

1. Provisions tending to repeal and annul an Act sanctioned by the Governor General, on the 4th May, 1910, 9-10 Edward VII, and intituled: 'An Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada.' Provisions to the effect that this resolution should not have force nor be binding, until the majority of the people, consulted through a plebiscite, have approved of it.

Mr. Speaker, I remember having declared, during the last electoral campaign, when comparing the proposed contribution and the Laurier Naval Act, that, to my mind, the former was preferable, but I added: 'Let us now condemn the Laurier Naval Act, and later on, should an opportunity offer, let us also condemn the proposed contribution.

In order to be consistent with my principles, I deemed it my duty to propose the amendment which has just been submitted to the House. For me, personally, it is a point of honour, having pledged my word to my constituents. I do not wish to recriminate nor to impute dishonourable motives to any one. The right hon, the prime minister is consistent with himself, having always advocated such a policy of contribution as he has submitted to the House. Other ministers, who have got information on certain facts which I am ignorant of, and who are satisfied that there exists an emergency, the proof of which has not been given me, deem it proper to support the resolution now before the House. I respect their opinion, but I do not subscribe to it. Before all, I want to be true to my pledged word, and that is the reason why I am taking this stand. I know that, before long, I shall disappear from this world; for I have to face a much more dangerous adversary than the Liberal party. That foe is the malady which will soon end by triumphing over me. I wish that it may be said of the member for Joliette that he was faithful to his undertakings, that he kept his promises and that he was consistent with himself.

Such are, briefly stated, the reasons which have prompted me to propose the amendment now before the House.

I am fully aware of what I am thereby laying myself open to. I know that I am forfeiting the esteem of my party; but on the other hand I do not wish to win the plaudits of the Liberal party which I still more strongly condemn. What I am most anxious about, is to win the approval of my own conscience, and to have the satisfaction of having done my duty.

Mr. SPEAKER: I notice that the first part of this amendment recommends that the resolution be referred back to the committee with instructions to repeal a law which is now on the statute-book, which, of course, could not be done by the House in that way. With regard to the second part, it is substantially the same as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville). Therefore, for these reasons, I am obliged to rule that it is out of order.

House divided on the motion of Mr. Borden:

That the following resolution from the Committee of the Whole be now read the second time and concurred in:

Resolved, that it is expedient in connection with the Bill now before this House intituled: An Act to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, to provide:—

(a) That from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding thirty-five million dollars for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire;

(b) That the said sum shall be used and applied under the direction of the Governor in Council in the construction and equipment of battleships or armoured cruisers of the most modern and powerful type:

(c) That the said ships when constructed and equipped shall be placed by the Governor in Council at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the Empire; and

(d) That the said sum shall be paid, used and applied, and the said ships shall be constructed and placed at the disposal of His Majesty subject to such terms, conditions and arrangements as may be agreed upon between the Governor in Council and His Majesty's Government.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): I desire to ask your attention for a few moments to a question of privilege. I have had this morning placed in my hands a sheet, which I presume the rules of this House compel me to dignify by the name of newspaper, published in the city of Regina, under the title of the Morning Leader. This paper bearing date of February 7, contains a most scurrilous article misrepresenting—dishonestly misrepresenting—the facts, and leaving, as far as it possibly can, an implication and a statement reflecting upon my honour in the discharge of my duty as Minister of the Interior. Perhaps I cannot do better than read to the House a portion of the article of which I desire to complain. It is headed in very large type:

Bob Rogers gives Prince Albert City Property to Favorite—Half of Quarter Section lying within the City Limits secretly entered as Homestead Land and given to Arthur Donaldson without Notification to the Public—Mr. Martin Exposes the Deal—Question of the Regina Member of Parliament Elicit Answers from Present Minister of the Interior Admitting the most Shameless Transaction of which any Canadian Government has ever been Guilty.

(Special Staff Correspondence.)

Ottawa, February 6—On April 16, 1912, when hon. Robert Rogers was Minister of the Interior, and without any notice having been given to the public that the land was available for homesteading, Arthur Donaldson, a close relative of the Conservative whip in the Saskatchewan Legislature, was permitted to make application for a valuable piece of property which is said to lie actually within the limits of the city of Prince Albert.

Part of the startling story came out in the House of Commons this afternoon, when the present Minister of the Interior replied to questions put by W. M. Martin, of Regina. Much more of it is likely to come out in the near future, and it is expected that the transaction will prove to have been one of the most astounding that has ever come to light in Dominion affairs.

The fact that this homestead is said to be within the city limits of Prince Albert is one of the most astounding features of the affair. More than this, according to real estate valuations in that city, the property in question, half of a quarter section, is understood to be worth many thousands of dollars, and yet under the Rogers administration of the Interior Department, land of this class and this great value was allowed to be taken up as a homestead.

But this is not the most remarkable fact in connection with the matter. In his reply to Mr. Martin's question this afternoon, Hon. Dr. Roche admitted that absolutely no notice whatever had been given to the public that this piece of Prince Albert property was available for homesteading. Apparently, however, Mr. Donaldson had sources of information which were denied the public generally, and in some mysterious way he was made aware, when Mr. Rogers was minister, that homestead entry would be accepted. On the date mentioned above, he made successful application. In the following November, patent for the land was granted Mr. Donaldson, so his right to the property under the homestead regulations is now established.

Another amazing feature in connection with the case is that it is claimed that prior to Mr. Donaldson making application for entry, other Saskatchewan men desiring to make similar application were given to understand that the property was not available for homesteading.

In answer to one of Mr. Martin's questions, Dr. Roche stated that the land under discussion was made available for homesteading entry in March, 1907. The correctness of this statement is challenged, however, and the claim made that Dr. Roche is wrong. It is asserted by men who should be in a position to know that the property was first made available for homesteading entry when Mr. Donaldson was given the chance to make application.

At all events, it is a surprising thing if the property was actually available for entry for three years before Mr. Donaldson made application that it was not taken long ago. Westerners are not likely to let the chance to secure such a piece of real estate for practically nothing slip by them if there is a chance to get it.

Dr. Roche's answer to two others of the Martin questions also had a decidedly peculiar flavour. The Regina member asked if any instruction had been given by the Government, or any of its members, to the Dominion lands agent at Prince Albert to accept the homestead application of any particular person for the property involved, and as to whether or not the Government is aware that the land is said to form part of the city of Prince Albert. To both questions Dr. Roche answered No, with a string to it. The answer was: As far as the records of the Department of the Interior are concerned, no.

The string indicates pretty well that perhaps the whole story as to instructions and as to ministerial knowledge of the exact location of the property has yet to be told.

At all events, these bald facts stand out: No notice was given the public that the land was available for homestead entry; the relative of a prominent Conservative politician became aware in some strange way that entry would be accepted on a piece of valuable property said to be within the limits of a city; he made application; the application was granted, and a patent for the property has been issued to him.

With respect to the statements contained in this article, I deny absolutely that there were any instructions whatever given, either by me or by any officer of the Interior Department, so far as I know. I deny absolutely knowledge of any act of wrong-doing in connection with the entry which is referred to in this article. Further, there was no act of wrong-doing upon the part of Mr. Donaldson, who secured the interest in the land, on the date named in this article. Let me say further, Mr. Speaker, that I had no knowledge of any kind or description of the entry that was being made, and I repeat that there was no information given to Mr. Donaldson or to any person else by any official of the Department of the Interior. Further, there were no instructions given to the agent to give Mr. Donaldson an entry for this particular eighty acres of land.

Now, in view of this slander, let me tell the House what the facts are. The facts are these: A few years ago when my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was Minister of the Interior, he undertook to lay out a forest reserve in that portion of the territory north of the town of Prince Albert. Some time after that reserve had having undertaken to do so by an Order been set apart, by his own order, without in Council even, he decided that it would be well to reduce the area of that reserve, and I hold in my hand a map showing in colour red the original reservation and also the number of sections that were afterwards withdrawn by my hon. friend from that particular reserve. The fact further is that these sections which were withdrawn by my hon. friend were disposed of under his administration. They were given not only by homestead, but by sale to his friends and the friends of the Liberal party.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if my hon. friend is in order in making an attack on me when I have no opportunity to reply?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not attacking my hon. friend; I am simply stating the facts of the case.

Mr. SPEAKER: An hon. member, in speaking to a question of privilege, has the right to state it and to deal with it as his judgment suggests, but I do not think he would have the right on a question of privilege to discuss what has been done by others.

Mr. ROGERS: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I deny absolutely that there were any instructions given by me or by any officer of the Interior Department to Mr. Donaldson in advance in order that he might secure that eighty acres of land. Now, Sir, I have the right to state some of the facts in connection with the matter in order that my denial may be full and complete and clear to the hon. members of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROGERS: I have said that similar conditions existed in the disposal of land surrounding this eighty acres. On the 30th of November, 1907, Mr. R. H. Campbell was asked to make a report on the quarter section actually adjoining the land in question, and he reported that several applications had been received to homestead the above quarter section included in the Prince Albert Forest Reserve, and he went on to describe the land. Mr. Maber, in a memorandum to Mr. Greenway, said:

Apparently this case should be considered in connection with Mr. Campbell's report on the forest reserve, which he states he is submitting, in order to make sure that the N. W. 8, is recommended to be withdrawn.

Now, mark you, I am dealing with the quarter section of land actually adjoining this eighty acres. On the 11th of February, 1908, the following memorandum is issued to Mr. Greenway:

Kindly have the necessary action taken to grant entry to the eligible applicant for the N. W. ¼ of 8, 49, 26, W. 2, (signed) Frank Oliver.

Then the following was issued on the 14th of February, 1908:

Re your memorandum of the 25th of November last, below.

If this land is in the Forest Reserve, I presume you will require to take action before the agent is instructed in accordance with the minister's memorandum of the 11th instant.

This is a letter from Mr. Keyes, dated the 4th of February, 1908:

I beg to inform you that it has been decided to make available for homestead entry the northwest ¼ of section 8, township 49, range 23, west of 2nd meridian, and you are hereby authorized to take the necessary action and grant re-entry to the eligible applicant in accordance with the regulations.

This is a letter dated Prince Albert, 19th March, 1908, from the land agent to the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Ottawa:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th ultimo, Ref, 811135, received here on the 10th instant, advising me that it has been decided to make available for homestead entry the northwest ¼ of section 8, township 49, range 26, west of 2nd meridian, and authorizing me to take the necessary action and grant re-entry to the eligible applicant in accordance with the regulations, and I have to ask if it is your intention that any notice should be taken of the applications on file either in this office or in your department (see your letter of 20th May, 1907). This case has been pending for some considerable time past and it is not altogether clear to me from the wording of your letter, whether it is your intention to recognize the applications now on file or dispose of this land in accordance with the recent regulations by posting it on the list kept in this office for a period of ten days and then disposing of it to the first eligible applicant applying in person therefor. My reason for referring this back to you is on account of the situation of the land and the fact that a bridge is now building across the river which will make this land valuable in the very near future and as a consequence I would like to be perfectly clear as to what action you desire taken. I enclose a sketch for your information.

Your obedient servant,
R. S. COOK,
Agent Dominion Lands.

In reply, Mr. FitzRoy Dixon addressed the following memorandum to Mr. Maber:

Please read minister's instructions dated 11th February, 1908.

In view of the special value of the land affected, I think it would be well to submit for consideration the agent's letter of the 19th instant,

The point is whether the land should be thrown open to the first eligible applicant after having been posted for ten days under recent regulations, or whether there is a particular eligible applicant who should receive the entry.

That was on the 31st of March, 1908. On the same date Mr. Greenway received the following memorandum:

Re N. W. 8, 49, 26, W. 2.

Referring to the instructions to the agent dated 4th February, advise the agent that the entry should have been given to the first eligible applicant for the same after the receipt of the instructions. He will therefore grant the entry to the first eligible applicant who applied to him for the same after the receipt of the instructions.

FRANK OLIVER.

On the 4th of April, 1908, Mr. Keyes addressed the following letter to the agent at Prince Albert:

Re N. W. ¼ of 8, 49, 26, West 2nd.

Replying to your letter of the 19th instant I am instructed to advise you that the department's letter to you of the 4th February was intended to authorize the granting of re-entry to the first eligible applicant in accordance with the regulations after the receipt by you of the instructions contained in that communication.

You will therefore on receipt of this grant the entry to the first eligible applicant who applied to you for the same after the receipt of the said instructions.

Your obedient servant,
P. G. KEYES,

Although that letter of instructions from Mr. Keyes was sent to the agent at Prince Albert on the 4th of April, 1908, the applicant for the adjoining quarter section to the one just referred to was granted a homestead entry on the 1st day of April, the day after the memorandum signed by the late minister was given out by his department. In so far as this half quarter section is concerned, I had no knowledge of any kind whatever of the transaction, as I can prove by the records of the department. I hold in my hand a letter bearing date April 3, 1912, written and signed by Mr. W. W. Cory, Deputy Minister of the Interior; it reads as follows, and is addressed to S. J. Donaldson, M.L.A., Regina, Saskatchewan:

In the absence of the minister, your communication to him in which you make application to apply scrip on the S.E. ¼ of 7 and the S. W. ¼ of 8 in 49-26 West 2nd, has been referred to me for attention.

Legal subdivisions 2, 7 and 8 of the S.E. ¼ of section 7, have been set aside as school lands, while fractional legal subdivision 1 stands as a time sale patented to A. S. Stewart; the N. ½ of the fractional S. W. ¼ of section 8, however, is vacant in the records of the department. The agent of Dominion lands has been communicated with and has been asked to advise the department as to the standing in his records of the said last-mentioned parcel. When he is heard from, you will be further communicated with in the matter.

That letter was received by Mr. Donaldson at Prince Albert. He immediately went to the land office, where he found the same condition that Mr. Cory had described as existing in the department here, namely, that the land was entirely free and open for entry to any person who might apply for it. The fact is that in the statement showing the number of sections that had been disposed of by the late administration, by some oversight this eighty acres had been left out; and some Tory to-day has had the good fortune to get that land under the rule as laid down by the hon. gentleman opposite. If Mr. Donaldson owes a debt of gratitude to any person for getting an entry for this particular eighty acres, he owes it to my hon. friend the member for Edmonton, because the agent of Dominion Lands in Prince Albert followed his ruling to give his friend the very adjoining quarter section a few years before. That rule is standing on his books in his office, and he followed it in this case. Because these are the facts and because some gentleman, who is called a Conservative, has secured a piece of land to the extent of eighty acres in accordance with the policy and administration laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite, I have been accused of committing a great wrong in connection with an entry of this eighty acres of land of which I have no knowledge whatever. I do not believe that the young gentleman who represents this sheet in the press gallery of this House would be guilty of writing such a misrepresentation and misstatement of facts, and I am rather inclined to believe that this article emanated from the manufacturing establishment that is carried on for the purpose of falsification and the misrepresentation of hon. members on this side of the House, carried on. I say, under the authority and by the direction of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I ask if the hon. gentleman is in order in making this suggestion?

Mr. SPEAKER: If I understand correctly, he is making a statement with reference to some unknown individual or organization that may be inside this House or outside, with reference to news going out from here. Therefore, I think he would be in order as to the statement which he considers to be untrue.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand you to rule, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman is entitled to do anything but deny this statement? Can he make any insinuation against any persons inside or outside this House?

Mr. BORDEN: My right hon. friend has changed his mind very suddenly on that question. Within his own hearing the Prime Minister of Manitoba was characterized as a liar on at least two occasions by members on the other side of the House; but we did not hear a whisper of objection on the point of order at that time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Prime Minister of Manitoba in qualifying a certain act, made use of statements in the local House which he had no right at all to make. We can deal with that some other time.

Mr. BORDEN: Just as soon as my right hon. friend desires.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very well.

Mr. OLIVER: I knew of no way to deny the assertion of the Hon. Sir Rodmond Roblin without giving the idea that he had told an untruth.

Mr. BORDEN: No one raises any objection. It is possible that my hon. friend may sometimes lack manners on such an occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the point of order?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The point of order is that the right hon. gentleman has just charged a colleague in this House with lack of manners.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not aware of any rule laid down as regards the specific words, but for the decorum of debate it would be desirable not to use words except those that would be permissible in the best of company.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And that which is not permissible in the best of company is unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ROGERS: I was undertaking to deny a statement that was false, misleading and dishonest, a statement reflecting upon my honour as a member of this House. And in doing that I was simply undertaking to give the source from which, in my judgment, the article emanated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I was justified in that. And if I was out of order——

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is quite in order. If he has reason to believe that the statement to which he refers comes from a certain source, he has a right to state it in this House, and it is for the House to determine whether the conduct of the individual, whoever he may be, is in contempt of the rights of Parliament or not; and, if it is in contempt of the rights of Parliament, then to deal with it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I submit for your judgment, Mr. Speaker, that when an hon. member asks leave to make a personal explanation with regard to a statement concerning himself, it is his right to do so, and to deny the statement if he pleases; but he has no right to make a charge against another in so doing. He has a right to deny or to explain, but he has no right to make a charge.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I understand the rules correctly, it is the right of any member not only to deny the correctness of any allegations made concerning himself, but also to question the right of any individual to make them as against himself or against the House.

Mr. ROGERS: I am perhaps not surprised at my right hon. friend not being anxious to hear me state what I believe as to the source from which the information comes that implies an insinuation and an attack upon my honour as a member of this Parliament. I say that I honestly believe that that information comes from an organization called 'The Central Information Bureau of the Canadian Liberal Party,' conducted under the authority of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a manufacturing establishment which seems to be for the purpose of manufacturing slander and——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I rise to a point of order. I am connected with that bureau, I admit. But I do not admit that that bureau is a manufactory of lies. If the hon. gentleman says it is, I will call him to the proof of it.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend will allow me to say what the bureau is doing, and if he will not acknowledge that it is a manufactory of even worse than lies, then I will be glad to apologize to him. If he will allow me, whether I am in order or out of order——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No. If the hon. gentleman wants to make a charge against the institution he has named, he can make it, but he will make it as a charge, specific, not otherwise. At present, the hon. gentleman has risen to vindicate his honour, which he is quite entitled to do. He can deny any statement made with regard to himself, but if he has a charge to make, let him rise and ask for an investigation, and I shall be glad to meet him.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is within the right of an hon. member to state what personally affects himself; but further than that I do not think it is permissible for him to go, on a question of privilege.

Mr. ROGERS: I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and, for the time being, until I can put myself in order, I will spare my right hon. friend the information. But at the proper time, I will make clear the statement I wish to make. I think I have made it clear to the House and to the country that this scurrilous article is a mass of dishonesty in every respect so far as my administration of the Department of the Interior is concerned.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask my hon. friend, as he has made some allusions to my administration of the department, if he will be good enough to place upon the table, without delay, all the papers in the department connected with this forest reserve, its reservation, the changes that have been made, and the transaction generally, so that members of the House may have an opportunity to consider the merits of the transaction.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be only too pleased to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) to bring down these papers immediately, and to give the hon. gentleman all the information he requires.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 22, respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.—Mr. Hazen.

CUSTOMS AND FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT.

Mr. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved second reading of Bill No. 35, to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act. He said: This Bill was explained to the House at the time it was introduced, but perhaps I had better explain a little more fully at this stage. The Bill is for the purpose of repealing section 10 of chapter 47 of the Revised Statutes of 1906, and substituting another section therefor. Section 10 provides as follows:

10. Every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, which, (a) has been found fishing or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing in British waters within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbours of Canada, not included within the limits specified and described in the first article of the aforesaid convention, or in or upon the inland waters of Canada, without a license then in force granted under this Act; or, (b) has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada for the time being in force; shall, together with the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores, and cargo thereof be forfeited.

It has been found in the department that under that Act it is practically impossible to make seizures of foreign vessels that are within the three-mile limit and preparing to fish because, according to the opinion of the Department of Justice and the construction put on that section by the courts of the country, in order to enforce the provisions of that Act against a vessel which without authority is within the three-mile limit preparing to fish, you have to prove it is preparing to fish within the three-mile limit. In other words if the owner says: I was preparing to fish but I was making my preparations with the intention of fishing outside of territorial waters, you are powerless to enforce the provisions of this Act. We want to amend that section so as to provide that if a vessel is within the three-mile limit and is preparing to fish without license or authority to do so it shall be liable to the penalty of forfeiture. The result of the present wording of the law has been that on many occasions offenders have gone scot-free because the Act did not express what the intention of the legislature evidently was when the law was passed.

Mr. McKENZIE: Was it not held by Chief Justice McDonald in a case in Halifax that a vessel was guilty because it was preparing to fish within the three-mile limit and was not that decision sustained by the Supreme Court?

Mr. HAZEN: My information from the Department of Justice is exactly opposite.

The Bill contains another important amendment. Under the treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain with regard to the North Atlantic Coast Fisheries, signed on October 20, 1818, article 1, would show that there was an agreement whereby in certain waters specified in article 1, fishermen and citizens of the United States have the same rights in regard to fishing as have citizens of Canada. Article 1 of that convention reads:

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbours and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties, that the inhabitants of the United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland.

It then describes the coasts on which citizens of the United States have the right to take fish. In the drafting of this section of the statute the mistake was made of using the expression: 'foreign vessels' instead of United States vessels and the result is that not only citizens of the United States who, under the convention, have an absolute and proper right to fish in those waters, but citizens of all foreign countries as well who fish in those waters cannot be proceeded against or the penalties cannot be exacted, so fishermen from France or any other country can fish in these waters and we are powerless to prevent them. The wording is:

Every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, which——

(a) has been found fishing or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing in British waters within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbours of Canada, not included within the limits specified and described in the first article.

The waters described are those in article 1 of the convention of 1818. This section really makes it impossible for Canada to enforce any forfeitures against vessels from France or other countries which come to fish in the waters in which citizens of the United States, under the treaty of 1818, have a right to fish while citizens of foreign countries have no right to fish.

The Bill now introduced repeals section 10 and substitutes a new section. It has been drafted by the Justice Department with great care and in their opinion meets the case. Sub-section (a) is as it is in the present Act, but sub-section (b), read in connection with the present section, says:

Every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or Canada, which——

(b) has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention or any law of the United Kingdom or Canada for the time being in force.

It is held by the Justice Department that that meets the case because the only ships or vessels which have any right to enter such waters by treaty or convention are the vessels of the United States and this provides that any vessels which enter these waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention or any law of the United Kingdom or Canada for the time being in force shall be subject to penalty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is to prevent vessels coming within the three-mile limit?

Mr. HAZEN: It is because they are coming within our territorial waters. Our vessels have no right to go within three miles of the United States nor have we the right to go within three miles of the Russian shore for the purposes of fishing. Nor have they the right to come within the three-mile limit for the purpose of fishing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has not a Norwegian vessel the right to sail up to within three miles of our coast under the common law?

Mr. HAZEN: The only purpose for which they have the right under the law of nations to come within the three-mile limit—the three miles having been held to be the distance because of the old idea that that was the distance from the shore at which a country could protect its coast by cannon shot when cannon carried three miles—the only purposes for which they can come within that limit are humanitarian purposes, such as making repairs, shelter, and obtaining wood and water. But if my hon. friend looks at this section a little more closely he will see that it says:

—has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention.

There is no treaty or convention which authorizes or allows the vessels of any country except those of the United States to come within that three-mile limit for the purpose of preparing to fish, or for the purpose of fishing, and my hon. friend will see if he looks at this sub-section that the language used would remedy the trouble.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are there not regulations common to both countries?

Mr. HAZEN: The regulations framed by the Hague Tribunal in regard to Canada and the United States, relate in the first place to the bays, as to the points where the three-mile limit shall commence, and the provision is that in all bays that are under the Crown and ten miles wide, there shall be drawn a line across the mouth of the bay and then a line shall be drawn from such line at right angles towards the ocean. There are a certain number of bays included in the provision, such as Egmont bay, Miramichi bay, Baie de Chaleurs, and in fact nearly all the large bays in which the points from which such line shall be drawn are actually fixed by the treaty, while in other cases the line is drawn from headland to headland at points where the configuration of the bays cease. The Bay of Fundy was excepted, while the Hudson bay is apart from the jurisdiction of the Hague Tribunal. The other provision had to do with regulations that would be made from time to time by Canada with regard to the fisheries within those waters prescribed by the treaty of 1818. Those regulations have been practically agreed to. There was a difference of opinion at one time between Canada and the United States because, while the sovereign right of those fisheries was found by the Hague Tribunal to be in Canada, it was felt that the regulations suggested were not consistent with this finding. A regulation could be promulgated by Canada without being first approved by the Government of the United States. The whole matter was satisfactorily arranged, however, after conference with the United States and Newfoundland, and as the matter stands at present, Canada promulgates those regulations and it is for the Government of the United States to take exception to them if they see fit. In such event there is a provision for a board, one member of which shall be appointed by the United States, and one by Canada, and if the two cannot agree upon a third, then the other representative shall be appointed by the Queen of the Netherlands. This is known as the Permanent Mixed Fishery Tribunal.

But the point I am bringing up just now as to the Hague Tribunal has scarcely any bearing on the matter under discussion, which is not aimed at the United States at all, but is for the purpose of making it clear that the vessels of the United States have the right to come in and fish in those waters under the treaty of 1818, and that other nations have not the right to do so. Under this Act it is impossible to take means to prevent them from operating, because in drafting that Act, which we are now seeking to amend, the word 'foreign' was used, when it was simply intended that the United States alone should have the right, as they have under the treaty, to fish in those waters. Now with regard to the other point. Subsection (c), taking it with the first part of the section, reads:

Every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, which has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada for the time being in force; and not being thereto permitted by such treaty, convention or law, purchases or obtains bait, ice, seines, lines or any other supplies or outfit, or transhipps any supplies, outfit or catch, or ships or discharges any officer, seaman, fisherman or other part of the crew, or ships or lands any passengers, shall, together with the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores and cargo thereof, be forfeited.

That section provides that if they enter those territorial waters, even if permitted by treaty or convention or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada to do so, and if they are not permitted by treaty, convention or law to commit acts in violation of that treaty convention or law, then the ships shall be subject to forfeiture also. I think that the Bill, which has been very carefully gone over by the Department of Justice, will accomplish the object intended. I may say to my hon. friend from St. John that at first I doubted whether it remedied what it was intended to remedy. I am satisfied now that it does, and that it will accomplish, if it becomes law, what it is desired to accomplish.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the object of this Bill? What is the evil which it is intended to remedy?

Mr. HAZEN: My right hon. friend was not in the House when I gave the explanation, but I may say that there are two objects. In the first place, under that Act, citizens of all countries can go in and fish within the waters mentioned in article 1 of the convention of 1818, although that convention only gives permission to fish there to citizens of the United States. But citizens of other countries can do so, and under that section we are powerless to enforce our rights against them. The other point is, and this view is held by the Justice Department, that the law which now makes it unlawful for vessels having no license to come within the three-mile limit, and prepare to fish within the three-mile limit, means preparing within the three-mile limit to fish within that limit, and it is necessary to prove not only that they were preparing to fish but that they were preparing to fish within the territorial waters. Time and again it has been found in practice that where fishery officers have found vessels within the three-mile limit preparing to fish the owners say, 'we were simply preparing to fish outside the three-mile limit,' and it has been impossible to enforce the law.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think there can be no doubt that paragraph (a) of what would be the new section 10 is a very great improvement upon the old section, and corrects an error which evidently exists in the present section. But I have very grave doubts as to whether paragraph (b) will get the department out of the difficulty which the hon. member says exists in enforcing the law. I understand that under clause (a) according to the view of the Justice Department, it is not possible to punish owners of vessels who are found within the three-mile limit preparing to fish, unless it can be proved that they were actually preparing to fish within the three-mile limit. My hon. friend says that is to be cured by paragraph (b). Let us see what paragraph (b) says:

Has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada for the time being in force.

Is there any statute law allowing a steam yacht to come within three miles of the coast of Canada?

Mr. HAZEN: None whatever.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it illegal to do so?

Mr. HAZEN: It is not illegal if they do it for shelter or safety, I presume.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it illegal for a steam yacht to come from Boston to St. John? Do they have to ask permission to sail these waters and exercise the right of navigation?

Mr. HAZEN: There is absolutely no law?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Statute, not common law?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no law which permits them doing so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is my hon. friend prepared to say that it is contrary to law?

Mr. HAZEN: We could prevent it being done.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what way—by ministerial action?

Mr. HAZEN: I should think that we could prevent it being done if they came for any purpose other than a humanitarian purpose, such as repairs, fuel, shelter, &c.

Mr. EMMERSON: Suppose it is for pleasure?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend is raising a case that never will come up, but the opinion of the Department of Justice is that there is no such law.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It surprises me to have it stated that it is contrary to law for a vessel from a foreign country to sail the ocean within three miles of the coast.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not say it is contrary to law, but there is no law that I can find permitting it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is the common law and there is international law.

Mr. HAZEN: It could not be the common law. When we speak of the common law we refer to the common law of England. There may be some international law with reference to the comity of nations or something of that sort.

Mr. PUGSLEY: International law, I take it, is common law.

Mr. HAZEN: Not necessarily.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a branch of the common law; it is not statute law. What is the difference between common law and international law? International law governs as between nations.

Mr. HAZEN: We speak of the common law of England.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, there is a distinction in that way. The common law applies to rights as between individual members of the same state, whereas international law applies as between people of different countries.

Mr. HAZEN: If there is a treaty or law then paragraph (c) applies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Paragraph (c) only relates to the transhipping of supplies, purchasing of bait and that sort of thing.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, it is entirely limited to the purchasing of bait, ice, seines, lines or any other supplies or outfit or the transhipping of any supplies, outfit or catch.

Mr. HAZEN: That is all we want to guard against.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is all my hon. friend wants to guard against in that paragraph, but I understand that he wants to guard against a vessel that may come within the three-mile limit and in regard to which the officers find that they are preparing to fish. The officers want to be allowed to arrest them whether the intention is to fish within or without the three-mile limit.

Mr. HAZEN: Do not these two paragraphs (b) and (c) meet both cases mentioned by the hon. gentleman? Paragraph (b) provides for the case where, for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, they enter such waters. If the yacht that my hon. friend speaks of is not permitted by treaty or convention—and it certainly is not, and if it is permitted by international law—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Or by any law of the United Kingdom or Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think it would be a law of the United Kingdom or Canada. If it were in consequence of international law—

Mr. PUGSLEY: It must be a law binding on this country.

Mr. HAZEN: A law of the United States or Canada would refer to a law enacted by the United States or Canada for the protection of the fisheries, I would take it. But, suppose it does not come within that case, suppose that yacht comes in and suppose the yacht has a right to come in, then you have section (c) which applies—

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Having entered such waters for a purpose permitted by treaty or convention or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada for the time being in force.

If it could not enter the waters under section (d) it might have a right to enter under section (c).

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is only for the special purposes mentioned in section (c).

Mr. HAZEN: That is all we want to get at it for. We presume that this yacht had the right to come in under some law or treaty. If it is there we presume that there is some treaty or law which permits it to be there, and being there under those circumstances, it purchases any supplies, outfit or catch, or ships or discharges any officer, seaman, fisherman or other part of her crew, or ships or lands any passengers, it comes within this provision.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, it is only where she purchases these things within the three-mile limit, but suppose that the vessel had left Boston and had all her tackle on board?

Mr. HAZEN: And she goes fishing?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, but she comes within the three-mile limit; you could not do anything under section (c).

Mr. HAZEN: You might cover that point by adding the words 'fishes or prepares to fish within the three mile limit or does any act connected with fishing'.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You have that in paragraph (a).

Mr. HAZEN: I think we would cover everything by adding these words.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You are trying to do something that you cannot do.

Mr. HAZEN: The principal way of preparing to fish is really to buy bait and supplies.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that the discussion would be more in order in Committee of the Whole than on the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We are both fishing for information, Mr Speaker.

Mr. HAZEN: I must apologize; I was proceeding as if this Bill were in committee.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House went into Committee thereon.

On section 1—foreign vessels fishing illegally.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) has raised a point that is worthy of consideration. I think it would be absolutely met, so that there could be no misunderstanding, by inserting after the word

'law' in the 24th line, the words, 'fishes or prepares to fish'; then let the other words follow. That puts it beyond any question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, that will do.

Mr. HAZEN: I am much obliged to my hon. friend for the suggestion.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have in Nova Scotia, particularly in North Sydney, very large dealings with French fishermen and these dealings have been going on for the last thirty years. French fishermen have been in the habit of coming in, buying bait, coal and supplies and it is going to create quite a disturbance and break up old associations and good business if the present conditions are disturbed. I have been in communication with the French consul at North Sydney, and he tells me that his people are watching this Bill with a great deal of concern, and that the Bill has created quite a flutter in France. A number of French trawlers came to North Sydney last year, and we did a trade with them to the extent of about $100,000, which we would like to conserve for our people. They were not interfering with the rights of our own fishermen in any way; they were fishing outside the three-mile limit, and nobody in that part of the country took exception to what was going on.

Mr. HAZEN: This law will certainly prevent the French fishermen from coming to ports of Canada for the purpose of buying bait and supplies. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has given a great deal of consideration to the question of steam trawling within the last few years.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is this aimed at steam trawlers?

Mr. HAZEN: It would have some effect on the trawler business. The feeling of the fishermen in the United States as well as in Newfoundland is very strong against the operation of these trawlers. Last summer, together with the inspector of fisheries, I conferred in Washington with the United States authorities, and with Sir Edward Morris, Prime Minister of Newfoundland, who was there at the time, and we made arrangements then to have representatives on board these steam trawlers so that careful observation might be made as to what the actual effect of the trawling business is. The feeling of the Gloucester fishermen is said to be very strong against these trawlers and of course there are other interests in favour of them so that before coming to any conclusion to prevent their operation, it was deemed desirable that we should have the best information we could get on the subject. These steam trawlers come out from France. and operate outside of the territorial waters but they are capable of doing just as much injury to the gear of our own fishermen as are trawlers from the United States or from Newfoundland. There would be no great purpose served by stopping the trawling industry so far as the United States, Canada and Newfoundland are concerned if we did not do something to stop it so far as the French trawlers are concerned. The United States, Canada and Newfoundland could come to an agreement to prevent the outfitting and sailing of trawlers from their ports, but we are powerless as against the French trawlers, unless we take action in this way. Even then, we may have difficulty because France owns St. Pierre and Miquelon and the trawlers may be able to operate from these islands as a base. The officers of the Fishery Department do not believe it would be possible for France to successfully carry on the trawling industry unless her trawlers are permitted to come into the ports of Canada to buy bait and coal and other necessary supplies. There is no doubt in the world that if this provision were put in force it would prevent French fishermen from getting supplies from Canadian ports.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I did not realize that this would deal with the question of steam trawling.

Mr. HAZEN: It incidentally would.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Then I am in full sympathy with that phase of the Bill. I think it would be a very good thing, if we could devise some method to prevent French trawlers from working off our coast. The minister referred to bait, but I suppose he does not intend to say that the steam trawlers operate with bait. Then if there are sailing trawlers neither would they require supplies of bait. I understand that the French trawling business is carried on off the Banks by steam trawlers and sailing trawlers as well, which transfer their catch to larger vessels, which take it to France where it is cured and dried.

Mr. HAZEN: Does my hon. friend think that a sailing trawler could be operated from France; is not the distance too great. I understand the business at present is principally done with steam trawlers which go into Nova Scotia ports to get their supplies of coal?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Of course the steam trawler is the more destructive and more objectionable, but nevertheless I am informed that there are sailing trawlers engaged in the business. In the North sea there are a great many trawlers still running under sail, although the larger number of the fleet are operated by steam. Some of the trawlers operating in Nova Scotia are from Great Britain and they would have the right to come into Sydney or elsewhere to obtain all the supplies of coal they require, and to properly protect our fishermen, it would be necessary to do something to prevent the British trawler as well as the French trawler from operating on our coast. I suppose it would be an easy matter for a French trawler to register in Great Britain. As I understand the British shipping law, it is a very easy matter to change the registry of a ship. All that is necessary is to go to the registry office, to make the declaration and to pay a small fee, and you can register in Great Britain a ship built in any part of the world. It would be very easy for the Frenchman to do that, although he might get into complications over his right to the bounty in his own country. The British trawler would still have to be dealt with unless we could secure in some way the approval and consent of the Imperial Government to the arrangement.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is nothing to prevent fishing outside the three-mile limit.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no way at present of preventing a trawler from fishing outside the three-mile limit. As the minister has just stated, the Government is making some effort to obtain international relations with the United States, in which Newfoundland and Canada would join, by which this method of fishing would be restricted and our fishemen would be saved this destruction each year and protected from the great annoyances which they have to endure from the trawlers. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the minister's proposal; I trust he will be able to work it out, and to deal with the British Government as well in the interests of our fishermen. I have not yet been able to find out what the results of the investigation made last year are. I understand that the minister has some information; and if he would be good enough to bring it down. I am sure we would all be very much interested. My study of this question has led me to the conclusion that trawling is very destructive to the ordinary boatman, and that it is almost impossible for the boat fisherman to exist and carry on his business in competition with trawlers. There is no doubt that the investigation in the North sea has established the fact that in addition to doing injury to ordinary fishermen, the trawling method is very destructive to fish, and that the southern part of the North sea is to a large extent depleted of fish on account of the operations of trawlers. People who favour the trawlers will answer that by saying that the quantity of fish landed on the coast of Great Britain is as large as ever it was; that as a matter of fact it has been increasing year after year. The answer to that is that these fish are collected from distant regions. The boats that formerly worked in the North sea are now going all along the Atlantic coast, as far as Morocco on the coast of Africa, and as far north as Iceland and the waters of the White sea. The industry is kept up by the enterprise of the British fisherman.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be very glad indeed to bring down all the reports we have from those officials whom we appointed for the purpose of taking observations during last summer as to the effects of steam trawling. The French fisherman has a very great advantage over our fisherman, because he operates in the same waters as our fishermen do, and is also paid a bounty by the French Government on the fish which he catches, and especially on the fish which he cures and takes back to France in a cured condition. As far as we can do so, we should frame laws so as to protect and assist our own fishermen as against those of other countries. A great deal has been written and said about steam trawling. Some two thousand trawlers are operating in the North sea at the present time. It is claimed by certain people that trawlers operating in the North sea not only do injury to the business of the ordinary fishermen, but that they also destroy immature fish to a very great extent, and in that way a permanent injury will be brought about to the fishing industry. Those who advocate steam trawling claim that trawlers do not destroy these immature fish; but that they collect and catch quantities of fish that would otherwise not be caught, and that there has been no lessening in the number of fish caught, as was stated by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), since these trawlers became so numerous in the North sea. A convention, spoken of as the North sea convention, has been entered into by all nations whose vessels operate in those waters, and very elaborate arrangements have been made for policing the fishing grounds and enforcing order amongst those who are engaged in fishing. Each nation in turn supplies a ship which stays in those waters and enforces those police regulations. Those who advocate steam trawling claim that it has resulted in a more steady supply of fish being supplied to the consumers than was the case before; and that this is done without permanent injury to the source of supply. So far as Canada is concerned, the feeling of our fishermen is practically unanimous in opposition to the trawlers and they believe that injury is being done. No nation can pass laws that will affect the right to fish outside the territorial limit; it is the right of every man to go out on the high seas and fish without let or hindrance; but we could make certain customs regulations regarding the entering of our harbours by these vessels, regarding obtaining supplies and so on, which would make it impossible for anyone to carry on this work in waters frequented by our fishermen, with the exception of France. My hon. friend, I think, has seen the correspondence which took place with the British Government on this question some years ago. The British Government was not prepared, at that time, to interfere in regard to the matter, without further evidence as to the destructive character of the work that was being carried on. We are trying to get that information now. If the United States, Canada and Newfoundland came to a practical agreement upon the matter after full investigation, I think that the Mother Country would be disposed to recognize the justice of our position, and do what it could to help us in the matter. Before we approach Great Britain again, it will be necessary for us to get together data upon which it will be possible for us to oppose a claim that the steam trawler is not interfering with our fishing business and thereby not against the business of the country.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I was not in the House when the discussion about steam trawling began, but, as I represent a county in which the fishermen have suffered a great deal from this method of fishing, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that trawlers on the shores of Antigonish have been fishing within the three-mile limit—at least I am so informed by the fishermen down there, and I have no reason to doubt the information they give. They state that sometimes these trawlers come within a mile and a half of the shore. If the fisheries protection cruisers were instructed during the fishing season to keep the trawlers outside the limit, something would be done to relieve the hand liners and other fishermen from the difficulties under which they now labour. They simply give up fishing on the coast when the trawlers come. They explain that it is not safe for them to put out hand lines, trawls and so on, because the steam trawlers destroy their gear, as they cannot be there all the time to watch. The fishermen of Arisaig, Georgeville and Livingstone's Cove have practically gone out of the business during the time these engines of destruction are about since the trawlers have come. Sometimes our fishermen have set out to get trawls at a distance of five or six miles from the shore. As the minister has stated, there does not seem to be legislation that will protect the fishermen when their fishing gear is out that distance. But I think the trawlers would not be so obnoxious if our fishermen felt that the law as it stands was being strictly enforced. Two or three years ago there was a prosecution of trawlers, and after that they seemed a little more careful for a while. But last year there was no prosecution, and they have grown bolder, and three of them were operating off the coast. I merely rose to call the minister's attention to the situation, in the hope that next season he will see to it that the trawlers are more closely watched.

Mr. HAZEN: The complaints referred to by my hon. friend as to the operation of steam trawlers within the three-mile limit around the shores of Antigonish and that section of Nova Scotia coast generally reached my department, and prompt instructions were given to those in charge of the fishery protection vessels on the Nova Scotia coast to use every possible means to prevent these trawlers coming within the three-mile limit and to take steps to have them punished if evidence were obtained against them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is, I take it, if they were trawling within the three-mile limit? They have the right to come in for supplies and so on.

Mr. HAZEN: They have the right to come in for humanitarian purposes of supplies, shelter, wood and water, but the complaint of the fishermen of Antigonish is that they have come within territorial waters to fish and have caught fish within those waters. We gave most positive instructions to the officers in command of our vessels on the coast of New Brunswick to take all possible means to prevent that being done during the past season. They have been unable to obtain any evidence against these steam trawlers for fishing within the three-mile limit on which a case could be founded, and they never caught any trawler within the limit. In view of the representations made to the department, only yesterday we sent special instructions to a special officer in Nova Scotia directing him to go to Antigonish and the district to which my hon. friend refers to obtain for us information that would show if these trawlers had actually come within the three-mile limit during the past season. If they can get that information—and, certainly, if the trawlers did come within the three-mile limit we ought to be able to get it—and if we find that the fisheries protection vessels that we now have in Nova Scotia are not sufficient for the purpose of guarding these waters against the operation of trawlers, we shall have to take means to obtain more vessels. The department is fully alive to the importance of the matter, and, so far as it could be done up to the present time, my officials advise we have taken all steps to protect the interests of the hon. gentleman's constituents and of others.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I grant the difficulty of obtaining evidence in such a case. It is hard for a fisherman to swear positively that the trawler was operating within the three-mile limit. In the first place, it is hard to estimate the distance. In the second place, the trawler puts up the excuse that they were 'jogging'—that is, moving back and forth, but not fishing. I think there will be little relief for the fishermen unless a cruiser is kept within a reasonable distance of the trawlers, not once a month or two months, but enough to protect our coasts.

Mr. HAZEN: That has been done.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Not on our coast.

Mr. JAMESON: Is the hon. gentleman able to say how many trawlers have been operating there and of what nationality? How many American, how many Canadian, how many French?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I have been told there are three, all Canadian—or British rather. I know of no others.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I asked a question as to the nationality of these trawlers last session or the session before, and I was told that only one of those working on the coast of Antigonish and Cape Breton was registered in Canada and the others were British. The Canadian vessel referred to was the Wren, but the Wren has gone out of business as a trawler, and is 'drifting'—another method of fishing.

Mr. JAMESON: How many of them were French?

Mr. CHISHOLM: None of those of Antigonish. The French are all off St. Pierre and come into North Sydney.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sorry this Bill is going to disturb old standing, satisfactory conditions in the part of the country from which I come. I venture to say that there is not a single line on the files of the department against the French trawlers. They have never fished off the coast of Nova Scotia or any part of the coast of Canada. To a very large extent they make St. Pierre their station, fishing around the grand banks of Newfoundland and other waters away from Canada altogether, and not interfering in the slightest way with the operations of our fishermen. From Guysborough along the southern part of Cape Breton and down to the northern part of the island, we have good fishing grounds that are occupied largely by our own people. Of course, I would not be in favour of any vessel or fisherman coming in there that would interfere with their rights. But these French trawlers simply come into North Sydney, and have come in for years and years past, for coal and bait. This bait they buy from our fishermen. When I speak in favour of selling bait, I am speaking in favour of our own fishermen. This bait is a small class of herring which comes in in tremendous quantities in the spring of the year. Our fishermen catch them and sell them. They cannot use them except to sell them as bait. If our fishermen are going to be cut off from selling this bait to the French trawlers, then they cannot sell it at all, and a large source of revenue which they now enjoy will be cut off. Why should such a small measure as this be adopted with the intent of preventing the trawler from operating? It is beginning at an infinitesimally small section of the business. I think it will be admitted by the minister that they cannot prevent the operation of the deep sea trawlers except by convention between the countries interested.

We cannot pass any legislation here that will operate beyond the three-mile limit and the only effect that this law will have as far as the steam trawler is concerned is that you will compel him to buy his supplies and land his fish in Newfoundland or St. Pierre and derive a prosperous trade of $100,000 or $150,000 a year from our ports. Our fishermen enjoy the sale of this small herring which is not sold for food but is fit only for bait. It is put up in large quantities in some places for bait and is kept in cold storage. No one has complained against these trawlers, this trade was not disturbing anybody, no person is finding any fault with it. The Magdalen islands sell bait in this way, St. Anne's harbour, Sydney harbour, Gabarouse and all the ports around there where the small herrings come in large quantities. It is rather a hardship when nothing can be accomplished by throwing this obstacle in the way that this old trade should be thrown to the winds for the fanciful idea that we are going to stop steam trawling by such legislation. We discussed last year the plan of preventing fish caught by steam trawlers from being landed anywhere in Canada, but we decided that the only effect of such a law would be to change the basis of their operations to places outside of Canada, to Newfoundland or some port in the United States, and since we could not prevent their fishing we thought we might as well have their trade within our territories. I do not wish to have the French trawler put in any worse position than the American trawler.

Mr. HAZEN: He is not put in a worse position.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, the American can get a license to do certain things, to buy bait and hire his crew.

Mr. HAZEN: No steam trawlers can get a license as the regulations are at present. They do not allow any steam trawler to operate within the three-mile limit and do not grant licenses to them.

Mr. McKENZIE: You would not prevent a steam trawler from coming in and getting a sailor? A steam trawler is a ship and if she comes into any port, and wants to hire a seaman there is nothing to prevent her, I presume.

Mr. HAZEN: She connot do it without a license and we will not grant any licenses to these steam trawlers.

Mr. McKENZIE: I take it that the Canadian or British trawlers operating in Canada to-day are not operating without men.

Mr. HAZEN: I thought the hon. gentleman referred to American trawlers.

Mr. McKENZIE: Any vessel coming into Canada, say a sailing vessel that is fishing, an American vessel with a license to fish or such license as this Government grants to an American vessel, has that advantage over a French vessel, which, whether sailing or not, cannot get a license. That being the case you are putting a French vessel in a much worse position than an American; she can do some business while the French vessel cannot.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman forgets the tremendous advantage enjoyed by the French fisherman in being paid a bounty on his fish by the French Government.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is none of our business. We can pay a bounty if we want to. I am not talking for the advantage of the French fishermen, I am talking for the trade of a Canadian port. These French fishing vessels and trawlers bring trade and traffic and dollars and cents to Canadian ports. They do a business of $100,000 or $150,000 in the port from which I come and I protest against this legislation when there is no purpose served by it, while it throws that much business out of the country. There seems to be no reason for passing this legislation except that it rounds off an act regarding the confiscation of vessels for fishing or preparing to fish within territorial waters. I am satisfied of the correctness of my statement that the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia condemned a vessel found preparing to fish within the three-mile limit and that his judgment was confirmed by the Supreme Court. The finding was that if the crew of a vessel were found doing things aboard a vessel which were necessary acts towards fishing it was preparing to fish within territorial waters. The Gearing, I think, was the name of the steamer. If there was any trouble of that kind it could be remedied by a simpler means than disturbing trade conditions that have existed for thirty or forty years and are becoming more profitable each year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The description of the coast waters of Canada in sub-section (a) might be held to be defective. The prohibition is within Three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbours of Canada.

Now take for example Chedabucto bay in my own constituency. I understand that the Canadian waters are indicated by a line running from the point on both sides of the land. We measure from the point of land on the Cape Breton side three miles out to sea, and from the point of land on the Nova Scotia side also three miles out to sea, then draw a straight line across, and inside that straight line are Canadian waters. But the centre of that line would be four, five, or perhaps six miles from the coast. Now this description is within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbours of Canada. I think it should be within the territorial waters of Canada, because some of the territorial waters of Canada might be more than three miles from the coast.

Mr. HAZEN: This language follows the language of the Act we are amending, chapter 47 of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act. I think that under the definition of the Hague tribunal as to what a bay is, it is perfectly clear that if you say within three marine miles of any of the bays of Canada, it means within three miles of the line which is drawn from headland to headland. I submit to my hon. friend that there cannot be much question about that. The language is the same as that used in chapter 47 of the Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would ask whether, in order to accomplish the object which the hon. minister has in view, of preventing steam trawlers from fishing within the three-mile limit, it is worth while putting in these provisions in paragraph (c) which would have the effect stated by my hon. friend from Sydney of driving away from that port a very large and lucrative business which the merchants do. What object is to be gained by preventing fishermen who are not transgressing the law, who do not fish within the three-mile limit, from coming into harbours along the coast of Nova Scotia where they have been in the habit of going to purchase supplies or bait, to ship seamen, or to hire seamen, or to discharge seamen? The only object of those laws was to secure to our fishermen in the past certain safeguards against the fishermen of the United States by reason of the advantage which United States fishermen had of taking the fish into the United States without payment of duty, while our own fishermen were prevented from doing so. I do not think that anybody ever supposed that it was desirable to prevent French fishermen, for instance, from going to the harbours of our eastern coast to purchase bait or to ship seamen, so long as they did not transgress our laws, or fish within the three-mile limit. I suggest that it would be reasonable to rise and report progress and to take a little time to redraft this section which would omit these objectionable provisions in clause 3. By doing so the hon. minister would still accomplish all he has in view. It seems to me that it is not desirable to disturb existing conditions so far as trade in Canadian ports is concerned, unless there is some good reason for doing so.

Mr. HAZEN: The argument advanced by the hon. member for North Cape Breton, is an argument clearly in favour of allowing the steam or beam trawler to carry on operations in non-territorial waters.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is on the high seas.

Mr. HAZEN: He says that those steam trawlers are purchasing supplies in his constituency. Now that is contrary to the whole feeling of the fishermen of Nova Scotia as I understand it. They want the steam trawlers prevented from carrying on operations in the high seas, as far as we are able to prevent them. We have already prohibited them within the three-mile limit, and one of the best means of preventing them from carrying on their operations on the high seas would be to prevent them from getting in Canadian ports those supplies without which it would be impossible for them to carry on those operations. If we say to the steam trawler: you can go to Sydney or anywhere else and buy your supplies and ship seamen; no doubt the steam trawlers would continue the business. We should try to protect our own fishermen by taking steps that will make it impossible for the trawler to carry on its operations, even outside of the three-mile limit. I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman has had time to verify his figures. He speaks of $100,000 or $150,000 being paid for supplies. The steam trawler buys no bait. What it particularly buys is coal, for without coal it could not carry on its operations. The steam trawlers which come from the United States and from France lay in their supplies before they leave their home ports, and there is not very much in the way of patronage in the ports of Canada from those trawlers. The principal supplies that they purchase are of coal, and if we prevent them from getting coal at Canadian ports it would go a very long way towards preventing the continuation of this business which our own fishermen are unanimous in opposing, and which is considered by them to be very destructive to the fishing industry. The Bill has been very carefully considered. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton is perhaps not so closely in touch with the fishermen as the hon. member for Guysborough.

Mr. McKENZIE: Just as much.

Mr. HAZEN: Then I am surprised that my hon. friend is not willing to encourage legislation which will have the effect of minimizing the evil that results from the operations of the steam trawler. The matter has been discussed in this House on several occasions, sometimes at the instance of the member for Guysborough, and delegations have come here frim Nova Scotia in regard to the matter. While I believe there may be some advantage to my hon. friend's constituency in the matter of some supplies that are purchased by French trawlers, I think that the advantage is more than offset by the injury which the fishermen in that district believe is being done by the operation of those engines of destruction. In Newfoundlond the same argument as that advanced by the hon. member for North Cape Breton was brought forward, namely that it was a shame to prevent those fishermen from buying supplies of bait. But that view did not prevail with the people of Newfoundland who, anxious to maintain their fisheries against operations of a similar character, excluded the trawlers from the right of purchasing those supplies.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In case there should be any misunderstanding, I wish the minister to know that in my opinion this Bill is not going to meet the troubles which I have on the coast of my constituency, or in other parts of the eastern seaboard. We have no troubles at all with the French trawlers. This is a blow at the French trawlers alone. I think something might be done with the British and Canadian trawlers. There will be no relief to the fishermen I represent, because I have never had any complaint about the French trawlers. They work one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles out to sea. The trouble comes altogether from the British trawlers.

Mr. HAZEN: This question of trawling can be dealt with, so far as Canada, the United States and Newfoundland are concerned, by an arrangement between the three countries, but there is no point in preventing American and Canadian trawlers from operating unless we can also prevent French trawlers from operating. The French trawler has practically no interest in the fisheries that are operated by these trawlers and unless we can devise something that will make it difficult for the trawler from France to come across and operate in these waters there is very little point in trying to prevent trawlers from the United States, Canada and Newfoundland from operating in them.

Mr. McKENZIE: This provision is rather absurd. There is nothing within the power of this Parliament that can prevent a French captain from coming into North Sydney, putting coal on board a barge, having that coal towed out beyond the three-mile limit and there putting it within his vessel. We can make that extremely difficult for the French captain, we can make this coal dearer, we can make it a hazardous operation for him to barge the coal beyond the three-mile limit, but he can continue to fish outside of the three-mile limit and carry on his trade just as he is doing to-day. My hon. friends from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) are interested in the fishermen just as much as I am and I am interested just as much as they are. The whole northern coast of the county of Victoria is inhabited by hardy fishermen and if the operations of the French trawlers in any way interfered with these fishermen I suppose they would be against them. But I find that the fishermen all along the coast from St. Anne to North Sydney, and on the south bar in South Cape Breton, are anxious to sell bait to the French vessels, whether they are trawlers or not. They sell thousands of dollars worth of bait to these vessels at the points which I have mentioned, as well as at Gabarus, Louisburg and other points along the coast. I find that this Bill prevents a trade which has been going on for the last twenty years, and it is to be cut off without any conceivable reason by this Parliament. It is up to the minister and to the Government to explain to the fishermen of Nova Scotia why such drastic legislation is passed by this House, what purpose is served and who is benefited by it. I venture to submit that there is not a fisherman —and there are thousands in my county— who will raise a finger in favour of this legislation, but that thousands of them will vote against it if they have an opportunity of doing so, because it has taken away trade from them. Why should it be done? The old-time practice was to meet difficulties when these difficulties arise. It was not customary to pass a law in advance of the necessity. If it is found that these French vessels, by reason of exercising this trade within Canadian territory, may become an embarrassment to our own fishermen, then we can certainly pass legislation to stop them. But, while we continue to carry on a profitable trade with them, while our people are satisfied with conditions and their own rights and means of making a living are not interfered with but helped by reason of the fact that this trade exists, I submit to the minister that he is not helping the fishermen by passing this legislation. I do not suppose that the minister has any purpose in passing this Bill except to promote what he supposes to be the interests of the Canadian people. I submit that this legislation is not going to benefit anybody, but that it is going to injure quite a large number of people in my part of the country who have been for years making money and helping to support their families in this way, utilizing for the purpose a certain kind of fish that is fit for this trade and nothing else. This small herring industry will be completely destroyed once the fishermen are unable to sell the fish to the French vessels coming in for bait. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has suggested that possibly the real purpose of this Bill could be accomplished by different language being used and by a section drafted in such a way as to achieve the object the minister has in view without striking at a trade that perhaps it was not intended to strike at, especially when it would be very much better that this trade should be left as it is. It is possibly not necessary to refer back to it, but I am not at all clear that we have any right to interfere with vessels coming within the three-mile limit unless the nation to which the vessel belongs agrees to that interference. Our right to legislate against American vessels is by reason of a treaty. The Americans agreed by the treaty of 1818 that they should be deprived of certain rights. When we exercise certain rights over these waters it is entirely by treaty and these treaties can be enforced by legislation in so far as we are concerned. But where there is no treaty at all, only the natural right of every man in the world to sail the sea, I am not at all clear that we have any right to legislate away the ordinary, common, everyday right of any citizen in any navigable water in this country. There is no common law which gives us the right to do so and we cannot do it, as I have said, except by treaty. We have been taking to ourselves the right to make certain regulations which we can enforce within the three-mile limit, but if we have no right to prevent French fishermen from fishing within the three-mile limit, then it is difficult to enforce such a regulation. There is no common law by which we can prevent a French, a Norwegian, or any other vessel from coming within our limits and therefore such a regulation cannot be passed without the authority of a treaty. However, I am not going that far. What I want to remind the minister of is the sound, old Tory doctrine to leave well enough alone in so far as the trade of my part of the country is concerned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The more one studies paragraph (c) the more important it seems to become. As far as the French are concerned this is a provision, directed against a friendly nation, apparently without any reason. My hon. friend the minister says that in the future they are going to try to make some arrangement with the United States Government and with the British Government by which trawling will be prohibited on the high seas; in other words, it is expected that each country will pass legislation against its own people and prohibit them from trawl fishing on the high seas beyond the three-mile limit. Then my hon. friend says, in anticipation of that, we are now proposing to legislate against the French fishermen.

Mr. HAZEN: Against all foreign fishermen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is really French fishermen who would be most concerned. This section of the Bill will not only prevent a steam trawler from entering our ports and buying supplies, but it will prevent a merchant ship or an ordinary fishing vessel from entering our ports and buying supplies, or landing passengers, or doing any of the things which are prohibited under this section. There is nothing in the language used by the section which would limit it to trawlers. Is that proper legislation? Is it directed against the Japanese on the Pacific coast; is there something back of this Bill which cannot be disclosed, which makes it necessary to adopt this very mysterious language? Steam trawlers are not mentioned from beginning to end in the Bill. The minister says, the object of this Bill is to prevent the French steam trawling on the high seas, but have they not a perfect right to do so? The more one studies the Bill the more objectionable paragraph (c) seems to be. Why should we legislate to prevent the ships of friendly nations coming to our harbours to do ordinary commercial business? I do not understand that provision at all. It may lead to endless trouble and seemingly without any reason between Canada and France and possibly Japan. To my mind the section is exceedingly objectionable.

Mr. JAMESON: This Bill had its first reading on the 13th of December last and the Minister of Marine, in introducing it, made a very careful and fairly lengthy statement explaining its provisions. Two months have since elapsed and one would have thought that if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had any objection to the legislation, they would have been in a position to state it somewhat earlier than they did to-day. What is the objection which hon. members who are opposing this legislation make? It is simply that they object to this Parliament taking the necessary steps to exercise control within the territorial waters of Canada. The hon. member for North Cape Breton went further and said that he did not think the Parliament of Canada had any right to legislate in that regard unless there was a treaty giving assent, with the nation against the shipping of which this legislation might possibly be directed. When the hon. member made that statement he was, I think, speaking more for effect than for the purpose of placing on record his actual views. The main object of this legislation has been announced by the hon. minister, and incidentally the question as to whether or not it would affect steam trawlers operated from countries other than Canada, Newfoundland, and the United States, was brought up by the hon. member for North Cape Breton. We remember that last session hon. members opposite were very severe in their criticism of this Government because they had not taken steps, as they alleged, to prevent steam trawling. There have been for some time, regulations with regard to steam trawling within the three-mile limit, but it has been found that in the actual operation of steam trawling, this did not go as far as our fishermen and those interested in our fisheries thought it should go. Our fishermen feel that legislation to be effective in protecting the fishing grounds, in this respect, should protect the fishing grounds outside the three-mile limit. They contend that the operation of these steam trawlers over the fishing banks has the effect of injuring the fisheries and of frequently destroying the gear of our fishermen. One might think that anything which would tend to restrict that would receive the enthusiastic support of gentlemen on the other side of the House, but we find objection taken by them to this legislation because it is likely to affect in some degree the trawlers from France which come to this side and which, although they may not actually operate within the three-mile limit, do operate on the fishing banks outside of our territorial waters where our own fishermen ply their calling.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they not within their right to fish outside the three-mile limit?

Mr. JAMESON: Let us suppose they are but is it right that we should continue to allow them to injure our fisheries and our fishermen if we can prevent them by declaring that they shall not make the ports of Canada a base for their operations?

As the Minister of Marine has pointed out, it is possible that after further investigation, the United States, Newfoundland, and Canada may come to an arrangement which will prevent the operation of steam trawlers from these countries even upon the high seas. It is also probable, if that decision is reached by the United States, Canada and Newfoundland, that Great Britain would act sympathetically and would legislate to prevent British trawlers from coming on this side. That is the action that the Canadian fishermen on the Atlantic coast desire this Government to take, and that is what they wish to see accomplished. Any step in that direction will meet with their enthusiastic support. I am sorry that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House do not seem inclined to take that view of the matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Can my hon. friend suggest any reason why the prohibition contained in sub-section (c) as to doing certain business in a Canadian port is not limited to steam trawlers but applies generally to all vessels?

Mr. JAMESON: I think that what I said a moment ago in respect to that matter is an answer to the hon. gentleman's question. In the Maritime provinces we are about three hundred miles nearer to the valuable fishing grounds of the Atlantic than, let us say, our American neighbours. Is it right that we should give to others than our own fishermen the advantage of our geographical position? Is it right that we should leave our ports open for foreign vessels to use as bases of operation?

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is not against the Americans, because they come into our harbours and buy supplies under a license; it must be intended to apply against other nations.

Mr. JAMESON: That license must be renewed every year and it might be discontinued at some future time. I cannot see any reasonable objection to this legislation beyond the point made by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) namely that there is a certain amount of business done, locally, with these French fishing vessels which might be of advantage to the community particularly interested. From that point of view alone he would be justified in making the representations which he has made, although I think he has gone a little further in objecting to the legislation than he might probably have done, with regard to that. There cannot be any correction of the difficulties which our fishermen are subjected to in the Maritime provinces, by the steam trawlers, without a readjustment of conditions, and that might possibly cause some disadvantage in certain localities. I think that the Bill, taken as a whole, is one which will meet with the approval of the great majority of the fishermen of the Maritime provinces, and more especially those from the province of Nova Scotia, who have been particularly concerned over this steam trawling menace. Anything which will have a tendency to lessen the number of steam trawlers coming to our waters or operating over the fishing banks adjacent to our coasts, although they might be outside of our territorial waters, will meet with their enthusiastic support.

Mr. CARVELL: It seems to me that the ordinary construction of this section 10, while no doubt it is aimed at steam trawlers or probably at fishing vessels, is capable of being aimed at any vessel which sails the sea. I should like my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) to consider this. I am not trying to obstruct this Bill, but I do not think we should have legislation placed on the statute-books which might be used as a means of unfairness later on. This section reads:

> Every ship, vessel or boat which is foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, which——

Now I will go down to sub-section (c):

> —having entered such waters for a purpose permitted by treaty or convention or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada for the time being in force, and not being thereto permitted by such treaty, convention or law——

Suppose a German liner comes into the port of Halifax, on account of stress of weather, or an American pleasure yacht comes into the port of St. John or any of the maritime ports as a matter of pleasure, and they want to buy ice or other supplies. Does the minister think that this section would go far enough to make them liable to the provision that the vessel—> —shall, together with the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores and cargo thereof, be forfeited.

Would a vessel such as I have described be permitted by any treaty, convention or law, to purchase ice or supplies, if it came into the port of St. John or of Halifax?

Mr. HAZEN: This section is only to be applied to vessels engaged in the fishing trade.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It does not say so.

Mr. HAZEN: There is no objection to adding a word that will make it perfectly clear that such is the intention.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the hon. minister concur with my view?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not say that I concur with my hon. friend's view; but I can add the word that will make it clear that the section only refers to fishing vessels.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am rather in sympathy with the object of this legislation; but to be very frank, I am rather struck with what has been revealed to the House during the discussion this afternoon. My hon. friend will understand that I have some feeling for the Frenchmen. As we have a treaty with France, and as it is a very friendly nation, I think it will be a pity if we pass such legislation against the French fishermen. I do not say that it is the object of this legislation to do so; but I can see from the remarks made by—

Mr. HAZEN: At the present time no American fishing vessel can come into our ports except on paying a license. Why should we treat the vessels of other countries differently from those of the United States? This Bill is absolutely general in its operation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not say that I will not support the Bill finally; but I should like to get more information as to the amount of business those French trawlers are doing in the ports of the Maritime provinces. Some of my friends from the Maritime provinces are doing a good business with them. We have a treaty with France; we are doing our best to improve our trade with that country, and it will be a great pity if we curtail the business that we have with the French people. I would suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he let the Bill stand for a day or so in order to give us some statistics about the amount of trade carried on in the various ports with those trawlers, not only the French but those of other nations. We might then see to what extent the interests at stake are hurt by this legislation. I think there will be much friction if it is carried out. I do not object to the Bill primarily; I think it is good legislation; but as to that phase of it, it strikes me as being a little too vexatious. My friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) states that it affects the port of North Sydney to the extent of $100,000 to $150,000 a year.

Mr. HAZEN: The information we have in the department is that since the advent of steam trawling, this trade has been practically confined to the purchase of coal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the matter come to the attention of the Minister of Justice, and does he approve of the section as it stands? The hon. gentleman will see that it applies to every ship that comes into Canadian waters and buys any supplies of any kind, unless it is expressly permitted by the treaty or by some law to do so.

Mr. HAZEN: I have told my hon. friend that it was intended to apply to fishing vessels.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman limit it to steam trawlers?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: I presume the answer of the Minister of Marine covers the practical point referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley), and that an answer from me, is not necessary. However, I will say that, as the section stands, and as pointed out by the hon. gentleman it would seem to be desirable, if it is not intended to cover other vessels, to limit it, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has expressed himself as ready to do. And, in a general way, I would be inclined, on first reading, to think that it would apply to any vessel.

Mr. LOGGIE: I understand that the object is to minimize the injury done by trawlers. It seems to me that unless we control our Canadian vessels and British vessels we do not gain very much by this kind of legislation. Would it not be in the interest of all concerned if an Act were passed, to be brought into operation later, and in the meantime an arrangement made with the British people regarding British vessels, and some legislation made with regard to our own? Then the law could be brought into force by Order in Council.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Digby pointed out that we were rather negligent in opposing this Bill. It is quite a long time since this Bill was read the first time, but possibly the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will remember that I asked him if this Bill was to be sent to the committee which usually deals with questions of this kind, the Marine and Fisheries Committee. His reply was that as this was a Government measure and consequently would not necessarily go to the committee. I think it was said to the minister that Government Bills very often go to committee. My purpose was to give our people, or any people who are interested, an opportunity to come before the committee. I did not lose sight of the point raised by the hon. member for Digby. Another point he made is one that I as a lawyer might explain. I desire to state what I really did say and what I meant. The hon. member stated that I said that we had no jurisdiction to legislate in regard to territorial waters of Canada— that is practically what he said. I said nothing of the kind. What I do say and what I did mean, is that we have no right within navigable waters except such as we make by legislation within our jurisdiction or such rights as are given us by treaty. We can make laws governing our own territorial waters, presuming these laws to be intra vires of this Parliament. We can obtain rights over territorial waters, or any waters by treaty, if all parties interested in those waters are agreed and become parties to the arrangement or treaty. And, as a matter of law, I state, that, in the open sea, unless there is some right given to the individual by reason of statute or treaty, everybody has the same rights there. That is the position I take, and I think it is the only sound commonsense view.

Mr. JAMESON: As I understood it the hon. gentleman's remarks they applied to the waters meant to be dealt with by this Bill, and I understand that these are purely territorial waters.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have stated my position, and I think my hon. friend from Digby understands what I mean. As to the other point, that we neglected this Bill, I wish to say that I did not neglect it. I sent a copy of it to the French consul in my town—sent three copies so as to give him an opportunity of sending it home to his people in France. I might state that our French consul is not merely a citizen of our own appointed to the office, but a gentleman born and educated in the old land and residing in our town as French consul for the district, particularly for Sydney, Sydney Harbour and North Sydney. After consulting with his people in France, he writes me a letter. I think it right I should read that letter to the minister so that he may see the view the French consul takes.

Agence Consulaire de France,
North Sydney, C.B., Canada,
January 28, 1913.

Dear Mr. McKenzie:—

I am in receipt of yours of the 23rd, for which I beg to thank you. At present, French fishing vessels of all kinds, including steam trawlers, are allowed to enter Canadian ports and purchase bait, ice, seine, lines and coal, or any other supplies or outfit, and also to discharge their officers, seamen, and fishermen, or any other part of the crew. Under the amendment to the Act which you enclose I do not think this would any longer be permitted, as I am not aware of the existence of any treaty between Canada and France which permits these privileges.

The passage of this amendment would mean quite a loss to the ports of North Sydney, Magdalen Islands. Gabarouse, St. Anne, and, in fact, all the ports of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia. In the spring, a large fleet of boats, out of this port, as well as the other ports mentioned, are engaged in herring fishing for bait and they find a ready market for bait from French ships from St. Pierre and France. This continues throughout the whole summer and last summer I advanced $750 to one vessel alone to purchase bait at Gabarouse.

Last summer, fourteen French steam trawlers practically made North Sydney their headquarters and I calculated the amount of money they spent at the port as being considerably over $100,000 for coal and supplies.

You will understand from the above that the fishermen at all the ports mentioned are vitally interested in this question and that the removal of the fishery trade from these ports, and particularly the port of North Sydney, would be a very severe loss.

Thanking you again for your courtesy in bringing this matter to my notice,

I am, yours truly,
E. Lanoit,
French consul.

I did everything I could in bringing this matter to the notice of the proper authorities and getting what information I could in regard to it so I do not fall within the criticism of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) as having neglected this matter. I wanted to have it come before a committee but failing to get it there by the ruling of the minister, I waited until the matter came up in this form and secured such information as I could to place before the committee.

Mr. JAMESON: The hon. gentleman has misunderstood me. What I meant was that this discussion had gone on for some time before the points of the hon. gentleman were brought forward; it was not that I thought the hon. gentleman had neglected to communicate with his constituency.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I hope the hon. member for Digby does not think that any hon. member on this side is obstructing the Bill because there is no such purpose among my hon. friends. The hon. member for Digby endeavoured to give this discussion a political complexion a few minutes ago which I regret because I tried to deal with the question with an open mind and to avoid anything like politics with regard to it. But this question of steam trawling was made a political foot-ball by the hon. member for Digby and his associates in Nova Scotia. Resolutions were passed at their conventions in Nova Scotia condemning this method of fishing and promises were made that if they got into power the steam trawlers would be driven from the sea. On the coast of my county I was hounded by friends of hon. gentlemen opposite and condemned by them for not doing more than I was endeavouring to do in the House to prohibit steam trawling in Canadian waters. I do not think it lies within the right of the hon. member for Digby to throw accusations at hon. members on this side. The record of the Liberal party on this matter of steam trawling is better than the record, so far, of my hon. friends opposite. A very few weeks after the steam trawler appeared in Canadian waters an Order in Council was passed by the late Government prohibiting steam trawling in bays, harbours and coast waters of Canada on the Atlantic and the Pacific and it was supposed that that exhausted their power in regard to the prohibition of steam trawling. An attempt was made to secure from the United States and Great Britain and France an international arrangement by which steam trawling would be prohibited in the deep sea waters. That was started about the time my hon. friends came into power; that was left as a legacy to the Minister of Marine to carry forward and I was pleased to see that he was making some attempt although a very trifling and ineffectual one to redeem some of the promises made by his party while in power; but I must resent any statement of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) that there is any reflection to be passed on hon. members on this side in regard to their conduct in reference to this question. When this question was discussed in Nova Scotia very drastic proposals were made by the junior member for Halifax, (Mr. Crosby) and others in regard to it. One was that fish caught by steam trawlers should not be landed on the coast of Canada and we were condemned or accused for not prohibiting Canadian vessels. It was said: If you do not prohibit Canadian vessels, what is the use of talking about a convention with France or the United States? Begin at home. That was the policy of my hon. friends when in opposition. There is nothing in this proposal that touches Canadian registered steam trawlers at all, or British steam trawlers, and these are the only ones operated in Nova Scotia. I am not specially interested in steam trawlers on the banks of Newfoundland, one hundred miles from the coast. Of course they may be injurious to the deep sea fishermen.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member for North Cape Breton has read a letter saying that fourteen steam trawlers from France were purchasing supplies at Sydney.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They were fishing on the grand banks and not on the coast of Canada. The French trawler never interferes with the in-shore fisherman because the French trawler never gets near enough to him but he operates in deep water on the banks which are situated south of the island of Newfoundland, one hundred miles from the coast of Canada.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. LESPERANCE moved third reading of Bill No. 20, respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I intend to propose an amendment to this Bill along the line of regulating the capitalization of the company to a further degree than that provided in the Bill as it now stands. This company is performing a public service in the way of transportation by lake and river, covering a great length of country from the head of lake Superior down through all the lakes and the St. Lawrence to at least the Saguenay river. It is a transportation company performing a public service, and the tolls that are charged for the public service performed are governed very much by the capitalization of the company, by the dividends that the company has to earn in order to provide interest on its capital. If the capital is large, the dividend requirements and the interest requirements must be large. Consequently the tolls charged by the company must be increased; whereas, if the company has a moderate capitalization and especially a capitalization composed of securities that are issued at a low rate, the tolls must be lower, or to put it in another way, can be lowered, because the dividend and interest requirements are not so great. Therefore, the public are largely benefited by the low capitalization.

It has been found all the world over in connection with transportation and all other public franchise companies that a regulation of the capitalization has had that result. The great movement in the United States now in the way of reduction of the charges in connection with transportation companies is in the direction of trying to get a recapitalization of the companies, and if possible to get a large amount of the water out of the capital that has been injected into it in the past. I do not for a moment say that the proposed increase of the capitalization of this company is for water purposes. I do not know; but certainly before they are allowed to increase their capital stock I say they ought to give, to some public body, a sufficient reason for doing so, and I would suggest that the public body be the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. We have established that board to regulate transportation companies. They have now charge of the rates of those companies; they have charge of the service. Every form that the service takes with respect to the public is governed by the Railway Commission. The conduct of the transportation companies towards the public in the way of construction and the operation of their lines is under the control of the commission, and to my mind it would be a good thing if this transportation company and every other transportation company were put under the control of the commission in the matter of capitalization. I come from a part of the country where this transportation company performs a very large service. To give some idea of its ramifications I wish to say that it represents an enormous merger. The Richelieu and Ontario Company is made up of what was formerly the line of boats that plied between Quebec and Saguenay, the line that plied between Montreal and Quebec, the line that plied between Hamilton and Montreal, and it now includes the Hamilton and Toronto boats, and the Toronto and Niagara boats, while it has also taken in all the old boats on the upper lakes. So that up to the present time it has absorbed a great many local boat lines, merging these into one large company. These boats do a very large service both as regards passenger and freight traffic on lake Ontario, especially out of the city of Toronto, and particularly in connection with the fruit growers' trade that centres in the Niagara peninsula.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend referred a moment ago to the new legislation in some of the states in the union. The other day I met the president of the Delaware and Hudson railway and he spoke to me of certain legislation which existed in the state of New York. My hon. friend mentioned the state of Massachusetts; does legislation exist also in the state of New York whereby a company cannot increase its capital before going before the commission?

Mr. MACLEAN: I will come to that in a moment. This transportation company, in which we in western Ontario are so largely interested, is also arranging some organization with a line of boats on the Atlantic; at least so I read in the newspapers. The Furness interest, as it is called, which is connected with certain lines of steamers on the Atlantic, is being more or less associated with the Richelieu and Ontario, which is an inland navigation company; and so the whole thing looks to me like a very large merger. Unless the public interest is protected in some way it will be absolutely to the disadvantage of the shippers and farmers of Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And it works in close connection with the railway companies.

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, it also works in close connection with the railway companies. Now the substantial feature in connection with transportation in this country last year and this year is the enormous increase in ocean freight rates in connection with the grain grown in our Canadian West. There is an increase of six cents a bushel, and this year has witnessed a decline in the price of the wheat of the West. What between the decline in the price of wheat in the West and the advance in the cost of transportation in the way of ocean rates, we have almost reached a point when it will not pay to raise wheat in the West.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Unless we have a larger market.

Mr. MACLEAN: Well, we will say it will be much more difficult for the western farmers to raise wheat, and I hope my hon. friends from the West will join me in this. I say that if freight rates continue to increase, if we allow the transportation companies to jump up the trans-Atlantic rates by six cents in the year without coming under control and the price of wheat continues to go down by reason of competition with other countries, we are very near the limit at which it will not pay to raise wheat in the West.

Mr. BOYCE: Does my hon. friend contend that the Railway Commission has jurisdiction to fix or control the rates of those companies at the present time?

Mr. MACLEAN: If they have not, they should have. They control all the steamship rates wherever they are connected with railways. If we have not control, I hope my hon. friend will see to it that we get control.

Mr. BOYCE: If we have not control, and I understand we have not—the Railway Act is quite clear on that point—does my hon. friend contend that we should give control under this particular legislation or with reference to this particular company, and not with reference to companies generally?

Mr. MACLEAN: We have largely control of those steamship companies by reason of their connection with railways.

Mr. BOYCE: It could be done by the general Act.

Mr. MACLEAN: In so far as they are connected with the railways, and in so far as we have not control, the Railway Act is defective, and it is up to Parliament to get control, for the great thing for the farmers in the West and for all Canada is to have control of all the railways and steamship companies, to have control of their capitalization, so that their charges will not be exorbitant as they have been in the past. That the great Canadian Pacific railway has unnecessarily watered its stock to the extent it has done with its enormous cash reserves, that it should have done what it has done in the way of capitalization is a reason why we should regulate every company that comes before us; and now we have this one, we should regulate it.

Mr. BOYCE: Not by special legislation.

Mr. MACLEAN: We will start here. If to-night we declare the principle that the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company must be regulated as to its capitalization it will be an intimation to all other companies that they must come under the same rule. We cannot wait until we get a comprehensive measure. It is a fine thing to roll in the mouth this comprehensive measure. It will come some day, but you can only solve these problems as they present themselves, and this one has presented itself to-night in connection with the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. No injury would be done to that company if it had to go to the Railway Commission for authorization of an increase in its capital.

The late Postmaster General asked me: What about the state of New York? No transportation or public service company in the state of New York can increase its capital stock without the authorization of the Public Service Commission of that state. If any such company goes there for an increase of its capital stock, it has to show the commissioners that it needs the money, the purpose for which it needs the money and it must also show how it can be raised with the least charge on those who use the public service. If it can get the money on a bond issue of four per cent it is told to issue bonds so that the increase in the traffic charges by reason of the increase in capital is only four per cent, whereas if dividends of ten or fifteen per cent have to be paid on an increase in the share capital the traffic charges must be accordingly increased. In the state of New York they would not repeal that law and it promises to become a general law as the outcome of the investigations that have been made in the United States. I believe that the law of most account that will be passed within the next year or two at Washington will be a law to control the capitalization of public service companies upon the principal that if the capitalization is regulated the tolls will be governed accordingly.

To come back to the question of excessive charges in connection with western and all Canadian produce on the Atlantic, if we do not protest now, or if we do not in some way try to keep control of these companies and get more power over them, not only in regard to their capitalization, but in regard to their tolls, the trade of this country will be in danger. There is every likelihood that the settlement of the Canadian West will be retarded because, as I pointed out out a few minutes ago, the Canadian Pacific railway, by reason of the use of the capital it has accumulated out of unnecessary issues of stock, will merge everything. The first thing we know the inland transportation lines will be in this Canadian Pacific railway merger. There will be no competition with the railways by means of these boats and we must not shut our eyes to the importance of at least preserving our water transportation. We see how rapidly these mergers are being organized. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company has probably ten other lines amalgamated with it at this present moment. It has an alliance on the Atlantic with the Furness people, to-morrow it may have an alliance with the Canadian Pacific railway and then good-bye to competition by lake and river with the railways. That competition extends from the head of lake Superior right down to the Saguenay river.

It has been argued that if we undertake to control any one company, or to regulate its capitalization, we interfere with the standing of our companies in this country. It was stated here the other night, we will be told to-night as we are told nearly every day in the newspaper press of the country, that we must not disturb the credit of the big corporations of the country by attempting to regulate them. The big corporations are unjustly treating the people by excessive charges, excessive earnings and unnecessary capitalization. It is time they were regulated. If the rights of the public are to be secondary to the rights of property and to the rights of companies then it is time that we told the people that this is the attitude of Parliament towards these things. But, I take it that the thing which is of primary interest in this country is the welfare of the people, that if the welfare of the people is concerned in a matter of this kind these companies will have to submit to some regulation. Anyway, I say now and once for all, that the rights of the public are more than the rights of companies and more than the credit of the country, if it comes down to that. We have been doing everything in Parliament for a great many years but trying to remove the grievances that exist in connection with corporations. We have not yet got so far as to give the people of the West the same railway charges that we give to the people in the East. We are discriminating against that western country all along the line, in the matter of telegraph, express and freight charges and everything of that nature. We are told we must submit to that because the credit of the country depends upon it, we are told that we must not interfere with the Canadian Pacific railway's rights to cut melons. This Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company can cut a melon out of its $5,000,000 issue of stock that we propose to sanction, it can distribute that $5,000,000 among the shareholders of the company, or it can sell it to these shareholders at twenty-five cents on the dollar or it can use the money for merger purposes that may not be in the interest of the public.

Before the capitalization of this company is allowed to be used in that way we should insist that it must get the consent of some proper body, like that which exists in the state of New York, to increase its capital and that it should give the reason why. The company will suffer no loss by having to appear before the Railway Commission. It will be fairly and justly dealt with. While I am proposing an amendment which shall apply to an individual company, I say that regulation must start some time and I propose to start at every opportunity that comes up. If the Canadian Pacific railway come here for any kind of a Bill this year, I intend to try and put into that Bill that its capitalization shall be subject to regulation in the same way. It is said: Oh, but you are unjustly discriminating against all the roads and you are putting a burden on one. As I say, we have to start somewhere. We cannot get a comprehensive law in this country, but if we start right now, if we make this change to-night, there will be no trouble hereafter in regulating the capitalization of these companies, while, if we refuse to-night to regulate the capitalization of this transportation company—and it is no worse but perhaps better than others—we simply whitewash the Canadian Pacific railway's recent melon-cutting up to the extent of $200,000,000. That company has unjustly issued $200,000,000 of stock within the last few years when it might have issued debenture stock at a much lower rate of interest. Not all of the proceeds of that stock went into the treasury of the company but a large portion went into the pockets of the shareholders and the people who used the road must pay dividends on that stock forever after. It is a rank injustice to the people of the country. This company before us to-night will be trying to do the same thing. We must not wait until we find a comprehensive measure applicable to all companies, although I am ready to join with any person in devising a comprehensive measure if it can be brought about. If we neglect to-night to regulate this company we whitewash the Canadian Pacific railway. We should tell all these companies that they are not to cut melons or unnecessarily increase their capital stock until such time as a comprehensive measure is passed by this House.

I could take up all night with this question but the House understands it and I do not wish to take up the time. I would just like to read a paragraph from a document that was sent to me yesterday. It is marvellous the letters and communications that come to me with respect to questions of this kind and my correspondence is rather interesting. It is coming from all quarters. I have here a pamphlet sent to me by a mining engineer who has investigated the Porcupine gold fields.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does he belong to the same clan?

Mr. MACLEAN: He is of the Maclean clan; we are all together, running like the horses of the sun all abreast. Speaking of his overcapitalization in connection with mining, he shows what has happened in other directions, and he says:

> And not alone in connection with mining deals is this abuse prevalent. In the case of many great commercial flotations, including railways and industrials, trusts and securities companies, &c., there is scarcely any legal limit to the amount of water that may be injected or that has been injected, and it may be readily believed that this very practice has a real bearing on the question of social economics, and is an important factor in causing many disputes between labour and capital. Whatever the law may say, the practice cannot be defended on moral grounds, and the financial juggling which invariably accompanies it, is merely a thinly-disguised method of highway robbery, whereby real money is transferred either from the pockets of the many investors to the few promoters, or from the pockets of the workers or of the consumers in the shape of dividends to holders of scrip which represents absolutely nothing but water, so-called. So long as the law countenances these methods, just so long will they continue, therefore it behooves those who disapprove to raise a voice of protest until reform is inaugurated and this particular form of high finance placed in the category to which it properly belongs.

I want to put the financing of our transportation companies and of all public service companies under the control of the Railway Commission or some other competent authority. We had that principle affirmed here the other night when the member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) with his wide experience, told us that the day had come for just such a thing, the member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) spoke in the same way, and the Prime Minister said the Government had the matter under consideration and proposed to study it from both points of view. That is all very well, but some of us have studied it and those who do know from their study of the experience in other countries, believe that the day has come now for such an amendment as I propose to this Bill. I propose that we should commence this very night in connection with this company. Later on, when the Minister of Railways brings in his Bill for an amendment of the Railway Act, I intend to put a clause in that, if I have the opportunity, giving the regulation of the capitalization of all these companies to the Railway Board. In the meantime, to-night I have an opportunity of putting it into the Bill of the Richelieu and Ontario Company without any detriment to that company. No harm will come to the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company by reason of this amendment and I ask the promoters of the Bill to accept it. If they accept it they will be the first company to realize that the public have rights in this matter, and that the capitalization of all these companies should be under control. The amendment I shall propose is practically the law of the state of New York. In that state any company wishing to increase its capital would have to go through the process which I set out in my amendment. In the meantime I intend that the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation tion Company—a company which is probably rendering as high a service as any other transportation company in this country—should be regulated with regard to its capitalization. In view of the fact that we have not a general and comprehensive measure dealing with the question I propose to deal with these companies in detail as they come before us in this House. We have in the Railway Committee an example of just such a thing, for when a Bill comes before that committee a number of model clauses are now inserted in it. The provisions in these model clauses do not apply to the old companies, but every new company that comes to that committee, and, for that matter, every old company which comes for an amendment of its charter, is compelled to accept these model clauses and gradually they are being extended to all companies. I trust that eventually these model clauses will be incorporated in a general Act. We are making progress; we are bringing all these companies constantly under the Railway Act. If we start now to make an additional model clause such as I propose in this amendment, and if we say that each company that comes before us shall be under the control of the Railway Commission with regard to its capitalization, we will be giving notice to roads like the Canadian Pacific railway that their capitalization hereafter must be subject to the control of Parliament. The greatest offence that has been perpetrated in this country against the public interest has been the recent increase in the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific railway. There was no control over the capitalization of that company and therefore it did what it liked: it issued stock which is likely to receive ten per cent dividends or even more, at a price less than it would produce in the open money market. The rights of that company, or the rake-off, or the cutting of the melon, went into the pockets of the shareholders, and no corresponding relief went to the users of the road. It is a great public scandal; it has got to be stopped, and if we start to-night and regulate this company we will be ready to regulate the Canadian Pacific railway and all the other railroads, until in the end we have secured control over all these transportation companies. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Turriff:

That said Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to amend the same by adding to subsection 2 of section 1 the following:—

And until the company shall obtain an order from the Railway Commission of Canada authorizing such issues and the amount thereof, and stating that, in the opinion of the commission, the use of the capital to be secured by the issue of such stock is reasonably required for the said purposes of the corporation. For the purpose of enabling it to determine whether it should issue such an order, the commission shall make such inquiry or investigation, hold such hearings and examine such witnesses, books, papers, documents or contracts as it may deem of importance, in enabling it to reach a determination.

Mr. MACLEAN (S. York).

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): In seconding this amendment and supporting it in a few words, I do not feel that I am in the slightest degree doing anything against the interests of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. We heard from the president of that company the other day that the stock had always been sold at par; that there never had been a drop of water in the company; that the stock which is now to be issued is to be sold at par, and that it was to be used altogether in the interests of the company to enable them to extend their work. If that is a fact—and I have not the slightest reason for doubting it—then there can be no possible hurt or harm coming to the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company by telling them to go to the Railway Commission and to put their case before them, and get the necessary authority to carry out their project. I agree with everything my hon. friend from South York has said, and more particularly with his statements in connection with the rates on western wheat. Last season the cost of producing a bushel of wheat in each of the three prairie provinces just about equalled the price received. As I stated the other day, during the past season, it cost from six to eight cents more o carry a bushel of wheat from Fort William to Liverpool than it did during the previous season. This wheat comes over one of the railroads from the wheat fields to Fort William, thence by boat to Montreal and then on the ocean liners. In the Montreal papers a couple of days ago it was stated that the control of this Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company was about to pass into the hands of the Furness people. It is currently reported that the Canadian Pacific railway has bought out the Allan line of steamships. The position is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and this Furness Company, when it gets control of the huge Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, which has already got its hands on, half a dozen or a dozen other companies, under a merger, will control the output of the three prairie provinces. If in one year the price of taking that wheat from Fort William has been raised six to eight cents a bushel, what may happen when practically all competition is eliminated? I can quite understand my right hon. friend the leader of the Government not wishing to single out any one particular company; but, if he will follow the advice of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) and take up the case of each of these companies as they come forward for legislation, and they are coming every week of the year, it will not be long until we will have these companies pretty well under control. I can assure this Government that the cost of production of wheat and the price the farmer receives for it have got so nearly alike that, if the freight rates go any higher, there is going to be not a profit but a loss in the production of wheat; and it is the interests of one or two companies now against the interests of seventy-five or a hundred thousand farmers in the prairie provinces. It is for this reason I am opposing this legislation; although I do not wish in the slightest degree to hamper or hurt the company. It is a big company, doing a big business, and if the capital that it is proposed to give them is used as my hon. friend the president of the company says it is going to be used, then I wish the company all success; but if the capital is going to be used for the purpose of further merging and raising the freight rate on wheat from Fort William to Liverpool, then I wish to see them go before some authority. If the Railway Commission is not the best authority, if something better can be found in the near future, it will be an easy matter to put the company under some new legislation in that respect. In the meantime we cannot do anything better than put that little restriction on them; it will not interfere with them, because as the promoter of the Bill, my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Lespérance) stated the other day, they purpose doing everything right in connection with this matter. We are therefore doing them no injustice whatever; we are taking a step in advance, and it will be to the advantage of the whole of the Canadian people.

Mr. BOYCE: It seems to me that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) in its wording does not carry out what he is contending for, and what my hon. friend who has just taken his seat is contending for. By the wording of the amendment, if it were carried by the House, it is impossible to carry into effect what was proposed in the speech of my hon. friend who introduced the amendment. If the amendment were carried, subsection 2 would read:

> The directors may increase the amount of the capital stock at any time to an amount not exceeding fifteen million dollars; but the stock shall not be increased until the resolution of the board of directors authorizing such increase has first been submitted to and confirmed by two-thirds in value of the shareholders present or represented at a special general meeting of the shareholders duly called for that purpose.
> And until the company shall obtain an order from the Railway Commission of Canada authorizing such issues and the amount thereof, and stating that, in the opinion of the commission, the use of the capital to be secured by the issue of such stock is reasonably required for the said purpose of the corporation——

And so on according to the reading of the resolution. In the first place, there is no such body that I know of as that mentioned in the amendment, and the amendment is out of order in that respect. There is no such body as the Railway Commission; it is improperly designated in the amendment, and that is one objection I have to it. The Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada has certain statutory powers; it has certain discretionary rights and privileges within the limits of its jurisdiction; but no such powers as these does it possess. Therefore, the amendment proposed by my hon. friend is that this Parliament is clothing the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company's board of directors with certain privileges, which, however, are not to be exercised until another body, which has no jurisdiction to give that power, has ratified that power and given directions as to how that is to be carried out, in short that Parliament clothes the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company with power to increase its capital stock; but says at the same time that that power shall not be exercised until a body, which has no jurisdiction whatever to do so, has regulated the amount of that increase and the manner in which the issue shall take place. My hon. friend the member for South York is a very ardent student of such questions; and some of the platitudes which he has uttered certainly apply as general principles to the conditions which exist in this country; but they are not applicable, and I contend cannot be made applicable to this particular legislation. It would be a manifest hardship to apply them under the circumstances. What my hon. friend should do is to introduce an amendment to the Railway Act. The idea of my hon. friend is to start right and go ahead. If my hon. friend gets in wrong, to use the vernacular, he will cause a lot of trouble and will be unable to achieve the very laudable object of serving the majority of the public in that matter, which he professes to do by these means. I contend that this House cannot attempt in private legislation to place upon the Board of Railway Commissioners a duty which it does not have and cannot get by its general powers under the Railway Act of Canada. Therefore the amendment proposed by my hon. friend, for the reason that I have mentioned, is absolutely futile; it can confer no benefits whatever on the public. The Railway Commission can do nothing under it; the Railway Commission cannot give its consent until the general Railway Act is amended. There is only one thing to do, and that is, if this be an evil, if it be desired to remedy that evil, let this House take into consideration the proper method of remedying that evil and remedying it in a general way so that it will apply to all companies and not apply improperly, harshly, unnecessarily and uselessly to one company. My hon. friend quoted the procedure in the state of New York and in other legislatures of the United States of America. But he forgets, what members of this House will bear in mind, that in the state of New York a Bill of this kind goes automatically to a commission and is not dealt with by a committee of the House which is directly responsible to the people. This House is directly responsible to the people. We are promoting legislation under this Bill respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company; it is private Bill legislation. We cannot by this legislation introduce a provision applicable to all companies. And as it is not applicable to all companies, so it is ineffective as applied to this company, because, were it passed, the Railway Commission would have no power or jurisdiction to take steps under it. Therefore, the radical result would be to grant a power which it is impossible to carry out, because a board improperly named in the resolution—not existent as named in the resolution—would be unable by reason of want of jurisdiction to act upon it. Therefore, the amendment is improperly drawn, it is irregular, and, for the general reasons I have attempted to show, should not be made applicable to this measure.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N. B.): I stated, when my hon. friend from South York made his suggestion in Committee of the Whole, that I would support an amendment such as he proposed to introduce if he presented it on the third reading; and I wish now to deal briefly with my reasons for supporting that amendment. I have been somewhat surprised at the legal argument put forward by my hon. friend from West Algoma (Mr. Boyce), especially in view of the fact that that hon. gentleman, I understand, is expecting, in the very near future, to occupy a very high prominent position on the legal side of the Government of this country. In view of that fact, I think his opinion as to the jurisdiction and powers of this Parliament require more than a passing notice. I am afraid he stated his opinion off-hand and without consulting the statutes. I know that when he reaches that important position to which I have referred, he will have a staff of well-trained clerks under him to look up these matters for him. At present, I will do that, and would refer him therefore to section 10 of the Railway Act, chapter 37 of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1906. It says:

> There shall be a commission, to be known as the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, consisting of three members appointed by the Governor in Council.

I presume the hon. gentleman knows that by amendment the number of the board has since been increased.

> Such commission shall be a court of record, and have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

It goes on to provide for their constitution—there shall be a secretary with duties so and so—how appeals are to be taken from their decisions—how the decision of the first commission as a matter of law shall govern, and various other matters which it will take too long to go over. Supposing that this Parliament stated that before the stock of this company should be issued the matter must be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and the certificate of the Supreme Court obtained, would the hon. gentleman say that the Parliament of Canada would have no jurisdiction to pass such a law, or that if it did pass it the Supreme Court would have no authority to act upon it? He might just as well argue that as to argue that the Board of Railway Commissioners would have no power to use the power which Parliament gave to them. I think he will require no further argument to show that his technical objections are not well founded. As to the merits of the case—

Mr. BOYCE: Before the hon. gentleman leaves that question, does he contend that under the Railway Act the Railway Commission would have power to do with regard to any company what it is proposed it shall have power to do under this Act?

Mr. CARVELL: No, that is the very thing we are doing now. We are proposing to give them power under this Act. The hon. gentleman forgets that we are in Parliament now. We are a part of the machinery which makes laws in this country. The only way you can make a law for the Dominion of Canada is by having it passed in the House of Commons and in the Senate and having it signed by His Royal Highness. And it is proposed that the Parliament of Canada in the exercise of its functions and jurisdiction under the British North America Act shall make a law to give the Railway Commission certain powers which they have not now.

Mr. BOYCE: By this amendment?

Mr. CARVELL: Let me give the hon. gentleman an illustration. Some years ago, probably in 1906 or 1907, we passed a law handing over the telegraph companies to the Railway Commission.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And cables?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and cables. Why, if this Parliament has power to legislate on the matter at all it has power to state the conditions under which this stock shall be issued. Parliament might, if it chose, make it a condition precedent to the issue of this stock that the signature of John Jones should first be obtained, or a decision of the Supreme Court. And it has the same right to say that the Board of Railway Commissioners shall consider this matter, and give a certificate, as the hon. member for South York proposes. I do not think the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) wishes me to argue the proposition any further.

Now, as I was saying, let us come to the merits of the case. When this Bill was before the Committee of the Whole, I objected as strenuously as I knew how to the passage of the Bill, because it gave this company the right to dispose of its stock as it had a mind to, for such prices as it pleased, and to use the money not merely for the extension of the service and for the benefit of the corporation and undertaking, but, if it chose, to buy the securities of any other company, to use it for amalgamating with any other company, or to use for going into the railway business or any other business. I objected to that then, and I object to it to-night. I am inclined to believe that the amendment proposed here would overcome to a large extent what I saw is wrong in this provision of the Bill. Section 2 of the Bill as it has been amended, says that the company may—temporarily they say—invest any money they have on hand practically as they deem proper. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for South York would overcome that, because it provides that before this stock can be issued, the company must satisfy the Board of Railway Commissioners that they require the money, the purpose for which they require it, and how it is going to be spent, and the board must give a certificate to that effect.

Of course the board, after taking the necessary steps to get the information, would not grant the certificate except under conditions which would insure that the money was properly invested in the undertakings of the company and therefore you would get around the difficulty which I see in the second clause of the Bill. For that reason, if for no other, I would feel like supporting the amendment. In the committee the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget) volunteered a certain amount of information as to the purposes for which this money was required, but the paucity of the information furnished is one of the strongest reasons why some such amendment as this should be made. He said that they would spend $500,000 for terminals at Fort William, $750,000 for a steamer on the upper lakes, $250,000 for terminals at Toronto and later on they expected to build a large steamer which would cost $750,000. I do not know where that was to run. After that there was to be a steamer on the Quebec and Saguenay route, $500,000. That is altogether $2,850,000, only a bare majority of the stock this company is asking the right to issue, and if you allowed this company to carry out every improvement which the hon. member stated they had in contemplation, and he made it plain it might be years before it would be taken up, you would only take up one-half of the authorized extension of capital. But the hon. gentleman left the committee entirely in ignorance as to what they would do with the remainder. Therefore, it comes back to the fact that there should be something done to restrict them in regard to the expenditure of this money.

Mr. LANCASTER: Then would not the proper course be to refer it back to the Select Committee, which is the proper tribunal?

Mr. CARVELL: I have no objection, not a particle.

Mr. LANCASTER: Is that not better than this amendment?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think so. I am in accord with every argument of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) to-night. In my judgment he presented an unanswerable argument as to why this provision should be incorporated in this Bill. As he said, there is no use in coming here and saying: You never did this before and therefore you should not do it to this company. There has to be a starting point somewhere. You are not singling this company out and saying it is worse than others; I believe it is better than most, that there is very little water in its stock and that it is carrying on a perfectly legitimate and proper business for Canada and we all want to see that it carries on as honourable career as it has done in the past. Therefore it seems to me that we ought to affirm this principle in this House, regardless of the Railway Committee.

An hon. MEMBER: It was not before the Railway Committee but before the Committee on Private Bills.

Mr. CARVELL: Whatever committee it goes before. The trouble is that the actions and view of the committees are not reported. I want to see the principle affirmed in this House, and to have the members on record. I want to see who are going to stand up for the people and who are going to stand up for the corporations.

CUSTOMS AND FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT.

The hour for private Bills having expired, the House resumed in Committee of the Whole the consideration of Bill No. 35, to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act.—Mr. Hazen.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The question which we were discussing at six o'clock is of such great importance to the fishermen of the maritime provinces that we cannot do better than devote a portion of our time to it. When the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) was on this side of the House he was accustomed to look on this mode of fishing as a vote-getting industry and it is difficult for him to adjust himself to the present position and refrain from using his old campaign speeches in this discussion. A discussion took place in this House on February 6, 1911—about two years ago. I shall quote some of the things which they said on that occasion. The hon. member for Digby said:

I cannot use words stronger than those used by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) in urging on the Government the necessity of taking some steps which will effectually prohibit the operation of these vessels in Canadian waters, and the landing in Canadian ports of fish caught by them.

You will note that my hon. friend refers not only to the prohibiting of these trawlers from working in Canadian waters but to the prohibiting of the landing of fish caught by them outside of Canadian waters. He goes on:

It may be that a large interest here and there will be prejudicially affected, but I believe that on the whole the end will justify the means; that the fisheries will be conserved and that the interests of the fishermen, which are worthy of the best consideration which can be bestowed on them by this House, will be benefited. I urge on the minister and the House that some steps be taken to protect the Atlantic fisheries of Canada by preventing the landing of fish caught in the trawls at Canadian ports and prohibiting within the three-mile limit the operation of these steam trawlers.

At the time the hon. member made that speech, the operation of steam trawlers within the three-mile limit had already been prohibited by the late Government but the hon. member also proposed that we should prohibit the landing of fish caught by the steam trawlers outside of the three-mile limit. My hon. friend the then junior member for Halifax, Mr. Crosby, made a long speech in which he endeavoured to lay down the policy of the Conservatives opposition at that time on this important question.

Among other things Mr. Crosby said:

If this Government could satisfy the hon. member for Guysborough and the hon. member for Antigonish by simply passing a minute of the council to say that they were not going to allow any steam trawlers to fish inside the three-mile limit they certainly could not satisfy the fishermen I represent by any such limitation. Nor could they satisfy the fishermen of Guysborough or Antigonish, or of any county in the maritime provinces. When my hon. friends get up and try to cover their tracks in this manner they must not forget that the fishermen in the maritime provinces know something about fish if they do not know very much about parliamentary affairs, and when the time comes for them to pronounce upon the position taken by these hon. gentlemen in regard to this question they will express themselves in no uncertain way.

Later on he said:

I challenge him here to-night, I defy him to contradict the statement, as I challenge the hon. member for Guysborough, that there is not a fisherman in the maritime provinces who is not against this. They are unanimous, not a single fisherman favours it, and I challenge either of these gentlemen to get up and say that I am mistaken in that view.

He was referring to the regulation existing at that date. Then he goes on:

That being the case, was it not up to this Government, in the interest of the people engaged in the fishing industry, that there should be no such thing as a steam trawler permitted in the maritime provinces? Was it not up to this Government not to pass this minute of council, not to allow them to fish outside of the three-mile limit, but to prevent them from fishing in Canada at all? If they had done that would they not have saved the fishermen of the maritime provinces?

Now, that is pretty strong language, but it shows the kind of fishing law we had to listen to when we sat on the other side of the House. If we are to judge from the speeches made by those hon. gentlemen in connection with this important question of steam trawling while they were in opposition, there were two things which they stood for. They stood for the prevention of the landing of fish caught by steam trawlers outside of the three-mile limit. I suppose we have the power to do that.

Mr. JAMESON: What does my hon. friend think about that?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am discussing the policy which my hon. friend from Digby and his colleague from Halifax said ought to be carried out when they were on this side of the House.

Mr. JAMESON: What do you think about it?

Mr. SINCLAIR: The first thing they said was that we ought to prevent the fish from being landed. The second was that we should prevent Canadian trawlers from operating. I suppose we have the power to make a law that a ship registered in Canada cannot engage in that method of fishing at all. I suppose, also, that we have the power through our Customs Act to prevent the landing of the fish caught by steam trawlers. I was curious to know if my hon. friend from Digby, now that his party is in power, and he is an influential supporter of the present Administration and chairman of a very important committee dealing with this subject stands by the position he took while he was in opposition. I may tell my hon. friend that at that time I did not take that view. I took the view that we could do more effective work by obtaining some agreement with the United States, France, and Great Britain to prohibit the catching of fish by that method on the banks and in the gulf of St. Lawrence in the places described as the spawning grounds of the fish. That was the view I took at that time, but I should be glad to do anything I can to support the Administration in any movement that is practicable and possible in connection with this important question. But as my hon. friend from Digby brought the matter forward and gave it a political appearance, I thought it was my duty to put on record the position he took when he occupied a place in the Opposition.

I wish also to draw attention to the fact that the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia looked upon this trawling question as an important issue in the elections in that province. In the county of Antigonish it was threshed out in every schoolhouse, and this was also the case in the county of Guysborough. At a convention of the Conservative party held in the town of Truro in 1909, the question was considered of sufficient importance for the provincial convention of the party to deal with. I have the minutes of the convention as reported in the organ of the party in Nova Scotia, the Halifax Herald. Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to read an extract from it:

The Liberal-Conservative party laid down their platform at a convention held at Truro June 30, 1909, as reported in the Halifax Herald, July 1, 1909. The evil of steam trawlers—E. Lavin Girroir, of Antigonish, brought up the question of protection of fishermen from steam trawlers. He said that the protection of the fishing industry within the three-mile limit is not effective, as the fish, in most cases, spawn outside the three-mile limit. The Dominion Government claims that it can do nothing outside that limit. The Government could effectually legislate against Canadian trawlers at least.

I wish my hon. friend the minister to note that statement.

Mr. HAZEN: I am paying the closest attention to my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Reading):

When they leave the steam trawlers alone they discriminate against the hook trawl fishermen. The steam trawlers are owned as a rule by wealthy companies, The poorer fishermen should be protected more effectually.

Clarence Jameson, M.P., of Digby made a splendid speech in regard to the matter, going into the subject fully. Other speakers also handled the subject, and at the conclusion the resolution following was unanimously adopted.

Here is the resolution:

We sympathize most profoundly with our fishermen in regard to the menace to our shore fisheries arising from the use of steam trawlers. The Dominion Government has failed to take action in this regard, and we condemn the local Government for failing to effectually urge the protection of our fishermen, and express the opinion that an international treaty should be promoted and such other steps taken as may effectually deal with the question.

You see, Mr. Chairman, that the statement is made here that the Dominion Government had failed to take action. Now I submit that that statement is not true.

Mr. JAMESON: Did not take effective action.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did not take action is the way it was put here. If there is anything wrong with the report in the Halifax Herald, I am subject to correction. It is not usual for a convention of a great party to make a statement like that unless it is correct. Now, the Dominion Government had not failed to take action. This convention was held on the 30th day of June, 1909. About a year before that date an order had been passed by the late Government prohibiting fishing by this method in Canadian waters.

Mr. JAMESON: What is the date of the order?

Mr. SINCLAIR: September 9, 1908. It reads:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, in virtue of the provisions of section 54 of the Fisheries Act, chapter 45 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is pleased to make and doth hereby make the following fishery regulation:—

'The use or operation of vessels known as 'steam trawlers' operating 'beam,' 'otter,' or other trawls for the purpose of catching fish, is prohibited within the three-mile limit and in the bays and harbours of Canada.

Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

That is a copy of the order which was passed nearly a year before the Conservative convention at Truro at which it was stated that the Dominion Government had failed to take action. They also took occasion at that meeting to condemn the local Government because they had not forced the Dominion Government to do something. The local Government politically was in sympathy with the Dominion Government, and they went out of their way to condemn the local Government for not having done something in regard to a matter over which they had not the slightest control. I am pointing out these matters to show you the difficulties we have to meet in connection with these gentlemen at the time when they were in opposition to the Government of the day at Ottawa. I think they will have a good deal of difficulty in squaring themselves with the fishermen on the coast of Nova Scotia if they do not do the things that they said we ought to have done at that time.

I have a good deal of information in my desk with regard to this important question. I have drawn the attention of the House on various occasions to the fact that in my opinion this destructive method of fishing ought to be prohibited if it is possible. It is injurious to the fishermen, it is also injurious to the fisheries and if allowed to go on it will drive the inshore fishermen out of business and will deplete the fisheries. In the Library I came across a work on 'Sea Fisheries' written by a French authority, Marcel Herubel. On page 108 of this work I find the following:

A steam trawler, furnished with an otter-trawl, and working about twenty hours a day at an average speed of two and a half knots an hour, and trawling three hundred days in the year, will plough up the submarine soil over an extent of about 83,000 acres—nearly 130 square miles. Thus the 213 steam trawlers owned in France would exploit some 1,780,000 acres annually, or 2,780 square miles if they did not go over the same ground twice. In the light of these calculations, based upon the data given by M. Roche, we need not be astonished at the statement of the English inspectors of fisheries: 'There were last year (1902) about 1,200 trawlers in the North sea. Supposing that each vessel fished thirteen hours a day for 280 days with a 75 feet wide, and covered 17 square miles per month, which figures are quite normal, these 1,200 trawlers would suffice to cover twice in a year the whole of the 100,000 square miles of practicable bottom in the North sea.'

Recently the English Government has held an inquiry into the emptying of the North sea, and the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries has published the results. Here they are in a few words:—Since the introduction of the otter-trawl the number of plaice caught per diem has continually decreased. Between 1903 and 1906 the takings of flat-fish fell by 40 per cent. In 1903 the English steam trawlers landed 190,000 tons of fish, and the sailing trawlers 14,000 tons. In 1906 the numbers fell respectively to 140,000 and 12,000.

That extract shows what a serious question this is with regard to the future of the fisheries on our coast and I have no doubt that the best time to deal with the question would be before this method comes to be too well established. There are not very many vessels of this class at the present time owned in Canada. I do not know how many there are. I have heard it stated that there are some operating on the Pacific coast. In a newspaper extract which I have here the statement is made that the first steam trawler had arrived on the Pacific coast

Mr. HAZEN: There are none on the Atlantic coast now owned in Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: With reference to the Pacific coast, I have here the following statement taken from the Fishing Gazette:

New York, Oct. 19, 1912.

The steam trawler Canada is expected to arrive in Vancouver this week after a voyage of nearly 100 days from Grimsby, England, and will be followed in a few days by the trawler Trymple, both of which will engage in the fisheries for the British Columbia Fisheries Company. The steam trawler, G. E. Foster, the first of the three built for the Atlin Construction Company to operate from Prince Rupert, ran successful trials at Grimsby on September 28, and has left for Victoria on the way to the north.

The crews of the three vessels have been chosen from the best fishermen in Grimsby, and their initial operations from Prince Rupert will be on the lines of investigation, in addition to commercial advantages, so that fishing charts can be compiled for future use. The establishment of the Atlin Construction Company at Prince Rupert means an enormous development and use of capital in British Columbia.

It is significant that the first steam trawler built for Canada bears the name of one of the Cabinet ministers and I would draw the attention of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) to this fact. I do not wish to be understood as being in any way opposed to the present measure. My objection to it is that it does not deal with the question in so far as the fishermen on the inshore fisheries are concerned. I do not know what injury has been done to the deep-sea fishermen of Canada by the French trawlers. This is not a question on which I have any special information. I do not know that the French trawlers are injuring the Canadian fleet of vessels working on the Grand Banks. If they are the question may be of importance to Canada in that way. I have very little sympathy with the proposal to prohibit sailing vessels from coming into Canadian ports to buy supplies. I do not think that the proposal is to the advantage of our fisheries. The sailing vessels from the United States which come into Canadian ports and trade with the people there, buying their bait and any goods that they require for their men, are doing no harm to any person. They are not an injury to the fishermen. We cannot prevent American vessels from operating on the Grand Banks. They come independently of us altogether. With the present facilities for cold storage I have no doubt that they can carry their bait with them, but if we are able to sell them bait and get their money to carry on the trade in the ports of Canada, I see no reason why we should prohibit sailing vessels from France, the United States or any country coming into the ports of Canada and buying bait and supplies. It is bringing trade to our merchants and it is not injuring our fishermen. It is giving our fishermen a market for a class of fish that is not marketable anywhere else. I never could understand why certain hon. gentlemen took the view that it would be to the advantage of Canada to prohibit these sailing vessels engaged in the fisheries from calling at our ports and carrying on trade.

Mr. JAMESON: Is the hon. gentleman in favour of a continuance of the licenses issued to American vessels under the modus vivendi?

Mr. SINCLAIR: The modus vivendi has been in operation for a great number of years and I do not see any special objection. I do not see that it is doing us any injury. The American fishermen are not competing with our fishermen in any way. There is plenty of room for them all on the Banks, they are not destroying the fisheries and they are bringing a certain amount of trade to our freezers and merchants when they come. Take the town of Canso where the fleet of American vessels come in the summer months and buy supplies, ice and bait; they are our best customers. If they were driven away we would miss them very much. The view of most of our people is that if they were driven away they would be very much missed. I have attended the fishermen's meetings, I have discussed the matter with them, and I do not think there is any feeling among the fishing population in the part of Nova Scotia I represent against American sailing vessels or French sailing vessels engaged in the fishery, calling at Canadian ports and trading with the merchants and buying ice and bait and so on. I do not see why we should go so far as to prohibit that. If this Bill were directed against the trawler alone I would hold up both hands for it.

Mr. JAMESON: I was not in the House at the moment my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) opened his remarks, but I understood he referred to me as having made a campaign speech this afternoon. If he did draw that impression from anything I said, I can retort that he has wandered off into a similar field himself and that to-night he has made a very vigorous campaign speech which no doubt later on will be circulated by the central Liberal news-spreading bureau at Ottawa, among the fishing districts of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman said that when the question of steam trawlers was under discussion in this House on a previous occasion, I favoured the prohibition of the landing of the fish of from the steam trawlers at Canadian ports. Well, Sir, I believe that was in the best interests of those fishermen whose business had been injured by reason of the operation of the steam trawlers, and why my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) should criticise the view I then expressed, I cannot quite understand. I can say, however, that my view did not prevail with the then Government, which considered that the Order in Council it had passed, forbidding the operations of trawlers within the three-mile limit, was sufficient for the protection of the fishermen. But, as a matter of fact, we know from the statements made by the maritime province colleagues of the hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) on his own side of the House, that the protection which the fishermen got under that Order in Council amounted to practically nothing at all, and that during the time the late Government was in charge of the affairs of the country, after the passage of that Order in Council in 1908, the steam trawlers did operate within the three-mile limit, and there was no effort made to suppress them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They did not operate on the coast of my constituency.

Mr. JAMESON: The hon. member must have overlooked the statements made by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) in the House some time ago.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I speak for my own constituency; the law was very well enforced there.

Mr. JAMESON: I am glad to hear it was enforced somewhere, because it is very well understood it was not enforced in other parts of the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) told us to-day it had not been enforced.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): Last summer.

Mr. JAMESON: The fact of the matter is that that Order in Council was defective, and whether it was intentionally defective, or accidentally defective, and its defects not cured under the late Administration, I am not prepared to say. At all events, the Order in Council worked out in this way, as I am informed in the case of the captain of the Wren; under the Order in Council you might proceed against the captain, you might arrest him, fine him, or imprison him, but the steam trawler still operated under some other captain. The legislation we are now considering provides that if, in a similar case there is a breach of the law, the captain would not be proceeded against, but the ship itself would be confiscated. That strikes at the very root of the evil, and yet my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) who professes to be so anxious to put an end to steam trawling, does not approve of it.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair) referred to the resolution relating to steam trawling passed at a convention of the Nova Scotia Conservatives in 1909, which resolution stated that the provincial Government had been derelict in its duty in this matter. I presume the hon. gentleman intended us to conclude from his remarks that he saw no reason why the provincial Government should be mixed up with it, but I may be permitted to call his attention to a resolution which was passed last year in the Nova Scotia Legislature, strongly condemning steam trawling, and stating it was doing very considerable injury to the fishing grounds. There was an interesting debate in the Legislature with respect to steam trawling on a motion that had been discussed at considerable length, and the amendment to which I refer was moved by Mr. Tory in the place of an amendment previously moved by him, and it was unanimously adopted. Mr. Tory, although his name does not suggest it, is a supporter of the Liberal Government in Nova Scotia and represents the county of Guysborough. I quote from page 173, Debates and Proceedings of the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, 1912.

Beam trawlers.

Hon. Mr. Murray moved the resumption of the debate on the subject of beam trawlers.

Mr. Margeson said the amended resolution as agreed upon was perfectly satisfactory to him, the objectionable portion of the amendment as first moved by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Tory) having been struck out. He, therefore, with the consent of his colleague from Lunenburg (Mr. Zwicker) would withdraw the resolution as moved by him in favour of the amended resolution.

Mr. Tory, in place of the amendment previously moved by him, moved the following resolution, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Bissett):

Resolved, that this House reaffirms the resolution unanimously adopted on the 5th day of April, 1909, as follows:—

That this House deem it imperative to advise the federal Government, and it is hereby so advised, of the impending danger to the provincial fisheries from the introduction and use in pelagic waters adjacent to the coast of the devices called otter-trawls operated by steamers from the British islands and from France, from which a great influx is contemplated the coming season to the imminent peril of the said fishing grounds as threatening to deplete them by a method proved the most destructive to the food fishes and their spawn, a fact tacitly admitted by the Dominion Government in debarring said trawlers from the littoral waters.

And further resolved, that the federal Government be hereby memoralized to set in motion the powers of diplomacy through the Imperial Government to bring about an international convention between the countries immediately concerned for the suppression of the said manner of trawling in open sea.

Further resolved, that in view of the very great importance of this subject to the fishermen of this province, of their very strong desire that steam trawling be prohibited and of the necessity of the fullest co-operation on the part of the Canadian Government at this particular juncture, this House places on record its exception to any views intended to raise doubts as to the injurious and destructive effects of steam trawling upon our fisheries.

That resolution, as I have said, was unanimously adopted in the Legislature of Nova Scotia at its last session.

In that resolution particular reference was made to the steam trawlers from France, which it was said were doing great injury to the fishing grounds adjacent to the coast of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) to-day in reading a letter which he had from the French Consul at the port of North Sydney, showed that fourteen of those steam trawlers from France had been operating out of that port or at least getting their coal and certain other supplies at that port during the past year. This legislation may prevent those trawlers from coming to that or any other Nova Scotian port; it is right along the lines of this resolution adopted unanimously by the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia; it is entirely in line with the views of the hon. gentleman in that legislature from the very county represented by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair); yet it would appear that these two gentlemen are entirely at variance with regard to the views they hold respecting this matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does my hon. friend mean to say that that resolution does not ask the question to be dealt with from a Canadian standpoint as well as from a French standpoint? Does he understand the resolution to mean that by prohibiting the French trawlers from working on the coast of Canada, the whole question would be settled?

Mr. JAMESON: My hon. friend has spoken too soon. If he had waited a moment, I intended to say that this Government has within the last twelve months, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated to-day, taken up this subject of the prevention of the operation of steam trawlers, in waters adjacent to the coast of North America, with the governments of the United States and of Newfoundland, and he has also taken the subject up with the Imperial Government. If a convention or basis of agreement is arrived at with respect to the Governments of Newfoundland, Canada and the United States, that matter is settled in so far as they are concerned. If they agree that no steam trawler shall be brought into these North Atlantic waters, Great Britain will, no doubt, coincide in that; and this legislation contemplates the exclusion of all other steam trawlers from these waters; yet my hon. friend does not seem to be in sympathy with it.

Mr. McKENZIE: The words 'steam trawlers' are not mentioned in the legislation at all.

Mr. JAMESON: My hon. friend took the objection that it was going to exclude steam trawlers from the port of North Sydney in which he was interested; and on the strength of that objection, this whole debate originated.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is not a word in this Bill about steam trawlers. I venture to suggest that these trawlers are not contemplated by this Bill. What I might say about it does not change the purport of intention or operation of the Bill.

Mr. JAMESON: In view of what my hon. friend has said, I am constrained to sit down and say nothing more about the matter. I always imagined that whatever the hon. gentleman said in this House was supposed to go. I believed that the view he expressed before dinner was the correct one with respect to the exclusion of steam trawlers under this Bill. If he says it is not correct that steam trawlers are excluded under this Bill, the whole case so far as his argument is concerned, has entirely exploded and the question is closed.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish): The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) has tried to convey the impression that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are not in sympathy with this legislation. If it has the effect of restricting in any way the operation of beam trawlers, for myself I wish to say that if the proposed legislation will in any way minimize the evil that the shore fisherman are complaining of, and will in any way tend to relieve them from the injustice which they have been suffering from since steam trawling has been conducted on our shores, I hold up both hands for it. As far as I can follow the argument of my hon. friend from Digby, he does not say that this legislation will to any extent assist the fishermen so far as their complaints at present are concerned; but he says it may be a stepping stone to something else that will have that effect. I have read over the Act and I cannot see how the question of steam trawling is affected in the slightest by it; but inasmuch as we have the assurance of the hon. member for Digby, and I presume he has been in touch with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and knows more about what is intended by this legislation than we can see from reading the Bill, so far as I am concerned, I have no objections to the Bill. I am quite sure that my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) in his remarks made no objection to the Bill if it will have the effect as suggested. Before six o'clock, the hon. member for Digby expressed surprise that hon. members on this side of the House were not more enthusiastic over a measure which in his imagination had some merit in it, because it was going in some way, which he has not yet made clear, to remove the grievances of our fishermen. I submit that he had no warrant for that. Nothing was said by hon. members on this side of the House to justify any suggestion that they were not in the fullest sympathy with any legislation that would tend to reduce the evil of steam trawling. For my part I have such sympathy with the fishermen and such a strong prejudice against steam trawling that I would go to the length of exterminating trawlers altogether, if we could do so by legislation; but to come down to the point, which after all is the position of my hon. friend from Digby and the hon. gentlemen on the other side. They say that the legislation which was passed by the late Administration, the Order in Council passed in 1908, is not effective. Surely it must have occurred to my hon. friend from Digby, who is burning with such zeal for the welfare of our fishermen, that he should have hied himself to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and got an Order in Council passed that would have the desired effect. He did not do so; the Government has been in power now for nearly two years, and we have not yet heard of one single step they have taken towards improving the legislation that exists or doing anything to relieve the fishmen of the grievances which they are complaining of. It is all very well for my hon. friend to say that the present Government is in conference with the authorities at Washington and with the government of Newfoundland. Our fishermen want more than that. Passing resolutions and making nice speeches are not sufficient for our fishermen; they would like to see some action taken. What is the trouble with the present Order in Council? Does not the Order in Council passed by the late Administration prohibit fishing by means of steam trawlers in the territorial waters of Canada? Can the present administration go any further? Could the late Administration have gone any further that it did? If so, I should like my hon. friend from Digby to tell me how the late administration could have gone any further than they did. He says that the Order in Council is defective. Where is it defective? He cannot tell us. That Order in Council is to be read with the Fisheries Act as it exists. It is quite sufficient if it were only put into effect. It may be difficult to put it into effect, and perhaps it has not been put into effect as well as it should be. He referred to the case of the Wren. I think my hon. friend when he was reading the debates before him, must have gone over a speech which was made by Senator Girroir, who discussed this matter in the local legislature at Halifax last winter. He also took the same ground. He stated that not only was this order useless but no use was attempted to be made of it. In fact he went so far as to intimate that the late Administration arrested the captain of the Wren but did not bring him to trial or that he was not effectively prosecuted. This statement is entirely misleading; it is entirely at variance with the facts. I know the circumstances in connection with the prosecution of Captain Smith, of the Wren, for I was instrumental in having it instituted. I know that the case was prosecuted before the magistrate in Malignant Cove, by Mr. Hockin. The fishery officer did not have sufficient evidence and it was necessary to adjourn from Malignant Cove to Antigonish town. It seems that the adjournment was made without there and then stating specifically the time and place to which it was adjourned. The adjourned hearing took place in Antigonish, a conviction was made and Captain Smith was arrested and put in a jail. Application was made for his release under habeas corpus, and on the application objection was taken to the proceedings on the ground that the hearing was adjourned from Malignant Cove to Antigonish and the time and place to which the adjournment was made had not been specifically stated. And the conviction was quashed on this ground and Captain Smith released. But, so far as the administration of justice was concerned, so far as the Government was concerned, everything was done to convict that man. And he was convicted and sent to jail, where he remained until he was released by due process of law. The fact that he was released on a technicality was not the fault of the department or the prosecuting attorney, or any one in connection with the prosecution.

Our friends on the other side, when they were in opposition, used to taunt the Liberals and supporters of the late Administration by saying that relief was not afforded to the fishermen. They said that if they had the doing of it, the fishermen's grievances would be a thing of the past. Now, what have they done? What legislation has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries passed since the present Administration came into power to lessen the grievances under which the fishermen suffer? None. Perhaps it is because they could not do any more than had been done before. But why are they not frank and honest about it? Why do they not say: When we were in opposition we were playing the game of politics; we sought to deceive and mislead the fisherman; we held out hopes to them and tried in every way to misrepresent the facts and the attitude of the Government at that time in order to get votes? That is exactly the situation. But the fishermen are not so easily deceived. Nor are they unreasonable. They have a grievance. The situation is that unless something is done in the manner suggested to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—that is, by arrangement with the Governments of England, Newfoundland, the United States and others, for I can see no other way—our shore fishermen will have to go out of business. But why do not our friends on the other side admit when they tried to arouse the hopes of the fishermen by saying that they were going to stop this method of fishing by prohibiting the landing of fish from trawlers in Canadian ports, they were promising something that they did not believe themselves could be carried out? Has the hon. member for Digby succeeded in inducing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the present Government to prevent the landing of fish caught by trawlers? No attempt has been made by the Government or any officer of the Government, to carry into effect any regulations of that kind. Have any attempts been made to prevent the Canadian fishermen from fishing by steam trawl? No.

Mr. JAMESON: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to be in favour of the steam trawlers from France coming to our coasts?

Mr. CHISHOLM: The hon. gentleman cannot get me away from the subject in that fashion. He cannot get me away from the fact that he and other gentlemen on that side said that they were going to stop this method of fishing. They were going to prevent the Canadian trawlers from operating, for, they said they could control these operations. We had a right, they said, to make it illegal for any Canadian to fish in this way. And they said that if this was not enough, they would pass a law to prevent fish caught by trawlers being landed anywhere in Canada, and in that way they were going to put the trawlers out of business. Have they done this? No. Now, the hon. member for Digby asks me if I am in favour of trawling by the French fishermen? I said before that if I could stop trawling on the part of Frenchmen, Englishmen, Americans, Canadians and all others, I would prevent it. For I say that the same thing is going to happen along our shores that has happened in the North sea and in Europe. Our fisheries will be depleted. I have a mass of references to show that notwithstanding the arguments put up on the other side of the water by those interested in that method of fishing, trawling is decidedly injurious. The best authorities in the United States and the independent authorities in England on the commissions that have been appointed to investigate the matter have come to the conclusion that this manner of fishing is so injurious that it is only a question of time when the fisheries will be depleted and the shore fishing industry ruined. But I have pointed out that, so far as my county is concerned, we have no great complaint as to the French trawlers. I do not know of any French trawler having operated along the Antigonish coast, unless there was one last year. I never heard of such a thing until the suggestion was made this afternoon, though there may be a French trawler operating in Northumberland straits. Previous to last summer, I know, there were none. The French trawlers referred to do not operate in Northumberland straits. But what we object to in Northumberland straits is the Canadian trawlers. They are all Canadians flying the British flag. I have many articles here showing the danger from this method of fishing, but the matter has so often been called to the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that, I am sure, he must be well informed on the subject, so that reading them would be a waste of time. I am sure the hon. gentleman is impressed with the fact that the time has come to take action, and the sooner he moves in this matter the better for Canada. The time to prevent trawling is now—to act now is to nip this system in the bud. I was glad to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say that there were no trawlers operating on the Atlantic coast now. But does he mean that none are operating this winter, or does he mean that they have gone out of business altogether?

Mr. HAZEN : There were no Canadian trawlers operating last year.

Mr. CHISHOLM : What were the trawlers operating in Northumberland straits ?

Mr. HAZEN : I understand they were English.

Mr. CHISHOLM : But operating for Canadian firms ?

Mr. HAZEN : There were no trawlers operating under Canadian licenses. The Wren, which was the Canadian trawler to which reference has been made, was not operating last year.

Mr. CHISHOLM : It does not make much difference to the inshore fishermen whether the trawler is Canadian or English. The trawlers were in Northumberland straits and operating off our shores, to the great detriment of Canadian fishermen. And they were supplying the Canadian market. But my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) could prevent the operating of these trawlers by preventing the landing at Canadian ports of the fish they take. I do not go so far as to say that that would be a wise policy for him to pursue, although that was the policy which the hon. members opposite, the hon. member for Digby and others, were advocating when they were in Opposition. My point is that the time to take action is now before more trawlers are out and before they get a foothold because as they become more powerful and work up their organization it will be more difficult to regulate and check them than it would be now. There is an agitation against them in the United States and in Newfoundland and among the better class of people interested in the conservation of our resources. There is also a feeling in England against this method but it happens that conditions in England are such that a supply of cheap food is essential and the steam trawlers have such a foothold there that it is impossible to do much with them, but if we want to guard against conditions such as prevail in England we must move as speedily as possible and see that some international arrangement is arrived at whereby our local fishermen may be protected.

Mr. STEWART (Lunenburg): I am very much interested in this subject and have listened attentively to the discussion this afternoon as I did to the discussion of the same subject last session. Notwithstanding my natural disinclination to say much, I feel that, representing a constituency so vitally interested in the question, I should say a word or two. I well remember that about a year ago an agitation was started in the New England States and along the coast of Nova Scotia with a view to impressing on the Governments of the United States and Canada the desirability of restricting this machine method of fishing. A mass-meeting of the fishermen of Nova Scotia was held in Lunenburg. I think invitations were generally extended to the fishing population of Nova Scotia. A delegation was appointed to come to Ottawa and wait on the Government with respect to this matter. I had the honour of introducing this delegation to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and I had the pleasure of listening to the representation made by this delegation and of listening to the assurances that were given by both ministers to the delegation. I observed the satisfactory manner in which these assurances were received by the delegation. It has been said, and I know it to be a fact that the Government and particularly the Minister of Marine and the officers of his department, have not been inactive in regard to this subject. Allusion has been made to representations to the Government at Washington and to interviews with the Government of the Mother Country and the Government of Newfoundland. The legislation which is offered here to-night is one step at any rate in the way of implementing the promises made by the Government at the last session of Parliament. The delegation which came to Ottawa presented a memorial to the Government and I feel that their views were put in such concise language that, if there is no objection, I would like to read from that memorial. It is as follows:

The Petition of the undersigned fishermen and inhabitants of the province of Nova Scotia,
Humbly sheweth:—

That whereas the prosecution of the deep sea fisheries is one of the chief industries of the people of the province of Nova Scotia, and is the direct source of livelihood of a very large proportion of the inhabitants of the counties of Guysborough, Halifax, Lunenburg, Queens, Shelburne, Yarmouth and Digby, as well as the foundation of a very large and rapidly growing commercial spirit in said counties;

And whereas the protection of the said fisheries and the fostering of said industry is of vital importance to all people interested in the fisheries of the province of Nova Scotia;

And whereas some $12,000,000 is now invested in fishing vessels, plant and appurtenances, in Nova Scotia, for the prosecution of said deep sea fisheries and the shore fisheries of said province by means of hand-lining and trawling, and at least 70,000 men are now regularly engaged in the occupation of fishing by said means;

And whereas at a very largely attended public meeting, held in the Court House, in the town and county of Lunenburg on the 9th day of February, 1912, it was unanimously resolved to formulate plans for the protection of said industry, as well as for the purpose of preserving to said inhabitants of said counties, one of their chief means of subsistence, and to which end an organized effort be made to prevent the threatened destruction of said fisheries and the cutting off from said inhabitants of said means of subsistence, now threatened by the introduction and continued use of the so called beam or auto trawlers;

And whereas your petitioners are convinced in their opinions that the only effectual method of preserving said industry and protecting said fishermen is by the introduction and enactment of such legislation as may tend to prohibit or discourage the operations of said beam or auto trawlers in those parts of the Atlantic Ocean and its bays or arms which comprise the fishing grounds frequented or operated by the fishermen of said province;

Your petitioners therefore respectfully pray that the subject matter of this petition be taken into consideration and such legislation be introduced into Parliament and such proposals be made to the governing bodies of other countries which may be interested in the protection of said fisheries, as may tend to promote said industry and safeguard the occupation and livelihood of those who are engaged therein and dependent thereon, to which end your petitioners humbly suggest that the following restrictions upon said method of fishing would materially assist in bringing about the object of this petition, viz:—

(a) the prohibiting of the landing of fish in Canada which are taken by means of auto or beam trawling.

(b) the prohibiting of the supplying of coal by the people of Canada to said beam or auto trawlers and the prohibiting to said trawlers the right to purchase coal in Canada.

The following are some of the reasons which your petitioners submit in support of this petition:—

1. That it is the experience of practical fishermen that wherever the beam trawler has operated the fish have been greatly depleted.

2. That the beam trawlers destroy the spawning grounds of deep sea fish and that the young fish remain near the bottom until they grow to marketable size. The spawn sinks to the bottom and does not float on the surface as some experts contend.

3. The beam trawler in its progress takes up and destroys the lines, trawls and fishing gear of the ordinary fishermen, and frequently comes close to the ordinary fishing vessels and its dories when the latter are in the act of taking large quantities of fish, and with the beam trawl sweeps around the fishing vessel, and carries away the trawls and fish.

4. The beam trawler destroys the vegetation at the bottom of the sea upon which the young fish very largely feed.

5. The beam trawler is a monopolist, and can be operated only by the wealthy combines, thus depriving the poor fishermen of a means of livelihood.

6. The beam trawler drags along the bottom and scoops up all sizes of fish with the result that the small fish are thrown away and destroyed.

7. The beam trawler destroys large quantities of valuable shell fish.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

If I understand the matter aright, the hon. the Minister of Marine has amended a section of this Bill so as to restrict its application to fishing vessels. The only objection offered to it comes from the hon. member for North Cape Breton whose interest is in the coal mines of that district, and who fears it may interfere with the sale of some coal to steam trawlers visiting that port. The hon. member for North Cape Breton is a friend of mine and I have warm feelings for many of the people down there, but I do not think that my feeling for him or for the community should prevent me from insisting that the interests of this large fishing class of the whole of Nova Scotia and the Maritime provinces should not be sacrificed for the benefit of any one particular port.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend from Lunenburg. I am glad he has made his maiden speech, and I congratulate him on the subject of it, and on the proper manner in which he dealt with it. I am glad that he has expressed some friendship towards myself and towards that part of the province from which I come. He very properly expressed the view that no such friendship should stand between him and the doing of justice to the fishermen of the province of Nova Scotia. Let me hasten to assure him that I am with him at every stage of the proceedings, so far as the protection of the fishermen of Nova Scotia is concerned. My hon. friend seems to think that we are a one-horse affair down in the island of Cape Breton, and that we have only coal to sell. I do not know whether his conception of conditions would apply to any part of the great province of Nova Scotia. Our pride in that province is that we have a great many possibilities, a great variety of interests, that our resources are practically limitless and that it is impossible to shut out a man from making a living by one thing or another. If the coal is bad, the fishing is good, and if the coal and fishing are not satisfactory the iron works are all right. If these happen to be a failure, our lumber business is prosperous, and if something else is not up to the mark, our agricultural industry is in first-class condition. If all these things fail us, we have first-class ship carpenters and ship-builders and we can build a navy. It is not proper for the hon. member for Lunenburg to think that the protection or assisting of the coal industry has anything to do with what I have to say in this connection. There is no such thing as a member of Parliament for small things and a member for big things. The county of North Cape Breton and Victoria has no voice except mine, and it is my duty to protect not only the coal industry but the fishermen as well. I would ask my hon. friend from Lunenburg to point out in what particular the fishermen in Lunenburg are affected when a Frenchman or a Norwegian or a Scandinavian, who may be running a trawler on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, buys a few tons of coal at Sydney and goes right back to the banks. If he can show me that there is any possibility of that transaction interfering with his good friends in Lunenburg I will at once abandon my contention. But I submit that the taking of a few tons of coal at North Sydney by a French trawler which goes to the banks of Newfoundland or to the fishing grounds along the island of St. Pierre, does not in the slightest degree interfere with the interests of the fishermen in Nova Scotia. When I tell my hon. friend that we sell in the vicinity of seven or eight million tons of coal in Nova Scotia, and that the great coal companies which I represent have as big a market as they can supply, he will see that the few tons of coal sold to these fishermen do not enter much into their calculations. However, it is a legitimate business, a good cash business and as it does not interfere with the rights of anyone else I think it is proper to try to hold the trade we have now. This trade has been going on for a great many years and nobody seemed to find any fault with it. What I am sorry about is that this legislation should come along now and disturb conditions which are at present satisfactory, and the disturbance of which will not profit anybody else while it will cause a great deal of trouble to the people who have been carrying on the trade for so many years.

I am protecting not only the coal industry but the fishermen as well. I do not know whether the small herring which is to be found in tremendous schools around the shores of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia frequents that part of the coast represented by my hon. friend. I am not aware that it does, but if it did, and the fishermen caught it in barrels and there was only one way in which they could convert it into cash, that way being to sell it to the French vessels for bait, how would he feel if legislation were introduced in this House cutting off that means of livelihood from the fishermen in his constituency? Hundreds of men along the coast from Gabarouse to Louisburg, and from North Sydney to St. Annes, catch that small fish and sell it to those fishermen for bait. They do not disturb the interests of anybody else and they make money out of it. Judging from the response I have received from the other side, it looks as if that right will be taken away from the poor fishermen of Cape Breton who have been making money in that way for the last thirty-five or forty years. My hon. friend from Lunenburg apparently is not the friend of the fishermen unless he belongs to Lunenburg. I am afraid he will gather enough strength on the other side of the House to beat me out on this question. But I bring the responsibility home to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He is the chief sinner in this thing, he has introduced this Bill to no purpose whatever except to cut this bite out of the mouths of those fishermen in my county who have been making money out of this trade for years and years and who have not been injuring anybody in doing so. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Stewart) says that this is a step in the right direction because it will tend to put an end to beam trawling. That is the only argument that seems to be in favour of it. But, how is it going to do that? It will prevent the French trawlers from getting their coal right at the wharf at North Sydney, where they should get it. There is nothing to prevent them putting their coal on board barges, taking it out to the three-mile limit and putting it on board their vessels. They will do that or they will get their coal at St. Pierre or Port au Basque, Nfld., and go on with their trade in the old way. They are not to be prevented from going on with that industry because they are shut out from putting their vessel under the chute at North Sydney and taking their coal in the proper way. My hon. friend is succeeding in taking about $100,000 worth of business out of the hands of the merchants of North Sydney, but beyond that he is accomplishing nothing. I protest against this law because there is no necessity for it. The law as it has stood for the last twenty or thirty years is good enough. I would ask my hon. friend if there is any concrete case that has arisen to make this amendment necessary. Before 6 o'clock I mentioned the Gearing case, which was before the courts of this country. The book containing the report of this case which was dealt with by the Supreme Court discloses a high degree of learning on the subject. It is a case somewhat akin to that which is under discussion here to-night, but nobody suggested that there was any necessity for amending the statute at that time. The statute was then what it is to-day, and I have not heard from the minister or anybody else that any condition has arisen since the trial of that case, fifteen years ago, which makes it necessary to make such drastic changes as those which are now proposed. All the law we have ever had on this particular subject is simply implementing the treaty of 1818. We simply have the statutes passed in Great Britain and Canada implementing the terms of that treaty. We are now breaking away from the terms of the treaty and making a law for the Frenchman, Scandinavian, Norwegian and all those foreign countries without any treaty whatever. They do not know where they stand with respect to Canada. The American knows where he stands because he has the treaty of 1818 and he knows that we cannot legislate him out of his rights under that treaty. The Norwegian, the Frenchman, and the maritime powers of Europe have no such treaty and we put them in a position by this legislation that they were never in before. Is it not worth while for my hon. friend to think before he puts France, Belgium, Italy, Spain and all the maritime powers of Europe on a different footing with the Canadian people from that which they occupy at the present time? We have Norwegian vessels carrying coal in this country. We see men fishing from these vessels in the port of Sydney every day and according to this amendment if the sailors begin fishing over the sides of the vessel, their tackle and everything they have is subject to seizure. This legislation seems to have been introduced without sufficient consideration, without it being understood how far reaching it is and it changes the conditions in this country and the relations of all the others powers of Europe except Great Britain.

I have done my duty in connection with this matter. I have protested against the Bill on behalf of my people, and I submit, not only to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but to the Prime Minister, that all the legislation we ever had upon this subject was implementing the treaty of 1818, and that we are now travelling beyond that. There never was a case in the maritime provinces where we interfered with the vessel of any other country except that one which was brought before our courts. We had no statute but a common practice was recognized which eventually was crystallized into legislation. We are going to have practically a criminal statute dealing with this question and conditions are to be radically changed. I have done everything I could in protesting against this amendment, but as I said a moment ago, I feel that they have enough strength on the other side of the House to take away these rights which I represent here and I can only protest and give reasons why they should not be interfered with.

Mr. CARROLL: If this measure were calculated to strike a death blow at beam trawling in the maritime provinces I would certainly not oppose it because down there we all appreciate the fact that beam trawling is very detrimental to the interests of the fishermen. But it does strike me that the mere fact that a foreign beam trawler will not be allowed under this Act to enter our harbour to buy supplies, bait, coal or anything of that kind is not going to do away with beam trawling. Most of the beam trawling that is being done along the coasts of Nova Scotia is being done by British ships fishing for Canadian syndicates. This legislation cannot be aimed at them. Here we are prohibiting a Norwegian vessel from coming into the port of Louisburg or Sydney to get a supply of coal. That is not going to kill the beam trawling industry but it is going to hurt the coal industry of Nova Scotia to some extent. If these Norwegian or French beam trawlers want to do business beyond the three-mile limit they can get their supplies in Newfoundland or at St. Pierre.

This legislation will hurt the fishermen in such towns as Louisburg, Gabarouse and Sydney; it will hurt the coal industry to a certain extent in the province of Nova Scotia, and it will not benefit the fishermen because it will not tend to do away with beam trawling. That is the reason I protest against the Bill.

Mr. McCURDY: There is no doubt in my mind but that the provisions of this Bill will discourage the operations of beam trawlers along the coast of Nova Scotia, and judging by the remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite, the French trawlers now operating in large numbers off the coast of our province will be particularly hurt.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are the French trawlers there in large numbers?

Mr. McCURDY: The hon. member for Cape Breton stated there were fourteen of them, and he told us they used a large quantity of coal and that if they were not allowed to take their supplies of coal, it would be a serious matter for the district he represents. Inasmuch as some five million tons of coal are mined annually in the hon. gentleman's district and that he regards any interference with the sales to them as serious, as opposed to the interests of the line fishermen, the French trawlers must be there in large numbers. Coming to this House as I did at the opening of this Parliament without any great knowledge of the speed with which important legislation progresses, I may say that I have been pleased at the substantial progress made by the Government in the comparatively short period of time that they have been in power. The proposition to prohibit steam trawling is rather a large question; big matters move slowly, but it would seem to me that during the fifteen or sixteen months this Government has been in office it has made very substantial advances indeed towards implementing the promises made by the Conservative party when in Opposition. I, in company with the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) had the pleasure of accompanying a delegation representing the fishermen of Nova Scotia which waited on the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with reference to this question and I may say in passing that the delegation were given a very sympathetic hearing by the hon. minister (Mr. Hazen) and by the Prime Minister who also was present. It was pointed out to the ministers that 70,000 fishermen in the maritime provinces were affected through the invasion of their fishing grounds by these steam trawlers, and having the interest of the fishermen at heart we urged that the Government should take some action to protect the interests of this hardworking and industrious class of our population. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) stated that no step had been taken by the Government to prevent the growth of this steam trawling business along our coasts, but judging by the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite this Bill is going to make it very difficult indeed for the French trawlers which are the most dreaded by our fishermen, to carry on their operation and so substantial progress is made. I may mention that there are no trawlers being operated at the present time by Canadians, and if hon. gentlemen opposite have been following what has been going on in fishing circles, they will know that had it not been for the determined stand taken by the Minister of Marine and the public expression of opinion given by him, the steam trawling industry would no doubt be to-day established in Canada.

Mr. KYTE: The objection I have as a representative of the fishing industry of Nova Scotia against this Bill is, that it is not aimed against steam trawling in our waters, but aimed at steam trawling by one particular nationality whose trawling operations have not resulted in any respect to the detriment of our fishermen. My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) and others on that side of the House appear to attach much value to this legislation on the ground that they consider it will curtail the operation of steam trawlers in Nova Scotia. My reading of the Act leads to the conclusion that it will have no effect whatever on steam trawling as carried on in the coast waters of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton has pointed out that the only class of steam trawlers that will be affected by it is that class which are not operating within the coast waters of Nova Scotia. The French trawlers do not come within one hundred miles of our shores and no complaint has ever been made by the fishermen of Nova Scotia in respect to the operations of trawlers upon the Grand Banks. There is however a class of trawlers which have been operating to the detriment of the fishermen in the coast waters of Nova Scotia, and these are trawlers either owned or under charter by fishing concerns in that province. One of the aspects in which this legislation ought to be viewed is that it is another manifestation of the principle of monopoly to which the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to be so entirely wedded. If you eliminate the operations of the French trawlers from the waters adjacent to the maritime provinces, then you leave that other class of trawlers, to which I have referred in absolute control which are owned by certain interests in the province of Nova Scotia and have been operated to the detriment of the shore fishermen. We know as a matter of fact it has been urged by certain interests that if one particular corporation is permitted to have the service of steam trawlers to supply them with the fish they require in their business, it would be necessary in self-defence for other industries engaged in the fishing business to employ steam trawlers as well.

Mr. McCURDY: You make the statement that these steam trawlers operating off the coast of Nova Scotia are owned by interests in the province of Nova Scotia. Will you please give us further particulars?

Mr. KYTE: Owned or chartered by interests in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McCURDY: Would you please give us further particulars regarding that. My information is entirely to the contrary, that these are not owned, operated or chartered by any interest in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. KYTE: These interests receive their supplies of fish from those trawlers, with the result that the shore fishermen are not able to sell their catches to those concerns, because it is argued that the shore fishermen cannot supply the steady demand which those corporations require from day to day.

Mr. McCURDY: Would you be in favour of forbidding the British trawlers from landing their catch?

Mr. KYTE: I would be in favour of preventing anything which operated to the detriment of the shore fishermen in Nova Scotia; and I have the authority for saying that the shore fishermen in the province of Nova Scotia and the interests of the shore fishermen are influenced to their detriment by the operation of these steam trawlers. If those corporations which are engaged in the fishing business were to depend entirely on the supplies which they could obtain from the shore fishermen, then there would be a steady price for these fishermen; but it is argued that the shore fishermen do not supply the fish in the quantity required from time to time, and it is necessary for those corporations to purchase catches from the steam trawlers. The fishermen have been informed by some of those interests that if steam trawling were abolished altogether, then the shore fishermen would fare very much better, because one corporation then would have no advantage over the other. So far as I am concerned, the trawlers which are aimed at by this legislation do not come into competition with the shore fishermen in the province of Nova Scotia. If the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries were to direct his attention to curing an evil which actually exists in the province of Nova Scotia, he would be entitled to the gratitude of the fishing interests of the Maritime provinces. This legislation will leave things exactly as before. My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) claims that this legislation is a step in the direction of putting an end to the operation of these steam trawlers in the province of Nova Scotia; it cannot have any such effect. While the Government are indifferent to the operations of the trawlers which are owned and chartered either in England or in Nova Scotia, the legislation that is contemplated by this Bill cannot improve the conditions in any degree. Therefore if my hon. friend from Digby or any other hon. gentleman creates the impression that this legislation is going to relieve the situation so far as our fishermen are concerned, then these fishermen are doomed to disappointment. If we cannot get legislation that will curtail the operation of the steam trawlers that are operated within the three-mile limit, and that are owned or chartered by interests in the province of Nova Scotia, then this legislation will be absolutely futile inasmuch as it can only affect operations that are carried on beyond the three-mile limit, in a territory in which our shore fishermen do not operate at all.

Mr. TURGEON: While I can add nothing more to what has been said on this question, I wish to place myself on record. The steam trawler has not yet reached our shores in northern New Brunswick; but I see her coming full speed from Cape Breton Island and from the shores of Antigonish to the banks of Prince Edward Island, where she will mingle with the fishing fleets of Caraquet and Shippigan, in the county of Gloucester, a deserving Canadian institution controlled by men who keep vivid and sacred the heritage of their ancestors, whom the Breton navigator has taken across the Atlantic in small vessels which the generations of to-day will not man to go across our harbours. Meanwhile in anticipation of the trouble, I wish to say that I am opposed to steam trawling by any man, whether he be French, Norwegian or American, whether he be Canadian or English. It is for the preservation of the vast fishing resources of our coast along the gulf of St. Lawrence that I wish to place myself on record. The fishing industry of Gloucester county exceeds that of any other constituency, except perhaps the constituency of Lunenburg, which is worthily represented by the hon. member who gave his views on the subject a few moments ago. I fear that the legislation before our consideration will be apt more to create friction and disturbance than to destroy the evil which exists, because it does not pretend to give any international agreement between the nations which send those trawlers across the ocean and our own trawling people who are doing harm to our own fisheries. We often speak of our inexhaustible fisheries in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Forty years ago we used to speak of the inexhaustible lobster beds along the sea shore; and owing to over-fishing and lack of protection due to the Canadian people themselves, who have not in time pressed upon public opinion the necessity of taking more stringent measures, they have been proved to be not inexhaustible. I would suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the Bill now before our consideration would merely create disturbance and friction, and perhaps punish those who are the lesser offenders and the greater benefactors in the community. While I am just as much opposed to the French trawler as the American trawler, it has been shown by the discussion this evening that the French trawler keeps away from the sea shore, never interfering within the limits in which by international treaty he has a right to operate; and he is the one who comes ashore and leaves more money and trades with the Canadian people more than the American who can reach his own shores two or three times during the season. The consequence of this Bill would therefore be perhaps not to kill trade but to curtail the trade which the maritime provinces, especially along the shores of Nova Scotia, receive from the French trawler, without affecting in the least the destructive operations of the trawler in the midst of the ocean. I would suggest to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, without any political motive whatever, that, instead of forcing this Bill upon us to-night, he should put more vigour into his correspondence or conferences with the other nations, or appoint a commissioner or officer of his own department, for instance, Professor Prince, or the superintendent of fisheries, whom I see in the House to-night, both able men who can impress their minds upon representatives of other nations with whom they come in contact. I believe that such would be more effective and would produce quicker results than the Bill now before us which, I believe, without imputing any lack of judgment to my hon. friends on the other side, would not be as effective as they seem to think. For, as has been stated here, the companies that send out these trawlers will find means to evade this law, and will find a supply of coal or something else necessary at a time when they are convenient to one of our harbours, or transfer their base of operation to other parts. I earnestly hope the minister will commission some of his officers to gather the necessary information, so that before the next fishing season opens, steps may be taken sufficient to create in the minds of the companies operating trawlers that the conditions are changed, and consequently they will commence to curtail their operations for the future.

Mr. HAZEN: I suggest that this section be amended by inserting the word 'fishing' before the word 'ship.' This, I think, meets the objection raised, with some force, I admit, by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell). It is intended that this law shall apply only to fishing vessels, and it is well that that should be made abundantly clear in the Bill. With this amendment, I think there will be no doubt, even if there be doubt at the present time, that that is the effect of the measure.

Some hon. members have discussed this measure from the standpoint entirely of steam trawling. I explained, in introducing the Bill, the conditions which I thought made this Bill necessary. But, let me make it clear again what difficulties are to be overcome. The effect of this measure will be to provide that a foreign vessel shall be forfeited if found inside the three-mile limit and preparing to fish, even though the department cannot prove that the preparations were made with a view to fishing within the three-mile limit.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What foreign vessels are fishing in Canadian waters, outside of American vessels?

Mr. HAZEN: None, but it is not uncommon to find vessels without license inside the three-mile limit and making preparations to fish. Under the law as it stands, we cannot punish them unless we can prove that they were preparing to carry on fishing operations inside the three-mile limit. Another point that makes this legislation necessary is that the law as it exists gives no power to prevent fishing vessels from foreign countries from fishing in those waters mentioned in the convention entered into between the United States and Great Britain in 1818. While the United States have the right to fish in these waters, the vessels of other countries have not. Yet, as the law stands, they are given the right, practically, to fish in these waters in which it was intended by the treaty of 1818 that no foreign country except the United States should have the right to fish. These are the reasons why the Bill is necessary at the present time. But incidentally I think it will prove effective in preventing what hon. members of this House from fishing countries seem to think it desirable to prevent—steam trawling on the high seas as well as in territorial waters. My hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) has made a suggestion, and I always pay regard to his sugegstions because I know they are made in the very best of good faith. But I may say that the question to which he refers has already been taken up. I explained to the House this afternoon that last spring or early in the summer, in Washington, I had a conference with those responsible for the amendment of the United States fisheries and with Sir Edward Morris, the Prime Minister of Newfoundland, concerning the steps to be taken to prevent fishing by means of beam trawls upon the high seas outside the territorial waters of these countries. We all agreed that we would, during the fishing season following take steps to ascertain what the actual result of these beam trawlers' operations were. Carrying out that arrangement, the Marine and Fisheries Department have had representatives on the beam trawlers during the past season and also representatives on certain of the fishing schooners, in order to ascertain what effect the beam trawlers had on the fisheries, and also what effect they were having on the fishermen engaged in other methods of fishing that were in vogue before beam trawling came into use. The United States gathered similar information, and the Government of Newfoundland, I presume, has done the same. So, we shall start with some information as to the results of beam trawling. And if the Governments of these three countries come to the conclusion that beam trawling is injurious to the fishing industry of these countries, it will be easy for them to pass regulations to prevent fish being sold or shipped that were caught on beam trawlers. And thus, so far as these three countries are concerned, we shall bring this form of fishing to an end. Or we could prohibit beam trawlers from being fitted out in and sailing from our ports. But other countries also have beam trawlers. However, if these three countries agree, it is reasonable to believe that the British Government also will make some provision with regard to beam trawling in waters frequented by the fishermen of the United States, Canada and Newfoundland. But we also have to deal with France, Italy or any other country that chooses to send out beam trawlers to fish in the high seas, as they have the right to do. But while we cannot prevent this, we can make laws to prevent the ports of Canada being made the base of operation of these trawlers from across the seas. And this Bill, I think, is the first step in that direction, and will have a considerable effect in preventing trawlers being fitted out to cross the seas and to enter into competition unfairly with our fishermen—because the fisherman of France is paid a bounty on the fish he takes and carries back to France in a cured condition. So, while this Bill will not prevent steam trawling, it will operate in the direction of preventing the ports of Canada being made a base for the fitting out of these beam trawlers to engage in operations in the waters about the shores of Canada and on the Banks. Hon. gentlemen opposite have discussed this question from the standpoint that the danger to be guarded against is that of the beam trawlers along the shores of Nova Scotia occasionally making incursions inside the three-mile limit.

There is no doubt that it is most desirable not only that they should be prevented from coming within the three-mile limit at all but that they also should be prevented from operating off the shores of Nova Scotia. But that is not the only danger. The delegation that came here last year and interviewed the Prime Minister and myself, came representing the different fishing counties of Nova Scotia, among others Lunenburg, and it was pointed out to us that the men in Lunenburg who engaged very largely in deep sea fishing were as much opposed to the operation of these steam trawlers along the banks and at points a long distance from the Nova Scotia coast as to their operation along the shore or just outside the three-mile limit because the fishermen from Lunenburg operating on the banks with the old-fashioned system of hand trawls and other appliances other than steam trawls said that their industry was imperilled by the fact that from time to time the other trawls, operated by steam tugs moving about from place to place had actually destroyed their gear. They would set out trawls in certain places and would be making good catches when the steam trawler, seeing what was going on, would come down with a view of sweeping the waters in that locality and would destroy their nets and other gear; it was stated that some fishermen had lost $500 in a single night by injury done in that way by steam trawls operating on the banks a long distance from Nova Scotia and they felt that in respect to many counties of Nova Scotia where men engaged in deep sea fishing it was as important that, if it could be arranged by international arrangement or otherwise, steam trawling should be prevented on the banks as on nearer points. The French trawler carries on its operations largely on the Banks. It gets its coal at Sydney and other points to carry on its operations on the Banks in competition with our fishermen, destroying, if the contention is true, the immature fish to a great extent and destroying the gear, nets and appliances of our fishermen.

So hon. gentlemen will see that it is not only the careful patrolling of the coast of Nova Scotia or of Canada and keeping these trawlers without the three-mile limit, but that as great danger to our fishing industry may occur by their operation on the banks far-distant from the littoral of Nova Scotia and other parts of Canada. While I would not contend that the passage of this Act alone as it stands is going to remedy the evils which may result from steam trawling, yet it is a first step towards preventing the ports of our country being made bases from which the operation of the steam trawler is carried on and if Canada and the United States and Newfoundland come to an agreement the conditions may be greatly improved. In a short time all this information will be collected and another conference will be held. If it is then decided by these countries to prevent steam trawling by vessels fitted out at their ports and owned by their citizens and if all three countries and Great Britain enact laws for that purpose and prevent steam trawlers from France and other countries from using their ports as bases of operation, then can be accomplished the prevention, in great measure of what the fishermen of this country, what the hon. member for Gloucester and other hon. members believe may be a very great source of destruction to the fishermen and very great injury to the public interest.

That is the position in which the matter stands to-day. It will be followed up by the Government. As soon as this information is obtained, a further conference will be held with the authorities of Newfoundland and the United States. It is to be hoped that the result will be to bring about results that will be in the interest of the protection of the fisheries of Canada, but this Bill is not introduced primarily for that object. Hon. gentlemen have discussed it as if that was its object. That is not it, incidentally it is a move in that direction; the objects it was sought to attain I have already explained to the House.

Bill reported.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COCHRANE moved second reading of Bill No. 64, respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He said: This is merely to extend the time for the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway from Winnipeg to or past Edmonton, which is called the prairie section. The agreement expired on the first of December and we have extended that time.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

Mr. OLIVER: What is the purpose of this legislation?

Mr. COCHRANE: Merely to extend the time to complete the prairie section of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway.

Mr. OLIVER: The prairie section has been completed for the matter of a couple of years.

Mr. COCHRANE: It has not, with all due respect.

Mr. OLIVER: I am only asking for information and perhaps I should not have said that so positively. What completion is contemplated under the terms of this Bill? As I understand it, the prairie section extends to Wolf creek, and I know that trains have been running to Wolf creek

Mr. COCHRANE: There are about 800 miles yet to be ballasted up on that section according to the inspecting engineer's report.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will this extension complete it?

Mr. COCHRANE: This should be the last extension.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand that the part of the road between Winnipeg and Wolf creek is not ballasted?

Mr. COCHRANE: The roadbed in places has to be widened out according to the specifications. It has not been rounded out and widened as the specifications call for.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—MOUNTAIN SECTION.

On motion of Mr. Cochrane, Bill No. 65, respecting the National Transcontinental railway, was read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the chair).

Mr. COCHRANE: This is to extend the time for the completion of the mountain section of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. CARVELL: This is the National Transcontinental railway. The Bill speaks about the western division of the National Transcontinental railway.

Mr. BORDEN: That is what it is called. The Act incorporating the National Transcontinental railway dealt with it all the way from Moncton to Prince Rupert. It includes all the road.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the minister any idea of what remains to be done on the mountain section?

Mr. COCHRANE: I cannot give my friend the exact number of miles, but I have discussed the matter, not only with the inspecting engineer, but with the president, and he feels that it cannot be completed before 1914. Last year was an exceedingly bad year for labour. Every road and every kind of construction had the same complaint to make. In the latter part of the year the Bulgarians and other class of people left to go to the war. A tremendous number went away. The president and inspecting engineer do not think they can complete the mountain section before 1914.

Mr. OLIVER: This Bill refers to the prairie section. There is nothing in it referring to the mountain section.

Mr. CARVELL: It refers to the prairie section of the National Transcontinental and it only gives the Governor in Council power to extend the time for completion up to 1st December, 1913.

Mr. COCHRANE: That was when the time expired, last December. This is merely extending the time.

Mr. BORDEN: The Bill that we passed a moment ago had relation to the corporate capacity of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to complete the road within a certain period; therefore it was necessary to have the Bill which we have just passed. The Bill that is now before the House is to enable the Government to pass an Order in Council agreeing to that extended period. That is also necessary. As I understand it, it relates to only the prairie section, because if I remember the statutes of last year correctly, the time for completion was not limited to the same period in respect of the mountain section, and therefore further legislation in respect to the section is unnecessary. But at that time it was apprehended that the prairie section would be completed within the limit fixed by that statute. Unfortunately the expectations of the company in that regard have not been realized, and therefore it is necessary in order to complete the arrangement, so far as the power of the Government is concerned, to pass this Bill in respect to the prairie section. No similar provision is at present necessary in respect to the mountain section.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

PATENT APPEALS.

Mr. DOHERTY moved second reading of Bill No. 84, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister explain?

Mr. DOHERTY: The purpose of this Bill is to transfer to the Exchequer Court the appellate jurisdiction that is now conferred by law upon the Governor in Council in cases where the applicant for a patent finds his application refused by the Patent Commissioner. Under the law as it now stands there is an appeal from the Patent Commissioner to the Governor in Council. This Bill proposes that that appeal should be from the Patent Commissioner to the Exchequer Court. I think it will be obvious to everybody that the Exchequer Court is a tribunal better fitted to deal with appeals of that kind than the Governor in Council. That is the whole purpose of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the preamble is adopted, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if there is any machinery by which this appeal is prosecuted? It says that a party may appeal. It might be difficult for the ordinary man to know how he is going to get before this court if there is no machinery provided somewhere else in this Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: I fancy that the procedure under the Exchequer Court Act would be sufficient to enable this party to lodge his information before the Exchequer Court and that he would proceed as he would in any other case in which the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a new jurisdiction by way of appeal.

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill adds the section contained in it to the section of the Exchequer Court Act which enumerates the cases in which the Exchequer Court shall have jurisdiction and then the subsequent sections of the Act provide how proceedings in cases in which the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction shall be conducted. I do not think there is need for making a special form of procedure to bring a case before the Exchequer Court. It is the initiation of a judicial proceeding proper as the appeal from the decision of the Patent Commissioner is not an appeal from the decision of a judicial officer but an appeal from the decision of one who sits in an administrative capacity.

Mr. McKENZIE: The great virtue of an appeal to the Governor in Council was that there was no expense in connection with it and no particular form of procedure. Any person could go before the Government and tell his story and there was no counsel required and no technical procedure was laid down. That was a desirable thing in connection with this simple appeal to the Governor in Council. Now the party is told by a few words of legislation that instead of that remedy he has a right to appeal to the Exchequer Court. How that is brought about without special printing and expense I do not understand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why not add that the same procedure would apply as in an ordinary case?

Mr. DOHERTY: That addition might perhaps be made. But after this Bill has passed, this clause will be inserted in the Exchequer Court Act as forming part of it, and to the case provided for as being a case in which the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction all the provisions about procedure will apply. As to the hon. gentleman's observation about the matter of expense, it is true that it may have been less expensive to make an appeal to the Governor in Council, but I am not quite sure that it was so because, after all, the party appearing before the Governor in Council had to take means to get before the Governor in Council what his grievances were and I think that in most instances there was a printed case just as there would be on an appeal to the Supreme Court. Counsel also appeared and there were all the expenses that might be incurred in an appeal to the Exchequer Court. Therefore, it is problematical whether the expense will be any greater while on the other hand we have given to the party aggrieved a tribunal in a much better position to deal satisfactorily with his appeal than the Governor in Council could possibly be. The Governor in Council after all is not a court of justice and is not equipped as a court of justice is to deal with questions of law or fact. Any disadvantage that may possibly result from the point of view of expense to the party to whom the appeal is given will be more than compensated for by the character of the tribunal to which he is allowed to appeal.

Mr. CARVELL : I do not think that anybody will doubt the proposition of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) that the Exchequer Court is the proper tribunal to which these matters should be referred. It is a much better remedy than to go before the Governor in Council. I understand the point taken by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is that we are providing for an appeal and we are adding a sub-section to section 23 of the Exchequer Court Act. The Exchequer Court Act gives jurisdiction in cases of patent and so on, but it does not provide for an appeal. The point which my hon. friend is raising is as to whether there is sufficient machinery in the Exchequer Court Act to provide for the appeal. I have not gone into it carefully, but I did not know that the Exchequer Court was an appellate court.

Mr. McKENZIE : The Exchequer Court is not an appellate court.

Mr. CARVELL : The question is as to whether there is sufficient machinery in the Exchequer Court Act to provide the modus by which you can get the case from the decision of the commissioner of patents to the Exchequer Court and as to whether you would be compelled to go through the ordinary process. If so, that would be a hardship on many litigants. Suppose that a man goes before the Commissioner of Patents and the Commissioner of Patents decides against him; it may be an invention which is not patentable or it may be that the article has been patented by some other person. The applicant is not satisfied with the decision, he wants to get it before the proper tribunal and the Exchequer Court is the proper tribunal. Have we the machinery in the Exchequer Court Act by which we can get it there or have we to commence suit in the Exchequer Court the same as we would have to do in an ordinary case ?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no doubt that the Exchequer Court is a court of original jurisdiction. As I pointed out in answer to the member for North Cape Breton, while this is an appeal it is an appeal not from the judgment of a court. When this proceeding will come to the Exchequer Court it will come as an original proceeding in so far as it constitutes a judicial proceeding.

Mr. LEMIEUX : It is a court of revision?

Mr. DOHERTY: Precisely. Under the Exchequer Court Act to-day a party, provided he has a petition of right granted, would have the right to bring any claim which he was seeking to enforce before the Exchequer Court and there is a procedure for it. This would be in the nature of a complaint that he was aggrieved by the administrative determination of this departmental officer. He would lay an information before the Exchequer Court setting forth the facts and asking that the ruling be set aside and a new ruling made in his favour. I do not see that there is any more necessity for making a particular method of procedure for a matter in which the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction than there was need when the law simply said that there should be an appeal to the Governor General in Council.

Mr. CARVELL: I think that I can point out to the minister something that might give rise to a difficulty. If you bring a suit in the Exchequer Court there are two parties; there is the complaint of one party against the other party. There is provision made for service on the other party. Would the Minister of Justice contend that the other party would be the Commissioner of Patents or the Minister of Agriculture or the Governor in Council ? Or, who would it be ?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman will see that there is provision here as to how he is to deal with what should be considered the other party. A party applies for a patent and the proceeding is, in the great bulk of cases, ex parte.

Mr. CARVELL: Unless there has been a caveat filed.

Mr. DOHERTY: When an applicant is refused his patent by the Commissioner, he now has an appeal to the Privy Council, and this amendment gives him an appeal instead to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And he would get his decision much quicker from the Exchequer Court than from the Privy Council.

Mr. DOHERTY: Much quicker.

Mr. CARVELL: It would seem to me that you should provide some easy means of transferring the papers from the Commissioner to the Judge of the Exchequer Court without putting the applicant to all the trouble of going through a legal procedure.

Mr. DOHERTY: He will have his appeal now to the Exchequer Court and the Exchequer Court can make whatever rules it deems most convenient for the hearing of such appeal.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have a great many appeals now from different courts and there is always some well-beaten path laid down by which the appellant can get from one court to another. I think there should be provision made directing how the appeal should be taken.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Civil Government—Royal Northwest Mounted Police, $19,300.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has Mr. White resigned?

Mr. BORDEN: Mr. White retired on the 1st of January and his assistant, Mr. Fortescue, who is a very capable officer, has been promoted to be commissioner.

Mr. OLIVER: I would much rather if that item stood unless it is particularly urgent.

Mr. BORDEN: I will let the item of contingencies stand. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition had charge of this department for a number of years and he might wish to ask some questions.

Mr. OLIVER: It is understood that we can discuss matters concerning the Mounted Police on this item?

Mr. BORDEN: Certainly.

Civil Government—High Commissioner's Office, London, $28,074.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What have you decided about the new offices that we discussed last year before the departure of the right hon. member for London? We passed a resolution in this House that Canada should have offices in London worthy of our status. Australia and the other colonies have acquired splendid buildings in London; and I think that we owe it to our country to have in the centre of the world something of which every Canadian would be proud. The offices we have at the present time are very inadequate. We want for Canada the best under a progressive government.

Mr. BORDEN: There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says. At the same time a good many considerations must be taken into account. I had an opportunity last summer of looking at a number of sites that had been suggested. In the first place, for the purpose of determining the site that should be secured, you must come to a conclusion as to what character of building you propose to construct and to what purposes you propose to devote it. The particular site that might be most useful for the work of the High Commissioner himself might not be the best site for other purposes of the public service, such as the immigration service. If the country should acquire a very large site and erect a very large building, there might be a good deal of difficulty in utilizing all the space, unless some arrangement could be made by which the various provinces of Canada would be willing to house themselves in the same building. At the present time they do not seem to be inclined to adopt that course. I think the province of British Columbia has already acquired a site. The site which the Ontario Government has in the Strand is in a very advantageous position so far as the number of people passing it every day is concerned. The offices of the Quebec Government on Kingsway are exceedingly commodious and well situated, but they may not have quite equal advantage in that respect. The idea got abroad that the Dominion Government were rather anxious to acquire a site in some advantageous position; and I am not absolutely sure that that idea reduced the prices which were suggested to persons who were employed by the High Commissioner at our instance to obtain information in regard to this matter. I can only say that the subject has not been forgotten; but up to the present time for the reasons I have mentioned, no very great progress has been made.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Just leave an item there.

Item stands.

Civil Government—Department of External Affairs, $17,950.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many officials have you in the office of Sir Joseph Pope?

Mr. BORDEN: Just the same as last year with the exception of one stenographer who was taken over from the Department of the Secretary of State and who was necessary for the increasing business of the office.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that the new wing is about completed. Are they going to be moved into that new wing?

Mr. BORDEN: Unfortunately I have not been able to secure accommodation for them. I have had very urgent and repeated requests from Sir Joseph Pope to house them somewhere else. I should like very much to have that Department within easy distance, because a great deal of time is lost whenever I desire to consult with any of the officials. We hope at an early date to make some further arrangements.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, Part IV, for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. Reid (Minister of Customs).

Supplement to the Fourteenth Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the year ended March 31, 1912.—Mr. White (Minister of Finance).

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE—MOTION TO SUMMON WITNESS TO BAR OF HOUSE.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO moved:

That with respect to the inquiry now pending before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts respecting the payment of certain moneys to the Diamond Light and Heating Company, Limited, of Montreal, more particularly set out in the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts submitted to the House on the fourteenth instant, that Mr. R. C. Miller a witness called and sworn upon said inquiry on Friday the fourteenth day of February instant be summoned to appear before the Bar of the House on Tuesday the eighteenth day of February instant at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon and thereafter until discharged by the House, then and there to answer certain questions which on Friday the fourteenth day of February, 113, he did refuse to answer before the said Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts and particularly that the witness do answer the following question:—

To whom did you pay the sum of forty-one thousand and twenty-six dollars for the purpose of securing contracts from the Government of the Dominion of Canada as alleged by you amounting to one hundred and seventeen thousand dollars or thereabouts between the month of June, 1907, until you ceased to be president of the Diamond Light and Heating Company in June, 1911?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is a matter which is altogether new to the House. The report was brought in the other day, and I desire to see it. I looked at it cursorily, but it was taken away from me. No notice has been given of this motion as is usually done, and I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that a day be set down for the discussion of this matter.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I understood that when we reported the proceedings to the House that would act as a notice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, it does not.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I have not found anywhere that it is necessary to give notice. Towards the close of last session we had an investigation into this same item before the Public Accounts Committee. A gentleman named Bain gave evidence. He was secretary of this company, and he testified that $42,000 had been paid out by the company to the witness now in question for the purpose of enabling him to get contracts for the company. Mr. Miller was also suppœnaed, but did not appear before the committee, and an Order of the House was obtained about the last day of last session to compel him to appear before the committee, but the Sergeant-at-Arms was unable to serve the order before the House rose, and so the proceedings terminated. This year we took proceedings on the same matter and issued a summons for his attendance. He appeared last Friday morning, and in his evidence stated that he had paid out $41,026 for the purpose of securing $117,000 of contracts from the Government. I shall read the exact evidence, which will more clearly illustrate the position than anything I could say. I quote from the evidence of this witness, R. C. Miller, given before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts on Friday last.

Q. And commencing with March 31, 1907, and up to the close of the your presidency the company did a business with the Government of some $117,000? A. Well, I could not say whether that is correct or not, but I believe it to be correct.

Q. You believe it to be correct? A. Yes.

Q. The evidence showed, Mr. Miller, that a resolution had been passed by the directors of the Diamond Light and Heating Company in the month of June, I think it was, of 1907, authorizing you, as president, to make expenditures of money to secure business. Do you recall that resolution? A. Yes.

Q. Have you the books of the company with you? A. No.

Q. They would not now be in your possession? A. No.

Q. Do you recall the resolution? A. I do.

Q. Was that resolution passed at your request? A. Yes.

Q. I understood you represented to the directors that it took a lot of money to secure this amount of business? A. I represented that it would be necessary to use monies in order to secure business.

Q. Did you explain why it would require the expenditure of money to secure the business you were after? A. No, not in detail to any extent. I do not remember exactly what explanation they were given.

Q. What explanation did you give in general terms? A. I could not say. I do not remember what explanation I gave.

Q. You simply told the directors it took money to get this business? A. I could not remember what I did say.

Q. Can you remember anything else than that? A. No, I do not think there was any explanation given in detail.

Q. You simply said it took money to get this business, and, in pursuance of that request, they passed a resolution authorizing you to expend money to get it? A. Yes, to use what money I deemed advisable in order to secure business.

Q. That was in June, 1907, and it was between the date of that resolution and the close of your presidency that the business amounted to the figure named, $117,000. Now, Mr. Miller will you tell us what monies the company placed in your hands to secure business between those dates? A. The total amount was $41,026.

Q. Mr. Bain gave the total amount, and produced cheques making it some $42,000. A. He was not correct.

Q. Have you checked the cheques over since with his evidence? A. No, but I may state that this matter is in the hands of the courts and the amount was specified in the writ against me for an accounting, and it was checked over at that time and that is why I know the amount.

Q. Do you mean to say it was checked over on sworn evidence in court? A. On sworn evidence, and I also corroborated it at the company's office.

Q. And the amount was $41,026? A. Yes.

Q. So that money was placed in your hands between June, 1907, and June, 1911, in order to get some $117,000 worth of Government business? A. In order to get what business we could. I could not state the amount.

Q. You have stated the amount as $117,000? A. I said I believed it was that.

Q. That is the evidence given by Mr. Bain which you believe to be correct? A. I believe that to be correct.

Q. And beyond that the business of your company, according to Mr. Bain's evidence, only amounted to about $2,000? A. It was not very much. I could not say as to that.

Q. So that it amounts to this: that you were paid $41,026 by the Diamond Light and Heating Company in order to secure $117,000 odd of Government business? A. That money was drawn by me during those years.

Q. My next question is this: Will you give the committee a statement of where you paid that money? A. I would beg to state that, owing to litigation at the present time going on in the courts in Montreal, and two cases which have yet to come up on which the evidence has not been given, I would respectfully request that I be not forced to answer that question, because I think it would be prejudicial to my case in court to give these details at the present time.

Further on, the question is put to him specifically: :

Q. Mr. Miller, I will ask you again to tell us to whom you paid that money? A. Well, gentlemen, I cannot do any more than what I said before, that I do not feel like giving that information at the present time, as I feel that I must protect myself in connection with my case that is in the hands of the courts.

Q. You refuse to answer? A. Well, I have given my reason.

That is practically a resume of the ground on which we ask for the order. As far as I am able to gather, the mere fact that there is litigation in court respecting the same subject matter is no reason for the refusal of the witness to answer the question. It turns out that the case about which he speaks has just been tried. The action was for an accounting by this witness for this $41,000, which the company said was illegally paid. The action went against him, and the case is now on appeal. Any evidence which he might give before the committee could not be used on that appeal, because the appeal would be tried on the evidence already given. It is true, as he says, that there are a couple of cases arising out of the same case by way of interpleader. I do not think that he can be prejudiced in any manner, because the rules of the House expressly provide that any evidence given either before the House or before the committee is privileged and cannot be used in any court of justice without the full consent of the House. I ask therefore that the witness be asked to appear before the Bar of the House to answer the question as to the person to whom be paid this particular sum of money.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Speaker, before you rule on the point of order raised by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, I might state that the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) has fairly correctly stated the facts as they were disclosed before the Public Acccounts Committee, except that he did not state the whole reason given by the witness as to why he did not want to make that disclosure. The reason will be found on page 12 of the proceedings of the committee for last Friday. Mr. Miller stated:

Well, Mr. Chairman, I started to give those reasons some time ago and you told me to sit down. In connection with the litigation now on in Montreal, my reason—or rather an additional reason—for not giving the destination of that money is this: owing to the fact that I never paid a dollar of that money to any member of Parliament, to any senator or any official of the Government, I therefore, in addition to my other reasons, think it is a matter of my own private affairs between the company and myself; and as we are at present in litigation in the courts I hold that it would prejudice my case in the courts.

I thought it only fair that the whole of the facts should be placed on 'Hansard.'

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I would beg to submit to you a case in this House in 1891, which will probably still be in the memory of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. Mr. Michael Connolly declined to submit his books to the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections. The report of the committee was presented to the House on the 5th of June, 1891. It will be found on page 205 of the Commons Journals of that year, volume XXV. On the same date on which the report was submitted it was moved by Sir John Thompson, seconded by Mr. Dewdney, that Michael Connolly, the witness named in the report be ordered to attend at the Bar of the House. So that evidently in that case no notice was given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not a member of the committee. For my part I just raised the point of order, and I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: On referring to the English cases as well as to the Canadian, I cannot find any instance where notice was given. With reference to the matter, Bourinot says, at page 559:

If a witness should refuse to appear on receiving the order of the chairman, his conduct will be reported to the House, and an order immediately made for his attendance.

But I have found no case where a notice was given that it would be brought up on a certain day.

If he should still refuse to obey, he may be ordered to be sent for in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Then he says:

Similar proceedings are taken when a witness refuses to answer questions.

My opinion is that it does not require a notice of motion.

Motion agreed to.

PARCEL POST.

On the Orders of the day being called:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have just received a letter from the Grain Growers' Association, containing a resolution passed in favour of the parcel post system, and I would ask my hon. friend the Postmaster General if he has taken any steps towards establishing a parcel post system in Canada since our last discussion in reference to this matter?

Mr. PELLETIER: I declared then that I would deal with this matter some time during the present session, and I am now working at it.

PRIVATE BILLS.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Lesperance for the third reading of Bill No. 20, respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Maclean (South York), resumed from February 14.

Mr. CARVELL: When the hour for the discussion of Private Bills expired on Friday evening, I was addressing the House on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). As the hon. member said: We have for years been giving to public utility corporations the right to issue their stock practically without restrictions, and that we have to make a start sometime, because the conditions with respect to over-capitalization of public corporations, and especially utility companies, have become almost unbearable. I was surprised at reading in the press a statement made as the result of an investigation, with respect to the enormous amount of capital stock issued by express companies as compared with the actual money—a mere bagatelle—invested in them. I do not propose to go into that matter, as I understand it will be discussed in due course, but it is an evidence why we should inquire very carefully into the amount of capitalization the Bill allows this public utility corporation to possess.

Another reason why I think hon. gentlemen should vote for this amendment is that we have no evidence as to what became of the $5,000,000 increase allowed to this company in 1911. I have some doubts whether the whole of that capital has been called in, or, if so, whether it has all been expended in the interests of the company. We are now asked to grant another $5,000,000 of capitalization, or an increase of 50 per cent, and, as I stated on Friday evening, after hard pressure in committee, the representatives of the company were able to show us that they hoped within a number of years to spend $2,850,000, leaving over $2,000,000 entirely unaccounted for. If this stock is allowed to go to the public, and gets into the hands of bona fide holders—which is the great difficulty, as these gentlemen who get watered stock always take care that it is sold to the public—and you apply to any board that might have jurisdiction over them for a reduction of rates, the innocent man comes up and says: I have paid par for my stock; I have a right to the dividends, and it would be unfair to reduce the rates to such an extent as to prevent my recovering dividends on the stock for which I have paid par. This company, as I have said, has been doing an honourable business, and we have no evidence that there has been any water in its stock. We believe that it has a right to the issues of whatever stock is necessary to perfect its terminals, extend its transportation lines, and carry out any projects necessary to make the scheme a success, but, as the representatives of the company have said that they hope to expend less than $3,000,000 within a number of years, it seems to me there should be some restriction placed upon the issue of the stock in such large amounts as are asked for in this Bill. When you come to the matter of treating this company unfairly, as compared with the treatment received by other companies, my answer is that no company has ever been before this Parliament in my day to which this principle could be applied with as little difficulty as it can be applied to the company now under discussion. These gentlemen do not require all this money, and the Board of Railway Commissioners would certainly give them authority to issue their stock as they require it. A precedent would thus be established without injury to anyone, and, when the next company comes along with a real kite-flying proposition, the precedent will have been established, and the matter can be dealt with accordingly. There was a time when, if a member were to ask that certain restrictive clauses be placed in a Bill during its consideration in committee, he was looked upon as blocking the Bill, but that day has gone by, because the Railway Committee had the good sense to frame what they called standard clauses, thus establishing a precedent applicable to all cases, and the chairman may now simply run his pen through any section of the proposed Bill which is not in accordance with the recognized——

Mr. LANCASTER: He does more than run his pen through it.

Mr. CARVELL: He strikes it out, at any rate, and in its place he substitutes the standard clause. I propose that this Bill should contain a standard clause regarding the capitalization of all these great companies, and, for the reasons which I have given, I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOL: I think some of my hon. friends are labouring under a confusion of ideas. They seem to make no distinction between a public utility corporation, such as a street railway—which has to have special legislation, and which, in its nature, is a monopoly—and a steamship corporation, which can be incorporated under the Companies Act of Canada as it stands to-day. It may be a little ludicrous to give, at this stage of our national history, the reasons for this distinction; but perhaps it is well to look now and then at basic principles, and thus arrive at a fair conclusion as to whether it is right or reasonable or proper to do what is suggested in the present instance. The reasons why a railway corporation under the Railway Act has a special opportunity to deal with these affairs, are twofold: first, the railway corporation has the power of eminent domain, that is, they have the power to go upon any man's farm and take his land, paying reasonable compensation; they can go into the city and take lands on the same terms, and nobody can say them nay. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company cannot take from any man one foot of his land. If we want a wharf, we have to buy a place for it and pay the price to the owner, just as anybody starting a newspaper has to buy a place, or a man who wishes to start a wholesale house or to run a farm, must buy a place. We have to buy all we get at the market value. The second point is that every railway corporation that I know of in this country has been aided by the Government of Canada; and very properly so; for they are doing a public service, and they have been given aid by the public of Canada, because the Government does not wish to operate all the railway systems of this country. The Government has the right to take them over if it chooses. But the Government prefers to regulate charges by means of the Railway Commission. In no way does this apply to this or to any other steamship company. We buy our steamships, like any other people, at the market price. We compete for trade like any other people engaged in business. We have no monopoly; the lakes are open to all. We are affected by the railways, of course, because during the summer, which is the only season when we can run, we have to run for lower rates than the Railway Commission permits the railways to charge, or we cannot get the trade. There is no suggestion that this company, or any other transportation company engaged in navigation has done any harm or is not dealing fairly with the public. I have heard the suggestion that the ocean steamship rates had been raised by six cents? Whether that be so or not, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company or any other navigation company of this country is not responsible for it, and is not making any profit out of it.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it not the Furness Company that has been making this raise?

Mr. BRISTOL: No; they are only one of the many carrying companies of the world. What has the Furness or any other company done? At the instigation of the people of this country they have invested their money here in Canada, they have put it in the stock of this company. Certain English capital has come into the company. Why? Because the company has grown so big and requires so much money that it is thought wise to bring in the capital from outside of Canada. One of the greatest needs of Canada to-day is money. Go to your bank and try to borrow money, and you will find that out. When a company gets a large capitalization, you need to get foreign capital into that company, because in the old countries from whence this capital comes, they have a surplus, whereas a country like Canada is always in need of money and men. Neither directly nor indirectly have the Furness people an interest in this company except as investors, like any others. Whether they have or have not made money in their Atlantic trade, I take it that this Parliament has nothing to do with that; what we have to do with is the navigation companies of Canada. I have tried to point out, I hope with clearness, we are largely different from a railway company. Each of these companies has special powers. A street railway company has a monopoly and a privilege and must have its rates controlled by the city. But there is not a man in this country to-day who cannot go, right now, to the provincial secretary's office and get out a charter for a navigation company that is much broader, much more liberal, than the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company's charter is to-day. Now, that makes this a case of special legislation. We are informed here that in 1845, before there was a Companies Act, the Richelieu Company got a charter, and they have gone on, in my humble judgment, much against their own interest—amending that charter, instead of coming under the General Companies Act and getting a broader charter such as other steamship companies have. I say unless you amend the Act you simply compel us to take out a charter like any other transportation company. That is what we shall be compelled to do because we cannot be put to any disadvantage as compared with other companies. There is the case: This is either special legislation, or it is purely academic. If any of you gentlemen are sincere in your view that it would be a good thing for the steamship interests of the country to make a change, then amend the Companies Act and put the legislation in such a way that all will be affected alike. But do not pass special legislation affecting one corporation which the facts show to be a bona fide company and doing a bona fide business. One hon. gentleman asks about this $5,000,000 of an increase of stock. I know as a matter of fact that every dollar was paid up in full for that stock. It is stated that there is no such thing as watered stock. What we object to is special legislation which affects us and does not affect our competitor, and the result of which must be to force us to abandon our legislation, of which we are somewhat proud as the oldest steamship company of Canada, and come under the General Companies Act. As regards that legislation if it were up for discussion, there are important features to be considered. It must be borne in mind, that, as I have said, we have no power of eminent domain, we have received no aid from the people—no navigation company has received any aid of that character—and we are all competitors. What happens in the spring? The various navigation companies inland lines, including the Canadian Pacific railway with their steamships, and the Canadian Northern railway with their steamships, compete at Port Arthur for trade, and the one that will carry at the lowest rates gets that trade. There is no suggestion that there is a combine, and no suggestion that there has been anything done under the laws of this company that was unfair, so far as this company or any other navigation company is concerned. Under these circumstances, I strongly urge that there should be no special legislation concerning this company. But if my hon. friend is in earnest, if he wants to do something as regards the navigation companies, let him bring in legislation to affect all alike, and let us all be on the same footing.

Mr. EMMERSON: I wish to congratulate the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, upon the presence of my hon. friend from Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol). The hon. member endeavours to remove a confusion of ideas which he says exists in the minds of hon. members with respect to the principle involved in the amendment. Had he been here at any time during the past three weeks, he would have learned that that confusion of ideas existed then; I am sorry he did not come sooner in order to attempt to remove that confusion. From his use of the pronoun 'we,' I infer that my hon. friend is a member of this company and I think I may fairly assume that he considers the Bill and the amendment from that standpoint. From the standpoint of the general public, I think that the amendment of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) is a very pertinent one; and while it is true that we have no general legislation on the point, it is well, even preparatory to that general legislation to adopt the principle in relation to isolated Bills, pending the time when the Government shall take action to make the principle applicable generally. I do not wish to take up the time of the House at this moment to discuss the principle. That has already been fully discussed. I want to say that I will record my vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend from Toronto says there is no suggestion of an amalgamation in connection with the lines that are competing for trade at Port Arthur and Fort William. As a matter of fact, this very company has taken over a number of navigation lines in the last year or two.

Mr. BOYCE: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia has spoken on the amendment already.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has already spoken on the amendment.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): It has occurred to me that the opposition to this legislation is somewhat invidious, especially from certain hon. gentlemen opposite. This company possesses no franchise or monopoly in the sense that these words are ordinarily used. It is a navigation company engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers on our inland waters. As has been said by my hon. friend from Toronto, under the general Companies Act of the Dominion, and persons may to-day obtain a charter authorizing them as a company to carry on precisely the same business. It seems to me that there is a clear distinction between the case of this company and the case of a street railway company or an electric light or power company, or a railway company. With regard to these companies, I think there is a general view that some supervision should be exercised by Parliament or through a public utilities commission, for reasons that are obvious to the House.

Now this company is simply asking for power to increase its capital from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 for the proper purposes of the company, not for the purpose of restricting competition, but for the purpose of enlarging its business, of adding to its ships and terminals, and of enabling it to compete with others for the trade of the country. There is no suggestion in this Bill, nor has any argument been urged conclusively in my judgment, that the increase of this company's capital from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 will have the slightest effect in restricting in any way competition between companies or between individuals engaged in the business of navigation; quite the contrary. The express purpose of this increase of the capital from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, as was stated by the president of the company, who is also a member of this House, is for the purpose of enabling it to purchase additional ships and additional terminals at Port Arthur or Fort William, and to extend its business.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Can the minister tell me how many businesses this company has already merged?

Mr. WHITE: I do not know how many companies this company has merged, but I do know that to-morrow my hon. friend or any person or any firm or any company that will incorporate itself can engage in business in competition with this company. That is the point to be borne in mind in connection with this legislation. There is no suggestion, I repeat, that this company possesses any monopoly, nor is it a franchise holding company in the ordinary sense of the term.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Does it compete with franchise companies, say with railways?

Mr. WHITE: It competes with railways and with all other navigation companies that do business on the lakes. It has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Toronto that it is in competition with the Canadian Northern steamships and the Canadian Pacific Railway steamships, and it will be in competition with the Grand Trunk Railway steamships, and with the American lines that ply from Port Arthur and Fort William to Buffalo. Now it seems to me that it is repugnant to the common sense of this House that it should be said that the increase of this capital from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 will have the effect in any way of limiting or restricting competition on the great lakes; quite the contrary. I repeat that this increase is for the purpose of enabling this company to compete in a more advantageous way than it has been able to do in the past with any of the other companies doing business on the lakes.

My hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell), spoke of over-capitalization. It seems to me that he used the word in a very equivocal sense. Over-capitalization is a term that is used in connection with stock that is sold at a discount, watered stock; but there is no suggestion that there is watered stock in this company. This company was incorporated fifty years ago, and is one of the best known companies in Canada. It has been stated and not contradicted, that not one dollar is watered stock, that every dollar of its capital has been paid for, one hundred dollars per share. There is no suggestion that this company has in view the watering of any stock or the issuing of shares at a discount. It has not the power to issue its shares at a discount, and if we give this company the right to increase its capital from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, the directors must see that these shares are issued of $100 per share, because they have no authority to issue shares at a discount.

Mr. CARVELL: Would they not have the right to give this paid-up stock for property?

Mr. WHITE: Let me ask my hon. friend a question by way of rejoinder. If a company buys property and pays say $5,000 in cash, what is the difference between issuing fifty shares of stock at $100 per share which would put it in funds, and using that money to purchase $5,000 worth of property?

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry my hon. friend is so extremely innocent.

Mr. WHITE: It is all right for my hon. friend to suggest that. My hon. friend has had some experience as a corporation lawyer, but he knows as well as any man in this House that if a company decides to purchase property at a certain price it may do so by buying that property and exchanging it for its shares fully paid; or it may buy in the other way, because there is no difference so far as legal effect is concerned. It may purchase that property for cash, and find the money by issuing its shares at par. I repeat that there is no suggestion that this company proposes to water its stock, or to issue its shares at a discount. There is not one iota of evidence to support that view.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): There is the example of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. WHITE: It has been stated, and not contradicted, that this company has never issued one dollar of its shares as watered stock, and there is no suggestion that it proposes to do anything of the kind. In order to see whether my hon. friend from Carleton is consistent in this matter, let me call his attention to the legislation of May, 1911, with regard to this same company. An application was made to this House when my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was the leader of the Government, and on 19th May, 1911, an Act was passed increasing the capital stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Company from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. So far as I know, the Government took no exception to that.

Mr. BOYCE: Was there an amendment from the hon. member for South York?

Mr. WHITE: I am not sure whether there was or not, but I want to point out the inconsistency of hon. gentlemen opposite. Two years ago an application was made to increase the capital stock of the company from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. I find no fault whatever with hon. gentlemen opposite for allowing that Act to pass. It was very proper legislation. Here is a trading company possessing no monopoly and no franchise, and it comes to Parliament to increase its capital by $5,000,000. This $5,000,000 is wanted for what purpose? The purpose is to purchase vessels to carry on the business to greater advantage, to increase the capital of the company, as every other company and firm in Canada has been obliged to increase its capital during the past few years. It has been suggested by my hon. friend from South York that there should be supervision over this issue by the Railway Commission. I shall speak a little further on with regard to trading and industrial companies generally, but it is a trite observation to make that the principle underlying company incorporation, having reference to a company of limited liability, except with regard to franchise holding companies in the sense in which the term is generally understood, is that if the stock is fully paid up, if it is paid up to the par value of $100 a share, in so far as the public is concerned, it has no cause of complaint. The creditors are protected because they know that $100 has been paid per share, that the stock has not been issued at a discount and that the requirements of the Companies Act in this regard have been complied with.

Now, we come to the question of watered stock. Watered stock is stock that has not been issued for $100 per share; that is to say it is stock that has been issued in exchange for a franchise or properties that have been valued at an exorbitant price, at a price very much more than that which was paid for these properties by the original promoters. The promoters of a street railway company, let us say, obtain a valuable franchise, they sell that franchise to a company for a disproportionately large issue of its capital stock. The public are profoundly interested in that transaction for this reason that there goes with the franchise a liability on the part of the company to observe its covenants, to provide a proper street railway service for the public, to make extensions of street railway lines as they are required, and for that purpose the company should have available a part of its authorized capital issue. In addition to that, it has been found in the case of street railways that, when they are criticised for giving an inadequate service, they frequently point to the fact that they are only paying five or six per cent on the capital stock and that it is impossible to give a better service because of this comparatively small dividend to their shareholders. There has probably been an evil in connection with the original issue of their stock because, if their stock had been issued to a proper amount in exchange for the franchise, they would have been in funds, either from their earnings which would not have been required to pay additional dividends to their shareholders, or they could have put themselves in funds by issuing additional stock for the purpose of taking care of their obligations to the public. The same is true with regard to electrical power and light companies.

But I submit that these companies are in no way on all fours with this company. Any firm, any individual, any company, incorporated under the general Companies Act may enter into competition with this company at any time and my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., and other hon. gentlemen opposite know well that parties seeking incorporation under the Joint Stock Companies Act as a navigation company will get an authorized capitalization of $5,000,000, $10,000,000, $15,000,000 or $25,000,000; there is no restriction upon them, nor should there be, in so far as capital is concerned, because it is in the interest of the country and the public generally that companies should be authorized to raise all the money they can legitimately for the purposes of legitimate trade.

The considerations that arise in connection with street railway, electric power and light and railway companies, which have a monopoly, do not arise in connection with a company like this. Now we come to the case of industrial companies and, as far as I know, it has not been laid down as a principle as yet that there should be supervision in regard to the stock issue of this class of company. I believe that in Germany there is supervision over the stock issues of industrial companies and I should not be surprised at all to find that the day will come—no doubt the legislation to which I refer will come gradually as all legislation of the kind does—when some form of supervision will be exercised even over industrial companies. It will probably be for the purpose of protecting shareholders and people who buy shares. There have been great evils in connection with the issue of watered stock of industrial companies, or in other words in connection with the capitalization of earnings. We have not yet reached that stage with regard to our industrial companies. It seems to me that this company is being singled out rather invidiously. It has been meted out treatment that has not been meted out to any other company doing a similar business, nor could it be meted out to any company which would choose to obtain an incorporation under the General Companies' Act. It was pointed out the other night by the president of this company that the stock was selling at one hundred and sixteen. The president of the company has stated that they propose to issue this stock at par and as I have said before no stock of this company has ever been issued except at par. If you have a stock quotation, let us say, of one hundred and fifteen, every hon. gentleman opposite as well as every hon. gentleman on this side of the House knows that it would be impossible to make an issue of $5,000,000 or $3,000,000 or $2,000,000 upon the market, or to sell it at auction at anything like the quotation of the stock exchange. The stock exchange quotation is for such limited amounts as may be put on the market from day to day, but if a company desires to raise $2,000,000 or $4,000,000 for the purposes of its undertaking it by no means follows that it will be able to get the market price or anything like the market price for stock so issued. The amount of stock that it desires to sell will determine to some extent the price at which it can be issued.

A good deal has been said about melon cutting and, leaving to one side the franchise holding company and the public utilities company, there are some considerations which I wish to draw the attention of the House to in that connection. It is a principle of law that a board of directors may distribute among their shareholders the reserve of the company. The reserve of the company—that is everything in excess of one hundred cents on the dollar, because that provision for one hundred cents on the dollar is to protect the public and the creditors of the company—belongs to the shareholders. That is a thought that I desire to give to the House in connection with this so-called melon cutting. Even if stock is issued at a premium of fifteen or twenty per cent, that premium which goes to the reserve, belongs to the shareholders of the company and may be distributed, if the company is a going concern, among the shareholders. There is another feature; it has been stated that the amount of money which is put into the enterprise will have some relation to freight rates. So it will, but if it is put in in the shape of premium or additional reserve surely it will be taken into consideration just the same in fixing the freight rates. The real evil is not so much the issue, in the case of a company of this kind, at par of stock that may be selling at a slight premium, but the real evil is the possibility of watered stock. But that, as I have said, is an evil which may appertain to any industrial company incorporated in Canada to-day.

It has been said that the grain growers of the West, the farmers of the West, are interested in seeing that this increase of $5,000,000 capital is not granted to this company. It seems to me that precisely the contrary is the fact, and that every man in the West who has products to sell is interested in having competition in the carrying of those products to the markets of the world, and, as I pointed out, that this company must compete with all other companies, Canadian and American, the Canadian Northern railway, Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk and all the American boats that carry grain from Fort William to Buffalo to be forwarded to New York for shipment, this company will relieve the railways to that extent. We have congestion every year at Fort William and Port Arthur. It was not so bad this year as last year.

Let me say, furthering this application for an increase in stock, that the freight rates have been higher this year than last year. Why? As a matter of fact the American bottoms have been so busily engaged in carrying their own grain, as they had large crops in the United States this year, that many of them could not engage in this trade and although the Canadian boats did their best and had a prosperous season, there were not as many boats as last year and their rates were higher. This company simply asks Parliament to do what has been done in hundreds and thousands of cases, to allow this company, as a trading company, to go to its shareholders and get $5,000,000 to enlarge its capacity and to serve the public of Canada. I attribute no improper motives and I hesitate to say that there has been any false reasoning, because I am quite sure that every member is able to reason as lucidly as I can, if he turns his mind to it but I do say from the appearance of things and the development of this debate that it would seem as if this company is sought to be put in an invidious position as compared with other companies and I appeal to the House to deal as fairly with this company as with any other company making its application in the usual course, asking no monopoly, no franchise, but only to be allowed to carry on its business of a trading company, a navigation company in competition with all other firms engaging in the same business, the carrying of the commerce of Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister has suggested that the company is being used in an unfair way. Does the minister know of any other company that has ever been given the privilege which this company asks? I refer especially to the clause giving them permission to use their money entirely at their own discretion. If other companies have been granted that power it would to a large extent be relevant but I do not know of any other company with such wide powers either under Act of Parliament or letters patent under the General Companies' Act.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): That precise clause is in the General Companies Act.

Mr. KNOWLES. For the purposes of the company.

Mr. WHITE: For the purposes of the undertaking of the company; but it would be absolutely ultra vires for that company to divert money to a purpose foreign to the purpose of the company. This clause is taken from the clause in the General Companies Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That cannot be possible. The object of section 2 is to allow the company to employ funds not required for the purpose of its undertaking in any form or manner it sees fit, which would enable it to buy stock in other companies or do as it pleases.

Mr. BORDEN: Temporarily.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not from the Joint Stock Companies Act.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): We must not assume that a Board of Directors will do anything improper with the funds of a company until evidence is brought to our attention that they so design or intend. Suppose my hon. friend were on the board of directors of a company of this kind and the company had made an issue of three or four millions of its stock with sums coming in from time to time, a million or half a million or two million dollars, and let us assume that they had gone ahead with the construction of ships and terminals but that at the time at which a million dollars came to hand payments were not due upon the ships or terminals, what happens? The company must either leave that money in the bank, drawing no interest or such interest as they may arrange for, or they must temporarily invest the money and get interest upon it until the money is required for the payment of the contractors upon the ships or terminals. What impropriety is involved in that? It is simply equivalent to saying that a company may make the best use of the funds legally and lawfully supplied by its shareholders. That is as far as it goes. Did I understand any body to say there was not a clause like this in the Companies Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: At least five cases of the kind were presented in the House last Tuesday by myself and the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro).

Mr. CARVELL: But not under the Companies Act, these are under letters patent granted under the Companies Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend thought this was in the Companies Act. I say my recollection is there is no such provision in the Companies Act.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Do I understand that companies have not been incorporated under the Companies Act with this provision?

Mr. MEIGHEN:: Certainly they have.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am quite satisfied they have not been because the Companies Act contains a provision against buying the stock of other corporations or lending money to its shareholders. If this clause two passes the company can do that very thing which is prohibited by the General Stock Companies Act.

Mr. BRISTOL: That is permitted by by-law under the Companies Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: On the 10th instant I quoted the names of several charters that had been granted by the Secretary of State containing the following clauses:

To invest and deal with moneys of the company not immediately required upon such securities as may be from time to time determined.

To invest and deal with moneys of the company not immediately required in such manner as may be from time to time determined.

To invest and dispose of the funds of the company which are not immediately required in any manner which shall be decided from time to time.

To invest and deal with the moneys not immediately required upon such securities and in such manner as may from time to time be determined.

Mr. WHITE: That is from the Companeis Act?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will not my hon. friend agree that that will all be subject to the prohibitory clause of the Joint Stock Companies Act?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): The section of the Joint Stock Companies Act to which I think the hon. member alludes is section 168. That section reads:

No company shall use any of its funds in the purchase of stock in any other corporation unless in so far as such purchase is especially authorized by the special Act and also by the Act creating such corporation.

That is the clause in the Joint Stock Companies Act, but if the special Act authorizes the purchase of other securities that section does not apply. Let us see what my hon. friend's Government did with regard to purchasing securities. He raises this question now as to the prohibition, as he says, contained in the Companies Act with regard to companies of this kind or of any kind incorporated under that Act purchasing securities. But, as I have pointed out to my hon. friend, that prohibition does not apply to companies that are incorporated by special Acts, as this company is. In the year 1910, this very company on a revision of previous legislation was given the power to acquire business and the securities of other companies. I want to show that hon. gentlemen opposite are inconsistent in connection with the matter. In the year 1911, the Government, of which my right hon. friend was the leader at that time, and I find no fault whatever with his action, raised no objection, so far as I am able to learn, when the company applied to the Government for an increase of their capital from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, with the same restriction, that two-thirds of vote of the shareholders should authorize it, as is imposed in this Bill. Therefore on all the grounds I have mentioned, namely, that it is not a franchise holding company; that it is not a monopolistic company; that any company could be incorporated to-morrow to carry on a similar business under the General Companies Act, and that none of the considerations that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has brought up are weighty or in any way inconsistent with the giving of this legislation, I submit that the Opposition that has developed is to say the least invidious, in making a sample of this company, in singling out from all other companies that may be authorized either by this Parliament under the General Companies Act to carry on business. It would be open to the directors of this company to-morrow to withdraw their application and incorporate under the General Companies Act a company with wider powers to take over this company's business.

Mr. TURRIFF: But they have not done so.

Mr. WHITE: During the last few days we have been discussing an academic question; we have not been discussing a practical question. If you look at this legislation from the standpoint of logic and fair play and good common ordinary business sense, the opposition that hon. gentlemen are raising to it is not reasonable.

Mr. TURRIFF: I rise to a point of order. The hon. Minister of Finance having been allowed to speak twice on this matter, I should like to know if I am in order to speak twice.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Finance did not speak before on this question; but the hon. member who has just risen did speak previously.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance seeks, perhaps unconsciously, to give a party tone to this discussion. He speaks of those who are opposed to the Bill as being on the other side of the House, as if it was the opposition party which was opposing the Bill. In that respect my hon. friend fails to give due measure of credit to the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment and who is recognized as a warm supporter of my hon. friend. It sems to me a pity that this question, which is very important, cannot be discussed entirely from the standpoint of public interest and irrespective altogether of party politics. My hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Lesperance) who is promoting the Bill, also spoke of those opposing the Bill as being hon. gentlemen opposite, in that way seeking to make an appeal to the supporters of the Government to give their united support to this measure. An hon. member opposite is the president of this company; and it appears that quite a number of hon. gentlemen in this House are interested by reason of their being shareholders in this company. I trust, however, that will not prevent them from looking at the matter from the standpoint of public interest. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says that this company is being singled out from other companies. I do not think so. I think the reason why it is sought to throw some safeguards around this issue of additional stock is because this company is one of the great transportation companies of the Dominion. This company is operating on the St. Lawrence; it has lately bought out other companies which have been operating on the great lakes, so that it has to-day probably some seventy steamships carying on a great system of transportation between Port Arthur and Fort William and the city of Montreal. It also appears that one of the Atlantic steamship companies, the Furness line, has acquired an interest in this company, so that in some measure at all events this company will have control of the traffic of our western produce all the way from Port Arthur to the markets of the world.

Mr. WHITE: Does my hon. friend suggest that this company, if it carries produce from Port Arthur as he has said, will not be in competition with all the other companies that I have mentioned?

Mr. PUGSLEY: By its record of the past year, this company has been in the business of merging. Prior to last year, a very large company, called the Inland Lines, Limited, operated a steamship line from Port Arthur, trading over the great lakes to St. Lawrence ports; the stock of that company has all been acquired by this company. As appears from reports in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, the shares of the Northern Navigation Company have been acquired; the shares of the Niagara Navigation Company, Limited, of the St. Lawrence Steamboat Company, Limited, and of the Thousand Island Steamboat Company have been acquired by this company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend state that any of these companies before being merged were in competition with the merging company?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know. I think they were.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The promoter of the Bill assured the House that no company in competition has ever been merged.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend knows it, of course I am bound to accept his statement. The farmers of the West depend upon the water route in order to get reasonably low rates of freight. Therefore, it is reasonable that the Government and Parliament should have just as much control over the capital of this company and over the rates which shall be charged as they have over a railway company. I see no reason whatever why they should not have control over this company just as much as over the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Both these companies are engaged in transportation; and it is all important in the interests of the public that the capital should be as low as is reasonably possible and also that the rates of freight should be as low as possible. This company earned about thirteen per cent profit last year; that large profit came out of the people of this country who are obliged to send their freight by the steamers of this company, and out of the people who are obliged to travel by the company's boats. That is the only reason why I think that this company should be treated differently from ordinary companies. It is very different from an industrial company, a company which is not engaged in transportation. When you have a great company with an enormous capital, controlling a great many different steamships, even if some other company might be organized to enter into competition with that company, to all intents and purposes it would have a monopoly. I do not see why this company should be allowed to increase its capital to $15,000,000 unless it shows that increase to be necessary for the building of new steamers or for the building of wharfs. As that reason has not been given, I think we may reasonably assume that the money is intended to be used for the buying out of other steamship lines and with a view to creating a greater monopoly in transportation than exists to-day.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Is this navigation company not in competition with the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN: Do we not control the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Governor in Council control the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I think my hon. friend is straining a point when he says that the right of control by this Parliament arises because a railway company has the right of eminent domain or has a monopoly. The real reason for that control is that this is a great public utility in the proper regulation of which the people are deeply interested. I do not care whether the transportation is by water or land, the public are deeply interested in having the Government exercise control over the rates. As my hon. friend from South York has suggested, these steamship lines which operate on the great lakes ought to be the means of relieving the farmers of the West, because they ought to be able to carry the traffic of the West more cheaply than the railway companies during the season of navigation. The Minister of Finance says that this company ought to be given the wide powers it is proposed to give it under section 2. He says, in effect, that they ought to be allowed to increase their capitalization at once, without the Board of Railway Commissioners or any other body having control over them, and that the money which they do not require for the purpose of building ships or wharfs, they ought to be allowed to do with as they please.

Mr. WHITE: I said, pending the expenditure of the money, they ought to be allowed to do it—temporarily.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We know what 'temporarily' means. This section simply means that until they require the money for the legitimate purposes of the company, they can do with it as they please. Parliament has provided in the Companies Act that a company shall not be allowed to lend its money to its shareholders. I think that is a wise provision. But here it is proposed to let this company do anything they please —which means the board of directors may do as they please—with the money of these shareholders, by lending to shareholders, lending it on the stock of other corporations, buying the stock of other corporations, using it in any way they see fit. That is not proper legislation. I submit to the leader of the Government who is responsible for the legislation of this House, that it is not proper legislation. When a shareholder subscribes money to a company, he ought to be assured that if that money is not required for the purposes of the company, it shall be put into a chartered bank or invested in municipal or Government bonds until it is required by the company. But it is proposed that, in violation of the principle laid down in the Companies Act, Parliament shall say to the directors of this company: You may sell stock for $5,000,000, though you may not want more than $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 at present, and if the balance of $3,000,000 is not required for the purposes of your company for a year or two years, you can apply the money as you please; you can lend it to shareholders, you can buy stock in other corporations and control other institutions; you can do as you please with the money even without regard to the purposes of the company. In the absence of any other body that might have supervision over the affairs of the company, the Board of Railway Commissioners is the best body to be chosen for the purpose. Parliament has given that board control over the railway rates, over express company charges, over telephone charges and over cable rates. The board has experts in its service; it has the opportunity of calling people before it; and I see no hardship at all upon this company in compelling it to go to the Board of Railway Commissioners. It does not imply that this company is intending to do anything wrong; but as already stated, we are now dealing with a great transportation company and we are asking Parliament to lay down the principle that with reference to the capitalization of that company there shall be some disinterested body that shall have control over the issue of stock. One word more and I have finished. The Minister of Finance has said that because the American bottoms had been very much engaged in taking the freight from the American West, the rates on freight to the Canadian exporter had been increased by six cents a bushel on wheat.

Mr. WHITE: I made no mention of six cents. I made the general statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman, then said that the rate had been increased and some other hon. member, I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) mentioned the figure six cents. What does that mean? It means that these steamship companies will take advantage of the western farmers when they can do so. So long as American steamships can carry Canadian freight, rates are low, but as soon as they are busy with American freight up go the rates to the Canadian producer. Does not this show how necessary it is that Parliament should control the capitalization of these companies?

Mr. WHITE. How will the extension of the operations of this company to Port Arthur or Fort William tend in any way to increase the rates which now prevail and which are subject to the competition which I have mentioned and of which the hon. gentleman is aware?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will tell the hon. gentleman. Up to a comparatively recent date, this company was content to carry on principally a tourist business extending from Toronto to the Saguenay. They have now caught the spirit of the age which my hon. friend seems to admire; they have gone into the business done by trusts and mergers. They are enamoured of the business of merging companies, and we find that in the past year they have been steadily and earnestly engaged in it. Have we not reason to fear that the object of this enormous increase of capital is to continue that business of merging, and may we not expect that it is possible that if we give them this privilege, before many months or years have passed away, they will carry the merging of these companies to such an extent that they will practically control the water transportation business. At all events they will reduce most materially the competition that exists; and the less competition there is the greater the opportunity there is to squeeze the western farmer both in what he has to sell and in what he wishes to buy.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure hon. members have been very much impressed by the statement of the last speaker and other hon. members who have been urging that this particular company should be made object of a sort or parental supervision of the Railway Commission in distinction from the other companies of this country. It has been stated and reiterated by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that it is a bad principle to permit it to increase its capitalization—I think the statement was that this was 'bad legislation.' I wish to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this vein to chapter 134 of the statutes of 1911, in which there is a clause identical with the one in Bill No. 20—and the hon. gentleman was then sitting on the treasury benches. At that time not the slightest objection was made to that clause in a Bill which, relating to the same company, provided for an increase of capitalization of $5,000,000. It has been admitted by hon. gentlemen that this company has been properly administered, and all hon. members speaking in connection with this Bill have stated clearly and emphatically that this company is one of the best operating on the inland waters of Canada. In spite of the fact that in 1911 hon. gentlemen opposite passed a similar clause, they now contend that if we support this clause we are not faithful to the trust reposed in us by the people of Canada regarding the protection of the interests of the country.

A thought has occurred to me, as an ordinary layman, to this effect: Why should we saddle the Railway Commission, not with the power to administer certain general laws in a given way, but with the duty of watching over the particular business of some individual company? I submit that a provision of that kind is inimical to the best interests of the country. Everyone knows that the Railway Commission has more business to attend to at the present time than it can properly look after, but in spite of this it is sought to impose on that commission duties which I contend should not in any case devolve upon it.

I agree with some of the remarks of the hon. member for South York in introducing his amendment in the course of which he enunciated certain principles with regard to over-capitalization. In connection with this company, no over-capitalization has been charged. There are companies organized under provincial laws—I could cite scores of mining companies organized under the laws of the province of British Columbia—which are over-capitalized, and I could mention other companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act of Canada, which are similarly over-capitalized, but this amendment, which is supposed to remedy this condition, will not affect any of these companies, nor can Parliament at any time establish a precedent to remedy the conditions which are bound to occur under the Joint Stock Companies Act. If hon. gentlemen opposite are serious in their statements that it is time for the Parliament of Canada to deal with this question, I am prepared at any time to support a measure which will effectively deal with over-capitalization of companies in Canada, but I am not in favour of putting on the statute books any patchwork legislation which singles out individual companies. I submit that every evidence before us points to the fact that this is a mater of personal animosity rather than one of public interest.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is going too far when he imputes motives to other hon. members.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and withdraw any remarks which are contrary to the rules of the House. When this matter was under discussion the other evening, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) stood up in his place and talked away, with his eyes on the clock. It may be that he was seriously trying to impress on the House all the arguments supporting his convictions in the matter, but the manner in which he attempted to do this was rather questionable. I submit that there is absolutely nothing in the proposed amendment which will deal with the principle involved, but when hon. gentlemen are prepared to bring down a measure which will deal effectively with the matter, I am prepared, if it is a sane measure, to support it; but as to singling out any individual company, I contend that is not good legislation, and I wish to go on record as absolutely opposed to any such procedure.

Mr. NESBITT: I would not have spoken on this matter but for the fact that the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol) tried, as he said, to clear the fog out of our minds by stating that this Bill was not like a railway Bill, because navigation companies have to buy whatever they want. That, I may say, only befogged my mind all the more, as I always thought that railway companies also had to buy. True, they have the right of expropriation, but they have to purchase at a fair value, everything they obtain. The Minister of Finance stated that this company, being a transportation company, was more in the line of industrial corporations, and for that reason we had no right to control its capitalization, but I agree with the hon. member for Carleton in stating that, because it is a transportation company, we have just as much right to control its rates as to control the rates of a railway corporation. Some hon. gentlemen have stated this afternoon that, in purchasing these other companies, this corporation was not shutting off competition. I presume they did not intend us to take that just as it was stated, because to shut off competition was the main object of the purchase. The Minister of Finance says also that any of us, if we have the money, can build boats and start a transportation business on the water. Surely it was not necessary for him to tell us that; he knows that when a company attains a certain size, and obtains control not only of the transportation business, but of the feeders to that business, it is almost impossible for any smaller corporation to compete, and this means the larger organization has a practical monopoly. The reason why the promoter of this Bill was in my judgment unwise in bringing the matter before the House in its present form, was the absence of a statement as to the company's intentions with respect to the additional capital, and the request to give to the company unlimited powers to deal with these moneys. I think the discussion on this Bill should warn those who may come to this Parliament in the future that the time has arrived in this country when we, the supposed representatives of the people, have the interests of the people at heart, and do not propose to allow over-capitalization to continue. It has been stated that this company is not over-capitalized. It may be a perfectly legitimate company, and its moneys may have been properly and judiciously expended, but that makes no difference when they withdraw competition, as they have done, in the last few years. In answer to the query of the hon. member who has just sat down as to why we did not oppose this principle in the Bill passed in 1911, we are, like every person in the world, learning. As a matter of fact, in 1911 there was not the same fear in the minds of the people as to over-capitalization of corporations or as to the overstrength of corporations as there is to-day. There is a lurking fear in the minds of the people of this country that corporations are getting too much control. There is nothing in my judgment that requires more careful legislation than this transportation business on the great lakes. We are going to deepen, I hope, the Welland canal at an enormous expense to the people of this country to allow those boats to go from Port Arthur to as near Montreal as possible. Why? Because the people of this country want the rates reduced. Now if we had fewer transportation companies plying between Port Arthur and Montreal, would there not be a human tendency—I would not blame them—to increase the rates? Someone has pointed out this afternoon that owing to the fact that the Americans had all they could do with their boats this last fall the rate did increase. Not being particularly interested I did not notice the fact, but if the rates did increase, it simply shows how careful we have to be in legislating here to keep control of the corporations. I am not talking from a party standpoint. I have no feeling against the gentleman who introduced the Bill and certainly not against the hon. member for Toronto, or against any one else connected with the company or with the Bill. But after all, we are supposed to represent the interests of the people at large, and to do it to the best of our ability, and in passing legislation of this kind we are not doing so, I think. I hope that this will be the last Bill of the kind to come before Parliament asking for such sweeping powers without stating what it is proposed to do with the increased capital, or without some control over the increased capital being provided.

I am opposed to two-thirds of the members present at a meeting of a company being allowed to vote for anything affecting the financial interests of the company or the shareholders. I maintain, and always have maintained, that the provision should be for two-thirds of the value of the capital, and I intend to maintain that, because no directors should have the power asked for in this Bill. It is so easy to avoid those who are in opposition to proposals affecting companies. I speak from my own knowledge, and I am sure there is not a man connected with companies who does not know that what I am saying is absolutely correct. If directors wish to act in the interests of shareholders they will not be afraid of a provision requiring two-thirds of the value of the capital to sanction anything of a sweeping nature in connection with the company. After these protests, I have nothing more to say on the Bill. I agree in a sense with what my hon. friend from Vancouver said with reference to patchwork legislation. There ought to be, and I hope this discussion will be the means of bringing about some sort of body that will have power to check over-capitalization, not only as regards railway companies and public utility companies, but as regards such a company as the one under discussion. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, there is not a more important question in this country to-day than that under discussion. If this company takes in the Inland Navigation Company it will practically control the whole of Canadian transportation from Port Arthur to Montreal.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not wish to delay the vote on this Bill, but I think we are losing sight perhaps of the main issue that has caused this debate by having an academic discussion on the legal aspects of the case. It is only wise that Parliament should take notice of this Bill and of what it really means. This Bill affects every manufacturer who ships to the Northwest in the province of Ontario, it affects over 8,000 sailors; it means a matter of wages to them. If there is no competition, wages necessarily go down. On the American side of the great lakes, the United States Steel Company has lowered wages by a combination of ships owners till wages are lower than they are on the Canadian side. This Bill also affects the farming community of the West. I have every confidence in Canadians and in their management of affairs of this kind. But there is an interest in this company about which I do not feel quite satisfied. A few years ago there were plenty of tramp ships on the North Atlantic. No doubt some hon. gentlemen have seen statements in the press about the North Atlantic freight pool which the Canadian Pacific railway is occasionally breaking open. According to my information one of the largest factors in the North Atlantic pool, in putting tramp ships of the North Atlantic, which were cutting freight rates, into the trust basket, is what is known as the Furness interest. Since the tramp ship has disappeared from the North Atlantic the freight on a bushel of grain from Winnipeg to Liverpool has gone up eleven cents, that is in the last three years. The freight on a ton of flour from Montreal has gone up from $1.60 to $4.80. Now it has been said that this company has not merged any company that competed with them. That may be quite true in a narrow sense. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company is largely a passenger company, and no company in reality competed with them on the St. Lawrence. But we find that the other constituent companies that have been merged by the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company did compete with each other in the matter of rates. For instance. the Inland line was composed of two or three lines, and the Inland line and the Northern Navigation Company were competitors before they were absorbed. Practically, this company will control 80 per cent of the freight on the great lakes, 80 per cent of hired help, 80 per cent of the merchandise going up, and 80 per cent of the merchandise coming down. Within the last four or five weeks I have been told by parties who were shareholders in this company that men representing the so-called Furness interests have been going around canvassing proxies for the annual meeting, which is to be held shortly, in order that they may throw the Canadians out. Of course if they throw out the Canadians directors, who perhaps have some appreciation of the necessity of keeping the rates on a reasonable basis, and the Furness interests get control, the whole inland system will be virtually in the control of the North Atlantic pool. That is what we are up against; that is how it looks to me. I do not think that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South York touches this question at all, because it is a matter of public concern. This is one of those questions which we have no law to reach at present. Some day we will have to get a law to reach this question, just as we have laws to reach railway freight rates. As soon as the Northern Navigation Company and the Inland Line amalgamated I know, as a shipper, that their rates went up about 20 per cent. Since the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company took charge there has been no advance. The Richelieu and Ontario Company has been carefully managed and has acted very well indeed with the public since it has been in control of this concern. But what I dread is that the men who now control the destinies of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company will be displaced by creatures of a new corporation that will be virtually under the influence of the North Atlantic freight trust or pool. It is well that Parliament has taken cognizance of this subject. My hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) wants the matter of the issue of stock placed in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners. There is need that the Board of Railway Commissioners should have control of all lake freight rates. It may be asked: What right has this Government to interfere in a case of this kind? This Government has spent millions of dollars on harbours and canals and surely the ship owners must recognize that there must be something given in return for those great public works. I do not see that this amendment will touch this question, but it is just as well that Parliament should recognize that it is legislating on possibly one of the greatest measures that has ever come before it. Reference has been made to the fact that no objection was ever before taken to the stock of this company being increased. That is quite true but the company at that time was not the company it is to-day.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Were the mergers that took place paid for by the additional issue of $5,000,000 that we authorized three years ago?

Mr. CURRIE: I understand that the mergers were largely paid for by the stock that was issued but they were not paid for at the time the stock was issued. They took advantage of the issue of stock to acquire funds and purchase additional ships. I realize that it is essential that there should be competition in freights on the great lakes, not cut-throat competition but healthy competition, because it is only by having healthy competition that we can have the trade carried on. Healthy competition on the great lakes has increased the trade during the last ten years by thousands of tons. It has really brought about a great fleet on the lakes, but with one fleet controlling everything, the smaller fleets have to stand aside and take what is given to them. I was reading the report of the Farrar Transportation Company, which has three steel freighters, and it showed that last year this company earned thirty-seven per cent net. That will give some idea of the earning power in connection with this trade. There is invested in shipping on the great lakes something like $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. This amendment of my hon. friend does nothing more than call the attention of Parliament to the fact that at some future day we will have to take the question up. If this new corporation is going to shove the freight rates up another thirty per cent the question will be one for serious consideration. It is very unfortunate that some hon. gentlemen opposite, in discussing a private Bill, assume that it must necessarily be supported by the Government of the day. I cannot conceive of a private measure as being in any sense a Government measure. The minister in charge of the committee, who heard it discussed in committee, is the party who, with the chairman, represents that committee in Parliament and it is quite proper that he should present his views before the House. It is very unbecoming for any hon. member to try to make political capital out of a private Bill. I do not think this amendment of my hon. friend will meet the situation at all. The situation is indeed serious and we will look with a great deal of interest to what will take place on the 19th of this month to see whether some hon. gentlemen who have seats in this House are going to be thrown off the board of this company.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to compliment the hon. Minister of Finance upon the fact that he fathers, or becomes responsible for the explanation of measures that are discussed in the Private Bills Committee. My own opinion is that some minister should be on hand to discuss every Bill that passes through a committee of which he is a prominent member, and that when a railway Bill is up the Minister of Railways should be able to tell us all about it and discuss it for the benefit of those who are not on the Railway Committee. There are two points that have been raised in connection with this Bill. I refuse absolutely to discuss a private measure from a political standpoint. As a member of the Government I never did and as a member of the Opposition I do not propose to. The first question is that of rates and the next is that of capitalization. This amendment has nothing directly to do with the question of rates, although indirectly it has been pointed out that without safeguards this Bill may lead to an increase in rates. The question of rates is one that is so large that I could not take up the time of the House at this moment to discuss it. Railway rates and ocean rates present an anomaly in Canada and between Canada and the other side of the ocean which we have not yet been able to overcome. For example, we control the rates on the transcontinental railways. They have their own steamship lines from Canada to Liverpool. We can make the rate whatever we choose through our own commission until it strikes the seaboard but the same company, through their steamship line, will put on their own rates again as soon as the goods get on the ocean.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): And they are doing it.

Mr. GRAHAM: So we do not have control. At one time during my term of office, certain correspondence took place between the Canadian Government, I think, through myself, and the home authorities as to the possibility of forming a joint control of rates, so that the rates on the ocean between Canada and the Old Land might be controlled as well as the rates on land. But, such control has not yet materialized. A great many difficulties were pointed out by the home authorities, but I am of the opinion that it is possible to work out a plan and a body to put that plan into operation so that the rates may be controlled between Canada and the Old Country. It was pointed out that it would perhaps drive trade to United States ports. My view would be that it would have the very reverse result because, if, owing to control, cheaper rates were given by way of Canadian ports, it would assist Canadian ports rather than injure them. This question of rates is not affected by this Bill or this amendment. The Canadian Pacific railway, by consent, has its rates under the Board of Railway Commissioners. This company is said to compete with the Canadian Pacific railway and other railways; consequently if you followed that out to its logical conclusion you would place the rates of this company under the Board of Railway Commissioners but there is nothing in this Bill or this amendment affecting rates. I might say incidentally that the question of the water carriage of freight will have to be taken up by the Government and Parliament before long and some method of control of water-borne freight will have to be worked out as well as control of land-borne freight. I did not agree with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance when he argued that because a certain company had its powers through letters patent under the Companies Act and another company had its powers through a Bill granted by Parliament they were not in the same position as to control.

Let me point out that in the United States the railway companies all get their powers by letters patent, practically, and do not go through the state legislatures or Congress, and yet they are controlled not only by federal authority but also by state authority, so in that regard I think there would be no particular difficulty.

Now we come to the question of capitalization. That is a bigger question than one company, it is a very important question for the Dominion of Canada. In the United States some years ago, owing to the vastness of their transportation problem, and the great persistence and perversity of companies in forming mergers of railway and other transportation companies, an Act was passed placing this question of capitalization in the hands of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. I am not sure that it has worked out well but I shall not argue that point. It is a large problem, too large a problem to be solved by attaching one clause to any particular Bill. It is something that deserves the serious consideration of this House and if the Government will bring in a measure, as I understand they have it in mind to bring one in, of a comprehensive nature, I assure them that I will bring the best ability I can bring to bear on it, so that we may have an Act that will apply to transportation companies of every kind, railroad or water. Should we have control of rates by water? Granted that we should, I would go this far with the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) if he thinks it would be in the interest of transportation, owing to arguments that have been advanced here, I would go with him to the length of saying that we ought perhaps, even in this Bill, to place this company in the same position as to capitalization that the railway companies are in, leave it to the Governor in Council and when we take it out of the hands of the Governor in Council, take all companies out of the hands of the Governor in Council and place jurisdiction with the Board of Railway Commissioners. But even if this Bill were passed, the Board of Railway Commissioners would have no power to deal with this matter. They have not been given the power. This Government has to take authority from Parliament by amendment to the Railway Act to give to the Board of Railway Commissioners power to act in such cases; the passing of this amendment would not in any way call upon the Board of Railway Commissioners to deal with it. I say that because when, as a young member of the Government some years ago, I proposed some amendments and by placing a clause in one or two Acts I thought I would give the Board of Railway Commissioners power to deal with such matters, I discovered that I would have to retrace my steps and bring in an amendment to the Railway Act giving them the power suggested. That is the way it must be done and the Government will have to take the responsibility.

Perhaps I am too delicate, but being a shareholder, although a very small shareholder in this company, I do not propose to vote on this question.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The other evening I suggested to the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Lesperance), who has fathered this Bill in the House, that he should give a little further explanation as to the use the company expected to make of this enormous amount of money. In my judgment the Richelieu and Ontario has been a credit to Canada, so far as water carriage and transportation is concerned. It is an old company, and has always been well managed. Therefore I do not speak against the proposed increase in capitalization because I bear any ill-will against the company, but I think the hon. member for Montmagny should give the House some explanation of the proposed use of this additional $5,000,000. The other evening I asked the president of this company, who is a member of this House, what use the company intended making of this enormous amount of money and he said that the company intended to apply the $5,000,000 towards terminals at the head of the navigation system, towards the establishment of a coal-depot at Toronto and the purchase of one or two or perhaps three boats for the company.

Mr. PELLETIER: And the betterment of terminals at Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the company the proprietor of the terminals at Quebec? I was going to say that the explanations given are not satisfactory to members of this House. First of all I do not believe that the company will pay for the terminals at the head of navigation, I think these are government works. I know, as a matter of fact, that the terminals in Montreal do not belong to the company but to the Harbour Commission at Montreal, and at Quebec, if I mistake not, the terminals belong to the city of Quebec.

Mr. LESPERANCE: They belong to the company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was not aware of that. In Three Rivers they belong to the Harbour Commission of Three Rivers. At Sorel they belong to the company I think, at all events it is not very important; but below Quebec every terminal belongs to the Government of Canada, and I daresay the company does not pay a red cent for the use of those terminals. As a summer resident at Murray Bay I know that the wharfs and even the light are provided by the Government for the use of the Richelieu Company and also for the use of the public. Therefore as regards the terminals not much of this additional capital will be used by the company. As regards the boats I would be very much surprised if the company intended to build or acquire a new steamboat for the service below Quebec. The company quite creditably to it, purchased two or three years ago one of the most magnificent floating palaces I have seen in Canada or any other country in the world. It is only used during a few weeks of the year, at most three months. It is withdrawn from the service at the end of the month of August. Therefore the company, I feel confident, does not intend to build another floating palace as it did some years ago for the service below Quebec. Where then is that money going to? That is an explanation we have not yet received. I may state again that I have no ill-feeling towards the Richelieu and Ontario but I see nothing in the explanation given which would justify me in voting for that increased capitalization because, as some of my friends have stated, after all the consumers and exporters will have to pay he interest that will be distributed as dividends to the shareholders of the company.

I put another question the other evening to my friend, the president of the company, the member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget). I asked him most specifically at the end of the debate if the company intended to absorb other lines. I said I had just seen in the Montreal Herald that the company had absorbed various lines, and intended to pay with this additional capital for that merger. I was given a flat denial. The hon. gentleman answered by stating that the Montreal Herald was not the organ of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, and that that Company did not intend to absorb the companies that were named in the article published by the Montreal Herald. I hold in my hands the Montreal Gazette of this morning, with the annual report of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company published in extenso, and here is what I read:

> The statement of this year includes earnings, expenses, &c., of its subsidiary lines, viz.: The Northern Navigation Company, Limited; Inland Lines, Limited; Niagara Navigation Company, Limited; Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company of the United States; St Lawrence River Steamboat Company, Limited; Thousand Islands Steamboat Company.

Further down it says:

> Under the contract of May 18, 1911, which was approved of by a special meeting of the shareholders, June 26, 1911, the company has completed the purchase of the shares of the Northern Navigation Company, Limited, and Inland Lines, Limited.
>
> The company, on June 1, 1912, also acquired all the shares of the Niagara Navigation Company, Limited; St. Lawrence Steamboat Company, Limited, and the Thousand Islands Steamboat Company, as approved by special meeting of the shareholders on May 28, 1912.

There you have the explanation of this increased capitalization. It shows a merging of the various companies in the upper St. Lawrence. My hon. friend the Postmaster General, who is well acquainted with the situation between Montreal and Quebec, knows that the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company is without any competition in that section of the country.

Mr. PELLETIER: We are very glad to have it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly we are very glad to have it; but my hon. friend would not seriously pretend that competition would not be welcome. We are at the mercy of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. Since my boyhood, I have travelled on the boats of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company; and I have seen I do not know how many lines coming into competition with that company's line between Montreal and Quebec, which is the favourite route. Eventually, they have all been absorbed, one after the other. What has been the result? My hon. friend will realize it at once. Let him ask my hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) what has been the result. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company has favoured only those places where money is to be made for it. That procedure may be quite businesslike; but what has happened? The company has erected large summer hotels at Murray Bay and at Tadousac, and it gives special privileges to such places, but it neglects places as important as Fraserville, represented by my hon. friend from Temiscouata; and, in spite of appeals to the company, we in the district of Quebec have not been able to induce it to send a boat there in summer. The result has been that Rivière du Loup, which is the old name given to Fraserville, has been practically ruined as a summer resort; and, besides, the city of Fraserville is suffering considerably from the lack of steamship service. This is the result of the merger of our water transportation lines. Again I say that I have nothing against the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company; I have nothing against the president of the company; I will say this, that since he has taken charge of it, it has been well managed from the company's point of view, because it is paying a dividend of thirteen per cent this year.

Mr. LESPERANCE: The hon. member for Rouville is in error in saying that the company is paying a dividend of thirteen per cent; it is paying eight per cent. Thirteen per cent represents the earnings. The dividend and the earnings are not the same.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I accept the correction; but thirteen per cent as an earning is not to be despised. I would be glad to manage anything with an earning of thirteen per cent. Thirteen is generally an unlucky number, but not for the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. I think under the circumstances the amendment should be accepted.

My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham)—I would think he is still the Minister of Railways and Canals, so conversant is he with the transportation problem—said that he had suggested two years ago that we should obtain from the home Government a joint adjustment of ocean freight rates. Not only did he do that, but, under the direction of the late Mr. Justice Mabee, correspondence was engaged in between the United States authorities and the Canadian Government in order to obtain the establishment of a joint board to adjust and control the rates between the railway companies across the line. I do not know what has become of that project; but such a high authority as the late Mr. Justice Mabee thought it should be carried out at the earliest opportunity. There is nothing to prevent this Government, if it does not wish to truckle, trade, or even discuss passenger and tariff rates with the United States, from again discussing the question with the home Government. With regard to the present legislation, I say that there has been a huge merger, which will affect not only the province of Quebec, not only the large and influential province of Ontario, but, in the judgment of my friend who represents the West in this House, the farmers of the prairies as well. Heaven knows that the farmer has enough to contend against, not to give him a chance, when Parliament can do so, by adjusting the rates on the great lakes and on the river St. Lawrence. I beg to support this amendment.

Mr. PELLETIER: Without entering into the details of this debate, I wish to correct a false impression which might be given by the remarks of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). If these statements should go unchallenged or uncorrected, the public may be to a certain extent under the impression that, as a result of this Bill or of some merger which has taken place, an important point in the province of Quebec, Fraserville, in the county of Temiscouata, had been neglected by the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, and that somebody is responsible for this state of affairs. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact, well known to the hon. member for Temiscouata, that Riviere du Loup was one of the ports of call of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company for years, and also that it was given up as a port of call long before the late Government allowed the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, in 1911, to increase its capital from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. My hon. friend suggests that this was too bad for Riviere du Loup or Fraserville. I agree with him, and I think that Riviere du Loup is a point which surely ought to be taken care of. But we must not be unjust in these matters; and the country should know that this important change in the route followed by the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company steamers was made, and this port omitted as a port of call, before this company came before this House—at a time when my hon. friend was in power and when the hon. member for Temiscouata was here—and was granted an amendment to its charter without any conditions being enacted at the request of either of these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. GAUVREAU: The circumstances were different.

Mr. PELLETIER: This is the second time this afternoon that we have been told that hon. gentlemen opposite have learned something. Well, when in power they seemed incapable of learning anything.

Mr. GAUVREAU : We had no merger at that time.

Mr. PELLETIER : That is a very surprising statement. I understood that all the mergers had taken place in the fifteen years of Liberal administration, and I think nobody can gainsay that statement. But my hon. friends did not say anything about this matter at the time when the company came before them for a change of charter. But, now they are becoming wise. I think the country will believe that as they learn so well in opposition, it will be best to keep them there a long time.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the hon. gentleman think that that helps his Bill much?

Mr. PELLETIER: I am answering a statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. But we have been told lately that people on this side have no right to take account of things that occurred since two years, or more, ago. The hon. member for Rouville has said that there is no competition with the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company between Montreal and Quebec. There is competition as a matter of fact; but I must add frankly, that it is made by companies which are not nearly so well equipped and have not such fine boats as the Richelieu and Ontario Company has. A salient fact in this connection is that the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company with its boats is a serious competitor of the railway companies. We get lower rates, as everybody knows, from this company than we get from the Canadian Pacific railway or the Grand Trunk railway, and when the summer comes, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk railway lower their rates on account of the competition of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. I am told that this also happens in other parts of the country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is not that an argument for competition?

Mr. PELLETIER: It may be such an argument. But it shows there is competition now; that is my point. If the hon. member for Rouville will compare the winter with the summer rates of the Canadian Pacific railway, he will come to the conclusion that the Canadian Pacific railway have to lower their rates very much to meet the competition of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. Surely, if the operations of a company have the effect of lowering rates so much we ought to consider that company a public benefactor. And if we tell such a company that they are not to be allowed to increase their capital because they have ceased to call at Fraserville, surely we are making a mistake. The additional capital proposed to be placed at the disposal of this company is only $5,000,000 added to the $5,000,000 given to them in 1911. What harm has resulted from that increase in 1911? The directors of this company, these hon. gentlemen admit, have administered the affairs of the company very wisely and very economically. We are told that the company has fine hotels at Murray Bay and at Tadousac. That is very true and these hotels are a credit to the province of Quebec. Shall we tell the company that they should not build at the points that pay them best? If this company were one subsidized by the country, that would give Parliament a different position in this matter. But we do not subsidize them at all. I think the argument that has been given here is one that should appeal to both sides of the House. This is an important company and one that is rendering great public service. Shall we discriminate against that company so far as rights of capitalization are concerned? We have scores of Bills coming before this House from banks and other concerns providing for increase in their capital, and these have never been refused. Speaking for myself, I think there is a good deal in what my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) and my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) have said as to the arrangements to be entered into in order to control the water rates as we control the rates on the railborne traffic. But why should we single out this company for special and exceptional treatment in this regard? Let us have a general Bill dealing with all, and putting all on the same footing, and greater justice will be done.

As to Rivière du Loup, in which I take a great deal of interest, because as my hon. friend knows, it is in the county in which I was born, the Government of this country has done something to relieve the situation. Since the time the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company ceased to call at Rivière du Loup, a company composed of business men of that town has been formed. They have a steamer there, I think it is called the Mahone, which is owned by people in Rivière du Loup, and this steamer now plies from Rivière du Loup to Tadousac and other points. The Government has given a subsidy to this company, and to a certain extent that has relieved the situation. Nor do I agree with the statement of the hon. member for Rouville that the fact that the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company has ceased to call at Fraserville has ruined that place. I would not like it to go uncontradicted that this town, a very flourishing town, is on the point of bankruptcy. I know that its debt is very large, but I do not think the public men of that town should be judged by such a statement as has been made.

Mr. GAUVREAU: As a summer resort it has been ruined.

Mr. PELLETIER: As a summer resort it is much less than it was. Many people who go to 'la Pointe' now go by rail, and the officials of the Richelieu and Ontario Company have thought that, from a strictly business point of view, it did not pay to call at that port. They did not want to discriminate against it, but nobody can blame a company which is not subsidized by the Government, and which lives on its own resources, for calling only at those points which offer it sufficient inducements to do so.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It is my intention only to put a question to the promoter of the Bill. In 1908 a telegram signed by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Sir Rodolphe Forget), was sent broadcast throughout my riding to the effect that if a boat of the Richelieu Company did not call at Rivière du Loup, it was the fault of the Laurier Administration, and that if my opponent was elected, and the Conservatives placed in power, a boat would call at that port. Although the hon. gentlemen are now in power, I have not yet seen any boat call at Rivière du Loup, and I would ask the promoter of the Bill if, in the event of its becoming law, he can promise me that a boat will call at Rivière du Loup next summer?

Mr. MICHAUD: I also desire to ask the promoter of this Bill if there is any possibility of the boats of this company calling at Rivière du Loup in the future? This would greatly help the public in my own constituency, and in other parts of the province of New Brunswick. Many of my constituents have interests at Chicoutimi and Saguenay, and in order to get to these places, they are obliged to go by rail around the city of Quebec, but if the boats of this company called at 'la Pointe' or Rivière du Loup the public could get across the St. Lawrence in three or four hours. The present arrangement is very inconvenient, especially to those living in the northern part of New Brunswick.

Mr. LESPERANCE: I did not intend to take any further part in this debate, but some questions have been asked of me, and I wish also to correct some statements made by the hon. member for Rouville. The hon. gentleman has stated—and I do not wish it to go unchallenged—that the Richelieu Company have bought or effected a merger with every other company that has been organized for purposes of traffic between Montreal and Quebec. Some years ago two companies, called La Compagnie Nationale de Quebec and La Compagnie de Navigation Canadienne, were organized to operate between Montreal and Quebec. Both these companies went to the wall. These companies were not bought by the Richelieu and Ontario Company, although great efforts were made by the promoters of these companies to effect the sale of their interests to the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company. Now and then, navigation companies are formed between Montreal and Quebec with the special purpose of being ultimately bought over by the Richelieu and Ontario Company. With reference to the earnings of the Richelieu and Ontario Company, I may say that if the hon. member for Rouville will look up the report he will find that the net earnings of the company for this year are not quite up to a million dollars. This represents a little less than 10 per cent on the stock of the company. A dividend of 8 per cent has been declared, and the stock is quoted on the market around 116. I do not see why the hon. member for Rouville should complain because a navigation company so well managed as the Richelieu and Ontario Company earns about 10 per cent on its capital stock.

With reference to the calling of the boats of the company at Rivière du Loup, as I am only one of the directors I cannot say whether or not the company will decide to make Rivière du Loup a port of call in the future; but I may say that the Richelieu and Ontario Company is a business concern, and when it pays the company to call at a certain port—when there is sufficient traffic to warrant its doing so—the company generally arranges that this be done.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The boats of a subsidized company did call at this port.

Mr. LESPERANCE: I understand that the subsidy paid by the Post Office Department was reduced by the hon. member for Rouville when Postmaster General?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. LESPERANCE: Perhaps that is one of the reasons why this company discontinued the Rivière du Loup service. If the hon. member for Rouville had been as generous with respect to the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company when he was administrator of the Post Office Department as he was when he subsidized a company to do service between Rivière du Loup and Tadousac, a company having at its head a gentleman by the name of Camille Pouliot, now Judge of the Superior Court and brother-in-law of the hon. member for Rouville, and a company which the hon. gentleman subsidized to the extent of $20,000 a year——

Mr. LEMIEUX: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is wrong when he states that I subsidized the steamer.

Mr. LESPERANCE: Perhaps I went too far when I said that the hon. member for Rouville did so, but we always understood in Quebec that he was master of the Administration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to refer to me as being master of the Administration. I was a humble member of the Government, and never claimed to be master of the Administration.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. gentleman evidently desires a ruling, all I can say is that I think this is becoming a too common proceeding.

Mr. LESPERANCE: I do not desire to trespass any longer upon the time of the House in dealing with this subject, but as a closing remark I desire to say that if the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company is subsidized by the Government to make Rivière du Loup a port of call, I have no doubt that in future the company will be only too glad to have boats call at Rivière du Loup, if it is treated as generously as the company which was subsidized by the Government of which the hon. member for Rouville was then a member.

House divided on proposed amendment of Mr. Maclean (South York).

DOMINION NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY

Further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill No. 68, to incorporate the Dominion Northwestern Railway Company.—Mr. Bennett (Simcoe).

On section 3—capital stock:

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe) moved to amend section 3 by substituting, in line No. 1, the word 'eight' for the word 'ten.'

Mr. LANCASTER: The Bill as drawn required only $2,000,000 of capital. When we inquired as to the length of the line, the solicitor who was in charge of the Bill erroneously stated that the length of the road was 1,000 miles; therefore, according to our usual custom, we made the capitalization $10,000,000, or at the rate of $10,000 a mile, which is our rule. I have been given to understand since that the solicitor, in making that statement, was mistaken. Had he stated what I now understand to be the fact that the line was only 800 miles long, the capitalization would then have been as now proposed by my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). I think that the amendment should be made.

Section amended as proposed, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN MEDICAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION.

House in Committee on Bill No. 89, to incorporate the Canadian Medical Protective Association.—Mr. Chabot. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. HENDERSON: About ten days ago I received a petition signed by upwards of fifty ratepayers in my county asking me to oppose legislation which was being promoted by the Medical Association. I confess I am at a loss to know whether or not this is the Bill to which these petitioners refer. I will read the petition and then it will be in the possession of the House. The petition is as follows:

Nassagaweya, Feb. 5, 1913.

Mr. D. Henderson, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—We, a few of the ratepayers of this township, having learned with alarm of the intention of the Medical Association to pass legislation, which in our opinion will cause a monopoly of the system of healing, and thereby infringe upon individual freedom, respectfully ask you, as our representative in Parliament, to carefully watch their proceedings and use your vote and influence against any legislation which will prevent any individual in this Dominion from having his or her choice of the many different systems of healing now available.

Respectfully yours,
(Sgd.) J. W. Adamson.

And about fifty others. I am unable to decide whether that petition refers to this Bill or not; but this is the only legislation before the House so far this session which in any way relates to the Medical Association. I therefore request the promoter of the Bill to allow it to stand for a week, say till next Monday, until I can hear from some of these petitioners in order to be able to determine whether I should oppose the legislation or not. At present I am not able to connect this Bill with the petition; but, as it is the only Bill before the House in any way relating to that subject, I am compelled to take this course. I would ask the hon. member from Ottawa, who is promoting this Bill, to explain it, and then I will ask him to allow it to stand.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would also ask the promoter to explain this Bill. I am in a similar position to the member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). If this legislation intends to establish a monopoly, it would certainly have to be opposed.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I have had similar protests, and I should like to have the Bill explained.

Mr. CHABOT: In order to comply with the request of my hon. friend from Halton and other hon. members, I will offer a brief explanation regarding the Canadian Medical Protective Association and the Bill now under consideration. The Canadian Medical Protective Association has been in existence for ten years and has a large membership composed of duly and legally qualified physicians from all parts of the Dominion of Canada; it is affiliated with the Canadian Medical Association, which is the most important and the most influential medical society in Canada; in fact it is an offshoot of this society which holds a federal charter. The gentlemen, who are asking for this incorporation, are citizens of prominence and are surgeons and physicians of repute and high standing residing in different parts of the country. The object of the association is to maintain and uphold the dignity and honour of the profession, to encourage honourable conduct, and at the same time to discountenance and suppress unprofessional, unbecoming, and unauthorized practices.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): What is unauthorized practice?

Mr. CHABOT: Unauthorized practice is unprofessional practice in so far as the medical profession of the Dominion and the various provinces may be concerned. Medical conduct and medical education of course are determined and absolutely controlled at the present time by provincial laws; in Ontario, for instance, we are directly under the Ontario Medical Act.

Another purpose of the association is to advise, to assist and to protect any of its members against whom unfair or unjust proceedings may be instituted. In fact, the chief aim of the association is to support legislative proceedings intended to benefit and calculated to foster feelings of good will and to strengthen the the ties of fraternity which already exists in the ranks of the medical profession throughout the Dominion. I can assure my hon. friend from Halton and the other hon. gentlemen who have asked for further information that the intention is absolutely an essential one of protection and not one of interference in any possible way. Hon. gentlemen will not deny that the medical gentlemen of this country have the right to band together for the purpose of promoting and protecting their mutual interests, providing they do not interfere with or infringe on the rights of others.

Mr. HENDERSON: I think the hon. member will consent to the Bill standing over for a week. There is no particular hurry. I assure him that I am not putting up any opposition to the Bill at the present time; I am inquiring from some of these gentlemen who signed the petition what their real meaning is and what their objection is. I have an idea that they are afraid the measure may interfere with some religious ideas they may hold in connection with healing, and are afraid that their rights will be interfered with. Even if that be the case, I would like to protect my constituents who have these ideas. I may be mistaken, but from a quantity of literature that was inclosed to me with the petition, I am led to believe that there is something of that kind in connection with it, more especially as they speak about the system of healing. I confess, I do not see anything in the Bill that would really prohibit, unless it is contained in sub-section (b) of section 2, which speaks of unauthorized practise. Now all that I ask the hon. gentleman to do is to allow the Bill to stand over for a week, when I hope to get the information that I have referred to. It is quite probable that there will be no decided objection to the Bill unless some further protest comes from these people from whom objections have been received.

Mr. CHABOT: In order to allow the hon. member an opportunity to allay the fears and morbid apprehensions of his very careful constituents, I have no objection to the Bill being postponed.

Mr. EMMERSON: I would suggest that before my hon. friend brings up the Bill for further consideration, he should have the documents here that are referred to in section 4. Under this section, I think we are taking a leap in the dark. There may be something in that section that might interfere with the constituents of my hon. friend. We have these by-laws which are now in existence and which we propose under this Bill to ratify, and to make the real constitution and by-laws of this society.

Mr. HENDERSON: I desire to allay the fears of my hon. friend. I had observed what I consider rather drastic legislation as contained in section 4. When we are asked to adopt the constitution by-laws and rules of an unincorporated society and make them law, I confess it is a rather unusual thing. In the Railway Committee, when somewhat similar proposals are made they are opposed. But when a Bill bears the honourable names of those who are incorporators in this case, men some of whom were members of this House years ago and personally known to me, Dr. Roddick, and Dr. Lachapelle, and also Dr. Primrose, Dr. King, of Toronto, Dr. Courtenay, of Ottawa, and others I might name, I am not very much afraid of anything along the line that the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. EMMERSON: But it is your duty to know what you are doing.

Mr. HENDERSON.

Mr. HENDERSON: I am quite willing to take something for granted when I see the names of honourable men like those connected with the legislation.

Progress reported.

GUARANTEE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA.

House in Committee on Bill No. 31, to consolidate and amend the Act relating to the Guarantee Company of North America. —Mr. Baker.

On section 22—failure to fill vacancy does not invalidate acts of the board:

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that this section was fully considered by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. But would it not be possible that a certain number of directors, through disagreement on some question of policy, might resign, and the remaining members of the directorate, although possibly a minority, might go on and do the business of the company? Does the section provide all that is necessary for the protection of the shareholders?

Mr. PERLEY: This is a peculiar clause which is explained by the fact that they have this same right under their present charter. This is a very old company. It is provided that a majority of the directors shall be Canadians, and in order that they may be able to hold a meeting, the quorum of directors has been fixed at three. But the point raised by the hon. gentleman about the board going on without having filled the number of directors was not discussed in the committee.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I might supplement what has been said by stating that a clause of this kind is by no means unusual. I believe that under the former Companies Act of Ontario, and also under the present one,—though I am not so sure as to that—the vacancies occurring in the board of directors between annual meetings may be filled by the remaining directors. I think the safeguard against such a situation as the hon. member refers to would be the fact that the majority of the directors would maintain their positions; they would hardly resign, because they would be in control and would desire to carry out their policy until the next meeting.

Mr. GRAHAM : I think the reason given by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) would be good—that this provision is in their present Act. We do not wish to change the status they now enjoy. But if this were a new company, I should be prepared to argue that this should be safeguarded in some way, so that they should have to fill vacancies within a specified time.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 87, respecting the Burrard Inlet and Bridge Company.—Mr. Stevens. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

Mr. GRAHAM : Would my hon. friend from Vancouver tell us what the position of this company is? If I remember correctly, this is the undertaking about which there was a good deal of discussion in the House and in committee during the previous session. There was a municipal company, if I remember rightly, and a private company, and they came to some arrangement, as I understand it, by which this bridge was to be constructed, and certain government aid to be given. Has anything practical been done? Have they proceeded with the work, or are these two interests still conflicting?

Mr. STEVENS: Practically the last obstacle in the way of commencing the construction was removed only a few days ago in the Public Works Department—the matter of the approval of the plans. There has been a very long discussion between the Government and the company—which, by the way, is entirely composed of representatives of municipalities—as to the width of the span of the bridge, and the clearance underneath. This has now been finally disposed of, and the detail plans, which are being drawn by Sir John Wolfe Barry, of London, are now on the way. These detail plans could not be completed until the Government had finally decided on the exact width of the span and the height of the clearance. This having been done, it is anticipated that actual construction will be commenced at a very early date. I might say that the matter of the approval of piers has also been decided, so that there will be no further delay in the construction, and, in view of the importance of the work, I think that every possible speed has been exercised in arriving at its present stage of development. I may add that only about a month ago an additional amount of money was voted by the municipalities in order to complete the twenty-five per cent of paid-up capital which was necessary in order to commence construction. This added capital was voted only a very short time ago, and I think that all difficulties with respect to the construction of the bridge have now been removed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the private company connected with this bridge disappeared?

Mr. STEVENS: It was impossible for these municipalities to organize a company to construct the bridge, so that five individual citizens, who have only sufficient stock to make them capable of becoming incorporators, organized the company, but the city of Vancouver, district of North Vancouver, district of West Vancouver, and the municipality of Burnaby, own the entire stock, with the exception of a few shares held by these private individuals, which will be surrendered on demand.

Mr. GRAHAM: Was there not a government subsidy voted to the private company?

Mr. STEVENS: That was in connection with the V. W. & Y., for the construction of this bridge, but this was last year transferred to the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company. There is only one place where the bridge can properly be built across the narrows, and these two companies have entered into an agreement, which is on file with the Minister of Railways, with regard to the location, and I understand that all difficulties in connection with the construction have now been removed.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was some discussion as to the number of tracks that would be over this bridge. Could the hon. gentleman tell me what roadways, street railways and railways would be included in the bridge under this Act?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a vehicular, railway and tramway bridge.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN NORTHERN BRANCH LINES COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 97, respecting the Canadian Northern Branch Lines Company.—Mr. Sharpe (Lisgar).

Mr. LANCASTER: This is an ordinary renewal. The power was given in 1911, and this is the first renewal that has been asked for. The Bill was unamended in the Railway Committee. It was exactly as it should be. We did not add any of the standard clauses in regard to municipal control of highways, and electric powers, because they had already been inserted in the statutes of 1911.

Mr. GRAHAM: The original statute gives the lines of railways which the renewal covers. Can the hon. member tell us to what lines this Bill refers?

Mr. LANCASTER: There is quite a number of them.

(a) From a point on the Oak Point branch of the Canadian Northern railway at or near Grosse Isle, thence in a generally northerly and westerly direction to Grand Rapids near the head of lake Winnipeg, with a branch therefrom to a point on Sturgeon bay on lake Winnipeg;

(b) From a point at or near Wassewa, thence through or near Deloraine, Hartney and Rossburn to a point at or near Ethelbert;

(c) From a point at or near Yorkton, thence in a generally northerly direction to a point at or near Hudson Bay Junction;

(d) From a point at or near Craven, thence in a generally northeasterly direction to a point at or near Hudson Bay Junction;

(e) From a point at or near Craven, thence in a generally easterly direction to a point on the Rossburn branch of the Canadian Northern railway east of Yorkton.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has any of the Rossburn branch been built yet?

Mr. LANCASTER: I am not sure, but I do not think so (reading):

(f) From a point at or near Craven, thence in a generally northerly direction, via Humboldt, to a point at or near Prince Albert;

(g) From a point on the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan railway at or near Davidson, thence in a generally easterly direction, passing north of Last Mountain lake to a junction with the line authorized in paragraph (d);

(h) From a point on the constructed line of the Canadian Northern railway between Brancebeth and Kinistino, thence in a generally northeastery direction to Pas Mission;

(i) From a point on the line authorized in paragraph (d) in or near township 40, range 7, west of the principal meridian, thence in a generally westerly and northwesterly direction to a point on the constructed line of the Canadian Northern railway at or near Jackfish lake;

(j) From a point at or near Moosejaw, thence in a generally northwesterly direction, to a point on the Vegreville-Calgary line of the Canadian Northern railway between Camrose and Stettler;

(k) From a point on the international boundary in range 7, west of the 4th meridian, thence in a generally northeasterly direction through or near Medicine Hat to a point on the authorized line of the Canadian Northern railway near or west of Battleford;

(l) From a point at or near Macleod, thence in a generally northeasterly direction, to a point on the Saskatoon-Calgary line of the Canadian Northern railway, in or near ranges 1 to 4, west of the 4th meridian;

(m) From a point on the authorized Maryfield-Lethbridge line of the Canadian Northern railway at or near ranges 1 to 4, west of the 4th meridian, thence in a generally westerly and northwesterly direction, passing through or near Cardston and Fishburn to a point at or near Pincher Creek;

(n) From a point on the authorized Maryfield-Lethbridge line of the Canadian Northern railway in or near ranges 8 to 5, west of the 4th meridian, thence in a generally northwesterly direction, passing through or near Taber, to a junction with the line authorized in paragraph (l);

(o) From a point on the authorized Maryfield-Lethbridge line of the Canadian Northern railway between ranges 1 and 5, west of the 4th meridian, thence in a generally northwesterly direction to a point at or near township 17, range 18, west of the 4th meridian, thence in a northwesterly and westerly direction, passing along the valley of Sheep river, to a point on the west side of range 6, west of the 5th meridian;

(p) From a point at or near Lloydminster, thence in a generally northwesterly direction to a point at or near township 54, range 5, west of the 4th meridian, thence in a generally northwesterly and westerly direction to a point at or near Bruderheim;

(q) From a point on the authorized line of the Edmonton and Slave Lake railway between Morinville and the north boundary of township 61, thence in a generally westerly direction to a point in township 56, range 8, west of the 5th meridian;

(r) From a point on the authorized line of the Canadian Northern railway at or north of Fort Pitt, thence in a generally northerly and westerly direction, passing south of Lac la Biche, to a point on the Athabaska river.

These are the lines that were authorized in 1911, and which we are continuing here by the first renewal.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend know what the mileage of all these lines is? It makes quite a network of branch lines.

Mr. LANCASTER: I did know in the Railway Committee, but I have not a note of it here. I may say that in the Railway Committee I checked the capitalization. That being $15,000,000, at $10,000 a mile I found what the mileage was approximately.

Mr. GRAHAM: Any person who has studied the question realizes that what is needed in the West are branch lines and more branch lines in addition to the main lines. The difficulty I always found, and which I suppose my successor finds, is to get them to build the branch lines which are chartered. It is almost impossible to have them constructed as rapidly as the people want them.

Mr. COCHRANE: They will certainly construct these lines.

Mr. GRAHAM: I rather think that strong pressure was brought to bear to have certain branch lines built rapidly. I think one of them has been commenced, the one mentioned first.

Mr. LANCASTER: They said that one was commenced, but I forget which one it was.

Mr. GRAHAM: No doubt the scarcity of money at present, imaginary or real, is a reason for less rapid building than might otherwise have taken place. But the duty of Parliament is to urge as strongly as possible that the most important of these lines be constructed with as little delay as possible. I never took the view that taking the charter away from a company would help to build a railway. I was rather criticised for holding that view. If the big companies cannot build those branch lines with sufficient rapidity, no other person can. At the same time Parliament has a duty to perform, for when we induce men to move their families into that new territory we ought to put forward our strongest efforts to give them railway facilities.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

SHUSWAP AND OKANAGAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 82, respecting the Shuswap and Okanagan Railway Company—Mr. Green.

On section 1—agreement with Canadian Pacific Railway Company:

Mr. GRAHAM: There seems to have been a statute passed which is referred to here as section 6 of chapter 47 of the statutes of 1890.

Mr. LANCASTER: By that statute it is enacted that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may give evidence of the consent of their shareholders to the amalgamation with this company in a little different way from that required of other companies under sections 361, 362 and 363 of the Railway Act. So as to be consistent we have enacted that, although the Shuswap and Okanagan Railway Company have to do it under these sections, as far as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are concerned it would be sufficient to do it as required by their charter.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does this particular clause in their charter give them any advantage over any of the other big railways in the way of amalgamation or otherwise?

Mr. LANCASTER: No, it simply enacts that they shall give evidence of the consent of their shareholders in a slightly different way from that provided by sections 361, 362 and 363 of the Railway Act. While these sections shall be complied with exactly by the other companies, as to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it shall be sufficient if consent is given in accordance with their charter.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose my hon. friend has not failed to notice the fact that this is a very old friend—1886?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes, the company was incorporated in 1886 by chapter 82 and then it went on until 1891. But it has been very much alive; the railway is constructed. This is not a renewal but it is merely a Bill to allow them to continue the agreement which they have made with the Canadian Pacific railway. It does not give them the right to go and build other lines.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend know the length of this road?

Mr. LANCASTER: I could not give it exactly at this moment.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN NORTHERN QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 99, respecting the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company—Mr. Guilbault.

On section 2—lines of railway authorized:

Mr. GRAHAM: What is this?

Mr. LANCASTER: This charter is partly a renewal of an existing authority and it also grants authority for the construction of new lines. Paragraph (a) of section 2 is a renewal of previously authorized lines and (b) authorizes new lines.

Mr. GRAHAM: Paragraph (b) raises an inquiry in my mind as to the Canadian Northern Quebec project east of Montreal. If I remember correctly, in guaranteeing the bonds of the line from Port Arthur to Montreal, provision was made that, should the Government find it expedient, the Canadian Northern should be prepared to enter into an arrangement of some kind for an interchange of traffic with the Intercolonial railway east of Montreal. Has that idea developed at all, or would it be significant that they are now applying for power to build a line of their own from that point to Levis paralleling the Intercolonial railway? Would that lead us to believe that there is no likelihood of an arrangement being made between the Government and the Canadian Northern for an interchange of traffic? That brings up the other and bigger question of the agreement in existence with the Grand Trunk railway. Has the Grand Trunk shown any symptoms of wishing to withdraw from that agreement with the Intercolonial railway, or is it living up to its agreement to the fullest extent? Perhaps I would make it easier for my hon. friend if I would ask the question in this way: Is it living up to its agreement as well as it ever lived up to it? It is a well known fact that an arbitration has been trying for years to settle this matter. My own opinion is that there should be a finality to that commission's work very soon. What I do desire to ask is if there is any possibility that there will be an arrangement made with the Canadian Northern for an interchange of traffic east of Montreal?

Mr. COCHRANE: There has been no arrangement completed. The question has been discussed to some extent but whether the arrangement shall start from Montreal or Quebec has not been determined. As far as the Grand Trunk living up to their agreement is concerned, it is pretty hard to say. The managing board of the Intercolonial railway claim they are not. As to the reference to the board of arbitrators, considerable delay was occasioned by the death of the chief arbitrator and the illness of Mr. Shepley. I had word from Mr. Justice Falconbridge to the effect that the arbitration would be finished up in a few days. Some points have not yet been finally settled.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is certainly very desirable that the Canadian Northern railway, having reached Montreal with its western lines, should reach Quebec and the maritime provinces. It is however difficult to see where there is room for another railway from Montreal to Lévis. There are already three lines there, the Grand Trunk railway from Montreal to Richmond and from Richmond to Lévis, the Intercolonial railway over the Grand Trunk to Ste. Rosalie with a branch to Levis, and the Delaware and Hudson, the old South Shore, which skirts the St. Lawrence to Lotbinière and is to be extended to Lévis also. So a fourth railway would certainly have to parallel one of these roads if not two and it is therefore most desirable that arrangements should be made to have running powers over one of the existing lines.

Mr. COCHRANE: We would have to give notice of the traffic agreement in order to get running rights there, and until the aggreement is completed I do not think we should interfere. Then the Canadian Northern railway could not get out of Montreal, they would have to cross over and make a connection in Montreal if they are to avoid the construction of a road. Anyway the Canadian Northern railway have control of a road from Montreal to Quebec on the north shore.

NIAGARA, ST. CATHERINES AND TORONTO RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 102, respecting the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company—Mr. Wilson (Wentworth.)

On section 1:

Mr. LANCASTER: This is a company that does some building every time it gets a renewal of its charter. It is building through an expensive country. It has constructed a certain number of miles of electric railway in the Niagara district every time it gets a renewal and it sets a good example to other railway companies in that respect. They are now building from Niagara to St. Catharines and from Queenston to Niagara.

Mr. WILSON (Laval): Is it not through the Garden of Eden?

Mr. LANCASTER: I would not say the Garden of Eden, but it is through the Garden of Canada. It is an ordinary renewal and they have made progress since the last renewal.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

DOMINION TRUST COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 10, respecting the Dominion Trust Company.—Mr. Stevens. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. GRAHAM: As I understand the amendments in all these sections where the committee has amended the Bill, it is provided that certain steps must be taken by by-laws rather than in the open way in which the Bill was drawn in the first instance, namely by consent of the shareholders or directors.

Mr. AMES: This clause with reference to share warrants has been made to conform exactly with the amendments that were put by the House into Bill No. 9, respecting Canadian Explosives, Limited. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) at that time suggested that all these steps should be taken by by-law and that such powers should not be given to the directors as directors.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

REGAL TRUST COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill No. 73, to incorporate the People's Trustee and Security Company, name recommended to be changed to the Regal Trust Company.—Mr. Fripp. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On section 13—annual statement to be given to Minister of Finance:

Mr. GRAHAM: Is my hon. friend the Minister of Finance sure that by this provision the statement given annually will be an absolutely accurate portrayal of the conditions of the company? I have in my mind the statement required of insurance companies. In some instances it is not fair to the company, in so far as it does not permit it to include certain things in its assets, which are real assets, namely, reinsurance in companies not doing business in Canada. The statement to the department must exclude certain amounts that should appear as assets, because the reinsurance is done with companies not permitted to do or not doing business in Canada. Consequently, all the assets that would be taken into account if that reinsurance were done with a Canadian company or with a company registered to do business in Canada, have to be excluded from the annual statement of the insurance company; and in some cases it means a difference of thousands of dollars in the standing of the company as it appears in the report given to the public. This matter comes in here only incidentally. When my hon. friend considers the matter at a later date, it might be wise if the regulation which requires these assets to be excluded were altered, so that in the report required from the insurance company some memorandum could be inserted showing the real condition of its finances as regards reinsurance with companies not doing business in Canada. Some American companies, which do not do business in Canada, are perhaps the strongest on the continent; and our insurance companies often find it advisable to do some of their reinsurance with such companies. I will point out why that is the case. Application is perhaps made to several Canadian companies for a very large risk, which they are already carrying to the fullest extent possible. It is impossible for the Canadian companies to accept this risk unless they can place some of the insurance in companies not having a legal right to do business in Canada; and when a report is made out, they do not get any credit for that reinsurance. If there could be some column in the official report in which the company were allowed to state, notwithstanding the regulations, that they have this reinsurance with outside companies, it would be fair to the company and would give the public an accurate idea of its standing.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): The suggestion of my hon. friend is very well worthy of consideration. I will bring his remarks, as they appear in 'Hansard,' to the attention of the proper officials, and the matter will be considered at a convenient time. As my hon. friend has said, the statement required from insurance companies is somewhat different from the statement called for here. No such difficulty is likely to arise in connection with this particular company, because the statement called for here is a statement of the capital stock, the portion thereof paid up, the assets and liabilities of the company, the trust property held by it, and other details. That statement is not complicated by the considerations that have been drawn to my attention by my hon. friend. His suggestion in regard to insurance returns appears prima facie to be well worthy of consideration, and I will have it looked into with pleasure.

EXPRESS RATES.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland) moved:

That, in view of the alleged widespread feeling throughout Canada, that the rates or transportation charges exacted by the express companies in Canada for the carriage of traffic are said to be excessive and in many instances abnormally extravagant, to such a degree that it has, in the opinion of very many, become intolerable it is, in the opinion of this House, desirable that a further inquiry should be had by the Railway Commission of Canada and that such inquiry or investigation should be held and heard by the full Board of Railway Commissioners and not by any division or committee thereof, and should include not only an inquiry as to the tariff rates and the consideration of all matters relative thereto in force by the said companies respectively, during the past ten years, or in the case of companies not in operation that length of time, for the period during which they have respectively actually carried on an express business in Canada, but as well relate to and include the investigation as to the amount of capital actually paid in cash and invested in the business operations of all said companies respectively, and the amount or other dividends declared and actually paid by the said respective companies, and that the period over which such inquiries should extend, should be the operations of said companies, respectively during the past ten years or in the case of companies not in operation that length of time, for the period during which they have been operating as carriers of goods by express; and such investigation or inquiry shall also relate not only to the rates charged by the said companies, but as well to the proportions of such charges, or rates collected, paid to the railway and steamship companies and to other transportation companies operating in Canada respectively, and to the Intercolonial Railway of Canada and to the Government of Canada, or any department thereof, as also to individuals, in connection with the transportation of express traffic.

Mr. McKENZIE.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the measure of one's usefulness as an ordinary member of this House is not to be taken by the number of times he addresses you, but rather by the importance of the subjects presented and the sincerity with which these subjects are discussed. I therefore feel that there is no apology needed for presenting to the House a resolution relating to the subject which is involved therein. Its importance will be recognized on all hands, not only upon its own account but because of its cognate relationship to the question of parcel post. I feel that I cannot deal with this subject as well as I would like at this late hour; the subject is really of such wide importance, and is so generally recognized by the people of the country that as a matter of necessity the facts relating to it are very comprehensive and would naturally take up a good deal of time. Let me point out that the resolution, when analysed, simply means that there is a widespread feeling throughout the country that the cost of transportation by express is excessive. That is the first statement in the resolution. The second is that because of that there is a necessity for a further inquiry into the subject by the Railway Commission. Its importance must be recognized by the fact that the express transportation tax is over $1.25 per head of the population of Canada, and it is a matter that affects every section, every province, and the people everywhere throughout the country. The necessity of a further investigation into the subject I think will be apparent when I have brought to the notice of the House the facts relating to it. I do not propose to offer any opinions of my own; I shall content myself with simply presenting to the House certain facts and figures and it will then be for the members of the House to draw their own conclusions and to devise such action as would seem to be necessary under the circumstances. Not only do the express companies in Canada have to do with transportation, but in a measure they do other business incidentally connected therewith. Practically, they do a certain banking business in the way of exchange, and I was surprised to see the revenues which these companies secure in connection with this branch of their business.

In 1906 express companies were first brought under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and in 1907, after the control of express companies was placed by the Railway Act under the direction of that board, the late chairman, Judge Killam, started an investigation, I think on December 10, 1907. I do not know how long Judge Killam devoted to that inquiry, but as he died in March, 1908, the investigation was not finished. It was subsequently proceeded with by his successor in office, Judge Mabee. I cannot very well deal with the subject of the conclusions reached as a result of that investigation without making somewhat lengthy extracts from the general judgment which was delivered by Judge Mabee in which he recited practically the salient features brought out in the evidence before him and also referred to the opinion expressed by his predecessor in office, Judge Killam. In holding that investigation Canada was but following the precedent established by the United States in the matter of the express companies in that country, and the inquiry followed along the same lines. The investigation brought out a great many facts. It was attended by the representatives of the three great Canadian express companies and also by representatives of the American companies which do business in Canada as well as by some other Canadian railway companies which were given notice and which had an opportunity of appearing. At the commencement of the investigation the legislation of 1906 was first discussed at some length and the chief commissioner ruled that the tariffs which had been submitted for the approval of the board required the affirmative approval of the board and that the onus of establishing that the tariffs were reasonable and fair was upon the express companies. It was then suggested by the companies that a stated case might be submitted for the consideration of the Supreme Court upon three points, first, as to whether these tariffs required affirmative approval in the first instance and, second, if so, as to the onus of proof and, third, as to the principles upon which the board should proceed in deciding whether to approve or disapprove the tariffs submitted. I may say that Judge Killam treated it as an application by the express companies in Canada for the approval by the board of their standard tariffs. At first, as I have stated, the companies took the ground that the law was defective with respect to the matter and that this stated case should be submitted to the Supreme Court, but after much discussion the companies abandoned the alternative of submitting these questions to the Supreme Court and the inquiry proceeded gradually, developing into practically an investigation into all the various phases of the express business as carried on in Canada and to some extent in the United States. I cannot very well place before the House the evidence that was given, nor would I wish to take up the time of the House in calling attention in detail to all that transpired, but I shall take the liberty of quoting from that general judgment as to the views which the commission entertained with respect to the whole subject. The judgment is a very valuable one, it is indeed a treatise upon the express business and while it in no sense concluded the case or dealt with all points that were raised, yet it laid down certain principles that should govern the commission in making its subsequent orders. There was no concrete judgment as to tariffs, but as a result of that judgment, from time to time, orders were passed by the board relating to this or that phase of the whole difficulty. In that judgment Judge Mabee recited among other things the following:

> A vast system of transportation by express companies has grown up, involving both in physical operation, as well as in its financial features, details of a most complex character. To cover all the matters discussed in the inquiry into the affairs of these companies by fair and well digested findings is not possible. There are some features connected with the business of these companies, that at the present stage, the board cannot satisfactorily dispose of, and after long and patient consideration, perusal and reperusal of the evidence and argument it has been concluded that much the fairer course to pursue is to deal with all matters about which we have no reasonable doubt, leaving others that we find we cannot satisfactorily dispose of in abeyance for further discussion, or for additional evidence. This course we think more in the interest of all concerned than that further delay should be permitted in disposing of matters about which we have come to conclusions, and which cover much the larger portions of those involved; and it is more than likely that in the result the questions not specifically disposed of now, will by reason of the rulings now made, gradually adjust themselves.

The words of the Chairman of the Board on that occasion indicate that any conclusions which they reached at that time were not to be considered as by any means final, in fact you will find all through his rulings the idea that he was simply skirting the subject, and that he touched here and there some vital features which, as he thought, could be remedied at the moment, leaving for future determination certain other difficulties which presented themselves to the board at that time but with which they were unable to deal satisfactorily to themselves or to all who might be interested in the subject.

I said that the express companies made a suggestion as to the submitting of a case to the courts. The former Chief Commissioner, when that suggestion was made—I refer to the lamented Judge Killam—gave utterance to the following, which I think, is worthy of consideration. It gives an idea of what was in the minds of the members of the Board as to how the whole subject was to be treated, the difficulties that presented themselves, the solutions that were possible, and the basic principles which should govern the investigation:—

The third question I would suggest is as to the principles upon which the board is to proceed in deciding whether to approve or not approve the tariffs submitted.

Under the legislation in the old province of Canada, the General Railway Act, made part of the Grand Trunk railway's charter, and probably under the charters of other railway companies incorporated before Confederation, their rates were subject to approval by the Governor in Council. That legislation is continued in the General Railway Acts after the formation of the Dominion, and probably most, if not all of the railway companies doing business in Canada, were subject, at any rate up to the passage of the Railway Act of 1903, to such provisions requiring the rates to be approved by the Governor in Council, and provisions giving the Governor in Council power to vary those from time to time.

I have traced all that legislation up to the judgment in the case of Robertson v. the Grand Trunk Railway Company, now before the Supreme Court.

The Governor in Council, I apprehend, under that legislation, was subject to no legal rules other than such as approved themselves to the Governor in Council. There was no tribunal which had power to review the conclusions of the Governor in Council upon such matters. I take it that under the Railway Act the Board of Railway Commissioners, in approving these standard tariffs, are in the same position. It was expected, of course, that the board would be reasonable and just to everybody. The provision authorizing the board to disallow the tariffs was that it could disallow them if it considered them to be unjust or unreasonable. No rules were laid down. I do not think the board would be bound by the rule applicable at common law to determine whether charges of common carriers were just and reasonable, and I do not think that the board could be bound by the rules that have been laid down in the United States to determine the constitutional limitations of the powers of the State Legislatures. So far as these principles commend themselves to the judgment of the board as consonant with natural just and right under the circumstances, the board can adopt and follow them, but I mean to say that, as a matter of law, it is not bound by the principles that have been laid down, so far as they have been laid down at common law, for the purpose, or by the principles so laid down as constitutional limitations in the United States.

I think the board is entitled to take into consideration the probable expense that companies will be at in transacting the business to be done under these tariffs, and the probable returns from that business, and the probable profit to be made among other factors. Those, where the opportunity exists, may be judged by the circumstances of the past. Where the company has already been carrying on such business, and, for that reason, it seemed to me that this evidence respecting the receipts from the business of these two express companies (the Canadian and the Dominion), we have had before us, and their expenses, is material evidence. And, in considering the expense to which these companies would be put, naturally the payments to be made to the railway companies, on whose lines their business is carried, comes in, and the position then of the express companies with regard to these railway companies; whether they are separate independent bodies, dealing with each other at arm's length, each looking after its own interests, or whether in any case they are really one concern, is material; the relations between them; the condition of independence one of the other. All that is material.

Of course, I do not hesitate to state also that, for what it is worth, evidence as to how such business is transacted elsewhere, and the proportions of the express business received by the companies who furnish the transportation, or the amount paid for such transportation, is material to be considered. But that appears to me to be the position of it with regard to the principles. I thought perhaps it might be well to express those, and that the parties might then make up their minds whether they think it desirable, before the board concludes these matters to lay any of the questions of law that seem to arise, before the Supreme Court for consideration in such a way that we may, if possible, have its conclusion in time to base our judgment upon it in the end, rather than that we should go on independently, and consider and arrive at conclusions, and have these matters made a matter of appeal afterwards.

It will thus be seen that the then Chief Commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners, thought that it was pertinent to such an inquiry that there should be an investigation not merely as to the business that was done, but how it was done and its relation to the railway companies. And in discussing this matter, we must bear in mind the fact that, so far as the Canadian express companies are concerned, each is allied to one of the great railway companies of Canada. For instance, the Dominion Express Company, one of the largest in Canada, is practically the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is owned and controlled and operated by that railway corporation. The Canadian Northern Express Company is part and parcel of the Canadian Northern Railway. Their interests are so interwoven that, practically, in dealing with the express companies in Canada you deal with the great railway corporations. And though separate accounts are kept and though they are separate so far as their indentity is concerned from these railway companies; it is only for the purpose of carrying on this express business and these separate companies being practically the agents of the railway companies in dealing with the patrons of these companies in the matter of their express business.

Mr. BLAIN: Has the hon. gentleman any information as to decreases made in express rates upon different Canadian goods since the express companies were put under the Railway Commission in regard to rates?

Mr. EMMERSON: The information I have is too voluminous to permit my imposing it upon the House under the present circumstances; but as a result of that inquiry orders were made from time to time with respect to certain classes of agricultural products, such as cream, butter, eggs, and other products of the creameries, and such goods as are usually carried by the express companies. There was, practically speaking, no change with respect to the products of the creameries. For instance, previous to the filing of the new standard tariffs in 1907, and before the companies were made subject to the Railway Act, they imposed a charge for carrying the products to the point of destination, and in that charge was included the case of having the empty vessels returned free of charge. A fixed charge was made for carrying cream from one point to another in cans, and these cans were returned to the shipper free of charge. As a result of this investigation no change was made in the original charges, which included the return of empties, but an additional and practically nominal charge was made for the return of the empties, and under the present tariffs, shippers are obliged to pay for the return of the empty vessels in which the products were shipped to market. While this investigation was valuable in exposing the conditions which prevailed in Canada with respect to these express companies, no substantial reduction has been made in the tariffs as compared with previous tariffs, and it is alleged that the charges are still excessive, and that the inquiry did not result in affording relief to the consumers of Canada, who are materially interested in the transportation of Canadian products. I think I shall be borne out in this statement by what I shall bring to the attention of the House before I conclude my remarks. I know that the express companies made certain claims in respect to the matter; indeed, there has been placed before me a statement setting forth what they conceive to be the burdens placed upon them as a result of that investigation. In justice to them, I will read their claims, which are as follows:

The order of the Board of Railway Commissioners in the express inquiry in 1910 resulted in:

1. A considerable reduction in express rates in various parts of the country.

2. Under a new form of receipt, approved by the commission, the express companies' liability for loss and damage was greatly amplified as compared with the receipt formerly used, which has resulted in an increase of over 50 per cent in the expense to the express companies for loss and damage claims, and a corresponding benefit to the public.

3. Whereas formerly the express companies performed in the principal cities a free collection and delivery service by wagon only within a narrow district (usually the business centre), under the new order this service was extended to the municipal boundaries of the cities, resulting in an increased expense for additional horses, wagons and employees of from 25 to 100 per cent.

4. On through shipments the lines of the first carrier where a through rate made up of the combination of the separate locals was formerly used, the commission ordered a single graduate rate on shipments under 100 pounds, also a basis for through rates on packages over 100 pounds considerably lower than the former combination of separate rates. This has very materially curtailed the revenues of the express companies, though to what extent cannot definitely be determined.

5. The commission, working with the express companies, caused to be prepared a new classification of express freight, with the object of removing all inconsistencies and discriminations, also with the object of reducing revenues and increasing the liabilities of the express companies. The effect of this was widespread, and it has been impossible to determine how seriously the revenue has been affected.

I present this as a statement of the contentions of the express companies with regard to the investigation. Answering these claims specifically, I may say that while there was a change in the form of receipt, the results have not been as they claim. The same difficulties still exist with respect to claims for damages, and, indeed, there was a special order of the board with respect to shipments which had to be transferred from one company to another, or from a Canadian company to an American company when the shipment reached the border. In that regard, the first company receiving the article for transportation merely became the agent of the shipper, and no relief could be or would be afforded on the part of the original company receiving the article for transportation. In many instances, even in Canada, this placed the shipper at a very great disadvantage, so much so that I am informed by shippers it is practically impossible to recover with respect to these. With regard to shipments that are made to the United States, it is absolutely impossible to secure redress. I could read letter after letter, which I have received from business men throughout Canada, setting forth the difficulties in that regard.

Mr. BLAIN: If the House should pass the resolution that my hon. friend is moving, would it give to the Board of Railway Commissioners any power of investigation that it does not now possess?

Mr. EMMERSON: The resolution certainly gives no power. They have all the powers inherent to it.

Mr. BLAIN: In other words then, whether this passes or not, it does not add to the powers of the board for investigation purposes?

Mr. EMMERSON: None whatever.

Mr. BLAIN: What is its value then?

Mr. EMMERSON: It calls attention to the necessity of a further investigation. It is claimed on behalf of the business men of Canada that the first investigation, which was concluded in 1910, was not as complete or as exhaustive as it should have been. It is complained that the matter was not gone into by the full board.

Mr. COCHRANE: The full board gave a judgment.

Mr. EMMERSON: That is quite true. The judgment was given by the commissioner on behalf of the full board. I am not making complaint as to that, but the business men of Canada claim that the whole of the evidence and all the facts should be heard by the full board if it is possible to do so. The commissioners acting under the chief commissioner did not have the opportunity of listening to the evidence, of having all the facts presented to them. They simply took for granted—I have no complaint to make as to that course—that all was well, and they allowed the chief commissioner to deliver the judgment. I do not think complaint is made with respect to the character of that judgment, which, as I have said, was practically a treatise on the express companies of Canada, but they do complain that the facts were not as comprehensive as they might have been, that the commissioners did not follow the course pursued by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the United States, and that they did not delve down under the whole business of express companies. Even in so far as they did investigate, and drew any conclusion, it is complained that they did not then act decisively except in regard to one or two features. That is the general complaint of the business world of Canada. In the East and in the West, they are calling for a second investigation, a more thorough one in which all the evidence, as presented, will be heard by the full board, so that every member of it will have the opportunity of exercising his judgment in reaching a conclusion as to the remedy which should be applied. For instance, with respect to this very matter of the liability of the companies, the companies explain that they are subject to greater burdens by reason of liabilities in cases of loss. The shippers say that it is not so, that the same difficulties exist, that you cannot recover when you have claims for loss, and that the difficulties that were shown to exist by the investigation in the United States exist in Canada, though perhaps not to the same extent, and the remedy has not been applied. I have here a statement by one of the big business firms of Canada, in connection with the clause in the express merchandise receipt, which was referred to in the memoranda of the express companies which I have read. It reads as follows:

> If the shipment is delivered to an express company or carrier not subject to the Railway Act, the company shall act as agent of the shipper in effecting such delivery, and contracting for further transportation and the liability of the company shall thereupon cease.

That arose in a particular case. And the answer was:

> If you have suffered loss, you doubtless have an action in the United States against the United States company; but as a United States company is not subject to the board, the board has approved of the clause as above quoted.

That was a case where there was no possible remedy. These cases frequently come before the courts. There was one from Toronto very recently, I think not later than the month of January, in which such a difficulty occurred. I shall not take the trouble to refer to all these isolated cases; I shall content myself in dealing with the matter in a general way. The shippers complain that the companies do not treat them fairly in the matter of those claims. They say that they are arbitrary and autocratic, and that when you apply to them in a case of loss, they simply will not give that consideration which the shipping world thinks is due it. 'All this happened,' they say. 'but what are you going to do about it?' And because they are very arbitrary, it is almost impossible to secure a claim from them particularly in the case of shipments to the United States.

Now, in the United States, they did have an inquiry which brought to light so many facts that the Interstate Commerce Commission was constrained to pass a very drastic ordinance, with the result that there has been a very substantial change with regard to the business of express companies. I think it was Wannamaker who gave utterance to that immortal epigram, that there were five objections to the parcel post system. But the epigram, like a good many others, was not true; as a matter of fact, there were twenty-two objections in the form of express companies. The express companies in the United States were not confined to the number of five, but there were twenty-two of them and these constitute the objections to the parcel post system in that country. One wag suggested that they had better have twenty-three and then they should wipe them out altogether and go forward with a clean slate—I suppose suggesting the skidoo idea. It was shown in the United States that there was practically an express trust and it was shown to be the finest example of organized and legalized pillage ever consummated and that no one individual seemed to be blamed for it. It was simply another example of the eternal truth that power unrestrained tends to tyranny. The result of that trust in the United States was that these twenty-two companies divided up the territory between them, operated it in their own interest. The other companies did not interfere with the one that was assigned to a certain territory with the result that the charges were exorbitant, the whole business came to be a scandal and the business interests of the country suffered.

We all realize that the express companies in Canada are placed upon a somewhat different basis from those in the United States. In both countries, it is true that the express companies had their origin at the time of the inception of the railways on this continent, first in the United States and then in Canada. They simply grew up as a sop to the stage coach proprietors who were put out of business at the time of the advent of the railways. They have grown to great proportions without practically any capital. I think I might very profitably read to the House the words of Judge Mabee in his general judgment, first, as to the capitalization, the stock, the finances, of the express companies. He says:

> The position of nearly all the express companies doing business in Canada, at any rate the position of the Dominion and the Canadian express companies, is different from most, if not all, of the express companies doing business in the United States. To what extent the capital stock of the various express companies there is held by railway companies, we have no exact information, although as to some it is known that certain railway companies own or control large holdings. In Canada all the capital stock of each of the above companies is held by the parent railway company. For instance, every share of the capital stock of the Dominion Express Company is held in trust for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that railway company being the actual and beneficial owner of all assets, franchise, and earning power of the Dominion Express Company. Exactly the same position obtains as to the Canadian Express Company. The Canadian Northern Express Company stands in a somewhat different position as it does not appear that the stock is expressly held in trust for the Canadian Northern Railway Company. A letter from the company contains the following statement upon this matter:—
> 'The capital stock of the company authorized is $1,000,000; issued, $300,000. Of this $5,000 was paid in cash and $295,000 was issued as paid-up stock to the vendors of the express business, and the rights, franchises, good-will, properties, &c., connected therewith, carried on in connection with the Northern Pacific and Manitoba and allied railway companies, and for the good-will, properties, &c., used in connection with the express business then done for the Canadian Northern Railway Company and allied roads.'
>
> 'Hon. Mr. MABEE: Who were the vendors?
>
> 'Mr. BUELL: William Mackenzie, D. D. Mann, Z. A. Lash, R. J. Mackenzie, the estate of A. W. Mackenzie, and Mackenzie, Mann Company, Limited.' It goes on to say:
> 'From the foregoing it will be seen that practically all the capital stock is held by Mackenzie, Mann & Company, Limited; the balance of five shares being simply qualifying directors shares. None of the stock is held by or in trust in any way for the Canadian Northern Railway Company, but as will easily be seen the express company is controlled by the same interests as control the railway company, the shareholders being practically identical.'

In endeavouring to arrive at what are fair and reasonable tolls for express companies to charge the public, it may not make much difference whether the stock is owned by private individuals, or by the railway companies; for, after all, no matter who may be the owner or owners, they are entitled to have the business conducted upon a footing that will yield fair returns; and the fact that these express companies are owned by the railway companies affords no reason for approaching the consideration of what are fair tolls in any different way than that the matter should be approached if the stock were in other hands; but it has necessitated a much more careful inquiry into and consideration of the relations between the railway companies and the express companies. For instance, a contract covering carriage and other matters between a railway company and the express company owned by it, entails much more careful consideration and inquiry into all the surrounding facts than would a contract made between an express company, which was an entirely independent organization from the railway company, and the railway company, the dealing between the two being at arm's length. Again, where all the earnings of the express company go to the railway company there is an entire absence of competition as to the class of traffic as between the two corporations, and to some extent at least, and of course with certain limitations, it is in the interest of the railway company to have the traffic moved in express, and not in freight cars, as the earnings would thereby be increased; while in the case of an express company operating upon a line of railway, the company owning the latter having no financial interest in the former, it would probably be in the interest of the railway to move traffic in its freight cars; at any rate there would be some competition regarding traffic that might move either by freight or express. Again, where the express company is owned by the railway company, it is not unfair to assume that the managements of each are in such close touch with each other that tariffs are built that will work to the best advantage of the railway company. We are not suggesting that the inquiry has developed any abuses arising from these relations, but mention these matters as illustrative of the amount of detail this investigation has cast upon the board and its officers.

The board inquired into a great many matters to learn as to whether the company tariffs which had been submitted were fair and reasonable and they took into consideration the question of the cost of carriage, the cost of operating an express company apart from the railway company and, at the same time they dealt with the financial aspect, that is to say, the amount of capital invested. We will take the case of the Dominion Express Company as a first illustration.

Dominion Express Company.—The Dominion Express Company was incorporated in 1882. The capital stock was fixed at $1,000,000, divided into ten thousand shares of $100 each; a provision was made that upon a vote of its shareholders of a majority, at a special meeting, it might be increased to $2,000,000.

At the time the company began business capital stock was subscribed to the amount of $1,000,000 upon which ten per cent was called.

The first shareholders were:

	shares.
Andrew Robertson, Esq., Montreal.	7,350
P. Mitchell, Esq.	100
John Cassils, Esq.	100
A. B. Chaffee. Esq.	100
Hon. J. R. Thibaudeau.	100
W. M. Macpherson, Esq.	100
G. A. Kirkpatrick, Esq.	2,150
	10,000

Between the date of inspection and 1904, the above ten thousand shares were assigned to the gentlemen hereinafter named, and in June, 1904, it was decided to increase the capital stock to the full amount allowed by the company's incorporation viz, $2,000,000, which was authorized by the stockholders at a special meeting, and the increase was divided among existing shareholders pro rata, who were at that date:

	shares.
Sir W. C. VanHorne.	14,700
Sir T. G. Shaughnessy.	4,500
R. B. Angus, Esq.	200
W. S. Stout, Esq.	200
C. F. Smith, Esq.	200
C. R. Hosmer, Esq.	200
	20,000

On June 26, 1882, $24,500 was paid to the treasury in Montreal by the subscribers, and on the same date an entry credited in the cash book entitled, 'Land Grant Bonds' $75,500. These two items appear to represent ten per cent or $100,000 on the capital stock of $1,000,000.

In other words, the Dominion Express Company is operating in Canada upon a nominal capitalization of $2,000,000, shares have been issued to that extent and yet only ten per cent on the first $1,000,000 has been paid, namely, $100,000, and so far as any returns that have been placed before the Railway Commissioners or before the Statistical Branch of the Department of Railways and Canals show, that is the only cash that is invested in the Dominion Express Company, and yet that company is paying a dividend, as will be seen later, on a capitalization of $2,000,000.

On or about the same date, the item of $75,500 for Land Grant Bonds appears as a disbursement, viz: 'paid out'; since that date there appears to have been no other payments made by shareholders in respect to their stock holdings; but from time to time, viz: from October, 1882 to October, 1884 the sum of $9,437.50 was credited in the cash book as 'interest received on land grant bonds' after which date there are no further entries in this respect. There are also entries appearing to the credit of cash for 'interest on deposit' from October 1884 to April, 1892, amounting to $7,448.46, these two amounts making $16,885. This amount was incorrectly applied as being entirely to land grant bonds.

Property and real estate.

The total amount of property and real estate standing on the books of the company from its inception to the end of 1908, is $592,239, consisting of:—

Property (viz., general equipment.	$407,038
Real estate.	185,201

The real estate consists principally of stables situated in the principal cities, the exceptions being:—

Fish wharf at Vancouver, valued at cost.	$27,523
Office building at Quebec.	27,134
Offices and depot at Toronto.	21,602

All real estate stands at the original cost; but the company estimates that the value to-day is considerably enhanced.

The company has filed two statements, one showing the gross revenue and expenditure, the other excluding certain revenues which they claim should be exempt from the Board jurisdiction, viz. the revenue derived from their fish business at Vancouver; also from their money order business.

The investigation of the books shows that the total gross revenue from all sources for the period of eight years, 1901-1908, amounted to $21,473,694, increasing from $1,529,195 in 1901 to $3,743,580 in 1908.

I shall not deal further with the features connected with that company, as that would involve too much detail. The Canadian Express Company is similarly situated. The Chairman says of it:

This company was incorporated in 1865 with a nominal capital of $500,000; subscribed capital of $275,200 of which $27,520 was paid in. The Grand Trunk Company purchased all the capital stock of the company in 1892 for $660,000.

On the 1st January, 1892, a complete valuation of the stock and property was made, and it was fixed at $60,000. Yearly additions have been made; the company's estimate of its value at the end of 1908, is $202,719, viz.:—

Property.	$143,668
Real estate.	69,050

The shareholders and their holdings are as follows:—

Sir C. Rivers Wilson, A. W. Smithers, Esq.	$1,465,000
C. M. Hays, Esq.	1,505,000
F. W. Morse, Esq.	5,000
W. Wainwright, Esq.	5,000
E. H. Fitzhugh, Esq.	5,000
Hugh Patton, Esq.	5,000
C. Percy, Esq.	5,000
Frank Scott, Esq.	5,000
	$3,000,000

It is not shown anywhere that a dollar was paid into that stock excepting the original $272,000 and yet the capitalization is represented as $3,000,000 and dividends are paid on that amount.

The company, like the Dominion Express Company, filed two statements, one excluding and the other including certain business which they claimed should not be considered as pertaining to express business.

The items which they exclude are:—

Money order business (net receipts for 7 years)	$223,692
Ocean earnings (net receipts for 7 years)	31,725
Customs Commissions (net receipts for 7 years)	9,974
Sundry Commissions (net receipts for 7 years)	4,969
	$270,360
The total gross revenue for the period of seven years (1902 to 1908) from all sources amounted to	$13,362,266
Less transportation paid and due other companies	1,706,295
	$11,655,971

Increasing from $1,314,400 in 1902 to $1,909,-024 in 1908, showing an average of $1,665,024 per annum.

These are simply statements filed by the express companies during the inquiry with the department. It is interesting, however, to note the results that have been secured by these companies during the last two years without regard to the previous years. There has not been a full investigation of the business of any of these companies since their inception. In 1911, by an amendment to the Railway Act, the express companies were required to file an annual statement with the Department of Railways and Canals showing all the facts with respect to their capitalization and their operation. A similar statement was filed in 1912, and we have the returns for those two years only. The returns for 1912 were placed on the table of this House within the last week; and I have not had the opportunity of analyzing it; but I cull from the report of 1911 the following: The gross receipts from the operation of the Canadian companies enumerated were $8,810,315.22; they paid out for express privileges $4,022,907.96, that is to say they paid that amount to the railway companies for the carriage of goods which were entrusted to them; their total operating revenues for transportation were therefore $4,787,407.56; add to that the revenue from outside operations, $3,506.60, and you have the total gross operating revenues of these three Canadian companies in 1911 of $4,790,914.16. Less operating expenses, that is the expenses of the carrying on of their business, it left to these three companies net operating revenues of $1,118,404.19. Out of that, they paid taxes of $14,416.17, so that their net earnings were $1,103,988.02. That is, the earnings of these companies, whose total capitalization outstanding was $4,005,-200, were $1,103,988.02, or a little over twenty-seven and one half per cent. Their capitalization is in a sense fictitious; I do not use the word with any fraudulent meaning; but it is fictitious for this reason, that in every instance these companies have issued paid-up stock without a dollar being paid into the company beyond the amounts which I have named. The net corporate income of these three companies, as per their own statement, was: The Canadian Express Company, $261,645.06; The Canadian Northern Express Company, $141,654; The Dominion Express Company, $674,237.82, or a total of $1,077,536.88, less dividend. This is the amazing feature of it: The Canadian Express Company paid dividends of $21,624.32; the Dominion Express Company paid a dividend of $460,-000; in all $481,624.32, leaving as a surplus after payment of these dividends, $595,-912.56, as a result of the operations of these three companies in the year 1911, according to their own statement. The dividend paid by the Dominion Express Company of $460,000 was divided as follows: they paid to their shareholders $240,000; they placed in reserve $160,000, and they put aside for property renewal $60,000. After payment of these dividends, these companies have a surplus of nearly $600,000. What became of that? In what way is that sum utilized? The shareholders have received their dividends; the amounts are not charged up anywhere; in the statements filed in the Department of Railways and Canals they show that they have or had that on hand for some purpose. Is it for the purpose of constructing buildings? In what way is it applied? No answer has been given in any of the statements. The statement of 1911 was followed by another in 1912; and they have not shown even in the latter statement what disposition was made of that surplus for 1911. That sum is presumably in the treasury of these companies. The question might be asked: will there be a stock bonus? These companies have not been authorized, I presume, to increase their capitalization; but are they preparing the way for a stock bonus in connection with these respective companies? It is not a question merely of the amount of dividends which they pay of six or eight per cent; the question is as to their earnings and the surplus which they have after deducting their total expenditure from their total receipts. If you take the report of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals for 1912, you will find the following on pages 12 and 13, with respect to the revenue and operating expenses of these three Canadian companies:

It was explained in connection with the report of last year that it had been found impracticable to make an accurate separation of the business done by American express companies operating in Canada from their aggregate business. The situation in that regard remains unchanged, and there is little hope of a better adjustment than was made for the purposes of the report of 1911. That adjustment was based upon an arbitrary assignment of revenue and operating expenses in accordance with the proportion which the operating mileage in Canada bore to the total operating mileage in both Canada and the United States.

The gross receipts from operation in 1912 were $10,994,418.10. They were $9,913,018.31 in 1911.

A deduction of $4,892,242.49 for express privileges—that is, the amount paid by express companies to railway, steamboat and stage lines for the carrying of express matter—left $6,102,175.61 as the operating revenue for the year.

Operating expenses—a thing quite apart from express privileges—had a total of $4,880,120. This left a net operating revenue of $1,222,055.61, to which was added a net revenue of $28,440.91 from outside operations, bring the total up to $1,250,496.52. A deduction of $87,488.58 for taxes left the net revenue for 1912 at $1,163,007.94.

It will be observed that during 1912 these companies make a return showing that they paid taxes of $87,488.58, whereas for the year 1911, they show taxes paid by them of only about $14,000. Wherein was the great increase in the taxes as between those two years? Is it a matter of bookkeeping? I simply call the attention of the House to this remarkable discrepancy in the taxes paid in 1912 as compared with 1911.

So far as Canadian companies were concerned the actual net revenue, after deducting taxes, was as follows:—

Canadian Express Company ..	$283,281.33
Dominion Express Company ..	645,288.94
Canadian Northern Express Company	192,496.25

Measuring this net revenue against capital liability, following was the result of the Canadian companies in 1912:

	Capital liability.	Per cent of net revenue.
Canadian Express ..	$1,705,200	16:6
Dominion Express ..	2,040,000	31:6
Canadian Northern Express...	1,000,000	19:2

The average for the three companies was 23:4.

The following balance sheet gives a concise summary of the financial results for the year:—

Gross receipts from operation ..	$10,994,418 10
Less express privileges..	4,892,242 49
Operating revenue..	$ 6,102,175 61
Operating expenses..	4,880,120 00
Net operating revenue	$ 1,222,055 61
Net revenue from outside operations..	28,440 91
Total net revenue..	$ 1,250,496 52
Less taxes	87,488 58
Balance for the year..	$ 1,163,007 94

The Canadian Express Company charged $48,965.27 to additions and betterments, while the Dominion Express Company deducted $160,000 for dividends, $160,000 for reserves and $80,000 for property renewal. In striking a net balance for the year, however, the true balance is the amount given above—$1,163,007.94. Dividends, appropriations for betterments, reserves, &c., merely explain what disposition was made of the balance. In other words, such items are strictly matters of domestic book-keeping. They do not in any way reduce the profits from operation.

The following is a statement of operating revenues for the year ended June 30, 1912:—

Revenue from transportation:—
Express revenue..		$10,575,699 00
Miscellaneous..		41,675 90
Total..		$10,617,375 80
Other than transportation:—
Money orders—domestic..	$201,234 88
Money orders—foreign..	18,056 02
Travellers' cheques—domestic..	2,806 60
Travellers' cheques—foreign..	2,714 92
C. O. D. cheques	83,791 24
Other earnings..	68,138 64
		$377,042 30
Gross revenue..		$10,994,418 10

A comparison of revenue from other sources than transportation, in 1911 and 1912, would point to growth in such items. Following are the facts:—

	1911.	1912.
Money orders—domestic.	$181,395 28	$201,534 88
Money orders—foreign ..	16,985 06	18,056 02
Travellers' cheques—domestic	2,895 74	2,806 60
Travellers' cheques—foreign..	1,186 21	2,714 92
C.O.D. cheques	39,701 71	83,791 24
Other earnings..	26,149 59	68,138 64
Total..	$268,313 59	$377,042 30

I have presented these figures to the House for the purpose of showing not only the enormous profits, but the growth of the business of these companies. It is expanding year by year, and yet there is no additional capitalization, and, on a capital of a little over $4,000,000, the people of the country are obliged to pay dividends, or contribute to the coffers of the company in order that dividends shall be paid on that capitalization, whereas in reality there is no such money actually invested. The amounts earned by these companies for transportation are, of course, by far the largest items, but in addition to that, they are, as I have said, practically doing a banking business, and the earnings in that regard are very great indeed when one inquires into the results. I shall not go into the details of what those earnings have been in the last two years. It is not relevant to the discussion of this resolution, and I have dealt with it simply for the purpose of showing the immense profit incidental to this business, and pointing out to the House the growth and expansion of the business. The investigation concluded in 1910 might be accepted as a thorough investigation up to that period, yet, because of the conditions which exist to-day as compared with even three years ago, it is in the interests of the country, in view of the attitude of the people towards these companies, that the Railway Board should make a thorough investigation, and that the matter should be thoroughly inquired into, with the view, if possible to have such tariffs submitted and approved as will lessen the excessive charges made on merchandise and products transported by these companies from one end of the country to the other.

Perhaps it would not be amiss if one were to call attention to isolated cases of charges made by the express companies; while it would not, perhaps, prove anything, it would yet be interesting to take into consideration the extent of the charges made. I know of one case where a cane was sent from this city to a small town in Western Canada. The article itself was worth 75 cents, and the charges for transportation amounted to 45 cents. I know also of a case where some debenture bonds were transmitted from St. John to Moncton, N.B., and the charges on these debentures, weighing only a few pounds, amounted to $8.75.

Mr. STANFIELD: Did they insure them at that rate?

Mr. EMMERSON: No doubt the face value of the bonds was taken into consideration under the liability clause, but even so, in view of the fact that the distance was only 90 miles, I consider that to be a very excessive charge. I have not taken any trouble to hunt up these cases, but another which came to my attention was that of a three-pound parcel shipped from Toronto to point in New Brunswick, the charge for which was 45 cents, a twelve-pound parcel shipped from St. John to a point 100 miles distant, the charge upon which was 45 cents; a three-pound parcel shipped 100 miles out of St. John at a cost of 30 cents. These isolated cases are, it seems to me, instances of the very excessive rates, especially when compared with the parcel post system recently inaugurated in the United States. I have secured a copy of the parcel post rates as effected under that system. The country is divided into zones. There is the first zone, 50 to 150 miles; the second zone, 150 to 300 miles; another zone 300 to 600 miles, one from 600 to 1,000 miles, then there is the seventh zone of 1,400 miles and the eighth zone of over 1,800 miles. For one pound on the locals the rate is five cents; in the fourth zone it is six cents, then seven cents, eight cents, nine cents, ten, eleven and twelve cents. But on the first zone, on one pound the rate is five cents; on two pound, eight cents; on three pounds, eleven cents; on four pounds, fourteen cents; on five pounds, seventeen cents; on six pounds, twenty cents; on seven pounds, twenty-three cents; on eight pounds, twenty-six cents; on nine pounds, twenty-nine cents; on ten pounds, thirty-two cents, on eleven pounds, thirty-five cents. That is for 150 miles. The charges under the parcels post system in the United States are certainly very reasonable, and when you make a comparison they show that the express companies in Canada and the United States must profit enormously for the transmission of articles of small weight. Very frequently the express charges are much in excess of the actual value of the articles themselves.

I would have been very glad if I could have presented this case more briefly and dealt with the subject more comprehensively, but the lateness of the hour, and the conditions and circumstances under which these facts are presented to the House, make it impossible for one to satisfactorily deal with the question. It is certainly one of supreme importance to the people of Canada. When it is realized, and I did not realize it until I figured it out, that our transportation tax in Canada by express is over $1.25 per head of the population, the extent of the operations of express companies begins to dawn upon one. I have simply dealt with the Canadian express companies, but you must remember that we have in addition, I think, five American express companies operating in Canada, the Wells-Fargo Company, the American Company, the United States Express Company, the National Express Company, and I think some others. I think that one practically does all the business with the Yukon through American territory. The facts are only measureably before this House. They are only measureably before the Department of the Minister of Railways and Canals. They are only measureably before the Railway Commission. There has not been a full expose of the conditions surrounding the express companies and their operations, and I venture to submit that we have not a complete and satisfactory showing with respect to any one of those express companies. As to the United States companies, we have none whatever. The responsibility is upon this Parliament of having the matter dealt with now. I remember very well the conditions which prevailed in 1906. I know that those companies had their arrangements with the different railway companies, where the companies are not owned by the railways themselves. When I assumed the responsibilities of the Department of Railways and Canals, the Intercolonial railway was operating its express business under a contract with the Canadian Express Company. That contract expired in 1905, during my regime as Minister of Railways and Canals. It had been in existence for a number of years, and the railway received from the Canadian Express Company forty per cent of the gross earnings on express business. The matter was under consideration in 1905 with a view to the Intercolonial railway operating its own express traffic. I was strongly in favour of it. There are two sides to the question, as there are sides to every question, but it was finally determined that the contract should be renewed upon the terms that we should receive fifty per cent of the gross earnings. I do not know whether the contract then renewed has expired.

Mr. COCHRANE : It was renewed in 1911.

Mr. EMMERSON : At any rate, from 1905 to the present time, I believe that the railway got fifty per cent of the gross earnings from the express business over its line. I felt then and am still of opinion that the Intercolonial railway would be in a very much better position financially if it operated its own express business apart from any of the Canadian express companies. The additional cost would be very little. Of course there are some features to be considered with respect to delivery stations at different points, but my well-founded belief is that the gross earnings of the railway would be increased very materially if it were to undertake its own express business. However, that is neither here not there. Recently an arrangement was entered into with the Dominion Express Company with respect to the carriage of express goods on the trains of the Intercolonial railway. I am not familiar with the conditions and I am not in a position to express any judgment with respect to it. It occurred to me, however, that in so far as the northern section of the Intercolonial railway is concerned, the railway might be put to greater expense in making provision for two companies than is the case where only one company is operating, while practically there would be no increase in the express business in that particular section. That is to say, the amount of business would be divided between the two companies, but the total volume of business would not be very materially increased. That is my judgment. I presume that the Minister of Railways has looked into the matter and knows the conditions and circumstances. Therefore I do not venture to offer any criticism, nor to express any judgment as to the results that may be anticipated. The time has come for this Parliament to act, to give directions to the Board of Railway Commissioners for an additional inquiry into the conditions as they exist to-day. I make no complaint as to the course that has been pursued by that commission. I believe that the matter was dealt with thoroughly and exhaustively; certainly as a beginning it was a good beginning; but we have, in the statement of Judge Mabee and in the statement of his predecessor Judge Killam, evidence that they did not consider that the investigation went as far as they would like it to go, nor did they think that the conclusions which they drew were complete or entirely satisfactory. I would suggest and urge that the commission be instructed by this resolution, backed up by the influence of the Minister of Railways and Canals, to hold a further investigation in order that some remedy should be given to the consuming and producing classes. This is a vital question; it is a matter that affects not only the producer but the consumer as well. The closer together you can bring the producing and consuming classes and the easier you can make the access between the point of production and the point of consumption, the better it is in the interest of all and I think we can very well do it without any great detriment to the business or financial interests of the express companies or railways in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize to the House for the time that I have necessarily spent in presenting this matter. It has been no pleasure for me to do so, but in the discharge of the duty that I owe to myself and to the country, I have put these facts before the House as briefly as I could.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, we have just had the pleasure of listening for some hours to the complaints of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) with reference to the express companies. Those of us who have been members of this House for the last eight or ten years cannot help wondering what these gentlemen were doing when they were in power, and especially what my hon. friend was doing when he was Minister of Railways in regard to these questions, because they are constantly bringing them up and advocating new ideas in regard to them. I remember distinctly, year after year, calling the attention of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, to the fact that the express companies were extorting from the people extravagant rates, and I received very little satisfaction from that hon. gentleman. If the hon. gentleman had done as we suggested in 1904, when we urged upon him the necessity of making the National Transcontinental railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific a national road, as we were compelled to pay nine-tenths of the cost of the building of the road, we would have owned, controlled and operated a national express company. We would then have been able to control the rates and have been in a position to look after the interests of the people. If there is one thing more than another that I feel impelled to do, it is to advocate, and strongly advocate, the taking over of the business of the express companies on the Intercolonial railway and the lines connected therewith. I would strongly urge upon my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals the need of investigating this matter, and I feel confident the people will support him in taking over and nationalizing the express business on that line of railway. Not only do I believe that but I would even go farther. In the face of all that has been said and done in this House, year after year, in face of the exorbitant rates which it has been shown the express companies have been exacting from the people, it is up to us to take the position that, as the Canadian owned express companies have been shown by the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals to have cost but $4,700,000, including even the watered stock which has been divided up among the shareholders, we should take over the express business of the country and nationalize it. You may perhaps say that that is going a step too far, but I do not believe it is. I believe that the people will stand at our back if we say that we will own, control and operate the express companies as a national institution. These companies, as has been shown by the ex-Minister of Railways, have taken out of the pockets of the people over twenty-three per cent, not on their capital invested, but on the capital which they claim has been put into the business. In addition to the amount of money that they have placed at their disposal for betterments, they have taken out of the pockets of the people over twenty-three per cent during the past year. If we only refer this matter to the Railway Commission we will not be likely to obtain any very great remedy therefrom, nor would the people be able to receive any great degree of benefit. It was my privilege to have gone before that commission with reference to the very matter which the ex-Minister of Railways has placed before Parliament to-night. That was the matter of the carriage of cream and farm products from the farms to the cities, and the distribution of these products to the people in the cities. It was my privilege to spend considerable time before that commission, and while I cannot take up the time of the House to-night to explain in detail how the hearing was carried on, I will merely state, as giving a fair idea of what you may expect when you do go before the Railway Commission, that the express companies were represented by a splendid array of legal talent ready to refute the arguments which were placed before the commission. I am confident that the only way out of this whole difficulty is for the Government to take over, own, control and operate the express companies as a national institution. What would be the position if such a change were brought about? Every post office in the towns, smaller cities and villages would be an express office, and in the large cities we would have the larger express offices such as we have to-day. I do not think that the parcel post system will interfere with the express business to any great extent notwithstanding the fact that we are increasing the size of the parcels considerably. Let me quote just a figure or two to show the position of the express companies in the United States to-day. The express charges are $31.20 per ton of packages, while the freight charges amount to only $1.90 per ton. The express charges are sixteen times the freight charges, while in other countries they are only five times those upon freight. It is too late an hour to go into the question in detail, but I maintain this is a matter that our Government should deal with. As far as our present Minister of Railways and Canals is concerned, we have every reason to compliment him upon the splendid work he has been doing since he took charge of that department. Only a year ago we were hearing from the Opposition benches man after man asking the minister, although he had been in office only a few months, to carry the grain from the West to the markets of the world in a prompt and efficient manner. What have you found him doing in the past year? Devoting his whole time and energies, largely, to assisting in the development of railway facilities in the West so that grain may be carried out as it has been, and I am glad to say that not once this session have I heard a single complaint with reference to the transportation of grain from the Great West; so that we have only reason to compliment ourselves and congratulate the Minister of Railways on the efficient manner in which he has conducted the affairs of the department, and I am sure that in the matter of express companies he will do his part towards bringing about some satisfactory solution.

Mr. COCHRANE: I regret, like the mover of this resolution, that the investigation which took place from 1906 to 1910 had not better results. I agree also that some facts were established there which certainly were in the interests of the country; but as to the reduction of rates there was no result. They spent a great deal of money, they met a great number of people. From a memorandum which I hold I find that they took evidence on this subject from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Montreal Board of Trade, the Toronto Board of Trade, the Niagara Peninsula Fruit Growers' Association, The St. John, N. B., Board of Trade, the Sackville Board of Trade, the Winnipeg Board of Trade, the Vancouver Board of Trade, the Victoria Board of Trade, the Winnipeg Shippers and Jobbers' Association, the Regina Board of Trade, the Calgary Board of Trade, the Dominion Board of Trade, the Associated Board of Trade of Western Canada. Thus it will be seen that they covered the whole country pretty thoroughly, but they evidently did not arrive at any conclusion which has led to a reduction of rates. The present chairman of the Dominion Railway Board, since his appointment, has been giving a great deal of attention to this subject, he has been discussing in different parts of the country and feels that he will soon be able to bring in a report.

I may say to my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) that if the Intercolonial railway was not tied up with a contract I personally, speaking for myself alone, would, as the result of my study of the question so far, install an express business there of our own. I feel that we bear the big end of the stick so far as expense is concerned. We furnish the cars while they pay our agents something at each place according to the amount of business done. Yet we are at the big end of the expense, and I feel strongly, as the hon. member said, that we could make considerable money by establishing an express company of our own.

I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Hazen:

That, all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed resolution be struck out and the following be substituted therefor: 'The Minister of Railways and Canals having instructed the House that the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada has had under consideration the necessity of a further reduction in express rates and charges and that the said chairman is now making an informal inquiry for that purpose, the House is of opinion that it is desirable to await the conclusion of such inquiry before passing any resolution on the subject.'

Mr. EMMERSON: Personally the amendment will meet with my approval. I have simply brought the matter to the notice of the House to impress on the Board of Railway Commissioners the necessity of action being taken, and having discharged my duty in that regard, and in view of what the minister has stated as to the intention of the board, nothing would be gained by pressing the motion to a conclusion even if that could be done. But this amendment will accomplish the object I had in view, and therefore, as one member of the House, it will meet with my approval.

Amendment agreed to, and motion as amended, agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 18, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE—Mr. R. C. MILLER AT BAR OF HOUSE.

On the Special Order being read:

Attendance at the Bar of the House of Mr. R. C. Miller, to be examined regarding the alleged payment by him of forty-one thousand and twenty-six dollars, while acting as president of the Diamond Light and Heating Company, Limited, of Montreal.

Mr. Miller came before the Bar.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would move, seconded by Mr. Meighen, that the following question be put by the Speaker to the witness at the Bar of this House, with a request for an answer thereto:

To whom did you pay the sum of $41,026 for the purpose of securing contracts from the Government of the Dominion of Canada amounting to $117,000 or thereabouts, between the month of June, 1907, until you ceased to be president of the Diamond Light and Heating Company, Limited, in June, 1911, as alleged by you on your examination before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts on Friday, the 14th of February, 1913.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request the privilege of being represented by counsel at the present moment.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would move, seconded by Mr. Meighen, that the witness at the Bar of the House be permitted to be represented by counsel.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. George E. Kidd, K.C., came and stood beside the witness.

On the question being put by Mr. Speaker to the witness:

Mr. Kidd (Counsel) said: Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Commons, under the advice of counsel, my client refuses to answer the question, for the reason that it would incriminate him, and I consider it an unwarranted interference with his private business.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would point out that under the rules of the House this is no defense to a motion of this kind. By express enactment it is declared that anything that a witness may say to this House or to any committee of this House is privileged, and cannot be used in any manner against him in any proceeding of any nature outside of the House; and therefore his reason for refusal to answer does not, in my opinion, constitute a defense of this motion. He will not be harmed; he will be in the same position when he leaves this House as before he came here. I therefore move:

That the witness, R. C. Miller, now before the Bar of this House, having refused to answer the question put to him by this House, be forthwith taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, and that Mr. Speaker issue his warrant accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

The witness then withdrew, in custody of the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms.

THE SCOTT ANTARCTIC EXPEDITION.

THE DEAD HEROES.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the attention of the House for a few minutes, that I may move its adjournment under rule 39.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Lemieux moves the adjournment of the House, under clause 39, which provides that the adjournment of the House may be moved to call attention to some definite matter of special urgent necessity, and, in connection with this motion, he hands me the following statement:

I would call the attention of the Government to the advisability of providing for an expression of practical sympathy with the bereaved family of the late lamented Captain Scott and his unfortunate companions who lost their lives in the Antarctic regions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope it will not be found unbecoming on my part if I take up a few minutes of the valuable time of the House to call the attention of the Government to the sad fate of Captain Scott and his unfortunate companions. The world, the British world especially, has been stirred to its very depths by the sad news which reached civilization a few days ago that Captain Robert F. Scott and his companions had died, there afar, in the unexplored solitudes of the South. These dauntless explorers are no more, but the world to-day knows that brave men, and heroic Britishers, found a glorious grave in those unknown regions. This event has moved the heart of everyone with grief and pride—with grief because of the generous sacrifice of their lives; with pride, because their dearly-bought conquest bears tribute to the indomitable characteristics of the race, to the intrepidity, the resolution, and the capacity for endurance of the sons of Britain. The expedition of Scott, like the expedition of Franklin, was intended to be of service to humanity. I have no doubt that the records which were made and which served Scott as a pillow in his last sleep will hereafter be of scientific interest to the world. Mr. Speaker, we in Canada belong to the British Empire, and there is, I need not say, a feeling of solidarity, of fraternity, between the different component parts of that Empire. As British subjects we feel that these heroes are ours. As a Canadian of French descent, I cannot forget that the British Empire generously participated in the tercentenary of another hero and great explorer, Samuel de Champlain. Scott's last appeal is worthy of the stoic bravery of the bravest in England's long line of heroes. It reads as follows:

We are weak. Writing is difficult, but for my own sake I do not regret this journey, which has shown that Englishmen can endure hardships, help one another, and meet death with as great fortitude as ever in the past. We took risks. We knew we took them. Things have come out against us, and therefore we have no cause for complaint, but bow to the will of Providence, determined still to do our best to the last.

Mr. Speaker, the message of Scott is that of a great hero; it is an example and a lesson to humanity in this materialistic age. He is the worthy successor of Cardigan, who immortalized the valour of the English soldier at Balaclava; he is the worthy successor of Franklin, the great explorer who died under the frosty skies of the North American continent. In Captain Scott's last appeal, I find the following pathetic words:

These rough notes and our dead bodies must tell the tale, but surely a great rich country like ours will see that those who are dependent on us are properly provided for.

The British Parliament, Sir, under the inspiration of its Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, has declared that this appeal has not fallen on deaf ears, and public subscriptions have been opened throughout the United Kingdom to help the families of Scott and his unfortunate companions. Reading the newspapers this morning, I find that the Lord Mayor of London has issued a second appeal to British sympathy. As I have stated, we belong to the British Empire, and I rise only to suggest respectfully to the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Government, that Canada, a rich and prosperous country, the oldest of the British dominions, could well afford to place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum of money which will bear tribute to the admiration of this nation for the brave explorers who have found a glorious grave in the Antartic regions, and will, at the same time, proffer some relief to those dependent on them.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I am very glad indeed that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has, upon the floor of this House, expressed, in very eloquent words, that which I am sure, has been in the minds and hearts of all of us, and which certainly has been in the minds and hearts of the members of the Government. Every one of us in Canada was profoundly moved by the tidings which reached us from the other side of the world, telling a story of courage, and endurance and heroism which, perhaps, has never been surpassd in the annals of human history. Speaking for myself, I was especially stirred by the story of that man who, feeling that his presence with his companions might render it impossible for them to gain the safety which he knew he could not share, went out alone into the cold and darkness of an Antarctic winter morning to meet death by himself in order that his friends might be saved. But, Sir, a story such as that appeals especially to hon. gentlemen of this House and indeed to the people of this country, remembering the traditions of their ancestors, whether from France which first gave her pioneers to this country, or from the British Islands, who persevered through incredible trial and hardships and whose endurance, whose courage, and whose faith in those days of bygone centuries, have yet left their impress upon the character and the ideals of the Canadian people. And I am sure that the deep and heartfelt sympathy of every man and every woman in Canada has already gone out to the widows and children of those who lost their lives under those circumstances which my hon. friend has so eloquently portrayed. It has been said by the Prime Minister in the British House of Commons that the very touching appeal in the last words of Captain Scott, found by those who went to seek the dead, would not fall upon deaf ears. It is beyond all question that the ears of the people of Canada will be found as sensitive to such an appeal as those of our kinsmen beyond the seas. The widows and children of these men have been spoken of as the wards of the British nation, but it has been already stated in this country—and I venture to repeat it here—that they ought not to be the wards of the British nation alone, but the wards of the whole Empire.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker. the hon. member for Rouville has certainly touched a chord which will find a response in every Canadian heart, and the nation at large, for which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has the right to speak, will endorse and appreciate the immediate response given to the request of my hon. friend. Next to a sense of horror which is naturally felt respecting the fate which has befallen these heroes in the Antarctic regions, the one feeling which rises uppermost in the breast of a British subject at the present time is a consciousness of the fact that the bosom of the Old Motherland is not barren—that, indeed, it still produces men equal to the most illustrious of the past. The gentleman who has lost his life, Captain Scott, belonged to the British navy, and it is not too much to say that in the long array of battles which have made the British navy famous all over the world, no greater example of heroism was ever produced than that which has been demonstrated in that distant and unknown land. Some few years ago, at the time of the South African war, many were the taunts and gibes of the times, for it was doubted that the British soldier would prove equal to the emergency that confronted him. But we are all glad to remember that on that occasion the British soldier came up to the mark and proved himself the equal of what his forebears had been. And then, when peace had come, when the statesman had to come in to bind the wounds, to efface the effects of that war, British statesmanship was found equal to the occasion, and the problem which it faced was solved in a manner which has struck the world with wonder by its magnanimity. So we are proud, we British subjects, to remember that in this day England is still the England of the past. But we cannot forget the young wife, now no longer a wife, who is ploughing the ocean to meet her husband, and who will know all too soon that she is now a widow. Nothing that we can do or say here can assuage the grief which must be hers for the rest of her life. But it behooves us to see that she has whatever consolation there may be in the consciousness that the heroism of her husband is duly appreciated by all people in all parts of the world who are proud to name him as fellow-subject, and the further consciousness that the request which he made for the benefit of his wife and his dependents shall be honoured in every nation of the British Empire.

Motion negatived.

TOOLETON AND HATFIELD POINT MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yesterday I asked for the names of the tenderers and the name of the lowest tenderer for the Tooleton and Hatfield Point mail contract. The minister answered that tenders were invited for a proposed rural mail route in the district and that the matter was still under consideration. Of course, if the minister declined to give the answer intentionally, because the matter is still under consideration, I will have to be contented with that.

Mr. PELLETIER: Perhaps my hon. friend is right, that the answer is not clear enough. What we meant was that no contract had been entered into as yet. We propose giving the information as soon as the matter is closed, but we think it is in the public interest not to give the names of tenderers before the closing of the contract. I will give the information as soon as the contract is closed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Might I, in the public interest, ask my hon. friend to look into this matter carefully himself? I have been informed that tenders were received a good many weeks ago and that so far the lowest tenderer has not been recognized and there is a rumour in the county that it is intended in some way to give the contract to a higher tenderer. Will my hon. friend be good enough to look into it?

Mr. PELLETIER: I will.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CROTHERS: I rise to a question of privilege. In the Ottawa Free Press of yesterday, and I think perhaps in some other papers, appears what purports to be a digest of an address delivered by me in Montreal, Saturday evening, in which I am reported to have said:

Continuing Mr. Crothers said: I have not very much sympathy for the labour unions, but I have a very strong sympathy for the workingman.

The latter half of the sentence I did say but the former half I did not. It expresses directly the opposite of what I said, and I do not understand how it could have found its way into the papers because I spent some time in pointing out the benefits that the unions have been to the working men.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The reason is that it was not published in the Montreal Gazette first.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was the reporter sober?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am the more certain, because I had what I said on that occasion in writing. After pointing out the hardships that labour endured one hundred years ago, I used these words:

These conditions have largely disappeared under the beneficial influences of trades unions, legislation, and a more enlightened public opinion.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr, BORDEN moved second reading of Bill No 21, to authorize measures for increasing the effective Naval Forces of the Empire.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): When the question of Canada taking part in the defence of the British Empire was put on the resolution of the right hon. leader of the Government, the respective chief whips of both sides of the House shut off full discussion by mutual arrangement between themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TURRIFF: And threfore I was unable——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. TURRIFF: I will put it this way, that by mutual arrangement they decided to take a vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member modified the statement in a manner which I think would be permissible.

Mr. TURRIFF: I had no intention to say one word that would even crowd the rules of the House. But, by a mutual arrangement between the two chief whips, the vote was taken before a large number of gentlemen at least on this side of the House, had been able to express their opinions on the subject. However, now on the second reading, I wish to avail myself of the privilege of saying a few words with regard to it. I feel that it is important not only to this part of the country but to every portion of Canada and, coming as I do from the prairie provinces which are very much interested in this subject, I would not like to give a silent vote on the question. For quite a long while there seemed to be somewhat of a paralysis of tongue amongst hon. gentlemen opposite who, I understand, have now recovered their power of speech. Judging by the noise that was made when the vote was taken last week they must have almost entirely recovered it and so I hope to see the debate go on as a debate like this usually goes on, because the subject is so important that it is desirable that there should be a full discussion not only from this side but from both sides of the House. I can hardly believe that our hon. friends opposite think their case is so bad that the less they say about it the better. At all events I understand that we are going to have an improvement in this respect this afternoon.

Canada is proposing to enter upon a new line of policy, she is proposing to expend a good deal of money in connection with the defence of the Empire and, in my judgment, it is very important we should start out on right lines. It was pointed out by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) when he discussed this question some weeks ago, that it did not matter which policy was adopted, that this was only the beginning that whether we gave a subscription as proposed by the leader of the Government, or whether we built a fleet of our own, the expenditure would only be the initial one. I am satisfied that if you were to consult individually the people whom I represent in this House, you would find a large number of them opposed to a navy of any kind whatever. That is a natural conclusion for people to arrive at who are from 1,500 to 2,000 miles away from an ocean, but at the same time, Canada is arriving at that place in her history, she being a rich country possessing great natural resources, when it is incumbent upon her to make some preparation to defend and protect what belongs to her. We defend our property in the city and in the country and there is no reason on earth why we should not be in a position to defend our property on the high seas. A great part of our prosperity consists in the fact that we have large overseas markets to which we ship millions and hundreds of millions of dollars worth of produce every year. What would these markets be worth if, in case of trouble, we were not able to defend our through routes, or to defend our produce on the high seas? The result of failure on our part to protect these trade routes would be to inflict upon us the loss of these markets. It all depends on what should be done in this respect.

We have before us the proposition of the right hon. Prime Minister that Canada should give a contribution of $35,000,000. The other night, when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister spoke on this subject in closing the debate on the resolution, he took credit to himself for his consistency in this matter and he pointed out that two years ago he had suggested something in the nature of what he is now proposing. If my memory serves me aright, the right hon. gentleman is in this happy position, or rather unhappy position, if you like, that it does not matter a bit what attitude he adopts, he can fortify his argument by the declaration that he had proposed the same thing two or three years previously. If my right hon. friend had voted for the amendment of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) he could have fortified his argument by the fact that he had himself voted for that same thing a couple of years ago. If my right hon. friend had proposed to adopt the policy suggested by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) he could have gone back two or three years, read his own speeches and shown that he had advocated the very same thing himself. As far as I can see the only thing that the right hon. the leader of the Government has learned really well in connection with naval matters is to box the compass because he has certainly been all around it.

The proposition which the right hon. the leader of the Government puts before the House now is an altogether different proposition from that which he advocated a few years ago. The only argument by which it can be backed up in any degree whatever is that based upon the assumption that there is an emergency at the present time. I doubt very much if my right hon. friend himself thinks there is an emergency, I doubt very much if any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House thinks there is an emergency, I doubt if you could find any considerable body of men in Canada who believe that there is an emergency and I doubt if you could find anybody in the Mother Country who considers that there is an emergency. If there had been an emergency when the right hon. the leader of the Government came back from the Old Country last fall what would his duty have been? If the emergency was so insistent, so great, that it was necessary for this Parliament to vote $35,000,000, what would have been the clear duty of the leader of the Government? Surely it would have been to have called Parliament together at once and to have asked Parliament to vote $35,000,000 or any other sum which might have been considered sufficient. Had there been an emergency, or if the people of Canada thought that there was an emergency, there would never have been one word or protest on the part of anybody, either on this side of the House or in any part of Canada, against giving a good large sum except perhaps it had come from a branch or party connection of the right hon. gentleman; I refer to the Nationalist wing of the present Government. Prior to the last election they were opposed absolutely to sending ships or men or to giving any assistance whatever. Unless opposition came from that quarter there would have been no opposition from any part of Canada. But the fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that there is no emergency and that there never has been. If ever there was anything that looked like an emergency, it was three or four years ago. There were more signs of an emergency then than there are at the present time. But at that time the policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government was not to give a contribution, but to build a Canadian navy and he laid great stress on the necessity of a policy that would meet with the unanimous approval not only of the House but of the people of the country. I think that that is very desirable, and I am sure that now that this question of sending a conribution of $35,000,000 to the Old Country to build ships, has been discussed, and he has seen, as he must have seen, that the opinion of the people of Canada is very greatly divided on the subject, we will not consider it advisable to go on with that policy, which, apparently, has the endorsation of only one-half, or probably a good deal less than one-half of the people of the Dominion. I am sure that in view of what has taken place, and of what is taking place every day, in view of the press comments throughout the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, my right hon. friend will find it to his advantage to come back not to our policy, but to his own policy, the policy that was originally proposed by his desk mate the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, and endorsed by my right hon. friend. He will see that it is greatly in his own interests and in the interests of the country generally that he should come back to his own policy, to his first policy, to the policy that he initiated when he was not hampered and driven by party exigencies to do anything that was not in the best interests of Canada. If my right hon. friend would do that, he would have a policy that would meet with the unanimous approval of the House, and, to a very large extent, with the approval of the country. Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, how much more it would mean to the British Empire and to the Parliament and people of Great Britain if, when we come to decide this question, if the Government were able to lay down a policy that appealed to the whole of the people of Canada and had their unanimous support. What has brought about the change in the policy of my right hon. friend? He and his followers generally were in favour of the policy of building a navy in Canada, of manning it by Canadians, and of keeping it up by Canadians. What brought about the change? The first change, Mr. Speaker, as you will remember, came during the Drummond and Arthabaska election when certain people in the province of Quebec, who were not favourable to that policy, started a campaign to undo my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition who was then Prime Minister of Canada. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government and his colleagues the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, joined Mr. Bourassa and his supporters in the province of Quebec for the purpose of beating the Government if possible. We had proof of that when some one in the Province of Quebec —I forget who it was—wired to the Minister of Trade and Commerce at Toronto.

An hon. MEMBER: The Montreal Herald.

Mr. TURRIFF: I understand it was the Montreal Herald. It asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce what the people ought to do in the circumstances. What was the reply? 'Anything at all to beat Laurier.' That, Mr. Speaker, accounts for the right-about-face of my right hon. friend the present leader of the Government. He made an alliance with those Nationalists who won their elections, practically every one of them, on the ground that not one man, not one dollar, not one ship should be given to help Great Britain in time of need. That is what they won their elections on, and my right hon. friend made an alliance with them in order to get into power. From that day to this, they have been hanging like a millstone about his neck, and they are going to sink him in the end. It is to those men, who, as I say, won their elections on the policy I have described, and who could not breathe the air of freedom under the British flag, until it was riddled with bullet holes, that he has allied himself, the men who put him in power and who are keeping him in power; and that accounts for the right-about-face of my right hon. friend and for the fact that he now says we cannot have a navy of our own, we cannot build a navy, and we cannot man a navy, and that we must give a contribution in cash and allow better men than we are, to fight for us. That has been all brought about by this unholy alliance with the men who were disloyal to Canadian interests, to Canadian ideas and to the Empire in practically every speech they made during the campaign that ended in September, 1911.

I think my right hon. friend has now practically given up the claim that there is an emergency in Great Britain. If there is an emergency in Great Britain, he is not taking a very good way to meet it. If he believed for one moment that there was an emergency in Great Britain do you think, Mr. Speaker, that in Britain they would wait for three years to build ships? Do you think they would use those $35,000,000, that it is proposed to send over to Great Britain, to build ships when there is a much quicker way of getting ships ready for war at the present time, if my right hon. friend believes there is an emergency? But as I have already stated, I do not think that he holds that opinion. The only emergency is the emergency in which he finds himself of holding his followers together. That is where the emergency comes in. Why, Mr. Speaker, at the present moment there are in private British shipyards, in all stages of construction, six large warships for foreign nations, and it is well known that the Government of Great Britain has the right where a foreign nation is having a warship built in England, to take that ship at any time for the British navy. That being the case, what can you think of any one getting up here and saying there is an emergency when there are six ships that could be completed in very short order, some of them nearing completion now? If there was an emergency, the British Government would not hesitate a moment, but would rush forward the work on those vessels, would have the ships launched, equipped and added to the British navy at once.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would not that depend on the British Government?

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, the British Government has the right to do that.

Mr. BURNHAM: If it depends on the British Government, why blame us?

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend says: why blame this Government? The Government is to blame if it believes that an emergency exists, which I do not think it believes. If there was an emergency, this $35,000,000 could be used to far greater advantage than in letting contracts in which case the keels would not be laid down for probably six months and the ships would not be ready for two or three years; ships could be bought much quicker and the British Government could do that themselves without waiting for Canada to send over the money. There is, however, no emergency. Great Brtain does not want these ships because she has lots of ships of her own. She is not trying to take these six vessels; they will be completed and equipped, and then will go away from the shores of England to the nations which have ordered them. As I have pointed out, if there was an emergency, that would be the way in which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister would use the money, the way in which the British Admiralty would use the money. Therefore, I think that we can set this question of emergency aside.

Since this debate began, something of very great importance has taken place. The German government has come to the conclusion that Germany does not require such a large navy as Great Britain has; it has accepted the proposition that for every sixteen ships of any class that Great Britain has, Germany will not increase hers to more than ten, so that the proportion exists now of sixteen to ten in favour of Great Britain. Does any member of this House or any Canadian believe that, with a preponderance of sixteen ships to ten, without taking into consideration the friendship of France and of our ally Japan, our relationship with Russia, that Great Britain cannot hold her own against Germany? Surely no Canadian would believe that. No Briton believes it; and no Canadian worthy of the name believes it, because very few men in Canada, I am proud to say, agree with my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, when he says that we cannot build ships in Canada, or that we cannot man them in Canada, or that Canadians cannot fight on water as well as they can on land.

Supposing that we did pass this resolution, and that we sent over this $35,000,000 to Great Britain for the purpose of building three dreadnoughts; and that those dreadnoughts were kept in the North sea pointing towards Germany. After this understanding, which has been arrived at between Germany and Great Britain that Great Britain may have sixteen ships to ten that Germany has, we would simply be weakening instead of strengthening the position of Great Britain. Under that arrangement, those three ships would have to be counted in the sixteen of Britain's ships against the ten German vessels; whereas, on the other hand, if Canada had her own two fleet units with one of these dreadnoughts at the head of each, instead of the ratio being sixteen to ten, in case of an emergency Great Britain would have eighteen dreadnoughts to ten of Germany's. If my hon. friends believe that it is necessary to have a preponderant number of ships, then we would be two ships to the good. Therefore everything seems to point to the fact that my right hon. friend the leader of the Government should drop this proposition, which is his second or third, and go back to his first proposition of a Canadian navy, built as far as possible in Canada, manned by Canadians, kept up by Canadians, and when the time comes in the fighting line with Canadians on the decks of those vessels, winning glory for Canada and the Empire against any foe.

Another argument advanced by some of my hon. friends opposite is that Great Britain needs this money. I think the time has come when we ought to do something in the way of defence of the Empire; but in my judgment, if we want to be a strength to the Empire, we must be able to defend our own shores. How can we be a help to the Empire, if the Empire has to defend the shores of Canada? Why does not Canada do the work at her own door first? We have the very best of authority from the British Admiralty that the most important thing for the outlying dominions to do is to defend their own coasts and to defend their end of the trade routes. That is the duty which is foremost at the present time; that is the duty which Canada in my opinion is called upon to do, to have her own navy so as to be able to defend her own coast, and in time of need to be of assistance to the Empire. After hearing some of the arguments put up by hon. gentlemen opposite, one would think that Great Britain was in dire straits. It has been pointed out in this House that Great Britain has something like $2,000,000,000 invested in Canada, and that we are paying Great Britain in interest about $80,000,000 each year. That is all right, because we get value for that interest. Great Britain is levying interest tolls on every nation of the world. In addition to keeping up her large army and her immense navy, within the last few years she has taken on millions and tens of millions of dollars of new expenditure in the way of old age pensions and other matters. While Canada goes year after year deeper in debt, Great Britain with all her Imperial burdens is gradually paying off her debt, and during the past six years has reduced her national debt by about fifty to fifty-five millions dollars a year, or a total of about $350,000,000 in six years, which is more than the national debt of Canada. In spite of it all, she has kept up her navy and kept it right in the forefront; she has not gone bankrupt in building ships; she is stronger to-day than ever she was; she has more dreadnoughts than all the other nations of Europe put together. She has a stronger navy than any two nations. Does that look as if Great Britain was impoverished, as if she needed a gift of $35,000,000? To my mind it is a poor way to pay our debt, whatever debt we owe to Great Britain, to send money in order to build ships over there, giving Great Britain empty ships. Of what advantage are they going to be? They do not save the British ratepayers, for the ratepayers have to furnish 2,500 men to man these ships. And the manning of ships is one of the most important matters they have to deal with. They have not their fleet fully manned to-day, and that fleet has not been fully manned at any time for some years. Yet we are sending over three empty ships, and they will have to hunt up the men to man them. So, if this is a gift, it is a gift with a very strong string on it, it is a gift that will not appeal very much to the people of Great Britain. It is not money they need so much as men. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government has said that we could not man a Canadian navy, and in this connection we have heard many sneering and ill-natured remarks about the two ships that Canada already has, the Niobe and the Rainbow. I wonder if it ever occurs to hon. members who make these remarks that it is not upon the late Government that they reflect, not upon members on this side, but upon the British Admiralty and the British navy.

Who built these ships? They were built by the British Admiralty and built in England. Who sold them to Canada? The British Admiralty. Who advised that that they were the ships that Canada wanted? The British Admiralty. So, any words my hon. friends on the other side have said in connection with a 'tinpot navy' has been levelled directly against the British nation and the British Admiralty who built the ships and recommended Canada to buy them. These ships were not bought for the fighting line; they were bought as training ships. And my hon. friends on the other side of the House knew that perfectly well; but for the sake of a little political capital, a little party advantage, they have gone up and down this country for two years reproaching my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), reproaching the late Government and the Liberal party, when every word that they uttered was a direct reflection upon the ability and honesty of the British Admiralty. Will anyone advance a good reason why we cannot man ships in Canada? I have only heard one reason advanced since this debate began, and that was advanced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). That hon. gentleman said that we were too rich in Canada, too prosperous, that our young men could get higher wages at home than we could hire British seamen for to work for us. Mr. Speaker, can you name one nation of the world that ever became great, that ever made itself respected by the other nations of the world, that hired men to do its fighting? There is not one nation, ancient or modern, that ever became great, that ever took a high place in the world, that ever was respected or feared by other nations, that gained this place by adopting the policy of hiring men to do its fighting while its own citizens remained at home. Yet this is the policy which my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, and every one who backs him up is advocating for Canada. It is something to be proud of, is it not—to advertise to the whole world that we are a nation of poltroons, that we dare not go upon the deck of a ship and fight the battles of the Empire; that we give empty ships, but hire others to do our fighting for us? And this policy is the exact opposite of what the right hon. gentleman advocated two years ago. And that only shows the extremes to which he and his friends are driven. It is said that we cannot find the men to man our ships. We have the sixth largest mercantile marine in the world; have we any trouble in manning our merchant ships? I have never heard it suggested that we cannot get men for our merchant ships. How is it that the neighbouring republic can man their vessels? Their condition is almost the same as ours, but ours is the more favourable, and for this reason, that we have on the Atlantic coast, and also on the Pacific coast, a very much larger proportion of our population living on the sea than they have in the United States. Down by the Atlantic, in the three provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, I understand there are seventy thousand men who make their living from the sea—fishermen chiefly. It is a well-known fact that the life of a fisherman, deep sea fisherman, or coast fisherman, is one of the hardest lives in the world, so far as hard work goes, and also that it is one of the poorest paid when you take the average earnings of each fisherman one season with another. So, I say, if we had Canadian vessels, and had a system of service that gave fair wages—reasonable wages, I do not mean the wages that many mechanics receive—you would have no difficulty whatever in securing all the men you could possibly want for any fleet such as Canada would require for the next fifty years. And where would you find finer men than the descendants of the English, Irish, Scotch and French settlers of a hundred or two hundred years ago who settled in the maritime provinces? In addition to that we have over 100,000 people coming into Canada every year from Great Britain, and many of these are young men who, when they come to Canada, might be glad to get into that service for a time. We found the same thing in the case of the mounted police. Probably half of that service, perhaps even a larger proportion, of the men in the Northwest Mounted Police, as fine a body of men as exist in the world, are young Englishmen, Irishmen, or Scotchmen who came out to settle on the prairie, and, in order to learn something about life in Canada, enlisted for from three to five years. Some of them at the end of their first term have enlisted for another term. Many, at the end of three, four, or five years, have left the service, thoroughly posted as to Canadian conditions and ideas, and to-day you can find many of these men occupying high positions in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. We have had a considerable number of those men on both sides of this House—men who have put in years and years in the service of the Northwest Mounted Police and, it would be the same if we had our ships built and were ready to man them. In the United States last year they wanted 17,000 men for the navy, and how many applicants do you think they had? They received 37,000 applications, and they turned 20,000 men away! Of the men selected, over ninety per cent were not only American citizens, but American-born.

If that state of affairs exists in the United States, why should we have any difficulty in this country? I contend that we would not have any greater difficulty here, we would have no trouble with regard to the men. We would get the right class of men —men who would be a credit to Canada and to the Empire; men who, when the call of duty came—when the bugle sounded and war took place—would face the situation and take their part and their share in the conflict in the same way as did our men some ten years ago in the case of the South African war.

Mr. FOSTER (Kings, N.S.): Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to explain why we have had difficulty in obtaining men in Canada?

Mr. TURRIFF: For what purpose?

Mr. FOSTER: For the navy.

Mr. TURRIFF: For the Niobe and the Rainbow?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not know exactly what the figures are as to the number of men who enlisted for service on the Niobe and the Rainbow, or as to the number of men required, but one reason why difficulty was experienced was the fact that these were not fighting ships, but training ships. But the principal reason was that these men were hounded to death by my hon. friends on the other side of the House; they were laughed at, and told that these vessels were not war vessels, but only tinpots. Had my hon. friends on the other side of the House been reasonable and fair and patriotic, there would have been no difficulty whatever in securing men. Will any hon. member opposite tell me, if in the United States they can get twice as many men as they want, why we, who have a much larger proportion of seafaring men, cannot get what few men we want for a Canadian navy?

Mr. GRAHAM: Admiral Kingsmill says they did not try the fishermen, where they were supposed to get the men.

Mr. TURRIFF: That may be another reason, but if you build a navy in Canada and have a permanent service, which the men can look forward to as a career, you will have no dearth of young men desirous of joining the navy.

Ten or twelve years ago, when the South African war took place, Canada sent over a contingent; later on, she sent a second contingent, and then she sent the Strathcona Horse, a third contingent. Many of these men came from my part of the country—from the prairies—and I knew a great many of them. A large number had had no previous training in warfare, but they went to South Africa, and it is a matter of history that, man for man, they were just as good soldiers and fighters, and showed just as much heroism and bravery, as the best men sent to South Africa from any part of the world. Many of our young men who took part in these battles in South Africa died on the field of battle, in defence of the Empire. Their blood dyed the veldts of South Africa, and, in some cases, I presume their bones are bleaching on the prairies. I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, if we had then followed the policy suggested by the Postmaster General, and partly suggested by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister —and he stated it again last week—to the effect that we cannot man our ships; if we had said to Great Britain at that time: Our men can earn more at home than the soldiers you send to South Africa; here is $2,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $35,000,000 to help you out—would we have been so remembered for our services as we are to-day? No; we would never have heard of it again; it would have been a drop in the bucket, and it would have been to our eternal shame that when asked for help we gave money and withheld our men. Not only that, but it would have been an insult to every young man in the Dominion of Canada. But we did not take that course; we sent our men, and Canada has ever since reaped the advantage; it has been held to her credit; it has been remembered in Great Britain, and I venture to say it did more to cement the bonds of empire than anything that had taken place up to that time. If, then, that is the case, what are we to do in this later day, when our country is twice as rich as it was ten years ago, has almost doubled in population, and is yearly increasing in wealth, power, and position? What are we to say now, when the time has come that the Empire needs assistance? Shall we send empty ships, and let better men do our fighting? Shall we send mere dollars, with nothing behind them? Or shall we build our own navy, man it with our own Canadians, maintain it with our own money, and defend our own coasts in time of war, holding the ships in readiness for the use of the Empire, in any part of the world, where its services may be deemed necessary by the British Admiralty?

The difference between the policy of my right hon. friend opposite and the policy enunciated by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition is this. Under the policy of the leader of the Opposition we build our ships in Canada, as far as possible, we man them by Canadians, we maintain our own ships, and, when fighting is to be done, the Canadians are in the firing line. Under the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when the bugle sounds for action, we send empty ships—and the Canadians are at home under the bed! You cannot get away from this position under the policy of the leader of the Government we are shirking our responsibilities; we are taking a course of which every Canadian ought to be ashamed —a course that does not appeal to the manhood of Canadians; a course that will never build up a national spirit in Canada. You will never be able to man ships if you train people in that way. The right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada says to this country and to the world: We can put up money; but we cannot build ships, and cannot supply men; the Postmaster General says we will not supply men, because you can hire them in the Old Country for twenty-eight cents a day, and our men earn say $1.50 or $2 a day. Is that anything to appeal to the imagination of young Canadians? I say it is a policy that Canada should not think of adopting; it is a sorry spectacle that the Prime Minister of Canada is driven to such a policy by his colleagues, the Nationalist party of Quebec. Does any one imagine for a moment that if it were not for that influence my right hon. friend would advocate such a thing? Do you imagine for one moment that he would go back on what he said two or three years ago? He would never think of doing such a thing. It only goes to show to what extremes partyism will drive a man, and the whole people of Canada practically are going to be put in a false position, an unfair position, a position they do not like, a position which if it was put to the country would not command one vote in five on a plebiscite, and what for? All to satisfy a small bunch of our friends from Quebec, followers of the hon. the Postmaster General, the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Secretary of State. And for that the whole people of Canada are to be put in a false and untenable position to please a few Nationalists of Quebec whose motto is, not one man, not one dollar, not one ship to help the Empire in time of trouble. That is their motto, that is what they were elected on. Some of them talk differently now. Why? The salary is good, and they do not want to resign. One of their number, the best of the lot by a long way, a man who sat for many years in this House, respected on both sides of the House, stood it for a short time but he could not stand it very long and rather than find himself in the position of my hon. friends he sent in his resignation, the only thing that an honourable man could do under the circumstances, if he was animated by the best motives. I do not know by what kind of motives my hon. friends opposite are animated that enabled them to keep their places.

One word more about the danger of German invasion. In the past six years the Government of Great Britain has paid off its debt to the extent of $350,000,000, and at the same time Germany, in order to build her navy has increased her debt by $200,000,000 so that on one hand you have Great Britain paying off her debt, keeping up her ships and her army and everything out of annual revenue and paying off $50,000,000 a year while Germany is borrowing about $35,000,000 or $40,000,000 a year in order to build up her navy. How long can that sort of thing continue? It is a matter that any one can see, it is a matter of common sense, it is a matter of dollars and cents, that if it is a case of seeing who can build the strongest navy or keep it up the longest the victory is bound to come in the end to the nation which can do all that out of revenue and at the same time pay off largely her national debt as against the nation that has to borrow money each year to keep the race up.

One word as to whether there is any likelihood of trouble with Germany. Take what the German Ambassador said last October:

We do not cherish the slightest desire or intention of disputing Great Britain's mastery of the seas said Prince Lichwonsky. 'A supreme fleet is, as the Britons claim, a life and death question with them. They are supreme now and no responsible person in Germany dreams of distributing that pre-eminence, but it must not be forgotten that a powerful fleet is also a vital necessity for us. England must not read hostility into the fact when we know and then lay down a dreadnought. Anglo-German relations are beset with difficulties, but they also offer ample opportunities for an agreement.

That is putting the matter fairly and squarely. About the same time that the German Ambassador made that statement we have a statement from Mr. Poincare, then the Premier, now the President of France. He said:

We have no intention to change our friendships. The ties which bind us to Russia and to Great Britain are imperishable; they are cemented by political sentiments, political interests and political probity. Nothing can compromise en entente upon which the European equilibrimum depends.

Such clear intimations that the emergency is a mere piece of hysterical phantasmagoria should be sufficient to move even Mr. Borden's political equilibrium.

Surely in discussing this question of naval supremacy it is plain to see that Great Britain does not stand alone. There may have been a time when she stood in splendid isolation, but that time has long gone by. You have not heard a word from any hon. member opposite about the friendship of France. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) spoke of it the other day. France has the third navy in the world to-day; Russia has a very considerable navy, and then in addition to all that Japan is an ally of Great Britain's and will be for the next eight or nine years at least, so it is utterly absurd for any one to speak about bad relations between Great Britain and Germany, or about there being any German scare or any emergency whatever.

If we adopt this principle of giving a contribution of $35,000,000 it is practically going back seventy years in our history, going back to the days of the family compact,—it is paying tribute. You may disguise it with fine phrases as much as you like but it is paying tribute just the same. My hon. friend the Prime Minister says that this is an emergency contribution. But if you will remember he further stated that we could not in the next twenty-five or fifty years hope to build ships in Canada, hope to build a navy in Canada, and that even then it would be such a poor, miserable affair that it would hardly be worth the attempt. Hon. members will remember what was stated by the hon. member for St. John, N.B. (Mr. Pugsley) on this subject. He pointed out that at Fore River, Mass., some ten or twelve years ago, a shipyard was established. Twelve years ago it was a vacant field, and between that time and this 114 vessels have been built there, six of them dreadnoughts, and that concern now has contracts for two foreign warships. The Prime Minister talks of what an enormous amount of money it would take to equip a navy yard in Canada. Why should it take more to equip a navy yard in Canada than it would in the United States? Conditions are the same practically, prices are just the same in that respect and for this navy yard, that in ten years has built 114 ships, six of them dreadnoughts, the whole cost of the land, buildings, machinery, and equipment of every mortal description, was less than $4,000,000. Is that a sum to stagger Canada? Is that a sum to frighten Canada? It seems to be small when we are talking of $35,000,000 at once. Supposing we did give this $35,000,000, what are we going to do afterwards? these dreadnoughts will not last for fifty years, the time that the right hon. leader of the Government says it will take to build ships in Canada. When these ships go on the scrap heap in ten years what about the next subscription? Supposing these ships are wrecked a year after they are built, as often happens to war vessels, what will we do then? Will there be another subscription? Does the right hon. leader of the Government, or anybody sitting behind him, believe that if you did give this subscription of $35,000,000 and if, in ten years from now, you came back and asked for another $35,000,000, the people of Canada would stand it? They would not stand it and they would not stand it to-day if they were given an opportunity of saying whether they would or not. Nobody knows better than hon. gentlemen opposite that the people would not stand it. If they think they have the people of Canada behind them why do they not test the feeling? They will not do it. Why? Because they know that they have not the support of the people behind them in this matter. I venture to say that if the question were submitted to a plebiscite they would find out where they were. Let them submit to the will of the people and they will find out where they are.

A great deal has been said, and a great deal has been written in the papers throughout Canada, about the British Admiralty having asked for this subscription. It is not true; the British Admiralty did not ask for it. The British Admiralty were not given an opportunity of saying what they wanted. The right hon. leader of the Government went to the British Admiralty and said: For immediate assistance what would you propose? I challenge my right hon. friend to-day to take this policy of a subscription of $35,000,000, place it before the Admiralty alongside of the policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and ask what they want. We will abide by whatever they say. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government went there and said: We have no permanent policy, and I suppose he would tell them, what he has told us, that it would take fifty years before we could build ships. He said: We want to give you some immediate aid—what shall it be? That is why he got the answer from the British Admiralty that whatever we gave should include certain ships. But that is not what the British Admiralty wanted. What the British Admiralty wanted was stated three years ago when they were asked the plain question and not trammeled by conditions. If hon. gentlemen opposite think that they have the people behind them—and we have the Prime Minister's statement that it is of the utmost importance that there should be unanimity on this subject—let them submit this question to the people in any shape they like, either by plebiscite, which I am not advocating, or by an election, and let them find out where they stand.

Mr. FOSTER: Is the hon. gentleman advocating an election?

Mr. TURRIFF: The right hon. Prime Minister stated two years ago that the question of reciprocity should not be decided without an appeal to the people. If that was the case why should he decide this question without an appeal to the people? This matter has never been before the people and has never been voted upon by them. The last election was run on the question of reciprocity and every hon. gentleman knows that. If my right hon.

friend wants something unanimous, if he is so sure that he has the people behind him, why should he hesitate to submit the question to the people and find out whether this is what they want or not?

Mr. GUILBAULT: The hon. gentleman says that the last election was fought out on the reciprocity question and that the opinion of the people was not obtained on the naval question.

Mr. TURRIFF: Perhaps I should qualify that by saying that the people all over Canada with the exception of a faction that raised trouble with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in the province of Quebec, the reciprocity question was the issue. But there were a certain number of places in Quebec where the navy question was discussed.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian navy won in Quebec, the only place where is was discussed.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: And it is getting better every day.

Mr. TURRIFF: I would say to my hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Guilbault) that it is true that certain people in Quebec were against a navy in any shape or form. I am not very much surprised at that; I can quite understand the people of Quebec not being very favourable at first to a navy. The people I represent in this House, only a sprinkling of whom are French people, and who are mostly English, Irish and Scotch Canadians from the province of Ontario, are not very favourable to a navy either. Therefore, I can quite understand the position in Quebec. But, an unfair means was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. As stated by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) it was anything at all to beat Laurier. Hon. gentleman opposite pursued one policy in connection with the navy in Quebec and another policy in connection with the navy in the other provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The navy won in Quebec.

Mr. TURRIFF: The navy won in Quebec. We got a big majority of members from Quebec.

Mr. GUILBAULT: The attitude of the hon. gentleman's party on the navy question was disapproved in Quebec.

Mr. TURRIFF: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Only in Joliette and that by accident.

Mr. TURRIFF: I understand that the navy was opposed by certain people in Quebec and Joliette was one of the constituencies which took that view of it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guibault) won out himself but the great majority of constituencies in Quebec, where the policy advocated by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was in issue, elected men in favour of a Canadian navy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me quote what one of the best authorities in Great Britain has to say about the advisability of building dreadnoughts. This statement was made by Admiral Beresford, a day or so after the right hon. leader of the Government made this speech in this House:

London, Dec. 6.—Lord Charles Beresford apparently has foreseen grave danger in the Borden idea, and says in the Daily Express this morning:

'What I recommended was that the dominions defend their end of trade routes with strong naval bases, mines, torpedo boat destroyers and light cruisers. The trade routes are unprotected and now our danger is starvation and not invasion. The country was deceived and fooled by statements regarding the dreadnoughts of other nations. We were insulted by being told a dreadnought could sink their whole fleets. The people speak of nothing but dreadnoughts, quite forgetting that a fleet is composed of a variety of units, any one of which being defective or short jeopardizes the whole.'

These are the words of one of the most prominent admirals that Great Britain has had for a number of years. He is not a supporter of the present administration of Great Britain; he has been a strong opponent of it from the first, and he points out that dreadnoughts are not altogether what is wanted, that dreadnoughts alone do not comprise a fleet, and that you must have smaller vessels as well. Let me point out what a fleet unit is, and what the difference is between the proposition of my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and that of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Government proposes to give three empty dreadnoughts. The leader of the Opposition proposes two fleet units, each unit headed by a dreadnought of exactly the same class, capacity and power as those proposed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government; so that, so far as dreadnoughts are concerned, there is a difference of one. Now what would we have in connection with the two fleet units in place of the third dreadnought? We would have three unarmoured cruisers on each coast; that would be six unarmoured cruisers. We would have six destroyers on each coast; that would be twelve destroyers. In addition we would have three submarines on each coast, a total of six submarines; so that in place of the third dreadnought, and as I have said the two dreadnoughts suggested by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition are identical with those suggested by the right hon. the leader of the Government, we would have six unarmoured cruisers, twelve destroyers and six submarines, with the necessary auxiliaries, such as depot and store ships which are not specified. Who for a moment would believe that these ships, to guard our own coasts, which Lord Beresford says is a most important thing—for he declares that is not invasion but starvation they have to fear in Great Britain in case of war—who would believe that these two fleet units manned and maintained by Canada would not be of greater service than three empty ships given to Great Britain with a string attached, and to be manned by Great Britain and kept up by Great Britain. It seems to me that there is absolutely no question as to which policy would be the best in the interests of the Empire. Of what strength can we be to the Empire when we cannot defend ourselves? If we had a dreadnought on the Atlantic coast it would not be necessary to keep it there. It could go to any waters in any part of the world. If there was likely to be any danger at any time, the Government would know of it five or six days beforehand, at all events, and that is all the time that a ship would take to cross from our coast to Great Britain. As for the Pacific unit, it is a well known fact that the British Admiralty are more than anxious to have Canada place a unit on the Pacific coast. Why? Because with the Canadian unit, the Australian unit, the New Zealand unit, and the unit of the British navy now in the Chinese seas, there would be four units that could be assembled at any point where there was likely to be trouble; and so we would have, right at once, the first line of battle. A Canadian unit on the Pacific coast is what the people of British Columbia have been advocating, practically without a dissenting voice, for the last four or five years. They want a unit, and to my mind if any possible danger may be expected to loom up in the future in the way of naval warfare, it is more likely to come on the Pacific coast than in the North sea. The people of British Columbia think so, and they are anxious to have a fleet unit on the Pacific. Why then not do what the British Admiralty suggested in the first place? Why not give them what they want to defend Canada and the Empire? I am one of those Canadians who never hesitate, and never fear to say that I am a Canadian, and as a good loyal Canadian, I believe that the better Canadian I am, the better Imperialist I am. I am not afraid to say in this House, or on any platform in the Dominion of Canada, that if Canada builds her navy, mans it, and pays for it, Canada shall have the say and the control of that navy until the time of war comes when it will be put under the British Admiralty. Who should have that control, if not Canada, when we build the navy and pay for it? Are we going to say that we are poorer men than the men from other parts of the Empire? Are we going to acknowledge that we are not as good men, or that we cannot take our share of the defence of the Empire?

A great deal has been said during the past month or two to the effect that a Canadian navy means a separatist navy. That is a disgrace and a shame to the man who says it. Was my right hon. friend the Prime Minister of Canada a separatist three or four years ago when he so eloquently advocated a navy, built as far as possible in Canada, and manned by Canadians? Was every man on the other side of the House within hearing of my voice a separatist when he supported that policy? I repeat that it is a disgrace for any man to come forward now and say that a Canadian navy would be a separatist navy. I do not think that a statement of that kind will appeal to the people of Canada. It would be impossible to elect any Government in Canada, Liberal or Conservative, that in case of trouble in the Empire, would not put the fleet immediately under the control of the British Admiralty. You could not elect such a government; you could not have a government controlled sufficiently by the Nationalist wing of the present Government to prevent the Canadian navy from being put at the service of the Empire. We do not have to take a back seat in saying that we are Canadians and proud to be Canadians; and the better Canadians we are, the better imperialists we will be.

I am very much pleased at the great change which has taken place in the province of Quebec in connection with the naval question during the last two years. I never could understand how the descendants of the people of old France would ever be against a navy. The French were the great ship-builders of Europe two or three centuries ago. In the great wars that took place for over a hundred years between England and France, at one time one nationality would be the victor, and the next time the other nationality would win. Whenever a French ship was captured, it practically served as a model for British warships that were built afterwards. The French were ahead of every other nation in the world as builders of warships. The men of old France manned those ships, carried the flag of France on every sea, and won many great naval victories. The people of France have a record of which they may well be proud. Does anyone dare to tell me that the descendants of those people are not ready to fight for their country? I do not believe it. I have the honour of being born and brought up in the province of Quebec, surrounded on all sides by French people. I was a young man when I left home; I could speak French as well as English; I spoke it often; I can speak it in a rough way now when I have to during election times; and I have seen nothing in my whole life to make me believe that the people of Quebec, the descendants of the people of old France, are not just as good men and as good fighters on land and on sea as their English-speaking compatriots. No one can make me believe that the French people of Quebec, when they understand the question, will not be as ready to do their share in the defence of the Empire as the people of any other part of the Dominion of Canada, of course excepting always my hon. friend the Postmaster General and a few others on the other side of the House.

I will now refer for a few moments to some of the things advocated by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I am quoting from his speech made in this House on March 29, 1909, which is only a short time ago. He said:

It might be wise to refer for a moment to the circumstances that Great Britain, by giving to Canada and the other great dependencies of the Empire, absolutely full control of their own affairs, and absolute autonomy in respect of self-government, has, I believe, increased and strengthened the ties which bind these great dependencies to the Empire as a whole, in a measure which would not have been practicable by any other policy. I believe also that the ties which bind Canada to the Empire to-day are firmer and surer and more enduring than they have been at any time in the past.

If we have absolute and full control, why should we not build and man our own navy? On that same occasion he said:

It is of no use for us in Canada to speak of this country as a nation, and to shrink in any manner from the discharge of our national responsibilities? What are those responsibilities? Acknowledged in every civilized community, recognized among all the great nations of the earth, a primal responsibility is the defence of their territories and the protection of their commerce.

How are you going to defend your territories and protect your commerce, if you do not build a navy? Are you going to do so by giving contributions to someone else to build a navy and to do our fighting for us? Further on, the right hon. the Prime Minister objected somewhat to the expenditure of $6,000,000 for military purposes. I would recommend that he keep that in mind when my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) is fixing up his estimates, because I understand they will be about $4,000,000 more than they have ever been before. At that time my right hon. friend thought that at least half of the money should be spent on the navy. Further on he said:

We are all aware to-day, that the policy of the British Admiralty is a policy of concentration, and we are all aware that the policy of the Australian naval programme, which has recently been entered into with the full approval and consent of the Mother Country, is altogether designed to guard the coasts of Australia against a danger of that kind.

Take the case of Australia. Australia started out to give a contribution. She found it was unsatisfactory and changed, and she is now building her own navy. Instead of Australians talking about it being a separatist navy, or about it being disloyal to have that navy under the control of the Australian Parliament, the two parties in the Australian Parliament during the last few months were quarrelling as to which party was entitled to the credit of insisting that the navy should be absolutely under the control of the Australian Parliament. My right hon. friend stated further:

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of the opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that. The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the Mother Country and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory. In Australia it failed, in the end, to meet the approval of the people for the reason that Great Britain felt constrained to ask Australia that the field of operations of the squadron should be extended to the China and Indian seas; and when the operation of that squadron was so extended the Australian felt that the contribution which they had been making for some years past was not really being used to give that protection to Australia which her interests demanded, so that the policy of Australia at the present time is to build up a flotilla of submarines and torpedo boats, which, in case of war, would co-operate with armed cruisers and battleships of the British navy. It was pointed out in discussing this question that Australia in providing a force of that kind would provide a force which it would be very difficult, if not impossible, for Great Britain to send across the seas, and that in thus protecting themselves, they were providing the best possible force for the protection of the Empire.

If Australia in defending herself is doing the very best for the defence of the Empire, why should not Canada in defending herself be doing the very best possible thing for the defence of the Empire? My right hon. friend went on to say:

So I am at one with the Prime Minister so far as this is concerned. I am at one with him in this respect, also that I think that expenditure of money designed for that purpose ought, in the main, at least, to be under the control of our own Parliament, and that by making an appropriation of that kind and attending to the defence of our own coasts by co-operation and co-ordination with the Imperial naval forces, we would be rendering a real service in the defence of the Empire, and we would be doing our duty, not only for Canada, but for the Empire as a whole.

Just one further extract from that speech:

I come now to a consideration of the resolution which has been moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister and I will say that with many portions of it I am in entire sympathy, but I would like to make one or two suggestions to the right hon. gentlemen, and I do not make them in any party spirit or any carping spirit, because if there is one thing more than another that I would desire it is that the policy Canada on this great question and the resoluiton announcing it should meet with the absolute and unanimous approval of this Parliament and of the country.

That was the position of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government in 1909. I pointed out why, in my estimation, he has gone back on this position. He went on:

What suggestions I have to make I make with the sincere desire that we may shape a resolution of which we can all approve and which shall go forth (to the world) as a ringing declaration that if the mother of nations has to fight the battle of her life, the people of Canada without distinction of party or of creed will stand by her side in that fight. This is too great a question for the introduction of party strategy. It is a question in respect to which we should all rise superior to party motives, and so I propose making to my right hon. friend one or two suggestions which I know he will receive in the spirit in which I make them.

Now, that surely was worthy of the leader of the Government. But he has changed views since then, compelled to do so, as I pointed out, by the Nationalist wing of his party. For the purpose of holding these Nationalists, he now goes back on the view he then held and puts forward a proposition upon which we cannot be unanimous, because the country is not behind it.

Mr. MARSHALL: How do you know that?

Mr. TURRIFF: Let my hon. frends opposite bring it to the test, and they will find the country is not behind them. At a later date, the 12th of January, 1910, the hon. gentleman spoke further on this question. I will not read at length on this speech, though I have a number of quotations from it here, but will only give the closing one:

I say to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, so far as my words have any weight with him: Go on with your naval service.

That was the Canadian navy, remember.

Proceed slowly, cautiously and surely. Lay your proposals before the people and give them if necessary an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. TURRIFF.

Now, I have just one more point on which I wish to say a word or two, and then I am done. My hon. friend to my left here says 'Thank God.' Well, unfortunately, my hon. friend on my left, like his friends opposite, does not seem to have the power of speech on this subject, and so I have to speak for myself and for them as well. Now, I wish to present this view to the Prime Minister: I think that it is absolutely unfair that this question should be settled without a reference to the people. I do not think this House is in a postion to properly decide on that question, for the simple reason that this House is not properly representative of the people. The province from which I come is not properly represented here. We are entitled to far more members than we have here at the present time. And the same is true of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. That being the case, why should this House decide a question such as this without submission to the people? Let me give you an idea of how unfairly we are represented. Here are the figures showing the basis upon which the four western provinces are represented in this House:

	Inhabitants.
British Columbia has one member for each	56,068
Alberta has one member for each.	53,532
Saskatchewan has one member for each	49,243
Manitoba has one member for each.	45,561
Average	49,739

And here are the figures for the eastern provinces:

	Inhabitants.
Ontario has one member for each	29,340
Quebec has one member for each	30,810
New Brunswick has one member for each	27,068
Nova Scotia has one member for each	27,352
Prince Edward Island has one member for each	23,432
Average	29,376

Thus we see that the average member from the western provinces represents more than 20,000 more people than does the average member from the eastern provinces. In the face of that inequality, I call on the right hon. Prime Minister to remedy that before he attempts to pass that measure. This is a measure that he himself has said should be dealt with unanimously, that on this question we should have a policy that would appeal not only to the members of the House but to the people of the country. My right hon. friend himself must feel that the policy he has initiated does not appeal unanimously to this House. And I am told by members who have figured it out that the number of people who voted for members who supported the resolution of my right hon.

friend is just about the same as the number who voted for those who opposed it. In view of that I call on my right hon. friend not to force this question at the present time, but to give us the redistribution. I call upon my right hon. friend not to force this question at the present time, but to bring down the Redistribution Bill. My right hon. friend is constitutionally bound to do this; the British North America Act, in section 51, says that it shall be done after a census has been taken. A census has been taken; it shows that the West is only half represented, and it is unfair, I say, to pass a measure such as this, inaugurating a new course for Canada, to which more than half the people are opposed I call on my right hon. friend to make good his promise when he canvassed the West two years ago, and held meetings throughout the western provinces, that, if returned to power, one of the first things he would do would be to pass a redistribution Bill.

Mr. BORDEN: On what occasion does my hon. friend say I made that statement?

Mr. TURRIFF: I have been told, Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF: Hon. gentlemen should not laugh too quickly. I have been told by a number of my own constituents who had the pleasure of hearing my right hon. friend in the towns of Estevan and Weyburn—both of them in my constituency—that my hon. friend stated that if he was elected on the reciprocity question, one of the earliest things he would do would be to pass a redistribution Bill, and give to the West their proper and legal representation. That statement was made by my right hon. friend generally in his tour throughout the West.

Mr. BORDEN: I beg my hon. friend's pardon, but I have absolutely no recollection of making any such statement, and am quite convinced that I never did so.

Mr. TURRIFF: Let me quote to my right hon. friend what one of his own particular friends wrote—Mr. Castell Hopkins—in the Canadian Annual Review. Referring to the utterances of my right hon. friend at the Melville meeting, Mr. Hopkins said:

Reciprocity he said should not be put through a parliament which was not elected on it. If the referendum was a good thing, he would expect the farmers to support the Conservative demand for an election. In this he reiterated a statement made many times during his western trip—that reciprocity should be postponed and proper representation given to the West before a general election.

Mr. BORDEN: That does not seem to be precisely what my hon. friend previously stated.

Mr. TURRIFF: I did not have the pleasure of being in that particular part of the West at the time my right hon. friend held his meetings in my constituency, but I was told that one of the promises made by my right hon. friend was that, if returned to power, one of the earliest things he would do would be to give the West the representation to which it was entitled. That is not the only promise my right hon. friend made on that trip, and which he has forgotten. He made several other promises which he has forgotten, at least so far as taking any active means to carry them out are concerned, but as these subjects are not connected with the naval question, I will not refer to them at the present time. If the western provinces have the same representation as those of the East, instead of thirty-five members we would have fifty-nine and I appeal to any right hon. friend as to whether it is fair to put through a measure inaugurating a new policy for Canada, when proctically one-half of this great country is but half-represented in this House of Commons? In this I appeal to the sense of fair play of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and I intend to close my remarks by submitting an amendment to this Bill, as follows:

That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved:

That it is the constitutional duty of the Government, under the terms of the British North America Act, immediately to introduce a measure for the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons, according to the population of the said provinces as established by the census of 1911, and that this House do not proceed further with the Bill until such readjustment has taken place, and the people have been duly consulted on the said Bill.

I present that motion to the House, believing that it is but fair and reasonable. In pointing out the representation to which we are entitled in the West, I have said nothing about the enormous number of people who have come in since the census was taken. I do not claim that we are entitled to representation for those people, but I would point out that last year the Department of Immigration made the statement that, every twenty-one days during last summer, the tide of immigration coming into the four western provinces entitled these provinces to an extra member in Parliament. We do not base a claim upon anything of that kind, but surely this emphasizes the fact that we ought to have that representation to which we are entitled by the census of 1911. Supposing my right hon. friend does not pass a redistribution Bill at present, but brings it down next session, as the right hon. gentleman stated some time ago he would do. Under our constitution no government is certain of a year's power. In 1873, Sir John A. Macdonald, when he opened the session, expected to be in power until the term expired, but he did not do so. A couple of years ago, the right hon. gentleman who led the Government, when he started the session, expected that he would remain in power during that term of Parliament, but he did not do so. The right hon. the Prime Minister might, in the early part of next session bring down a redistribution Bill; some thing might happen to prevent the Bill from going through, and he would have to appeal to the country. What would be the result? in the year 1914 a parliament would be elected with the right to sit for five years, which would carry it up to the end of 1919, and the provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba would, in that Parliament, be represented on the population of 1901, the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta would be represented according to the census taken in these two provinces in 1906, and, during the whole decade between 1911 and 1921, the western provinces would be deprived of their just and rightful representation in this House. In view of these facts I would ask the right hon. member, according to the terms of the amendment I have moved, not to go on with this Bill but to bring in his redistribution Bill. We will help him through with it. When that Bill is through let him appeal to the country and he will then find out whether the people of Canada are behind him or not.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have seen a singular illustration this afternoon of an old rule which says that arguments between two disputants who can never hope to convince each other depend on one of two things, either a difference as to the facts or a difference in the standpoint from which the facts are viewed. I take it for granted that that principle applies to this debate, and in view of the statement made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that in discussing this question he would not yield in loyalty or devotion to the Empire to the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, we need not worry about the standpoint from which these facts are to be viewed. We may take it for granted that every hon. member in this House honestly desires to do the best that he can at this time for Canada and the Motherland. I would not have deemed it necessary to read at any length from the memorandum of the Admiralty had it not been for some remarks made by previous speakers, including my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), which convinced me that not only had they not read the memorandum of the Admiralty but that they had not even read the Bill to which the hon. member has offered an amendment. I heard him again and again and again denounce the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government on account of his daring to give this 'subscription' to the Motherland. We heard a tirade against the Motherland on account of her wealth, we heard a tirade against those who would venture to give a subscription of $35,000,000, and yet when I look at the Bill which I hold in my hand, I confess I am unable to find a word to justify the statement that we are giving a subscription of $35,000,000 to Great Britain. The right hon. gentleman desired that we should have a Canadian navy. In the course of his remarks, whenever he came anywhere near the question before the House, it was to call the attention of the members to the fact that we desired a Canadian navy and before him is a Bill, a practical Bill, to establish a Canadian navy, which, it is true, in the meantime we will lend to the Motherland.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NORTHRUP: The question is therefore whether or not under the circumstances that is a wise thing to do. Let us appeal to the Admiralty. Surely hon. gentlemen cannot object if when the question has been raised and everyone desires to do what is right, we should ask for expert information and I venture to say there are few members of the House who would venture to claim that they had greater and wider and more varied experience than the lords of the Admiralty and therefore were better able to decide what was best for the purposes of the Admiralty than the lords of the Admiralty themselves. Let me read a few extracts from the memorandum, which is entitled 'Despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies to His Royal Highness the Governor General, transmitting memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the general naval situation and communicated to the Government of Canada by His Majesty's Government, November, 1912.'

So, surely if there is any authoritative document anywhere under the sun to which we should refer to get the facts necessary to enable us to form an intelligent opinion on this subject it must be this document. The first clause shows how they came to give this document:

1. The Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada has invited His Majesty's Government through the Board of Admiralty to prepare a statement of the present and immediately prospective requirements of the naval defence of the Empire for presentation to the Canadian Parliament if the Dominion Cabinet deem it necessary.

The Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material and still more important moral assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas, but they think it necessary to disclaim any intention, however indirect, of putting pressure upon Canadian public opinion, or of seeking to influence the Dominion Parliament in a decision which clearly belongs solely to Canada.

So, the question having been asked and the Admiralty having said: We understand the question is what is necessary for the naval defence of the Empire, we put no pressure on Canada, but give these facts:

The power of the British Empire to maintain the superiority on the sea, which is essential to its security, must obviously be measured from time to time by reference to the other naval forces of the world,——

And let this House not for a moment forget that that is the key to the situation.

--and such a comparison does not imply anything unfriendly in intention or in spirit to any other power or group of powers. From this point of view the development of the German fleet during the last fifteen years is the most striking feature of the naval situation to-day. That development has been authorized by five successive legislative enactments, viz., the Fleet Laws of 1898, 1900, 1906, 1908, and 1912. These laws cover the period up to 1920.

Whereas in 1898 the German fleet consisted of:—

9 battleships (excluding coast defence vessels),
3 large cruisers,
28 small cruisers,
113 torpedo boats, and 25,000 men

maintained at an annual cost of 6,000,000*l.*, the full fleet of 1920 will consist of:—

41 battleships,
20 large crusers,
40 small cruisers,
144 torpedo boats,
72 submarines, and
101,500 men,

estimated to be maintained at an annual cost of 23,000,000*l.*

The memorandum goes on:

The effect of the new German navy law is to produce a remarkable expansion of strength and readiness. The number of battleships and large armoured cruisers which will be kept constantly ready and in full commission will be raised by the law from 21, the present figure, to 33—an addition of 12, or an increase of about 57 per cent.

And on page 8:

It has been necessary within the past decade to concentrate the fleet mainly in home waters.

In 1902 there were 160 British vessels on the overseas stations against 76 to-day.

Whatever may be the decision of Canada at the present juncture, Great Britain will not in any circumstances fail in her duty to the overseas dominions of the Crown.

The Admiralty are assured that His Majesty's Government will not hesitate to ask the House of Commons for whatever provision the circumstances of each year may require. But the aid which Canada could give at the present time is not to be measured only in ships or money. Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness to the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the overseas dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.

In view of all these considerations the Admiralty recommend:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

Mr. Speaker, as I take it, the Government come before this House and, laying on the table this memorandum, say: We have honestly endeavoured to carry out the wishes of the Admiralty and, in so doing, we ask the Canadian people to give $35,000,000 to be expended in the construction of three dreadnoughts which will be the property of the Canadian people but which will be handed over to the Imperial authorities to be used for the purposes of the Admiralty and which may be recalled at any time should the Canadian people so decide. Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of the course adopted by the Government, whether right or wrong, whether wise or foolish, we must all admit that the policy of the present Administration is to carry out what they were asked to carry out by His Majesty's ministers in the Old Country.

There seems to be such an extraordinary difference of opinion among the members of this House on the question of fact that I venture to recall to the memory of hon. gentleman a few matters with regard to which I think we will all agree as to matters of fact. In the first place, I venture to affirm that, no matter what we may do or say, the fact remains that war is on and has been on for a year past between Great Britain and Germany. The fact is that war is on and has beeen on since the German Act of 1912 was passed. We may have two kinds of war—physical war and diplomatic war. Whatever one may think of the fiscal policy of free trade, it is perfectly certain that when you come to the question of the diplomatic war, the absence of a protective tariff, the absence of the possibility of making terms with other nations whereby advantages may be secured by giving concessions in return, tremendously handicaps the Motherland in her diplomatic policy. When we come to physical war, while we may approve of the rule that has been laid down and practised by the Mother Country that conscription should not prevail, and while we would be unwilling to have conscription in this country, at the same time, when the strugggle comes, the people who will tolerate conscription are much better off than the people who will not. So again the Motherland is handicapped not only by her fiscal policy, being unable to make trade treaties, but by the fact that conscription, whether it be right or wrong, does not exist within its domains. At the present time we find the one hundred and seventy-six ships of ten years ago reduced to sixty. What is the practical result in the Mediterranean where war is going on? We have France, Italy, Spain each one of which nation has acquired a portion of an empire on the southwestern shores of the Mediterranean, and in acquiring a portion of an empire on the shores of the Mediterranean these nations must of necessity be on good terms with the power that commands the Mediterranean sea. A few years ago our flag floated supreme on the Mediterranean. I can remember one day sailing into Gibraltar, how my heart swelled with pride when I looked upon the magnificent fleet lying there in defence of our commerce; to-day that fleet has been withdrawn practically from the Mediterranean. Italy and Austria are building vessels, while, on the contrary, England is withdrawing her vessels and I would like to ask any hon. member if at the late conference held in London in the endeavour to settle affairs in connection with this important war which has lately been raging, the power, the strength and the influence of Great Britain were more or less because of the fact that her fleet had been withdrawn from the Mediterranean. If she is in command of the Mediterranean then those powers which have overseas possessions in Africa must be on good terms with her. It is not only on the Mediterranean, but with respect to diplomatic questions that arise in Europe, France, Spain, Austria and Italy are all bound to be on good terms with the power that controls the Mediterranean and if they cannot afford to quarrel with that power the very withdrawal of these vessels from the Mediterranean has affected the Old Country already.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NORTHRUP: When you left the chair, at six o'clock Mr. Speaker, I was calling the attention of the House to the actual situation of the British navy at the present time. I pointed out that whereas a few years ago it was supreme on the Mediterranean, now it was almost non-existent, and that in a very short time with the new dreadnoughts that are being built by Italy and Austria, British naval power in the Mediterranean would be wholly a thing of the past. I pointed out that France, Spain and Italy have all added to their empires on the southwest side of the Mediterranean, and that therefore they are to a great extent under the control of the power which has the supremacy on the Mediterranean, and if Great Britain possessed that power in the future, as she has in the past, but does not at the present time, no matter what diplomatic embarrassments might arise on the continent of Europe, France Spain and Italy would be very much interested in keeping on the right side of Great Britain lest she would interfere with their own empires divided into two by the Mediterranean. I might also have gone on to point out that at the present time a large portion, practically almost half of the foreign wheat sent to Great Britain goes by the Mediterranean, £32,000,000 worth going by that route and £35,000,000 worth by all other routes. Therefore it is most important that Great Britain should have control over the route through which passes half of her life supply. It is well known that Germany is building a railway in Asia Minor, the Bagdad railway which must ere long reach the Persian gulf, and it is almost certain that when it reaches the Persian gulf, it will be extended to India. One has only to consider for a moment the position of Great Britain in India to-day with 200,000,000 of a population with the only route by sea by the Suez canal, to realize the value of retaining the supremacy of the Mediterranean. Consider the position of Great Britain a few years hence if the supremacy of Great Britain in the Mediterranean is gone and the Germany railway is completed. We must not forget the influence that Germany had at Constantinople, and the railway is controlled by Germans, financed by Germans and entirely managed by Germans. Then we must remember that Great Britain has great responsibilities in Egypt. Anyone acquainted with that country must recognize that it is simply a question of continuing British power, not only with the aid of British troops and native troops, but especially of her maritime supremacy, and that without this maritime supremacy she could not hold control for a moment. The name of Lord Kitchener is in itself a tower of strength to the supremacy of Great Britain which has been recognized for many years, controlling trade and enabling the poor people to live under better conditions than previously prevailed. Those who have been in that country and have heard, as I have heard, Egyptians tell how their lives and families and property, which formerly were not worth a moment's purchase, are now safe, would hardly believe that the same men are pouring out curses at being ruled by infidel dogs. No Sir, one need only point out if trouble comes in Egypt, and Britain loses control of the Mediterranean to realize what a parlous condition England would be in. How is British commerce between India and Great Britain to be carried on safe by the sea and the Suez canal, through the Mediterranean and up the Red Sea? And we all know apart from other difficulties that if the cotton supply from India was stopped for a few months, the starvation among the cotton operatives of England would be terrible.

Look at it from another light. Looking the matter fairly and frankly in the face, let us see who control the sea route between Great Britain and India. France happily is an ally of Great Britain, but France controls the route to the Suez canal and at the other end of the canal the route to India is controlled by Japan. Luckily Japan is also an ally of Great Britain, but unquestionably the Japanese navy controls that route. Then take the route from Great Britain to Australia. Who controls that route? France at one end, Japan at the other; there is not the slightest question about it. And if by unhappy chance the alliance between Great Britain and Japan were broken to-morrow, and the Japanese were to endeavour to attack Australia as they attacked Russia but a few years ago, I do not think one requires to be a prophet or the son of a prophet to predict what would be the fate of Australia. Who controls the route between Great Britain and Canada at the present time? On one side France on the Atlantic and to the Suez canal, and at the other end the Japanese and American fleets. So that whereas a few years ago Great Britain was unquestionably the mistress of the seas, to-day, owing to the fact that while her navy is far superior to the navy of any other power, her great fighting ships are massed, for some reason or other in the North sea, and her ships have been withdrawn from the Mediterranean, she does not control the routes and does not possess the influence that she did a few years ago. Speaking for myself, if more than three dreadnoughts were needed, though three are understood to be sufficient, I would say we were quite prepared to give more. That would be my own preference, but taking it as it is, if those three of the greatest fighting machines in the world are added to the fleet in the North sea, one can easily see two advantages, first the material, and then the moral, which has been so much emphasized in the memorandum of the Admiralty.

But supposing we had a fleet unit on the Atlantic and another unit on the Pacific, with one dreadnought to each and two or three of the smaller vessels, cruisers and submarines, I would like to ask any hon. member of this House, after frankly considering the question, by what manner of means could these two dreadnoughts affect the control of say the Mediterranean? I have mentioned a great many serious difficulties that may possibly confront the Empire from that region; in what conceivable way could these two units affect Great Britain's position in the Mediterranean? Then I spoke of her position in regard to India. Will any one tell me how those two units could affect that? Take her position in regard to the control of the routes to Australia. In what possible way could those units affect those routes? Looking at the matter frankly, trying to consider it without partiality for one plan or the other, trying to see which would best serve the interests of the Empire, and laying aside party political prejudices I fail to see how you are strengthening the forces of the Empire or helping the Mother Country. I was very much struck by a few words uttered by Mr. Winston Churchill in a speech a short time ago which seemed to put the position of Great Britain so clearly that I will take the liberty of reading them to the House. He was speaking at a banquet at Glasgow on February 9, last and he said:

> The whole fortunes of our race and Empire, the whole treasure accumulated during so many centuries sacrifice and achievement, would perish and be swept utterly away if our naval supremacy were to be impaired.

Is not that a fact? In introducing the navy estimates on March 18, last, he said:

> When we consider our naval strength we are not thinking of our commerce, but of our freedom. We are not thinking of our trade, but of our lives. Nothing, of course, can make us absolutely safe against combinations which the imagination can summon up. We have faced combinations over and over again in the past, and sometimes heavy odds, but we must never conduct our affairs so that the navy of any single power would be able to engage us at any single moment—even our least favourable moment—with any reasonable prospect of success. If this is insular arrogance, it is also the first condition of our existence.

The speaker this afternoon spent considerable time in pointing out the alleged inconsistencies of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. I could not help being reminded of the old story of Nero fiddling while Rome burned, when at such a time as this the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition and his followers, say what they will, have frankly and publicly admitted that there is a something, be it an emergency, a crisis or a peril, I care not what they call it; but there must be a something, because the right hon. gentleman and his followers are willing to double the estimates they were willing to pass a few years ago, and willing, I say it in justice to the right hon. gentleman and hon. members opposite, to spend a far larger sum than is asked for at the present time by the Government; and yet their uppermost idea seems to be the consistency or inconsistency of the Premier of this country. I congratulate the right hon. gentleman and the country on the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are willing to spend about $45,000,000 on and millions more for the upkeep of what they have pointed out as being the best way of meeting the peril. It shows that whatever conclusion we may arrive at, it will not be miserly; it will not be niggardly; it is a difference of opinion as to what should be done. If that be the case, there must be some way in which we can come together; and before I finish, I will take the liberty of suggesting a compromise which I think will not effect the honour or standing of either party or in any way compromise it with the public.

I have said so much of the position that exists at the present time. Let me add one more word to show why this position is as it is. When the hon. gentleman this afternoon was pointing out the alleged inconsistensy of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, I could not help but suspect that he would not have spent the time of the House in so doing, had he been aware that all the conditions are entirely changed since that time. A man might have been willing to do anything under the sun in 1909 and 1910 as far as this country and Great Britain were concerned, and he absolutely correct in what he did. The same man advocating the same course to-day might be considered an idiot by everybody in this country and in the whole world, simply because conditions have so changed. A few years ago, as the memorandum which I read this evening from the Admiralty shows, the German navy was a practically insignificant navy, one of the weakest among the great powers of the world; to-day it is the greatest navy in the world bar one, and by 1920 it will be a far greater navy than the British navy is to-day. In considering the figures in regard to the ships of these two nations, we must never forget that nothing after all is so fallacious as figures. We read about so many vessels in the British line and so many in the German line. We all know in a general way that these vessels are growing obsolete; but we forget that the British vessels are growing obsolete, at a very much greater rate than German vessels, because there are so many more of them. Therefore, more British vessels must go to the scrap heap than German vessels in the same time. When the German Naval Act was passed in 1912, it was but the culmination of a series of Acts, the Act of 1898, the Act of 1900, the Act of 1906 and the Act of 1912. Each one provided for an increase in the German navy. Great Britain, owing to reasons pointed out frankly by Mr. Asquith in the British House of Commons, in order to save money so as to be able to pay the old age pensions, for a time refrained from building ships as rapidly as she had been doing, and Germany caught up. Even that was not a matter of such tremendous importance, until this German Naval Act was passed, which provided not only for a very large increase in expenditure, but for the keeping, twelve months in the year, day and night, 365 days and a quarter every year, the bulk of the German navy ready for action. My hon. friend this afternoon thought it would be a very easy matter, in case war was declared, if we had a fleet unit on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, for us to go to the assistance of Great Britain. He seemed to think that a wire would be sent by the Kaiser, six or seven days before he went to war, stating when and where he was going to strike. He forgets that that is not the way in which war is declared by Germany. History tells us that when Germany gets ready to strike, she strikes first and explains afterwards. At the present time, the condition of both the German and the British navies is such that for a large portion of the year the crews are allowed to go on shore, ships are allowed to be out of commission, and men are exchanged from one vessel to another. Now one clause in the German Naval Act requires that three-fourths of the German navy shall be ready for action at all times and that navy is within a few hundred miles of England ready to strike. That is enough to show a very wide difference between the state of affairs in the year 1913 and the state of affairs in the year 1910. What I am going to mention now is a strange thing, and I only mention it because it is commented on in many books in the Old Country, to show that it is important that something be done. Germany has nine dry-docks for her dreadnoughts along the Baltic on the North sea; Great Britain has one which is nearly but not yet completed, so that to all practical intents and purposes she has none. Is it not a striking fact that the British naval estimates for last year are about $100,000,000 more than they were ten years ago, especially at this time when the Government of Great Britain is assuming so many new obligations and is endeavouring to do so much for the poorer classes and doing so much to alleviate the distress from which they are suffering, and when Great Britain requires the money so badly for that purpose, as I said a moment ago, that she decreased the number of dreadnoughts she built for some years. In this year of grace 1913, the esti mates came to some £45,000,000, about $240,000,000. I venture to think that if members of this House would consider such striking facts as these, they would come to the conclusion that it is indeed time that something should be done. As I said before, what is the best thing to be done? Hon. gentlemen opposite differ from us to a great extent, because we differ as to our facts. I should like to take up the time of the House for a few moments in mentioning what I consider are facts, which apparently are not considered facts by some hon. gentlemen opposite. It has been said again and again in this debate; it is said by almost every newspaper we read in opposition to the Government, that Great Britain is a rich country; and it is stated that she has billions of money invested all over the world, and, therefore, she has no use for a contribution of a few dreadnoughts. Supposing that Messrs. Rockefeller and Carnegie and the twenty-three gentlemen, who were advertised in Canadian papers as controlling the finances of Canada, went to Greenland would we be justified in saying that Greenland was a rich country on that account? Twenty-five rich men might be an improvement to that country; some would think they might be the contrary; but would that make Greenland a rich country? Is England as a matter of fact a rich country to-day? It is perfectly true that Englishmen have billions of dollars loaned out and that an immense wealth is held by wealthy Englishmen. If those wealthy Englishmen could be made to bear the strain of all this expense, I do not think any person would be very badly off. For illustration, Great Britain has an area of 77,000,000 of acres altogether, and 1,700 people own over 14,000,000 acres. There are 7,000,000 men whose weekly wages run from 9·3 shillings to 27 shillings a week. I have here a statement showing the following:

Textile trades, 482,000 men, 23s. 1d. per week.
Clothing trade, 114,000 men, 30s. 3d.
Building and wood-working trades, 1,200,000 men, 32s.
Metal engineers 1,100,000 men, 33s. 11d.
Public utilities—Gas works &c., 2,684,000 men, 28s. 1d.
Railway workers, 621,341 men, 25s.
Agricultural labourers (all allowances included) from 9s. 3d. to 20s. 9d.

It is these people, it seems to me, who have to bear the burden of this expense. If the expenses of the navy run up $100,000,000 in ten years and are this year over $240,000,000 spent, the 1,700 land owners to whom I have referred are not seriously hurt; but every penny which falls upon the man who is earning twenty-five shillings a week, is a very serious burden. And when we consider that in addition the reports show that the workers are out of employment ten, twenty, or thirty per cent of the time, a heavy tax must be this which raises the large amount of $240,000,000. And when we know that whatever we may think of the fiscal laws of Great Britain, as a matter of fact, she collects $370,000,000 or so from what the people eat, drink and smoke, and, whether we call it free trade or not, we know that it is the people who eat, drink and smoke—the poor as well as the rich—we see the burden that this heavy tax must impose on the ordinary man.

It is easy to speak of England as being a rich country. But 31,000,000 out of 45,000,000 own not a foot of land, while millions and millions are on the verge of starvation. We cannot leave these poor people out of account as to where the burden is to rest. And, while the people of Britain have borne the burden in the past, and while the ministry of the day say that they are prepared, if necessary, to bear the expense still, it seems to me that if we are a sister nation owing allegiance to a common king, with our boundless wealth, we must say to our fellow Britons: You are burdened for the common good; if these dreadnoughts are not supplied, you will have to supply them—because there must be the preponderance over Germany or the Empire goes to pieces; and we should not hesitate to give three or more dreadnoughts to maintain the supremacy upon the seas upon which the very existence of our Empire depends.

It has been said again and again that we owe nothing to England. I have been surprised to hear that statement made, and it has been made very frequently. The hon. gentleman who represents Sunbury and Queens (Mr. McLean) the other night made what was, to my mind, one of the most magnificent patriotic speeches ever delivered in this House. He put the explanation of his position on the ground that he desired to do his duty. Sir, I do not think a higher ground than that could be taken by any man. While I was thinking over his remarks, it seemed to me that, from my own standpoint, I was not actuated wholly by a desire to do my duty. In this case as in most cases I think there are more factors than one that influence one's actions. One person is influenced more by one consideration and another by another. In my case, loyalty would not be the only factor, but it is a large one. Gratitude, in my case, might not be sufficient to decide, but it is a large factor and duty is a large factor, but that is not the only one. I am not sure but that my sense of self-respect is the one that influences me more than anything else. As to this idea that we owe nothing to England, I may be pardoned if I take a moment to consider it. England, after a long and bloody war entered into the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, under which she was given Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Labrador. We have not Newfoundland, but we have Nova Scotia and we hope yet that Newfoundland, the sentinel of the gulf, will join our fair Dominion. And we know that we shall pay exactly the same price for her as for all the other territories we have acquired. The treaty of 1763 gave Canada to the British Crown as she is to-day. Subsequent treaties were made, and even the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition is a little behind in his knowledge of the treaties, the Ashburton treaty, the Oregon treaty and others—the result being, however it came about, that Great Britain did own from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And all this she handed over to us without a cent being paid. Surely we owe something to Great Britain for that. I think that the ancestors of the right hon. gentleman were in this country when the cession came in 1759, and I think that if they could be called into the witness box to-day, they would testify that they enjoyed a higher degree of liberty from 1759 forward than they had enjoyed under their own sovereign. We in the other provinces had our own difficulties. But it is not fair for us, in the light of modern liberty, to find fault because, a century ago, when we were in the enjoyment of as large a measure of liberty as any other people in the world—similarly situated—and larger—we had not then the full measure of freedom that we have to-day. Take us as we sit here in this chamber and consider the absolute liberty we possess. But think of the contrast of to-day with even a few years ago. In 1887 the first colonial conference was summoned. The colonies were told to send one of their ministers if that could be done handily, but if not, any prominent colonist who happened to be in London might go to the office of the Colonial Secretary to talk over affairs. And so, like little boys, the colonists turned up at the feet of the Colonial Secretary and made their suggestions. Think of the contrast between that and the last Imperial conference with the Prime Minister of Great Britain standing in Parliament and speaking of the sister kingdoms, that, in comparison with the Mother Country 'differ only in stature and not in status.' That is the status we occupy to-day. And surely, if we possess this magnificent heritage we owe something for it,—the richest country upon which the sun shines, with our fisheries and our mines and our forests and our wealth of mountains and prairies, wealth all given by the Motherland for which we never paid a cent, and possessing, too, the fullest measure of liberty,—for everyone knows that if we requested the Old Country to let us throw in our lot with the United States or with Japan or with any other land, however regretfully she might see the tie severed, there would be no opposition on her part. Could there be more perfect liberty given than that which we enjoy from the Motherland?

I have spoken of the Ashburton and Oregon treaties, and I may be pardoned if I dwell for a moment on that subject. Because the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has expressed dissatisfaction with the conduct of British diplomats in reference to these matters. I do not wonder at it, for though he is a scholar, yet for the last fifteen or seventeen years he has had more to do than keep in touch with the modern discoveries of history. A man ruling a country as broad and growing as rapidly as the Dominion of Canada has all his time taken up in the discharge of the duties of his high office. But nobody who has not read the recent discoveries of history in the last few years knows the truth of the Ashburton and Oregon treaties. If anyone has any curiosity on the subject, let him read the account given by Professor Ganong of New Brunswick in the Royal Society Archives in 1901. Professor Ganong wrote perhaps the fullest and best account of the Ashburton treaty that has been written. He shows that, although Great Britain and the United States had referred the question as to the boundaries to the King of Holland, and although Lord Palmerston, on the floor of the Parliament of Great Britain and Lord Aberdeen in a public letter, had called attention to the fact that the King of Holland was under such obligations to Great Britain that the people need not be under the slightest anxiety that justice would be done to Britain's claim; yet when the King of Holland gave the award he gave Canada only 4,100 square miles of the disputed territory. The award was promptly repudiated by the United States, and, when year had followed year, and threat had followed threat, war at last broke out; the State of Maine had called out its militia, and the United States Congress had voted $10,000,000 for the purposes of war. Men had been arrested on both sides. Lord Ashburton was sent out and made his treaty, with the result that instead of an award of 4,100 square miles, which the Americans repudiated when given by the King of Holland, the treaty gave us 5,000 square miles. If there could be any possibility of doubt as to how Lord Ashburton succeeded, it was certainly settled when in 1848 the surveyors of New Brunswick and Quebec went out in a friendly way to decide the location of the boundaries of these two provinces, and they reported that there was a large tract of country—over 500 square miles—which did not belong to either province, and which had been gained by the Ashburton treaty. In later days it has been learned that if there was any duplicity, it was rather on the other side, and the map that hung in King George's library, with the red line marked in his own handwriting, was not produced. I think there is not the slightest doubt that we received many advantages under the Ashburton treaty. With respect to the Oregon treaty, I think we do not all realize that the only reason why we have a Northwest or a British Columbia at all is because Great Britain stood by us in connection with the Oregon treaty. Some hon. gentlemen of this House may not be aware that when the Lynn Bill was passed by the United States Senate in 1843, providing for the erection of forts, for the administration of justice by American judges, and for grants of land for settlers in the far West, Lord Palmerston at once notified them that if they passed that Act it would be taken by Great Britain as a declaration of war. The Act passed the Senate, went into the House of Representatives, and has not emerged since. Subsequently, when matters were again on the verge of war, it was only because our American friends found that it was a case of fight or settle that we obtained what we have to-day. Although we hear this described as the Oregon treaty, we must remember that Oregon was described as extending from the south up to 54·40, the lower line of Alaska; so that if the Americans wanted, as they said, 54·40 or fight, all of Canada you would have left would be what was between 54 40, the south boundary of Alaska, and 54·40, the north boundary of the United States. When we come to consider what we owe to Great Britain, we should remember that her diplomatic services have been entirely at our command at any time we required them. Although it is said that this country may be invaded on account of our connection with Great Britain, we must not forget that when Canada was invaded by Americans in 1775, and again in 1812, although the inhabitants fought nobly and heroically for their country, after all, in all human probability, both invasions would have succeeded, had it not been for the presence of the Imperial troops in Canada at that time. We must not forget that after this country had been conquered in 1759, there were very few people in England who desired to retain Canada. France wanted to regain it, very few Englishmen wished to keep it; but one far-seeing Englishman, William Pitt, preferred to keep Canada, then considered but as a few arpents of snow, with a trade of £14,000 in pelts, as against Guadeloupe, with an annual trade of six or seven hundred thousand pounds in sugar, cotton, and tobacco, which England, at that time, wanted. It seemed monstrously foolish to take this frozen land, with its £14,000 of annual trade, and abandon Guadeloupe, with its enormous productive capacities. Yet England gave Guadeloupe over to France and kept Canada, practically paying the difference between £14,000 a year, and six or seven hundred thousand pounds, in order that she might have possession of this country. Since those times, England has spent more money on Canada. I have here some authentic figures, compiled from a statement sent out from the War Office and I find that from 1852 to 1902, fifty years of peace, $85,000,000 was spent in this country on military affairs. Taking this as a basis for the one hundred and fifty years would give $170,000,000 though it would really be much higher, for these were fifty years of peace, and there had been many years of war during the period of one hundred years. The expenditure in connection with canals amounted to $81,000,000, and improvements to $56,000,000. There is another item to which I would direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. No one can sail up the St. Lawrence and see the beautiful city of Quebec, resting like a queen on the heights, without being impressed by the magnificent walls and citadel that crown the summit. These walls and that citadel were built by English money, paid for by the classes to whom I have referred a few moments ago, and in the construction of the walls and citadel in Quebec between the years 1820 and 1829, £7,000,000—$35,000,000—were spent. So, if we are to eliminate everything else at the present time, the Government is asking us to expend in dreadnoughts, for the maintenance and preservation of the British Empire, only such an amount of money as the English Government spent on the walls and citadel of Quebec nearly one hundred years ago. Adding up these various items, they come to $427,000,000, and they do not include the forts in Toronto, Point Lévis, Halifax, Kingston, Montreal, St. John, and other places.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in his exhaustive speech the other evening, gave us some figures which I take the liberty of quoting, in order that I may be enabled to make as full an estimate as possible. The amount spent on the navy on the North American and North Pacific oceans for the years 1851 to 1861, was $21,000,000; 1861 to 1871, $27,000,000; 1871 to 1881, $19,000,000; 1881 to 1891, $19,000,000; 1891 to 1901, $23,000,000; a total of $109,000,000, or in round numbers, $110,000,000. These figures have, of course, no relation to the first charges for the training of those on board, and expenses of that nature.

As to our commerce, I may say that Canadian commerce runs to some 718,000 tons a year, amounting last year, if I remember rightly, to over $400,000,000. This magnificent commerce has been protected, without any expense to us, by the British navy. That commerce is scattered all over the world, and hon. gentlemen should pause and consider for a moment what its protection means. A fleet unit off Vancouver, or Victoria, and another off Halifax would be of little value for the protection of our commerce which sails in every sea. I am afraid that, as a mere matter of insurance alone, it would be found to have paid us better to have stayed with the old company and contributed our funds into its coffers. I might also say that when the troops were withdrawn from this country in 1872 they handed over to the Canadian authorities £79,891 worth of arms and subsequently £111,867 worth, of barracks, forts and other buildings, £698,880 worth, making £890,638 which they handed over at that time. Having said this much of what we owe to Great Britain and what she has done for us I would add a few words from the speech of the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. McLean) who, taking up the subject in much more eloquent language than I could possibly use, added another couple of items to the account.

3. When Canada needed roads, canals, and bridges in the early days, British money supplied them.

4. For half a century the Indians required yearly gifts of money, which was provided by Great Britain.

5. Our churches wanted vast sums for relief work, and British societies contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars during the nineteenth century.

6. If railways, such as the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk had to be constructed, Britain sent us the necessary money.

In recent years countless enterprises have been financed in London, until the present total is over one billion, five hundred millions. When we wanted the money to construct the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk, the Transcontinental or the Canadian Northern railways, we went to England. Do you think that this money could have been obtained by a small nation not under the British flag, and not having British power and stability to guarantee its position?

Having said so much as to what the British Empire has done for Canada, might I ask frankly what has Canada done for Great Britain?—and I think I would pause for an answer. I do not wish to-night, for I am anxious to make a most conciliatory speech because I feel the matter is of too tremendous importance for anyone to endeavour to make political capital out of it, but, speaking frankly, I think that the Government of the right hon. gentleman did not rise to the occasion as they should have done at the time of the South African war, when the right hon. gentleman gave the famous interview of the 3rd October, in which he said that the Government had not considered the sending of troops. I find no fault with them for that, I think the Government of Sir John Macdonald at an earlier date had erred in the same way. It is easy for us now to find fault with those who, in the old days, had their own troubles, in a rapidly growing country, by no means as prosperous as Canada is to-day, because they did not do as we would wish they had done. At the same time, while one regrets that something had not been done by this country one at least has this satisfaction that whatever might be the conduct of the country as a country at the various times when she was called upon, the Canadian as a Canadian rose to the occasion every time, the people were superior to their Government. Looking over the pages of history one's blood rather burns within him when he reads the account of the days when Napoléon gathered a mighty flotilla to invade England one hundred years ago. when the bravest heart quailed and no one knew at what hour a flotilla would come to the coast of Great Britain. We all know how a gallant band of ships under a certain commander first sent in their fire-ships among the enemy and dashed to the attack, routing the flotilla and that commander was Captain Owens, later Sir Cuneliffe Owens, a Nova Scotian. We cannot read the pages of history without being struck by the heroic defence of Kars. All writers agree that Kars was one of the most extraordinary defences in history, and the commander of the British forces there was Sir Fenwick Williams, a Canadian. When we look at the dark days of the Indian mutiny, there are very few gleams of light, but perhaps the brightest of all was the defence of Lucknow, for eighty long days—and the commander there was General Inglis, a Canadian. When we read the account of the dash at Balaclava, the charge of the Light Brigade, when > Cannon to right of them,

> Cannon to left of them,
> Cannon in front of them
> Volleyed and thundered;
> * * * *
> Then they rode back, but not—
> Not the six hundred

we are proud to remember that at the head of his troop rode Captain Dunn, a Toronto boy, later commander of the 100th Light Horse. And the day when Sebastapol was taken, the man who led the assault, and was the first in the Redan was Major Wellsford, a Canadian, and by his side fell Captain Parker, two more Canadians.

In these later days we have the satisfaction of knowing that Canadians have taken their part. When Stanley led his great expedition in search of Livingstone, his first lieutenant was Stairs of Halifax. We remember how proud we were at the genius of Sir Percy Girouard, as a distinguished engineer assisting the troops in Africa. And away to the northwest of India there is a small fort which holds control of that district, and it was built by Duff and Nanton, two Royal Military College graduates from Kingston. So on the pages of history, whatever Canada as a nation may have done, the individual Canadian has been willing to do his part. And we are most of all proud, irrespective of party, that to-day in the mother of parliaments we have Parker, and McMaster and Baker and Greenwood, without pretending to enumerate all, and we have at the head of one of the great parties there a man prepared to fight for what he believes to be true imperialism, the true binding together of the sister kingdoms, Bonar Law, a Canadian. So I think I am justified in saying that even if our government has not always risen to the occasion as should, the spirit of the Canadian has always risen above the spirit of the government. I happened the other day to come across a book in the library showing the subscriptions sent at the time of the Crimean war, thousands of pounds were sent, and apart altogether from the £20,000 sent by the Legislature of Canada and the £4,000 by the Legislature of New Brunswick and the £4,000 by the Legislature of Nova Scotia and the £2,000 by the Legislature of Prince Edward Island, when one reads letter after letter acknowledging £1,000 from Hamilton, £2,500 from Toronto, £500 from Kingston, £1,600 from Quebec, running along the list one could not but feel that after the war over there was a spirit in this country even in those early days which showed that the spirit of our ancestors was still alive in the people of Canada. If that has been the spirit of Canada and of Canadians in the past, now, in 1913, when the most momentous epoch in the history of the British Empire is at hand, for surely that must be the case when we find that the Motherland has withdrawn her ships from every sea, practically, and is expending one hundred million dollars more than a few years ago, when we find all her ships massed in one little place on the northeast coast of England, that should be enough to satisfy us that there must be something, call it an emergency, a crisis, a peril, a need or what you will; then if any one of us were perfectly certain in his own mind that this, that or the other was the best remedy for this direful state of affairs, when the Admiralty has said: What we would like most, what is best in the interests of the Empire both morally and materially is to give us a few dreadnoughts, what man would dare take the responsibility of saying to the Admiralty: You are wrong and I am right. It would seem to me that if my own feeelings were entirely in favour of a Canadian unit, if I were satisfied in my own mind that was the wisest and most proper course, I would still feel that I would be afraid before my King and my God to take the responsibility when the Admiralty authorities had asked for something else, of insisting on having my way, which way might mean the destruction of this Empire. I quite agree that the views of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition are based on the same principles as those of my right hon. friend who leads the Government and that he desires to do what is proper in a spirit of loyalty and devotion to the Empire. I would appeal to him to reconsider the amendment that he laid before the House when this question first arose before the House. If the right hon. gentleman would calmly read over that amendment he would come to the conclusion that this is a proper time to reconsider the position that he has taken. Let me point out why. I only refer to the amendment because I assume that hon. gentlemen, when they voted for it a short time ago, were actuated by the same feelings and spirit of loyalty and devotion to the Empire and, therefore, upon that assumption I would direct the attention of my right hon. friend to something that I am sure he overlooked in his own amendment. His amendment gave certain alleged facts and from these alleged facts a presumably logical conclusion is drawn. Let us see what the alleged facts are and let us see whether or not, as a matter of fact, on the face of the amendment itself, they are really facts or amusing fictions. I read as follows:

The memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the general naval question of the Empire and communicated to this House by the right hon. the Prime Minister on December 5th shows that several of the most important of the foreign powers have adopted a definite policy of rapidly increasing their naval strength.

Perfectly true.

That this condition has compelled the United Kingdom to concentrate its naval forces in home waters involving the withdrawal of ships from the outlying portions of the Empire.

That is to say that because Germany, Italy and Austria are building dreadnoughts, therefore Great Britain is going to get her dreadnoughts out of the way of Italy and Austria by concentrating them on the German ocean. I think that the right hon. gentleman will admit that Great Britain is not concentrating her ships on the German ocean because Austria or Italy is building dreadnoughts and therefore, when he came to draw up this amendment, he lost sight of the fact that when Great Britain withdrew her ships from the Mediterranean they were not withdrawn because Austria and Italy were building ships. They were withdrawn simply and solely because Germany was building ships. This amendment goes on:

That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without further delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence.

I would like to point out that, if the present state of affairs between Great Britain and Germany were to continue forever, we would be wise to enter upon a policy of permanent naval defence, but let us hope and trust that the day may not be far distant when this tension between these two nations will be relieved in some way. Then will be the time for us to decide upon a naval policy. The wisest man in the world is unable to decide to-day as to what this naval policy should be simply because no man can tell what the outcome of this tension will be. If Canada and all the overseas dominions rally to the side of the Motherland and contribute money enough to ensure her supremacy there is no doubt what the result will be and then we can make our arrangements on that basis. It we, by dividing our efforts, should allow Great Britain, some unhappy day, to be overcome by the German fleet it is quite possible that we will not be interested in this question of a navy in Canada for some time to come.

Suppose we had our unit equipped and manned on the Atlantic ocean, against whom would we have it? Let us calmly and quietly consider this question. Supposing we had this dreadnought, cruisers, submarines, against whom will they protect us? Not against the United States, because one dreadnought could not protect us against the naval strength of the United States. Against Germany? One dreadnought could not protect us against Germany if her fleet should happen to smash the British fleet and cross the Atlantic. Then, on the Pacific, against whom would we be protected? To send one dreadnought against the Japanese navy on the Pacific would be wicked. Would it not be far easier for us to so uphold the hands of the Motherland that other nations would love to be in alliance with her and would fear to be her foes? Surely we would have the same defence from her in the future that we have had in the past.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House; I have spoken at greater length than I had intended. May I not finish by making a suggestion also in perfectly good faith and not with any desire to obtain a political advantage? We all agree that the circumstances are extraordinary and therefore can we not go further and agree to this? The Government has asked for $35,000,000 for three dreadnoughts which are to be handed over to the Imperial authorities on such terms as may be agreed upon and which it is understood will be given back to Canada upon due notice being given at any time hereafter when they are wanted. Hon. gentlemen opposite, as I said before, have shown that they are not governed by niggardliness, that they are not miserly because they have told us that they are willing that we should go as high as $45,000,000. All credit to hon. gentlemen opposite for being willing to expend that much money. Can we not agree upon this? Let the Government come up and say: We will give three dreadnoughts, and we will do what we can to have them manned by Canadians. We will be only too glad if we can get Canadians to man them but until we do get Canadians we will pay for the men who take their places. That will meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite because they wish to pay Canadians to man the ships. Everybody wants a permanent policy; there is no doubt about that and the only difference is as to the propriety of the time at which this permanent policy should be inaugurated. Could we not establish a temporary policy that would meet the views of the Admiralty? If we establish this as a policy we could place these three dreadnoughts at the service of Great Britain. We hope that more will not be required, that within a short time this tension will have passed away and that Great Britain and Germany will be the best friends in the world. But if this tension does not pass away and it is found that a few years later the same necessity exists as exists to-day we here and now give notice to the world that Canada is in this fight to the finish. We have more resources than any other country; a kind heaven and a good mother have given us this country with the greatest natural resources in the world. With the response which our example would call forth from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa there is not the slightest doubt that these other overseas dominions would be only too glad to follow in our wake. We hope that three dreadnoughts will be sufficient for all practical purposes. In the meantime we give $35,000,000 in dreadnoughts which we loan to the Old Country, we serve notice on the world that we are in this fight to stay and if this tension is not removed we stand ready to supply three dreadnoughts or ten dreadnoughts or whatever number may be necessary. If the two sides could possibly agree there would be no possibility of any kudos to one side or the other and no cause for casting any reflection upon either side and we would be presenting the most beautiful spectacle to the world of the Parliament of this Dominion setting an example of perfect unanimity by complying with the wishes of the Admiralty and by giving every moral as well as material assistance that it is within our power to give. Then, I believe that, instead of any questions being raised between parties as to the motives with which an air, is sung in this House we could, after unanimously passing a Bill which would prove to the world that at last Canada the greatest of the overseas dominions, had taken its proper place by the side of the Motherland, determined to keep the old flag in the future as in the past, supreme on the seas, we could raise the rafters of this Chamber as we rose and unitedly sang 'The Maple Leaf Forever,' followed by 'God Save the King.'

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, it has been a source of amusement to me during the whole course of the discussion in connection with these navy problems to see with what energy, determination and eloquence hon. gentlemen opposite have struggled, in season and out of season, to establish that England was in great danger, that it was a broken-down country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GERMAN: Yes, that it was practically a broken down country, a poor country, unable to take care of herself. Why, what did the hon. gentleman who has just sat down say? That there were more poor people in England than anywhere else, people borne down by the weight of taxation, that there was no wealth in Great Britain.

Mr. NORTHRUP: Pardon me. I do not say that there was no wealth in Great Britain.

Mr. GERMAN: If the hon. gentleman did not put it exactly in these words, that was the meaning of it. He said that Greenland would perhaps be called a rich country if Rockefeller and Pierpont Morgan and a few other wealthy Americans should go up there and settle. Why, Sir, England last year exported £385,219,000 worth of manufactured goods, and still, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, England is ready for the poorhouse. They put up men of straw in order to knock them down. My hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, and he spoke for an hour and a half, did not utter one word in defence of the Government's proposition. He did not utter one word against the amendment of my hon. friend from Assiniboia. He did not attempt to adduce an argument as to why the amendment of the hon. member for Assinibcia should not be passed. He did say that England was in great need. He referred to a speech made by Mr. Winston Churchill in introducing the navy estimates on March 18 1912, and he read a part of the speech of Mr. Winston Churchill to show that England was in great danger.

We have faced combinations over and over again in the past, and sometimes heavy odds, but we must never conduct our affairs so that the navy of any single power would be able to engage us at any single moment, even our least favourable moment—with any reasonable prospects of success. If this is 'insular arrogance', it is also the first condition of our existence!

This was read by my hon. friend with a view to showing that England was in straightened circumstances, that there was very grave fears of her ability to maintain her naval supremacy. Why did the hon. gentleman not continue to read from Mr. Winston Churchill's speech? I cited the same speech in the remarks I made to the House before the holidays. This is what Mr. Churchill says in addition:

I am glad to be able to assure the House that no difficulty will be experienced in making arrangements to maintain our relative position in the near future, and to secure as quickly as we need them adequate margins of safety. I am glad also that these measures will not involve any excessive disproportionate expense. We should not of course require to build any more ships other than those I have referred to under the head of 'New Construction.' All we should need to do is to bring up, as we require it, and no sooner, a large portion of our existing fleet into a higher status of commission, and consequently of greater readiness.

Does that mean that England is in danger? She has more ships at this moment than she can man except by men of the naval reserve who are not now in active service. If my hon. friend would read Mr. Winston Churchill's speech, and I would commend it to him in order that he might read it from beginning to end, he will find that there is not a line from first to last but what proves conclusively, not only that England is in no danger, but that she is in the highest condition of readiness for defence against all nations that may possibly attack her. It is absurd for hon. gentlemen to make such statements.

Now he also says that on this side of the House we have stated that Canada owes nothing to England. I venture to say that he cannot point to one such utterance of any member on this side of the House. It has never been uttered on this side of the House, and there has never been a Liberal member from one end of Canada to the other who declared that upon his responsibility as a member. We admit, and hon. gentlemen opposite admit that Canada does owe something to England, and we are prepared to pay our obligation by building a Canadian navy able to take care of her own shores. Those gentlemen try to assume a certain superabundant amount of loyalty, but it is more in talk than in actions. He says, 'get together' in the very pleasant manner which he always exhibits. He says 'why cannot the two parties get together and come to a settlement'? Why Mr. Speaker, three years ago we were together.

Three years ago the welkin rang with cheers for Canada and The Maple Leaf Forever? Every man sitting in this House agreed one with the other as to what the naval policy of Canada should be. We were all together. Why did the hon. gentlemen not stay with us? Why did they desert the ship? Why did they break their pledges? And now the hon. gentleman gets up in this House, forsooth, to try to show to the people of Canada that he above all others has superabundant loyalty, and he says 'oh, gentlemen, get together'. Stay with us, I say to the hon. gentleman, you were with us at one time; come back to the allegiance you swore three years ago and we will have a navy to satisfy the people of Canada.

Mr. NORTHRUP: I was not present in the House, on that famous 29th of March, and subsequently on the floor of the House I repudiated any responsibility for an agreement made in connection with a proposal which it was stated by the mover was quite apart from party politics.

Mr. GERMAN: I presume the hon. gentleman would now say that he was absolutely opposed to the 1909 resolution.

Mr. NORTHRUP: Most certainly I was.

Mr. GERMAN: He was the only Conservative in Canada who was.

Mr. NORTHRUP: I would like some proof of that.

An Hon. MEMBER: Mr. Bourassa.

Mr. GERMAN: Mr. Bourassa was a sort of mugwump I think. The hon. gentleman has mentioned the names of several gallant Canadians who have filled high positions in the army of Great Britain, and high positions as statesmen in Great Britain. It seems to me, Sir, that the hon. gentleman's statement is a complete answer to those hon. gentlemen who say that we cannot produce men to manage, man, and operate dreadnoughts. But so far as hon. gentlemen have said anything, that has been the burden of their song. They have tried to convince everyone that Great Britain was in a dangerous condition, and that she neeeded assistance from Canada.

I am glad that the silence on the opposite side has been broken to some exent, because we had a reign of silence on that side for several weeks in regard to this question. I presume that hon. gentlemen opposite find that it is necessary for them to say something in regard to it. Before this matter is finished, they will find that this amendment and the arguments which can be adduced and will be adduced in support of it, will take a lot of answering not only in this House but throughout the country. I do not intend to go into the question of naval supremacy in Great Britain nor into the question of the construction of a Canadian navy. We have an amendment before the House which to my mind is as important as any amendment which has come before Parliament for many years, and that is: Shall the constitution of Canada as embodied in the British North America Act be adhered to and carried out, and shall the constitutional principle which is in existence now and is the guiding star of English statesmen be adopted in Canada, that no new legislation, which is not before the people, shall be adopted by Parliament until the people have had an opportunity of expressing their views upon it. That is what this amendment means. In the first place, it declares that there shall be a redistribution. We all know that representation by population is the keystone of our Canadian confederation. For that George Brown and his followers struggled before Confederation for twenty years or more. Mr. Brown joined Sir John A. Macdonald in a coalition Government. In no other way could that reform be accomplished; but so strong was he in the belief that representation by population was the only course to adopt that he joined Sir John A. Macdonald with a view to bringing it about, and it was accomplished. Confederation was based on certain resolutions called the Quebec Resolutions; on those resolutions the British North America Act was founded, and those resolutions must be looked to in interpreting the Act. Section 17 of those resolutions says:

> The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population as determined by the official census every ten years.

The British North America Act does not contain the words 'representation by population'; but sections 51 and 52, which are the sections referring to this matter, certainly mean that; and no lawyer would dispute that they do mean that and that they are just as clear an expression of the principle as the resolutions are although not expressed in the same language. There is no doubt that the true constitutional principle in Canada is that we should have representation by population, each province to have a representation in proportion to its population as the number sixty-five has to the population of the province of Quebec, that province being made the pivotal province in that particular. What is the position in Canada regarding representation in the provinces to-day? My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) referred to it shortly. At present we have in the province of Ontario eight-six representatives; according to its population to-day Ontario is entitled to only eighty-two representatives; Nova Scotia has eighteen representatives and is entitled to only sixteen; New Brunswick has thirteen representatives and is entitled to only eleven; Prince Edward Island has four representatives and is entitled to only three; Manitoba has ten representatives and is entitled to fifteen; British Columbia has seven and is entitled to thirteen; Alberta has seven and is entitled to twelve; Saskatchewan has ten and is entitled to sixteen. Therefore we find that the West is under-represented by twenty-two, and the East is over-represented by nine. My hon. friend from Assiniboia said that the West was entitled to fifty-nine members; my figures, which are taken from Mr. Ewart's kingdom papers, give the representation from the West as fifty-seven. If it should be fifty-nine, then the West is entitled to two more than I have stated. What do we find? It is this, that the vote of a voter in Ontario or in the maritime provinces has more weight in this House than the vote of a voter in the western provinces. That surely is contrary to the principle of representation by population, on which principle confederation was founded, and on which principle alone can confederation in the future be maintained. It was known by the fathers of Confederation that there would be continual and rapid increases in our population, and they provided the means for readjusting the constituencies. Representation was to be by population according to the provision of section 7 of the resolutions. No one will deny that there should be a redistribution, which our constitution provides for. The census has been taken, everything is ripe and ready for a redistribution; when should that redistribution take place? Section 19 of the resolutions says:

> Immediately after the completion of the census of 1871, and immediately after every decennial census thereafter, the representation from each section in the House of Commons shall be readjusted on the basis of population.

That says 'immediately after each decennial census.' On those resolutions the British North America Act was founded, and passed the Imperial Parliament. It is clear that not only the wording of the resolution but the intention of the Act is that there should be immediately after each decennial census a redistribution. 'Immediately' in law means within such time as is reasonably required for doing the work. That is settled by authorities during the last two hundred and forty years. The word 'immediately' is not used in section 51 of the British North America Act. The Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), I think, said 'hear, hear.' Does he say, or will anyone say that this was an omission meant to alter the meaning of the resolution? The British Parliament could not have had, and did not have, any reason to wish on such a point to vary the agreement the delegates had reached. And the section in fact carries out fully instead of in any way seeking to vary the intention expressed in the resolution on which it was founded. The section says 'on completion.' It does not say 'immediately.' I venture to say that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) will not stand in this House and declare that the leaving out from this section of the word 'immediately' in any way varies or alters the meaning of the resolution because it was on that resolution, that the Act was founded. Why should the British Parliament, before whom the resolutions went on which the confederation of Canada was founded, seek for a moment to alter those resolutions? It cannot be considered for a moment. The Act says 'on the completion of each decennial census' redistribution shall be made. Surely that does not mean after one year or after two or more years. It means that it shall be done with no greater delay than is reasonably requisite for doing the work—not when it is convenient to do it, not when political party exigencies would suggest doing it, but 'on the completion of the census.' That is the meaning of the Act, and now is the time when the redistribution should take place. Sir, that that is the meaning as understood by previous governments the making of redistribution in the past is sufficient evidence. There was a census in 1871, and a redistribution in 1872; a census in 1881, and a redistribution in 1882; a census in 1891, and a redistribution in 1892; a census in 1901, and a redistribution in 1903. Now, the Postmaster General immediately grasped at that, and I know what hon. gentlemen opposite have been saying as to that, and as to what the Prime Minister stated as to it long ago, condemning the late Government for not having the last redistribution immediately after the census. They should have looked at the records, they should look at reports. Let the hon. gentleman look at the record, let him go to the Census Bureau, and he will find that the census of 1901 was not prepared and printed, so that the Redistribution Bill could be prepared, until December 1902; and then the Redistribution Act was immediately brought in. But what do we find existing now? The census of 1911 was completed and printed in June of last year. There has been ample time, therefore for this Government to prepare and bring down the Redistribution Bill. Why have they not done it? The reason is not hard to see. When we find the Prime Minister of Canada proposing to increase the representation of the provinces in the Senate which is a Liberal body of this Parliament so far as politics go, when we find him suggesting that he should increase representation in the Senate and not at the same time readjusting the representation in this House, what are we to think? We have had gerrymanders in this country before. That is what it means again. It means that they would increase the representation in the Senate until they secure a majority in that body and then they would bring down the Redistribution Bill in the House of Commons and gerrymander the Liberals out of existence. Hon. gentlemen opposite smile. Does not it look like it? I leave it to the House and to the country. What else can it be? The Prime Minister knows that the Senate as at present constituted has a majority of Liberals; he knows that he has a majority in this House, and he hopes to retain it. He thinks that if he can recast the representation of the provinces in the Senate and give himself a majority in the Senate, he can bring in a Bill and redistribute the constituencies of this country at his own sweet will with the help of his henchmen behind him.

The life of this Parliament has yet three years to run—until 1916. If redistribution is not made now, it could not be effective until the session of 1917. Surely that is not the intention of the British North America Act. Sir, many large questions may arise between now and then. As my hon. friend from Assiniboia said, a new election might be held between now and then. As our representation is based only and solely upon population, and as the British North America Act provided that there should be an immediate redistribution of constituencies after the completion of the census, we are brought to the question of an appeal to the people. It is clear that there must be a redistribution if we are to carry out and not to entirely ignore the provisions of the British North America Act. There must also be an election if we are going to act in conformity with all modern authority.

Mr. BLAIN: How late after taking the last census was the last Redistribution Bill introduced into this House?

Mr. GERMAN: I presume that my hon. friend was not in the House when I referred to this very matter. Possibly he will feel like stepping out again when I have told him.

Mr. BLAIN: I was not out of the House, I merely failed to notice it. The hon. gentleman need not mention it; I will read it in 'Hansard.'

Mr. GERMAN: The census was taken in 1901 and was completed and printed, as the hon. gentleman will find if he will inquire at the Census Bureau, in December, 1902, so there could not have been a redistribution of constituencies until 1903.

Mr. BLAIN: When was redistribution?

Mr. GERMAN.

Mr. GERMAN: In 1903, immediately after the completion of the decennial census of 1901. Mr. Anson, who was an authority on constitutional practice, in his 'Laws and Customs of the Constitution,' says this:

> When any large change is made in electoral conditions, it is proper that those new conditions should be put to the test and the newly enfranchised enjoy their new rights at the earliest opportunity. As soon, therefore, as the machinery is perfected, a dissolution takes place.

This is taken from volume I of Anson's 'Parliamentary Government,' the author of which is one of the foremost constitutional writers in the land. Can it be for a moment denied that there has been a large change, at least comparatively, in electoral conditions? No one can deny that, when according to the present census returns, Ontario and the maritime provinces lose nine representatives and the western provinces gain twenty-two, a change of thirty-one. If the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) was correct, there would be a change of thirty-three. Some hon. gentlemen may say that is not a large change, but apply it practically, and particularly to the vote of last Thursday night on the adoption of the resolution which is the basis of this Bill, and what do we find? The Bill was carried by thirty-two, and it may be said that a proper redistribution would not or might not have changed the result. That is not the point; the point is that there would be a condition of misrepresentation—over-representation in the East and under-representation in the West—sufficient to have defeated the resolution and to have defeated this Bill! In other words, the people are wrongly represented to such an extent that this Bill and the resolution on which it is founded might have been defeated if the representation had been in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act. If there were no other reasons, I say that that by itself is sufficient to compel this Government to go to the country.

But there are other and cogent reasons why the electors should be consulted It is true, there is authority that there is no constitutional practice which requires that there should be an appeal to the country previous to legislation upon great public questions, but adherence to that principle is not in accordance with the genius of modern British constitutional usage. I am not a believer in the practice of the referendum, so-called, as at present developed, but I do assert that when a Government proposes a fundamental change in our relations with the Mother Country and the rest of the Empire, such change ought not to become law without previous submission to the electorate, and more particularly when Parliament, within three years previously, unanimously declared in favour of a proposition exactly the opposite. I use the words 'fundamental change in our relations with the Mother Country' advisedly as those are the words used by the present Minister of Justice in speaking upon the Naval Bill as introduced into this Parliament in 1910, and it was on those words that he based his argument that the then Government should appeal to the country before the Act became law. How can hon. gentlemen opposite get away from that position now? If they are making the change—and they are making a change—then why not carry out their own suggestion of appealing to the country and of obtaining the opinion of the people on that question? It has been asked; 'Why did not the late Government submit their naval proposition to the people? I may say that the situation is now entirely different from existing conditions then, and I believe that any one who views the matter with an impartial mind will admit that. Let us review shortly what was the then situation. The member for North Toronto, now Minister of Trade and Commerce, introduced a resolution, supported by a long, eloquent and forcible speech, declaring that Canada should take her share and accept her position in naval matters. The then leader of the Government, the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, moved in amendment:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada as they increase in numbers and wealth to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House reaffirms the opinion repeatedly expressed by representatives of Canada that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of any stated contribution to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be a satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House has observed with satisfaction the relief afforded in recent years to the taxpayers of the United Kingdom through the assumption by the Canadian people of considerable military expenditure formerly charged upon the Imperial treasury.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire, and the peace of the world.

The present Prime Minister spoke on that amendment. Did he suggest a reference to the people? There is not a word of this in his speech from the beginning to the end. He did suggest, however, that the word 'speedy' should be inserted in the resolution and that one clause of the resolution should be struck out. Following him, the then Prime Minister said:

The suggestions which have been made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition are such as can be accepted by this side of the House and I have no objection to adding the words, so that the resolution will read as follows:

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service.

This was so changed at the suggestion of the present Prime Minister, and the resolution was unanimously passed by the House, without any suggestion that there should be a reference to the people. That being accepted, what happened? Armed with that authority, backed as it was by the unanimous approval of Parliament, and with no protest from the country—not even from Mr. Bourassa—ministers of the Government went to England to attend the Imperial conference. The ministers had no authority to discuss, much less to agree to a policy of contribution or to the payment of money. That resolution expressed the settled and permanent naval policy of Canada as much as if it had been embodied in an Act of Parliament and placed on the statute-book. That was the unanimous decision of Parliament come to after no little consideration that a Canadian navy should be constructed, that ministers should go to England to consult the Admiralty and on their advice and on suggestions from them an Act was to be prepared and submitted to Parliament. If before that resolution was passed hon. gentlemen opposite had suggested that the then Government should go to the country there would be some sort of apparent sincerity in their contention now. But not a word, we never heard prior to the passing of that resolution, that the then Government should go to the country, every one was unanimously in favour of the resolution. When the ministers reached England what happened? They had a conference with the Admiralty and the Admiralty report shows what took place. The memorandum of the Admiralty at that time suggested what New Zealand had offered, what Australia had offered, and it cites the resolution passed by the House of Commons. It says:

On the 29th of March the Canadian House of Commons passed a resolution recognizing the duty of Canada, as the country increased in numbers and wealth, to assume in a larger measure the responsibilities of national defence and approving of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in cooperation with, and in close relation to, the Imperial navy.

If the problem of Imperial naval defence were considered merely as a problem of naval strategy it would be found that the greatest output of strength for a given expenditure is obtained by the maintenance of a single navy with the concomitant unity of training and unity of command.

There was talk of contribution then. What would have happened if the Government, if the ministers who at that time went to the Imperial Conference had entered into an arrangement with the British Admiralty to give a contribution such as is proposed to be given by the Government to-day? Supposing that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had agreed at that time to the Admiralty proposal that there should be a contribution from Canada instead of the arrangement that was made and had come back here and submitted to Parliament that proposition in the form of a Bill as is being done by this present Government, what would you have heard? You would have heard nothing from these gentlemen about England's decrepitude, nothing about England needing the assistance of Canada to build warships. Why you would have heard just the reverse, you would have had these gentlemen waving the British flag from one end of Canada to the other and saying: Send dreadnoughts to England? Let us build up Canada; England needs no help from us; England can take care of herself, and whip all the rest of the world combined. If the late Government had agreed to that proposition that is what the party now in power would have said. But, Sir, the ministers then were bound by the resolution which had passed this House, they could not go beyond that, they would have been violating their duty if they had gone beyond it. That resolution declared for a Canadian navy and that is what they went to England to arrange and organize. Now, Sir, what next happened? Section four of the memorandum of the Admiralty says:

The main duty of the forthcoming conference as regards naval defence will be, therefore, to determine the form in which the various dominion governments can best participate in the burthen of Imperial defence with due regard to varying political and geographical conditions. Looking to the difficulties involved, it is not to be expected that the discussions with the several defence ministers will result in a complete and final schemes of naval defence.

What did that all result in? It resulted in this:

It was represented on the part of the Admiralty that it would be difficult to make any suggestions, or to formulate any plans, without knowing approximately the sum of money which Canada would spend. The Canadian representatives then suggested that two plans might be presented:—one incurring an annual expenditure of £400,000, and the other an expenditure of £600,000, omitting in both cases the cost of the present fishery service and hydrographic surveys, but including the maintenance of Halifax and Esquimalt dock-yards, and the wireless telegraph service, estimated at some £50,000 a year.

And then the Admiralty stated what sort of ships should be constructed. We had all this done in the summer of 1909. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Mr. Borden) was in England that summer. He came from England that fall. The results of the conference were shortly afterwards made known. The summary of the results of the meeting is dated 19th of August, 1909. The memorandum of the Admiralty is dated 20th July, 1909. Shortly after the 19th of August it was generally known what the arrangement to which the Canadian ministers had come was. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government was in England that summer. He came back from England and knowing what had been done by the Government in regard to the Naval Service of Canada he went to Halifax on the 15th of October and made a speech which the Halifax Herald says was a non-partisan speech, in which he applauded and vociferously applauded and lauded as well the proposition of the Government. In his speech in Halifax, and I took the time to read it yesterday, and a very excellent speech it was, there is not one word from beginning to end that the Government before proposing to Parliament a navy Act should submit the proposition to the people. On the 15th October, 1909, he was strongly in favour of the resolution which passed this House in March 1909, and which he assisted in passing. What was the situation? Did anyone at that time say that the Government should go to the country? The then Opposition did not suggest it, the leader of the Opposition, now leader of the Government, did not suggest it—no one suggested it. But when the Bill was introduced into Parliament by the right hon. the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on the 10th January, 1910, then, for the first time we heard: We must go to the country. All summer from March until the 31st of December not a word from a living man excepting the sounds that came from the province of Quebec, from Bourassa and his adherents, not a word from any man of standing in the Dominion of Canada, not from the Conservatives, the right hon. gentleman, in Halifax on October 15, strongly declaring in favour of that proposition. Then, on the 10th of January, when the Bill is introduced in Parliament, we hear for the first time that there should be a reference to the people. Why? Bourassa then stepped to the front of the stage; he took command of these hon. gentlemen; from that time to this they have been in his power, and they will stay in his power until they are driven out of office. What was the reason for this change? Has the right hon. leader of the Government ever suggested why he made the change? Why did he change his attitude of the 15th of October? What was the reason? From being enthusiastically in favour of the Canadian Naval Service in October, why did he change on the 10th of January and say you must submit this to the country?

Mr. EMMERSON: The Drummond and Arthabaska election had taken place.

Mr. GERMAN: I do not think the Drummond and Arthabaska election had taken place until the following summer. But we had the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, (Mr. Monk) in Parliament. He was a follower of Bourassa or Bourassa was a follower of his. I do not know what influence the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) was exercising, but no doubt he was exercising considerable influence; that element was beginning to appear on the political stage, the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government dropped into its hands and he has been in its hands ever since. I am justified in making that statement by reason of the course of events. They ask: Why did you not go to the country? Why should the Government have gone to the country with that proposition? It had been unanimously accepted by Parliament and throughout the country. There had been no word of protest except from Bourassa and his associates. The First Minister had approved of it in October. If the then Government had accepted their proposition and gone to the country ministerial and executive responsibility would have been reduced to a farce. They were responsible to the people. They had been led to believe, and Parliament had a right to believe, that the whole country was unanimously in favour of this policy. They brought a Bill into Parliament based on that resolution; not a line changed, not a word in the Bill that in any way conflicted with the terms of the resolution. They brought in their Bill and then, forsooth, we heard these gentlemen declare: You must go to the country. Supposing the Government had gone to the country? Why, Sir, these gentlemen might have changed their minds. If Bourassa had commanded them they would very probably would have made another switch, gone off at a tangent and condemned the Government for some other reason. The Government did not go to the country and there was no reason why they should. The time to have submitted that proposition was before the resolution had been carried by this House. After that the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite were closed so far as referring the matter to the country was concerned. They had pledged themselves to the proposition. All summer they were pledged to the proposition and they were not then justified in saying: You must go to the country. Now we have a new Government and we have a new proposition.

Mr. PELLETIER: And a new Opposition.

Mr. GERMAN: A new Opposition and a strong Opposition, an Opposition that is consistent, an Opposition that will not agree to one thing to-day and do something else to-morrow, an Opposition that, when it agrees to something in this House will stand by it and will not be carried away by Bourassa or any one else. We have a new proposition and we now say that this new proposition, before becoming law, be submitted to the judgment of the people as stated by Lord Lansdowne, to see whether they approve or disapprove of it. We have a large new electorate in this country. These people should be allowed to express their views in regard to this proposition.

What are the new conditions? Parliament unanimously authorized the former Government to make an arrangement and this Government now present the new Bill. Who authorized the right hon. leader of the Government to make the arrangement that he has submitted to Parliament?—not this Parliament, not the former Parliament, not the people of Canada and not even Mr. Bourassa. Who authorized him? He did it off his own bat, absolutely alone, and unauthorized by Parliament. When he made his somersault in the winter of 1909-10 he said something about this question of contribution to the British Government, but no one had authorized him to make any such proposal. Instead of this resolution having the unanimous approval of Parliament, as the resolution of 1909 had, it is opposed and strongly opposed by nearly one-half of this Parliament and it is opposed and strongly opposed by more than half of the people of the country. If the hon. gentleman feels so confident of his position and if he thinks that the people approve of this proposition, let him dissolve Parliament and go to the country. The right hon. gentleman said, the other night, that the people had had a chance of expressing their opinion on this proposition at the last general election. Surely he does not think that any man with intelligence enough to remain out of an insane asylum will accept that statement. Reciprocity was the sole and only issue in the last election outside of the province of Quebec, and within the province of Quebec, where the Naval Act was something of an issue, the proposition of the hon. gentleman was defeated and the present Naval Act was carried by a considerable majority. This is a new question in so far as the electors are concerned and a new question of vital importance—of vital importance not so much by reason of the amount of money involved as by reason of the possible and, I think, more than probable, future consequences. What did we find? We found that Mr. Bonar Law, who could have got his impression only from conversations which he had had with the right hon. the leader of the Government last summer in England, said on the 17th of December last, and this was referred to by me in the few remarks that I made to the House in December:

If the whole Empire is ever to become in reality as well as in name, a united empire and a united nation, it can do so in one way only, by the establishment of a real federal system by the United Kingdom and our colonies, in proportion to their population, contributing to the defence of the Empire, and sharing in the glory of governing the Empire.

That is the impression he got, and he could only have got that impression from the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government when he was in England last summer. He knew then what his proposal was, a contribution to naval defence, and he made that speech last December in which he said that if we ever have a real British Empire and a United Kingdom it can only be by the colonies, in proportion to their population, contributing to the defence of the Empire. What does that mean but a policy of continual contributions? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman's own supporters say that; they have said it on different occasions. I have heard them say it outside of this House, and I have heard them say it inside of this House. Well, Sir, if this is to be the result of this proposition, or if it is likely to lead to a result of that kind, then I say it is of vital importance. And if it is, let us see what another eminent authority has to say on the question. Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell in 'The Government of England' says:

Another sign of the times is found in the doctrine, now sanctioned by the highest authority, that Parliament cannot legislate on a new question of vital importance without a mandate from the nation.

Now, I have said that there is authority in Todd and May that Parliament may legislate, and has legislated in past times on questions of vital importance which had not been submitted to the people. But Sir, that is an effete doctrine. The genius of our modern constitutional practice is, that when a question of vital importance comes up, a government should not enact legislation embodying such a principle and place it on the statute book until they have submitted it to the people for their approval.

Mr. CROTHERS: When did the people of Canada express approval of the Naval Bill of 1910?

Mr. GERMAN.

Mr. BOYCE: When was that submitted?

Mr. GERMAN: That was not submitted to the people of Canada at an election, and they did not express their approval or disapproval.

Mr. CROTHERS. What about the doctrine you have just been reading?

Mr. GERMAN: The principle involved in that Bill was unanimously accepted by the Parliament of Canada, by the representatives of the people of Canada, without one word being uttered by hon. gentlemen opposite in favour of it being submitted to the people. If hon. gentlemen are true to their principles, why did they not then, before the resolution passed say, 'You must submit that to the people for their approval?' If they had done that, they would have shown some consistency, but they said nothing about it, as I have already stated, until Mr. Bourassa appeared on the scene and took command of the ship. How can these gentlemen square themselves with their past actions? What was the issue in Parliament on the reciprocity question? Was it not one of the strong contentions that the Government at that time had no mandate from the people? I urged that as one reason why I was opposed to the reciprocity proposition. I said to the Government then in power, 'the people have not had an opportunity of expressing their views on this matter. At one time thirty years ago, the whole of the people of Canada were in favour of reciprocity but times and conditions have changed, and the people of Canada are not to-day as they were thirty years ago, and the question should be submitted to the people.' Hon. gentlemen opposite said the same thing; it was the burden of their song. They applauded me in my remarks, and they applauded each other in their remarks when they said that there was no mandate from the people to enact reciprocity, and that the Government should go to the country. They said the same thing when the Navy Act was before Parliament. The hon. Minister of Justice, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the right hon. the leader of the Government, the hon. Minister of Labour, every minister of the Crown who spoke, and every one of their followers who spoke declared emphatically that the Government must go to the country on the naval proposition of 1910, and they voted that way. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour agrees to that proposition. Then I say to him, be consistent and go to the country now.

Mr. CROTHERS: We went to the country on 21st September, 1911.

Mr. TURRIFF: Not on the navy question?

Mr. GERMAN: The Government then were told by Conservatives that they had no mandate from the people to enact reciprocity legislation. The Government accepted the challenge, and went to the country. Let hon. gentlemen opposite be equally brave. They said to the then Government: go to the country not only on reciprocity but on the navy problem. Let them now follow out their own line of discussion, and go and do likewise.

Now Sir, how can they square themselves? Have they any respect for fixed principles? Have they any idea of consistency? Have they any regard for reasonable uniformity in public action? One is bound to think not, unless they adopt the course which they themselves declared to be the proper course, have a redistribution, and appeal to the country on this issue. The Bill is not going to die. We are not endeavouring to kill their Bill. Three or four months would see an election over after a redistribution Bill had been passed. It will take three or four years to build three dreadnoughts and to equip them. Sir, I say that there is a greater emergency in settling this question by the people of Canada than there is in giving three dreadnoughts that much sooner or later to the British Empire. If they want more authority, every text-book writer declares not only that when there is a change in the conditions in regard to representation, that when there is a large increase in voters, Parliament should immediately appeal to that new electorate. There is positive authority for the view that when a new question of vital importance comes up in Parliament, a Government should not enact legislation in reference to it, without first submitting it to the electorate. Let me see what other gentlemen say in regard to matters of this kind. What did Mr. Balfour, the leader of the Conservatives in England say? He said this:

> Mr. Balfour while repudiating the suggestion that the existing Parliament having been elected on the single issue of the South African war——

That was the Parliament elected to support Mr. Balfour's Government.

> —ought to be dissolved when peace was made, refused to grant time for a debate on free food on the ground that it would be constitutionally improper for Parliament to act on the question until it had been submitted to the people at a general election, and that it would be unwise for the House to discuss a subject on which it could not act.

Do hon. gentlemen want a higher authority than Mr. Balfour, who is the leading Conservative in the British House of Commons? I find in May's 'Constitutional History,' in speaking of Sir Robert Peel's action in regard to Corn Laws, he uses this significant expression:

> Sir Robert Peel was accused of betraying his party on the Corn Laws, but there was no emphatic demand as there would have been in later times that he should dissolve Parliament and obtain a mandate from the country before proceeding to action.

All constitutional law is of gradual growth. The positive actions of conscientious leading statesmen reflect very accurately public opinion and show what is or what ought to be constitutional practice. Mr. Balfour, speaking on the Finance Bill in the British House of Commons in 1910, after that Bill had been rejected by the House of Lords, in volume 15, English Hansard of 1910, at page 1187, said:

> We are not doing our duty by the constitution which we have inherited if we leave it to the power of the majority of this House without the deliberate assent of the people to these changes to carry them into effect over the heads of another place. That is a point in the constitution of this country and the necessity of providing some safeguards for it.

He was speaking on the motion made by Mr. Asquith after the lords had rejected the Finance Bill. Let me come to a stronger and to my mind absolutely conclusive authority as regards submitting a question of this kind to the people; it is the authority of no less a man than Lord Lansdowne, who was once Governor General of Canada, and leader of the Conservatives in the British House of Lords. In speaking of the Finance Bill, he moved this amendment, which is almost similar in terms to a portion of the amendment which is now before the House:

> That this House is not justified in giving its consent to this Bill until it has been submitted to the judgment of the country.

That was the Finance Bill introduced by Lloyd George in the British House of Commons in 1909. In support of the amendment, Lord Lansdowne said:

> You have to consider its results as they would affect all classes of the community, and the principles that underlie it, and you have to consider whether the people of this country have been consulted with regard to it. If you find that the results are likely to be disastrous and that the principles underlying it, which we detect not only from the official utterances of members of the Government, but also from the more indiscreet explanations of so-called supporters of the Government, are pernicious and that the whole matter is one that has never been duly referred to the people of this country, then I venture to say that your lordships have a clear duty before you—not to decree the final extinction of the Bill—because that is not what we propose, but to insist that before it becomes law an authoritative expression of the opinion of the electors of the United Kingdom shall have reached us with regard to it.

That is the highest tribunal in the United Kingdom. The men who passed that resolution are the Supreme Court of Appeal for Great Britain and Ireland. That being so, why is their declaration of what is sound constitutional law and practice not equally authoritative? There is no doubt that it is. So far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, it should be a positive authority to them. The Liberal Government of Mr. Asquith at that cepted the suggestion made by the Lords it did exactly what Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government did in 1911. Sir Wilfrid Laurier accepted the suggestion made in this House by the Conservatives that he should go to the country; Mr. Asquith accepted the suggestiion made by the Lords that he should go to the country and get the mandate of the people on the question of the Finance Bill. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: be you also equally courageous and do likewise. The highest judicial tribunal in England has declared that that is the constitutional practice and should be done; Mr. Balfour the leading Conservative statesman in Great Britain makes the same declaration; hon. gentlemen opposite have also made the same declaration; carry out the suggestions that you have made. Pass the Redistribution Bill, submit this question to the country; get a mandate from the people; then, if you receive the support of the electors of the country, if they approve of this proposition, you will come back clothed with authority to place that legislation on the statute-books; but ask the opinion of the people, and when you have got that opinion, I doubt very much if you will have the authority to place that legislation on the statute-books. As I have already said, your Bill need not and will not be killed; it can stand for three or four months. I submit that there is authority and strong authority which should compel these gentlemen to appeal to the country. It is the true constitutional practice; it is in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, if we are not to ignore entirely those provisions. If we ignore them now, we can ignore them in the future; we might as well wipe them out of the statute-book unless we are to carry them out faithfully, honestly and legally. Hon. gentlemen opposite have gone a long way in their assertions regarding the navy problem, as it is at present the law of the land; they say it is a separatist navy; they say it will unbind the ties that bind the British Empire together.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN: Hon. members say, 'hear, hear.' I, for one, glory in the fact that we have on the statute-book of Canada an Act which provides for a Canadian navy, and these gentlemen dare not repeal it. I glory in accepting as my platform, and I think I may say that we glory in accepting as our platform, the resolution of 1909 and the words of the British Admiralty expressed in their report in the summer of that year. And, Sir, on that platform, lined up with our noble chieftain, and with the British flag above us, we will strive for Canada's greater prosperity and the continued and lasting unity of the Empire.

Mr. W. G. WEICHEL (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, as a young parliamentarian and one who has had the privilege of occupying a seat on the floor of this House only a short time, I hesitated somewhat before expressing my views on the subject which to-day is being widely discussed throughout Canada, and which in my opinion, and also in the opinion of a great many other people, is one of the greatest questions that have come before the Canadian people since Confederation. I will be brief in my remarks, and my attitude in this debate will not be that of a critic of former speakers, not even a critic of my 'German' friend from Welland. And I believe that this is the first instance in the House of Commons where a German has been followed by a German in debate. My attitude in this debate is that of a man who, after carefully listening to the speech delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister and also to that of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, has come to some conclusion, and that after mature deliberation upon this very great and important question. The Prime Minister, in an eloquent speech a few weeks ago, gave notice to the House that he would introduce a Bill whereby Parliament would be called upon to contribute $35,000,000 towards the naval defence of the Empire. Immediate relief is to be given, and he is asking Parliament to pass this Bill with the distinct understanding that a permanent policy is to be submitted later on. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, in an eloquent speech, proposes an amendment to create a Canadian navy in Canada manned and equipped by Canadians, having a fleet unit on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific ocean. Both parties realize that something should be done. The leader of the Government who told this House he had received information from the Admiralty of Great Britain regarding the situation there at the present time, feels that, in view of what he has heard of the grave condition of affairs that seems to exist there at this time, we should offer an immediate contribution to the Empire. There is not in my opinion a great deal of difference between the two parties on this question. It seems to me that the only difference is that the Government is willing to act immediately and take no chances whatever, while the policy of the Opposition is to counsel delay and minimize as much as possible the danger that seems to exist for the British navy. Sir, I am and always will be an exponent of peace. Peace at all times without in any way lowering the dignity of a nation, to my mind, is a principle we should uphold at all times. Great nations are to-day engaged in the mad race for naval supremacy. Sensational journalists, the manufacturers of cannon, guns and other death dealing instruments, are stirring up the passions of men of the different Christian countries, inciting them to fly at one another on the slightest provocation. It is a crying shame that in the twentieth century, matters of dispute cannot be settled by arbitration. We know that the masses of Europe are ground down under militarism. When war is declared, when mobilization takes place, who are the men who are called upon to bear the brunt of battle? Men in high stations of life? Yes, to a certain extent. But, Sir, the masses constitute ninety per cent of the people, and it is from the masses, from the ranks of the workingmen and toilers, that you take your recruits; and they are the people who have to stand in the field of battle and stop the deadly bullets. The word 'No' pronounced emphatically by every toiler throughout the world as the answer to every beligerent, would once for all settle this question, and disarmament would shortly follow. The labour organizations are uniformly opposed to war. The church might very well compete for this distinction but for the fact that among its members may be found some not so strongly opposed to militarism—those, for instance engaged in the manufacture of army and navy materials and supplies, and especially the titled aristocracy. Pleas for arbitration between governments occasionally made by peace societies, activity on the part of individual philanthropists and other efforts have been made to prevent armed conflicts. The tendency of governments, however, has been to confine the work of arbitration to minor disputes, while greater issues are left to the sensational press, popular passion and war. In my opinion, disarmament rests with the masses. Let them refuse to be led away by war scares, and the sound of the drum, and at the same time work in harmony with the governments of their respective countries to promote sane legislation, is in my opinion highly to be desired. Look at the case of Sweden and Norway. A few years ago Norway, unexpectedly to Sweden, dissolved the union. The Swedish aristocracy and militarists appealed to the passions of the people to resort to arms. But the labour organizations held certain meetings and passed a few formal resolutions that, if summoned, they would refuse to serve. This had the desired effect, and the consequence was that these two countries instead of being at war are now living in peace side by side and contemplating an alliance for the protection of their mutual interests.

Some newspapers have been busy for the last two or three years trying to show that Germany is contemplating war with Great Britain. Others, perhaps with saner views, do not hesitate to tell the people that sensational newspapers and manufacturers of arms have had a great deal to do with stirring up passion and hatred between these peoples. Mr. Speaker, why single out Germany? What about Italy with its marvellous fleet? What about France which is to-day developing a magnificent navy? What about Russia which is again recuperating after her disastrous loss in the war with Japan? What about the United States, which, I believe, stands third in the list of naval powers to-day. And what about that little island kingdom of Japan whose people, we know, are marvellous fighters by land as on sea? I occupy a rather unique position among the two hundred and twenty-one members who represent the Canadian people in this House. I, Sir, am of German extraction, and I am proud, exceedingly proud, of the progress the German nation has made during the last forty-two years. A nation which in literature, has given to the world the works of Goethe, Schiller and many others; which to-day marvels at the wonderful compositions of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Haydn, Lizst and Wagner, in music; a nation which stands in the foremost ranks of science, literature, philosophy, medicine and art, must command respect and I am sure there is no one here to-night who will doubt that statement. Ninety per cent of the people of North Waterloo, whom I have the honour to represent, trace their ancestry to the German people. Come with me, Mr. Speaker, to my constituency, and I will show you what German thrift and energy has accomplished. Prosperous and contented are our farmers, happy in the knowledge that they are to-day living in a land protected by the Union Jack, which is to them a guarantee of freedom of speech and liberty of conscience. The manufacturing centres of my riding are to-day a regular beehive of industry. Berlin, with a population of 18,000 people operating 133 factories, whilst Waterloo, only a short distance away, with pride points to thirty-three industries. Prosperity, thrift and energy, has made a garden of North Waterloo, and this, Sir, is mainly due to the perseverance of the people of German extraction. They revere German customs and traditions, and are proud of the fact that the land of their fathers is making such magnificent progress. They realize also that they, under British institutions, have been allowed for the last 100 years to live in peace, whilst other nations, less fortunately situated, are embroiled in war. They realize also, that in no other country of the world to-day can a greater amount of freedom be obtained and enjoyed than in this Dominion of ours. Germany's growth, unexampled prosperity and progress, is due to the fact that technical education in her schools has made her a nation of thorough business men. Thoroughness in everything is the German slogan of to-day, and this commercially speaking, may probably be the cause of a great deal of the bitterness displayed towards that nation. Another great factor in the upbuilding of this wonderful empire is that the public utilities of Germany are owned by the state, and have brought immense revenues to that country. Another factor—and I am touching upon delicate subjects to-night is the home life of that country, where the German mother reigns supreme as queen of the home, not worrying about affairs of state—nor adopting militant methods as her sisters are doing in England to-day. Mr. Speaker, destroy the peace and sanctity of home life, and you once and for all start to undermine the very foundations of empire! I honestly believe that Germany desires peace. But there is another consideration—there is another side to the question. Since other nations are to-day increasing their armaments, it becomes a natural necessity for Great Britain to be prepared for all emergencies. I have listened with a great deal of interest to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who have delivered addresses on the Naval Bill. I have also heard the majority of those members—with the exception of one hon. gentleman on the Opposition side of the House, with perfect unanimity practically agree that the First Lord of the Admiralty can see no danger in Great Britain at the present time, so far as the British navy is concerned. Allow me to read a paragraph or two from a speech delivered by Mr. Winston Churchill in presenting the naval estimates to the British House of Commons on Monday, July 22, 1912:

There are two points with regard to navies and naval war which differentiate them from armies and land war. The first is the awful suddenness with which naval warfare can reach its decisive phase. We see on the continent of Europe immense military establishments possessed by nations dwelling on opposite sides of political frontier lines; yet they dwell and have dwelt for a whole generation in peace and tranquility. But between those armies and any decisive collision there intervenes an inevitable period of delay that acts as a great buffer, a cushion of security. I mean the vast process of mobilization, the very first signs of which must be noticed, and which, once it begins, lays idle the industry of both countries and dominates the whole course of national life. So it is that through all these years nations are able to dwell side by side with their tremendous military establishments, without being a prey to undue anxiety as to immediate attack. But none of these considerations apply to fleets. The fleet which was assembled for the manœuvres the other day was fully capable of going into action as soon as the ammunition could be brought up and put by the side of the guns. And that is true of all the great highly efficient navies of the world.

Further on he says:

I am bound to say, looking far ahead, and farther than the purposes of this vote, at the aspect which Europe and the world will present when the power of states, which has been hitherto estimated very largely in naval strength, and when we have a number of great powers all possessed of very powerful navies, the state of Europe and of the world seem to possess many more germs of danger than the period through which we have been passing through in our lifetime.

After reading these two paragraphs, I, for one, reading between the lines, was fully convinced that Mr. Winston Churchill saw a danger ahead, and I therefore cannot agree with what gentlemen of the Opposition have said in reference to their inability to see anything in the speeches of the Lord of the Admiralty, denoting that Great Britain had any cause for alarm. He states that the Empire's peace in England to-day is wholly artificial; he claims they are fed from the sea; they are an unarmed people, and possess a very small army, and are in fact the only people to-day on the continent of Europe who do not possess a large army. Therefore, he claims, these are facts which justify British naval supremacy in the face of the world. A few weeks ago the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), for whom I have a great deal of respect, flung a challenge across the floor of the House to the members of the Government to bring in a redistribution Bill, and then appeal to the people on this issue. Was the hon. gentleman in earnest, or was he simply playing to the gallery? I would like to remind my hon. friend that in western Ontario, where I live at the present time, this matter of a contribution is meeting with favour throughout the length and breadth of the land. The Canadian people are willing to pay for services rendered, rather than engage in the building of navies and the creation of too much of a military spirit throughout Canada. How many recruits would the hon. member for South Wellington supply for the navy from the busy city of Guelph? How many recruits would he get in South Wellington? How many recruits would I be able to get in the busy city of Berlin to-day, and among the German farmers in North Waterloo? Our people are too busy at the present time to enlist in the navy, and the experience of the former Government, with regard to the Niobe and the Rainbow, should act as a warning to the present Administration not to attempt too much at once, and take such action as will cause us to retain our self-respect and make amends for allowing the British taxpayer in the past to bear all the burdens of defence.

I was pleased the other evening to support the resolution of the right hon. the Prime Minister. It is our plain duty to do something, and no self-respecting nation should shirk its responsibility to secure and maintain peace at all costs. We should be willing to do almost anything. We pay for the policing of our towns and cities; why should we hesitate to pay for the protection of our country and the maintenance of the greatest policeman we have in the world to-day—the British navy? We are too busy developing the natural resources of this country; too busy building railways and canals; too busy creating towns and cities to think of militarism and navies, if Canada is to become a nation. A policy of isolation from the world is, in my opinion, no longer possible. Some may think that we on this continent can work out our destiny in peace, but I doubt whether this dream will ever be realized. We now have vital interests throughout the world. In the year 1910 our total sea-borne trade in exports and imports with the British Empire and other countries, exclusive of the United States and Mexico, amounted to $337,676,851, and with the British Empire alone $277,676,851. Our sea-going trade entered and cleared was 20,814,313 tons, exclusive of coasting and inland tonnage. And are there no Canadian interests at stake in the Pacific as well, with China waking up from its long sleep; the great possibilities of trade expansion with Japan, and also the opening of the great Panama canal? The fact remains that Canada at the present time cannot dissociate itself from the Mother Country and the Empire. We must, it is true, be jealous of our rights and liberties, and we must at all hazards maintain our position as an autonomous state within the Empire, but at the same time we must recognize the interests of the Empire. We must develop our resources, organize the defences of our frontiers, perfect the system of transportation by land and water to always meet the increasing needs of Canada if we wish to become a great nation. But if we hope for this, we must not forget that the essential conditions must be the stability and security of the Empire.

A certain writer once said that a nation can be secure only if its armed strength is commensurate with its possessions. The British nation is a maritime nation, and is most vulnerable from the sea. It depends for its livelihood upon the sea. They possess one-half of the world's shipping, and nearly one-half of the world's trade is carried under the British flag. Therefore, it is reasonable to suppose that to safeguard these enormous interests she must have a powerful navy. There was a time when the naval supremacy of Great Britain was undisputed, but that is not the case to-day. Other nations have grown powerful, and are casting longing and envious eyes at her colonial possessions. It is idle to dream of peace when we see with what feverish haste other nations are adding to their strength. There is a peril, however, in my estimation, that is greater by far than the European peril. I may be wrong, and I hope I am wrong, but I realize that the yellow peril is the one we have to fear more than the European peril.

I am not a diplomat, nor do I understand the mysteries of alliances and treaties between nations. I for myself cannot see where Great Britain has anything to gain by an alliance with Japan. Far rather would I prefer to see an alliance between Great Britain, Germany, France and the United States. An amicable understanding between these great and powerful Christian nations would for all time to come be a guarantee for peace. Destroy the British fleet, and then tell me, Mr. Speaker, what would become of the much heralded Monroe Doctrine. The British navy stands to-day for protection to all who live under the folds of the Union Jack. And our neighbours to the south of us have almost as much interest in the stability of the navy as we have in Canada. For my part I believe in one empire, one navy. A unit on the Pacific and one on the Atlantic looks all right on paper, but it is all wrong in time of peril and need. We have the assurance that a permanent naval policy will be submitted to the people later on. In the meantime let us be true to our professions of loyalty. Let us do something to regain our self-respect. Our sister colonies have put us to shame by doing their share. Why should big and prosperous Canada lag behind? We are proud of our heritage. Proud of our history and proud of our Empire. Envious eyes are to-day watching our progress in developing our natural resources. Our future is with that of the Mother Country. She has watched over us, has guarded us and now when we are fast becoming a nation it will be to our best interests to stick closely to the Union Jack. She has confidence in us, and to prove it she sends freely of her money to develop our resources. We owe a great deal to England. Although of German origin and proud of my ancestry, I am prouder still that I am a Canadian and a British subject.

This to my mind should not be a political question. It is a matter far too serious to be juggled about as a political football. We want peace and are prepared to pay for it no matter what the cost may be. War is inhuman. It is degrading. There are times when it may be necessary. The Balkan war which is going on at the present time may be an instance. There was provocation for a call to arms and the allies have triumphed over the Turks, who have been a source of trouble to Europe for a long time. Arbitration should settle all differences between nations. If that cannot be done, then by all means strengthen the British navy in such a way as to show to all nations that we are prepared at all times, with a bold front backed up by an enthusiastic people and by a navy powerful enough to defend our commerce, our homes and our children.

Canada alone cannot defend herself. Canada is a great country and her people are brave and resolute. But what could they do by themselves to defend their vast interests in the continent of North America on the Atlantic and on the Pacific? How long could we stand against the 100,000,000 to the south of us, or against Japan with its 40,000,000 who are desirous of gaining control of the Pacific? We have a trifle over 7,000,000 people living in a country that can accommodate 100,000,000, who could live here in comfort and ease. But across the Pacfic ocean lives the yellow man and he is hopelessly congested and must sooner or later seek new possessions. We are determined, however, to make this a white man's country and we have every right to shape our future accordingly. Ask the man from British Columbia how he feels about the matter. He will tell you that there is danger to be expected from that source.

A great deal has been heard and said about autonomy and rights and far too little about duties and responsibilities. In my opinion, the principle of local autonomy has once for all been accepted and no serious minded person questions it any longer. Canada is either a part of the Empire or it is not. We cannot any longer with self-respect stand idly by and allow Great Britain to shoulder the whole burden.

The supreme interest of the British Empire is the peace of the world. We would all hail with delight an announcement that the powers had decided to propose disarmament. But as long as nations will persist in arming to the teeth, just so long must the great British nation be in the van, ready at all times to defend her rights and to maintain at all hazards the integrity and stability of the Empire.

Canada's destiny lies with that of the Empire. Our success and prosperity will be assured if we share with her for weal or woe. I hope to be spared to see this a great nation. I hope to be spared to see Canada taking a leading part in trying to secure a better understanding between the Christian nations of the world. Canada has a destiny and it is going to be a glorious one, linked together with all the other parts of the Empire in one indissoluble tie that will make for the peace and prosperity of the world.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be somewhat lengthy, it is now eleven o'clock and perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on, go on.

Mr. CARVELL: I had an understanding with the whip this morning that the House would adjourn at eleven o'clock but if hon. gentlemen do not want to carry out that understanding, of course, I shall have to proceed. I do not think that they will ask me to finish my remarks to-night unless I am able to cut them a great deal shorter than I anticipate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) on the very excellent address which he has given to the House to-night and because he has expressed sentiments which might be well advocated by very many other hon. members of this House. I congratulate him upon his excellent language and I think that I realise to some extent the somewhat peculiar position which he occupies in addressing the House on this very important subject, especially when we consider that practically every member on his own side of the House who has discussed this question, not only during this debate but since the beginning of the year 1910, has advocated the course which they have been advocating because of what they call the German peril. I appreciate the position in which my hon. friend finds himself and I think he has handled the subject in a masterly manner considering all these conflicting associations. I do not want to say, or even to insinuate, anything unkind about the hon. gentleman, but I am afraid that his logic would hardly be as commendable as are some of his sentiments as to peace and good-will which he wishes the world in general and the people of Canada in particular. While he advocates doing something to protect ourselves and especially, is he anxious about the protection of our Pacific coast, he seems to think that it is not the duty of Canadians to protect themselves either on the Pacific or the Atlantic coast but in other words, he joins forces with the Nationalists and says that we should just hire somebody to do it for us. I know that that is not the true sentiment of the hon. member for North Waterloo. I have too much regard for his chivalry; I have too much regard for the chivalry of the great race from which he comes. I never before heard of a German who wanted to hire someone else to do his fighting for him. If there is a trait of the German nation which should be commended it is based upon the fact that when the time came to fight for the Fatherland the German fought for the Fatherland and asked nobody to help them.

My hon. friend also deprecates the fact that this has become a party question. So do I. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) laughs. So does he. There is no gentleman in this House who depreciates it any more than the Postmaster General does. I am afraid he will have cause to deprecate it to a greater extent in the future than he has in the past. He is making a magnificent attempt to make his people believe down in Quebec that everything is all right from their standpoint. My hon. friend, I understand is the principal owner and manager of a newspaper in the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the name?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not very good at French names, but the name is L'Evenement as nearly as I can pronounce it. I find in a recent issue these sentences, which I commend to the House in general and to my hon. friend the Postmaster General in particular. I would ask him if he is not a little tired of the situation which has been created and if he would not like to see it buried and something else discussed?

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the date of that paper?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not the date because it is a translation, but this was published within a recent time. This refers to the proposal of the Government to make a contribution of $35,000,000 to Great Britain, and the Postmaster General says that it is only a gift of money.

Mr. PELLETIER: I now say that that is not my paper, and I have said it many times in the House.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, L'Evenement says this—will my hon. friend say that he has no stock in it?

Mr. PELLETIER: Not one share.

Mr. CARVELL: Will he say that he is not a director?

Mr. PELLETIER: How could I be a director without any shares?

Mr. CARVELL: I would just like to have an answer. Will my hon. friend answer?

Mr. PELLETIER: I am neither a director nor a shareholder.

Mr. CARVELL: Was my hon. friend a director on the 21st of September, 1911? My hon. friend is silent when it comes to that. He is not the first politician who has got out from under a newspaper when he got into the Government. Many men have done that, but their ideas govern the newspaper just the same. Considering, then, the fact that my hon. friend, by his silence, admits that he was a director when he was elected to this Parliament, I want to read what his paper says:

> It is only a gift of money. You will never bear anything more of it. There is no danger. The British will hire men at twenty-five cents a day, and Canadian mothers and sisters will suffer no loss. As for the money, Ontario will pay for it, and the West will pay for it. It will not take your sons from your homes as the infernal Laurier would do.

No wonder that the Postmaster General, when this question comes up, speaks about getting rid of it. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not rid of it and notwithstanding the wish of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, the wish of my hon. friend from North Waterloo, and the wish of every hon. gentleman on that side of the House, we are not rid of it. A great constitutional question like this being sprung upon the people is something which will not down, and it is impossible to put it down in a day. We have to discuss the thing and I think it is the duty of every member of this House, no matter on which side he is, to discuss it and give reasons for the vote which he will record when this matter comes to a second reading or at the final stages of this Bill. It is the most important proposal which has been brought before this House in my time. I believe it is the most important proposal that the people have been called upon to discuss in a generation—yes, in two or three generations. I believe it is a most important constitutional question which has been presented to the people of Canada since Confederation. I submit that it is a practical reversal of the policy of self-government which was given to this country in 1867. And, Sir, I submit that if we pass this Bill, if we hand over—I will not say money, because I understand that according to the Bill we do not hand the money over to the British Admiralty; I wish we did for I would feel a great deal safer if we were handing the money over to the British Admiralty—that is a constitutional point which has not been discussed yet, and I wish to call my hon. friend's attention to it for a moment. As I understand this Bill, it proposes to hand over to the Government of this country $35,000,000 to be expended at their own sweet will, not in Canada, but out of Canada, for the construction of three battleships by firms over whom we have no control, and we have no way of finding out whether the money has been properly or improperly expended by people who can say that they have charged $4,000,000 apiece for those ships. We have no way of finding it out, no way of bringing them to the bar of this House as they brought a gentleman this afternoon, no way of asking them what they did with the money. I say we are raising here a constitutional question of greater magnitude than any raised in my experience, or since Confederation I believe. They propose to hand over $35,000,000 to the Government—I do not find any fault with the individual members—to be expended outside of the country, and give this House no control over it, and no opportunity of bringing the men who receive the money before the Public Accounts Committee or before the House in order to find out the true facts of the question. I repeat that it is a great constitutional question, and one which in my opinion should be submitted to the people before this Bill becomes law.

But as I said a while ago, I am afraid that this naval question is not out of politics. I do not wonder, as I said before, that certain gentlemen wish it were out of politics, but I would like to know whose fault it is that this naval question is still in politics. I do not want to travel over ground that has been pretty thoroughly threshed out by different members of this House since the debate began, but no gentleman can make anything like a connected argument, or give anything like a reason for his vote on this matter, unless he devotes some attention to the historical facts in connection with this transaction. We know that this matter was first mooted at the Imperial Conference of 1902. There was a discussion upon some sort of contribution, or upon the participation of some of the colonies in the naval defence of the Empire. It was only mooted at that Conference. We know that in 1907 it was again brought up. We know that in 1909 the hon. member for North Toronto, now Minister of Trade and Commerce, placed on the Order Paper a resolution to the effect that the time had arrived when Canada should take some share in the naval defence of the Empire. I have not his exact words, and it is not necessary to quote them, but I think I have given the substance of them pretty correctly. That resolution was allowed to stand on the Order Paper for something like two months, and no notice was taken of it until some time in the month of March, 1909. One of those periodical German scares had taken place early in the month of March, 1909, and it is somewhat remarkable how regularly those German scares come around. It seems that a certain number of gentlemen in the Old Country are able to work up a German scare at almost any time they want to do so. And after all it does not take a great amount of money to work up a German scare—a string of newspapers, a contribution of a few thousands or perhaps tens of thousands of pounds, which amount to a mere bagatelle to the great manufacturers of ships, armaments, and war material. They want a chance to sell their goods, and they start a German scare. Why, Sir, we have had German scares regularly from the beginning of 1909 down to the present time. The last of them was when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his colleagues went to London in the month of June or July last. Probably it did not take more than £10,000 to work up that German scare. We had the newspapers filled with German scares for something like two months. The Montreal Daily Star almost went into hysterics over the German scare in the months of July, August and September, 1912, and all the lesser lights of the Conservative party copied the Montreal Star. By the time the right hon. gentleman had returned to Canada, one would almost have thought that the German navy had sailed up to the shores of England and had blown all their defences to atoms. But they did not.

Now I find that on the 22nd March, 1909, when one of these periodical German scares was in existence, the Government of New Zealand telegraphed an offer to bear the cost of the immediate construction of a battleship of the latest type and of a second of the same type, if necessary. I am referring now to the reports of the Imperial Conference of 1909. The newspapers were of course fully apprised of this fact. It became public property, and was commented upon by all the newspapers of the Empire, with a great deal of admiration and commendation by most of them. When the psychological moment had arrived, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought up his resolution which had been quiescent for two or three months, and I am bound to believe that he brought it up from the very best of motives, although I think he was also actuated by the German scare. What may have been his anticipation as to how his resolution would be received by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister of Canada, I do not know. But one thing sure is that the right hon. gentleman met him in the spirit in which he proposed his resolution. I would be taking up the time of this House uselessly if I were to quote extracts from the splendid speeches of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the right hon. the Prime Minister on that occasion. Suffice it to say that in my mind they were masterpieces of oratory, of logic, and of argument, and in my opinion they rank among the first productions of any deliberative body in the British Empire for logic and good sound reasoning. The burden of the argument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce was that as England had borne the brunt of Empire for 200 or 300 years, the time had come when something should be done by Canada, and the only question in his mind was how the thing should be done, what method should be taken by Canada in order to carry out that laudable ambition and desire. He discussed the two propositions which were then in the public mind. The first was, I think, the question of a contribution, suggested no doubt by the action of New Zealand, to which I have referred, and which was made public only one week before the hon. gentleman brought in his resolution. The other was the proposition as to whether we should defend ourselves or not; or contribution on the one hand and the construction, manning and control of the Canadian navy on the other. As I said before, it is worth any man's while to read that speech over and over again. I do not think I am doing my hon. friend any injustice when I say that without any hesitation he arrived at the conclusion that the only logical, patriotic and sane proposition which Canada could accept was that of constructing a navy, manning it and maintaining it. I wish to put the matter fairly, because I realize that we are now discussing a question of very great importance. He was followed by the right hon. the leader of the House who made, I think, as fine a speech from the standpoint of a logician as did the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, but who lacked in oratory. The result of it all was that after some discussion back and forth by different members, the following resolution was drafted and unanimously adopted by this House. It is true that we now have a couple of members of the then Opposition, now members of this House, who say they were not here at that time, and had they been, they would have voted against it. I never knew until to-night that there was more than one. I do remember at a later date that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) stated that he was not in the House at that particular moment, although he had been a few moments before, and that he was not in favour of the proposition. Now the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) to-night says: I was not here, and therefore I am not bound by it. That is pretty close reasoning; that is something which I would call special pleading, and I do not think the hon. member for East Hastings really expects this House to take his statement very seriously, because the matter has been discussed a great many times. It was discussed in 1910 when the Naval Service Bill was up; it has been discussed in every session since 1909. So far as I can remember, this is the first time I ever heard a statement like that from the hon. member for East Hastings, and I believe it is the first time he made such a statement either in the House or out of it. With the exception of these two hon. gentlemen, I think I am safe in saying that every member of the House at that time gave his consent, and I might also say enthusiastic consent, to the resolution, which is as follows:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

That continued to be the attitude of every person in Canada so far as we know until some time in the late autumn of 1909. The right hon. gentleman went to England; and as has been stated here before, in a speech at the High Commissioner's banquet in London, on the 1st of July, he reiterated his adherence to the proposition of a Canadian navy. He came home, and on his way back at Halifax, as was referred to by my friend from Welland (Mr. German), he made a speech in which he again reiterated his adherence to the naval policy as set forth in that resolution of March 29, 1909. He went to Toronto, and found that things had been moving a little in Canada during his absence. Some of his followers in Toronto and I think in Winnipeg as well—possibly my friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) would have some knowledge of what took place at that time, because I remember that his name was mentioned in connection with the change of front of some of the Conservative leaders—had commenced to find fault with the attitude of the present leader of the Government, because he had fallen in with the view of the then Premier and had not opposed it as they thought was the duty of an opposition. My hon. friend the then leader of the Opposition stood by his guns manfully for some two or three months. It is true, when Parliament met in the month of November, 1910, a desperate attempt was made by my right hon. friend's friends to compel him to change his mind and recede from the position which he had taken in regard to the establishment of a Canadian navy. The first thing which took place was the amendment to the Address moved by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier in November, 1910, which was as follows:

The House regrets that the Speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the Government to consult the people on its naval policy and the general question of the contribution of Canada to Imperial armament.

This was moved as an amendment to the amendment moved by the right hon. gentleman, the then leader of the Opposition. The substance of this was that this question was so important from a constitutional standpoint, that it was such an important departure, that it was embarking on such an important proposition that it should be submitted to the people before being passed into law. We know that the right hon. the Premier and practically every member of his cabinet to-day who was a member of the House of Commons then save one voted for that amendment. As has been stated, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) could not make up his mind to vote for Mr. Monk on a proposition of that kind and he left the House. I think two of his colleagues, also members from the city of Toronto, went out with him, all except the Minister of Militia—I want to be fair to him. The Minister of Militia voted against it. But every other hon. member of the present Government who was a member of the House of Commons at that time, with the exceptions I have named, voted for this amendment—voted that before an important matter like this should be passed it should be put before the people. But that resolution does not say whether it should be submitted by a plebiscite or by a general election.

Mr. CROCKET: How did the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) vote on that?

Mr. CARVELL: I voted against that amendment. I voted against it because I thought that the Parliament of Canada had unanimously decided this matter representing every constituency in Canada, and expressing, as I believe what is the proper policy for Canada. But the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) had listened pretty carefully to his constituents, had considered the newspaper reports, and had tried to feel the sentiment of the county from the time of the resolution up to November 1909. And the member for Carleton saw no reason why he should change his views and call for a vote of the people on a question like that. Now, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) has asked me how I voted, I would ask him how he voted.

Mr. CROCKET: The records will show.

Mr. CARVELL: My recollection is that he voted with Mr. Monk. I don't know whether he will like to have this little matter of past history raked up or not. I do not know what the brethren in the county of York will think about when I tell them their representative voted with Mr. Monk in a matter like this. But this was the fact. And, as he has brought the matter into the light, I might as well give him all there is about it. The main amendment was moved by the present Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition. I thought at that time, and I think now that the difference between the two amendments was the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier proposed to express regret that there was nothing in the speech to state that we would take the voice of the people upon this question. The amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition was exactly the same thing, only that they threw the old flag around it, as they always do:—

We beg to assure Your Excellency of the unalterable attachment and devotion of the people of Canada to the British Crown and of their desire and intention to fulfil all just responsibilities devolving upon this country as one of the nations of the Empire. We desire, however, to express our regret that Your Excellency's gracious speech gives no indication whatever of any intention on the part of Your Excellency's advisors to consult the people on the naval policy of Canada.

If there is a man who will show the difference between the two, I shall be obliged to him. However, the leader of the Government and every one of his followers, so far as I am able to recollect, except the present Minister of Militia, voted for the amendment. I am not so sure about the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). By these amendments, which were voted for by the then Opposition, this matter was brought back into politics; it was made a political football, a means of trying to gain power; it was taken from the high plane on which the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the present leader of the Government had at one time expressed a desire to place it, and it became purely and simply a party question. And, to my mind, it comes with poor grace from the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) to plead with us to get together, to plead with the Liberal party to recede from the position which it took in 1909 and which these hon. gentlemen themselves took, a position which involves to my mind, the real national and manly principle, the principle of doing our own fighting, of acquitting ourselves like men, of defending our own shores, of looking after our own affairs; and they ask us to adopt the unmanly, the un-Canadian, the un-British policy of handing over a sum of money to the Mother Country and saying: 'Build ships with the money, man them yourselves, pay for them yourselves, fight them yourselves.' You cannot get a question like that out of politics. It is here to stay, no matter what may become of this particular proposition. It is here to stay until the Government of this country come to the conclusion that the people have a higher conception of the duties of citizenship than to hire people to fight for them because those people can be employed at twenty-five cents a day less than Canadians can be employed to fight for themselves. We may as well face that question and understand it once and for all.

Now, let me refer to what has taken place outside of Canada. I have given a brief history of this naval affair from the month of March, 1909, down to the time when the Naval Bill was introduced by the leader of the Government. The Imperial conference was held in the autumn of 1909. It will be found reported in a blue-book a copy of which I have before me. Before the conference met, a memorandum had been sent out by the British Admiralty, dated 20th July, 1909. In this memorandum sent out to the self-governing dominions the whole matter of naval defence was discussed from both standpoints. I wish to refer as briefly as possibly to some of the statements in this memorandum to show that the Imperial authorities, or, if you will the Admiralty, have not changed their attitude very much to-day from what it was in 1909. I do not think there is any doubt that, if we had gone to the Admiralty in 1909, as I contend my hon. friend the Prime Minister did in 1912, if we had said to the Admiralty: We want you to tell us what you would like to have us do, not what is best for us or even best for the Empire as a whole from the point of view of the political and business conditions, but purely for the purpose of making a fighting machine, we should have got practically the same answer as we get now. In fact, we have it here in paragraph 2:

> If the problem of Imperial defence were considered merely as a problem of naval strategy it would be found that the greatest output of strength for a given expenditure is obtained by the maintenace of a single navy with the concomitant unity of training and unity of command. In furtherance, then, of the simple strategical ideal the maximum of power would be gained if all parts of the Empire contributed, according to their needs and resources, to the maintenance of the British navy.

If it were merely a question of making the British navy one fighting unit, would suggest to the governments of the self-governing colonies that they should contribute to the support of the navy; but they realized then, as they realize now, that there are many facts to be taken into consideration before any self-governing colony would decide what course it will pursue. Because they say:

> It has, however, long been recognized that in defining the conditions under which the naval forces of the Empire should be developed, other considerations than those of strategy alone must be taken into account.

I hope that the House will remember that this statement was sent out by the Admiralty before the conference met. (Reading):

> The various circumstances of the overseas dominions have to be borne in mind. Though all have in them the seeds of a great advance in population, wealth, and power, they have at the present time attained to different stages in their growth. Their geographical position has subjected them to internal and external strains, varying in kind and intensity. Their history and physical environment have given rise to individual national sentiments, for the expression of which room must be found. A simple contribution of money or material may be to one dominion the most acceptable form to assist in Imperial defence. Another, while ready to provide local naval forces, and to place them at the disposal of the Crown in the event of war, may wish to lay the foundations upon which a future navy of its own could be raised. A third may think that the best manner in which it can assist in promoting the interests of the Empire is in undertaking certain local services, not directly of a naval character, but which may relieve the Imperial Government from expenses which would otherwise fall on the British Exchequer.

I desire to know whether any hon. gentleman reading that statement sent out by the British Admiralty before the conference of 1909, will say that the British Admiralty did not feel at that time exactly as my hon. friend professed to feel? Did they not recognize that a policy acceptable to one of the overseas dominions might not be acceptable to another? Did they not recognize that while contribution might be acceptable to one colony, it might not be acceptable to another? Did they not state exactly what my right hon. friend stated, and exactly what the member for North Toronto stated? Did they not state that a policy of contribution might not meet the aspirations of that colony which might wish to lay the foundations upon which a future navy of its own could be raised? And, Sir, Canada before that date had laid down the principle that the people of this country did have aspirations to establish a policy upon which a naval force of its own could be raised. (Reading):

The main duty of the forthcoming conference as regards naval defence will be, therefore, to determine the form in which the various dominion governments can best participate in the burthen of Imperial defence, with due regard to varying political and geographical conditions. Looking to the difficulties involved, it is not to be expected that the discussions with the several defence ministers will result in a complete and final scheme of naval defence, but it is hoped that it will be found possible to formulate the broad principles upon which the growth of colonial naval forces should be fostered. While laying the foundations of future dominion navies to be maintained in different parts of the Empire, these forces would contribute immediately and materially to the requirements of Imperial defence.

That was the statement of the Admiralty in 1909.

In the opinion of the Admiralty, a dominion government desirous of creating a navy should aim at forming a distinct fleet unit, and the smallest unit is one which, while manageable in time of peace, is capable of being used, in its component parts, in time of war.

There is no doubt but that the British Admiralty stated at that time that if the dominions, established a naval force of their own, they should aim at a fleet unit. They did not say they must establish a fleet unit at the outset, they said they should aim at a fleet unit. The next step, then, was the conference, and at the conference the policies of each of the self-governing colonies were discussed, laid down and adopted. The policy to be adopted by Canada was that of building not a fleet unit in its entirety, but ships which could be used as the nucleus of fleet units, both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. They discussed two schemes, one which would involve the expenditure of £600,000 per annum, and another which would involve the expenditure of about £400,000 per annum. If I remember rightly, the fleet unit decided upon by Australia was to cost that colony exactly the same amount as that proposed by Canada, namely, £600,000 per annum. So when hon. gentlemen contend that Canada was trying to shirk responsibility, and was not doing as much as Australia was willing to do, I say they have not read the records in that regard. If they would read page 26 of the report from which I am quoting, they would find this statement:

The annual expenditure in connection with the maintenance of the fleet unit, pay of personnel, and interest on first cost and sinking fund, was estimated to be about £600,000.

And the policy proposed by Canada was one which would cost about the same. But instead of building a dreadnought as the head of the unit, they were to build, as I have said, a number of vessels to be employed on different coasts of the continent—one portion on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific. When the Bill was brought down, we followed the recommendation of the Admiralty almost in its entirety. There were one or two changes made, but we provided for ten or eleven of these vessels. The £600,000 proposition provided for four cruisers of the improved Bristol class, one cruiser of the Boadicea class, and six destroyers of the improved River class. It was admitted by all that the submarines should not be included in this proposition because of the highly technical condition of that particular branch of the service. In this report to which I refer, there is a table showing the cost of the different vessels, maintenance and annual upkeep, interest and depreciation, cost of the personnel, victualling, pay, medicines, &c., the total including about £50,000 for maintenance of the Halifax and Esquimalt dockyards, amounting to £600,000 per annum.

Now we come back to the discussion in the session of 1909 and 1910, when the propositions laid down by the Admiralty of 1909 were adopted by the Government and were submitted to Parliament in what is called the Naval Defence Bill. To that Bill, two amendments were proposed—those which I read a few moments ago—by the present Prime Minister and the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), which were voted upon as I have already described. Up to the second reading of that Bill, my right hon. friend had certainly not changed the position which he took a year before. I desire to read to the House a statement made by my hon. friend on the 12th of January, 1910, which, to my mind, is the crux of the whole matter; which, to my mind, is as true of the situation to-day as it was in 1910, and which shows that the right hon. gentleman had given the matter very mature consideration:

It has been suggested that instead of the organization of a Canadian naval force, there should be a system of annual contributions from this country to the Mother Country——

This was not in 1909, but in 1910, on the second reading of the Naval Defence Bill.

—and I am free to admit that, from the strategical point of view, I would be inclined to agree with the view of the Admiralty that this would be the best way for the great self-governing dominions of the Empire to make their contributions. But, Sir, from a constitutional standpoint, I am opposed to it, for many reasons.

Opposed to what? Opposed to contribution; opposed to the very thing he is asking Parliament to vote here to-night; opposed to the very thing to which he himself was opposed in 1909; opposed to the very thing he was opposed to in London, and in Halifax, and I think I would hardly be out of order if I were to say opposed to the thing which in his heart of hearts he is opposed to to-night. Because he is too good a constitutional lawyer not to know the real effect of forcing this measure upon Parliament.

In the first place I do not believe it would endure. In the second place it would be a source of friction, it would become a bone of partisan contention, it would be subject to criticism as to character and amount of the contribution in both parliaments it would not be permanent or continuous, it would conduce if anything would conduce to severing the present connection between Canada and the Empire.

Is there a man in this House to-night, is there a member in this Parliament to-day, who could put forth more weighty and cogent reasoning in one short paragraph against this principle of contribution than did my right hon. friend on that memorable occasion in 1910?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): It is true now.
