POLLUTION

STATEMENT ON CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL AND REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ARISING THEREFROM

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, June 4, the tanker World Bond discharged approximately 12,000 gallons of crude oil into the sea while engaged in unloading operations at the Atlantic Richfield Refinery at Cherry Point, which is just south of the Canada-United States boundary in the State of Washington. Some of this oil quickly spread into Canadian waters.

The incident at Cherry Point is a stark reminder of what we have stated on many occasions: that far more serious spills will inevitably take place on other occasions if oil is moved by tanker through the Strait of Juan de Fuca. It demonstrates that in the event of a spill on the United States side, damage will almost certainly be suffered in Canada, and this damage could be severe. Even the small quantity of oil which escaped on this occasion moved rapidly northward across the boundary and collected on some five miles of one of the finest beaches of the area.

We have, of course, registered with the United States Canada's grave concern about this ominous incident. On instructions, our embassy yesterday emphasized to the State Department that the incident confirmed our anxieties over the threat to the ecology and resources of this inland marine area from oil tankers. The embassy made clear that the Canadian government expects full and prompt compensation for all damages suffered in Canada, as well as full clean-up costs, to be paid by those responsible. The embassy restated our broader concerns about the hazards which will arise from the movement by tanker of large quantities of oil into the Cherry Point refineries. We have made repeated representations to the United States government about the proposed increase in oil tanker traffic into this area, and indeed we raised this matter with President Nixon when he visited Canada in mid-April.

We proposed to President Nixon that the International Joint Commission should be requested by the two governments to conduct a thorough investigation of the hazards of marine transport of oil into this area. We have since made specific proposals for this investigation, and in the light of this recent incident our ambassador in Washington is pressing for an early and positive response from the United States government.

We appreciate that this particular spill was small in comparison with the magnitude of predicted spills, and that the refinery and authorities concerned on both sides took prompt action to contain the spill and minimize the damage. Consequently, the damage to Canadian waters and shoreline was less than might have otherwise resulted. We appreciate also that Atlantic Richfield Corporation has apparently recognized its obligation to meet the cost of the clean-up operations. However, the government wishes to obtain firm assurances that full compensation for all damages, as well as the cost of clean-up operations, will be paid by those legally responsible. The government is reserving all its rights in this matter and is examining all the legal options which may be available to protect Canadian interests.

We are especially concerned to ensure observance of the principle established in the 1938 Trail smelter arbitration between Canada and the United States. This has established that one country may not permit the use of its territory in such a manner as to cause injury to the territory of another and shall be responsible to pay compensation for any injury so suffered. Canada accepted this responsibility in the Trail smelter case and we would expect that the same principle would be implemented in the present situation. Indeed, this principle has already received acceptance by a considerable number of states and hopefully it will be adopted at the Stockholm conference as a fundamental rule of international environmental law.

However, even the best compensation arrangements cannot be a substitute for effective preventive measures. We shall, therefore, continue to press vigorously for measures in respect of the Juan de Fuca Strait and Puget Sound areas which will avoid the danger of spills of oil that would cause damage to Canada's waters and shoreline.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat reassuring, I suppose, to find that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has awoke several days after the incident at Cherry Point and has at least made the government of the United States aware of the views and concern of the government of Canada in connection with this spill. I assume that his statement was not ready in time for him to follow the usual courtesy of making copies available to the opposition. I do not know just what provoked this statement at this time.

As the minister has indicated, while compensation is important it is not the most important question. What the country really wants to know is how the government of Canada intends to achieve joint control over what may happen in the waters off that part of Canada and the adjoining waters of the United States.

I do not wish to be partisan in replying to a statement on motions or to provoke any kind of controversy, but I do say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to the Prime Minister, first of all, that the government took an interest in this problem very late in the day and that the planning of the Alyeska route was very far advanced before the government showed any interest or concern. It is only within recent times that the government of Canada has taken any direct position. Second, the government of Canada has been tardy in pursuing its investigation of any route that would be an alternative to the coastal route for transporting Alaska oil. It moved very late in the day and even now it is not in a position to know what it might do in that connection.

I simply say that, while it is all very well for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make a statement in the House, while it is all very well for him to tell us that our ambassador in Washington is pressing this matter, it seems to me, in view of the importance of the subject and the dangers to which the minister himself has referred, that this matter should be pursued at the highest level between the government of Canada and the government of the United States. The people of Canada will be satisfied with nothing less.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, as the member for the area affected by what has happened at Cherry Point I have a particular interest in speaking on this matter. First of all, I want to thank the minister for his statement. It is true that it outlines what the government has done rather than what it has not done. In my view the government could have and should have done a good deal more than it did to stop what has happened.

I think we should understand that as long as ships carry Alaska oil along the British Columbia coast to the refinery at Cherry Point, which is about 15 or 16 miles from my riding, as long as that plan continues and as long as that refinery exists for the purpose of refining that oil, we have in effect an ecological time bomb within a few miles of our shores. It is true that we should take protective measures against what has happened, and in my view the protective measures taken by the Canadian government were insufficient. After the spill took place, during the night there were 200 people with bales of hay trying to keep the oil off the beaches at Cherry Point and White Rock. With what was already known as to the likely effects if such a spill should take place, surely the government could have been in a better position to protect our people. In my opinion the contingency measures were not effective and were not properly prepared. What the government has said is all right as far as it goes, but the measures which the government is taking do not go far enough.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

I think we have to realize that what the Americans are planning to do with regard to shipping oil along the British Columbia coast constitutes in effect an unfriendly act by one nation against another. We have to take that position on our own behalf and also on behalf of the Americans in the adjacent Pacific coast area. We are in fact faced with a most basic and serious situation involving pollution of the ecology in which tragedies and disasters far greater than this small spill will inevitably occur. The government's own research has established that over a period of every three or four years there is bound to be a major oil spill if these giant tankers are allowed to sail down the coast.

I draw the attention of the government to a report issued today through the office of the Minister of Transport on a study prepared by Queen's University in regard to the feasibility of transporting Alaska oil by railway from the north to the south. According to the study, it is feasible to build a railway from the north and ship over that line at least 200 million barrels of oil in a comparable period as opposed to shipment by water.

I cannot emphasize too much that we in this party, and the people of British Columbia, I am sure, regardless of their party affiliation, look to the government to take stronger and tougher measures than they have taken and to point out to the Americans, many of whom will agree with us, that the planned route for the shipment of Alaska oil will result in the degradation of our coast.

• (1420)

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first we deeply regret—and we will never say it too often—that when the minister makes statements in the House, he informs hon. members only a few minutes ahead of time.

As to the content of his statement, it is nothing more than a stuttering which could not in any way solve the problem of pollution and protection of the environment in Canada.

The minister announced that a certain compensation would be paid, but that is a matter of very little importance as compared with the whole problem. It is again a kind of band aid treatment which will definitely not ease the pain. All that question can boil down to the nature of our relationship with our neighbour, the United States. The Canadian government has always had a shy and hesitant stand by always placing itself at the mercy of the United States as far as the protection of the environment and the fight against pollution in Canada are concerned.

The subject of particular concern to the House today, specifically the shipping of oil along our seacoast, is part of this problem.

We are led to believe that our ambassador in Washington is exerting pressures, but the problem still exists in Canada, and the minister is stuttering something or other about this problem instead of speaking up.

We urge the government to speak loud and clear to the Americans and suggest to them that, while they want to protect their own environment, their country and resources in order to develop them, we too, as Canadians, are proud of our country, and we shall take the necessary steps to protect our environment and improve our living conditions.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROGRAM TO REDUCE EGG SURPLUS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce that negotiations and discussions have been successfully concluded with the provinces and producer groups and that a program designed to adjust egg production to market requirements for Canada has been developed.

As hon. members are aware, the government has been concerned that any assistance it might put into position should be of such a nature and should be coupled with such provincial programs as would bring continuing stability to the industry. I might say that we are particularly concerned that we avoid doing those things that might be counter-productive over a long period of time.

A program has been designed that will provide assistance on a sliding scale to encourage maximum removal of surplus birds within the shortest possible time. Under this formula, if the target is reached within six weeks farmers will receive approximately 90 cents per bird marketed. If the target takes eight weeks to reach, the payment would be about 75 cents per bird.

If the program falls short of the one million bird target the assistance will be less. For example, if only 500,000 extra birds are taken out of the flocks during the eight-week period, the subsidy will be about 45 cents per bird.

The program will be effective from June 5.

This program is designed to stimulate rapid adjustment in fowl numbers thus providing indirect and immediate benefits through price increases to those producers and areas that do not need to adjust fowl holdings while at the same time providing direct assistance to those that need to make adjustments. To receive assistance under the program producers will require proof of sale to a registered poultry processing plant or a recognized certificate of disposal.

Full details of the program, including the method of claiming, will be sent to the industry immediately. In the meantime I would advise that producers should retain all receipts showing the disposition of fowl removed in the period.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, the statement that has just been made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is in effect a fowl buying program, although he did not wish to call it that. Another fowl buying program was announced last October 29—I have that statement here, Mr. Speaker—which was to be carried out over an eight-week period. So there is a familiar ring when in the present statement the minister says that this program will be in effect for an eight-week period. Following the earlier program I asked the minister the following question on March 16, 1972, as recorded on page 889 of Hansard:

Surplus Egg Reduction Program

With regard to the fowl buying program announced by the government last year under which assistance was going to be given to producers, how much money was paid to producers under that program?

The minister's answer was:

None, Mr. Speaker.

Most of us know of the terrible situation in the egg-producing industry in Canada today. Over 202,000 30-dozen cases a week are being produced. That is about 10,000 or 15,000 too many, and there has to be a cutback in order that egg producers can make a decent living in this country. This situation has gone on too long.

I am happy to see that the federal government and the Minister of Agriculture have negotiated on a little better terms with the egg producers and the provinces than they have with the provinces in regard to the small farms development program which we heard about in committee this morning from some of the provinces. I hope the minister has listened to better advice in working out the details of this program than he did on the previous one and that the program will do some good. I do not know whether the minister is aware of the normal laying period of a hen, but I think he should suggest that all hens that have been in production for ten months or more should be marketed through this program. That might be of some assistance. More direction has to come from the minister and he should listen to people who know what they are talking about.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, it would have been helpful if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) had given us more information. We know that negotiations have been going on between the provinces and the federal Department of Agriculture to work out a program of egg marketing under Bill C-176 which was passed by the House a year ago. One question that was seriously raised in committee at that time was whether sufficient information would be provided to the producer and indeed to Parliament when national marketing programs got under way. I suggest to the minister and to the House that the information that has been given to us at this time is sketchy, to say the least.

For instance, in addition to the fowl slaughtering program, which can be only one facet of a total approach, what is going to be done about the import of eggs from other countries? The minister referred to supply management being achieved between the provinces. If this is the case, what is going to be done about imports? What is the policy? No information is given. What is the actual division between the provinces? We do not have that information. We have not been told what the formula is for distributing the money. If fewer birds are killed the price per bird goes down. One area may have fulfilled its obligation and another area that has not will suffer. There are too many unanswered questions. The minister may have the answers, and I would be pleased if he would provide them to the House at some future time.

Surplus Egg Reduction Program

• (1430)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the minister began his statement with the following paragraph:

I am pleased to be able to announce that negotiations and discussions have been successfully concluded with the provinces—

That means an agreement is still possible. I continue to quote:

—and producer groups and that a program designed to adjust egg production to market requirements has been developed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I imagine that the subsidy mentioned by the minister will be added to the amount received when the fowls are killed. I fear that this will be a double-edged knife considering the short delay specified. In fact, if the objective is reached in less than six weeks, I foresee the danger of having a market over-supplied with fowls and, consequently, a drop in prices which are already very low.

We read recently in a farm weekly that in the week of May 31 producers received 12 cents a pound for fowls of 7 pounds or more, 10 cents for 6-pounders, 7 cents for 5-pounders and 6 cents for fowls of 5 pounds or less. Such prices are very low. So, if the market becomes suddenly overstocked, I am afraid prices will drop and grants paid by the Department of Agriculture will accordingly lose their value.

Egg producers have been experiencing great difficulties for a very long time and it should be pointed out to the House that even in January 1972 the amount paid to them averaged 15 cents a dozen, while the production cost ranged from 30 to 32 cents. This is an interesting problem which should be considered.

If, according to the announcement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), the proposed means are such that they will make it possible to reach the objective, that is the establishment of a long term policy to stabilize the situation and to give a certain degree of satisfaction to egg producers, all the better. But right now, the situation is distressing.

Mr. Speaker, according to the price list that we have been supplied with, producers received 26 cents for Grade A eggs during the week of May 24 and 20 cents during the week of May 31. These losses are extremely high and there is real danger that many producers will very quickly be moving towards bankruptcy.

If we really have surpluses in Canada—I would not know if it is true or not, but someone must know it—it means that we have a great production capacity. On the other hand if there are people who don't have any surpluses and are hungry, we should send them our surpluses. Such a gesture would enable some human beings to consume them and satisfy an essential need.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that one day at the Committee on Agriculture I was interested to hear a good Liberal member made a statement on the planning, the orientation given to agriculture by some economists who, after having tried for 10 years, admitted that their recommendations and plannning had failed. Yet they do not give us any alternate solutions.

[Mr. Gleave.]

We have visited in Canada big egg producers which should be doing well. However, there are proofs big producers have difficulties; production is not always efficient enough to allow benefits when the production cost is higher than the sale price. What we need is a miracle and I do not think it is possible these days.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I wish to request the unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion:

That in the light of the damage in Canada and the United States arising from the recent oil spill at the Cherry Point refinery this House support the urgency of a reference to the International Joint Commission of the environmental consequences of the movement of oil in the narrow waters of the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Georgia Strait, and Puget Sound both now and in the future and of the measures necessary to minimize the hazards, and requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately convey the terms of this motion to the government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is proposed to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, since the hon. member for Egmont was the first to move a motion on this matter three days ago, we naturally will support this motion wholeheartedly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This motion by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East shows that there is at least one Liberal who knows something must be done.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member kindly indicate who the seconder is?

Mr. Pringle: The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If there is unanimity, the motion will be put. There appears to be unanimity.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lewis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order that the hon. member who spoke before me raised. Not only the hon. member for Egmont—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Just hold on for a moment—but also two members of my party moved motions under Standing Order 43 which the Liberals of this House did not permit to come before the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ought to inform you and the government House leader that, so far as I am concerned, this motion is debatable and will be debated.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course all motions are debatable. The only leave the hon. member is seeking is leave for dispensation from the usual notice; if no notice is required under the terms of Standing Order 43, because of the unanimous consent granted by the House the motion will be put. However, I think hon. members ought to keep in mind that this is a supply day, and it has been agreed that the party to my extreme left, which is not necessarily the party to the extreme left in this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —shall move a motion which is to be debated later today. Perhaps after the motion has been put, and because there appears to be unanimous consent, there might be consultation between the party representatives to try to clarify the situation so that the party which has the responsibility for moving the supply motion today will be treated fairly. All this having been said, I will put the motion because there has been unanimous consent.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I am not at all anxious to interfere with the motion now on the order paper with respect to this supply day, but I want to make it clear that the Liberals cannot get away with the kind of partisanship they are trying to get away with.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have not completed my point of order. Could I have Your Honour's indulgence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Essentially the hon. member, is repeating what he said a moment ago. The matter is clear to me. I inquired whether there was unanimous consent, and I am prepared to put the motion.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the additional point I want to make is that if your words of advice, which I suggest with respect are very fair, are to be adopted, then your putting the motion now does not mean that either the motion will be passed without debate or that the debate is to follow immediately upon your putting the motion. That was the point.

Oil Pollution

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The terms of the Standing Order and the rules are very clear. There must be unanimous consent for the motion to be put. There is unanimous consent for the motion to be put. Of course, any motion is subject to debate, and if hon. members want to debate it all day that is up to them. I will put the motion. Mr. Pringle, seconded by Mr. Robinson, moves:

That in the light of the damage in Canada and the United States arising from the recent oil spill at the Cherry Point refinery this House support the urgency of a reference to the International Joint Commission of the environmental consequences of the movement of oil in the narrow waters of the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Georgia Strait, and Puget Sound both now and in the future and of the measures necessary to minimize the hazards, and requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately convey the terms of this motion to the government of the United States.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East.

• (1440)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been in the House this week and I have heard motions similar in wording and almost identical in content proposed by at least one or two other members. I am asking Your Honour for some direction.

I thought there was a rule of the House that when a motion is put and disposed of it cannot be reactivated or resurrected during the same session. Is this not an attempt to bring in through the back door something that could not be brought in through the front? If that is allowed, members who are asleep at the switch day in and day out will be able to rise on the same subject matter and utilize and prostitute the same Standing Order just to show that they are half awake.

If we do not invoke the longstanding procedure of the House that when a motion has been put, even though there was not unanimous consent, the matter has in effect been disposed of for that session, the number of times that hon. members will move spurious motions will proliferate. Even though this motion has a lot in favour of it, the motions of other members earlier in the week said much more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows the rules. When there has been a debate on a matter and a decision has been taken by the House, the rules are that the matter should not be brought before the House a second time for consideration during the same session. Of course, when there is a denial of unanimous consent the matter cannot be said to have come before the House at all.

I bring to the attention of hon. members that the rules apply not only to the fact that a matter is debated in the House but to the fact that a decision is taken. If a decision is taken, if a vote is taken on a motion, the Standing Orders and the practices of the House are clear. The matter cannot come up for discussion a second time. At that time, of course, the point taken by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley would be well taken and would have to be taken into account.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate Your Honour's ruling to a point. This is a new Standing Order in this Parliament, and, while I have not got the Standing Order before me, I understand the wording to be "disposed of the matter". Surely when this House refuses to give unanimous consent to a similar motion two or three days or two or three weeks before, that is a form of disposition of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This Standing Order is 100 years old. It is not a new Standing Order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the House accept the proposal of Your Honour, namely, that the debate on this motion stand until representatives of the four parties have met and arranged a time when it might be debated. We might find some time later this evening or tomorrow. The House has agreed that the motion be put. The House would like to debate it. Surely we can come to an agreement when that might be done.

If necessary, I would be prepared to move that the debate be adjourned. The difficulty with that is the motion would then be put under government orders. I do not want to do that unless we have an assurance from the government House leader that the order will be called. I think the most useful thing to do at this moment is for the House to agree to let the motion stand until the House leaders have met and discussed a time when it might be debated.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the importance of the matter is obvious, and we support the proposal you have made.

As we are the hon. members who are mainly concerned today, this being an allotted day for the study of supplies for the period ending June 30, 1972, and as a motion has already been put on the order paper under the name of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), it seems to me that we cannot now start a debate on another subject. Taking the previous agreement into consideration, and unless the various parties now agree to hold an important debate at a time that is agreeable to all four parties, it seems to me priority should be given to the day allotted the opposition and that the debate held until now has unfortunately trespassed on the time that should be devoted to the important question brought up today.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The point again taken by the hon. member for Lotbinière makes sense to the Chair. Obviously we might get into a difficult situation if we do not by agreement give priority to the debate which has been set aside under a supply motion. That is why I took the opportunity to suggest this originally. I hope that some agreement can be reached between the House leaders as to when this debate might be held. Perhaps we might hear from the government House leader on this point.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree 100 per cent with the suggestion that the normal supply day ought to go ahead. It would be unfortunate to deprive the Social Credit party of their day in the House. I also agree that we ought to meet and in the meantime stand the motion until agreement is reached as to when it can be called. Perhaps we will have a discussion as to whether it will take place on a government day or an opposition day. I hope we can work that out.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, we are not here to play games. The government has agreed to the motion being put. The government acknowledges that it would not be fair to the Social Credit party to debate it today. The government has set aside tomorrow for a New Democratic Party supply motion. I do not think any of us ought to interfere with that day either. Since the government has agreed to the motion being put, the government House leader should very readily agree that the motion be debated on the next day for government business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There does not appear to be agreement as to what ought to be done. I suggest that the Chair has no alternative but to recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. In the meantime, perhaps there might be consultations at the highest level to see whether we should adjourn this debate so that later this afternoon we might proceed with the consideration of the motion which stands in the name of the hon. member for Kamouraska.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at the outset that because of the urgency of the matter I felt that this motion should be made today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pringle: I concur with those in the House who have stated that we should endeavour to let the day's business go forward and not interfere with the motion of the Social Credit party. I assure Your Honour that I am fully prepared at this time to discuss my reasons for moving this motion. As the mover of the motion, I am prepared to lead off the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pringle: I am also prepared to accept a ruling that this matter be dealt with at a later date because I do not want to interfere in any way with the motion set down for debate on this opposition day. Therefore I will be brief.

• (1450)

I might say for the benefit of hon. members who are smirking behind me that my home is about three miles from this particular spill.

Mr. Bell: Where were you on Monday?

Mr. Pringle: In answer to the hon. gentleman, I should like to say that on Monday I landed by aeroplane at Abbotsford, British Columbia, and went fully into this problem. I should also like to point out that a senior cabinet minister from British Columbia accompanied me. We not only investigated the problem caused by this oil spill but also investigated the flood situation in British Columbia, something I have heard nothing about from the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pringle: Again for the benefit of members heckling me, let me tell them that at this time the flood situation in British Columbia is well in hand.

An hon. Member: That is more than you can say for the political situation.

Mr. Pringle: The main problem in transporting oil, as I see it, is that there is very little possibility of our ever stopping transportation of oil on the high seas. Until such time as we are able to return to burning wood or coal in our ships, or build ships driven by nuclear energy, we will have to use oil. I am not in any way suggesting that we should support the transportation of oil from Alaska to Cherry Point. But I am suggesting that we endeavour to rationalize the problem and that we look squarely at what the problem is. In other words, I suggest we endeavour to beat pollution, not try to kill the industry in the hope that the pollution will go away.

We know that oil spills have taken place and they will continue to take place. I wish the problem were so easy that we just turn a key and say that there shall be no more oil transported on the high seas of the world. If we could do that we would never dump oil into our oceans. But the solution is not quite that simple, and for this reason. If, Mr. Speaker, you examine the oil spill situation at Cherry Point, as I have done, you will find that it is not a case of a collision occurring in the Straits of Juan de Fuca, or a boat colliding with a rock or obstruction, breaking up and spilling oil. It is a case of pure negligence in the inspection of the equipment used when unloading or loading this ship at Cherry Point. As long as there are humans involved we will have to tighten up our inspection procedures.

This is why a reference to the International Joint Commission is vital. The commission can study the problem and devise proper methods and, hopefully, solutions which they would then report back to the government. If this question is debated at a future date, I should like to deal at length with many other points relating to this subject, but my point today is there is no relationship between the transportation of oil from Alaska on the high seas and the particular oil spill from a boat at Cherry Point.

Consider the case of a boat taking on 2,000 or 3,000 thousand gallons of oil to fuel its burners in order to sail through the Straits of Juan de Fuca and down to San Francisco. If the man responsible for pumping in the oil happened to put the nozzle, instead of into the spout, accidently on one side of the spout and 3,000 gallons of oil were dumped into the sea, would this mean that we would seek to prevent the transportation of oil on the high seas? There are many aspects to this problem and I hope that the House of Commons will consider placing the problem where it belongs. Instead of dealing with it emotionally and without thought the day after a spill occurs, let us conduct a proper investigation so we are able to rationalize the problem.

It is all very well to say that the government has been taking its time, but the point is this. It is easy for members of the opposition to be irresponsible and to get up and shout, because they do not have to be responsible to the general public or for relations between the United States and Canada, an important relationship indeed. We must first make sure that we are on solid ground. Certainly I have heard very little from the opposition apart from the cry "we have oil on our beaches". Although this is a very sad situation and cannot in any way be belittled, there is a matter here that we must investigate. I therefore present my motion to the House and I hope that all members of the House of Commons will support it.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I now understand why the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) made his statement in the House today. Certainly there is no question about the seriousness of the matter raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle).

Mr. Pepin: Has your research just arrived?

Mr. Stanfield: No; I have finally been able to obtain a copy of the motion. I imagine, that the hon. member who moved the motion did not expect it to be taken seriously and he had no copies. As I say, there is no question that this motion raises a very serious subject, and I am pleased that the members of the government have at least allowed one of their own supporters to get a motion before the House, though they blocked similar motions on two or three occasions earlier in the week.

As the hon. member pointed out, his motion does not strictly relate to transporting oil from Alaska, though I assume that the oil that will serve the Cherry Point refinery eventually will be transported along the tanker route from Alaska. If the hon. member for Fraser Valley East is intending to indicate that there is a spillage problem in Puget Sound and the Strait of Juan de Fuca, that is unquestionably the case. Clearly a good deal of oil is passing through those waters already, part of which goes to this particular refinery.

There is also no doubt at all about the importance of their being some joint control on the part of the government of the United States and the government of Canada over the movement of oil and other commodities in this area. I do not think anyone has to be a Solomon to say that. Neither do I think any member from British Columbia will dispute the importance of this kind of joint control being established. As it has been put to me, while we have adopted twentieth century technology in controlling the movement of aircraft, we are still using fifteenth, sixteenth or seventeenth century techniques at best in controlling the movement of vessels in and out of our ports. There is no doubt at all about the urgency of some rational plan or joint method of controlling the movement of vessels in these waters.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have stated also that the suggestion was made during President Nixon's visit that both governments should consider placing this matter in the hands of the International Joint Commission. That seems to me to be a rational approach. The International Joint Commission could take this matter a step forward with a view to fathering, if you like, a body with joint control over the movement of vessels in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, Georgia Strait and Puget Sound. As far as Canada is concerned the question really is, how energetically is the government of Canada going to move? The Prime Minister told us he made this recommendation to President Nixon, but we do not know of anything in particular having been done about it since until today in the House when the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that our ambassador in Washington was pressing the matter there.

I am going to support the motion although I doubt very much whether we can refer this matter to the International Joint Commission. I assume that anything to be referred to that commission that relates to its jurisdiction must be accomplished by agreement between the two countries. Therefore, while I am going to support the motion on the basis of moral support for the necessity of urgent action being taken on the establishment of some effective control over the movement of vessels in those waters, in my opinion the passage of this motion today will be no substitute for vigorous, determined and persistent action by the government of Canada to achieve the purpose of the motion—the establishment of this kind of control in these waters.

The most charitable thing I can say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East is that the motion or the substance of it is certainly very incomplete. We in this House do not want to rest the point with the simple passage of this motion to refer the matter to the International Joint Commission, because that in itself would probably accomplish nothing. As I understand it, what we in this House want to be associated with—at least I certainly do—is a motion that will lead to effective action being taken, a motion that will bring this government or encourage it hopefully to insist on action being taken to get agreement from the United States in respect of something effective being established.

I am not going to take more time in view of the original purpose in setting this day aside. I simply indicate that the matter is of the most profound importance. Anybody in his right mind must realize that some joint control has to be established. How anybody could forgive the laxity of this government in sitting around for years without making any serious effort to secure the establishment of a joint system of control over navigation in these waters is beyond understanding. The Prime Minister has now made a request to the President of the United States, but how anybody, particularly those on the west coast of Canada, could forgive this government for such laxity is beyond my comprehension.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the device that is being employed by the government makes me so angry that I do not know whether I will be able to make this speech without some strain against the limitation in the vocabulary I can use. Here we have a naked attempt on the part of the government, through a government member, to pour a lot of oil on the troubled waters of the Liberal government's sagging current popularity. It is a naked and belated attempt to make political capital out of West Coast ecological tragedy. It is interesting to note that the last time we sought a reference to the International Joint Commission was when the government was in some trouble over flooding of the Skagit Valley.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

An hon. Member: Which government?

Mr. Dinsdale: We haven't got much of a government so it is hard to recognize it.

Mr. Rose: My colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle), was critical of some of us and called us irresponsible and emotional because we had the audacity to raise this matter four days ago. He said, and I paraphrase him, that the government had to have time to think.

An hon. Member: They are slow thinkers.

Mr. Rose: In a matter of this importance, I suggest that if it takes the government four days to think we have reason to question the intelligence of the government.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, but the hon. member for Fraser Valley East is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, while I may have been paraphrased, I draw your attention to the fact that I never used the word "think". I realize that the hon. member's party has difficulty in that its members usually speak before they think. I usually investigate things—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order; that is debate.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, if after checking Hansard I find I have paraphrased the hon. member incorrectly, I will certainly be the first to apologize.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East made a great deal of the fact that this oil spill was within three miles of his home. I do not understand how that could be as I always understood the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was from Chilliwack. How this oil spill could occur within three miles of Chilliwack I do not know, because it was obviously in the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

An hon. Member: He is walking on the waters.

Mr. Rose: Someone suggests he is walking on the waters. I suggest he has an international responsibility because his summer home happens to be located on the United States side of the gulf islands.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Rose: If this motion is acceptable today as a matter of such urgency, I cannot understand why a similar motion was not acceptable three or four days ago unless it is because that motion emanated from the opposition side. People are disillusioned with the trickery and knavery of the political process.

Mr. Woolliams: And the skulduggery.

Mr. Rose: We know that about a year ago or more the government had a member who made much capital out of the Alaska tanker route issue. He is now the Liberal party leader in British Columbia. What did they do to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich when he wanted to have his committee travel to the west coast to hold hearings? They repudiated him. Instead of sending his committee to British Colunbia they sent that member to British Columbia permanently.

Mr. Speaker, interest on this side of the House in this issue is not new. I happen to have here a list of questions and speeches directed to ministries by members of my party and other parties dating as far back as January 28, 1971. The litany of expressed concern about this problem runs through the whole period until the inevitability of the spill which occurred last weekend. Each time the government was approached on this matter it wrung its collective hands and shook its collective heads. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs was asked what he intended to do about Amchitka he suggested we pray. Is this what his advice is on oil spill prospects? The government's own appointee, Dr. McTaggart Cowan, as engineer is respect of the Chedabucto Bay tragedy involving the Arrow said it is not a matter of "if" there are to be oil spills as a result of the location of a refinery at Cherry Point but rather a matter of "when".

In that particular part of British Columbia the track record on sea mishaps runs at about 7 per cent per year. Last Thursday, I believe, when we were privileged to hear that old smoothie, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), giving testimony before the Transport Committee on the estimates of the Ministry of Transport, he admitted that legally there was nothing Canada could do to protect itself against the transgressions in respect of the installation of this refinery in the United States. He admitted this.

After our experience with the Chedabucto Bay affair, in terms of clean-up contingency plans I am certain there could have been a little more preparatory effort beyond the provision of a couple of loads of baled hay. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) will have to petition the government once more to have the name of his riding changed to Black Rock if things like this keep up.

Something else Canadians may not be fully aware of—I am sure they may not be because the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) was not aware of it when I asked him a question earlier last fall —is whether or not oil from Alaska is already being carried down British Columbia's inside passage to Seattle. When I asked him about this the Minister of the Environment said such was not the case. When I asked the same question of the Minister of Transport, I received a long detailed letter outlining how oil is in fact being barged through the inside passage between Vancouver Island and the mainland of British Columbia bound for Seattle. This kind of transportation and ecologically risky situation has been occurring for some years, and I think shows how much one hand of the government knows what the other hand is doing.

Last weekend's oil spill must serve as a great warning to all of us. It is a relatively modest leak although tragic enough in its consequences. The spill happened in the only really warm water or Mediterranean area which in the Pacific Northwest serves the thousands of people who live in the lower mainland of Vancouver. The ecological transgression in respect of Robert's Bank in the same area was bad enough but now the probable destruction of the recreational area and fishing industry of the Fraser Valley is too much. We must have a much more vigorous and determined government posture than we have seen so far. We debate today about a veritable squirt of oil. The amount of oil involved in the Chedabucto Bay Arrow oil spill I believe was around 10,000 tons. However, there are tankers carrying 250,000 tons of oil today and it is anticipated that those on the drawing boards will carry 500,000 tons.

What does the government intend to do about this? A couple of years ago when the Minister of Transport was introducing amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, after he had been repudiated by the oil companies at the Law of the Sea Conference at Geneva, said Canada would go it alone and that we would have the toughest and most rigorous laws of any nation. What has been done? Have we demanded structural changes in respect of ships calling at our ports? Have we refused to let dock those ships—those hulks and tubs mainly of Greek origin—which fly flags of convenience mainly out of Liberia, Panama and other permissive states? In the case of the Arrow it was admitted in the House that it was absolutely impossible to trace the ownership of that vessel and therefore to nail down the responsibility for damages. I am hoping that in the course of this debate, since it has been initiated by the government, we will hear a little more about what the government intends to do in future. I certainly hope it intends to do something because it is certain and clear that it has not done anything so far.

I believe I have made my point, Mr. Speaker. I should like in conclusion to suggest that we wish to support this motion. We would have liked to do so three days ago but were not given the opportunity because our motions were voted down. I am sorry the government found itself so threatened that it thought it was necessary to use this kind of device to bring this serious problem before the people of Canada.

• (1520)

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before us is obviously important. It deals with pollution along the Pacific coast and emphasizes the lack of firm action from this government in this regard, except for lengthy high-flow statements.

Mr. Speaker, this motion is so important that we agreed, in the interest of the Canadian people, to hold a special immediate debate of about one hour on this matter. We forgot our own interest to consider that of Canadians. However, our own motion was important and today the co-operation and respect between parties has suffered a severe blow.

Mr. Speaker, our party is obviously deeply interested in safeguarding our environment as well as the living conditions of the Canadian people. We regret, as I said during the statement of the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), that this government is satisfied with speeches and alleged discussion and never takes any action likely to really protect our environment.

Division

Before resuming my seat, since all members from all parties know that we are really anxious to deal with the problem of land and water protection, I should like to say we did not appreciate very much the shady manoeuvring that was used today, at the outset of this day allotted to the business of supply for the period ending June 30.

Mr. Speaker, this is a severe blow to co-operation between parties, especially since there was no previous understanding or consultation, which we deplore.

Either it is due to bad faith on the part of some people or those people were so annoyed by the motion we are proposing today that they preferred botching the day set aside for opposition parties.

In any case, since hon. members were able to deal with the pollution problem, especially as regards oil transportation on the Pacific coast, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That this House now proceed to the orders of the day.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It is the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Fortin) which was negatived on the following division:

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, surely by voting for the continuation of this debate the vast majority of the members of this House have indicated their concern about the critical problem of oil pollution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I give up.

[English]

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, we are particularly concerned about the matter of oil pollution on Canada's west coast.

Mr. Woolliams: I see a long slick in the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Perrault: Regardless of our party affiliations, all of us are aware of the enormous ecological and environmental damage which could be caused by an oil spill there.

Mr. Stanfield: Don't forget governmental pollution!

Mr. Perrault: Having said this, I think it is distressing to learn that some members of the opposition would seize on this issue in order to engage in partisan politics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Perrault: If ever there has been an issue before Canada which required all-party unity, that issue is the fight against pollution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, what a contrast there is between the performance of the opposition today and the performance of government members on May 15. I am referring to page 2245 of Hansard and to the time when a member of the New Democratic Party moved the following motion:

> That this House herewith declares that the movement of oil by tanker along the coast of British Columbia from Valdez in Alaska to Cherry Point in Washington is inimical to Canadian interests, especially those of an environmental nature.
> And further, that this resolution be forthwith transmitted to the government of the United States of America in order that that government be apprised of the concern that the House of Commons of Canada has about the proposed movement of oil.

The members on this side of the House did not indulge in partisan political activity when that motion was presented.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Perrault: There was all party unity on the matter. There was no penny ante effort on the part of government members to discredit the effort of that opposition member. We voted for his resolution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Perrault: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) who had an unprecedented opportunity to bring forward rational arguments respecting oil pollution measures spent most of his time making a bitter, personal attack on the mover of the motion.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Perrault: He did not seize the opportunity which was presented to advance useful, rational proposals. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I must say that no nation has worked more earnestly to undertake useful initiatives for protecting the world environment than has Canada. And I do not think statements attacking members who speak on the matter of oil pollution and Canada's environmental reputation abroad are useful ones in this debate. As members know, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) is in Stockholm and is working with a world conference set up to fight pollution in all forms. The chairman of the conference is Mr. Maurice Strong, another Canadian.

The United Nations report entitled "Problems of the Human Environment" reads:

> Pollution of the sea is a continual threat to its future productivity. Although the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil has been in existence since 1954, oil pollution remains a major concern, and other forms of equally damaging pollution continue with little or no control.

There are no simple methods for preventing oil pollution either on Canada's west coast or east coast, or anywhere else in the world for that matter. The report continues:

> The control of pollution in the marine environment raises problems of a legal nature such as measures which states can take outside their territorial seas in self-protection against pollution liabilities arising from casualties involving discharge of oil or other pollutants, powers of surveillance by coastal states to implement measures for improving the safety of navigation and controlling maritime pollution.

The entire subject of pollution is being discussed at Stockholm at present and, again, Canada is providing a great measure of leadership at that world conference. With respect to the matter under discussion, the minister responsible for environmental matters in Canada, the hon. member for Capilano, was made aware immediately of the Cherry Point oil spill and of its movement into Canadian waters. As soon as this occurred, he had immediate discussions in Stockholm with Russell Train, chairman of the President's Council on Environmental Quality, and with William Ruckelshaus, administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. He discussed with them the question of reference to the International Joint Commission and he told his office here that he understood his views had been conveyed back to the United States. Some members of the International Joint Commission from both the United States and Canada are also in Stockholm at this time.

Opposition members who suggest that this government is not interested in the problem at Cherry Point and the oil pollution danger on the west coast of Canada should be made aware of the fact that not only has the recent incident been acted on immediately by the government of Canada but already, without any doubt at all, certain conversations have been undertaken in Stockholm between the responsible minister of the Canadian cabinet and representatives of the International Joint Commission from the United States.

There is grave concern by those who have seen the ecological disaster caused by oil pollution in areas such as the east coast about the possible effect of a major oil tanker disaster on the west coast. We are concerned that not only is more oil being moved by sea each year, but the size of oil tankers has also increased. The average tanker used during World War II had a capacity of 16,000 tons. By 1965 that average had risen to 27,000 tons, and a new tanker delivered in 1966 averaged 76,000 tons. A Japanese company has launched a 276,000-ton tanker. Other Japanese yards have orders for tankers as large as 312,000 tons. More than 60 tankers of 150 tons or more are on order throughout the word. Tankers of 500,000 to 800,000 tons are on the drawing board and those of more than one million tons are thought to be feasible. On the new 1,010-foot British tanker Esso Mercia two officers have been issued bicycles to help patrol the decks of the 166,890-ton vessel. If they build that million-ton tanker, undoubtedly they will be supplying the crew with automobiles to get around. I will now come to a more significant and serious point.

These supertankers require as much as 17 miles in which to come to a stop. Anyone who knows the coast of British Columbia and the navigational hazards there knows that the weather conditions, the dangerous shoals, the rock conditions, the reefs, the fog and all the other navigational problems make absolutely inevitable a major ecological disaster if oil is shipped down the coast from Valdez to Cherry Point. This is why there is virtually unanimous opposition in British Columbia to the shipping of oil by that means along Canada's west coast. The navigational problems down the west coast of Canada are bad enough, serious enough and difficult enough—but add to this the navigational chores in steering huge tankers through the Straits of Juan de Fuca and you have a situation that every expert report suggests will inevitably lead to an ecological disaster.

The size of the world tanker fleet itself is growing at a rate that rivals the growth in average size of new tankers. In 1965 it had increased to 3,500 and in 1968 it numbered 4,300 ships. In 1972 it numbers well over 5,000. At the present time nearly one ship out of every five in the world merchant fleet is engaged in transporting oil, and almost the entire fleet is powered by oil. Yet some people question why Canada is concerned about the possible movement of oil tankers of vast size down the west coast of Canada. It would be inconceivable that we would not be concerned about the extent of the danger. Significant oil spills have occurred worldwide. In the United States alone they have occurred with increasing frequency—180 in 1968; 192 in 1969; 61 to March 1, 1970, and a great many more in 1971. Those who suggest there is any fail-safe system to prevent oil spills along Canada's west coast simply have not been reading expert testimony; they do not know what they are talking about.

What should be done about this? First, members of all parties in this House of Commons, without partisan disputation, should continue their efforts to oppose the establishment of a U.S. tanker route from Valdez to Cherry Point. We should opt in favour of a pipeline to transport northern oil to Canada and to the continental United States. Second, we need improved facilities to ensure immediate and adequate action in the case of major oil spills. We have taken some action at the federal level to enable this country to fight serious oil spills when they occur. As well, in March, 1971, we passed an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

However, as a member from British Columbia I am not satisfied that we have done enough. I ask myself what would happen this evening if a 200,000 ton tanker broke up on the west coast of Vancouver Island. Do we have the facilities to do a proper clean up job? I think not.

Members of this House now have a certain number of opportunities to travel to all parts of Canada. I hope some will use their travel privileges to come to the west coast of Canada to see what concerns British Columbia members. I would like them to see the west coast dangers to navigation there which have established many ship "graveyards" up and down our coast and have led to the loss of hundreds of lives since British Columbia entered confederation and before then. The concern of British Columbians, regardless of whether they are Liberal, NDP, Social Credit or Conservative, must be seen to be believed.

We cannot allow the establishment of an oil tanker route along our west coast. Pressure must be exerted at every conceivable level. That is why the opposition received the unanimous consent of the House of Commons the other day. We wanted to add our names to the protest being forwarded to the United States at the congressional level. We need continuing action to persuade U.S. authorities to abandon any idea of shipping oil by tanker along the west coast. And we have to make it impossible for any substandard ships that are clearly marginal in construction to ply our coasts.

I was one of a group of Members of Parliament who visited Chedabucto Bay on the east coast where there was a relatively small tanker disaster. I saw, as did members of the opposition, the effect that one small tanker accident had on one of the most beautiful environments in this country. To this time, the cost of cleaning-up Chedabucto Bay has been assumed mostly by the Canadian government. To my knowledge the owners of that ship have yet to pay one cent.

An hon. Member: One million dollars!

Mr. Perrault: I may stand corrected. Perhaps we have now received some money. However, it has been difficult to obtain the kind of financial recompense we should have received soon after the disaster occurred.

I was in New York when the tanker Manhattan returned from its supposedly successful Arctic voyage. When the Manhattan was put in dry dock, two huge holes were found in its storage tanks. Under normal conditions those tanks would have been loaded with oil. That voyage would have been an ecological disaster for the Arctic. One hole was so large you could drive a truck through it, yet many people hailed the trip of the Manhattan as a success. It is one of the largest tankers in existence today. It has very thick plates. However, it returned from this Arctic safari with two serious gashes in its hull. This would have been disastrous had the ship been conveying oil.

I shall not continue any longer. I know that other members, particularly from the west coast, want to speak on this issue. I appeal to all members of the House of Commons, and through them to the Canadian people, to recognize the ecological and environmental disaster facing the west coast of Canada if we fail to act. Any measure which is going to stop, halt or hinder the possibility of a tanker accident along Canada's west coast, indeed the east coast and any coast because we are all Canadians and all interested in this problem wherever it exists in Canada, deserves the support of Members of Parliament and the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, what a spectacle we have been treated to today; a government in disarray! The speech made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) reeked of phoniness and hypocrisy. He appealed to this House to do something about the disaster on the west coast. He is a member of the government that is not doing anything about this problem. On the basis of a deal with the Social Credit party no doubt, the government today staged a play with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) making a statement of which no copies were provided in advance. We now know the reason for that. This was immediately followed by a motion moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Pringle). The same motion was made twice on Tuesday and once more on Wednesday.

• (1610)

Mr. Sharp: That is not so.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister says that is not so. Let me refer to Hansard, page 2879, June 6.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière is rising on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: We, Creditistes, have been accused by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) of plotting something in co-operation with the Liberal party in connection with this motion.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to set the record straight immediately and I ask the hon. member to withdraw his words because this accusation is utterly dishonest and I should even say a blow below the belt.

Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that the Creditistes are now the victims of people who abuse a stupid provision of our rules, namely Standing Order 43. It is also known that this is a misuse of our rules and perhaps Your Honour might allow me to guess what you think of it. We are the first victims of this ridiculous provision and we agreed that this motion be debated because of its urgency. We demanded that our motion be studied because it is important and included in the orders of the day.

Consequently, we cannot tolerate such language from the member for Yukon, or any member, accusing us of utterly ridiculous and alleged plots—

Mr. Rondeau: Dishonest.

Mr. Fortin: —and I respectfully request through Your Honour that this member withdraw his words immediately.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I accept the hon. member's statement that there is no deal between the Liberal party and the Social Credit party. I am bound to do that under the rules of the House. But one can only speculate as to what goes on. If the hon. member opposite has something to say, then let him stand up and say it instead of interjecting cowardly from his seat.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that I am mistaken that two motions were made last Tuesday. As reported at page 2879 of Hansard, we find the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) rising under the terms of Standing Order 43 to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity. The subject matter had to do with the oil spill that occurred last Sunday at the ARCO oil refinery at Cherry Point, Washington, which he said is now being carried by the tides and currents into Canadian waters and polluting Canadian shores south of Vancouver. He requested unanimous consent to move as follows:

> That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to examine and inquire into the oil spill at Cherry Point and the consequent infringement of Canadian sea and territorial sovereignty; and to relate its findings to studies on public hearings conducted on the west coast into the TAPS oil tanker route and oil transfer and refinery terminals; and to have power to travel from place to place both in Canada and elsewhere.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on that occasion he drew the attention of the House to the fact that the standing committee was on the west coast at the time. It was the Liberals on the other side of the House who denied the hon. member for Egmont debate on a motion that now, suddenly on Thursday, is considered a matter of urgent and pressing public necessity.

Mr. Sharp: It is not the same motion at all, not the same substance.

Mr. Nielsen: Why is there not that same denial forthcoming from the other side today? The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that the substance of that motion is not the same as the one now before us, but let me continue because that was not the only motion moved last Tuesday. As recorded at the same page of Hansard, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) moved the following motion:

(a) That this House approve immediate federal action to help clean up and protect the affected area; (b) to provide that no economic loss be suffered by the people of that area; and (c) that what has happened be drawn forcefully to the attention of the government of the United States as constituting a small sample of the inevitable ecological dangers and disasters that will follow the transportation of oil by tanker along our western coast.

Again, when unanimous consent was requested by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock to put the motion, Liberals members denied the unanimous consent that was necessary. We do not stop there, Mr. Speaker. On Wednesday, June 7, a further motion was made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), who as reported at page 2924 of Hansard moved:

That a message be sent to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence requesting it to proceed forthwith to the west coast to carry out an investigation of the oil spill at Cherry Point and to report back to the House.

Again the same thing: the motion was not urgent and it was not of pressing public necessity at that time, at least to the Liberals.

Mr. Peters: There is another one just above that.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; it has been drawn to my attention that there is another motion, again moved by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, to the following effect:

That this House invite the U.S. Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Rogers Morton and the director of the U.S. National Environmental Control Program, Mr. William Richelshaus, to visit the afflicted area and to see, at first hand, a small sample of the inevitable desecration of the west coast which will result from the proposed shipment of Alaska oil by tankers to Cherry Point.

I have referred to four motions made on two successive days which the Liberal government, including the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, did not consider urgent. Then suddenly they do consider the motion urgent today. The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour sheds crocodile tears and hurls charges across the House of political partisanship entering into this debate. Of what use is rule 43? We on this side of the House are denied unanimous consent to use rule 43 to bring a matter such as this repeatedly to the attention of the government. Yet is it for lack of partisanship that the government permits the hon. member for Fraser Valley East to bring his motion today? Or is it because of some deal that exists between the government and B.C. members as a whole?

I suggest that, as it is, rule 43 has become a farce. It is absolutely useless. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East moves this innocuous motion, following upon the heels of the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The hon. member moves:

That in the light of the damage in Canada and the UNited States arising from the recent oil spill at the Cherry Point refinery this House support the urgency of a reference to the International Joint Commission of the environmental consequences of the movement of oil in the narrow waters of the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Georgia Strait, and Puget Sound both now and in the future and of the measures necessary to minimize the hazards, and requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately convey the terms of this motion to the government of the United States.

All of this has been said in the four previous motions, if they are taken collectively. All these urgings have been made to the Secretary of State for Extenal Affairs by members of the opposition. Indeed, the very substance of the motion by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was contained in the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs made just a few minutes before the motion—yet hon. members on the other side speak about political partisanship!

Mr. Sharp: We want the support of the whole House to what I said.

Mr. Nielsen: It is sheer hypocrisy, and the minister knows that what happened today has reduced the proceedings of this House to a mere sham, a mere mockery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That is why I say this is a government in disarray. If the truth were known, the government House leader had his own cleverness backfire on him. Obviously, there is not going to be a motion under Standing Order 43 accepted in this House unless the government House leader gives the green light, and no one is going to deny the probability or inevitability of such a motion being agreed to by the government before it is even put. The minister outsmarted himself, because he did not figure the Social Credit party would react in the way it did, by attempting to get us back to orders of the day. This government, in order to be consistent, had to vote against that motion though it dearly would have loved to get back to orders. The government found itself in a box.

Mr. Sharp: So did you.

Mr. Nielsen: At least we were consistent: we voted for the urgency of the subject matter of the debate, just as the government did and, incidentally, just as the Social Credit party did. For them to move a motion that would get back to orders of the day after having agreed with the urgency of the debate was just as inconsistent as what the government did. The government has embarrassed itself: it was caught up in its own cleverness in its attempt to manoeuvre and use this House for its own political purposes. That is exactly what it was doing because its B.C. members were on the hook. The government is making a caricature of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, they laugh; the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) laughs at this.

Mr. Hogarth: Coming from you, I laugh at it.

Mr. Nielsen: Let the hon. member laugh at this. Here we have a government that says it is doing everything possible about the oil spill on the west coast. It says it is being vigorous in making representations to the United States, yet one of its own B.C. members, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, found it necessary to move a motion urging the government to do more.

Mr. Sharp: To get the support of the House of Commons.

Mr. Nielsen: This was a piece of staged showmanship because the B.C. members were in trouble. The whole thing was set up to give them some favourable publicity in a province where their fortunes are going down rather rapidly.

Mr. Basford: Why don't you have a B.C. member speak on the matter? I suggest it is because you do not have any.

Mr. Woolliams: Wait until after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I want to tell hon. members opposite, in the event they have forgotten their geography, that I come from the most westerly city in Canada, so I have an interest in this too. I consider this matter serious. I have spoken many times before about the seriousness of these spills and of having a tanker route down the west coast, as has our leader.

Because there is no real substance in the motion that has been proposed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), the following amendment to the motion:

> That this motion be amended by adding at the end thereof:
> "and that the International Joint Commission have a mandate to utilize and requisition such financial and other resources of Canada and the United States as will best and soonest restore the ecology and environment on the west coast to pre-spill conditions."

Perhaps the acceptance of that amendment will commend itself to all hon. members of this House, especially members from British Columbia and particularly the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, because it puts some teeth into what otherwise is a poor piece of cosmetic surgery in order to get them out of the political embarrassment they face in the province of British Columbia.

I condemn hon. members opposite for the shallow device used in an attempt to use this House for their own pure political advantage in coping with a situation for which they are being criticized for not doing enough. If the ministers responsible had a little backbone and did something about confronting the United States on this matter, we would be much happier.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I take it that I can speak on the motion and the amendment in the course of this debate. I will be very short in what I have to say because I recognize how deeply indebted we are to members of the Ralliement Créditiste—

An hon. Member: You mean the Social Credit party.

Mr. Hogarth: I prefer the old name, because we have Social Crediters at home and I get along much better with them. We are indebted to them for the time provided to debate this subject today. In speaking on this matter I must confess that, like many other persons who do not have a certain amount of expertise in this matter, it is not within my ken to judge or determine whether there should be a pipeline through the central part of Canada to remove Alaskan and northern oil or whether there should be a tanker route on the west coast. I can say, however, without doubt or qualification that to my mind a tanker route on the west coast which takes large vessels through the Juan de Fuca Strait will mean that a disaster will occur somewhere along the route. I should like to emphasize that statement because some people on the North American continent will not accept the fact that a disaster will occur.

Recently we have witnessed the disaster of the Torrey Canyon in the English Channel and the Arrow in Chedabucto Bay, Nova Scotia. I assure the House that in terms of land value and value of the environment, those disasters are nothing compared to what will happen when one of these large tankers breaks up in Juan de Fuca Strait, or Georgia Strait in the vicinity of the lower mainland of British Columbia.

This and other governments have had many warnings and a great deal of time in which to take very firm action. I should like to reiterate the many remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) about a situation so serious that he felt he had to go to Washington in an endeavour to prevent this sort of thing happening. I quite frankly admit that many members on the opposition side, members on this side from British Columbia, members of the cabinet and people from other parts of Canada have viewed this matter with great concern. I do not think it behooves anyone to suggest that anyone is taking political advantage by referring to the matter again.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at the personal attack made on the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) today. He has been accused of being a government dupe. He has even been accused of protecting his own property! There is not a person in this House of Commons who would ever question that hon. member's motives concerning anything in the course of his parliamentary duties.

I should like to point out to the member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), that if the hon. member should happen to own property in the United States in the vicinity of the Cherry Point oil refinery, there are also hundreds of Canadians who own property at Birch Bay, Point Robert, San Juan Island and Boundary Bay who would be affected by a disaster at Cherry Point. I say to those hon. members who suggest that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East moved a motion to protect his own property that there are many Canadians who have thousands of dollars invested in that area who wish to protect their investment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Rose: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should like to point out to my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) that I did not raise the matter of the cottage of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle); the hon. member for Fraser Valley East raised it himself. I do not have the record before me, but I believe the hon. member suggested in his speech that he had a personal interest in this matter. I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster that a number of Canadians with cottages on the United States side of the border certainly are concerned. Why should they not be concerned, as no doubt are many American cottage owners? The hon. member for Fraser Valley East is doubly concerned because he happens to be one of them.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, I accept that, if it is a retraction of the inference left in this House that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was protecting his own property when he moved this motion. I should like to get off these silly and interpolitical things and say that what we are all concerned about is one of the most beautiful parts of Canada which will be destroyed unless firm action is taken.

The damage involved could be irreparable. I am fed up with the apparent influence which large United States oil companies appear to have on all governments concerned with this matter. I do not exclude the government with which we in this House are concerned; I refer to all governments. I am fed up with the obvious delay in doing something in respect of the matter of safety which is involved.

I think rather than refer this matter to the IJC, which of course is a good idea, in addition all tanker movement should be stopped, except those which are required for local purposes, until the appropriate governments have evolved the appropriate regulations and treaties and until the people of British Columbia can be assured that they will be fairly well protected from such a disaster. I say "fairly well protected" because they can never be completely protected.

All members from British Columbia are concerned: I include members of the opposition. All of us on this side are concerned. No one can take any great amount of credit, but I should like to point out that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich certainly deserves the most credit. All of us support him in everything he has done. I also support the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis).

The problem about being a backbencher is that one does not always have the whole picture before him or the big decisions to make. It is easy for members on the backbenches and in the opposition to make wild suggestions concerning what should be done, when we do not have the expertise to deal with these questions.

However, I am not saying that the government has gone far enough with regard to protecting the interests of the people of British Columbia. With the greatest respect for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, (Mr. Sharp) I remember how difficult it was some years ago in this House to get the government to do something about the Arctic. Had it not been for a group of us who constantly prodded the government, I do not think the Arctic pollution legislation would have been passed. Certainly that is a mark for this government in the field of pollution. It was a mark for the government to have passed the clean air act and the Canada Water Act which we have in this country today. These are good steps, but I urge the government to go further than this motion contemplates. I cannot understand why the government could not take the firmest stand with the United States government in respect of this problem.

It is not good enough for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to discuss this matter with the President of the United States without immediate action flowing from that discussion in respect of the problem not only on the west coast but on the east coast. I am not suggesting that the government is not acting or will not act. I know the reference of the matter to the IJC will have some effect. However, while this reference is being held, while the endless diplomatic processes are going on, and while the IJC is considering the matter, what will happen if a disaster should take place? As much as we support this motion and the motive of the government, what answer will many of us have for the people of British Columbia if a disaster should take place in the interim?

It is my suggestion that the government should consider moving ahead with the American government with immediate, emergency legislation pertaining to the shipments and unloading of oil in the area. We are concerned about the Cherry Point disaster. In this way some assurance could be given that immediate and appropriate steps would be taken to prevent its recurrence.

An hon. Member: Do you support the amendment?

Mr. Hogarth: I see nothing wrong with the amendment. I thank the House for its attention. I think we should get on with the motion right away and pass it.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion before the House dealing with the oil spill in British Columbia and the ecological damage which will arise from it. Before beginning the main portion of my comments I should like to record my opposition of the statement of the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) who indicated that opposition members have been using this particular pollution problem in a political way. That statement does not represent the fact. I shall not outline the motions which have been moved every day this week because this was ably done by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who pointed out that the members of the various opposition parties in this House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege simply to clarify what I said. I was referring to the preceding remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. Many sincere efforts are being made by opposition members in this area of pollution, and I acknowledge them.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I said the hon. member for Yukon had outlined the areas of concern which have been brought before this House by members of the opposition every day since this oil spill became apparent. It seems rather odd to me that for three days prior to today the plea from members on this side of the House has been ignored by the government.

• (1640)

Mr. Nielsen: And denied by the government.

Mr. Harding: Yes, and denied by the government. There are several points which I think we should discuss in this debate. I certainly welcome the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth). I agree with the majority of his remarks.

This is a serious problem and it is of grave concern to every resident of British Columbia. I think it is time we did some pretty plain speaking and some pretty plain questioning of the government as to their tactics in dealing with pollution problems.

One of the first points I raise is that of contingency plans. Almost two years ago we dealt both in committee and in the House with contingency measures for handling oil spills. What was the result? We were supposed to have these measures implemented and supplies made available in every part of Canada to handle an oil spill if it occurred. What has happened in the case of this rather minor oil spill which took place on the west coast but which has caused immense damage? Precious few contingency measures were taken. This is why we asked for an investigation by the committee on external affairs, because this is an international problem.

The motion I moved yesterday requested that the committee go out to the west coast to look into the problem and to find out what happened. Were we able to move contingency supplies into the area and contain the oil before damage was done to the beach? The answer is no. We have every right to ask the government what their contingency plans are and what they have done in this regard in other parts of Canada.

If we have to cope with a major oil spill in the Great Lakes—and we might have had one in respect of the ship that was wrecked in the St. Clair River—or if we had a major oil spill in the north, what will the government do? Are supplies available to handle such cases? Again, the answer is no. The job has not been done over the last year and a half to adequately carry out the measures needed to implement our contingency plans. We have every right to question the government on this and other matters.

There is another point which I wish to bring to the attention of the House. I revert to the oil problem. Sometimes one wonders to what extent politics are involved in pollution legislation put before the House. Over two years ago we passed the Arctic pollution bill. We have set a 100-mile radius in the Arctic to keep ships from the area and to protect the delicate Arctic ecology from pollution. But that act has not yet been proclaimed although more than two years have elapsed since it was passed by the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Harding: I say that this is a phony issue which the government is always dragging out before the public. Not only has the bill not been proclaimed, but regulations have not yet been drafted. This government, the cabinet members and the party in power in Canada today has been using this issue to say to the people, "Look what we did in the Arctic". Legislation is sitting on the statute books of Canada, legislation which has not even been proclaimed, and the government wonders why people interested in ecological problems are angry with their performance.

We also have the inland waters act respecting the north. Although it has been proclaimed, regulations have not been brought down. Therefore it is useless. We passed this act over two years ago, but the legislation is useless without regulations. If we examine the list of legislation which deals with pollution problems in this nation, we find that the government has only been playing around with it. In effect, it has been misleading the Canadian public. Frankly, we are fed up with this approach to the problem.

There is another matter that I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members. We fought for it in committee and we have raised it in the House. Under the Arctic Waters Prevention Pollution Act we have set a 100-mile radius of protection. There is nothing wrong with it; I endorse it. But why do we not have the courage to set a 100-mile pollution control zone on the east and west coasts of Canada? We have been urging the government to set up such a zone. This does not mean that we will have complete control in the zone, but we will have the right to control shipping there.

Just a few weeks ago we had a serious wreck on the southeastern coast of Vancouver Island. A ship with a Japanese cargo thought it was 70 miles to the south: it was wrecked and as a result we had another oil spill. The ship came in without radar and without proper compasses. We should have an opportunity to check these ships sailing under flags of convenience. These ships are in the registry of a foreign country and are often inadequately built and equipped with inadequate instruments. They are certainly not safe for navigating on the west coast, down the Straits of Juan de Fuca and up the Strait of Georgia.

What is the government doing about this problem? There is every chance in the world of the TAPS pipeline coming from Prudhoe Bay to the west coast. Perhaps we will see a million barrels of oil per day shipped down the coast. Much of it will travel up the Straits of Juan de Fuca, one of the most dangerous straits in the world for ships. We will not see a small oil spill of a 1,000 gallons or so, because there is danger of tankers coming in there with 100,000 tons of oil. If there is one calamity, one wreck, immense damage will result from one end of the B.C. coast to the other.

What has this government done? We have made some amendments to the shipping act, and we have set up a fund. We will charge so much per ton of oil coming into our refineries and our ports until the fund is built up to a certain level. Recently, demands have been made by Nova Scotian oil companies that the rate of 15 cents per ton be reduced because they cannot handle it. I understand that the government is making some adjustment in this regard. The people of this nation have a right to demand protection of our shores from oil spillage. It is amazing to me that with all these dangers facing us, so little has been done.

I should like to get back to the matter of the oil tanker route on the west coast, the problem which we are discussing now. For a year and a half our committee has been trying to obtain permission from the government to visit the west coast to look into this problem. The chairman of the committee was the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) who was recently elected leader of the provincial Liberal party in British Columbia. He moved a motion in this House. Some of the members of the cabinet disliked the manner in which it was raised, so the committee was denied the right to travel and investigate.

We tried to get a similar motion through the national resources committee, but it went the same way. Members of the cabinet collectively were not interested in having a committee of the House of Commons conduct a thorough investigation of the oil tanker route along the west coast. No one held up this motion except the cabinet ministers who are sitting in the chamber right now. We have every right to condemn them for the action they took last year.

I endorse the motion that is before the House, Mr. Speaker. I will be happy to see it forwarded to the International Joint Commission and I hope some action will result from it. However, just last week in answer to a question which I posed in the House, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) indicated that a letter he had written to his counterpart in the United States, suggesting joint action by the IJC on the west coast of Canada, had not been answered. I certainly hope we have more luck with this motion.

Mr. Basford: Let's pass it, then.

Mr. Harding: There are several other points I would like to make before I sit down. However, I know that a number of hon. members wish to take part in this debate. I believe that major changes must be made in our shipping act if we are to bring about the type of controls that I am sure most members of the House want. We should bar from Canadian ports any ships which cannot meet the standards on which we as Canadians insist, particularly if those ships are to travel waterways such as the St. Lawrence Seaway, the Straits of Juan de Fuca and the Strait of Georgia. If we do not do this, Canadians will be the losers in the long run. We will lose because of the immense ecological damage which is bound to be done to our coasts, to our fisheries, to our tourist industry and to the living which people enjoy in the coastal areas.

It is not as if these things had not been brought to the attention of the government. Here I wish to quote from a brief which was presented to the government and, I believe, to most members of this House in May, 1971, by the Canadian Scientific Society for Pollution and Environmental Control in British Columbia, which organization we call SPEC. Some interesting points are made in the brief. It deals with the size of tankers, and says:

> The size of the tankers involved in this oil movement means that any mishap or spillage will be a catastrophe. A tanker such as the Universe Ireland—not necessarily the largest to be used—carries 300,000 tons. If this were spilled and washed up on shore it would make a blanket one inch thick, 30 feet wide and 3,000 miles long.

This is the problem that we are worried about in British Columbia. With just one major mishap in 25 or 30 years there would be a catastrophe so far as the entire coastline is concerned. This is why we are pressing this issue and urging that every pressure be put on the United States to stop the shipment of oil through the Straits of Jaun de Fuca. I quote further from the brief as follows:

> In an affidavit prepared in March, 1970, Mr. J. T. Galvin, co-author of the well known book on Pacific marine life, "Between Pacific Tides," said this about the effects of a spill from this tanker traffic:
> "The effect of the oil spills which must be expected as a result of the proposed pipeline tanker operation will be grim. Oil spilled at Prince William Sound or at sea in that area will be carried down the coast by the Japanese Current, perhaps having its major effect in the first thousand miles, but certainly making a major contribution to the fouling of the shoreline all the way to Point Conception in California, where the Japanese Current swings seaward away from the coast.
> "Not only will the oil move down the coast with the ocean current, but it will be carried by the flowing and ebbing tides into every bay, inlet and salt lagoon. And in the cold waters of the North Pacific oil degrades very slowly. In short, the effect of the inevitable spills will be catastrophic and irreversible.

This organization, SPEC, made a number of recommendations. However, it seems to me that the government has totally ignored this top-notch environmental organization which has done so much work in this field. For that reason I think the government should be condemned. I quote again from the brief:

> Because of our great concern for the damage to our environment which is sure to result from present plans for increased tanker traffic along the west coast of Canada, and the various proposals for pipe lines in the Arctic, we urge:
> 1. The Canadian government holds hearings in western Canada regarding the proposed tanker/pipeline movement of oil, so that Canadians in the area most directly affected will be able to make their views known to the government.

That recommendation was ignored last year. I have already indicated the trouble we had in trying to get a committee out to the west coast. Yesterday I moved a motion asking that the external affairs committee go out to investigate the present Cherry Point oil spill. That motion was turned down. SPEC also recommended as follows:

> That a joint Canadian/United States committee be appointed to hold hearings and to report to our governments on the many aspects of transporting oil from the Arctic which are still matters of controversy. The committee should have at least five members from each of our countries, and these five would include an economist, an engineer, a lawyer and a representative of a conservation/anti-pollution group.
> We believe that most of the decisions concerning the Trans-Alaska pipeline were made in haste, or from a narrow point of view. They have not properly considered long-term effects on economics, petroleum usage and markets, or environmental damage, and we fear that these long-term decisions are being made in haste, under both political and economic pressure.

• (1700)

> We suggest that a committee embracing both Canadians and Americans be appointed to hold public hearings, to publish their recommendations, and to open to public debate and consideration the many aspects of the development of the northern petroleum resources. This committee should also have conducted a thorough study of the ecological effects of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline route.

Mr. Speaker, there is so much to talk about, so many problems to deal with as far as an oil tanker route along the west coast of Canada is concerned, that late as it is I think the government would be wise to move now for some type of public hearing and try to gather information. If we cannot stop the building of the TAPS pipeline and the tanker route down the west coast, then at least we should know what we are up against should an oil spill occur. At least let us ensure that contingency measures are available to handle all oil spills, large and small.

It is with this in mind that I urge the government not to wait any longer, to move now. We have had one small spill from this refinery. One only has to examine the reports of oil spills which occur when tankers are loading and unloading at any port in the world to find that the spillage of oil is a great hazard. There is no doubt that when tankers start unloading at Cherry Point we shall see a large number of oil spills, and the current flowing north will sweep it up the British Columbia coast and do irreparable harm to the ecology and the beaches there.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I trust we will not leave it to the International Joint Commission to do all the investigating. Let an all-party group conduct hearings and bring in recommendations to this government which I hope will be accepted.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I must say I have found the afternoon quite interesting.

Mr. Woolliams: I should think you would.

Mr. MacEachen: There is nothing more revealing than to observe the House of Commons when it is not moving in its normal measured way and when there is the interposition of a motion or an activity that will derange the normal business of the House.

Mr. Lewis: You mean, when we have important matters to discuss?

Mr. MacEachen: We have had an example in the very important motion put forward by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Rose), who deserves to be congratulated for taking the initiative in bringing this motion before the House.

Mr. Lewis: At least you have the decency to smile.

Mr. MacEachen: In addition, he is to be congratulated for gaining unanimity in the House for having the motion put, and in the debate for securing unanimous support for the motion from every member who spoke. That is a rather important achievement.

Mr. Harding: We have been trying to get it all week.

Mr. MacEachen: This is not the first motion of this type that has been put in this session. Just the other day we carried a motion, without debate, put under the Standing Order by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); and earlier we carried, without, debate a motion put by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). Earlier still I believe we had a debate on a motion put under the Standing Order by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on, if I recollect, the subject of Biafra. So this is not a totally novel procedure, Mr. Speaker.

It makes matters difficult for all parties, however, when a motion is put quickly and we are launched on a course which was not anticipated when the House opened. Since that time, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has offered an amendment to the motion which introduces some new material and deserves consideration. Earlier today the House defeated a motion to proceed to orders of the day. I am not reflecting on the vote in any way except to indicate that if that motion had been accepted it would have supplanted totally the motion before the House and the House would not have had an opportunity to continue the debate and, more important, it would not have had an opportunity today or later to come to a conclusion on the subject matter itself. For that reason, it was not possible to support the motion.

In view of the fact that we have had a very extensive discussion this afternoon—quite a number of hon. members from British Columbia have spoken, some on this side of the House and several on the other side—not much difference of opinion has been exhibited with respect to the motion itself, so that the debate accomplished the purpose of focusing the support of the House on the motion. For that reason I believe it might be possible now to feel that we have accomplished the main purpose that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East had in mind, and draw the debate to a conclusion.

I realize that other hon. members, including the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) might wish to add comments, but with all due respect I believe the subject has been fully and ably covered by those hon. members who have spoken. Probably it would be wise at this point for the House to return—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. MacEachen: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think the minister will realize that I am asking him this question before he makes a motion that might not be debatable. Has he given consideration to the fact that if this debate were now terminated, it would mean that the Social Credit party would be cut off with only about two hours available of what should have been a full day's debate?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that, and I would co-operate in any way with every other hon. member of the House to provide additional time either today or on another day so that the Social Credit party would have the full benefit of the period that would normally be allocated to them. I take that into account in considering bringing the debate to a close, fully aware of the importance which the Social Credit party has attached to their debate today and their wish to have full play. Certainly the government will co-operate either today or on another day to give them additional time if indeed we get to their motion today.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by Mr. Sharp, that the debate be adjourned.

Oil Pollution

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of privilege before the minister introduces a non-debatable motion.

In introducing that motion, the minister is restricting the debate of the Social Credit party without giving the guarantee that it will be a normal day. I therefore wish to protest and point out that in my opinion it is not only an interference with my personal privileges but with those of all other members of our party.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I also wish to raise a question of privilege.

I should like to remind the hon. minister that we just voted to debate the problem of pollution and that so far no member of our group has had the opportunity of stating his views. The minister seems to be under the impression that all parties have been heard on pollution and since he is so eager for it to be discussed we also should like to do so.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) rising to ask a question of the minister?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen)? Before he puts any motion he may have in mind for adjourning the debate, is he prepared to give the House an assurance as to when this question will be brought on again and allowed to proceed to conclusion?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in replying to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), may I say that I would undertake to discuss with the other House leaders the question of how we can bring this matter forward at another time. I would undertake to do that and hope we can reach some satisfactory conclusion. I think we can.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How about Saturday?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the President of the Privy Council prepared to assure the House that the matter will be brought forward on Monday, in view of its urgency?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had not realized that the minister had put the motion. I received it at the table. If the motion has been moved—

Mr. Lewis: No, it has not been moved, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, with respect, Your Honour recognized the hon. member of the Social Credit party before the minister had finished reading the motion.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member on a question of privilege. I was speaking in French; perhaps the hon. member did not hear me.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? Would the minister mind explaining to the House why, since the subject in question is now before the House and other members wish to speak on it, and since no assurances on his part can possibly give the Social Credit party a full, continuous day in which to exercise the privilege that is theirs as a party in this House, he seeks to adjourn the debate? Despite any assurances he may give, he knows perfectly well that a full day cannot be given to that party. If they are given two hours today and a couple of hours some other day, that is not the same as being given a full day when all their members can take part in the debate and when others are present to hear them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: In view of these facts, and since it is now 5.15 p.m., why cannot the minister be gracious enough.—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I finish my question to the minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering on what ground the hon. member may have the floor at this time. He said he would ask a question, but the minister has the floor.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the minister a question.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member is asking a question. He has been speaking for three or four minutes and what he has said does not sound like a question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I did not think I had taken three or four minutes. I tried to make my point. Would the minister explain to the House why he wants to apply something or other—a motion to adjourn the debate, the axe, or whatever it may be—at this time, instead of allowing the debate to continue to conclusion so that we can vote on the motion tonight and adopt it unanimously.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already explained why I am putting the motion. I remind my hon. friend that we probably would have adopted the motion instantly if he had not insisted on a debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Of course I insisted on a debate. There ought to be a full debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that this is really debate. The motion has been proposed by the minister and I must put it to the House. Hon. members may consider the matter again after this motion has been decided on. Mr. MacEachen, seconded by Mr. Sharp, moves:

That this debate be now adjourned.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. MacEachen) which was agreed to on the following division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Pringle: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, I want to record why, as the mover of the original motion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wish to bring to the attention of the hon. member that it is not a question of privilege to rise to explain how a member has voted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we did not vote because we were compelled—

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe)—St. Lawrence Seaway—Reimbursement of debt; the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Immigration—Suicide of Alicia Wiercioch—Request for Investigation; the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin)—Pensions—Old Age Security—Alleged intention of Quebec government to profit by part of recent increase—Request for statement from minister.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BURTON—ALLEGED MISREPRESENTATION OF FACTS BY MINISTER CONCERNING GRANT TO MANIWAKI FOREST PRODUCTS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects the rights of all members of the House and involves the responsibilities of the government to this House in relation to the spending of money. I raise this question of privilege at the first opportunity, this matter just having come to my attention this afternoon as a result of a press report in an Ottawa paper, and I have given Your Honour the one hour prescribed notice that I intended to raise this question of privilege.

The basis for my question of privilege first of all rests on the provisions of the Regional Development Incentives Act, section 5, which prescribes the types of development incentive grants that may be paid to industries or to firms which apply for such a grant. Section 5 (2) reads:

> The amount of a secondary development incentive shall be based on the approved capital costs of establishing or expanding the facility in respect of which the secondary development incentive is authorized and on the number of jobs created directly in the operation and shall not exceed
> (a) 5 per cent of those approved capital costs,
> plus
> (b) $5,000 for each job determined by the minister to have been created directly in the operation.

There are other provisions in that section but this is the relevant one. That was amended later by Bill C-205, in the session of 1970-71, when provision was made for another type of special development incentive grant that also included a provision for a grant of $2,000.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the hon. member should indicate as quickly as possible what the question of privilege is. I suggest that the hon. member cannot take the time of the House to make a long speech. He has to indicate as quickly as possible what the question of privilege might be, and the Chair will indicate whether in its view there is a prima facie case. The hon. member cannot, under the guise of an alleged question of privilege, make a lengthy presentation.

Mr. Burton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I merely wish to establish the statutory basis upon which I raise this matter. The cause of the question of privilege was an announcement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion on June 6 of some regional development incentives grants in the province of Quebec, and the one in particular to which I wish to make reference involves the Maniwaki Forest Products Limited of Montreal which has accepted an offer of approximately $181,000 for a new veneer facility at Maniwaki. The project is expected to create an estimated 74 jobs, and the incentive grant is in the range of 15 per cent of the approved capital cost estimated at $472,000 plus $1,500 for each job created. That is the information which was provided to members. This information also has to be provided to members in regular reports under the provisions of section 16 of the Regional Development Incentives Act which specifies that there shall be a monthly report on the operations of that act.

In the Ottawa Journal of today's date, it was reported that the Maniwaki mayor welcomed the announcement of this grant, but then it was also reported that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind the hon. member that so far as I can gather, up until this moment there has been nothing that has even remotely resembled a question of privilege. The hon. member should indicate clearly how he feels that the privileges of the House have been abused. He should know, as we all do, that a dispute as to facts or the failure of the minister to give information or the allegation that information given by the minister is incorrect has nothing to do with privilege and cannot be raised by way of a question of privilege. Until now, this is all the hon. member has indicated. He should try as quickly as possible to indicate what the question of privilege is.

Mr. Burton: I was just at the point of pointing out that the plant manager stated that the number of employees would not be increased. This statement indicates a direct contravention of the legislation which has been passed by the House and would result in a misuse of public funds. Also, false information has been provided to members of the House, information which it is required should be placed before the House under the terms of section 16 of the Regional Development Incentives Act. The plant manager in this case is quoted as saying:

> We'll replace our outdated machinery and we'll still operate on a one shift basis with our 74 employees.

There is no increase in the number of jobs created. This is not in accordance with the minister's statement, on the basis on which he is expected to report to the House, so a contravention of the legislation involving an expenditure of public funds has been revealed, and he is guilty of false reporting on this matter in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that there should not be a debate on this question. This is clearly not a question of privilege; it is a dispute as to facts. I indicated a moment ago why a grievance of this kind cannot be considered by the House under the guise of a question of privilege. The hon. member may have a grievance; he may be right in his contention, but certainly a debate, if there were going to be one on the hon. member's representation or grievance, should not be entered upon in the House by way of a question of privilege.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SITTING HOURS TO GIVE SOCIAL CREDIT PARTY FULL ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in view of the course which this afternoon's proceedings took, and in fairness to the members of the Social Credit Party who have given notice today that they would like to debate a question pursuant to Standing Order 58, I wonder if the House would be agreeable to extending the time of sitting today so that they would have full opportunity to debate the question which obviously was of primary interest to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In other words, I would like to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the House would be agreeable, by unanimous consent, to extending the time for today's sitting beyond the ordinary time of adjournment so as to permit those hon. gentlemen a maximum of four hours' debate on their motion. In that way they would be able to air the question which they gave notice of last night.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, despite what the minister has said I would like to point out that this matter of opposition days is decided. In this case, however, the government introduced a motion—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Woolliams: They certainly did.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, a statement was made in the House by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) concerning a matter of importance. This was followed by a motion from a government member to discuss that matter of immediate importance, and it has now been discussed. The government made a decision as to the disposition of that motion when it made a motion to adjourn the debate. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this obviously is a government day, and not an opposition member's day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rise on a point of order, but what we have before us at the present time is a request for an order of the House to be made by unanimous consent. If there is not unanimous consent, then we would not proceed further with the matter. Other hon. members may want to express their views in relation to the point raised by the minister, but I do not think we should debate the matter. I believe there should be an indication of whether there is going to be unanimous consent or not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the request for this is made under Standing Order 43?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Obviously not. On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should have known that this is the customary request by the acting House leader on a procedural basis. If some hon. members are not prepared to extend to hon. members in the Social Credit Party the courtesy of—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously, we are not going to proceed very far on the basis of unanimity, and so I wonder if we might not proceed on motions, which is the item before the House now.

Mr. Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I fully appreciate Your Honour's desire that we go on with the business of the House, but I do not think we can afford, nor is it proper or fair to let the minister get away with a canard, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: It is, Mr. Speaker, the cheap trickery of the Liberal government,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: —and not of anybody on the opposition side—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lewis: It is the fault of the government, not of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Can we have order in the House? I wonder if I might not try to inquire if there is unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, as to the proposal made by the minister who was speaking on behalf of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), I should like to say that we are sorry about the present situation in the House. Before the House disposes of this motion, hon. members on both sides should certainly stop politicizing on the backs of the members of this party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that again we are not making much progress. It would be much simpler for hon. members to indicate clearly whether there is unanimous consent; otherwise, we shall proceed with motions.

Mr. Fortin: This is exactly what I was about to suggest, Mr. Speaker. In a word, this is the situation: A government member has moved a motion under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

I must ask if there is unanimous consent; if not, we will go on to motions. I do not think there is any point in a debate as proposed by the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to say that we agree to the five-hour debate suggestion as provided for in the Standing Orders. Such is our position, a fairly simple one. It was agreed to three times by the representatives of these parties and each time we have been had.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The matter is getting slightly more complicated from moment to moment. Already 20 minutes have gone by since we resumed our work, and we still have not agreed on anything. My understanding is that the suggestion was made that the House pursue its sitting after the hour of adjournment for an undetermined period of time. The hon. member for Lotbinière suggests that there would be—I apologize to the House. I am now told that five hours have been suggested by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please! That is the suggestion on which the Chair has to inquire whether there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: It is difficult for the Chair to determine this. I am not sure whether I heard any no's. I will ask again, and I wish if anyone has a nay that he make it clear enough.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. That is clear enough.

Mr. Speaker: That clarifies the matter.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have checked and I find that at this moment there is a committee of the House sitting, the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. I think it is very improper that while the question period, a very important procedure of ours, is continuing a committee of the House should be sitting. I think this makes a further sham of this Parliament. They should be instructed forthwith to cease their sitting until the orders of the day are called in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED NEED FOR COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF REVISION OF COMPETITION BILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to make the following motion seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be empowered to inquire into the allegation by Mr. Harold Buchwald, Chairman of the federally-appointed Canadian Consumer Council, that the government's decision to revise its proposed competition bill was an act of political expediency and that the government's decision was a result of an unbalanced dialogue since only two or three out of a total of 300 briefs represented consumer interests.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsay is put to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43. The Chair will inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

ALLEGED NEED FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF CANDU PROGRAM AND SHORTAGE OF HEAVY WATER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the following motion under Standing Order 43 seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That the House of Commons Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works, be requested to give immediate attention to the many problems associated with the CANDU program of AECL and in particular those associated with the proposed partial shut-down of the Douglas Point Power Station, the start-up of the Pickering Three Power Station and the problems involved in the shortage of heavy water and that the committee report back to this House at the earliest possible date.

An hon. Member: Oh-ho—heavy water!

Mr. Speaker: Order. May we have order please. This motion which is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

STAGNATION IN AGRICULTURE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a question of an urgent nature. Considering the thousands of agricultural auction sales held every week in Canada, especially in Quebec, which means that Canada will soon become an importer of foodstuffs, while up to now it had been an agricultural producing country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That an order of the House be issued instructing the Committee on Agriculture to consider the matter of farm foodstuff supply, which is urgent for the economy of Canada and the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLLUTION

NOISE FROM OVERFLIGHTS OF SUPERSONIC AIRCRAFTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion of pressing and urgent necessity under Standing Order 43 seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). At the Stockholm Environmental Conference, Canada's Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) said Canada is prepared to permit the occasional overflight of the Anglo-French supersonic aircraft for testing purposes.

Mr. Speaker, this House has had the assurance of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson)—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member will put the motion, we have to inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Skoberg: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, a member usually has an opportunity to at least get into the motion itself. All I was doing was giving the reasons for the motion and I was right at the point of putting the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that the precedents related to Standing Order 43 are clear. Hon. members should not attempt and are not allowed to argue the motion which they propose. I would think that Standing Order 43 gives rise to enough difficulties at the present time. It will be recognized that on a number of occasions in the past I have indicated why I thought there was something wrong with the practice in which we had become involved. I am afraid that what is happening today indicates that the Chair was correct in its assessment of the situation.

The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Skoberg: A further question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It has always been my understanding that I had to lay the groundwork for the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should resume his seat. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Lotbinière.

INDUSTRY

EFFECTS OF IMPORTATION OF TEXTILE PRODUCTS AND SHOES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): In view of the extremely difficult situation facing the footwear and textile industries in Canada which are unable to compete with massive imports, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That the problem of textile and footwear imports and their impact on our national industry, be referred forthwith to the standing committee of finance, trade and econdomic affairs, in order that efficient means could be devised to restore the competitive position of these Canadian industries and save the jobs they already provide to Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière. It is moved under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House.

DRUGS

MEASURES TO COMBAT EFFECTS OF NON-MEDICAL USE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the great use made today of Standing Order 43, I would like to move a motion under that standing order on a pressing and urgent matter.

A review of present measures is urgently needed in order to fight the damages caused by the non-medical use of drugs, especially by college and university students. The use of barbiturates has tripled, as has that of hallucinatory drugs other than LSD, while it has more than doubled in the case of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will remind the hon. member that he is clearly out of order when he tries to make a long speech in support of a motion under Standing Order 43. I suggest that even if hon. members are unhappy about the events of the day, they should still make an effort to respect the spirit of the rules of this House.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I always respect your suggestions, I will limit my explanations forthwith to the terms of Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House give immediate consideration to the problem of increase in drug abuse in order to urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take the necessary steps, jointly with the provincial health ministers, to eliminate this plague.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put, as there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I would like Mr. Speaker, to call through you, the attention of the House to the fact that systematic use is being made this afternoon of Standing Order 43 which provides that:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover—and it ends as follows:

—be made by unanimous consent of the House—

I think this Standing Order has been abused and to this moment not one hon. member who has presented a motion under this rule has been able to prove its urgency. To prevent the House from wasting valuable time I would like you, Mr. Speaker, to explain this Standing Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie will appreciate, as I stated a moment ago, that on many occasions I have given my own interpretation of this Standing Order and I have never interpreted it as being a new application of Standing Order 26 which, as the House is aware, was changed in 1968. Besides, Order 43 which dates back to 1867, should allow hon. members to submit urgent motions without any previous notice as normally acquired.

It is only under such extreme circumstances that hon. members should resort to Standing Order 43. This is the way I have always interpreted it.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. What is happening here tonight is obvious and results from the government's own ineptness earlier in the day. Rather than prolonging the agony involved in these delays, may I suggest to the acting government House leader that, if he could guarantee the Social Credit party a full day's debate, we could get on with the business of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: If he would do that, Sir, we could get on with the business of the day. It is very simple. If the government would simply admit that they goofed and give the House a guarantee, now, that the whole of Monday will be set aside for the motion of the Creditiste party, our difficulties will be solved and we will be able to get on with the business of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT INCREASE PURCHASES OF RAILWAY CARS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I add further to the sadness of this day—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: —by asking for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter which is urgent and pressing and which will help the government to be consistent. I therefore ask the unanimous consent to move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House urges the government to pursue consistently its policy of purchasing railway cars for the transportation of wheat, thus relieving the railway companies of their legal responsibilities; by purchasing sufficient numbers of cars to transport cattle from Western Canada to eastern markets, as well as by purchasing sufficient numbers of refrigerator cars to handle potato movements from the Maritimes and snow from the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has very serious doubts about what is going on. There is, to my way of thinking, a rather unfortunate situation before us at the moment and I do not think that it should be allowed to continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure if hon. members really want to present motions under Standing Order 43 all evening. I doubt if that is what hon. members want or if they want to place the House in that position. In any event, I am exercising all the patience at my command, because that is my duty and that is what hon. members expect of me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I will ask whether there is unanimous consent for the motion proposed by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I simply wish to bring to the attention of the House the fact that I concur in what you have just said, in order to show the likely feelings of minorities which feel wronged.

Our order of business was disrupted not of our own free will but owing to circumstances on which I do not intend to dwell, as you are aware of them as well as I am. I wish that today's experience will be profitable for the future and that in other fields outside this House the minority rights will be respected in all parts of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources rising on a point of order?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to indicate that I respect the hon. member's right to put his motion. As I said, we are quite prepared to have him and his colleagues debate the matter. However, it is fair to remind him that he and his colleagues consented to the motion put by my colleague earlier today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that is not helpful. That is debating, of course, the matter which was raised earlier and I have said that there should not be debate on this matter. We cannot go on eternally trying to assess blame for what has happened. I think we should try to continue with motions.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if hon. members would be quiet. Surely, we have made enough noise today, and in that I include all of us. I would now ask for a little bit of sanity of prevail in this institution. Just because one mistake was made this afternoon, and I might say the mistake was made by the government and resulted from their trickery, that is no reason for hon. members tonight to attempt to move motion after motion on matters that are not urgent and not of immediate interest. I am making a special appeal through Your Honour. I agree with your words and sentiments. I make a special appeal to the House. Let us return to the course of sanity so that we may get on with our business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in order to protect the Chair and also the rights of Social Credit members which have not been protected in any other way, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather):

That this House do now adjourn.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Peters) which was negatived on the following division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON STANDING ORDER 43

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to debate the following problem: the necessity of depolluting the Standing Orders of the House, the ambiguity of which is detrimental to the smooth running of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, a stop must be put to the frustration of the freedom of representatives of the people through cumbersome and prejudicial procedures and regulations. Therefore, under Standing Order 43, I move:

That a debate be held on Standing Order 43.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has submitted his motion. He might want to let the Chair have a copy of it.

The House has heard the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Kamouraska. The motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion therefore cannot be put.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INCREASE IN SLEEPING CAR RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it has been stated that I sympathize with you for what has happened today. I was glad that you mentioned in the House that Standing Order 43—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the hon. member to enable him to introduce a motion under Standing Order 43 and he should do so without making a speech.

Mr. Gauthier: I merely wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, that we were pleased to hear you say that such standing order has been in effect for 100 years. I wonder if it has always been used as today.

As you know, I have never introduced a motion under Standing Order 43, but just wait for the others. I have never proposed a motion under Standing Order 43, because I have always found it was ridiculous, but when ridicule defeats one, one uses the same weapons as other people.

That is why I ask, under Standing Order 43, unanimous consent of the House—and I trust it will be granted as it was to my liberal friends—to discuss a most pressing matter of interest to the users of the Canadian National, namely the recent increase of 40 per cent in the sleeper rates applied since June 1972. In view of the fact that services have been reduced considerably and have deteriorated over the last few years, I move—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must come to his motion, otherwise we will have to go on to another item.

Mr. Gauthier: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That this House study the possibility of deferring to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the new increase of 40 per cent in sleeper and roomette accommodation on the Canadian National since June 1, 1972.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REFERRAL OF QUESTION TO STANDING COMMITTEE FOR STUDY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the position taken by the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs and the correspondence between the Premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That an order be given to this House for that whole question to be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs so that it may be better understood and studied.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore the motion cannot be put.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek unanimous consent to discuss the urgent matter of the relations between the province of Quebec and Ottawa.

For a few weeks, the federal administration has been under heavy attack throughout the province of Quebec.

First of all, there was the minister's tirade—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should get to the point. He seems to be launching into a speech, but he knows he cannot do so. Under the Standing Orders, he should explain the urgency of the motion he is submitting to the House.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, as clearly stated in Standing Order 43, an hon. member who moves a motion under that Standing Order must explain why it is urgent. I do not think that anyone can deny that this is an urgent matter, when it is a known fact that the very future of our country is at stake, and if we do not want, within a year or two, Canada to go back to square one—or nine as you wish—it is urgent to debate this matter today so that the atmosphere that now exists in Quebec, with all the controversies which involve our country's future itself, may not destroy Canada.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue):

That this House be adjourned to discuss the pressing matter of relations between Quebec and Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's motion is out of order. Such motion should usually be introduced under Standing Order 26. The hon. member calls for the adjournment of the House, and he cannot do so under Standing Order 43. Therefore, his motion cannot be put.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Again, Sir, we are being treated to the same kind of asinine behaviour that is a complete waste of the time of the House. I again appeal to the acting House leader, who is at the moment speaking on behalf of the government, to bring some order and sanity back to these proceedings. The only way he can do it, I suggest to him in the name of sweet reason, is to assure the Social Credit party that they will get the full day's debate that they were hampered from having today.

Surely, we are entitled, not only in this country but in this House, to a modicum of leadership from the government and from the Acting House Leader in breaking this deadlock and getting down to the business of the country.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member what he obviously does not know: unless orders of the day are reached today, then by the operation of the rules hon. members will have an allotted day at some future date. I should also point out that if hon. members are interested in having a sensible question period, we could go ahead and have it. But if they are not interested in having that, I suppose they will continue with this charade of moving motions under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Nielsen: On that point, Sir, the acting government House leader knows, as do all other hon. members, that the assurance that the Social Credit party is seeking and that other parties on this side of the House are seeking is that it will not be an opposition day that is usurped in order to come back to the motion by the Social Credit party. This is the undertaking we are seeking from the government. Surely this is not without reason.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there is no way that representatives of the government can take away opposition days that are assured by the rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, having sat in this Chamber for the last few hours, I completely agree with the acting House leader that the present charade involves us all in the House of Commons. But I come back to a ruling made by Your Honour earlier today. While the rule may be 105 years old, I do not believe that in 105 years of parliamentary democracy of the British institution—or Anglo-Saxon institution, to get the two languages involved—there has been either an interpretation or an implementation of a ruling by the Chair which has brought the House into such utter confusion.

Frankly, I completely agree with the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that unless the acting House leader can assure us that the Créditistes will have their opposition day, then I suppose we will have to sit out the next 20 minutes. But so far as I am concerned, after sitting here for the last three four or five hours of complete insanity, I don't see why we cannot call it ten o'clock and start fresh tomorrow.

I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It has been suggested that we call it ten o'clock. Is it agreed that the Chair shall call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not agreement.

Mr. McKinley: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There are some important questions that were supposed to be asked today and we are not going to have a chance to ask them. What has happened today has brought up something that has concerned many of us for quite an extended period of time. This is the fact that hon. members who belong to the Creditiste party are situated to the left of the Speaker in the far end of the chamber. I think normal tradition was that the opposition were seated immediately to Mr. Speaker's left, and others who formed the government majority were seated in the far end of the chamber. But this government, due to its feeling of power over and control of the people of this nation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinley: —have decided that those hon. members should be seated there. I think it is time this should be changed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I appeal to hon. members to accept the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley that we call it ten o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Lotbinière rising on a point of order?

Mr. Fortin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Considering the very serious nature of the situation and the dilemma in which we find ourselves, I would like to say that it is not happily that we are fighting in order to obtain respect for the rights of the minorities in the House. But we would like to have it clearly stated that, first of all, our Standing Orders give us the right to one opposition day; secondly, that this right has today been trampled underfoot by persons who have abused a provision of the Standing Orders which is ridiculous, and the first victims of such a situation are my colleagues and myself.

Mr. Speaker, we have listened to hon. members opposite all day long and I hope now that they will be kind enough to listen to us.

Finally, I should like to say that all afternoon, as leader of the House for my party, I have attempted without result to hold talks with representatives of all other parties in order that this right be respected and that we get down to serious business. I have even put a motion to this effect.

Three times, they have come to us in order to reach an agreement and three times, we have been misled. In fact, we, have been masterfully taken in by people who are more concerned with playing politics than carrying out the business of this House. The net result, Mr. Speaker, is that you have had your fill—with all due respect—and so have we. The only thing we want is the formal recognition that our party is on an equal footing with the others, and therefore entitled to an opposition day just like the other parties. When some day the Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals understand this, there will be order in the House, but not before.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, I suggest we might call it ten o'clock but the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: I do, Mr. Speaker, on another subject and I do it on a point of order with apologies to you, Sir, because we may not reach the question period. It is obvious that the motion that was moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) is of great importance to Canada and of great concern to this Parliament. Because of that, Mr. Speaker, I should like, through you, to ask the Acting House Leader whether he would guarantee that that motion would be brought forward tomorrow for a continuance of the debate which was adjourned earlier—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Hold it a minute—just wait a minute—for the continuance of the debate which was adjourned today if our party were—and in its name I offer—to give up tomorrow, our opposition day, for the purpose of continuing that debate, understanding full well that if we do that we will lose one of our opposition days. I should like to ask the Acting House Leader, if I do that on behalf of our party, if he will guarantee to bring forward the motion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East tomorrow so that the debate may be completed and the motion voted on by the members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the hon. member's proposal, it is that the motion put in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Pringle) would become the subject matter, if the hon. member likes, of tomorrow's allotted day which was to be in the name of the hon. gentleman's party. In that case, if the House could perhaps recognize that the subject matter of the motion would be changed from the one he has given notice of to that of the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister obviously did not understand me, though I thought I made myself clear. It is my understanding that when a debate is adjourned the matter becomes a government order. What I am proposing is that we will give up our opposition day, not only give up tomorrow but give up one of our opposition days so that we are left with one rather than two, if the minister will agree that he, as Acting government House Leader, will bring forward that motion which is now a government order.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if the House is prepared to make an order this evening to reduce the number of outstanding allotted days by one, as the hon. member has suggested, that is for the balance of this part of the session, I will be quite agreeable to bringing forward the order standing in the name of my friend from Fraser Valley. If we are in agreement on the reduction of the number of allotted days by one in this case, I will be quite agreeable to calling that as the first order of business under government orders tomorrow.

An hon. Member: That is twisted.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, that was clearly what I suggested, though I did not put it quite the way the minister does because if that debate ends at two o'clock or three o'clock tomorrow, then it is possible to spend an hour or two on the motion that we now have on the order paper. I am, and my colleagues are, anxious to have that matter debated rather than adjourned until next week. If the greed of the Acting House Leader is such that he will not agree unless we now make an order that we lose the entire day, then he can have it and I hope he gets indigestion as a result of his greed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member has such a charming manner.

Mr. Lewis: I find it very hard to match yours.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to agree to that rather magnanimous offer of the New Democratic Party. We would, of course, have done the same thing had we not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: We do so on the understanding that it will not only be the motion that is now standing as a government order that will be debated tomorrow, but as well the amendment that was proposed from this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we agree with the proposal made by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) and we respect it, but we would like to have the same opportunity to dispose as we wish of our opposition days.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe there is obvious unanimity on this point. The understanding is that the motion which presently stands in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle), and of course the amendment thereto which by the Standing Orders will tomorrow become government orders, would be the first order of business. It is also understood that if this matter is disposed of before the end of the day, the next order of business would be the motion which now stands in the name of one of the representatives of the New Democratic Party. Is this understood and agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, as the hon. Acting Government House Leader says, this would be deemed to be the supply day assigned to the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Lewis: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps we might call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette rises on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a question of privilege.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to ask you if this change requires the unanimous consent of the House and then, with your permission, I shall explain why I rise on a question of privilege. First, I would like to know if this change requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, the changes suggested can only be brought in with hon. members' consent since the measure which would be studied tomorrow has already been announced and is on the order paper. It is only by agreement between hon. members, as I have just pointed out, that it would be possible to change the order of business to be put before the House tomorrow.

Mr. La Salle: In that case, Mr. Speaker, considering the numerous interventions, charges and countercharges made on each side of the House, and the entertainment the parties provided for one another—I think, for instance, of the motions moved this evening, some more serious than others—considering also that at the very last minute we are trying to give the House the prestige it ought to have at all times, I don't think we can get away with it that easily and, as far as I am concerned, I don't accept these changes.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. My suggestion is that we can still call it ten o'clock. Very soon it will be ten o'clock in any event, and I would hope that there could be consultation about tomorrow.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: —on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and it is probably my ignorance of the rules, but I assumed that if we offered to give up our day, the day assigned to the New Democratic Party, not only tomorrow but for good, so the government could use it as its day for the purpose mentioned, then with great respect I do not see how any other member of the House—

• (2150)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I respectfully submit that no member of this House could interfere with that kind of arrangement if the government agreed with it and we offered our day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to disagree with the hon. member who puts his case so well, but I have reached the conclusion that he is not completely right. When the hon. member speaks of "his day" or of "our day" he speaks, let me remind him, of an allotted day which belongs to the House and not to any member, any number of members or any party.

If the hon. member will look at the order paper he will see a specific motion, and there is no way that we can change the order paper without unanimous consent of the House. It seems to me it would be much simpler if there were further consideration of the matter after ten o'clock, when perhaps sweet reason might prevail. In my capacity as a member of one of the independent parties, I might have consultation with the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might make a suggestion which I still think would solve the problem. If there is not unanimous consent to change the order, then surely tomorrow when orders of the day are called and the order in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is read, if the hon. member declines to move the motion then the day will become a government day. I suggest that the acting government House leader could call the order in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle).

Mr. Speaker: I might agree with this, of course, but we would have to wait until tomorrow and see if the hon. member is still of the same disposition. Perhaps, in view of this possibility, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) might agree that it would be easier if we all were agreed on that point; that might facilitate matters.

The hon. member for Joliette recognizes that it is possible, even without the unanimous consent of the House, to follow the order of business which has just been announced: however, under the circumstances, it might be better for hon. members to agree to follow the order of business announced for tomorrow. I wonder if the hon. member for Joliette has reconsidered the suggestion I made a moment ago.

Mr. La Salle: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I have reconsidered this matter; if tomorrow the House finds it possible to change the order of business without my consent, I shall ask hon. members to do so, but I will not change my mind tonight.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, just before ten o'clock may I ask a question that is traditional on Thursdays. Could the acting House leader tell us what the business of the House is to be?

Mr. McCleave: Give us all the options.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, next Monday, if we complete routine proceedings, and indeed next Tuesday, we will take the two remaining days of the budget debate. Wednesday next and also Friday will be opposition days. On Thursday next the first order of business to be considered will be Bill C-170, the FISP bill, to be followed by Bill C-209, the financial mechanisms bill with respect to housing. That is to be followed, if the previous bill is dealt with, by Bill C-204, the Wheat Board bill. If that is dealt with, it will be followed by Bill C-203, the bill respecting the representation commissioner. This order, of course, is subject to revision on that particular day after the usual consultations between the parties.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the minister who acts on behalf of the President of the Privy Council could advise us whether he is waiting until he meets the house leaders before announcing the date of the next opposition day reserved for the Social Credit party.

[English]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy to do so. As I indicated, there will be two opposition days next week and I think these matters should probably be discussed with my colleague, the President of the Privy Council in order to determine which opposition parties are to be allotted those days.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At ten o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HIJACKING—CANADIAN ROLE IN SECURING ACTION BY UNITED NATIONS TO OBTAIN UNIVERSAL AGREEMENT ON EXTRADITION OF HIJACKERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister not only as Acting Prime Minister but also in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is a very serious question. In addition to the terms of the Tokyo, The Hague, and the Montreal conventions, would the minister advise the House what role Canada is taking in having the Security Council of the United Nations get all nations together, whether they are signatories to these conventions or not, to obtain a world-wide and universal agreement that extradition proceedings will apply to all hijackers and that no one will harbour hijackers or retain ransom money contrary to the conventions in question and the wishes of the majority of nations that want to bring an end to the ever-increasing, terrible, frightening, crime of hijacking?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman. It has been the purpose of the Canadian government to make hijacking a non-profitable enterprise and to do everything possible to get universal agreement that hijackers will be brought to justice. Unfortunately, not all countries in the world are signatories to the necessary conventions. We intend to be fully participating as soon as the legislation has been approved by this session of Parliament. We are now negotiating, for example, an agreement with Cuba, which is not a signatory to the universal conventions but has indicated an interest in having a convention with us.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the fact that the pilots association, not only of Canada but of the world, has asked the United Nations Security Council to take an active part in obtaining an agreement, is Canada doing anything through the Security Council to get an agreement of those nations which are not signatories to the three conventions I mentioned in my first question? I am asking the government what action it is taking internationally in that regard.

Mr. Sharp: We are trying to take the most effective action we can in this respect. It is not easy because, as the hon. gentleman knows, his views are not entirely in accord with those of all countries. We are not a member of the Security Council, but I can say here that if the Security Council should take this matter under advisement it would please Canada.

IMPOSITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT ON HIJACKERS WHO KILL PILOTS OF PLANES

Mr. Eldon M. Williams (Calgary North): In view of the fact that the new amendments to the Criminal Code dealing particularly with hijacking define the pilot in command of an aircraft as a peace officer, will the government now, without evasion or equivocation, state its policy with regard to a person who is convicted of murder by due process of the law, and who has also committed the crime of hijacking a plane, so far as the application of the penalty of capital punishment is concerned? In other words, if a hijacker kills the pilot in command of a plane, will capital punishment apply to him as a fact—we know that in law it does—and will this government see that it is carried out?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am quite sure that a question like this asking for a decision on a hypothetical case is not one that I could answer at this time. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we abhor the crime of hijacking as much as he does. We are trying to take whatever action we can, and I think are as effective as any other country in the world in dealing with this question.

HIJACKING—CONSULTATION WITH CANADIAN PILOTS ASSOCIATION REGARDING POSSIBLE BOYCOTT OF NATIONS HARBOURING HIJACKERS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Can the Acting Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, say whether or not he is aware if the government has been in consultation with the Canadian Airline Pilots Association regarding a possible boycott of those nations now harbouring hijackers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I know that my colleague, the Minister of Transport, has been in frequent consultation with the airline pilots, and I will ascertain whether there has been any recent discussion on this particular point.

HIJACKING—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO PROVIDE SECURITY MEASURES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Can the Acting Prime Minister say whether or not the government has given high priority to the allocation of funds to provide comprehensive security measures in Canada?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): There have been some recent increases in the surveillance and scrutiny of passengers and their baggage. We are very conscious of the growing threat to aircraft from this source and we are taking as effective measures as we can. I think the hon. member realizes, however, what an extremely difficult problem it is because no one knows where the next strike may occur. It may occur in places that appear to be very innocent and that are not involved in any particular international dispute. This is a problem that is faced not only by Canada but by all countries of the world, and we are trying to keep our security measures abreast of the threat. Needless to say, we could not guarantee, nor could anyone in the world, that there would not be another incident some place.

HIJACKING—POSSIBLE PILOTS' STRIKE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My supplementary question is to the minister. In light of the declaration by the pilots association that they intend to have a strike on June 19 as worldwide as possible because of this problem, would the minister advise the House whether the government has taken cognizance of this fact and, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, what steps will be taken in conjunction with the Canadian Airline Pilots Association to deal with this potential strike and the problem that gives rise to it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will inform my colleague, the Minister of Transport, about these inquiries today, and I am quite sure that when he is in the House early next week he will be very happy to deal directly with them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries, including the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Skeena. For the moment the Chair will try to complete the first round of questioning and then return to this important matter in a few minutes.

INFORMATION CANADA

ALLEGED FAILURE TO SUPPLY ADEQUATE INFORMATION TO PUBLIC ABOUT GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF EXPENDITURE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the conclusion reached in four studies commissioned by Information Canada that, despite large expenditures, Canadian citizens are not receiving adequate information about government activities, would the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether steps are being contemplated to remedy the situation, and would he also undertake to make a statement or to have the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour make a statement to the House within the next few days as to precisely what steps are being proposed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, the purpose in forming Information Canada was to try to improve the communication of government information to the public and to try to get some feedback in response. I do not think it is any surprise that we have not been wholly successful, and I am very glad to have the support of the leader of the NDP that we should try again.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, let not the Acting Prime Minister conclude that I am supporting Information Canada, as he may gather from another question I shall ask. I suggest these are very serious matters. In view of the fact that the total expenditures on government information projected for the year 1972-73 are some $63 million, compared with $39 million in the previous year, an increase of over 60 per cent, would the Acting Prime Minister undertake to review on an urgent basis this huge expenditure of taxpayers' money on activities which do not seem to be justified by the results?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government has these matters under review at all times. I am not prepared, however, to accept the premise of the leader of the NDP that these expenditures are unjustified. I would have thought from his previous question that he felt it was necessary to improve and to enlarge the facilities for making information available.

Mr. Lewis: My question implied nothing of the sort, certainly not an enlargement. My question was based on conclusions which show that these heavy expenditures of taxpayers' money are useless so far as Canadian citizens are concerned. In view of the fact that the Acting Prime Minister himself admitted that the purpose of Information Canada was to improve government services and also admitted it has not been successful, may I ask him whether the government is giving serious consideration to dismantling Information Canada which is proving to be a totally useless agency in the expenditure of taxpayers' money?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that that is argument, debate or a representation rather than a question, especially in view of the form in which it was placed. Perhaps the Chair might recognize a supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: May I rephrase my supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for that purpose, and then the hon. member for Peace River on a supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, in view of his admission that Information Canada has not served the purpose that was intended for it, the government intends to dismantle that organization that is not serving the people of Canada and is spending considerable amounts of money?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, what I said was that we had not achieved the purpose we had in mind and that we had the matter under review. I hope Information Canada will still justify its existence by improving the flow of information from the government to the people and vice versa.

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO PROVIDE GREATER FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to introducing measures that will provide for greater freedom of information, as was at one time proposed by the Minister of Finance and as I proposed in a private member's bill? Also, would such measures include steps to provide for a greater, franker and fuller flow of information in reply to both written and oral questions in this House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member I have been a member of this House for quite some time—

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Sharp: —and I have never seen more questions asked, more questions answered, nor more information provided by the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: That illustrates my point.

Mr. Bell: Where were you yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I now recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Would it be possible to bring this information department to a peak of efficiency so that it could provide us with copies of the publication on pensions and welfare?

INDUSTRY

REVIEW OF POLICY RESPECTING PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY—SUGGESTED DISCUSSION BY FEDERAL AND QUEBEC MINISTERS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Does the minister intend to meet his Quebec counterpart, Mr. Saint-Pierre, in order to discuss the policy which seems at present the subject of another litigation between Quebec and Ottawa?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have met Mr. Saint-Pierre, as I had met his predecessor, on a number of occasions. I think the suggestion is valid. I had thought of it myself and I intend to meet Mr. Saint-Pierre again soon.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

As the minister indicated that he was willing to revise the policy concerning the matter in which the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce is interested, I should like to ask him whether the government is still willing to do so?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, before meeting Mr. Saint-Pierre, I shall naturally consult with the federal ministers who are either interested in or responsible for sectors related to that of the petrochemical industry.

FINANCE

PURCHASE OF AMERICAN DOLLARS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister because of the absence of the Minister of Finance for several days, which must have some significance. In view of the fact that foreign investors are unloading United States dollars and that the soaring Canadian dollar is hurting the export market, would the government let the Canadian people know something of the mess in which the finances of the country are by revealing at once—I would suggest on Monday—the total amount expended each day by the Canadian government in the purchase of American dollars? During the last year the increase in American dollars has been about $100 million a month and apparently there has been an increase in the last two weeks. Would the minister provide that information in order that Canadians may understand what the situation is instead of the matter being entirely concealed from the people as a whole?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman himself prefaced his question, we are facing a very difficult and worldwise situation arising out of the weakness of the American dollar, which is reflected in the values of all currencies the world over, and the rising price of gold. As far as the operations of the Canadian government in the exchange market are concerned, this is not a matter that the Minister of Finance discusses on a daily basis. I will bring the attention of the minister to this question, and I am sure he will be able to satisfy the right hon. gentleman when he returns to the House.

Mr. Baldwin: Ask Ben; he had all the answers last year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should also like to know whether the minister recalls that the former secretary of the treasury of the United States, Mr. Connally, prophesied what the effects would be on the Canadian dollar although the former Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Kingston, said that he did not fear any increase in the level of the dollar. Has the government now changed its views in that regard, having changed ministers of finance?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that former Secretary of the Treasury Connally would not have forecast such weakness in the American dollar.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, apparently the minister did not read what Connally said. I will place that on the record when the opportunity comes. I proceed to the next question in connection with finance. In view of what has been described by financial men across Canada in the current issue of the Financial Post as the seriousness of inflation—indeed, they say that the greatest danger to Canada now is from inflation—is the government now giving consideration to bringing in some form of price and wage control?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what the Prime Minister has said on that subject—

Mr. Diefenbaker: He did not say anything.

Mr. Sharp: —when he was questioned on it last week. The matter has been under review. The government does not say that it may not be necessary at some time, but these circumstances have not yet arisen. I would be very interested at some time to know whether the right hon. gentleman is advocating these measures.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not answer questions here, but I would be glad to give the government a little advice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair interrupted a series of questions a moment ago and undertook to return to them for one or two supplementaries. The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

AIR TRANSPORT

HIJACKING—POSSIBILITY OF CANCELLATION OF LANDING RIGHTS FOR AIRCRAFT FROM COUNTRIES NOT WILLING TO RETURN HIJACKERS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister with regard to the hijackings that have been going on. If all reasonable efforts fail—and I mean reasonable efforts because Canada is recognized by the world's nations as being reasonable—in reaching agreements with other countries now harbouring hijackers, can the minister say if Canada would consider cancelling the landing rights of aircraft originating from countries that are not prepared to return hijackers immediately?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious suggestion that has been made. It is one with very broad implications and it is not one on which I would want to give an offhand opinion.

HIJACKING—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO MAKE HIJACKING EXTRADITABLE OFFENCE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since Canada is a signatory to extradition treaties with the United States and Great Britain, and since those two countries have amended their treaties with each other so as to include hijacking as an extraditable offence, is the government negotiating now with Great Britain and the United States with a view to Canada making a similar move?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may have forgotten that I signed such an amended agreement with the Secretary of State of the United States, but I understand the hon. member is probably not as familiar with these things as I am.

Mr. Nielsen: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has not answered my question with respect to the inclusion of hijacking as an extraditable offence in the extradition treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite certain what the state of law is between the United Kingdom and Canada, but no problems would in fact arise under such circumstances. I know the hon. member believes that, too.

HIJACKING—REPRESENTATIONS TO ALGERIA FOR RETURN OF HIJACKERS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of Canada's very friendly and close relationship with the government of Algeria, as evidenced a week or two ago by the government lending the government of Algeria half a million dollars to build a fish processing plant, without interest, incidentally—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, if this giggling would stop perhaps I could ask my question. In light of this close relationship, can the minister say whether the government of Canada will or has made representations to the government of Algeria for the return of the two American citizens who are being harboured in Algeria as hijackers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any Canadians are involved in this, and our general position on hijacking is well known to the government of Algeria. Therefore I do not think there would be any reason for us to make bilateral representations.

IMPOSITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT ON HIJACKERS WHO KILL PILOTS OF PLANES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to another question I asked previously. Since the law calls for capital punishment of a person convicted of murdering police officers, and since the new bill that the government has brought in classifies the commanding officer or pilot of a commercial airliner as a peace officer, I now put my question to the minister once again and I hope I do not get an evasive answer. Will the government carry out the law in that regard?

• (1130)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada always carries out the law.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the right to rise on a question of privilege, but we will then try to go on to the next question.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, it is surely a question of privilege when a member receives an answer like that. In all cases where police officers have been murdered and the accused have been convicted of murder by due process of law, the sentences have been commuted to life imprisonment. I do not want evasion and equivocation from the minister. I want him to carry out the law.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North rose on a question of privilege, not a supplementary. We might try to go on to the next subject. If hon. members want to ask further supplementaries, later, we will return to this subject if there is time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Several times in the last few weeks questions have been asked in the minister's absence about a change in the basic disability pension rate, with the request that this matter be sent to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs with a special reference to study it and bring back recommendations to the House of Commons. Is the minister prepared to reply to that suggestion?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the whole matter is now under study in my department by my officials. If members of the groups concerned would care to appear before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, I would have no objection.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—PRESENT POSITION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Labour with regard to the strike in Montreal. In light of the fact the Minister of Labour indicated that he had sent telegrams to both the employers and the longshoremen asking them to submit the dispute to immediate arbitration, and in light of the fact the longshoremen have indicated that they have not received such a telegram, is the acting minister in a position to advise just what the situation is regarding this conflict?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot add anything to what the hon. member has just stated. He will have to wait until Monday for the Minister of Labour to comment.

Mr. Alexander: In view of the fact I have been informed that a telegram has been sent to the effect that the longshoremen are not interested in arbitration, nor will they hold to any arbitration award, can the acting minister advise what the next step of the government is in view of the very serious implications this strike has on the economy of the country?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, that is definitely up to the Minister of Labour.

TRADE

SUBMISSION TO UNITED STATES ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL RESPECTING MICHELIN TIRE COMPANY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OR STATEMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the House whether he has prepared a submission on the Michelin case to put before the anti-dumping tribunal in the United States? If so, has that submission actually been presented?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Strike one, Mr. Speaker. I know it is being prepared, but I do not know whether it has been sent. I will find out and answer on Monday.

Mr. Broadbent: When the minister finds out what his department is doing in this regard, will he consider tabling the submission or at least making the essence of the submission known to the House by way of a statement on motions on Monday?

Mr. Pepin: I will consider that, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

DEFERRAL OF MORTGAGE PAYMENTS FOR KAMLOOPS RESIDENTS AFFECTED BY FLOOD

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can the minister advise the House whether he has yet received confirmation from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the 60 home owners who were victims of a serious flood in Kamloops last weekend have had their payments deferred for three months? I believe the minister made representations to this effect yesterday.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to arrange with the approved lenders for the deferral of such payments for three months. I understand they are having a meeting with the approved lenders on Monday in Vancouver to arrange this. I expect the approved lenders will comply with the request being made of them in order to assist the home owners in Kamloops who have been flooded.

REQUEST THAT CMHC LOANS NOT BE MADE IN AREAS SUBJECT TO FLOODING

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It has to do with flooding not only in British Columbia but also in Quebec at Laval and Chateauguay. Will the minister request his officials to examine all areas that were flooded in order that in the future no CMHC loans or NHA guarantees will be allowed on homes in areas subject to flooding?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question. The hon. member is making a representation and doing so in a very clear way.

POWER

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF NUCLEAR PLANT ON STODDART ISLAND, NOVA SCOTIA, BY PRIVATE COMPANY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of negotiations presently under way between a private group of individuals and the government of Nova Scotia with regard to the possible location of a nuclear power station on Stoddart Island, Nova Scotia, is the government in a position to indicate whether it has a policy with regard to the construction and operation of nuclear power stations by private concerns anywhere in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There are two government agencies that would be involved here, the Atomic Energy Control Board and the National Energy Board. The Atomic Energy Control Board is responsible for the safety of reactors. I understand that the proposed reactor would be a light water reactor of the American type which at the moment has not been authorized for use in Canada. It would either require a change in those criteria or a refusal of the application. At the moment, neither of the two federal agencies has received an application with regard to the proposal the hon. member has mentioned.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING INCREASE IN CLAIMANTS SINCE IMPLEMENTATION OF NEW ACT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Has the application of the new Unemployment Insurance Act increased the number of recipients?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Accepting the fact of poor attendance on both sides of the House in this fading Parliament, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, after yesterday, the Prime Minister has gone to see the Governor General, is in Washington looking into the oil spill, or is his absence just due to Friday politics?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: Where is Bob?

Mr. Bell: We know where he is.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Algoma in his capacity as chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. In view of the answer given a few minutes ago by the Minister of Veterans Affairs to the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), will the hon. member consult with the government House leader concerning the possibility of getting a term of reference from the House so that the standing committee can discuss the question of revising the basic rates of veterans pensions?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be pleased to do this. As soon as a reference is made by the government and the House leader, we would be very pleased to study the matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IMPENDING DEMOLITION OF GUELPH ARMOURIES—REASON FOR EXPENDITURE ON SIGN

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact negotiations are almost completed between his department and the city of Guelph for the sale of the armouries which have been there for 61 years and will be demolished, can the minister explain why as late as last week a large sign which is reported to have cost $500 and contains nothing more than "Department of National Defence, Canadian Forces Armouries, Guelph" was erected?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think that is a proper question. It should be placed on the order paper. The hon. member will agree that his question is more in the form of a grievance. It is not a question that can be accepted at this time.

Mr. Hales: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED EXAMINATION OF ACT AND REGULATIONS BY COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Bearing in mind the serious problems which have been created by the existing provisions of the Immigration Act and the regulations governing immigration, would the minister urge his colleagues to arrange for the appointment of a parliamentary committee as soon as possible to look into this whole question and make recommendations? I shall not refer to the many cases, but in light of facts of which I am sure the minister is aware would the hon. gentleman consider the appointment of such a committee?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, may I draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that hearings were completed before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration not more than a week ago, at which hearings his party was very adequately represented.

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I have a supplementary question either to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or to the Acting Prime Minister.

Because Canada's international reputation is involved, and because draft dodgers are greeted with open arms and political assassins are allowed to remain here while hardworking people whose only desire is freedom commit suicide—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question? That is not a question; it is an argument or a speech. He should ask a question.

Mr. Paproski: These are facts, Mr. Speaker, because they are treated like criminals by reason of the inhumane and ruthless bureaucratic regulations. I ask this question—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, I suggest to the hon. member, is not in accordance with the rules. He is really making a speech. If every member took advantage of the rules in this way there would not be many questions asked during the question period. I think there is a responsibility resting on all members to abide by the rules.

Mr. Paproski: Would the minister, or the Acting Prime Minister, tell us whether the government is conducting a special inquiry into the tragic death of Alicia Wiercioch who loved Canada so much that she killed herself to stay here?

Mr. Speaker: This question has, of course, been asked before. But the minister might have additional information and he might wish to reply at this time.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I did ask for an inquiry in the light of what appeared to be circumstances concerning my department. I might say that the lady in question was not ordered deported on the ground that she was working illegally in Canada, as reported in the press. She obtained the right to work in 1970. She was not ordered deported before she came to the end of her appeal procedure. In fact, her lawyer had indicated her case would be resubmitted for appeal some time in the future and had asked permission to have the normal period of time for appeals to the Federal Court extended. Also, there was still the possibility of an appeal to the Supreme Court. Thus, although the circumstances are very tragic, they can hardly be linked to any rights which this person was denied.

Mr. Paproski: Can the minister report to the House on the number of deportations to countries behind the Iron Curtain in the last six months?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking, I suggest, for statistical information, and questions of that kind should be placed on the order paper.

REQUEST THAT ALL PERSONS APPEARING BEFORE APPEAL BOARD BE ENTITLED TO COUNSEL

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Will the minister assure the House that all persons appearing before the Immigration Appeal Board will be entitled to be represented by counsel whether on an original application for deportation or on any subsequent reconsideration?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be glad to take this matter up with the chairman of the Appeal Board this very day.

MEASURES TO SPEED UP DISPOSITION OF APPEALS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the fact that I was a member of the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration when the minister indicated he had in mind a procedure for speeding up appeals which would alleviate many of the difficulties, could the hon. gentleman now give us a definite idea of these proposals and tell us when he expects to implement this new procedure?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker I think that at one of the few meetings of the committee that the hon. member missed I explained in detail the proposals for speeding up the appeal procedure. For example, I mentioned that as of July 1 we would be adding, in the Toronto area, an additional staff of 100 to deal with appeal procedure problems, with greater emphasis on appeal procedure at the special inquiry officer stage—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is now giving information which I suggest to him is so detailed that it ought to be given on motions. Perhaps the matter could be pursued on Monday, but we are running short of time now.

Mr. Alexander: May I say I know something of these arrangements because members of the committee were advised as to the procedure the minister has in mind, but would the minister make a statement on Monday informing us in detail as to what he intends to do? I might add that I am presently involved—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appeal to hon. members to ask short questions and to ministers to give short answers, because we now have only three minutes left in the question period.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER FOR DEPORTATION OF TUAN VU

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): May I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question concerning the case of Tuan Vu against whom a deportation order has been issued and whose appeal has been denied by the Immigration Appeal Board. He will almost certainly be executed if he is returned to South Viet Nam. Would the minister ask the Immigration Appeal Board to reconsider the case and cancel the deportation order issued against this person?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): This case is presently before the Federal Court. I would not wish to comment on whether or not this man's life would or would not be in jeopardy because the matter is sub judice. I would have to wait until the Federal Court has disposed of the case.

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF APPEAL PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether in view of the circumstances surrounding the suicide of Alicia Wiercioch the hon. gentleman will make public the proceedings of the appeal case on March 15 before the Immigration Appeal Board which ordered her deported?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As the hon. member should know, or does know, the Immigration Appeal Board is independent of the minister and of the department as well as of Parliament. I can only make such a representation to the board and the board will have to judge whether it is in the public interest to reveal that information or not.

GRAIN

RAPESEED—THREATENING INFESTATION BY BERTHA BUG—REQUEST FOR ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the question I wish to ask would ordinarily be directed to the Minister of Agriculture. I discussed it with that hon. gentleman yesterday but because of the debacle in the House no attention could be given to it. It has to do with a matter of very deep concern, namely, the threatening infestation by the Bertha bug of the rapeseed areas in northeastern Saskatchewan, particularly in the districts of Melford, Nipawin, Tisdale and the like. While it will not be until the middle of next week that the moths commence to fly, the fact is that the infestation appears to be more serious today than it was last year. Would the Acting Prime Minister do what he can to have the Department of Agriculture look into this matter over the weekend, because if the situation becomes more serious than it was last year it will constitute a serious threat to the meeting of contracts for rapeseed and, in addition, of course, the income of farmers would be greatly reduced?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I can assure the right hon. gentleman of our concern. The answer to the question is yes.

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—NUMBER OF AMERICAN COMPANIES MAKING USE THEREOF

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister inform the House whether the number of United States corporations that have made applications under DISC has now stabilized or whether it is still increasing? Is the minister now in a position to tell us the number of DISC applications and also disclose their names?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have some very fat figures somewhere. I will give them to the hon. member after the question period. At the end of April it was somewhere around 2,000.

• (1150)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair expressed the opinion in respect of a similar question a moment ago seeking statistical information that this kind of question ought normally to be placed on the order paper or considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Nystrom: May I ask a further supplementary question. Will the minister say whether the number of applications has now stabilized or is it growing? I think this is important to Canadians.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to remember, but my impression is that it was about 1,700 at the end of the previous month and 2,000 at the end of last month, which is an increase of about 300 to 400 a month.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST BY ALLIANCE THAT REGIONAL RATES OF PAY BE ABOLISHED

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and deals with the recommendation of the Public Service Alliance of Canada that pay zones be scrapped. Will the minister now consider having equal pay rates for federal employees across the country?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the formal representations from the Public Service Alliance on regional pay rates do not exactly jibe with the statement the hon. member has just made.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

On the order: Consideration of the Business of Supply.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that perhaps the best way to proceed, in view of the discussions last night, would be to call the two supply motions one after the other. I believe there in an understanding that if they are not proceeded with we would then, according to the Standing Orders, revert to government business.

Mr. Gauthier: Stand.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, for the reasons given last night by my leader and our House leader, I do not wish to proceed with our motion at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

POLLUTION

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. Pringle):

That in the light of the damage in Canada and the United States arising from the recent oil spill at the Cherry Point Refinery this House support the urgency of a reference to the International Joint Commission of the environmental consequences of the movement of oil in the narrow waters of the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Georgia Strait, and Puget Sound both now and in the future and of the measures necessary to minimize the hazards, and requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately convey the terms of this motion to the Government of the United States.

And on the amendment thereto of Mr. Nielsen (p. 2969).

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette on a point of order.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I regret having to ask you further information. I would like to know whether the House still needs the unanimous consent to resume consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle).

Mr. Speaker: Not today.

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word about the reasons for giving up our opposition day today. It is clear to me and to my colleagues that if the motion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) was serious and considered to be serious by the government, and if the Liberal party in this House was not merely playing politics but was concerned about the motion having the support of this Parliament, then it was wrong and undesirable for the government to have adjourned the debate yesterday so the motion would hang on the order paper for God knows how long. If, on the other hand, the government members as well as all of us in the opposition considered the matter raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East to be serious, and that a unanimous approach by this Parliament to the government of the United States would be useful, necessary and desirable, then the debate on that motion ought to have been completed as soon as possible. The vote on the motion should have been taken as soon as possible, since we know it would be a unanimous vote, in order that the motion and any amendment adopted might find its course to the government of the United States, because that is where it was intended to go.

We in my party were not prepared to see this very important matter dealt with in the cavalier and irresponsible way in which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and the Liberal majority in this House dealt with it yesterday. This is a serious matter and it is literally not only distressing but disgusting to note how this government deals with important matters, totally insensitive to the needs of the country and the people. It is playing games all the time and we were not prepared to see that happen. Since it could not be completed yesterday, because of the action of the government, we were determined that if the government would agree, as it did, the matter would be completed today. It is our hope that before this day ends this debate, hon. members having been given an opportunity to participate therein, will conclude and a vote will be taken, a voice vote or any other kind, in order that what the motion requests will happen. It will then go forward as the unanimous wish of this Parliament.

As has been said by speakers who preceded me, the little spill at Cherry Point, which has poisoned a large part of the beach area of our western coast, is an ominous warning of what faces Canada if any kind of oil tanker route is developed along the Pacific coast of this country. This government ought to have acted, as it was requested by us to act a long time ago, when the decision to build a refinery at Cherry Point was first made. People who know about these matters warned at that time that a refinery at Cherry Point was an ecological time bomb for the west coast of Canada as well as the west coast of the United States surrounding that area. People who know about these matters, and I can only go by what they tell me as I do not myself know, are aware that the currents and the winds are northward, that the dangers to shipping are very great in that area, and that the building of a refinery only 15 or 16 miles south of the Canadian border, right on the coast, not inland, was an act of reckless disregard for the ecological welfare of the people on the west coast of the North American continent, not only of Canada. This government ought to have protested at that time about that refinery being built there.

While I have not made a close study of this matter, it seems obvious to me that the Atlantic-Richfield Corporation built that refinery where it is for purely economic reasons. It was the most northern point on the United States coast, right on the coast at a point as close as possible to Alaska for tankers coming down south. As I have often said about corporations, this corporation was concerned merely about the efficiency of the operation, the profitability of the operation and the convenience of the operation; it was not concerned at all with the ecological dangers of the operation. This is what happens all the time across this continent because we permit these corporations to make decisions purely in terms of the economy with which they are concerned. They took a reckless step that endangered the future as well as the present of society in this country and, indeed, in the United States at the time the proposal was made to build a large refinery at Cherry Point. This government on behalf of Canada should have raised Cain with the United States authorities and demanded that this plan not be carried out.

Because of the importance of this matter we felt that the motion should be debated today. I want to make it clear that although we will give our support to the motion we will also support the amendment by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), because that amendment adds some teeth to the proposal we want to make to the International Joint Commission.

I am of the opinion that motions moved earlier this week, on one occasion by a member of the Conservative Party and on three occasions by members of my party, were much more relevant and much more important proposals to deal with this problem than the proposal that the matter merely be sent to the IJC. I think also that we ought to have had before us something concerned not only with this minimal spill at Cherry Point but concerned with a total plan about moving oil from Alaska down the waters of our western coast. We should have had a motion, that would have the unanimous approval of this House, that we should go to the government of the United States and say that this country will not stand for large oil tankers going down the Pacific waters. That is the motion we ought to be debating. I shall say a few words about that.

Obviously, there has been collusion between the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). The Secretary of State for External Affairs made a statement that the government of Canada has asked that this matter go to the IJC and the hon. member for Fraser Valley East replied by moving the motion. That is okay. I suppose it is understandable that this kind of politics might have happened. We could have done the same kind of thing. I do not want to sound self-righteous, but I wish to underline this. I could have accepted the offer of the Acting House Leader, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), last night that we deal with this matter on our opposition day. I could have placed a motion of this nature on the order paper before six o'clock yesterday precisely for that purpose. May I say I gave it some consideration but it seemed to me that that would be crude enough, partisan enough and cheap enough to qualify me to become a member of the Liberal party and that I could not contemplate.

Mr. Sharp: We have not invited you.

Mr. Lewis: On this motion, we must consider the matter in two areas. One is the area of national action and the other is the area of international action, because it must be an area in which the United States and Canada work together. I wish very briefly to go over the government's record in terms of legislation, in terms of regulations and in terms of any kind of really positive action. It will not take me very long to do so. However, it is a very dismal story which ought to be placed on the record.

Two years ago we passed the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act. This act has not even been proclaimed. No regulations have been prepared. The government goes around the country saying: "Look at what we did about the Arctic. We have a 100-mile zone which we have claimed for the purpose of pollution control". Members of the government point to the law which is on the statute books. An old friend of mine, a Newfoundlander, many years now dead, originally a leader of a trade union, used to say to me that gentleman's agreements "ain't worth the paper they are writ on". A law which is not proclaimed ain't worth the paper it is writ on either. A law of that sort which does not have the regulations proclaimed is not worth having on the statute books because most of the powers are left to the regulations.

Then, two years ago we passed the Canada Water Act. As yet there is not a single water quality management area established in this country. There are no national standards established in this country, and we are faced with something on the statute books which is merely another dead law. Then, we had the land use regulations for the north, but we find as usual that the government yielded to the pressure of the large corporations, their dear close friends, with the result that those regulations were watered down. As a result of this they do not cover the whole Arctic, but deal only with a select area in the Mackenzie River Basin and do not cover the matter of control over the Islands or other Arctic areas. Then, we have the Northern Inland Waters Act which was passed two years ago and proclaimed only a few weeks ago. Under that act we do not have the regulations, either. Not one of these acts is of very much value without such regulations. Then, finally, we have the James Bay development in northern Quebec which apparently is going ahead without ecological surveys having been made which are effective, adequate and conclusive. We will be faced with more ecological damage in that part of the country.

I find that this record is a dismal one. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) is now in Stockholm. He can make the finest speeches he likes and take admirable steps there. But I must say, from what I read—and I will know more when the conference is over—that I do not find much to criticize in the attitude of our delegation at Stockholm. If he can do that in Stockholm it seems to me he ought to be burying his head in shame because of the total inactivity of the government in the area of ecology, despite the laws it has placed on the statute books. Ecology is now like motherhood. Everybody talks about it. All of us talk about the dangers to the environment. All of us make fine speeches about the quality of life. It is only the government of this country which can do anything really effective about it and the government of this country has done very little—if you can call it even "little"—in the national sphere. In the international situation, in respect of these oil spills, we are in the same dead alley, in the same cul-de-sac, as we are in respect of all international measures.

According to the Secretary of State for External Affairs we have not yet received from the United States any reply even to the request that the matter be sent to the IJC. The TAPS route and the tanker route, which is connected with the TAPS route, apparently has been approved in Washington. I suggest the government is merely bleating pleas all the time like wounded sheep. And, like wounded sheep, they just bleat all the time and do nothing worthwhile about it. I say, appreciating the seriousness of the words I use, that the decision of the authorities in Washington to approve the TAPS route and the tanker route is an unfriendly act against the interests of the people of this country. In our modern world it is not only guns, rifles, canon and bombs which can do damage. In our modern world, I think ecological damage is almost as serious. It is not as quick. It takes longer. The threat to human existence for decades to come is just as great from ecological damage as it is from outright war so long as this war is with conventional arms and not with nuclear arms. It is just as important.

For a powerful neighbour of Canada to disregard—there is no other way to put it—the interests of the people of Canada on the west coast and indeed all the people of Canada, despite requests from us, and to approve the TAPS and tanker routes is almost the equivalent of an act of war. It is almost the equivalent of an act of war. It is an unfriendly act, and I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is in his seat today as Acting Prime Minister, to stop bleating and to start speaking firmly and loudly on behalf of the people of Canada so that Washington's ears may at last be opened to the rights and interests of the Canadian people.

As I have said, the very building of the refinery at Cherry Point was an affront to Canada and Canada's interests. As I was preparing a few notes for my remarks this morning I could not but recall the statement of the President of the United States when he was in this chamber. I admit that I did not greet him with the enthusiasm that some others in this House did, but I could not help but recall the sweet words of reason and the expressions of friendliness as well as the assurance of our independence that the head of government of our great neighbour uttered in this House. I want to say that as far as the members of my party are concerned, we want friendship with the United States.

However, we say to the president and his advisers in Washington that one of the ways in which that friendship can be made real, practical and relevant for the people of Canada is for the government of the United States to join us in stopping the TAPS route and the tanker route down the Pacific along our west coast. No general words of friendship will hide the unfriendliness if the president and his advisers permit that ecological threat to the wellbeing of the Canadian west coast to take place. I suggest to you, Sir, that this is the kind of approach that this country should take with the administration of the United States.

What we obviously need on this issue is to mobilize the wishes, the desires and the protests of all the people of Canada, and that is what this government should be doing. That is why the motion before us now to send the matter to the International Joint Commission is a petty step, and that is why the suggestions made by the Conservative and NDP members in their motions would have been much more useful. That is why it was shameful of the government to refuse to allow the Committee on the Environment, chaired by a member of the Liberal party who is now the provincial leader in British Columbia, to travel to the west coast to hold hearings, and more recently to refuse a motion requesting unanimous consent that the Committee on External Affairs, which was in the west at that time, should also hold hearings with regard to the ecological dangers on the west coast.

Those hearings of the Committee on the Environment and the Committee on External Affairs, either or both, would have been a platform and a forum for all the organizations dealing with environment, such as SPEC and other organizations on the west coast as well as representatives of all political parties and trade unions, of farm organizations, of fruit growers, of all the people in British Columbia, of wildlife organizations, of conservationist organizations and of all those deeply concerned with this matter. Hearings held by these parliamentary committees would have given all these organizations an opportunity to appear, to present briefs, and to show their concern, and the inevitable result would have been that the voice of the Canadian people on the west coast would have reached at least the west coast of the United States and also the authorities in Washington.

I suggest that it was thoughtless of the government of Canada not to see the value of that kind of popular support for the position that the Secretary of State for External Affairs boasts about taking with respect to the TAPS and the tanker route. It would surely have helped him in his negotiations with Washington if there were a widespread and loud demand by the people of Canada that the authorities in Washington cease their dangerous and reckless course in this respect. None of these things has happened. The laws are on the statute books but are either unproclaimed or without regulations. The government bleats, as I said, about the tanker route but does nothing serious about it and refuses to give an opportunity for the expression of the popular will in Canada on that subject.

I suggest that this is the reason why we are where we are on this motion. The shipping act and the shipping regulations have not been enforced. They are not strong enough. We do not insist that every vessel, every barge and every tanker that goes down that coast, whether carrying oil or anything else, have the necessary protective equipment and the necessary trained crews on those ships. We let things happen, and as a result spills occur. But worst of all—and I left it for my last point quite deliberately—the government has entirely failed to produce and to develop the contingency plan that we were promised more than two years ago.

I have in my hands a publication of the marine operations of the Ministry of Transport of about a year ago which speaks in general terms about the fact that there are internal federal contingency plans for combatting oil and toxic material spills. But nothing has really happened. The contingency plans have not been put into effect. We have not been told about the existence of any equipment for cleaning up spills that might be in place at Vancouver, at all the ports and all the points along the Pacific coast, and if they are in place we would like to hear about it today. I have not seen any reference to the fact that there is any really modern clean up equipment along the Pacific coast of Canada where it should be. When this small accident involving only 12,000 barrels of oil occurred we had literally nothing ready and available to deal with the mishap and people had to carry bales of straw in order to try to protect their beaches.

[Mr. Lewis.]

All the other things I have mentioned are serious enough, but it seems to me that the failure to develop contingency plans of any worth and the failure to place the necessary protective and clean up equipment along the points where they should be placed, as well as the failure to train the necessary personnel to deal with the mishap, is perhaps the most disastrous and the most indefensible failure of all.

In the document which I mentioned, I notice a reference to a manual of counter measure technology which is being prepared and will be issued in support of the contingency plan. I made inquiries about it this morning. Perhaps I did not go to the right place, but no one was able to tell me that the manual of counter measure technology has already been prepared to go along with the contingency plan. It seems to me that in every one of the areas which concern this life and death matter of ecological quality for the Canadian people the government has been limping instead of taking the steps that the situation required.

I wish to say finally that I and my colleagues appreciate the fact that we are dealing with an issue that is not easy to solve, an issue that is partly international in character, and that therefore we must rely on the willingness of other nations, as well as on our own, in order to do the job as thoroughly as all of us would want to see it done. I am not suggesting that this is a problem that can be solved overnight, or that there is a wand that somebody can wave and end it. I appreciate it will take a great deal of pressure, a great deal of work, a great deal of determination to do some of the things that obviously need to be done. I would not be critical of the government if I saw any evidence of that work having been started, if I saw any evidence of the determination being there. But when I look at this situation both with respect to legislation on the statute books and with respect to the kind of representations the government has made to Washington, I must conclude that there simply is not the determination, that it is in most cases a specious kind of window dressing, the kind of easy going assurance that usually follows the complacency for which the government is now famous.

We shall vote for the motion and the amendment. However, I hope that the government does not think that dealing with this narrow motion, improved by the amendment, but still in a narrow area, ends the concern of the Members of this Parliament about the inadequate activity of the government in the ecological field.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I should indicate to hon. members that the intention of the Chair at the moment would be to recognize the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), and afterwards the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) because, as yet, a representative of his party has not taken part in this debate. In any event, we shall cross the bridge when we reach it. I thought hon. members might want to take this into consideration in organizing their work for the next hour or so. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Stay for the debate, David.

Mr. Lewis: I will be back in a few minutes.

Mr. Basford: You might learn something.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure every member of the House welcomed the motion that is before us today, proposed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). When he put that motion forward on a subject that we thought would command the full support of every member of the House, we felt there would be a disposition, as there had been in the past, to accept the motion, to get it approved and to transmit it immediately to Washington, where it was intended to show the full support this House has for the reference to the IJC, and to show also the expression of concern of all members of this House over the consequences of the oil spill on the Pacific coast.

Of course, the result of initiating debate unfortunately has been to change the allotted days, and this particularly affected the Social Credit party. I know this consequence was not in the mind of the member for Fraser Valley East, but it arose because of the insistence upon debating a proposition that I would have thought could have been passed, approved, and sent to Washington immediately, just as other motions of this kind had been dealt with when there was a unanimous feeling of the whole House. However, I should add that even though this has been unfortunate from the point of view of the proceedings of the House, as Secretary of State for External Affairs I rather welcome the views that have been expressed by various members, which show just how deep is the concern about the possible damage to the environment on the Pacific coast.

Many hon. members who have spoken have made very valid points. These, I am sure, will have come to the attention of the United States administration and will help to support the efforts that the government has been making to try to prevent further damage and to deal with crises when they arise. The concern that has been expressed in this House yesterday and today has been growing for several years. Canada has now had direct experience on both coasts of the damage that can be done by relatively small spills or by the wreck of relatively small tankers. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to the leader of the NDP, I think we probably know more, and have had more experience and done more effective work in clearing up oil spills than any other country in the world. Indeed, it is our experience that is serving as a model for many other countries. So, I deny the major premise of the leader of the NDP that Canada has been ineffective. This is simply not so.

Our legislation is a model for other countries, and more than that the action we have taken has served as a model. This is one of the reasons that at Stockholm today it is not only the eloquence of my colleague, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis), nor the laws we have on our books, which are so progressive, but the effective action that has been taken by Canada in the whole field of the environment that has given us a position of leadership at that conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Everyone is aware that these incidents may be the foreshadowing of something far worse. The size of modern tankers has seized the public's imagination. Some dramatic figures on the growth in the number and tonnage of supertankers were given to the House in the debate yesterday.

These tankers are already by far the largest vessels man has ever sent to sea, and all of us think with horror of what might happen if one of these enormous tankers were to break up on our coasts. This is a universal concern. It is not only ours alone. This is not anything that is nationalistic or parochial. We are expressing our concern on behalf of all the people of the world. Already these tankers are delivering massive quantities of oil through or near Canadian waters on both coasts. I understand the concern of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and of others from British Columbia who have spoken in this debate, but we in the government, while we are concerned particularly about the movement of oil through these narrow waters, the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Georgia Strait and Puget Sound, recognize, as does the United States government, that there are other parts of our countries, of the United States and Canada, in which we are jointly concerned, where there could be the break up of a tanker that would cause great damage to the people of the area affected.

We all know that the demand for oil in North American is growing. We accept new refineries and new transportation routes for ever larger volumes of oil as the pattern of the present and the future. There is very little we will be able to do except to provide for moving that oil on the safest routes, and making provision for dealing with spills which will inevitably occur some time in the future. These are the lines upon which we must take practical action, and these are the lines upon which the government is taking practical action.

The statisticians have given us sober warning of just how often we must expect that this growth will bring trouble in its wake. It does not matter how many precautions are taken, inevitably there is going to be a break up somewhere. This has been the experience in the past; this will be our experience in the future.

Mr. Woolliams: Will the minister permit a question at this stage?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate the minister yielding the floor so that I may put a question. Has the minister or his government ever taken a position, previous to the United States decision to go ahead with TAPS and the tanker route, that we approved a pipeline in the Mackenzie delta area, down North America into western Canada, into the industrial sections of Canada and the United States? Have you got that far, and prepared an agreement for negotiation with the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) will be taking part in this debate. I hope the hon. member will stay around and hear what he has to say. He has taken very constructive action in a way that is responsible to the environmentalists of Canada, and that recognizes the problems that have emerged. Every day it seems we hear new threats to the environment. We are unceasingly reminded by environmentalists of the fragile balance of nature. So much so that the mind becomes saturated. We find the human tendency to close our minds to this bombardment and to look upon it as an expression of the equally human tendency to delight in making people's hair stand on end. I do not think we can afford to get into this frame of mind. These are very real dangers to the environment and we must take the matter seriously.

We are told that the valve which broke on the World Bond at Cherry Point on June 4 was open for only four seconds, yet look at the damage that resulted from that three or four second break in the oil line. No wonder the government has repeated over and over again to the United States its concern at the growing risk to the environment of both countries which results from the arrival of large tankers at the Cherry Point refinery.

This concern has been expressed publicly and privately, officially and unofficially, at all levels of the United States government up to and including President Nixon himself. As I told the House in my statement yesterday, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) discussed the problem with the president during the president's visit in April. At the same time, Secretary Rogers had an opportunity to feel the strength of Canadian concern during a meeting with the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) and myself. Indeed, we gathered together for a special meeting to acquaint Secretary Rogers with the depth of the concern about the possible damage to the ecology on the Pacific coast. We held a special meeting for that purpose alone, so that he would be in no doubt that this was not just a formal representation but that this represented the very serious and deep concern which we had expressed at other levels to the United States government from time to time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister allow a question for information? What is the basis of the objection of both Great Britain and the United States to the ideas placed before the conference in Stockholm by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis)? What are they opposed to and what will they not accept?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would have to await the return of the minister, but may I offer a comment on what I understand to be the situation? This is the traditional and long-standing difference of view between countries that have ships and countries that have long coastlines. This is the great contribution that Canada has made—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having no ships?

Mr. Sharp: —in the development of the law of the sea, to take the lead on behalf of coastal countries to get the law of the sea modified. At Stockholm and everywhere else we are making progress. I am happy that the right hon. gentleman has seen the progress we are making and how we have brought this issue into the open, showing the world that this is a cause in which we are going to succeed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Progress in crab fashion.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I know the right hon. gentleman very well and I watched the manoeuvres of his government when he had the responsibility. If we are moving sideways he moved backwards.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I might say something, about the manoeuvres of the hon. member when he was a deputy minister.

Mr. Woolliams: Why don't you tell us about pegging the dollar?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I will proceed with my remarks. The government proposed to President Nixon that the International Joint Commission be requested by Canada and the United States to conduct an investigation into all aspects of the problem. On May 4 and again on May 19 the Canadian Embassy in Washington followed up this proposal in specific terms. Our anxiety on this subject was increased by the announcement at more or less the same time that Secretary Morton had decided to authorize the construction of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline. The resolution unanimously adopted by this House on May 15 which declared that movements of large tankers in the narrow straits of our Pacific coast would be inimical to Canadian interests—which I might add was not the subject of a prolonged debate because we on this side agreed that this should be transmitted to the United States government—was conveyed to the United States government the next day. On June 7, as I reported to the House yesterday, the Canadian Embassy in Washington took up with the state department the Cherry Point incident, including both the immediate questions of compensation and clean-up and the larger questions which we want referred to the International Joint Commission. I am confident that we will receive the official response of the United States soon. Indeed, one of the reasons why I expect that we will is that this very tragic incident has occurred on the Pacific coast.

The actual terms of the reference to the International Joint Commission could be discussed. Should the study be confined to the problem on the west coast, for example, or should it deal with the question of oil shipments to east coast refineries as well? That is a very important point in the reference and it is one I know that would be concurred in by all sides of this House. If we are going to be able to persuade the United States, and this will take some doing, to ask the International Joint Commission to look into the problems arising from the movement of oil on the Pacific coast and those narrow waters, then the United States will also ask that in other parts of Canada and the United States in which Canadian oil moves, the same problems be considered. These are matters of detail. We are prepared to discuss them with the United States in a spirit of accommodation. It would take a certain time to frame the reference to the International Joint Commission properly. This is not surprising if it is to be a serious, thorough study.

What we want, of course, is the whole problem; the problem arising now where there is movement of oil and, for the future, while consideration is being given to moving big tankers into these narrow waters. We would hope that the International Joint Commission would agree with the views expressed in this House that this is indeed a very stupid thing to do. We believe that the Cherry Point refinery can be serviced from the land. It is not the building of the Cherry Point refinery that is the trouble, it is how it has been supplied. It has been our contention to the United States government that the refinery can be supplied from the land just as effectively as from the sea. The commission will not be helped, nor will the two governments, if its task is badly defined. But proper regard for precision should not be a cause for delay. What we have been trying to impress on the United States is our sense of the urgency and importance of the question.

We can be confident, too, that an investigation by the International Joint Commission will be constructive. We have only to look at the excellent work done by the International Joint Commission on the Great Lakes where the report it made has been accepted by both governments and where machinery has been established for clean-up. Indeed, we have a case at the present time of the break-up of a tanker on the Great Lakes, the Sydney E. Smith which is being handled in accordance with the procedures agreed to by our two governments. The vessel is in American waters and we can see that the Americans are observing the agreements that have been made for dealing with emergencies like this.

We can be confident that an investigation by the International Joint Commission will be constructive. It has been our experience in these matters that we can persuade the United States to go along. The International Joint Commission is a valuable international instrument. It has proven its worth over half a century in a series of cases that have been valuable to Canada and the United States. If these relations between our two countries are to be dealt with we need permanent machinery of this kind. I hope there is no suggestion in this debate, and I have heard very little, that reference to the International Joint Commission is not one of the most useful and constructive things that can be done. That is why I was happy to see the hon. member for Fraser Valley East pinpoint his suggestion on reference to the International Joint Commission. I have looked at the other motions that have been put before this House and I suggest that this is the most effective action that this House could take in supporting the concern—

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if the minister will permit a question, I should like to ask whether the next time he drafts an appropriate motion he might hand it to somebody else in the House.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can think of no one more suitable than the hon. member for Fraser Valley East who feels the interests of British Columbia more effectively than any of the NDP members from British Columbia.

• (1240)

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East rises on a point of order.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, I categorically deny the statement made by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I wrote the motion in pencil first, and had it typed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is an example of the superior literacy of the members of the Liberal back benches. Apparently, in the NDP all these things are inspired from the top. We have some grass roots movement of which we are very proud.

The government is conscious of the growing number of environmental problems Canada shares with the United States. Many of these will have to be attacked from a new angle. We are fortunate, however, in that a certain range of these problems having to do especially with pollution of boundary waters can be effectively tackled by an experienced yet adaptable body, the International Joint Commission. For this reason the government foresees a growing role for the IJC in future.

If I may digress for a moment, may I talk about the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and make some further comments on it. I think I understand the spirit in which the amendment has been put forward. It seeks to support the IJC and make sure that it has the necessary resources with which to carry on its valuable work. This motion, of course, cannot add to the powers of the IJC; nor can it instruct the United States government to make resources available. As the House no doubt understands, the IJC must work on a joint reference and not on a single, unilateral reference. So far as I am concerned, and I think I speak for the members of the government in the House, we will not oppose this amendment. We will support it in the interests of unanimity, which I know hon. members of the House would like to see.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What a sacrifice!

Mr. Alexander: That is what one might call sweet reasoning.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, you know, we are approaching this in a spirit of non-controversiality and in the spirit of trying to treat this problem as a serious, national problem; we do not want to introduce political overtones such as have been introduced by those on the other side of the House on many occasions. We want this resolution to be approved unanimously. I want this IJC reference to be supported by all members of the House. It is in that spirit that I support the amendment, even though I did not have a chance to draft it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Fold your wings, Mitch.

Mr. Sharp: If I may speak for Canada, we have made provision to put greater Canadian resources at the disposal of the commission. We have urged upon the United States the good sense of building upon the commission's previous work on pollution in internal boundary waters by a reference which would deal with the pollution danger for the first time in coastal waters. This is the first time that a reference of this kind has been attempted, and we are putting all our persuasive powers behind it in an effort to make the United States recognize that this area in future will be just as important as the Great Lakes have been in the past. Meanwhile, the work that the two governments have undertaken in contingency planning in improving navigation systems will be vigorously pursued.

Nothing could be more useful in lending weight and conviction to the Canadian case than that I should be able to convey to the United States government the unanimous wish of the House that this study should be undertaken.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder who wrote that.

Mr. Sharp: This House does not often express its unanimous view in this way. Actually, on three occasions, recently, has the House supported the government in its representations to the United States; that is a clear indication, I think, of the way in which our foreign policy and relations with the United States are being handled, because we have been able to obtain the support of all parties in this House. It is striking to note that the resolutions we sent to the United States on Amchitka and the resolution of three weeks ago which dealt with the risk of oil pollution from tankers were unanimously approved by this House. I believe that this will indicate to the United States government that the government of Canada is speaking not only as a government party, but that it is speaking for the whole country, and is speaking with the support of all political parties in this country. It is interesting to note that all three of these resolutions have been directed to the same subject. That fact will help to support the position we are taking.

The conviction with which British Columbia members on both sides of the House have spoken in the present debate demonstrates that this is not an issue on which opinion on the west coast is divided. However, the conviction with which members from other provinces have spoken demonstrates equally that Canadians see this as a national, not a regional issue. It is in this sense that I would like to be authorized to speak to the United States government on behalf of the House. Therefore, I urge the unanimous adoption of the motion, as amended.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity of saying a few words on the motion under review because we are in favour of it, even if it gave rise yesterday to some disagreement. We consider that it is important and, therefore, must be debated.

Mr. Speaker, this is an international problem which cannot easily be solved. Moreover, this already complicated question has been further aggravated by the recent accident which launched a wave of protests from the citizens of British Columbia. We cannot blame them because we are all duly concerned with the protection of our waters and want to fight pollution with every means at our disposal.

However, we wonder if the government had indeed taken all necessary precautions to prevent this accident.

We deplore today an accident that concerns all Canadians, especially the citizens of British Columbia, for it is said that it will cause irretrievable damage to the environment.

As a matter of fact, it is always the same thing. Surely there must be a way to solve that problem which the government has been considering for a long time. Indeed, it created a committee for that purpose. There were also many discussions about it but nothing has been accomplished yet.

The government and the international body concerned are studying the pipeline question. I believe this will be a means of controlling pollution and preventing the danger we are exposing ourselves to by letting big tankers in our waters for if there has been one accident, there could be others, liable to cause irretrievable damage. That is why we were willing to have the hon. member put his motion. In fact, we hope the discussion can take place because we too believe that the motion was a very important one and should be the subject of a debate.

When it comes to water pollution, air pollution or pollution of the general environment by cities discharging their sewage into waterways, we must be prepared to spend a great deal of money to cope with such a disaster. Therefore we ask the government to take the proper measures to protect the public.

If the government or international organizations are delaying the building of pipelines for the movement of oil, it is because the financial question is not settled yet. Therefore, since the opportunity arises, we ask once more that the necessary steps be taken to issue credits at low interest rate in order that these works may be carried out.

If these projects are physically possible I can't see why the government would not make them financially feasible. All delays in building and improving houses that should be done in Canada are due to financial difficulties. As a matter of fact, if we have the engineers, the building materials and all other necessary elements to proceed with these improvements, we can assuredly find ways of financing them.

There are references to improvements, pipeline construction and various other means likely to better the situation, but nobody dares deal with the financial issue since nothing is possible without the necessary funds.

Since it is a financial matter, the government should appoint an ad hoc committee that would seek to find the financial means needed to realize such projects. If such projects were feasible, it should certainly be possible to finance them with means others than those we are using today.

For instance, let us consider the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority which cannot pay back its debt or the interest on it. Yet it should be a profitable enterprise, as any other public undertaking for that matter. When an enterprise is not profitable, it means that other organizations are taking advantage of that fact.

Some projects that could provide jobs without anyone getting saddled with debts that cannot be repaid on account of exorbitant interests on capital, are postponed. If investment funds were provided interest-free, we could realize any project useful to this country and to foreign countries as well since quite often international matters are involved.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the Chair call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak this afternoon on a subject as serious as the one before us, it is not my intention to engage in reproaches and recriminations in connection with procedural matters. I say this at the outset, because wherever I have gone in the last few years, young people, young men and women everywhere, are concerned about the dangers of pollution, whether pollution of our waters, of our land or of the air. Then, too, there is noise pollution to be considered. As I say, young men and women everywhere are concerned about this issue and they want us to be concerned, too. Sometimes these young people have hang-ups. They take tough positions and act with some degree of violence in an attempt to get us to do the job we should be doing here in the House of Commons.

Before I get into the meat of my address, I should like to refer specifically to the motion before us. This is the motion moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle)—he was originally an Albertan and this, of course, does a little for his character and his calibre:

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Woolliams: The motion reads:

> That in the light of the damage in Canada and the United States arising from the recent oil spill at the Cherry Point refinery, this House support the urgency of the reference to the International Joint Commission of the environmental consequences of the movement of oil in the narrow waters of the Straits of Juan de Fuca, George Strait, and Puget Sound both now and in the future and of the measures necessary to minimize the hazards, and requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately convey the terms of this motion to the Government of the United States.

Then, there was an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), which I had the pleasure of seconding. It read as follows:

> That the motion be amended by adding at the end thereof:
> "and that the International Joint Commission have a mandate to utilize and requisition such financial and other resources of Canada and the United States as will best and soonest restore the ecology and environment on the West Coast to pre-spill conditions".

Once again, we have seen evidence of the serious consequences of an oil spill in waters near the Canadian coast. It seems to me that the young people have put their finger on one of the great dangers facing mankind. I agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) when he says that man, having invented and developed nuclear weapons of all kinds, is now in a position, by pressing buttons, to destroy his own species. However, I agree also with this young generation which has reminded us so forcefully that if we do nothing to control pollution, for example, pollution of the sea itself, so rich in resources of every kind, we shall face a danger equally great. We shall, in fact, be sounding the death knell of humanity on this earth. If I might be personal at this point, may I say this is one of the concerns of my son, Brian Woolliams, 16 years of age, who often discusses it with me and other members of the family. He, and others like him, are deeply concerned. We must all be concerned about this issue.

I listened today with great interest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). He said the government was looking into the situation. I hope they will not continue to "look into it" much longer. In 1968 they were given a mandate. We want doers, not lookers. It is time for action rather than words and inertia. This is why we have been asking questions continually over a period of years. We want to come to grips with this subject. We have been exploring for oil and gas in Canada's north for 15 to 20 years, and we know from reports from the United States and Canada that vast discoveries of crude petroleum and natural gas have been made in the Arctic. We have known for some time that in this modern world, with its automation, there is a great demand for energy in every country, including the United States, Canada, Britain and France.

I do not intend to present any recriminations today because this is too serious a subject to become involved in procedure. This is probably the most serious subject I have ever discussed in the House of Commons, and I refer to pollution. We had our procedural wrangle yesterday. It is not now time for another such discussion. It is not time for the government to play tricks, it is time for serious thinking.

Let me now come to grips with the subject I wish to discuss this afternoon. We know there have been discoveries of crude petroleum and natural gas in Alaska and in Canada's north. We know that the United States, with its industrial might, will demand and will get this potential energy. This government has known since it came into power in 1968 about these discoveries in the north, and must have realized that this energy would have to be moved through some media, by pipeline, tanker, airplane or train. This government has known for a considerable length of time of vast crude petroleum discoveries in Alaska and that it was necessary to move that oil from Prudhoe Bay to Anchorage or Valdez. The United States has had this problem on the tracing board for some time. Perhaps I should explain what I mean by that expression in view of the fact that when I used it this week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he did not know of the board to which I was referring. This is a term used by engineers. They put their ideas on paper and then transfer them into plans for pipelines, and building of roads and so on.

I am glad to see that the right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is here, because it was his government that gave us the great vision of the north. His government started that great development now taking place in the north. Many people laughed, including a former Prime Minister, Mr. Chevrier and Mr. Pickersgill. They all laughed about that vision which has brought about this great development. This government has known for a long time that we must move these vast quantities of crude oil from Prudhoe Bay down to Anchorage, and from there by some other means to Seattle and other places in the United States. Many speakers have pointed out that this is one of the most dangerous shipping areas to be found. It is very dangerous in the area of Cherry Point where this leakage occurred.

I come from a province whose economic foundation has been based on energy since the 1940's. Agriculture is an important industry in that province, probably the primary one, but natural gas and oil have lead to the building of urban centres. Many young men and women are leaving the farms to find employment in these large cities built from the material wealth of that energy. Perhaps this is why I am so concerned about this matter. I realized immediately this government was elected that the time had come to find out whether this government had a plan for moving this energy. There is no point in ciriticizing or being worried about the ecology of the sea because of potential spills or leakages unless you are in possession of scientific fact. We have spent a great deal of money on many ridiculous things when we should have been taking advantage of the human resource of this country, putting university graduates to work on finding answers. Had this been done the government would not be floundering today without answers.

I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) whether he had suggested to United States authorities that instead of using a tanker route down the B.C. coast they would consider an inland pipeline route. I asked whether he had come to any conclusion based on scientific fact that it would be better to pipe that crude petroleum and natural gas out of the north than ship it by tanker. I asked whether he had scientific information showing that a pipeline would be safer than the use of tankers. Let us remember that one of these methods will be used. That energy will be moved out of the north and the United States is going to move it to its industrial centres. Regardless of what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) says, the United States needs that energy. Canada is a fast-growing industrial nation and it will require this energy in the very near future.

On April 27, 1971 I directed this question to the Prime Minister as recorded at page 5258 of Hansard for that date:

> Mr. Speaker, the questions directed to the Prime Minister indicate how complex and divisive this problem is. I do not mean division on the part of the government but rather the complexity resulting from the pollution factor, economic factors and the defence aspect mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. Will the government now consider setting up a feasibility study by the best experts in these fields and Members of Parliament and Senators in order that we can get together on this subject, work together as a nation and come up with the right answers as a basis for our submissions to the United States?

This, in itself, is an indictment of this government, because it has no plan and has not even indicated that it prefers the pipeline route down the Mackenzie delta. It has not said it prefers the use of tankers down the coast of Canada. I suggest the reason the government has not said anything is that it is frightened of the electorate. The government cannot play politics for too long with this issue, it must come to grips with it.

An hon. Member: Do you know something?

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody asked whether I know something. I hope when I have finished that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice will appreciate this problem. In answer to my question the Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, we hope that in respect of all questions affecting Canada's future we can work together as a nation, but as a result of the way the parliamentary system has been set up there is one executive called upon to take its responsibilities, and that we intend to do.

In other words, the Prime Minister said this government would take a decision, but no decision has been taken as yet. No feasibility study has been carried out. Up until last week I had a question on the order paper seeking information in respect of who was the head of the task force. I wondered whether this was being left to private enterprise, or whether the task force was made up of people from private enterprise, from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I wanted to know who was the head of the task force.

My first indictment of the government is that there has never been a proper task force set up or a feasibility study made so the government could make a decision. That is why this government is floundering, and that is why the Secretary of State for External Affairs cannot give answers. I do not expect to get answers in this regard from the new Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) as he is a new minister and has not made any speeches on the subject in the House since becoming minister. He has made his speeches on an extramural basis outside the House. I will be very surprised if he comes up with any answers today as to how this energy is to be moved; that is by pipeline, tanker, train or aircraft.

Let us see what some of the other questions are which were put. I am referring to March 11 of the same year as recorded at page 4163 of Hansard. At that time I said:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Normally I would have put it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but he is not here.

One of the great troubles with the question period is that only half the ministers are here. I went on:

> As the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated that the government would entertain a United States project to build a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley through the Prairies, has the Canadian government set down terms under which Canadian labour, equipment and pipeline supplies will be used if such a project is undertaken by the United States.

Now, what was the answer by the former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I think the guidelines issued last August, which represent the government's position in respect of a pipeline, were very clear in this respect. Guideline number one, I believe, indicates there will be a clear preference for maximum Canadian content in any application that is made in respect of the construction of a pipeline.

Then, I asked:

Mr. Speaker, is the minister in a position to advise us whether there have been any discussions with the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan—

The answer was "No". Finally, on March 11, 1971 the Minister at that time said they did not know whether or not they were favouring a pipeline. The reason was they had no feasibility studies which the government had supported and laid before Parliament as well as the Canadian people.

Now, I shall go to the questions and answers recorded on March 5, 1971. I asked five questions on that day and received the same kind of wishy-washy answers. There was no decision. I said:

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that no decision had been made by the United States authorities in reference to the pipeline from the rich Alaska northern slopes to Valdez.

Of course, that is dealing with TAPS.

In view of the fact that a consortium of companies in the United States has already stockpiled pipe for the building of such a pipeline, is the minister aware of that and is he now aware of the decision made by U.S. government authorities to build such a pipeline in view of the stockpile?

I advised the government in that question that according to reports from official places in Washington that United States had been stockpiling the pipe to build TAPS so that the crude petroleum could be moved by tanker down the west coast of British Columbia. What was the answer? There is no point in asking questions if you do not receive information and use the information once you receive it. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, then the Acting Prime Minister, more acting than Prime Minister, said:

No, Mr. Speaker. It may be that there are such stockpiles; I do not disagree with that. I do know that no decision has been made. I would like to tell the House that the United States Secretary of State has indicated to me that he now agrees to enter into consultations with us on this question. I am sure he would not have done so if a decision had already been made.

The United States had already stockpiled the pipe. The study had been completed and they had decided to build the pipeline, but they thought they would soothe the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As I listened to him, I decided that he must be the most optimistic minister I had ever heard. He reminded me of a story I was told by a fellow who said that his 85-year old father married the woman next door, who was 70 years of age, and five days later purchased a house near a school. He was very optimistic. That situation is similar to the one we face when dealing with the jurisprudence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Pepin: That is not optimism; it is potential.

Mr. Woolliams: I will leave it to hon. members to draw any conclusion they want from that, but it did seem to me to be optimism.

Mr. Nielsen: He has no potential, so it must be optimism.

Mr. Woolliams: At that point I asked the minister this question:

In light of the answer, can the Acting Prime Minister say whether the Canadian government has made up its own mind as to which transportation route would be the best in Canada's national interest, that is, down the Mackenzie delta or to the port of Valdez and then by tanker to the United States? What is Canada's position and how did the government arrive at it?

The minister could very briefly have said that they did not have an answer. Let us hear what he did say:

I thought the hon. gentleman would have learned by now from the repetitive statements I have made in the House that the Canadian government feels there is a very serious risk in the movement of oil by tanker down the Pacific coast, and it would not be in the interest of either of our two countries.

Well, what kind of nonsense is that! I said:

Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the minister's statements in that regard, but does the government then endorse the building of a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley and through the Prairies to the industrial centres of the United States?

The minister said:

I am sure that as a member from Alberta he would wish me to be in as strong a bargaining position as possible in relation to the United States, and to ensure that if an application is made it is one that meets our requirements and not only those of the United States.

The point is that now the United States is going ahead with this project. The expression one might use would be that it is too late to close the barn door after the horse has run away. This is what the government has been doing continually.

I want to deal with some more questions I asked on this subject to show the lengths to which all of us on this side went to try to obtain an answer to a very serious problem of pollution about which all members from British Columbia and all members here were concerned. Of course, they should be concerned. They should be concerned about action on the part of the government. I do not know what hon. members opposite say to their minister in the caucus but I would sure like to be there some time.

An hon. Member: Come on over.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says: "Come on over". I could not stand the vacillation and procrastination. We could certainly do without the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) because he got the House in such an uproar last night that the Speaker almost had to use his prerogative to adjourn the House.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You mean the opposition.

Mr. Woolliams: I will not become involved in an argument with the minister. On March 10, 1971, as recorded in Hansard at page 4135, I asked this question:

The minister suggests that various departments are studying this matter. Will he at this time, or perhaps later on motions, make a statement indicating the evidence on which he bases his recommendations or his opinion of that evidence? Would he give us some indication of the type of personnel who provided the evidence on which he bases his opinion?

This is the answer of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development at that time:

Mr. Speaker, we have been considering this problem for some time—

He is like the minister today, who says the government is still looking. What they are looking at is the pollution which has now occurred. He said they have been considering the problem for some time. This is a most considering government.

Mr. Basford: I thought you said you would be a statesman this afternoon!

Mr. Woolliams: I overlooked a few remarks I could be making. I say to the former Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that it is difficult to be a statesman when one is involved in a problem like this and no one will come to grips with it. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said:

—I set up the first category of restrictions on construction and we said repeatedly that final instructions would be issued, we hoped, in the course of the coming months.

Coming years or coming months. So, the merry-go-round goes on. On many occasions the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) replies by saying: "Let us have your viewpoint". We told him that we need a study. If the study is made, we will be able to negotiate with evidence and with wisdom with the United States, because they will not stop the tankers if the pipeline is built. All the talk in the world will not stop them. It will be too late, then. On March 19 I asked the following question:

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Can either of the ministers responsible advise whether they now have a definite assurance from the United States that the Prudhoe Bay to Valdez pipeline will not be undertaken until negotiations have been continued and furthered in relation to the Mackenzie Valley route?

The minister said:

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any such assurance. This is an internal matter for the United States of America.

Yes, but it is a very important matter to Canada because what has happened has been only a taste of what is going to happen along the British Columbia shoreline. The government's own members have said that. They agree with me. The minister went on to say:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has made Canadian concerns known in regard to marine shipping off the British Columbia Coast. I think all authorities in Washington are aware that we should like consideration to be given to the Mackenzie Valley route, subject to Canadian rules and Canadian decisions, before the Valdez decision is made, but certainly we cannot bind the United States government to await that decision.

The only binding has been that this government has ended up with no answer and no information.

On May 4, 1971, I asked the following question:

Mr. Speaker, in light of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said about the meeting in Washington between Canadian and United States officials, may I ask if the Canadian delegation in its official capacity suggested any alternative route or method for transporting this crude petroleum? If they did, on what study did they base their recommendations?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no, the Canadian government did not suggest an alternative route.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

That is the answer, that the Canadian government has not suggested anything to the United States. they have stood by, doing nothing, saying nothing, making no study, knowing nothing, and of course making no decisions. The minister went on to say:

The delegation that went with the authority of the Canadian government went to discuss the ecological dangers of building the TAPS line, which I think is the correct procedure at the present time.

It does not take much training or much brains to know that. I can quote certain figures here of other spills that have affected Canada, such as the one down in California, and the one in Nova Scotia, the Arrow. We all know that it does not take much training or brains to tell the United States that it is dangerous to ship oil down the shores of British Columbia. The government sent a large staff to the United States to tell the authorities that. I imagine that the U.S. authorities listened, and I imagine that they were overwhelmed with the wisdom they received. I say that if the government had taken up our suggestion made three years ago, made a proper feasibility study and collected evidence, they could have come to a conclusion as to which route would be safer from both the ecological and economic points of view. I say to the government that they might present their views to the U.S. authorities any way they like, but the United States will go ahead with the tanker route because they will not wait for a wishy-washy, procrastinating government of this kind.

My next question to the minister was:

Mr. Speaker , may I ask a supplementary question. What knowledge and studies did the Canadian officials use in discussing this question with the United States officials? What study did Canadians use?—

The minister answered:

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has had considerable experience in cleaning up oil spills on the ocean.

Well, it will have a lot more experience because it has no solution to the problem that causes them. That is where the government has failed us to a high degree; it has failed every Canadian. The solution of this problem is not to be left to big corporations with selfish interests. Certainly, they have selfish interests when they are in business because they are in business to make profits. The government of Canada should deal with this matter because it concerns every Canadian and his welfare; it concerns the survival of mankind, not only here but throughout the world. The government should be able to tell us today without any equivocation or any evasion what route they plan to follow, what they said to the United States, and what hard bargaining occurred. No hard bargaining occurred. It is a joke.

On May 3, 1971 as recorded at page 5427 of Hansard I asked the following question:

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs in either capacity whether the government officials at today's talks in Washington are expressing the position that Canada must be a formal party to the discussions on the initiation of the TAPS route or any other route?

At least, we should have been part of the discussions. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the meetings that are being held in Washington is to discuss the concerns that we have about the ecological dangers that arise from the building of this pipeline, and we will be discussing with the United States how best the interests of the Pacific coast of Canada and the United States can be protected.

Did that mean that the government supported TAPS? I want the minister to tell me that this afternoon. I want him to tell the Canadian people whether he supports the TAPS line or the Mackenzie Valley line. Let us have it without any evasion or equivocation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He isn't here.

Mr. Woolliams: But the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), who had a little argument with me a moment ago, is here. My next question was:

Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not quite get the import of my question. What I am asking is whether those officials are expressing the position that Canada must be a formal party—I mean formal party—to the discussions on the initiation of the TAPS route or any other route?

The minister answered:

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this is a decision that has to be made by the United States.

At this point he let the cat out of the bag. This decision was left to the United States. They left Canada out of it and made the decision themselves. We heard the minister say that the decision was left to the United States. If there should be a spill, the government will then make a formal protest. That will clean up a lot of White Rock, that will clean up a lot of sea, that will clean up the damages done to the birdlife, fishlife and other life along the shores.

Before I leave this point, I want to say again that for four years we have pressed the new government—because the former Pearson government did nothing about it—to make a study, to supply us with evidence, to tell us who is heading the study, to give us the facts, and to give us the decision, painful as it may be. Whatever decision is made, as somebody said earlier today, it will not be an easy decision. I will repeat that this energy will come the north whether this government wants it or not, and yet they have not even met or negotiated with the United States.

Now, I will go on to another subject which was touched upon briefly today, that is oil pollution caused by tankers carrying crude petroleum on the high seas near the shoreline of Canada. This, in conjunction with the fact the consumer faces an extensive increase in the price of his gasoline, are the two foremost problems facing the federal government today. Those were the words I used once before in this House. Neither unemployment nor the economic welfare of the nation can be separated from pollution by oil, or the cost of the product to the consumer. The point I am making there is obvious. One can take an extreme, personal stand and say that ecology is everything and that we must not move anything. If mankind had led that kind of life since the beginning of time we would not be here. There must be some development, but also there must be some rules on how the ball game is to be played. There must be a balance between pollution control, the economic welfare of the nation, consideration of the gross national product, and employment. The question is linked with the development of the north.

As I said before, in 1957 the Progressive Conservative Party created and started a northern vision which has led to a vast energy exploration in the north, and in consequence huge discoveries of natural gas and petroleum have been made both in northern Canada and in Alaska. There is a growing demand for and a shortage of fuel energy and gasoline in the United States, and indeed in Canada. In fact the National Energy Board recently refused permission to enlarge the amount of natural gas exported, but I will not go into that matter at this point except to say that when representatives of the National Energy Board appeared before a standing committee of this House they said they were starved for staff to provide them with scientific advice. Yet when we ask the government questions, it replies, "We are leaving it to the National Energy Board." But the government will not give the National Energy Board the proper staff so that it can get the information on which to base decisions.

In the light of the hard fact that the Mid-East won an unprecedented price increase for its crude petroleum, the industrial centres of the United States and Canada have turned their thirsty oil eyes to the north for the purpose of replacing Mid-East exports. The consumers of both countries are seeking a reasonable price now and for the future, and to achieve that aim plans are being consumated to transport crude petroleum reserves and other by-products to the industrial centres of both countries. How is this to be done? There has been no study, no decision. To date the greatest proven field for crude petroleum appears to be on the northern slopes of Alaska, while an extensive find of natural gas has been located in northern Canada on Christian Island.

An early start on a pipeline in Alaska is now being planned in earnest, if not already under way, as a step to keep the United States and indeed eastern Canada, from being too heavily dependent on imports from the Mid-East and elsewhere. It is said that there is a reserve of 10 billion barrels of crude petroleum in the northern slopes of Alaska, and I might add that these statistics were given out two years ago.

There are two routes for transporting the crude petroleum to the industrial centres of North America. There are two serious problems that must be weighed carefully in the decision making on how to get this oil safely and cheaply from Alaska to the midwest of the United States. That is the decision the government will not make, and has not made for the last four years. It is a decision it will not make until it calls an election. First, the question of our economics, and still more important, the question of preservation of our northern ecology must be considered and weighed well. That is why a study is necessary.

The first method would be to build a pipeline from the northern slopes of Alaska to the port of Valdez, and then to take the oil by large tankers down the west coast of British Columbia to the United States. That seems to be what will happen at this time. The second method and route would be to build a pipeline from the Alaska slopes down the Mackenzie delta across the Prairies to the midwest, sharing the flow in the line with the oil supplied from the other proven provincial fields in Canada.

Oil Pollution

A massive leak from a pipeline, difficult to construct and maintain over and through the permafrost territory, could in itself destroy the northern ecology. In conjunction with the ecology problems, the two transport methods and routes would have to be weighed in light of the economics of getting the product to the consumer. In brief, which method and route would be more beneficial to Canadian consumers, and indeed to the ecology of North America? It is just that simple a question, but it requires a decision. I hope the minister will make an announcement today. As I said, Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives for some time have recommended that a study be carried out.

Tanker oil pollution near the western shoreline of Canada, in conjunction with the increase in the price of gasoline, are among the foremost problems facing Canadians. You cannot divorce oil pollution from unemployment or the economic growth of the nation, but it can be done with judgment, with rules, regulations and decisions based on facts. As I said, Mr. Speaker, there is an increasing demand for fuel and gasoline throughout the world.

Now, I want to turn for a few moments to deal with the question of the dangers that have arisen simply because no decisions have been made. On February 15, 1970, the Liberian tanker Arrow was wrecked on the Cerberus Rock in Chedabucto Bay off Nova Scotia. Only 1.3 million gallons, of an estimated 2.5 million spilled into the water, were recovered. The remainder contaminated 190 miles of shoreline in the bay, miles of beaches on Sable Island 100 miles away, and 4,800 birds lost their lives. The Arrow was Canada's major oil spill disaster. What happened? Who paid the shot? Read the Henderson report. The Canadian taxpayer paid the shot. They cannot determine who owned the tanker. There has been no way of measuring the damage, and so the taxpayer has paid the shot.

At the beginning of May U.S. Interior Secretary Morton issued preliminary approval for a go ahead of the TAPS tanker system to ship oil from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez by pipeline and from there to the west coast by giant oil tankers. One terminus for these tankers is Cherry Point in the state of Washington, which is exactly 20 miles away from the place in Canada which is polluted today. The tanker Arrow was 18,000 tons dead weight. The tankers for the TAPS route are to be over 100,000 tons dead weight. What will our shoreline be like if one of these large tankers is wrecked? Where will the government be then? Where will its supporters in British Columbia be then? It is a sad story.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to follow the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) in this debate because I can put to him directly the very extensive record, which has already been outlined in this House, of work done both with regard to the question of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline route and the dangers involved for Canada's west coast because of the TAPS route.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The hon. member made a number of points, saying there has been no indication on the part of the government of its views with regard to the TAPS route, that the government has not undertaken any feasibility studies with regard to the Mackenzie route, and has failed to let the United States government know its views. I am glad to have this opportunity to point out to the hon. member, from documentation tabled in the House, and from statements made in the House and outside it, that on all three points he is dead wrong and his assertions to the House are all false.

Dealing first with the question of feasibility studies, he said that the Conservatives for some time had recommended a feasibility study. If the hon. member was on the ball and was doing his job, Mr. Speaker, he would know that on April 18, 1972, I tabled in this House copies of documents dealing with 30 various aspects of a feasibility study preparatory to informing the two agencies of government concerned with regard to the Mackenzie valley pipe line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): These are studies that have been under way for the past three years, and that we would hope to have finished by the end of the summer season. This has been indicated repeatedly. I suppose the only way to get a message across to the hon. member would be to have a chisel, engrave the message on a tablet of stone, and hit him over the head with it, because he does not learn easily. This question has been under extensive study. Over $15 million have been expended to put the government into a position to make a judgment about the Mackenzie valley pipeline. As I have said repeatedly in this House, Mr. Speaker, at the end of this year when the companies themselves are ready to come forward, we will be in a position to evaluate proposals for a Mackenzie valley pipeline. So, on the first of the hon. member's points that there has not been any preparatory work, he is dead wrong. If there has been any lack of preparatory work it has been by the hon. member in preparing for his speech. He just has not done his homework.

The hon. member also said that I have made no speeches in the House on this question. I spoke extensively, in fact probably too extensively on it, in the Throne Speech debate. I reviewed the question extensively—

Mr. Woolliams: Not on this.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On this and the question of energy, and I dealt at length with the matter of studies before the standing committee. Further, I dealt with the question of energy policies during an opposition day debate. Once again there is lack of preparation. Mr. Speaker, but it has been lack of preparation by the hon. member for Calgary North who has been lying down on the job.

The hon. member also suggested that members of the government have not been in the position to set before the House, the country, and the United States government its position with regard to the proposals for a tanker route and the Mackenzie valley pipeline. I would like to take a few minutes of the time of the House to go through the very extensive documentation on this point, to show just how badly informed is the hon. member.

As a start I should like to bring to his attention the statement made by my predecessor, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Greene) in a debate in this House on March 12, 1971. He said:

As I have said, the Prudhoe Bay oil discovery was disclosed in June of 1968. As early as within one month from the time of that declaration the chairman of the National Energy Board met with the presidents of the oil companies who owned that oil—Arco, Humble and BP—and pointed out to them that the Mackenzie Valley line had advantages, as an alternative and should be considered by them.

Mr. Speaker, previous to that, in a statement made to the Canadian Club in Vancouver on February 12, 1971, my predecessor also said:

The Canadian government is not opposed to the construction of oil and gas lines from Alaska through Canada to the continental United States and the government of Canada has already acted in a broad way to define the national goals of such a development. On August 13, 1970 I announced some definitive guidelines to assist industry in their planning.

He went on to say to that audience:

Personally, I think that the United States oil industry has been too hasty and too unplanned in its decision to move Alaska North Slope oil across Alaska from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez and then by sea to receiving points in the U.S. northwest. Too hasty, because they did not give proper care and attention to the problems of the physical security of the oil line, the security of the environment in Alaska, the protection of the Alaska, British Columbia and Washington coastlines from sea-going tanker disasters, and to the question of the long term economics of the operation of such a line—

Once again, Mr. Speaker, my predecessor the hon. member for Niagara Falls made the government's concern about the risks to the coast amply clear. He also made it clear that the government was taking careful steps to make certain that it knew all about Arctic ecology and the impact of a pipeline in northern Canada before going ahead to issue permits.

My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), made reference to a series of meetings he had with officials of the United States government. To the hon. member who asserted that no attempt had been made to bring to the attention of the United States government the views of the Canadian government, I would refer an aide memoire delivered by the Canadian Embassy in Washington to the United States authorities on June 29, 1971, precisely on this issue, which reads in part:

At a meeting in Washington, D.C., on June 10 the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of the Environment expressed to the U.S. Secretary of State, the great concern of the Canadian government regarding proposals to move oil by tanker along Canada's Pacific coast and to the Puget Sound area. The Canadian ministers held the view that because of the virtual certainty that oil spills would occur if the proposed tanker movements were permitted in these confined coastal waters, present plans should be reviewed with the objective of diverting these oil shipments to destinations other than Puget Sound.

The aide memoire continues:

The Canadian ministers drew attention to the widespread public concern in Canada about the environmental risks involved in the proposed Alaska oil movements. This concern has been expressed by the unanimous approval given in the Canadian House of Commons on June 21 for the adoption of the third report of the special committee on environmental pollution. A copy of this report is attached.

That unanimous approval, Mr. Speaker, must have been in the absence of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) or maybe he was here and as usual did not know what was going on. The aide memoire goes on to indicate to the United States government the proposed line of discussions to deal with the oil tanker problem and to carry out additional research into the possible damage to fish and bird life, the question of monetary damages, the question of shipping control—all proposals that dealt with these questions long before the United States government had made its decision to go on with this route.

The aide memoire of June 29 was followed by an aide memoire to the United States government on August 20, 1971, in the following terms:

The great concern of the Canadian government regarding proposals to transport oil by tanker from Alaska to the Puget Sound area has been made known to the United States government on a number of occasions during the course of this year. This concern is based upon the certainty that any movement of oil by tanker on the scale which has been proposed will eventually result in oil spills. The most recent occasion was at a meeting of United States and Canadian officials in Washington on June 29. At that meeting a proposal was elaborated in an aide memoire for detailed consultations to be held as soon as possible,—

The aide memoire goes on to say:

In general terms, as outlined on earlier occasions, the Canadian government is convinced that if the full economic costs of the substantial environmental risks are taken into account it will be found desirable to avoid introducing large and hazardous tanker movements into the inner waters of the Pacific Coast. The Canadian government is concerned, however, that there has so far been no indication of sources of oil supply for the States in the Pacific northwest. In order to explore this aspect of the question the competent Canadian authorities would be prepared to discuss the technical and other factors which might affect the continuing contribution to the oil needs of the region from Canadian sources.

Mr. Speaker, coupled with my responsibilities as Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I had the opportunity to meet with the United States Secretary of the Interior, under whose jurisdiction this comes, on March 30 of this year and to point out to him the great concern of Canadians as echoed unanimously by this House with respect to the danger of heavy movements of oil in the northwest Pacific coast area, particularly Puget Sound, the progress that has been made by the Canadian government in the studies I have referred to, the progress that has been made in defining the area for a Mackenzie Valley pipeline—

Mr. Woolliams: Whom did you meet with?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The United States Secretary of the Interior, the member of the United States government responsible for the pipeline.

Mr. Woolliams: What was his name?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Rogers Morton. The hon. member seems to be as ignorant of that as he is—

Mr. Woolliams: I wanted to find out if you knew.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What is your name, do you know?

Mr. Nielsen: Who the hell are you?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In my letter to Secretary Morton of May 4 this year, I said:

> I found most useful my meeting with you in your office in Washington on March 30 last, and appreciate greatly your courtesy in discussing with me certain aspects of the interesting decision you have under consideration in connection with an application for a permit to construct an oil pipeline in Alaska.
> At the time of our conversation, you suggested that you would like to have more insights and information into the Canadian interest in having such an oil pipeline constructed through Canada from Prudhoe Bay.

In four pages, the letter goes on to cite in detail the arguments in favour in moving the oil down through the Mackenzie Valley rather than through Alaskan waters. The document has been made public, but of course one cannot make documents like that public for the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) because he is too idle to do his homework on these important questions.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has said that the government has done no feasibility studies. I pointed out by a document laid before this House, and it must have been available to the hon. member, that there has been an expenditure of $15 million over the last three years for defining the problems involved in building a Mackenzie Valley pipeline and for the purpose—

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): By all means.

Mr. Woolliams: I have listened to the argument and—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Ask your question.

Mr. Woolliams: I will ask my question if you will be patient. Have you then concluded, and have you reached a decision or made an ageeement with the United States government that TAPS in fact will not be built, that the crude petroleum and natural gas will be carried by pipeline down the Mackenzie Delta? Answer that question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Of course there is no agreement because the American administration has decided that they are going to move American oil through American territory and international waters down to the American markets. The hon. member, who is supposed to be a lawyer, should know that there is no legal action that the government of Canada can take to prevent that.

Mr. Nielsen: The government has not decided that, industry has. The government gave a permit.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If Secretary Morton is not the government, who is?

Mr. Nielsen: All he did was issue the permit; industry moves it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): He issued the permit to build the line. The hon. member knows better than that. The hon. member for Calgary North has suggested that our position has not been made clear to the United States government. I pointed out that repeatedly in personal meetings between various members of this government and members of the American administration, and in aides memoire placed before that government and, as long ago as 1968 within a month of the time that the Prudhoe Bay field was disclosed to the public, representatives of this government already proposed the Mackenzie route as a favourable one for bringing the oil to market. It seems to me that little more need be said about the contribution of the hon. member for Calgary North in this debate.

• (1500)

Several points raised by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) require a reply. The hon. member said, raising the same rather incredible proposition put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North, that in some way we should get inside the American jurisdiction and the Canadian government should prevent that government from making a decision with regard to oil coming from within its territory and going to its markets.

The hon. member for York South said—and I appreciate his courtesy in indicating why he would not be present when I spoke—that we should have protested the construction of refining facilities in Puget Sound at the time they came into being. Mr. Speaker, the refining facilities in Puget Sound have been in operation at least since 1961. Ninety per cent of the oil used in those refining facilities in use comes not from overseas but is Canadian oil, Alberta oil that travels via the Trans-Mountain pipeline overland from Canada. The hon. member is really suggesting that the government of Canada should have protested the construction of oil refineries in Puget Sound built expressly to take advantage of hydrocarbons coming from Alberta. I can say one thing for the hon. member for Calgary North; at least that is one objection he did not raise.

Mr. Woolliams: I thank the minister for his generosity.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I should like to take this opportunity to repeat an offer I made in the House of Commons on April 19, 1972, as reported at page 1440 of Hansard—the offer was repeated, as I have indicated, to the United States government—namely, that we are prepared to put the United States in the position, with regard to the Puget Sound refineries, where not one ounce of oil need be brought by seaborne traffic to those refineries. Once they had established oil supplies which would come via the Trans-Mountain route and provided the oil requirements of those refineries, there would be no need to bring seaborne oil into that area. We are prepared to make that undertaking. We hope the United States government, which of course will have to seek and obtain approval of the courts with respect to these proposals, will take advantage of that offer and will meet the particular problem we face by using Canadian oil that is available via overland routes, thereby making it unnecessary for oil to be brought by sea which is the problem involved in this debate.

The government of Canada in the last four years has been active in this area. Commencing, as I said, immediately with the discovery of Prudhoe Bay oil, the government has indicated to American companies Canada's willingness to consider the Mackenzie Valley route and has set up the extensive feasibility studies necessary to determine whether a Mackenzie Valley pipeline for oil and gas can be constructed to transport these products through our country to the markets of the central continent.

Furthermore, the government has been active in putting forward, by diplomatic memoire, by personal contact and by public statement both in this House and otherwise, the danger to Canada and to the American west coast which would result from the TAPS route. Of course we are disappointed. We regret that the American government, notwithstanding this, has decided to go ahead with the TAPS route. We must acknowledge, however, that it is their decision and they have the right to do this. I would not go so far as the hon. member for York South and suggest that this is an unfriendly act.

Even now it is not too late for the United States administration, as an act of comity, to reverse its decision, to be prepared to halt construction of the TAPS pipeline and come forward with a new proposal; that is, to participate with the companies which probably today or early next week will be announcing their intention to go ahead with a Mackenzie Valley route. On that basis we could be assured that in future the kind of damage which occurred in Puget Sound and which has been experienced in Canada will not be caused to the west coast.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): By all means.

Mr. Nielsen: The day before yesterday I asked the minister whether he had received an application from any company or consortium for the construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline, and he answered that no formal application had been received.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is right.

Mr. Nielsen: What he has just said comes as a startling revelation. He has indicated that he expects applications to be made some time next week for the construction of a pipeline.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I said, as the hon. member will see if he reads Hansard. I said previously that we have received no formal application. However, we have received an indication that consortiums are getting together with regard to making an application. So my statement stands that no formal application has been made.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister said, "Next week." He suggested there would be an application next week.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I expect that next week or, shall we say, in the very near future there may be such application. There have been a number of indications to suggest that applications will be coming to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to the land route. In large measure he and I will have to wait for those submissions to be made. We have reason to believe, from certain statements—the hon. member has had as much opportunity as I have had to gather this impression from news reports—that the consortiums expect to get together and make an application.

Therefore, it would be constructive and would help the proposal made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, and supported by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if we put under the jurisdiction of the International Joint Commission the resolution of the problem regarding tanker shipments both in the east and in the west, both in the waters of Puget Sound and in the international waters of eastern Canada. I would therefore hope we might have the support of the whole House, not only for the resolution but for the amendment.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly glad that I was present today to hear the speech delivered by the minister, for it represented 30 minutes of exculpation without information. What it lacked in common sense is made up in vociferous delivery. I have always liked listening to the hon. member because one has no difficulty hearing what he has to say.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is an occasion that illustrates exactly the degree to which this House has been made to look ridiculous. The government either has not come with information or it has provided information that is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister laughs because he has been one of the main destroyers of this institution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have heard enough.

Mr. Crouse: The minister cannot take it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: His leaving is in keeping with the courage he has always displayed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He makes a speech, we listen to him, he realizes it is foolish, ridiculous and full of incongruous statements, and away he goes because he does not want to be present when one reveals his total lack of consideration for the rights of Parliament. He does not want to hear what one says and thinks, apparently, that no one else will hear it. His leaving means that two ministers out of 30 remain in the House. Ministers of the Crown have responsibilities, but they are not held although this is supposed to be a most serious debate.

Mr. Basford: They will be here for the vote.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no question about that. Those automatons who are controlled by the government will be here for the vote. I am glad to receive that admission from the hon. gentleman. That is a most irresponsible statement and shows the degree to which this government has polluted Parliament. In other words, debate is no longer important. Ministers come in and deliver speeches which have been written elsewhere and then leave, satisfied with their capacity of being able to read that which others had prepared.

The minister, in order to show the celerity, assiduity and dedication of the government, said, in effect, "Do not say we have not done anything." Then he said, "Why, last June 10, one year ago tomorrow, we sent a memo to the government of the United States." The minister then said, "We were not satisfied with that." Apparently they received no reply. On August 29 this was followed by another memo.

• (1510)

Apparently the United States government paid no attention whatsoever to the representations of the Canadian government which today is not very highly regarded by the administration of the United States.

Mr. Pepin: That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) wants to interrupt, I will have a message for him. I do not want to deliver it because I do not feel this is the afternoon when I should. However, if he starts dancing around, as he does from time to time when problems are placed before him, I shall have to deal with him. I would not disturb the equanimity of the minister, but his record in the past few months in connection with United States trade matters has been so completely devoid of any effective action that I am surprised he even makes an appearance here as one of the two ministers present. He is 50 per cent of the government now.

Mr. Pepin: I will discuss that record with you at any time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do want to hear his words of wisdom. On march 20 there was a meeting with the Secretary of the Interior of the United States. All that the minister who just finished speaking did was prove that this government writes notes but does not do anything effectively beyond that. Indeed, some of those notes were stated to have been very effective, and in the month of February the Prime Minister, speaking of the dangers of pollution, said Canada has contingency plans ready for anything. Today we find there were no contingency plans. All we have had is a series of letters to Washington; they call them aides memoire—to aid the memory of the United States with regard to Canada's position, with no action being taken.

We then had the visit of the President of the United States and the United States Secretary of State. They came to Ottawa. They heard, they listened, they saw, they went back to Washington, and nothing was done. Warnings have been given over and over again in this House with regard to the dangers of oil pollution, but in Your Honour's independent position as Acting Speaker of the House you must have recognized the dilatory manner in which this government carries out its responsibilities. Naturally, I do not expect from Your Honour an answer to that suggestion.

I have very high regard for the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). Mind you, I do not suspect in the slightest that what he produced had been worked out across the way by the government. Not at all. He is a man who has a feel for what the government is thinking: this results in his being able to achieve something that no member on this side of the House has been able to achieve.

Mr. Basford: That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was just one case. I am referring to moving adjournments under Standing Order 43 for the purpose of discussing matters of signal importance. The hon. member has a 1,000 per cent record. No other member of this House has that. He moved a motion to provide for some words that had allegedly been spoken by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), and it received unanimous support.

Mr. Nielsen: Immediately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When he brought forward that motion, it received unanimous support.

Mr. Nielsen: Immediately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to enlist the hon. member. He is sitting on the other side of the House; he is not with us but he is of us. From now on, when we have a motion that is serious in its import and ought to be considered, may we count on him as an ally to move it? That is the only way in which members of the opposition can bring anything before Parliament under Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is powerful, and I believe in paying tribute where it is due. On June 6 a similar motion was moved by the hon. member for Egmont. That is recorded at page 2879 of Hansard. When that motion was moved, Mr. Speaker said that the motion required unanimous consent. When he asked if there was unanimous consent, the Hallelujah chorus opposite said no. A little later the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) moved a motion. The speaker said:

> There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

Again the Hallelujah chorus of members supporting the government said no. On June 7 the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock again introduced a motion. Again there was no unanimity.

Mr. Nielsen: The Liberals refused it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the same day, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) moved a motion, with the same result.

Mr. Pepin: Don't interrupt him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That shows the cruel farce of the new rules. Some hon. members sitting around me thought I was mistaken when I told them that if the rule changes were accepted, such rules would stultify the House of Commons and crucify Parliament. That is what has happened.

Can you imagine the House of Commons dealing with one of the most serious matters facing this country with only two ministers being in the House? The minister responsible beat a retreat. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) read an essay to the House.

Mr. Basford: It at least said something.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) is in a particularly vulnerable position. I do not want to bring him into this. There will be no oil poured out if I start on him. Can you imagine these two ministers speaking in the House and then leaving? They do not want to listen to argument. They have every reason to feel that way as this place has become a sepulchre of freedom. Almost every vestige of freedom that existed in the House when this government came into power has been destroyed by the rules which have been brought into effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is nothing that we can bring before the House of immediate importance unless we secure unanimity, and unanimity is never given. I do not intend to deal particularly with the oil situation; it has been dealt with at great length. Having seen this House in the last few weeks, I can say it is unbelievable to those who saw Parliament in the days of King and St. Laurent.

• (1520)

Mr. Basford: And Diefenbaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is unbelievable that a House of Commons should be reduced to innocuousness because a government, having secured rule changes, a portion by agreement and a major portion by closure, has been able completely to emasculate this institution. The two ministers laugh. They laugh as freedom is destroyed. They ridicule the idea because, after all, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once said, "We are your masters". That attitude toward Parliament is apparent at all times and it has been intensified recently.

I had hoped an election would not have been long delayed so that as a result of this government being defeated, Parliament might have freedom restored to it. But I am not hopeful now. I must admit that I made a serious mistake in predicting that the election would be in the late part of June. Something happened. Something occurred to hon. gentlemen over there. I would not be surprised if the Minister of State for Urban Affairs from British Columbia had been in conversation with his hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) and had learned how dangerous it would be to go to the country.

Mr. Basford: We would sweep it.

Mr. Nielsen: Sweep what?

Mr. Dinsdale: Sweep too much under the rug.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have had admiration for the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton ever since the days at Saskatchewan University when he was president of our party at that university.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not say that disdainfully at all. When I read recently what he found as a result of a poll, I can only conclude there were good reasons for the postponement of the election. If they take a few more polls, I do not think I would be venturing into the field of prophecy were I to say that it appears clear now that there will be no election until 1973. There are great difficulties ahead for the government. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is simply wallowing in difficulties. And while he wallows, Canada's trade is being lost.

Mr. Pepin: I will meet you on Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Export trade is being lost as a result of the failure of the Department of Finance to take action.

Mr. Pepin: Wait until Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I have heard similar statistics. The minister is very happy about what is happening. Now we understand why the administration of the United States is so firm. They realize that whatever stands they take, the minister will approve regardless of the effect upon our trade.

Mr. Pepin: Fifteen per cent up!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is one reason we are afraid to speak out to the United States.

An hon. Member: It is better than you did in 1962.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not talking about backbenchers. I should like to know who that hon. member is. Many of the backbenchers over there feel very much as I do, but they dare not say so, Mr. Speaker. One hundred and ten posts of the 150 available to backbenchers have been filled. There are 40 dangling plums, and the reward for silence is a prospective plum.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: Is that how you ran your government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman from British Columbia makes some of his finest contributions from a seated position. Once he gets up, he reads. I do not want to say anything more about him because he is not in my field of operation today. Although he is from British Columbia, he has not been able to get his government to do one single thing to protect the waters of British Columbia and the Pacific coast from oil pollution and the potential danger to that province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The only one who did anything was the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson).

Mr. Pepin: Istanbul!

Mr. Diefenbaker: His reward was to be shipped out. They would not listen to him. He was not as successful as the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. When he made a motion on this subject, the government turned it down. He found he could do nothing, so he went out to British Columbia to tell the people there that he could not do anything while he was in Ottawa because of the attitude of the government toward that province.

I speak with a deep sense of feeling with regard to this institution. It has become a puppet in the hands of this government as far as the majority is concerned. It has become a memory of what a House of Commons should be. What do government members say? Apparently they agree with the Prime Minister that Members of Parliament are nobodies. Certainly that appellation reflects the attitude of the government toward them.

I pass to the next matter, Canada's natural resources. Where do we stand in relation to the United States? We send them notes. The air is full of notes—going one way! What are the replies? I remember the days of the First World War when Woodrow Wilson said, in effect; "We send notes because we are too proud to stand." Apparently that is the attitude today. Mention has been made of the possibility of an offer to build a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley. The government found this out only yesterday, apparently. Yet a few weeks ago in Edmonton the Prime Minister announced in stentorian tones the building of a Mackenzie highway to extend 1,000 miles. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) said a pipeline could be built over the highway.

Did the United States agree, before that announcement was made, that it would build such a pipeline? The Prime Minister estimated it would cost $100 million. According to the estimate given to me, it would cost five or six times that amount. It is simply a means of befogging the thinking of the electors in Alberta and the Northwest Territories by pretending that something will be done.

What about our resources? We are today a "have" nation; the United States is a "have not" nation of those things required in the modern technological age. Imagine the position of affairs as revealed recently by Dr. Preston Cloud, Professor of geology at the University of California: he says that the world will run out of natural gas, zinc, tin, gold, silver and platinum in 20 years. He went on to say:

> In 30 years there willl be no uranium 235, the basic atomic fuel. In about 50 years, oil will have ceased to gush from the last well. In less than a century we will have used up all our supplies of nickel, minerals are in similar danger. Only iron has a life expectancy of 400 years.

We have these elements to a degree that the United States has not, but needs. Surely the government, instead of sending notes, should be endeavouring to bring about agreement on the basis that we in Canada have these assets and they have not. The President of the United States made a statement after he was here, part of which apparently was written by one Head. It has the earmarks of such production. That is one Canadian production but the words used were obviously not written in Washington. He said, in effect, "We are going to get along very well." Earlier the Prime Minister spoke about a breakthrough. What about the great industrial concerns of the United States? The president of the United States National Coal Association, when giving evidence to the United States Senate, said:

> Our government considers Canada our own for energy purposes.

Surely a government of Canada that is worth its salt will, instead of making roseate statements such as those by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and others, stand up for Canada and assure us that this nation shall receive the fairness and consideration it deserves. There is no use trying to press this government to do anything. It just will not act. It is self-satisfied and secure with its majority. It continues its course, which already has had the effect of seriously weakening the Canadian economy.

Northern development was mentioned in the most admirable speech of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I have listened to him on many occasions, but his speech today was a mine of information concerning oil and Canada's problems arising therefrom. I congratulate him. I think this is the first time I have ever done that to anyone, but it was a speech worthy of the House. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was reading while the speech was being delivered. That is the interest he showed in this admirable speech which was worthy of the House.

Mr. Pepin: I agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have never been able to compete with the terpsichorean way the minister has of dancing with his hands.

Mr. Pepin: I learned that from you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What of our northern resources? When I decided to bring before the people of Canada a plan for the development of the north, it was ridiculed. Liberal members, including Mr. Pearson the then leader of that party, said we were going to build roads and railroads from igloo to igloo. Apparently he had been reading what was said in 1874 regarding Macdonald's plan to support the building of the CPR: the Minister of Finance of that day suggested that Macdonald was endeavouring to build railroads from wigwam to wigwam.

We opened up the north and provided $7.5 million to each province in Canada for the construction of roads. I remember when we decided to support the building of the railway to Pine Point. Liberal members then jeered and said it was ridiculous. It was a nightmare to them. But today it is the best paying railroad in any part of Canada. This has been the attitude of the Liberal party throughout the years from the time of Macdonald right through to the present. It is always speaking about development, but has failed to act.

We now have this danger to our shores, and what action do we get from the government? None. We receive the same interest which the government shows in respect of our other resources. It is dumping them in the United States. Mention has been made of exports. Let us look at our record of exports, in large measure contributed to by raw materials sent out of Canada.

Mr. Pepin: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister wants to speak and give us the facts, which he cannot do and does not dare to, I would be glad to hear him. Let us consider the latest example in British Columbia, in connection with the railway, to supply coal to Japan, some five million tons a year. What is this government doing about that? Is this coal going to travel over Canadian railroads? I suggest it will do nothing of the kind. A United States outfit will carry the coal from the coalbeds, through the U.S.A. to dock facilities furnished by the people of Canada at tremendous expense, and in this way export thousands of Canadian jobs.

When I asked for some action what answer did I get? I was told the government was looking into it, giving it consideration. While they are considering it, we are disposing of our resources of coal and losing jobs for Canadians. I do not want to say anything more about the oil situation because I am in entire agreement with what has been said by my colleagues. What I have tried to do is see whether it would be possible to dislodge this government from its inertia and from its sitting position, from where it makes its greatest contribution, and get it to act for Canada.

The speech just concluded by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the former minister of defence, was one of defeatism and fear. He said the things he wanted to say in order to evade what should have been said. I am sorry if the election is to be postponed until 1973 because the time has come for Canadians, if they would preserve our heritage, to have a change of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I join the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) by complimenting him for introducing a tremendously important motion which has occasioned this important debate. Any motion which draws the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) into debate is one worth making. The House always enjoys his pungent comments whether or not one agrees with them. We listened with great interest and amusement to the right hon. gentleman.

Yesterday and today the leader of the NDP described the proposing of this motion and the debate thereon as a game, as trickery. I will come back to that matter in a minute. The right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert said we were playing politics, that we have lost the freedom of the House and that motions under Standing Order 43 amount to nothing, are never consented to and never reach the stage of debate.

Let me place on the record the fact that motions under Standing Order 43 moved by the opposition have been debated in the House and voted on. There was one by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on the Public Service Commission's annual report. There was one from the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) under Standing Order 43 which was voted on by this House. Unanimous consent was given by the government to its presentation to the House. It was on a somewhat related subject, the west coast tanker route.

A motion under Standing Order 43 was made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who is not in his place today, relating to Biafra. It was presented to the House and voted on. I appreciate why the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert would be unaware of motions made by the leader of the Conservative party. I understand neither of them pays too much attention to what the other is doing. That motion of the Leader of the Opposition was moved and voted on. What the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert says is really not correct. When a motion is well put and well directed, the government consents to its presentation to the House and supports it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the discussion will not be embarrassing to the government.

Mr. Basford: Members of the opposition say that motions presented on this subject were not allowed. Let us look at those motions. On Tuesday, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) presented a motion to the effect that a committee look at the oil spill. I do not think we need another committee looking at it. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) presented a motion on Tuesday relating to federal action to clean up the spill. Action had been taken. Anything provided for in the motion was being deal with. On Wednesday another motion was presented under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, inviting the United States Secretary of the Interior to look at the oil spill. I am not sure that would have been very useful. Let us get something going, rather than just travelling around looking at things.

Again, on Wednesday the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) presented a motion to the effect that another committee should look at the oil spill and report back to the House. In my view that would not be of much use. Then on Thursday along came the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) who for the first time presented a motion that the matter relating to the international aspect of the problem be dealt with by the IJC. This was a very positive and useful type of motion. If some member of the opposition had moved a similar type of motion on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday there would have been no withholding of consent from this side. It would have been presented to the House and, I am sure, carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seeks the floor.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking a question. Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Basford: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is he overlooking the fact that on Tuesday, when the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) presented his motion, he asked as point (c) that what has happened be drawn forcefully to the attention of the government of the United States. What was wrong with that? How does it differ from what is now before the House?

Mr. Basford: That is quite easy to answer. It was made clear yesterday, in the report given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), that this had been done, that our embassy in Washington had already brought the matter forcefully to the attention of the United States authorities.

Then on Thursday along came the hon. member for Fraser Valley East with a motion relating to the international aspects of this matter, aspects beyond the territory and jurisdiction of Canada, asking that the United States join with us in a reference to the IJC to look at these situations. That, of course, is a useful motion which this House should have before it, as it has now. I hope it will be carried unanimously when the vote is taken.

The government previously declared itself on this question. As was made clear yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and again last evening by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), the government at every point of contact with the United States government, from the President down, had urged this course of action. The government had declared itself and had made its position clear. The time had arrived when it would be helpful and appropriate if the House of Commons called upon the United States government for a response to the request of the Canadian government.

That is the type of motion which should have been put. Had it been put before, it would have been agreed to on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. It does not seem to me that the presentation of a motion of the type that would ask the United States government to respond to our suggestion that the IJC be called in to deal with certain international aspects beyond our territorial waters could be termed as trickery or playing games. It is a disappointment to me that the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) would describe such reasonable initiative as trickery.

In listening to members of the New Democratic Party and to some opposition spokesmen it would seem that they overstate their case to the extent that they lose credibility. They state that this government has a record of non-performance in this area and is not concerned with environmental issues. The fact is that this government is doing more in terms of protection, preservation and conservation of the environment than any other government in the world.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: Perhaps we might look at a few things this Parliament has done. This Parliament has passed the Canada Water Act, the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Northern Inland Waters Act, the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, major extensions of Canada's territorial seas, major extensions in respect of the preservation of our fishing resource and important amendments to the Fisheries Act relating to any waters frequented by fish, to ensure they are protected.

This Parliament, through the initiative of the government, passed major amendments to the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act relating to water pollution and to the protection of our water environment and the resources of our waters and seas. We have taken action relative to the Clean Air Act concerning the protection of our air. There have been amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act relative to exhaust emissions. Many important pieces of legislation have been passed. The leader of the New Democratic Party described these as pieces of paper. That is an insult to Parliament.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I think in this Parliament we have passed very important pieces of environmental protection legislation at the initiative and with the leadership of this government. Within the government we have taken action, for example, to reduce the phosphate level of detergents. Measures have been passed under the Pest Control Products Act to deal with DDT and other pesticides. Extremely generous tax incentives have been given to industry respecting devices and anti-pollution measures to reduce air and water pollution resulting from industrial processes. We have been providing over $500 million through one of my own agencies, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for the construction of sewage disposal plants to reduce the demands on our clean waters. Those are things which we have been doing within our own territory, under our own jurisdiction.

• (1550)

We have also been taking positions internationally and have been at the forefront of international action. We are one of the leaders at the environmental conference which is now being held at Stockholm. If the official opposition want to, they can belittle the importance of our efforts, but let us look at the record.

Mr. Baldwin: There is so much to belittle.

Mr. Basford: We read such headlines from Stockholm as "Canadians break stalemate at environmental conference".

Mr. Baldwin: After first reversing their position.

Mr. Basford: Let us not forget the work of my colleague from British Columbia, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). Another headline about the Stockholm conference which appeared in one of the Vancouver papers today reads, "Canada wins day in ocean pollution law". Further action is being taken in Stockholm at the international level to ensure tough, tight and proper environmental protection action in areas that are beyond our territorial seas and beyond our immediate national jurisdiction.

The concern of this government is precisely the reason why we are playing a leading role at that United Nations conference on the environment. Surely hon. members know the very strong stand that we have taken there regarding oil pollution. When my colleague from British Columbia returns from Stockholm, where he is leading the Canadian delegation, he will undoubtedly report to the House in detail on the success of the leading role Canada has played at the conference. Canada has been supporting and has worked effectively at that conference to win support for a multinational declaration of principles which will go a long way toward keeping clean our air, our water and our beaches.

We said we will give our support—these are our instructions to our delegation—with significant amounts of money on a continuing basis. It is not too much to say that we have assumed an extremely important leadership role at that conference and that it is being generally recognized, a recognition which never comes from the official opposition.

I am delighted, particularly because of the portfolio which I now hold in this government, that the conference has at least passed through the preliminary committee stage. Yesterday the Canadian delegation suggested that Canada host an international human settlements conference in 1975. I hope this will be passed by the plenary session at Stockholm. This is not simply another conference relating to the environment; it is designed to be a demonstration project on Canadian sites in Canadian cities of experiments that have been made in the world as to how people can get the best urban environment while living in cities. That is the kind of thing that Canada will be showing the world at that demonstration project which, hopefully, it will be agreed will be hosted by Canada.

Some comments have been made in this debate about British Columbians in the House and I want to mention a few of them. First, we have the motion moved by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. It is a useful initiative at this time, calling upon Americans to respond to our request that certain matters relative to the Cherry Point refinery and to the shipping of oil through those waters be dealt with by the International Joint Commission. We have the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos), who is in his riding today, who has four private member's bills on the order paper, some of which are being reflected in regulations and in the proposals which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) announced today. We have the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) who as a member of this House has played an important role in environmental matters and on the whole subject of the carriage of oil by sea.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Look what happened to him!

Mr. Basford: That hon. member is so well regarded that we all joined in supporting him for the leadership of our party in British Columbia.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was banished.

Mr. Bell: You threw him out.

Mr. Basford: Those of us who are Liberals in British Columbia are proud of his leadership, and whether we are members of the cabinet or Members of Parliament we are determined to give him every support to become the next premier of British Columbia. This morning we received a telegram from the Premier of British Columbia on this oil spill. All the matters mentioned in the wire are being dealt with. I am sure that Mr. Anderson, the leader of the provincial Liberal party in B.C., will be happy the premier of B.C. is supporting the position for which he has been fighting for so long.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the government did not support him.

Mr. Basford: I am sure that he welcomes the support of the Premier of British Columbia.

Mr. Woolliams: You scuttled the poor member.

Mr. Basford: I could mention the work that hon. members from the interior of B.C., the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) and the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard), are doing in terms of preservation of the recreational waters of the Okanagan. I am sorry that my colleague, the Minister of Transport, cannot participate in this debate as he is out of the city on government business. However, three ministers have spoken in the debate and have indicated the importance that we place on the matter. The fourth minister is leading our delegation in Stockholm.

Mr. Bell: Where is the Prime Minister?

Mr. Basford: May I say for the Minister of Transport, relative to the Transport Act and the work of his department, that as has been mentioned in this debate ever since concern has been expressed about oil spills, about the ecological damage that can be caused, and ever since this problem came to public attention with the sinking of the Torrey Canyon in the English Channel, attention has been focused on the need, to which this government has been responding, for proper, effective transport laws, marine laws and shipping laws to protect the waters of our coasts from the kind of accidents that can occur.

The Brussels conference of 1969 dealt with two international conventions related to oil pollution. While in some respects we did not get all that we wanted from that conference, we did bring about important revisions of those conventions and from that flowed a revision of the Canada Shipping Act which was reflected in Bill C-2 which was dealt with by this parliament. The grounding of the tanker Arrow on the east coast in 1970 gave further impetus to those projects of revising the Canada Shipping Act and putting in place what is now part XIX of the Canada Shipping Act which was proclaimed on July 1, 1971.

The introduction of anti-pollution regulations under part XIX of the Canada Shipping Act is progressing and new oil pollution regulations and garbage pollution regulations have been made. Traffic control and traffic separation schemes have been introduced and are being continually developed. These are the kind of measures we need if we are to protect our coasts. Regulations establishing the maritime pollution claims fund were made on February 3, 1972, and further regulations relating to ships' navigating appliances, watchkeeping personnel and non-Canadian ships' compliance certificates are in the final stages of drafting.

• (1600)

Arctic shipping pollution regulations made under the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act are also in the final stages of drafting. Being announced today by the Minister of Transport, effective July 1, 1972, is the institution of a marine navigation information service in the waters of British Columbia. This service will be effective in Canadian waters between Vancouver Island and the mainland including the Strait of Juan de Fuca, the Strait of Georgia including Burrard Inlet, Howe Sound, Malaspina Strait, Johnstone Strait, Broughton Strait, Queen Charlotte Strait including the Gordon and Goletas channels.

This marine navigation information service is designed to cover all vessels of 100 gross tons and over, and all tugs with tows which measure, from the stern of the towing vessel to the stern of the last vessel or object towed, 100 feet or over. The service is based upon each vessel transmitting a message containing basic navigation information at designated points along her route. Masters or pilots of other vessels in the area, by monitoring these broadcasts will have the positions and intended movements of all other vessels which are within a given sector. Steps are being taken in a constructive positive way to ensure that the possibilities of marine accident, particularly involving tankers, are reduced to the minimum which adequate protection measures can provide.

The leader of the New Democratic Party said we were not ready if there was an oil spill. We pray that there will never be a major oil spill. Let us hope that we can have tough and effective international regulations governing the transportation of oil at sea, but we ourselves must be ready in the event that there is some accident, some hazard, some oil spill. The Minister of Transport's efforts in this regard were ridiculed by the NDP. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Ministry of Transport has a contingency plan. The ministry has the nucleus of a team of experts at headquarters which provides for the central purchasing of equipment, training, evaluation and planning whenever a situation is serious enough to warrant the use of such group. Regional structures have been established under the authority of the federal contingency plan which provide for a local responsibility and planning structure throughout the country. A great deal of effort has been provided by the petroleum and associated industries to assure that this contingency plan is well established.

The program involves the expenditure of approximately $4 million, which will include the provision of 27 slick-lickers. Possibly that would be a job for the leader of the NDP when he is out of office after the next election. As I say, it includes the provision of 27 slick-lickers and their associated vehicles, 42,000 feet of inshore booming and the other equipment which is needed in order to provide a reasonable capability to meet the challenge of an oil spill.

Mr. Baldwin: Now tell us about the toilet-rolls.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I can hear ridicule from the opposition. It just shows what little they know of this subject. Such a machine has been located at Victoria. This equipment can be moved on short notice to points on the west coast to cope with possible oil pollution incidents.

An hon. Member: You are reading too fast.

Mr. Woolliams: Then why did they have to get hay?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, all this heckling from the opposition shows that they do not want the facts. They do not want to see that we are prepared, that we have contingency plans and that we have the situation under control. This kind of equipment was used, for example, in connection with the grounding of the freighter Vanlene off Austin Island in mid-March of this year, and the same equipment is now being used to cope with the oil spill at White Rock which came from Cherry Point refinery.

Slick-lickers have been built for Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert, and 2,000 foot inshore booms will be located at Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert. As part of the over-all contingency planning structure for the west coast, readily available sources of sorbants have been identified throughout British Columbia for emergency use in case of oil spills. The hon. member for Calgary North ridicules this kind of planning. So does the leader of the NDP. We all hope there will not be any accident. We all hope there will not be ecological damage. But the government must have a contingency plan to minimize the damage from an accident should one occur.

Within our own legislative jurisdiction and within our own territorial waters we have taken every possible effective step that we could take. We are prepared to carry out whatever constructive suggestions are made, but our problem is that much of the potential damage can come from the carriage of oil on the international high seas or in the U.S. territorial waters. Within our own territorial jurisdiction we have our own powers and tough legislation. We have contingency plans. But of course we are limited when it comes to dealing with the high seas, U.S. territorial waters or U.S. refineries. This is why we are calling in this motion, and the government has called at every point in our contact with the United States, for them to—

Mr. Nielsen: You are admitting it is your motion.

Mr. Basford: Parliament is calling for it in this motion and that is why we want the motion passed by Parliament. That is why we are joining the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, so that there may be an expression by the representatives of the Canadian people of their wish that the United States respond to the government's invitation to bring the International Joint Commission into this matter and design meaningful rules relative to U.S. waters. Hopefully, Mr. Speaker, this and other action taken by Parliament, by government and by the people of Canada, and the representations made by the politicians of this country and those of the U.S. Pacific northwest, will lead to an early and favourable response from the U.S. government.

It is plain that the problem of pollution is international. Each time a river flows from one land to another, each time foul air blows from one country to another, and each time an oil tanker pollutes the high seas or ravages a coastline, it is essential that we act, and that internationally we impose very stringent requirements on international oil and shipping companies which fail to take adequate precautions and endanger the life that is dependent on our oceans.

Relative to the west coast, Mr. Speaker, we think the Pacific northwest, be it British Columbia, Oregon or Washington, has some of the most beautiful water and recreational areas on the North American continent.

Members from British Columbia have asked the Canadian government to do all that it can to protect us, and speaking as a member of that government, we are doing that. We are calling upon the citizens of the United States to ask their government to do the same.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East, who moved this motion, is to be complimented on having the Canadian House of Commons put on record this request to the United States government to respond to our initiative and involve the IJC in this important role. I think the member for Fraser Valley East will want to speak again on the amendment and indicate the response to conversations with politicians, governors and senators of the Pacific northwest who we hope will urge the United States government to do what we are urging them to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if I might review the situation. We have about 45 minutes left in this debate and I know many hon. members would like to contribute to this important matter. I suggest that I call next upon the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), then the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) and then the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates). I suggest to hon. members that if they would take 15 minutes each, that might be fair. If this suggestion is acceptable, we could give these three hon. members a chance to make their contribution. Without asking that it be made a formal order, I make this suggestion.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, will the procedure followed in this debate be such that the question will be put? Is that the intention?

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I think there is probably a disposition among hon. members on all sides that when we come to the end of the debate we carry the motion and the amendment without their being put to a formal vote.

Mr. Baldwin: I am not talking about a recorded vote, but at least the question should be put. I mention this because after the speech of the minister I think it is necessary to get back to the business of the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is our understanding, that at five o'clock today the question on the motion as amended will be put and we hope it will be carried unanimously.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, we have just watched a very interesting performance indeed. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) has given a performance as smooth as silk. In this case it needed to be very smooth indeed. He has papered over the cracks in the record of the government, practically turning himself into an oil slick licker in order to show his anxiety and to cover up the long months of neglect when this government turned a deaf ear to pleas from this side of the House for something to be done in order to avoid a disaster such as has taken place at Cherry Point.

Earlier speakers have documented what happened in these long months. I refer specifically to those occasions since January, 1971, when the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and one or two members of the official opposition begged that something be done about this matter. It was not done, Mr. Speaker.

Anyone who has visited the west coast recently knows that even this government has to make a show of interest and anxiety at this time because feelings there are running very high—feelings of indignation, of outrage, of fear for the future. The people of British Columbia are deeply concerned about what is happening to the province, and not only in the matter of this oil slick, although that is a taste of what is to come. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to Canada as being a "have" country. We realize that the time is not far distant, if we keep a government of this kind, when we shall be joining the "have nots".

An hon. Member: Have nuts.

Mrs. MacInnis: We have the nuts right now, but we will be "have nots" before too long if we let this go on. It is not only oil, it is not only environment, it is not only fish, it is not only minerals, it is not only forest—in every one of these cases the federal government is demonstrating less than tokenism in trying to save and protect our resources which were among the richest in the world.

I am convinced, as this House is gradually becoming convinced because British Columbia members are doing their best, that this problem is not going to blow over. The people of British Columbia are becoming thoroughly aroused about this oil spill problem because they have seen what happens here. The age of gumshoe diplomacy is not dead in this government.

This morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said that we have been trying to persuade the United States government to do this and that. Those of us who have read history remember when Canadian governments adopted much more vigorous methods of persuasion in order to get the United States government to realize that there was a border and that we wanted to run our own show. This has not been the case with the present government.

It would be nice to believe that in this House we are all equally concerned about the disaster that has taken place at Cherry Point and that we are equally concerned to see that it does not happen again. Much as I would like to believe that, I cannot. It may be true of individual members, and most who come from British Columbia sense the feelings of the people there. But it just is not true of this government which is torn in its loyalties and has already made up its mind on which side it stands.

I listened carefully to the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning. He accepts the inevitability of the destruction of the environment because he accepts the inevitability of tankers coming down the west coast. His whole speech was predicated on the fact that tankers will come down the west coast. I am not sure that they need be allowed to do so. I would much prefer the attitude of the leader of our party, who said that it was time the government of this country and an aroused people behind it took the position that Canada will not stand for tankers coming through Pacific waters. It may be said that we are just battling against shadows and that the United States will not pay any attention. But if some of us and the government would start doing this sort of thing, we might be joined by other governments. Some have shown that they have a little backbone even against the great United States.

I noticed in yesterday's newspapers a report that the Swedish prime minister, at the environmental meeting in Stockholm, without naming the United States had made abundantly clear where he stood on the outrage and the immense destruction brought about by indiscriminate bombing and the large-scale use of bulldozers and herbicides. He said it was of paramount importance that ecological warfare cease immediately. The United States recognized that the cap fitted and were enraged diplomatically because the prime minister of a little country like Sweden had dared make remarks which could refer only to them.

If Sweden could be joined by Canada and one or two other countries who pride themselves on being international powers, if our minister who is in Sweden now told some of the things that should be told about oil slicks and urged that the environment is more important than the provision of additional facilities for corporations to bring oil down the west coast, then we might get somewhere internationally. We will not get anywhere while we merely strike attitudes, take up positions and go with polite little notes to the United States.

I have consulted the record about what is going on, at least as far as one can in view of the cloak of secrecy surrounding these matters. On February 9, 1971, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West tried to get some information from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and received the following reply as recorded at page 3232 of Hansard:

I do not think it would be appropriate for us as a federal government to appear before any U.S. tribunal that is considering these questions, any more than we would consider it appropriate for the American government to appear before our tribunals. Our contacts must be much more direct. I am sure the hon. member recognizes the question of the dignity of our government in dealing with the governments of other countries.

There are times when something is more important than dignity and this is one of those times. The survival of this country is at stake. The minister can smile as much as he likes, but he knows perfectly well how British Columbians feel about this. If he had more intestinal fortitude he would tell the Secretary of State for External Affairs that sending polite notes is not enough, and merely referring these matters to the IJC is not sufficient. I think a proper way of handling this business would be by bringing forward the sort of motion that is suggested in the publication Perspective, which is put out by an anti-pollution organization on the coast. In their May issue they say:

We feel that prevention will be the best medicine for the problem. The half million dollars spent on the Vanlene oil clean-up—

That was the spill previous to this one.

—could have been used to begin installation of radar along the west coast for the ministry of transport to monitor the approach of ocean-going vessels, and inform the captains of their positions as they near the coast-line. The captain of the Vanlene thought he was grounded on the coast of Washington. Canada must take immediate action to keep the rust-buckets like the Vanlene from entering Canadian waters without proper functioning guidance equipment. It is not worth the cost to the taxpapers for British Columbia harbours to seek increased trade with ships that could just as well end up on the rocks as in the harbour.

Then they say:

It would be an ironical situation for the federal government to proclaim a national underwater park in the Gulf of Georgia and not protect it from the potential polluters floating above.

If supertankers are permitted to travel along the coast of British Columbia it is only a matter of time before one of them runs aground.

The resultant spill will be 50 times worse than the 330 tons spilled by the Vanlene. The ecological and economical destruction would be disastrous.

Then they suggest a motion for setting up a committee formed of citizens from the Canadian side of the border as well as from the American side which would delve into the Cherry Point disaster and other matters, find the facts, make recommendations and then as a joint citizen group from both sides of the border bring pressure to bear on both governments jointly and make them act.

I know that on the government side of the House there is a great lack of respect for ordinary, organized citizens. Nevertheless, if we are to deal effectively with the United States I think we must encourage such voluntary citizen groups to do their work. Citizens must be informed, they must be organized and they must stand behind their government. What is the sense of sending polite notes to the United States government, to members of Congress, to the President or to anybody else unless the American government knows that Canadians are ready and willing to support their government in these efforts? The Skagit business is staring us in the face. The IJC is supposed to have made a report. And what has been the result? The government has done absolutely nothing. I suggest nothing will be done on either side of the border until enough citizens groups become concerned, stand behind those who are concerned about pollution and demand that something be done.

Only a few minutes remain to me, Mr. Speaker. May I say this. We need new priorities in this country, priorities different from those this government espouses. The government's top priority is that of economic profitability for corporations—oil corporations in this instance. The government adheres to that priority even though it results in ecological disaster for the west coast.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): What do they care?

Mrs. MacInnis: We must change that. We must speak out and stand firm in our dealings with this government and the government across the border. We have had one Arrow disaster. We know what that disaster meant for the people of the area concerned. How many more disasters like Chedabucto Bay and Cherry Point must there be before the government realizes that setting up equipment to deal with pollution when it occurs is not enough? We must prevent these disasters and as our first line of defence we must stop the big supertankers from coming in large numbers down the west coast. It can be done if the government wants to do it. Apparently this government has given its allegiance to big business on both sides of the border, to oil companies and other big companies. Its polite notes are designed to give people the idea it is doing something.

Let the government think what all this means to British Columbia. Let it think of the beaches fouled, of water polluted, of recreational possibilities damaged, and so on. Our second largest industry, the tourist industry, is shot because the environment which makes that industry possible is being wrecked. Wildlife is destroyed. Such pollution is a disaster for marine life and for bird life. These things are irreplaceable. Our province, one of the most beautiful areas in the whole world, is being desecrated by oil companies, mining companies and lumber companies which are taking out all that the traffic will bear without any thought of what will happen. It is time British Columbia members made their voices heard loudly and clearly. It is not enough, in view of what is going on, to introduce a motion of this kind. I can hardly believe that British Columbia supporters of the government will allow the government to get away with this sort of thing.

An hon. Member: You had better believe it.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, of course we are in favour of this motion even though its introduction involved political trickery. We believe in what the motion says and we support the amendment. We will support the motion as amended. However, let me say this: the people of British Columbia are not fooling and they do not intend to let this government get away with what has been happening in the past 18 months. They will not tolerate such complete neglect and failure to do anything concrete that will stop tankers coming down the west coast. I for one hope that every force in this country will be mobilized to prevent this outrage being perpetrated against our west coast province.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) has provided the House with an excellent opportunity to review a subject very close to the hearts of west coast members and all members who serve constituencies adjacent to or involved with bodies of water that are navigated by commercial vessels.

In order to focus our attention more sharply after the numerous speakers who have spoken in a number of hours of debate, let me deal with the spill and say how large it was. Strangely enough, this was not a big spill and not a very damaging spill. It was dramatic, not so much because of its size but because of the location in which it occurred and what is anticipated will take place on the west coast. I have some notes which the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was good enough to give me after he had been in touch with the office today of Congressman Meeds of the state of Washington. According to these notes, the clean-up co-ordinator is Captain David Gershowitz, captain of the port of Seattle coast guard district. The tanker involved was the World Bond, a ship under Liberian registry carrying oil from Iran. This was not oil that is to be connected with the new, proposed oil route from Alaska.

The ship arrived at Cherry Point late on June 3, 1972, and began discharging oil almost immediately. The spill occurred during darkness on June 4. Witnesses say that crude oil discharged for approximately five hours before it was discovered. A great deal of the spill was contained by plastic booms surrounding the discharging vessel. There is a regulation which states that loading or discharging vessels must be surrounded by these booms. However, they are not effective in currents greater than seven-tenths of one knot; oil is sucked under the boom when the current exceeds that figure. Coastguards estimate the spill at approximately 100 barrels, each running to 55 gallons. Some estimates are as high as 300 barrels. So, Mr. Speaker, we are talking about an oil spill of between 5,000 and 6,000 gallons.

A broken valve caused the spill. The valve has been taken from the ship and sent by the coastguard to an independent testing lab to determine the cause of the break, whether it was the responsibility of the vessel or of the Atlantic Richfield Oil Company.

On Monday, Congressman Meeds will testify before a sub-committee on the navigable waters safety act sponsored by Senator Magnusson and himself. This legislation was introduced after the spill at Anacortes last year. It will provide for strict harbour controls which will lessen the possibility of collision and strict construction standards for bulk liquid carriers, such as oil carriers. Initially, only United States tankers will have to comply with this ruling, but by 1974 foreign tankers will also be included. The notes conclude:

> A letter was mailed today from Senators Magnusson and Jackson and Congressman Meeds to Secretary of State Rogers requesting the administration to call a cabinet-level, Canadian-U.S. oil spill conference. This conference would specifically discuss the international consequences and possibly co-ordinate action in the event of future oil spills.

Here is a movement toward Canada-U.S. co-operation which up to this point has not been recorded in this debate. It is certainly going to be a useful addition to the studies now being taken to see if some control can be brought to the matter of oil spills on an international basis between Canada and the United States. This is in addition to the recommendation made by the government of Canada for action by the International Joint Commission.

It is interesting to note that today, June 9, hearings are taking place in the Congress of the United States, in Washington, in the joint economic committee of which Senator William Proxmire is chairman. I quote from a press release dated June 2:

> Senator William Proxmire . . . announced Friday that the Committee will hold four days of hearings on June 7, 8, 9 and 22 on natural gas regulation and the trans-Alaska pipeline.
> "It is becoming increasingly clear that the supply of energy has shifted from abundance to scarcity," Proxmire said, "and that the nation badly needs wise public policies to avert an energy crisis—
> "It also means that government policies must be formulated in a broad perspective that carefully balances the environmental, economic, national security, and other social demands of both consumers and producers—
> "The purpose of the hearings I am announcing today will be to place the Federal Power Commission's regulation of natural gas and the Interior Department's decision to approve the trans-Alaska pipeline right-of-way into this broad context and determine how well these policies serve the broad public interest—

"The hearings on June 9 and 22 will investigate whether there is evidence to support the Interior Department's decision to approve the trans-Alaska pipeline right-of-way. As I indicated in a May 19 letter to Secretary Morton, a preliminary analysis of the available information indicates serious omissions and inconsistencies between Secretary Morton's public statements and his department's analysis of the situation."

Of particular interest to us is that in the schedule of witnesses, attached to this press release, who will appear before the committee today the first witness is "David Anderson, Member of Parliament, Canada". A little later I want to remark on why the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) happens to be before that committee today, about the work he is doing and also the very valuable work being done by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos) in this field. Before I do so I want to refer to the area that is affected.

The Gulf of Georgia and Puget Sound would be affected by the oil spills we have been discussing today. Puget Sound and the Gulf of Georgia are formed by an indentation of the west coast and by the inland shore of Vancouver Island. These two bodies of water together are about 20 to 30 miles across. They extend northward from the southern point in the state of Washington for a distance of approximately 200 miles. This inland sea is an extremely busy area. It is plied daily by hundreds of vessels, commercial, recreational, small craft and one of the biggest fishing fleets in the world. The area is of inestimable value for trade, recreation and marine life. It is also a great commercial fishery. Around its shores and in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, which is the strait leading into the Gulf of Georgia and Puget Sound, are the cities of Victoria, Tacoma, Seattle, Vancouver and smaller centres such as Nanaimo, and so on.

Let me now deal with the threat to this area from oil spills. While it is true that oil has moved daily in vessels up and down the Gulf of Georgia and Puget Sound for decades and spills have occurred again and again, it is only with the possibility of giant oil tankers proposed for the Alaska route, or TAPS route as it is called, that a threat of this magnitude comes to the Gulf of Georgia. This threat is beyond our present capability to manage or even comprehend. To give hon. members some idea of what is meant by an oil spill if vessels of the 250,000 tons and up class were to spill oil in the Strait of Georgia, let me refer to words which the hon. member for Victoria used in a speech last February to the Vancouver Island Liberal Association.

Mr. Bell: Was this before you kicked him out of caucus, or after?

Mr. Deachman: I am referring to the hon. member for Victoria, whom we have not kicked out of caucus. We never kick anybody out of the Liberal caucus.

Mr. Crouse: What about Hellyer and Kierans?

Mr. Deachman: Sometimes members decide that they want to leave us, but we never kick anyone out. The hon. member for Victoria said:

The tankers they are building for the Valdez-Bellingham route carry about a million barrels of crude. At roughly 250,000 tons they are today considered to be only medium-large tankers. It would take about three of that size every day to take the maximum output of the TAPS line at Valdez. But I did a little calculation with the help of some handy conversion tables, and if the million barrels they carry is as incomprehensible to you as it is to me perhaps it is easier to understand if I say that a million barrels would make a trail of crude oil 18 feet wide and an inch thick for a distance of 700 miles. If you want the 700-mile trail a little wider—say 30 feet wide—still an inch thick—just move up to a 500,000-ton tanker.

The same hon. member, in an address to the Chamber of Commerce of Vancouver Island at Duncan, British Columbia, in March, 1971 said:

The Torrey Canyon was a 100,000-ton or 600,000-barrel capacity oil tanker. It got off course and spilled the whole works in the English Channel. The tanker Haro which ran aground off a reef in Chedabucto Bay spilled about 10,000 tons, 5,000 tons of which escaped the sea and was never a part of the immediate problem. It cost $3.5 million to clean up even superficially the other 5,000 tons. What is by today's standards now known as a medium-sized oil tanker of about 100,000 tons would carry about the same amount—about 5,000 tons of oil for its own consumption and a 200,000-tonner of the Universe class will carry over 12,000 tons. This is not the end. Tankers nowadays range up to double that size, to 400,000 tons, and there are bigger ones on the drawing board.

Consider the threat brought to the west coast by the proposed TAPS line. Consider for a moment what is at stake here as far as the Americans are concerned and what the possibilities are of preventing traffic along this route, as was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), or seeing it diverted down the Mackenzie Valley through Canada. I wish to quote from a well respected industrial newsletter published on the west coast, Beale's Resource Industry newsletter. Reference is made to a report published in the United States by the president of the Alyeska Pipeline Service Company the purpose of which is to set out the United States case in support of the west coast tanker route. The president stated:

The dependency on foreign crude sources in district V is greater than comparable dependency in the aggregate of district I-IV.

In other words, the interior of America is already well supplied by internal oil resources. It is the coastal area which has economic problems. The article goes on to point out as follows:

Shipment of North Slope crude oil to district II could lead to a current underutilization of existing systems and a future oversupply in that district at the expense of district V—

The uncertainties associated with any trans-Canada pipeline indicate it could not be built without much delay and greater cost than suggested in the environmental impact statement.

He points to the seriousness of the Canadian native claims issue which he feels would upset going ahead with the Mackenzie route. The report continues:

A trans-Canada pipeline would raise significant environmental issues where there is currently no established forum for dealing with them and could involve regulatory and jurisdictional delays beyond any reliable estimate—

Canadian equity financing would be necessarily limited and requirements for transportation of Canadian oil could result in excessive net resource costs to the United States.

The report goes on to document various reasons why they do not want to accept the Mackenzie Valley route and why they consider the less costly, more flexible, totally

U.S.-operated and controlled west coast route to be more desirable. And so it seems evident as we watch—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I interrupt the hon. member to remind him of the agreement reached as to the time to be allotted to speeches. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Deachman: Perhaps hon. members would be good enough to give me a few more moments. I shall be finished in a very few moments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put it to hon. members. At the same time, I will incorporate with that request the suggestion that the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North might be allowed the 15 minutes to which he is entitled. Is that agreeable to hon. members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deachman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In summary, I would like to particularly praise the work of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in his fight before the U.S. courts and in congressional committees in an effort to point out what this issue means environmentally to the Puget Sound and Georgia Bay areas. I would remind hon. members how effective the hon. member has been in making the people of Canada, the people of the United States, the Congress of the United States and this Parliament aware of these problems.

I would also praise my colleague, the hon. member for Victoria, for what he has done. He has made some extremely valuable suggestions as to what could be done on the west coast to ensure more effective control of tanker traffic. We must recognize that tanker traffic is coming, and I very much doubt that it is within the power of this Parliament or the people of Canada to prevent these vessels operating on the high seas off the west coast and in and out of U.S. ports.

While I do not have time today to discuss the details of the measures advocated by the hon. member for Victoria, may I simply refer to his suggestion that an elaborate system of radar control operate on the west coast to keep this traffic under surveillance throughout its passage. This program would provide rigid inspection and would prevent rust-buckets, as one hon. member called them a moment ago, entering the sheltered waters of the west coast. The hon. member also suggested provision of harbours of refuge for vessels in danger, places where safety gear might be kept ready for use whenever oil spills occur.

It will be seen, therefore, that work is being done to bring about better rapport between Canada and the United States in an effort to control these matters, and that suggestions are being made by Members of Parliament both to our own government and to the United States as to what can be done to control this growing threat.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to say that in my opinion this has been a very useful debate today after what might be termed a lost weekend yesterday. I think the government has materially assisted in allowing the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It was accepted today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) on behalf of the government.

The International Joint Committee now will not only have authority to consider the matter by way of reference but will also have the necessary resources, financial and otherwise, to produce results that will provide protection to the people of the United States and Canada against hazards, real and realized, from the tanker transportation of oil.

The gravity of the situation can best be appreciated when the facts are examined. We learned that within three to five seconds between 4,000 and 12,000 gallons of oil were spilled into the ocean. We in Nova Scotia know the frightening dangers to the ecology from oil spills. The Arrow disaster in Chedabucto Bay resulted in 1.2 million gallons of crude oil plastering 190 miles of our province's shoreline, killing wildlife and costing the taxpayers of this nation a fortune.

The oil spill in British Columbia is a drop in the bucket compared to the Arrow disaster and the danger of future disasters to British Columbia from tankers which will have a 100,000-ton dead weight capacity as compared with the 18,000-ton dead weight capacity of the Arrow. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) was talking about tankers with a 250,000-ton dead weight capacity and the possibility of still larger tankers being built.

I have a 1972 year book issued for the "National Fisherman" in which is a picture of one of the great supertankers being produced. Part of the accompanying story reads as follows:

> Controversy over proposed superports—deep water terminals to receive oil tankers which may range up to one million tons dead weight in another decade—

That indicates what the people of British Columbia have to face in the future so far as tanker traffic is concerned along their shorelines. We in Nova Scotia appreciate how frightening this whole situation is for members who come from that area of Canada and the people who live there, just as we are frightened in Nova Scotia about similar future problems associated with our coastline.

What concerns me about this debate, just as with the situation at the time of the Arrow disaster, is that we approach each of these disasters as they occur, and when they occur, to our ecology on a piecemeal basis. The time has arrived for an integrated, national long-term policy which will ensure control and regulation of all such activities be they problems of pollution associated with the Great Lakes, tanker traffic on the east and west coasts or the development of nuclear power plants whether the sites be on either of our coasts or in central Canada.

While the residents of British Columbia have this week been concerned about the oil spill from the Cherry Point refinery, we in Nova Scotia have been concerned about the possible construction of a nuclear power plant on Stoddart Island in Shag Harbour. We were told discussions were being held between officials of a United States group and Mr. Regan's government about the possible construction of a $2 billion, 12,000 megawatt nuclear generating station with power to be exported from that plant by cable under the Atlantic Ocean to the northeastern United States.

Surely the dangers inherent in such a project are just as real and even more deadly to our environment, as well as to those who live in the area of Nova Scotia, as the oil spills on both the east and west coasts. Surely we should before now have had definite statements as to just who can build these plants, as well as in respect of the dangers to the public of such a power station and the relative dangers associated with the CANDU-type nuclear power station as compared with the United States light water reactor which has been proposed for construction by United States interests on Stoddart Island.

It was helpful to learn from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) today that the type of reactor proposed for Nova Scotia had not been authorized in Canada and will either require a change in the criteria or a refusal of the application. We must certainly have some guarantee from the government as to the safety of these nuclear power stations from almost every point of view. I am informed that the Pickering I nuclear power station had to be cut back from full energy production to 80 per cent capacity as a result of a build-up of cobalt 40, the same substance used in the cobalt bomb. Pollution Probe has contended this is the highest concentration found in a non-military device. It is also contended by Pollution Probe that there is a higher level of radioactivity in the Pickering area than is normal. We must act in an attempt to solve this type of pollution problem as well as pollution from oil spills. We must have greater assurance than we have at present that pollution associated with the CANDU method of nuclear power generation is less dangerous to the public and the environment than other methods of power production.

It has been my view that the CANDU method of nuclear power generation produces a great deal of radioactive waste. It is urgent, also, that we obtain new assurances with regard to effluents, for again I understand the Pickering I nuclear power station also had to be cut back because its production capacity was heating up the lake into which it dumps its effluent to such a degree that it was dangerous to the resources of the area. Again I should like to refer to the "National Fisherman" and its reference to the dumping of effluents into waters by nuclear power plants. It reads:

> Dumped indiscriminately, waste heat can raise water temperatures near discharge tubes more than 20 degrees F, disrupting migratory and reproductive cycles and killing fish or driving them away.

That is an indication of the type of danger associated with nuclear power generation. We should be involved in an over-all examination of all types of pollution developed by man in various ways. This is particularly so if we are to build nuclear power stations in this country, just as it is if the United States is to build tankers with a dead weight of a million tons capacity to carry oil from Valdez to Cherry Point or some other refinery on the west coast, creating tremendous danger to the people of British Columbia from every environmental and ecological point of view.

We should have the same assurance when the government approves the development of nuclear power stations whether it be by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited or someone else. We must have every guarantee that there will be no danger or that the danger will be very minimal to our environment, the ecology and the people who live in the area.

There is a suggestion that in the Chicago area of the United States, where a nuclear power generating station has been built, the incidence of stillborn children is greater the closer you get to the power station. This is information gathered during a study carried out in the United States by environmentalists. Surely we do not want to be party to the construction of that type of station which will kill children even before they are born. We already have evidence that there is more radioactivity in the environment the closer you get to the Pickering nuclear power station. Surely we should not place communities in a position where our people might suffer this kind of danger.

Coming from the Atlantic provinces, I find it strange that there should be talk of nuclear power stations by the government of Nova Scotia and the government of New Brunswick which have at their doorstep the tides of the Bay of Fundy which could produce a similar amount of power which would be completely pollution free. I believe, also, we must have an assurance from the government as to who should have the right to build nuclear power stations. I endeavoured to obtain today some information in this regard from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Should a group of United States citizens, who are not allowed to build or who cannot receive a permit to build a nuclear power station in their own country, be permitted to come to this country as a private group of individuals and receive permission to build a nuclear power station here which would direct most of the energy produced back to the United States where it is required? Surely it is stupid for us to become involved in such a situation, especially when we consider the danger inherent in many aspects of the production of nuclear power.

I should like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kindness in allowing me to speak for 15 minutes in this debate. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) for putting this motion before the House. Some people may say it was done through trickery. I do not care why or how it was done. I believe this has been a very useful debate. It is the type of debate which the people of Canada wanted the House of Commons to have today. I think the New Democratic Party deserves credit for seeing that the disaster of yesterday became a useful mechanism for today so that Members of Parliament of all parties would have an opportunity to express their points of view on the tremendous problems associated with man-made pollution and how we can best correct the situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Nielsen) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is now on the main motion as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Pringle) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being after five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5.07 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 12, 1972

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING, LOANS TO NON-PROFIT ORGANIZATIONS, FINANCING OF CORPORATION, NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT, ETC.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-213, to amend the National Housing Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

OLD AGE SECURITY AND GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 333—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

1. How many persons receive (a) Old Age Security (b) Guaranteed Income Supplement?

2. What was the net cost of (a) the basic Old Age Security (b) the Guaranteed Income Supplement for the fiscal year 1970-71?

3. What percentage of the federal budget do these expenditures represent?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) As of January, 1972, 1,759,036; (b) as of January, 1972, 976,225.

2. (a) $1,627,219,132; (b) $280,005,371. However, increases in benefits under the Guaranteed Income Supplement effective April 1, 1971, brought expenditures close to $525 million for the fiscal year 1971-72.

3. Expenditures on Old Age Security pensions and the Guaranteed Income Supplement are not themselves included in federal budget expenditures, because these payments are made from a separate fund designated for this purpose, namely the Old Age Security Fund. However, in 1970-71, expenditures on Old Age Security pension benefits and the Guaranteed Income Supplement were 12.71 per cent of total federal budgetary and non-budgetary expenditures, on a national accounts basis. These expenditures for 1972-73 are estimated at $2,555 million which represent 13.45 per cent of estimated federal budgetary and non-budgetary expenditures for that year.

FAMILY INCOMES

Question No. 343—Mr. Mather:

1. Does the government have information on the estimated income which will provide a modest but adequate Canadian standard of living for a family of four and, if so, what is the estimate?

2. What percentage of Canadian families make less than $5,000 a year?

3. What percentage of Canadian families make less than $10,000 per year?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Health and Welfare and Statistics Canada as follows: 1. There is no existing official statistical concept of poverty in Canada. However, Statistics Canada has established low-income cut-offs which have been used to delineate low-income families from other units. For a family of four, in 1969, the income cut-off was set at $4,420. In its report, the Special Senate Committee on Poverty has recommended that basic allowance rates be set initially at $3,500 for a family of four. Among provincially established social assistance programs in January 1972, the annual rate of benefits for a family of four ranged from $2,604 in Nova Scotia to $3,252 in Ontario. Also, under the proposed Family Income Security Plan, a family of four, depending on whether there are two or three children, will receive full benefits where family income is less than $5,000 or $5,500 respectively.

2 and 3. The most recent figures available on incomes are for the year 1969. The following income figures include income from investments and government transfer payments as well as income from employment. 24.8 per cent of families had incomes below $5,000 per year; 66.6 per cent of families had incomes below $10,000 per year.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

Question No. 355—Mr. Robinson:

What is the estimated amount of money that will be paid to recipients under the new family allowance program, does this exceed the amount paid out under the old plan and, if so, by how much?

Hon. John Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The proposed Family Income Security Plan will replace not only the family allowances program, but also the current youth allowances progam. The estimated cost of the Family Income Security Plan in the first year of operation and the amount now expended on current programs, including Quebec schooling allowances, are $820 million and $650 million respectively, so that the additional costs of the new proposals are estimated at $170 million.

CMHC TASK FORCE ON LOW INCOME HOUSING

Question No. 416—Mr. McCleave:

Did CMHC commission a task force under Michael Dennis and, if so (a) for what purposes (b) how many reports were requested by the task force and from whom (c) what will be the total cost of this task force?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): In January, 1971, a study of low income housing was commissioned by CMHC, to be carried out by a task force, headed by Mr. Michael Dennis. (a) The main purposes of the study were to examine present approaches to low income housing, and the extent to which current program meet stated objectives, and also to consider what the future role of CMHC in the low income housing field might be. The study was to provide, over the long run, a range of policy alternatives supported by research.

(b) The following ten studies were commissioned by the Low Income Housing Task Force: (i) Melvin Charney: study of the adequacy and production of low income housing. (ii) G. Fortin: study of social and institutional aspects of the provision of low income housing in Quebec. (iii) Professor George Molins-Ysal: study of the residential housing construction industry. (iv) Dr. Aprodicio Laquian: study on internal migration and low income housing. (v) Michael Clague: study of citizen group development in Vancouver and its implications for low income housing policy. (vi) Professors Deutsch and Green: study of the public finance aspects of low income housing. (vii) Professor Helen Abel: preparation of policy recommendations in the area of rural housing. (viii) M. Fernand Hwon, CRURINRS: study of the housing projects under CMHC directive administration in Montreal. (ix) Mr. George Hunter: study of housing policies and programs of the federal departments and agencies other than CMHC. (x) Planning Secretariat of Manitoba: study of low income housing in Manitoba undertaken in conjunction with the Task Force on Low Income Housing.

(c) The cost of the task force as at February 29, 1972, was $322,857.05.

PENSION OF RIGHT HON. LESTER B. PEARSON

Question No. 529—Mr. Godin:

Does the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, receive a pension from the government and, if so, is it subject to income tax?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Privy Council office and the Department of Supply and Services as follows: The Right Hon. L. B. Pearson receives a pension as a former prime minister under the terms of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act and also receives an annuity under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. These pensions are subject to income tax. Parliamentary pensions payable to former Members of Parliament are under the administrative jurisdiction of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—RECRUITMENT OF PERSONNEL FOR QUEBEC OFFICE

Question No. 545—Mr. Godin:

1. Does the Quebec office of the Post Office Department recruit staff through competition or personal interview?

2. If by competition are they public or simply reserved for a small group?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. The Quebec postal region recruits its staff by open competition. Candidates are expected to fill out an application form which is subsequently studied by a personnel officer. If the candidate claims to possess the required qualifications and he passes the written examination, in cases where such is a requirement, he will be called for interview by a selection board. The personal interview, therefore, is an integral part of the competition process. No employee is admitted to permanent status within the Department who has not been interviewed. I must add, however, that the Quebec postal region, in common with departmental practice across Canada, does not necessarily resort to open competition when filling positions for which there are adequate candidates within the department. This applies to nearly all supervisory or promotion positions, and for certain lower level positions which are filled from the ranks of casual or part-time employees. A personal interview would not necessarily be held, for instance, if a part-time employee, who was well known to the supervisor, was moved into a permanent position. He would, however, have been interviewed when first recruited as a part-time employee.

2. There are no restrictions as to who may or may not apply in an open competition.

POST OFFICE REVENUE FROM RENTAL OF LOCK BOXES

Question No. 572—Mr. Penner:

1. What revenue is derived annually by the Post Office Department from the rental of lock boxes to boxholders?

2. Has the minister or his officials considered making these available free of charge in communities which lack letter carrier service?

3. Is the present box rental system discriminatory against those who live in small communities which do not have household mail delivery and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what steps are contemplated to eliminate such discrimination?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. During the fiscal year 1970-71 the revenues derived from the rental of lock boxes amounted to $5,061,338. The revenues from this source for the fiscal year 1971-72 will approximate $4,875,000. Final figures not available.

2. In communities which lack letter carrier service, the normal means of free delivery in smaller centres is over the counter; in the rural areas delivery is made by a rural route courier. The lock box service is an optional service and an additional convenience supplementary to the normal free method of delivery. The policy of the Post Office is that the cost related to the operation and administration of this service should be borne by those who benefit directly from it.

3. No. Lock box fees in the urban centres are higher than in the rural centres because salary and accommodation costs are much higher in the urban centres.

BANNING OF HORSES TO EUROPE FOR SLAUGHTERING

Question No. 588—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to banning further shipments of horses to Europe for slaughter purposes?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): All aspects of horse shipments to Europe are being studied.

*DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL' SECURITY PLANNING AND RESEARCH GROUP

Question No. 589—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many hours a week, since April 1, has the Security Planning and Research Group in the Department of the Solicitor General met for the purpose of studying the nature, origin and causes of subversive and revolutionary action and the measures necessary to protect Canadians from internal threats?

2. What are the salaries of each of the members of the said Group?

3. How many meetings have there been between the said Group and the Solicitor General to advise him on the information compiled and analysed by them since the above date?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is somewhat long and I wonder if we might have it printed in Hansard and taken as read.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The answer above referred to follows:]

1. Since the Security Planning and Research Group is an integral part of the Headquarters of the Department of the Solicitor General, its members work during the normal daily working hours each working day, i.e. 8:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. and 1:15 p.m. to 5:00 p.m., Monday to Friday inclusive. Overtime work is required from time to time. It is difficult to state how many hours were devoted to any particular subject.

2. As of May 15, 1972 the salary ranges of each member of the Security Planning and Research Group were: P. Banning, $15,360-$15,990; H. Black, $15,236-$20,557; R. Bourne, $22,000-$28,000; B. Cantin, $8,903-$10,603; L. Cloutier, $14,988-$17,031; W. Dabros, $17,340-$19,860; R. Gaudet, $14,988-$17,031; L. Paquette, $7,602-$8,356; M. Valenti*, $6,358-$6,989; and P. Wallace, $14,988-$17,031.

*M. Valenti replaced S. Hoffman as a member of the Group on May 15, 1972.

3. Information compiled and analysed by the Group is passed to the Solicitor General by normal departmental channels through the Deputy Solicitor General. The Solicitor General is given briefings from time to time by the Head of the Security Planning and Research Group when necessary or at his convenience.

ROCKLAND, ONTARIO—SITE OF NEW POST OFFICE

Question No. 592—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. Was land recently acquired by the government in Rockland, Ontario as a site for a new post office and, if so, on what date?

Questions

2. What was the nature of the enquiry for suitable sites and who made it?

3. If such person was not in the Public Service of Canada, what were the terms of engagement and what was the cost thereof?

4. How many sites and/or offers of sites were considered and of these (a) how many were suitable (b) what was the price involved in each case?

5. What is the area of the site finally chosen, at what cost, and from whom was it finally acquired?

6. Have any objections been received from local residents as to the choice of site, and what was their general nature as well as the reply?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, on December 28, 1971.

2. Improved postal accommodation was the subject of enquiry; it was performed by officers of the Department of Public Works, Capital Region.

3. Not applicable.

4. Four sites were considered (a) Only two sites presented suitable conditions, adequate area, and fair cost; (b) Cost of first site: $20,000; cost of second site: $15,000.

5. The site chosen presented an area totalling 25,992 square feet. The cost involved amounted to $15,000. The Department purchased the land from the following parties: Boucher, Fernand; Boucher, Come; Thivierge, Claudette.

6. No objections were raised.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS BY CMHC FOR COUNTIES OF HALTON AND WENTWORTH

Question No. 594—Mr. Alexander:

1. How many projects in the county of Wentworth and the county of Halton were in receipt of CMHC funds of amounts exceeding $100 thousand during 1970, 1971 and to date in 1972?

2. (a) What type of projects were involved (b) where were they located by way of municipal address (c) what were the names of the firms in receipt of the funds?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1 and 2 (a) (b): See table attached.

2. (c) It is not customary to release the names of borrowers under the NHA, since this is considered to be a matter of confidence in mortgage transactions between lender and borrower.

POLICING BY ARMED FORCES FOR ARCTIC POLLUTION CONTROL

Question No. 607—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. To date, what role has the Departmenf of National Defence played in the prevention and control of air, water and land pollution in the Arctic?

2. How many members of the armed forces are presently maintained in the Arctic for purposes of policing (a) the pollution-control zone (b) the new fisheries closing lines?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The Department of National Defence has been engaged actively in an anti-pollution campaign in the Arctic for the past several years. Most of the activities have been carried out with other federal departments who have jurisdiction in the area. The main pollution problem is litter and debris. In 1970, air support was provided to Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to carry out reconnaissance of four abandoned Distant Early Warning sites. In 1971, this program was continued to include an additional 12 sites. The reconnaissance of the five remaining sites which are located on Baffin Island will be carried out during the summer of 1972. Air reserve squadrons have assisted in these reconnaissance and pollution survey missions. As a result of the findings from these reconnaissance flights, a cleanup of Stokes Point. Y.T., is scheduled for July 1972. This will be a combined operation between DND and DIAND and will serve as a pilot project to determine the financial and manpower requirements for the clean-up of the other sites. The Department of Environment is scheduled to carry out an inspection of selected active DEW line sites this summer to ascertain conditions at these locations. At Canadian Forces' Station Alert, a work party and a drum crusher will eliminate pollution from discarded oil drums. A sanitary landfill operation also will be put into operation to alleviate the solid waste disposal problem. Garbage emanating from exercises and manoeuvres in the north is transported out for proper disposal.

2. No members of the Canadian Armed Forces are maintained in the Arctic for the specific purpose of policing (a) the pollution control zone (b) the new fisheries closing line. However, Mobile Command long range patrol aircraft when flying over the Arctic report pollution and fishing control zone violations.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—NUMBER OF EMERGENCY CALLS RELATING TO PERSONS LOST IN FORESTS

Question No. 626—Mr. Laprise:

By province, and for each year since 1968, how many emergency calls for persons lost in the forest were answered by the Canadian Armed Forces?

[Translation]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): The Canadian Armed Forces are responsible for all aspects of air search and rescue in the areas of Canadian SAR responsibility and for the co-ordination of marine search and rescue in Canadian territorial waters and in designated oceanic areas off the Pacific and Atlantic Coasts. There are four Search and Rescue regions—Halifax, N.S., Trenton, Ont., Edmonton, Alta., Victoria, B.C. Prior to 1970, statistics on missing person incidents were not recorded as a separate category of occurrence from other forms of search and rescue nor are they maintained by province. During the calendar years 1970 and 1971 the Canadian Forces participated in a total of 198 searches for missing persons, and the following is a breakdown by region:

SAR Region	1970	1971
Halifax, N.S.	28	28
Trenton, Ont.	22	21
Edmonton, Alta.	24	13
Victoria, B.C.	32	30

Under the Local Initiatives Program and since its inception, were funds invested by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in the constituency of Beauce and, if so (a) what was the total amount (b) what is the complete list of groups who benefited from the program (c) what amount was granted to each group?

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

CANADIAN DOLLAR EXCHANGE LEVEL—MEASURES TO REDUCE SHORT-TERM CAPITAL INFLOW—ASSISTANCE TO EXPORTERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have had a question or two for the Minister of Finance for some days now. He has not been able to be in the House and he is not here today.

Mr. Hees: Here he comes.

Mr. Stanfield: I wonder whether the Minister of Finance could tell me if it is his view and the view of the government that the present level of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar is a temporary phenomenon or whether he proposes to make a statement and take any measures in this connection?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement at this time. As to whether or not it is temporary, I cannot forecast that for the hon. gentleman or for the House. I will leave it at that for the moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact this is taking place despite the deficit on current account and the falling off in our trading position, and in view of the fact the main reason for the increase in the level of our dollar seems to be the inflow of short-term money resulting from the differential between our short-term interest rates and other short-term interest rates, can the minister give us any information as to the volume of the inflow of short-term money coming into Canada?

• (1410)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is quite right that if one were to take the current account alone, which has fallen off from a surplus position, one might draw one's conclusions as to the exchange rate. But aside from the general weakness of the U.S. dollar, which has made that problem a universal one, there are two situations in Canada affecting the Canadian dollar particularly, and about which I have been concerned.

One has to do with the amount of current borrowing for long-term funds by the provinces on foreign markets. The other has to do with a strong demand by the Canadian banks for short-term capital, short-term money, in order to relieve their liquidity problems. I might say that on that latter subject I had some discussion with the Canadian Bankers Association when I was in Winnipeg on Thursday night.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to infer from the final sentence in the minister's answer that he has suggested some guidelines to the banks with regard to the borrowing of short-term funds from abroad?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to representatives of the Canadian banks on the occasion of the annual meeting of the Canadian Bankers Association in Winnipeg last Thursday. During the course of my remarks I said we were concerned about rates of interest and the exchange value of the Canadian dollar.

I have now received from the president of the Canadian Bankers Association a request that I approve an agreement among the banks that will have the effect of reducing the rates paid by banks on their larger certificates of deposit, that is to say, street deposits maturing within one year. I have already indicated my approval in principle of this agreement under section 138 of the Bank Act because in my view it will contribute to the objectives of the government in the field of finance affecting interest rates and in the realm of foreign exchange.

Mr. Stanfield: I would like to ask the minister whether it is the position of the government to permit the Canadian dollar to remain at this level or whether the minister is considering measures to assist our producers and exporters in the event that this condition continues?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, our producers and exporters, manufacturers and processors, have already received a good deal of flexibility and support as a result of the budget measures announced in the House on May 8. As to whatever other action the government might take, that would depend on events.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

INCREASE IN SHORT-TERM CAPITAL COMING INTO CANADA—CONSULTATION WITH BANKS TO LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that most economic analysts think that part of the reason for the rise in the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the American dollar is the large amounts of foreign capital which are coming into Canada on a short-term basis to take advantage of the high interest rates here, would the minister tell the House to what extent there has been an increase in the amounts of short-term capital coming into the country in the last six months? Has there been a substantial increase, and to what extent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman is referring to the response of short-term money crossing into Canada as a result of Canadian banks certificates of deposit, yes, that amount was substantial, in fact, in the amount of half a billion dollars.

Mr. Douglas: Is the minister taking any steps to consult with the banks and other financial institutions with a view to bringing our interest rates into line with the interest rates for short-term capital both in Europe and in the United States so as to make Canada a less attractive market for these short-term deposits of capital from outside and in order to stop the upward spiral of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. That was the result of the request that the major banks made to me and with which I agreed. It would have the effect of reducing the interest rate on certificates of deposit to about 5¼ per cent, which is about 1 per cent below what it was on Friday. That will have the effect of being less attractive to short-term money coming into Canada.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the minister's statement that part of this serious situation is due to the purchase of bonds in the United States by provinces and municipalities in view of the attractive rates available there, is the government taking any steps to provide a market in Canada for provincial and municipal borrowing?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am exploring ways for extending the facilities of the Canadian capital market, and I will be talking with the provinces about the question of borrowing outside and the accommodation that might be achieved by them within the Canadian capital market.

PURCHASE OF AMERICAN DOLLARS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I asked a couple of questions on Friday and they were replied to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as Acting Prime Minister who said that they would no doubt be answered when the Minister of Finance returned to the House. I should like to know whether the minister would provide the House with a record of the purchases of American dollars by the Canadian government during the past month. Usually the amount is set out at the end of each month. Would the minister be able to furnish the House with information now as to the present situation with respect to those purchases?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing secret about these figures; they are published monthly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the serious situation of the Canadian dollar and the direction in which it is going, will the minister give that information to the House? I realize, of course, that normally it is only given once a month, but I think he will remember that when I was in office the opposition of that day asked for the information and we furnished it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I recall those facts very well indeed because I asked for the information. Although a motion for the production of those figures was granted by the House, I do not recall the minister of finance of that time giving them to us when the House was sitting before the election. In any event, I will look into that precedent to see whether it applies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the minister found it necessary to inject that. I should like to ask the minister whether, when he met with the Canadian Bankers' Association, he was impressed by the words of the president to the effect that if the federal government were a business it would go broke at the current rate of spending?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Bankers' Association is in the business of banking and not in the business of trying to run this country. I disagree with that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we are still on the original question. Perhaps we might try to complete the first round of questioning and hon. members may enter the lists again on the second round.

TOBACCO—FROST DAMAGE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCERS—REPLACEMENT OF PLANTS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who is supposed to be in the House today but is not present. I shall direct it to the Prime Minister because it is very urgent. Because of the widespread disaster throughout the tobacco belt of southwestern Ontario and in view of the fact that most tobacco farmers are not covered by insurance against spring frost, would the Prime Minister assure the House that the Department of Agriculture will either give aid to those hit or make sure that a sufficient number of healthy young plants are made available from Quebec and the United States as soon as possible so that a crop can be harvested before the September 15 deadline for autumn frost insurance?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Agriculture is joining in the assessment of this situation. It is too early at this stage to anticipate what action may be desired or required, but certainly the department is staying in close touch with the situation.

Mr. Blackburn: Would the Acting Minister of Agriculture assure us, in the eventuality there are federal funds available, that the government will enter into an agreement with the province as well so that both levels of government will be able to assist the tobacco farmers?

• (1420)

Mr. Lang: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, it would be improper at this stage to attempt to speculate on what measures might follow in a hypothetical situation.

TOBACCO—FROST DAMAGE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—SUGGESTED FACILITATING OF IMPORT OF REPLACEMENT PLANTS

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the tobacco board is negotiating for the importation of plants from Virginia to replace those lost by frost, will the minister discuss with the plant protection service ways in which they could facilitate the importation of these young plants into Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that sounds to me like a very reasonable suggestion.

TOBACCO—FROST DAMAGE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—INCLUSION OF OTHER CROPS IN SURVEY

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the acting minister who has indicated that a survey is to be made of tobacco. Since other major and costly crops are involved, can the minister assure the House that when the survey is made it will cover the total damage and not be restricted to one specific crop?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course that is what the department is doing. It already has some preliminary information with regard to other crops, some of which it may also be possible to replant in certain circumstances. The question as originally addressed was, of course, solely in relation to tobacco.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CLOSING OF CIP PLANT IN TEMISCAMING—DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC AUTHORITIES AND BUSINESSMEN RESPECTING REOPENING

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Concerning the town of Temiscaming, where the International Paper Company of Canada closed down some 12 days ago, has the minister any statement to make as to resumption of operations at Temiscaming and has his department made any offers yet to provincial authorities or to groups of businessmen who would be prepared to take over the operation of the plant?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I know that discussions are under way in this regard, Mr. Speaker, but I shall inquire as to the latest news and I shall be in a position to report to the hon. member on Wednesday.

MANPOWER

DISCONTINUANCE OF RELEASE OF FIGURES OF LAY-OFFS OF 50 OR MORE PERSONS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As the Department of Manpower is no longer releasing figures monthly on lay-offs of 50 or more persons, will the minister make a statement giving the reasons for the withholding of this information, as it is affecting the true picture of lay-offs in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may ask a supplementary.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, as the department has ceased, since February, issuing figures with respect to lay-offs of 50 or more persons, will the minister look into the situation and try to reinstitute the former practice?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly see what was the logic behind any change in policy and report to the House.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NABET—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister announce the settlement of the strike between NABET and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? If not, has the department's mediator withdrawn his services, or just what is the status of this much too long drawn-out labour dispute?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot, unfortunately, make that announcement today. As to the second part of the question, the two parties are meeting jointly. They met during the weekend and I believe that they have further meetings scheduled.

[Mr. Caouette.]

The federal mediator is not currently meeting with them. He would, of course, be available provided that constructive negotiation is going forward as, indeed, it is now going forward between the two parties.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ADMISSION OF PERSHING GERVAIS INTO CANADA

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration which I am sure he expects me to ask him today. In light of the conflicts and contradictions which have arisen in connection with the case of Pershing Gervais, and in light of the minister's refusal to co-operate in having immigration matters referred to a committee of the House, will the minister at least order an independent inquiry into this matter, make available the files of his department and request his predecessor to appear and make a statement to this independent inquiry?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied with the conduct of my predecessor. If there is any contradiction, it is in the mind of the hon. member who last night quoted the wrong section of the Immigration Act.

Mr. Baldwin: But his facts were right.

Mr. Mackasey: Second, the estimates of the department were discussed at length last week before the appropriate committee and his party was, of course, well represented. Every opportunity was given to investigate the case. We have nothing to hide at all in the Pershing Gervais case.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that a crisis does exist, certainly at the ministerial level and below, will the Prime Minister refer this matter to his new crisis centre and will he do this right away before this centre is swamped with work, which obviously will be the case?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—REASON FOR DEPORTATION ORDER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the conflict in the reasons for the deportation order, can the minister, without any equivocation, now advise us as to the original reason for the institution of the deportation order?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I missed the beginning of the question. Will the hon. member please repeat it?

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact there is a conflict as to the reason for the original institution of the deportation order, can the minister, without any equivocation, now advise us as to the original reason for the institution of the deportation order?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, there was no deportation order in the case of Mr. Gervais. He left the country voluntarily. When he left the country voluntarily, I rescinded the ministerial permit on the ground that he is not necessarily the type of person I would welcome back into Canada.

Mr. Alexander: Perhaps we are not on the same wavelength. The case I am referring to is that of Alicia Wiercioch.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not supplementary to the previous question. The hon. member might be recognized in a moment. Perhaps I am wrong, but in any event the hon. member can ask the question in a moment. I will now recognize the hon. member for York South.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

NATURE OF ALLEGED CRISIS MANAGEMENT CENTRE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Reference has already been made to the agency about which I want to ask the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the House when the crisis management centre was set up in the Privy Council office or his office, and what is the purpose of that particular group in that office?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no crisis management centre. There is a post occupied by General Dare for the purpose of studying the matter of crises and, essentially, finding ways of dealing with them. However, at this stage, it is merely a study. It was made known when General Dare was appointed to that post from the Department of National Defence by way of a press release last March.

Mr. Lewis: Will the Prime Minister inform the House whether this crisis management centre is to deal with all the areas the newspaper report suggests, namely, floods, fires, acts of God, economic affairs such as Washington policy, national security and national unity? Is the crisis management centre studying action by the government in all of these various areas?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member did not listen to the answer to his previous question. I said that there was no crisis management centre.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that the Prime Minister is playing with words. He does admit—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems there is now debate between the Prime Minister and the hon. member. The hon. member has been recognized for the purpose of a supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether there is a group studying the reaction by the government in possible crises—I understand there is such a study group headed by General Dare—and whether this group is studying matters in all the areas that I suggested and perhaps in other areas or whether their studies are confined only to certain areas with which the government might be concerned in terms of crises?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I answered that there is one gentleman, General Dare, who is conducting a study in the Privy Council office. The terms of reference are quite general. I would be prepared to table them if it would help the hon. member understand what precise areas he is studying.

• (1430)

Mr. Lewis: Do I understand from the Prime Minister that General Dare is the only person in that group and that there are no others associated with him in that study, for example, Colonel Sutherland, or a gentleman with some such name as that?

Mr. Trudeau: I have never heard of Colonel Sutherland. To my knowledge, General Dare was given an assignment in the Privy Council office with very precise terms of reference. I will look into the matter to ascertain whether there is anyone assisting him directly or indirectly.

IMMIGRATION

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—REASON FOR DEPORTATION ORDER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I will put my question again to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I believe he is familiar with the situation to which I am referring. In view of the conflict of evidence concerning the circumstances surrounding the deportation order, can the minister tell us what was the original reason for the deportation order being issued?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I would be helped in answering if I knew what conflict the hon. member has in mind. I know that the appeal of the lady in question against the previous rejection of her application to remain in the country was turned down by the Immigration Appeal Board on the ground that it could find no evidence that if she were returned to Poland she would be persecuted. At that moment she was automatically notified she would be deported unless, of course, she would have availed herself of other opportunities to appeal further. Her lawyer indicated that he intended to appeal to the Federal Court but, of course, he did not do so in the light of her untimely death.

Mr. Alexander: The minister has given us to understand that the deportation order was issued because this person had not acquired the necessary points under the assessment system when, in fact, deportation order proceedings were started as a result of her having found a job. Can the minister clarify the situation and advise the House which of these factors was the basis for the invocation of the deportation order?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Mackasey: The lady in question was given permission to work. Press reports that she was being deported for working in Canada illegally are erroneous. When she appeared before a special inquiry officer and her application was rejected she was given permission to work in the interval while waiting for her case to be heard by the Immigration Appeal Board.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURES TO HASTEN PROCESSING OF CLAIMS IN CASES OF ILLNESS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Can he indicate whether together with the UIC he is studying procedures to be used to hasten the study of claims for unemployment benefits in cases of illness?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are working very closely with private industry, always conscious of the fact that it is our duty to authorize payment of unemployment insurance benefits, sickness and maternity benefits, only when we are satisfied that the claims are lawful.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION AGAINST PRODUCERS OF UNSATISFACTORY LIFEJACKETS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the verdict returned by a coroner's jury on Thursday of last week in Toronto citing unsatisfactory flotation jackets as a contributing factor in the drowning death of a number of youths on the Humber River, can the hon. gentleman inform the House whether, under the terms of the Hazardous Products Act or some other act administered by his department, any action against the producers of the lifejackets in question is being taken or studied?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have instituted an inquiry into this matter of flotation jackets and I will give the hon. member an answer as soon as possible.

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF FOOD INDUSTRY

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I take this opportunity to answer certain questions that were directed to me last week in my absence?

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway inquired as to the possibility of an investigation into concentration in the food industry. I would refer her to a report on concentration in the manufacturing industries in Canada published in 1971 on the basis of a study undertaken in the office of the Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Branch and, more particularly, to the annual report of the director for 1971, pages 16-29, relating to concentration in food retailing. In accordance with what appears in the latter report, the director is keeping the situation under active review.

The hon. member for Greenwood inquired about—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There has to be some order if the hon. minister is attempting to answer a number of questions. Perhaps we might dispose of the earlier one first. The hon. member for Egmont has a supplementary.

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION AGAINST PRODUCERS OF UNSATISFACTORY LIFEJACKETS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I am grateful for the minister's concern and interest in this matter. In view of the fact that we are now entering upon the season of active boating, could the minister set forth clearly what the safety standards are in terms of appropriate quality, and how they can be enforced by his department? Perhaps the hon. gentleman would consider making a statement in the House or issuing a press release, because this information will be of importance to those of the public who will be purchasing lifejackets in the next few weeks.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I will try to answer that as part of my answer to the first question.

LOCAL INITIATIVE PROJECTS—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF SUMMER CHILD CARE FACILITIES TO ENABLE SOLE-SUPPORT MOTHERS TO CONTINUE WORKING

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in connection with the status of women. In view of the fact many sole-support mothers presently working on local initiative programs will be forced to leave their jobs and go on unemployment insurance or welfare unless summer child care facilities can be provided for their school-age children, will the minister consider funding such a program which would enable these women to live independently of social assistance and would in the long run save money for the taxpayers?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): While the hon. lady's representations appear to be very laudable I am sure they are addressed to the wrong minister. The $30 million which I have at my disposal for programs this summer has been allocated to projects which were already in existence and which we felt should be continued. This limits my scope considerably and no doubt makes it virtually impossible for me to assist such worth-while programs.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask the Secretary of State whether he would consider funding such centres for the care of children of school age so that their mothers will not be obliged to collect social assistance or unemployment insurance payments?

Mr. Speaker: That is a representation. The hon. member has to assume that the matter will be considered.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask who is the right minister to address? Who is the minister to whom I should direct these questions?

Mr. Mackasey: I can only suggest that the hon. lady might find an appropriate minister in each of the provinces of Canada.

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST BY PROVINCE FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the very serious flood situation in several parts of British Columbia, could the Prime Minister advise the House whether the federal government has yet received a request for assistance from the province of British Columbia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I received such a telegram from Premier Bennett on Friday or Saturday, I believe. He was asking, primarily, for two things, first, that the federal government designate a person to liase with the committee he is setting up to study the flood situation headed by Mr. Wallace. We have already designated Mr. Harries who is the regional director of the Emergency Measures Organization for British Columbia.

The telegram also asked whether there would be any sharing by the federal government in compensation payments. The answer is, of course, that the federal government, as I told the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary last week, does share with the provinces in certain circumstances when they are caught in emergency situations and when the provinces themselves participate to a certain degree in compensation.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED HIGHWAY AND PIPELINE CORRIDOR—CONSULTATION WITH NATIVE PEOPLE ON LOCATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the corridor to the north for pipelines and a highway, presumably, which the Prime Minister announced. Would the right hon. gentleman indicate the nature of the consultation which took place with the native people in the territory as to the location of the corridor, prior to his announcement?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has repeatedly told the House that he was in constant contact with the Indians and that he had urged them to select the areas in the territories which they would want to occupy under the existing treaty rights. Beyond that, consultation and communication are frequent and constant.

• (1440)

Mr. Stanfield: May I remind the Prime Minister that when the guidelines announced in 1970—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. There are about seven minutes left before the end of the question period. We might try to proceed a little faster.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am reminding the Prime Minister of the undertaking in those guidelines regarding consultations with industry and other interested groups. May I ask the Prime Minister what consultation, to his knowledge, took place with regard to the corridor route for the highway and pipelines prior to his announcement? Specifically what consultations, to his knowledge, took place with the native peoples?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have no dates in my memory but I am sure that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development could inform the House and the hon. member of the dates when he consulted with various native groups.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN POSTAGE RATES FOR ETHNIC PRESS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General and concerns the representations that have been made from time to time by the ethnic press, small in number but numerous in the various newspapers that are published. They have protested the oppressive and discriminatory high postal rates charged them and have asked for an amelioration of those rates. The ethnic press does a great deal for Canadian unity. In view of that fact and the smallness of their circulation, will the minister do something to assist them to continue by reducing the postal rate to that paid by periodicals or papers in towns or villages under 10,000 population?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I too have a lot of sympathy for these newspapers and others who suffered an increase in rates a few years ago, but any changes in rates of this kind would need an amendment to the law and I am not ready to say when the law will be amended.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister not give consideration to an amendment now rather than waiting until a change of government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I again bring to the attention of hon. members that we are running short of time. A number of members in the back rows will again be left by the wayside today. I will try to recognize some of them, but I believe the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has a supplementary to an original question.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE NATIONAL PRIORITY GUIDELINES FOR BANKS—SUGGESTED MANDATORY PROVISION OF MONEY FOR HOUSING AT LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement made on the weekend by the Minister of State to the effect that the banking industry of Canada needed guidelines established by the government in order to achieve certain national priorities, could the minister inform the House if we might expect a statement soon on what these guidelines might be and in what areas they might fall?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I would want to read that speech before commenting, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact a set of national priorities must include adequate housing for all Canadians, and in view of the further fact that for some years now the majority of Canadians have been unable to pay the high interest rates established by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, would the minister consider making it mandatory for the banks of Canada to set aside a certain percentage of their investment capital each year to be lent to average and low-income people at interest rates in the neighbourhood of 5 to 6 per cent to enable them to buy houses?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look into that closely to see whether there is any merit in that suggestion.

POST OFFICE

POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS ON NEW CONTRACT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Now that almost three months have passed since the expiry of the contract with the postal unions, has the hon. gentleman a progress report to make to the House on the matter?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, last week the meeting of the negotiators was cancelled by the union at the last minute. The next meeting is scheduled for June 14, in two days.

Mr. Dinsdale: Has there been any upgrading of the offer that was rejected by the unions on May 10, particularly with reference to the proposed regional pay scale which has become quite contentious?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): No, Mr. Speaker, but we are waiting for their demands.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Edmonton West, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the very disastrous effects on the grain trade, as stated over the weekend, as a result of the Montreal dock strike, is the minister in a position to announce progress of any sort whatsoever with regard to the union's attitude, with regard to the government's attitude and with regard to management's attitude, so as to resolve this very disastrous strike that, frankly, is a blot on the Canadian record right now?

Mr. Lewis: It is a lockout.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I can only reiterate my request to the two parties to set aside the reservations they have regarding the procedure that the law requires and that the collective agreement provides, that is to say, that they take this dispute to arbitration. I think that is all I can say at this time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West for a supplementary but following that I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre who was pre-empted a moment ago.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I suggest to the minister that he is taking a most unrealistic attitude in view of the public interest—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask the minister whether he is prepared to act—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. O'Connell: The hon. member should bear in mind—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now that my question has been answered may I rise on a question of privilege to correct an article written about me by Southam News Services this weekend, which stated that I claimed that the Immigration Appeal Board was inhuman, ruthless and treated people like cattle. I did not refer to the Immigration Appeal Board specifically but to the entire immigration structure and immigration policy of this government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that if he wants to rise on a question of privilege, which he may very well have, he has to do it as required by the Standing Orders, namely, by giving notice.

I apologize to a number of hon. members who were not recognized today. I am not going to name them, but I have made a note of their desire to ask questions and I will try tomorrow to give some priority to gentlemen who do not occupy the front row.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a very short question supplementary to the one put by the hon. member for Edmonton West?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This would have to be done by consent since the question period has expired. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 24, consideration of the motion of Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the budget debate, the fifth day, most of the facts, figures and policies have been examined and discussed by both sides of the House. My purpose in entering the debate at this time is to elaborate on one sentence in the budget speech, a sentence that I consider to be important above all others. Also, I particularly want to enter the debate at this time so that I can speak about the purchasing policies of the federal government, the policies of my department, as they relate to that sentence in the budget speech.

Along with what else the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said on May 8 were these words:

> National unity has a great deal to do with equality of opportunity—equality of opportunity for Canadians, no matter where they happen to be born or where they happen to live in our country.

The kind of equality of opportunity I will talk about is equality of opportunity for Canadians from coast to coast who want to sell their manufactured goods and their services to their federal government; in other words, those who want to sell to the national government. I believe hon. members know the Department of Supply and Services is a purchasing department and also an accounting department. I have often said that had we been called the purchasing department and the accounting department of government, more Canadian citizens would know what we do. In fact, however, we do more than that. We do many more things. We are responsible for materiel management, for warehousing, for the disposal of equipment and also the provision of management consulting services, as well as the provision of complex computer services.

Therefore, because we do more than simply purchasing and accounting we have been given, in someone's wisdom, the somewhat obscure title of Supply and Services.

The aspect of our operation about which I want to speak particularly today is purchasing, because the department is one of the largest purchasing organizations in Canada. As it buys more than $1 billion worth of goods and services each year, its operations affect the lives, particularly the business lives, of many Canadian companies large and small. We make purchases from literally thousands of Canadian companies. On behalf of other government departments, we are busy each day buying everything from pencil sharpeners to the largest computers, everything from toothpaste to the most advanced and modern aircraft.

When I first began to look over the vast amount of purchasing undertaken for the federal government through my department I was surprised—and I may say as a western Canadian I was somewhat amazed and under some circumstances annoyed—to find the extent to which federal government purchasing was concentrated in a relatively small region of Canada, a region not more than 300 miles from the national capital, in a country 4,000 miles wide. When I looked at the figures, I found out that year in and year out more than 85 per cent of federal government purchases were made in the two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It did not seem to me that figures such as these were consistent with equality of opportunity for Canadians. I am therefore pleased to have this occasion to tell the House that for some time now we have been in the process of evolving purchasing policies which will help correct this concentration of purchasing and will give Canadians from coast to coast a greater opportunity to sell to their national government.

When Canadians are selling to the federal government they are, of course, selling to themselves because as taxpayers in a sense they are both buyers and sellers. In what I am saying today I want to emphasize that I am talking about an evolving purchasing policy. I am talking about something that is partly in place and in operation, and partly in the process of formation. That which is still in the process of formation constitutes goals or objectives rather than established policy.

The policy I am now developing within the department has three main characteristics or three main parts. The first part, which is still in the nature of an objective, is that we propose to establish federal government purchasing targets within four large regions of Canada. These targets would be based roughly upon the population in each region. For this purpose, the regions must be large because obviously we want to have competition within the regions. If we selected one small province and tried to localize buying in that province we would not have the competition necessary to obtain the lowest price. Therefore the regions for which we want to establish targets within the department are four. The first area is the Atlantic provinces region which I think of for this purpose as Canada East. Quebec is one region and Ontario is one region. The four provinces in the west for this purpose, and also for some other purposes from time to time, I call Canada West.

If we examine the figures for federal government purchasing which has actually taken place over the past six years, we find that under 6 per cent of all purchases have been made in the four Atlantic provinces. We find that over 40 per cent of these purchases have been made in Quebec, some 44 per cent in Ontario and under 10 per cent in the region of Canada West. When we consider establishing targets based on the population of these regions, we find that the Atlantic provinces contain almost 10 per cent of the Canadian population, Quebec approximately 28 per cent, Ontario 35 per cent and Canada West 27 per cent. Comparing the number of Canadians in each of these four regions with the amount they have been able to sell to their national government we find that in Canada West 27 per cent of the population receives under 10 per cent of federal government purchases. In the Atlantic provinces, 10 per cent of the national population has been receiving less than 6 per cent of federal purchases. In Quebec, we find 28 per cent of the national population and more than 40 per cent of the national purchases. In Ontario, we find 35 per cent of the population and some 44 per cent of the purchases. These figures do not cover just the last week or month but are averages over the last six years.

In other words, the story is quite clear. The federal government which after all is a national government, a coast-to-coast government, does not buy in equal measure or in anything approaching equal measure from all the citizens and taxpayers of the country. I do not believe it would be practical to make a hard and fast rule requiring that federal government purchases meet established targets in each region. However, I should like to see our purchasing policy so ordered that federal buying in each of these four regions, would, in percentage terms at least, approach the populations of those regions. Our first objective is to establish targets.

The second characteristic of this evolving policy—and this part in fact is now being implemented and is policy—is to increase the amount of purchasing done through our regional offices. Last year for those who may be interested in the total figures we purchased $178 million of government requirements through the regional offices, while $897 million was spent on what we call national purchases made from Ottawa. Members of the House will appreciate that we can reach the kind of fair regional balance that I am talking about in one of two ways. We can either increase the amount of regional buying that is done from the centre or we can increase the buying that is done through the regional offices. Those are two distinct operations, but they both have the effect of increasing regional buying.

There is a clear advantage to more regional buying, which is that when we purchase through regional offices, in most cases we have a substantial cut in the distribution costs of the goods purchased, particularly when they are required in the area in which the purchase is made. As well, in order to increase the regional buying we have been actively seeking new sources of supply, that is we have been looking for companies across Canada which have never before sold to the federal government. This is just "good business" so far as the government is concerned, because of course the more suppliers we have the more competition we can have among suppliers. I think the House will be interested to know that a number of businesses that have never before sold to the federal government are now receiving orders. These are orders and contracts that are open to tender and are awarded to the lowest bidder.

Looking for a moment at some specific areas in the purchasing field, may I point out that it is encouraging to see that the amount of federal government printing business, awarded in this case, in the prairie provinces during six months, that is during the half year ending March 1972, exceeded the total of printing business that companies on the Prairies received during the whole of the previous year. I should like to point out also that in the Atlantic provinces we have been successful in encouraging the development of marine technology, and substantial purchases of marine equipment have been made in that region. Still another example is the government's furniture requirements which used to be purchased centrally and then distributed to all parts of the country with relatively high distribution costs. I have already reported to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee that a major part of the federal government's furniture requirements in western Canada, not their total furniture requirements but the furniture required in western Canada, has now been won under competition by western Canadian firms, and this furniture is now being manufactured in western Canada.

Still speaking about regional purchases, I am encouraged to be able to report that the purchases in our regional offices in western Canada increased by 21 per cent in the last fiscal year over the previous year. In the case of the Atlantic provinces, the percentage increase was even higher and amounted to 27 per cent over the previous year. In looking at these percentage increases, encouraging as they are, it is of course necessary to realize that the western and Atlantic regions started from a very low base and there is still a long way to go to achieve equality of opportunity or even to approach the regional targets mentioned earlier.

Finally, the third and most important characteristic of federal government purchasing which I think should be considered relates to the cost of transportation. It is apparent to everyone that in a country of vast distances there are many companies that are a long way from the destination where the goods are required and thus are prevented from bidding effectively because of transportation costs. A proposal which I intend to discuss further with my colleages is the establishment of a policy under which any Canadian who wishes to sell to his national government can bid on the basis of his costs at his plant, that is his bid will be judged f.o.b. plant rather than f.o.b. destination which would of course then include transportation costs to destination. This proposed policy would be one way to demonstrate clearly that as the national government we really mean what we say when we talk about equality of opportunity for Canadians in all parts of Canada.

Before speaking further on that aspect of our policy, I should like to refer to a speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in my home city of Winnipeg a few days ago on May 26. I need hardly say that he was speaking to a crowded audience.

Some hon. Members: All Liberals.

Mr. Richardson: An enthusiastic Liberal audience.

Mr. Paproski: Thus alienating the westerners.

Mr. Richardson: Among many things the Prime Minister said in his address, this—this statement stood out and I would like to quote it for you—"no Canadian should feel distant from the federal government". He was not referring there of course to a Liberal or a Conservative government; he was referring to the national government.

Mr. Paproski: Did he cry?

Mr. Richardson: There was no reason for tears on this occasion.

Mr. Alexander: Maybe not on his part, but on ours there is.

Mr. Richardson: What he went on to say was that whether he lived in the Yukon, in Newfoundland, in the Gaspé Peninsula or on the Prairies, every Canadian should regard himself as close to the federal government as those who happen to live near Parliament Hill.

Mr. Dinsdale: Especially at election time.

Mr. Richardson: No, at any time. It would seem to me to be very consistent with that concept if we were able to say to all Canadians when you sell to your government you can compete with each other based on the costs in your own plant and upon your own efficiency, but so far as transportation costs in this land of great distances are concerned, every one of you can sell to the national government in the same way as you could if you happened to live near Parliament Hill. The government of course cannot eliminate inefficiency within a business, and in that sense all Canadians cannot bid equally—some are clearly more efficient than others, and it is to the benefit of our whole economy that they are. But we can do something about eliminating the disparity of distance, and it is in that direction that I hope to continue to move our purchasing policies.

I should emphasize that nothing in this suggestion—and this is for anyone who may be concerned about the big plants in this region or in any other region of Canada—would be harmful to any manufacturer anywhere in Canada. No one anywhere would be put at a disadvantage. The largest plants in the heavily industrialized regions of Canada would of course still retain the advantage of size and the advantage of whatever efficiency they have attained as well as the continuing advantage of proximity to the national capital and to the national buying offices of the government. Of course, they would also retain some advantage in the cost of their inward freight. It is important to realize, for instance, that a printer in western Canada, even if he is able to bid f.o.b. his plant and therefore has no transportation cost on the finished product, still has to move the bulk paper into his plant before he can bid against a company that does not have to move its raw materials the same distance.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, what I have been talking about is the desirability of moving further towards federal government purchasing policies that will increase equality of opportunity for Canadians from coast to coast, equality of opportunity for Canadians who wish to sell to the national government. I have talked about the establishment of federal government purchasing targets for each of the four large regions in Canada. I have talked about increasing the volume of federal purchasing through regional offices, and I have mentioned the progress we have made in that direction. Third, I have said that it would be fair play if anyone who wishes to sell to the federal government were able to have his bid judged according to the costs in his own plant, and not judged on the cost at destination. I am convinced that these policies in combination will help to achieve the goal of equality of opportunity. It seems only right to me that national purchases should bring about nationwide economic benefits.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should respond briefly to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) who made a contribution to the budget debate several days ago. He made his usual worthwhile contribution, and mentioned—

Mr. Paproski: Stick with us, Jim. We'll make you Prime Minister.

Mr. Richardson: There's a good suggestion.

An hon. Member: You won't. Somebody else will.

Mr. Richardson: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris made a number of comments, and first I would like to thank him for some of his references to my efforts to try to explain the aspirations of western Canada, many of which he has outlined himself. In particular, he mentioned a seminar which was held in his home city of Brandon. It was a two-day seminar and was a very successful one at which I had the honour to be a guest panellist. We talked all day, and I am afraid a few of us talked most of the night. We covered a lot of ground, and it would be impossible to give the conclusion which the hon. member has requested. I wish he had been there because it was a non-partisan occasion throughout which his colleague, the able young member for Lisgar, attended.

If I tried to say in a sentence what that seminar concluded, as I have been asked to do, I would say to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that western Canadians concluded that what the west wants is a greater participation in industrialization, in scientific, technological, advanced, economic endeavour. What happens is that the west has a tremendous agricultural base, a tremendous resource base, a tremendous energy base. But as long as it concentrates on policies for those, important as they are, it still is a hinterland of a sort. It still has a very adverse balance of trade, of manufacturing trade, with the eastern provinces of Canada.

So really the issue which was faced in those two days, and resolved, was that in western Canada we must build an advanced society on top of the agricultural base, and on top of the energy base, and on top of the mining resource base. That is the point that has to be clarified, because we all spend a good deal of time talking about the agricultural requirements of the west. And they are important, Mr. Speaker, but we could sell not just a billion bushels, we could sell two billion bushels of wheat and we still would not have answered the needs of western Canadians who are going to university in Edmonton, Calgary, Saskatoon, Winnipeg and, of course, Brandon. These young people are not in university so that they can be wheat farmers. They are there because they want to be designers, engineers, and computer technicians. That is the requirement and that was the conclusion.

How we are to achieve this was also concluded at that meeting, and again I will try to put it in two sentences. It is in one of two ways. Clearly, the west must achieve greater influence at the centre. We can either have a strong central government in which there is a strong regional voice—obviously this would be comparable to the American central government and its decentralized space program and other programs—or the alternative has to be, in a federation, to increase the influence of the provinces or the regional governments, if they become regional governments. Those are the alternatives, and I think that at the present time we are making headway in the first direction. We are achieving some decentralization. We are achieving some of the west's requirement for participation in the economic endeavours of the nation, in major programs like the aerospace program. But these have still to be proven as we go down the road. We will have to see in the future if the west participates in these great national programs in the way it must before we determine which of those answers we finally choose in order to achieve the obvious potential of that region.

That is a very quick summary, Mr. Speaker, but I felt that as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris had called on me at least three or four times during his address, I should try to respond briefly, although it was not the main theme of my speech today.

Mr. Dinsdale: Spoken like a good western Conservative.

Mr. Richardson: So, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance was not addressing himself to the purchasing policies that I have been describing, but I am encouraged by the central theme of his budget address.

I think that I may say in conclusion that all of us who were in the House on the evening of May 8 listening to the Minister of Finance recognized immediately that Canada could be standing on the threshhold of a new era. We realized that we were listening not only to a new man at the helm of the vital Department of Finance but also that we were listening to a new definition and a clearer understanding of the all-important relationship that must exist, in a free society, between the men who run the government of the day and the men who manage the large and the small business enterprises of the nation. I am convinced, as I know the Minister of Finance is, that it is the degree of confidence which business and government have in each other that will ultimately determine the economic success of our whole society. The Minister of Finance's budget has taken us farther toward the achievement of that mutual confidence than any single document in recent time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but in the last few seconds he mentioned that he was reaching a conclusion and that is why I did not interrupt him. However, he has gone beyond his time and he can continue only with the consent of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Finish your paragraph.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I realize that I have concluded two or three times, but I will end by saying that I not only support the motion that the House approve the budgetary policies of the government but I endorse and support as well the other statements that I have quoted. I have pointed out that the Prime Minister has talked about the need for every Canadian to feel as close to the federal government as those who happen to live near Parliament Hill, and that the Minister of Finance has talked about the fact that national unity has a great deal to do with equality of opportunity for all Canadians no matter where they happen to live in our country. I have referred not only to my wholehearted agreement with these statements but to the specific changes in the purchasing policies of the government that will, in fact, help to achieve this equality of opportunity in all parts of Canada. I have talked about what my department, within its area of responsibility, can do to make equality of opportunity from coast to coast a reality, an actual living, day-to-day, reality.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to take part in this budget debate is one which I deeply appreciate. This particular budget, Mr. Speaker, is a long one. It tries to do many things and, although we in the opposition may have some unkind things to say about it, none of us, I am sure, wants to see the measures taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) fail, simply so that we can say, in effect, we told you so. Rather, we are optimistic that what has been done by the hon. minister is a step, or even several steps, in the right direction. However, Mr. Speaker, we would all be remiss in our duties as members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition if we did not bring to the attention of the government things which should have been done and benefits which could have been realized through policies that would aid Canadians in general.

This budget finally concedes that it is from the private sector of our economy that the thrust of our economic development must come. It is only from the private sector that we can get the necessary energy and resources to expand our nation. All the best intentioned academics, theoriticians and civil servants, and for that matter politicians, ultimately cannot be anything more than spectators who, in the final analysis, can only exhort the individual members of the private sector of our economy to help us realize our potential. Hopefully, the Minister of Finance will seek advice in formulating our economic policies from people with practical experience instead of relying, as I feel this government has done in the past, on the advice of people long on theory and short on practice.

The hon. Minister of Finance, while adopting measures to benefit businessmen and large entrepreneurs, has failed, and his government has failed, to also single out middle class citizens who are paying a great deal of tax and who are in business in a small way for some tangible economic benefits. For example, even a small reduction in the level of personal income tax would mean that he, and millions like him, would be able to consume more of the goods and services generated by the entrepreneurs. In turn, these entrepreneurs would hopefully increase their production and make available types of consumer goods and services that would herald the economic expansion that we so desperately need in this country to provide, not only a continuing rise in the standard of living, but desperately needed employment opportunities. Members on both sides of this House agree that we must have increased opportunities for employment.

In this particular budget the government has attempted to expedite production ends by giving the private sector the means to expand and increase production, increase its investment, but what about the purchasing means to justify these production ends? Instead of stimulating the general purchasing power of middle income Canadians, in effect this government has taken away the 3 per cent advantage these people had, so the effective tax rate has been increased rather than decreased. This was a regressive step for which this government will have to answer.

If "faith without works is useless", according to the Biblical adage, then surely economic growth and production capacity increases without the means to consume is also useless. Something should be done, in my opinion, to change at least the attitude, if not the policy, of our Canadian banks. They do not have the proper philosophy in financing Canadian enterprises. These banks, for example, have received concessions from various governments over the years. At the present time, according to the report of the Auditor General, $100 million has been made available to them, without cost supposedly, as compensation for cashing various types of government cheques. As I understand it, by law they are obligated to cash these cheques anyway. Canadian banks in my opinion, are too reluctant to take risks. Perhaps an amendment to the Bank Act to actively encourage our chartered banks to not only finance projects, but to actually become involved in them if they are truly Canadian owned and meet certain criteria, would be a constructive step.

If banks were able to, in effect, be participants to some extent in worthy projects, then their assistance and expertise would be available in certain areas of economic development and the banks would be provided with additional and diversified sources of income, which perhaps would ultimately allow them to lend money at lower rates of interest. It is no secret, Mr. Speaker, that some large corporations are now, in effect, in the banking business. They have come into the field of finance with the aid of their retained earnings and large profits. Why would banks not participate, in a converse manner, in the benefits to be obtained from the profits of corporations which they were instrumental in helping to finance or reorganize? I submit it is a concept worthy of study.

Another point I should like to make with reference to financial institutions, Mr. Speaker, is that some particular lending companies and institutions are charging rates of interest which effectively bar needy small businesses from obtaining the type of credit which, in effect, these institutions are urging them to take. It seems to me, for example, that the Industrial Development Bank is a prime example of an institution which sends some of its personnel about the country encouraging and advising small entrepreneurs to take advantage of their expertise and available moneys, but they miss the point that people cannot afford to pay the kind of interest rates that the IDB charges. They cannot afford, either, the other complications that must result if the IDB takes care of financing, such as incorporation, and auditing procedures which in some cases are not necessary. Perhaps I will say more about this a little later, with reference to some of the problems that are facing some of my constituents.

I should like to touch briefly upon another topic which interests me in the provisions of the current budget. I am speaking particularly about the provision dealing with moneys held in trust for disadvantaged persons. This particular provision is found on page 16 of the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance on May 8. In essence, as I understand it, a person who is crippled, or to use the example given by the hon. minister, a victim of thalidomide poisoning, will not be taxed on funds held in trust for his or her benefit until they reach the age of 21 years. To me, this is a rather ridiculous situation. While conceding that it is a good measure and commending the Minister of Finance for introducing it, it seems to me that its effect, or its thrust if you will, is spoiled by putting in an age limit. If a person is under a disability which can be cured through the passage of time, or there is a change in his or her status, fine; let the tax advantage also be removed. But to put a limit of 21 years of age for tax purposes on moneys held in trust for crippled or disadvantaged persons is very ironic. Age has nothing to do with it, and the person's situation or status, or economic circumstances, are not liable to change through the passage of time. Such a person will not become more capable with age, for example, nor will his disability lessen, at least not in a case such as a thalidomide child. Why have this distinction in there? It spoils the entire effect of an otherwise humane provision.

Another implication of the budget which interests me greatly is the apparent lack of federal-provincial co-operation and consultation. For example, although the federal government has manifested clearly its intention to stimulate private enterprise by lowering corporate tax rates, some of the thrust of its policy may well be lost because the government has not had the consent or the co-operation, at least apparently, of some of our provinces. I have the impression that the provinces of British Columbia and Quebec, for example, will not necessarily change their logging tax provisions in order to expedite the federal government's policy with regard to pulp and paper producers. It seems that the tax rate paid by these companies will be higher than that the Minister of Finance intended, since the provinces will not, I think, without some negotiation change their logging tax provisions.

I have heard much, since becoming a member of this House, of federal-provincial co-operation. Conferences have been held between first ministers and ministers of various departments, federal and provincial; however, as yet, from my position in this House, I have not seen much tangible evidence of federal-provincial co-operation either in the fields of finance or the environment, or, for that matter, in the field of social welfare, as the present situation in some provinces seems to indicate. I think this budget also illustrates that there is a great need for continuing efforts by this government for consultation with the provinces, particularly in the fields of taxation. There is much controversy in the maritime provinces and across the country about provincial governments moving into fields vacated by the federal Minister of Finance. Enough has been said about this already. The point has been made.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, if I may to avail myself of an opportunity to speak, as is traditional in debates such as this, about some of the needs of my constituency. I will do so briefly. I should like to begin by asking the rhetorical but also pointed question, what do our people do when they can no longer follow their normal way of life? What do fishermen do when they are paid for their equipment but told they can no longer fish? What are our miners to do when they are forced to cease a way of life they have known, in many cases, since first entering our work force? Farmers as well face similar difficulties when they find they can no longer make a living in their traditional way. It is all very well to compensate them according to some fixed and, according to definition, equitable scale. All the same, what are they to do? Where are they to go once their means of making a living has been taken from them?

The needs of Nova Scotians in general, and the people of Central Nova, in particular are well known and well defined. Our province needs development, not only by large corporations and government agencies but, as well, by the initiative of its own people, particularly in small ventures which are suited to each region. Hard times in the maritime provinces during this government's tenure of office have become proverbial. Unrealistic transport rates have been set and often discussed in this House. I am pleased that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) alluded to this aspect in his speech which I have had the honour to follow. It seems to me, in view of what the minister said, that it would be appropriate if I were to introduce a few statistics, as it were, to illustrate our difficulties with transportation. For example, after talking with a friend, Mr. C. P. MacLean of J. W. Macdonald Co. Ltd., who operates a business in Central Nova, I learned that in 1966 it cost the company $1.83 per ton to ship scrap iron from New Glasgow to Sydney, Nova Scotia. In 1968, the rate went up to $2.45 a ton. This year, it costs $3.49 a ton to ship that amount. The greater amount paid in many cases means that there is to be a loss instead of profit. I also learned that, to ship steel to Newfoundland from New Glasgow, N.S. via CNR, costs $20 per ton whereas it is possible to ship steel from Detroit to Newfoundland for $6 a ton. This will show what businessmen in the Maritimes are up against.

In my constituency, we honestly applaud the efforts of the government to develop and open our north. We support that as a national goal, yet we are apprehensive to some extent about the ecological implications and rights of the native peoples involved. We wonder, too, at the spending of all those millions of dollars for highways to the north—Perhaps not all the implications have been thought out—and yet not even $1 million or $2 million have been allocated to construct a highway to open an area in my constituency in Guysborough county, where the need for such a highway is so obvious that for years reference has been made to the "missing link highway" between the areas of Port Bickerton (Fisherman Harbour) and Country Harbour. This is a development so necessary that it is difficult to see why it has not been expedited before. Mr. Speaker, the whole of the eastern shore of Nova Scotia has been neglected.

The Industrial Development Bank, if I may return to that subject, is not the answer to the financing of a small business. There is too much red tape; there are too many conditions and too high an interest rate is charged for that purpose. What we really require is an agency like an ordinary mortgage corporation which would be given incentives to finance small businesses or even to finance the construction of homes outside well defined town boundaries. In that way, aid could be given to the development of the rural parts of my constituency and province and, to some small extent, help halt the rush towards centralization in urban areas. We may be comforted by knowing that this administration is at least considering taking steps in this direction under its residential mortgage financing legislation. Its scope ought to be broadened and it should be extended to cover the building of small commercial buildings in the eastern shore area of my constituency. The same thing could be said about many other areas where people would like to establish small business enterprises which could be tailored to take advantage of what can be found in those areas.

One sees examples of this in the New England states. For example, people in the area would like to grow and process cranberries, foxberries or blueberries, not only for the tourist trade, but to ship to canneries and food processing plants; they would like to sell scallops and fresh sea foods at roadside booths; to serve good clam chowder and home cooking, to undertake small boat building operations or conduct salt water sport fishing tours; to experiment with aquaculture for clams or oysters; and, to provide necessities such as trailer parks and other amenities for tourists. But, Mr. Speaker, they lack capital. Capital is very necessary, and this budget makes inadequate provision for the kind of capital which is needed if we are to help these areas in Nova Scotia.

This particular budget, as I have said before, is fine for healthy, large corporations which need assistance to improve their competitive positions in major markets, but it does nothing to encourage Canadians who wish to start in a small way and become independent. It does not help the average person to begin a small business.

This government has done nothing constructive to assist the Sheet Harbour area of Nova Scotia, although the matter has repeatedly been brought to the government's attention in the House of Commons by myself and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). That is to say, nothing has been done to compensate for the loss of the pulp mill, which was the only industry of any consequence in the entire shore region, apart from fishing; and we all know the difficulties in which the fishing industry finds itself because of the extremely timid and reticent attitude, if I may describe it in the kindest terms possible, of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and of the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis). Surely, Mr. Speaker, the much heralded Department of Regional Economic Expansion could have done something to establish an industry somewhere along this line, in this vast stretch of territory, that would to some extent make up for the loss of the pulp mill which was closed many months ago.

In another area of my constituency, Mr. Speaker, that of Pictou county, there are different problems. It seems obvious that in this area, which is more organized and which has a reasonably diversified industrial type of economy, steps should be taken to have it declared a designated or special growth area within the meaning of the DREE legislation. In this connection, may I quote from part of an article which appeared in the recent Halifax edition of a leading newspaper. It is entitled, "Grits to impose metro government" and, in part, reads as follows:

> There are indications that the Nova Scotia government now is prepared to move firmly toward some form of regional government for the Halifax metropolitan area.

In some ways this is comparable to the industrialized area of Pictou county, to which I referred. I continue:

> —pressure from the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion (DREE) for some overall planning for this area could force the provincial government to move steadily towards regional government with or without the blessing of the three local municipalities.

I wonder if the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is trying to exert political pressure on municipalities. For example, are municipalities being led to believe that they will not be designated as special growth areas unless provision is made for a certain type of local government? If so, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should say so, and not beat around the bush on this subject. I appeal to the government directly to do something and take care of the situation in Pictou county. It is an area that is fast growing industrially and needs all the help it can get particularly in view of the government's transport policies.

I, personally, am most concerned about what is happening to agriculture in Nova Scotia, about the steps being taken to alleviate difficulties. I still live in a farming community and have seen the drastic decrease in livestock and farming activity in my area. It might be useful if I were to put on the record at this time statistics to show the drastic decline in farming in Nova Scotia over the years. In 1935, for example, Nova Scotia produced 4,900,000 pounds of creamery butter. At present, Nova Scotia produces less than half this amount. Milk production is down drastically, and there are fewer cattle. The same may be said with regard to sheep. What is really disconcerting is the fact that a census of farms taken in 1931 revealed there were 39,444 farms. Thirty-five years later there were only 9,621, less than one quarter. Consolidation accounts for some decrease in numbers, but consider this, Mr. Speaker. The area of improved land dropped from 2,502,773 acres in 1933 to 1,084,273 acres in 1966. That is a tremendous decline.

In Canada as a whole, if my figures are correct, it appears that the census of farms reveals a decline from 430,522 to 366,128. Total farm land in Canada dropped to 169.7 million acres from 174.1 million acres. That is further evidence of the decline in the agriculture industry. If we are to stop this alarming trend and protect a way of life that has been so good to us and for this country, many government ministers and departments will have to help, not just the Minister of Finance. Surely, we do not want large corporations to be completely pre-eminent in agriculture, yet our present tax policies are forcing the small farmer out of business and into cities where, in many cases, he becomes a sort of refugee. When a man sells his farm and moves to the city, often he cannot adjust. A man who owns land has a stake in this country. He can grow crops, raise animals and contribute something. If you take this way of life away from a man who is used to it, he becomes, in some cases, a burden and not an asset to society.

There has been so much abuse heaped on the government regarding its policy on foreign ownership that one almost hates to kick a government when it is down. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recognized the inadequacies of this policy when he asked students in the western part of this nation not to be too hard on it, or words to that effect. This government had a problem regarding the Gray report. It had to take some action, make some gesture before an election. Since the basic contents of the report were leaked, the report could not have been left in limbo indefinitely. Last year the Home Oil takeover bid embarrassed the government. The year before, 1971, Denison Mines had to be dealt with, so the government gave us the Gray report. The basic truth is that it does not have much, Mr. Speaker. Like so much that this government does, it is hardly more than a gesture. If a foreign company wishes to take over a Canadian one but is prevented from doing so, it can start a new company and possibly put an existing one out of business as a result. We must give incentives to Canadians to develop and invest in our own companies by granting tax credits, using a selective capital gains tax or some other device whereby it pays to be a Canadian in Canada.

The former Minister of Finance made a step in that direction when he recognized that small Canadian-owned companies should be treated more equitably with regard to corporation taxes, but more of this spirit is needed. All hon. members must be rather apologetic about this so-called Gray report if this is the best that our government can do. If all we want to do is screen American takeovers, I predict we will see Americans come in and by-pass these provisions by starting their own companies.

We need to limit control in certain key areas. I do not know exactly what Mexico has done over the years, but my information is that the Mexican government has done very well in coming to grips with its foreign ownership problems. In future, if the administration of Mexico wishes to pursue a course of economic union or some scheme of this nature, that is pursue a continentalist policy, they can do so with their national pride and economic strength apparent and intact. A country that is in control of its economy could, when the occasion arises, participate in a continentalist policy in some areas, but could refuse if it had to participate as a junior partner with a tiny, minority interest. How can one conduct meaningful policies from a posture such as this? I sincerely hope, and I trust my feelings are shared by the administration, that this government can come up with progressive legislation that will give Canadians a positive incentive to develop their own country so that in years to come we will be pre-eminent in our country and not so utterly dependent, as we now are, on foreign capital.

In conclusion, I say to this government that they have only scratched the surface with their foreign ownership policy and budgetary proposals. They are not all bad, but in my humble opinion, they are not all that good. The tax reform legislation is not cohesive and it is not conducive to economic growth. This government has failed to coordinate its efforts with provincial authorities. Instead of talking to the provincial authorities, they have been talking at them. When some of the fellows I worked with in the woods showed up with a fat lip or black eye, I asked them what happened and they replied that they were talking when they should have been listening. This government has been doing too much talking to the provinces and not enough listening. There has not been the degree of co-operation that is necessary between federal and provincial authorities if this nation is to develop properly. The taxation policies have made it very difficult for Canadians to expand their own nation. As the immortal Joe Louis used to say when he was fighting, "they can run, but they can't hide". The Canadian taxpayer can also run and pay, but thanks to the existing tax policy, he has no place to hide any of his assets, not one little area he can call his own when it comes to putting something aside for his old age. I do not think the majority of people in Canada are happy about this policy. Unless this government does something to change it, they will be in for a very rude shock in the not too distant future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rud L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on his initial budget which has set priority on the stimulation of Canada's economy. No one can question the need to provide jobs and to aid the competitive setting for secondary manufacturing, particularly in view of the recently announced United States DISC program.

The reduction to 40 per cent in corporation tax is expected to maintain the buoyancy of our economy and, to some extent, compensate for the squeeze on profit margins due to appreciation of the Canadian dollar. It is also expected to help defuse the threat to Canadian production as a result of protectionist moves by our trading partners. The fast write-off of equipment and machinery is expected to maintain the buoyancy of our economy and stimulate further investment within the secondary manufacturing industry. The result of such stimulus on Halton, which houses a bourgeoning secondary manufacturing sector employing more than 16,000 people, can be of immense importance.

[Mr. MacKay.]

J. P. R. Wadsworth, President and Chief Executive, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, struck a responsive cord with this comment on the budget when he said:

> It has a refreshing tone and is positive in outlook.

I think this is the way all Canadians should look at the budget. It is not intended to be a cure-all, nor is it an attempt to buy votes. It is a highly pragmatic program for the continued development and expansion of our economy.

One tax expert, William A. MacDonald, in the Financial Post, of May 13 suggested that this budget, and I quote: > —constitutes a change in tax direction that could have greater long-term implications for the well-being of Canadians than the complex tax reform which took 10 years to hatch. It is directed at strengthening the international competitive position of the economy on a long-term basis—something no budget in recent memory showed any concern about.

> "For the time being, at least", said MacDonald, "the fine-tuning and fiddling-at-the-edges of recent budgets has been abandoned in exchange for powerful, direct and permanent action through tax cuts and fast write-offs. These will help the cash flows and rates of return of Canadian manufacturing and replace continuing reliance on government expenditure and loan programmes."

It should be noted, I might point out, that the budget is also in keeping with the approach to foreign investment reflected in the bill introduced by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) to provide for the review and assessment of takeovers of Canadian business enterprises by non-residents. The old adage "let the dice fall as they may" can no longer be equated to today's global community. The initiative for throwing the dice lies with the player, and the social consequences of the throw must be shared. So must it be with today's international economy.

The governor of the Bank of Canada put it quite succinctly when he stated:

> Because prosperity and depression can spread rapidly from one country to another, the great countries must manage their affairs well and keep firmly in mind the international implications of their actions.

For Canada, it is imperative that government, industry and each individual share equal responsibility in making this nation competitive and stronger.

• (1550)

Focusing, now, on my own constituency of Halton, one of the major beneficiaries of this budget will be the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited, which now employs more than 7,000 people. That is a lot of employment centralized in one community industry, and much of the county's prosperity depends on this industry. This dependence comes in the form of supplier-to-manufacturing operations: housing for employees, transportation, and many other relevant services, all contributing to increased employment. I would expect Ford as a beneficiary, to heed the advice given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) at his budget conference: "I expect business to get out and hustle, to grow, to compete and to build jobs for Canadians."

Equally important is the need for government to give Ford the opportunity to compete and provide jobs, emphasizing again the need for shared responsibility. Ford, I am sure, intends to be a viable Canadian enterprise. Recently the president of that company, in an address at the St. Thomas, Ontario, plant, said:

We intend to meet the import challenge of vehicles made in countries other than the U.S. and we intend to meet it with our own resources. Every import sold in this country jeopardizes Canadian jobs and tax revenue.

In effect, the budget protects a very large and important segment of Canada's manufacturing industry; it protects jobs, and it protects against a loss of corporate tax revenue. Labour is viewing with alarm reports circulating that Canada must capitulate on the auto pact in the forthcoming rounds of trade negotiations. Members of the United Auto Workers told the Canadian Labour Congress when they met in Ottawa a month ago that U.S. economic strategies are costing and will cost the Canadian automotive industry thousands of jobs. Dennis McDermott, Canadian director of the U.A.W. said "The Americans are playing around with the auto pact and we think they're in violation of GATT".

I feel, personally, the reasons we refused to abandon the auto pact safeguards in our talks with the United States in February are valid today and will be applicable tomorrow and years hence if our economy is to progress. However, Ford will only continue to be a viable industry and provide opportunities for spin-off secondary manufacturing operations as long as the auto pact safeguards are maintained in bargaining with our neighbours to the south. The auto pact was a conscious decision by both governments to build a more efficient automotive industry within North America through specialization and rationalization. To this extent, both governments have succeeded.

We have succeeded, I think, because of several very important reasons. First, our labour force is much more skilled and self-disciplined than its counterpart in the United States. Another factor is the excellent social environment in Canada's manufacturing locations, as compared to that of the northern industrial sites in the United States. The Canadian worker can compete, as efficiently and as effectively, as any worker in the world. He is prepared to share responsibility in making our country a better place in which to live, but he must have the co-operation of industry and government. This co-operation is implicit in the auto pact, for, despite all the misconceptions surrounding this agreement, its safeguards stalemate, to a great extent, any moves on the part of the U.S. parent corporations to maintain operations in Canada only as long as it is profitable for them to do so.

In the foregoing remarks, Mr. Speaker, I have touched on those points in the budget which I feel are of vital concern and benefit to the people of my constituency. With the emphasis the minister has placed on the tax benefits for secondary industry, I foresee a marked continuation of the upward trend in employment especially in the auto industry, and I think it is reasonable to expect that all parties involved, both management and labour, will recognize the need for co-operation. As I pointed out in my references to the auto pact, Canadian labour is skilled and self-disciplined, both vital factors in manufacturing efficiency. Given stable labour relations, Canada can maintain its competitive position throughout the world. We also have every right to expect the industry will lower its prices.

As the Financial Post stated a few weeks ago:

It is now very much up to business, especially manufacturers to respond to the sizeable tax incentives with substantially more competitive prices.

And now, like the current stories that have the good news and the bad news, I have given you the good news in the budget first. While home in my constituency over the past few weekends I heard what might be called the bad news. Many people mentioned in conversation that the middle income group must continue to carry the chief burden of taxation. Indeed, it is pointed out there is no indication that the 3 per cent reduction introduced in a former budget will be continued after its termination date on December 31 of this year. In other words, we can expect a tax increase of 3 per cent at that time.

I think that all members of the House deplore that the Finance Minister has seen fit not to continue this tax benefit beyond its expiry date. His reasoning is simply that there are many things that we as a country cannot afford today and this is one of them. But I am happy to see that he has not completely closed the door and that he has both the time, between now and the end of the year, as well as the right, to review the legislation so that it will not be necessary to restore the tax at that time. There are other items I might have touched on but they have already been dealt with by previous speakers.

Let us remember, however, that the main thrust of this budget is the creating of jobs and job security while minimizing inflationary tendencies. In my opinion, its short term effect will be to give the economy a definite impetus while laying a solid foundation for future economic growth.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I were to give the members of this House one guess as to the subject about which I intend to speak this afternoon, they would all guess correctly. I rise to speak again on the subject of pensions, because I have learned during the years I have been here that the only way to get action on a matter of this kind is to keep it alive.

• (1600)

I want to say to the Minister of Finance that although it was a bit of a departure from the usual routine that is followed in a budget speech for him to announce certain legislation respecting pension changes, it was a welcome departure. Indeed, the fact that that departure was welcome has been demonstrated by the fact that the two pieces of legislation that he announced on May 8 have already been put through all stages in this House. Thus, the stage is set for the paying of the increases provided in those bills at an early date. I am referring to the increase that will be enjoyed by old age pensioners because the escalation clause has been put back on the basic $80, and also because the 2 per cent ceiling on the escalation provided in the Old Age Security Act has been replaced by a formula that provides for both the basic pension and the guaranteed income supplement to be increased automatically each year in accordance with the actual percentage rise in the cost of living.

The other change that was announced, and which has now been embodied in a statute passed by this House, makes it mandatory for the same principle to apply to pensions paid to war veterans under the Pension Act, to the allowances paid to war veterans under the War Veterans Allowance Act, and to all other pensions and allowances that come under the aegis of the Department of Veterans Affairs. As I say, these announcements which the Minister of Finance made on the night of May 8 were most welcome, and the House has shown that fact by taking speedy action on the two pieces of legislation that were forecast by that announcement.

However, I feel that I must say to the Minister of Finance and to the government that in terms of the total problem, in terms of a really satisfactory pension program for all the people of Canada, all he did by his announcement on May 8, and all the government has done by its subsequent legislation, was to admit that there are things that sorely need to be done. We argued for a long time that it was not good enough to have an escalation clause that was limited by a 2 per cent ceiling. We argued that such a clause had the effect of forcing people to fall behind year after year, especially when their pensions went up by only 2 per cent whereas the cost of living may have gone up 4 or 5 per cent or even more. We are glad that the 2 per cent ceiling has been removed under the Old Age Security Act and that the principle has been established that the escalation of pensions should be related to the actual increase in the cost of living.

The first of four points that I want to make this afternoon, a point I make with as strong a plea as I can, is that this principle of the escalation of pensions according to the actual rise in the cost of living should be extended to every pension plan that comes under the responsibility of the federal government. I know that in response to questions I have asked since May 8, the assurance has been given that these matters are under consideration. But the fact is that we have to be told about 47 times that something is under consideration before we get action.

May I make particular mention of the pensions of retired public servants. For a couple of years now, these people have been getting annual increases in their pensions, but they have been limited to 2 per cent per year. The same is true of retired members of the Canadian Armed Forces and retired Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel. They, too, are getting annual escalations of their pensions but they are limited to 2 per cent. If it is correct and proper, as I assert it is, to put escalation of some pensions, notably old age security and veterans pensions, on a basis that equals the actual increase in the cost of living, I urge that this also must be done for all other pension programs.

I particularly mention retired public servants, retired RCMP personnel, retired members of the Canadian Armed Forces, retired employees of the Bank of Canada, and many other individuals and groups coming under federal responsibility. I might even note that there is a pension arrangement for retired employees of Devco, and if a certain member were in the House this afternoon the mention of that might raise another argument. But I simply make the point that that pension program also has attached to it a 2 per cent ceiling on its escalation provision, and for all I know there are such ceilings in other plans that may not have been drawn to my attention. The Minister of Finance took a good step forward, and showed himself to be a candidate for something or other in the future, by being progressively minded and introducing the idea that certain pension escalations be related to the actual increase in the cost of living. My very strong plea is that this principle be extended to all pensions that come under federal jurisdiction.

In passing, since I have referred to the pensions of retired members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and retired personnel of the Canadian Armed Forces, I want again to make the plea that the escalation of their pensions begin at any time after they go on pension. They face a discrimination whereby some public servants at age 55 can get an escalation of their pensions without having to wait till age 60, but in the case of most retired RCMP and Canadian Armed Forces personnel, they have to wait until they are 60 years of age before that escalation begins. That is a slight digression but I felt it should be mentioned along with this first main point that I am trying to make, namely that if this idea that the Minister of Finance brought in on May 8 is a good one—and it is; indeed, it is excellent—it should apply across the board.

I have cited a number of pension programs that come directly under the responsibility of the federal government. There are some I must also mention that one might say come indirectly under the responsibility of the government in Ottawa. I refer in particular to railway pensions. I start with the pensions paid by Canadian National Railways which were escalated on a one-shot basis a little over a year ago, nothing more having been done since that time. In my view, that escalation should be put on an annual basis, a basis that again should correspond to the actual increase in the cost of living and not be tied to a 2 per cent limit.

Of course, in mentioning the Canadian National I must also mention the Canadian Pacific Railway which is lagging behind disgracefully. Every time we pose questions about both these railways to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), he makes the point that he has more influence with one than with the other. Well, I suppose that is true; but I suspect that if the government really wanted to throw its weight around with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it could be almost as effective as it is with the Canadian National Railways.

The particular point that I want to make is that both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific are governed by a piece of federal legislation, namely the Pension Benefits Standards Act. This is a federal statute which lays down the conditions registered pension plans must meet in order to qualify for registration, in order to obtain income tax recognition and so on. I submit to the federal government the time has come when it ought to write into the Pension Benefits Standards Act the requirement that all pension plans which come under that act must contain provision for the escalation of those pensions and that that escalation ought to be on a basis equal to the actual rise in the cost of living. We can look at all these matters in a number of ways. If the government ever considers again at this session the bill having to do with the Canadian National financing we will be back to the pension question, and if the government wants to get that bill through the answer is simple. All it needs to do is to tell us it has made an arrangement with Mr. MacMillan, the President of the Canadian National Railways, to improve Canadian National pensions along the lines we have suggested.

Mr. Speaker, I have been unhappy since it was first brought in that we have had a 2 per cent ceiling on the annual increase in pensions. I take my hat off to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). He has broken through that ceiling, but only in respect of old age security and the pensions of veterans. I call upon him to use his influence with the government to recommend that it finish the job and break that ceiling right across the board, if that is not a mixed metaphor.

I said that I had four things to say. I shall move immediately to the second point. I agree that I am asking for something that will not happen overnight and something which calls for study. However, we must get this study started. A few years ago we did not even have a universal pension and until a short few years ago we did not have any escalation. We have made progress. But I want to say again this is not good enough. It is really not the mark of a decent society if all we can do for our retired people is to increase their pensions in accordance with the rise in the cost of living. Surely our older and retired people who helped make the economy what it is at any given time have the right to share in the rising standard of living. Wage rates go up faster than the cost of living goes up. The gross national product goes up faster than the cost of living goes up. When you give to retired people only an increase related to the cost of living increase you condemn them to remain at the same standard of living they had at the time of their retirement, even though people all around them enjoy an increase in their standard of living.

An editorial appeared in the Vancouver Province on this subject on May 20, 1972, entitled "Standard of living pensions ...". I admit it was a speech or two of mine which prompted the writing of this editorial. It says some very nice things about me, but I do not know of anything in the rules which would prevent me referring to it because of that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You must have a good researcher. I have one or two.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have friends in British Columbia who send these clippings to me. Indeed, I have a great many friends in British Columbia. The article reads:

> Mr. Stanley Knowles makes a persuasive point when he says the old age pension should be related not only to cost of living but also to standards of living.
> The two measurements are related but they are not the same.
> If pensions are increased by a cost of living formula as Ottawa now proposes, they merely keep pace with increased costs. If they are increased by a standard of living formula they allow the pensioner to keep pace with the general improvements in lifestyle that other sections of society enjoy through real economic growth.

The next two or three paragraphs of the editorial are direct quotations from speeches of mine, so I shall skip them and go to the last paragraph:

> But if it's considered fair that other people should share in the increased wealth of the country beyond the mere increase in the cost of living, it's equally fair that pensioners should benefit along with them. Such increases would obviously be very expensive. But expense is not a final argument against the principle.

I wish to underline that. The principle is unanswerable and incontrovertible in respect of our older people. I hear they are busy banding themselves together in the United States and calling themselves the Grey Panthers. A program appeared on the CBC last night which members of the government should have watched, or which they should watch some other time if they did not see it, which indicated that the retired people in that country, some 20 million strong, are not satisfied with things as they are. I think the same thing is true here on a lesser scale. I feel strongly that our older people, in numbers approaching 1,700,000 or perhaps two million, are entitled not just to be kept alive on some subsistence allowance and are entitled not just to an increase in their pension year after year to keep them at the standard of living they had at the time of retirement, but are entitled to share in the growing wealth and the rising standard of living in this country. I call upon the government to give some real study to this matter. I think this ought to be brought into effect right away. I know that first of all we must have the cost of living increase applied to every one. I feel, however, that the day should not be far off when we start to put into effect the principle of escalating all pensions according to the rise in the standard of living and in so doing recognizing the rights of our older and retired people.

The third thing I wish to say this afternoon is that after or perhaps even before we have solved these problems about the escalation of pensions of various kinds, a good hard look must be taken at the basic rates. It is fine to say that the old age security pension will now be escalated by an amount equal to the actual percentage rise in the cost of living, but $80 as a basic rate is not a sufficient amount with which to start. It is no answer to say there is a guaranteed income supplement which one can obtain if one subjects himself to a certain income test. I believe that at the present time that basic rate should be not less than $150 a month. I think, too, the basic rate of pensions paid to our blind and disabled people should be increased substantially. I believe it is unfortunate that in the changes which have taken place in our pension legislation in the past few years the rate for blind and disabled persons has not been increased, as it should have been. A pension of $75 a month is not very much; it certainly is not enough. I know these people receive more money than that because they can obtain assistance from the provinces, funded in part out of the Canada Assistance Plan. But I still think that persons who are blind or disabled ought not to have to go through that kind of routine. I believe their right to an adequate pension because of their condition ought to be recognized under federal legislation.

I feel, too, that the basic rates of both pensions and allowances paid to our veterans must be increased. I am delighted that the new Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) has indicated his willingness that this question be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. When this reference is made the House can be sure the committee will study this matter very sympathetically. I want to emphasize that in asking for a new look at the rates with regard to veterans, I have in mind not only the basic rates of the disability pensions paid under the Pension Act, but also the rates of the war veterans allowance.

Those rates must also be increased, and increased substantially.

These matters I bring before the House under the general point that I am making that while I am pleased that we have made progress in terms of escalating pensions, and while I welcome the attention that has been paid to my plea that the escalation of pensions be related to the standard of living, these things are without any significant value unless the basic rates are adequate. It is not good enough in this day and age to have a basic rate of old age security that is only $80 a month, and I regard the basic rate of the disability pension for veterans as being too low in relation to today's standards. In my view, these rates simply must be increased.

I know of course that in relation to this, as in relation to all the requests that some of us make for pension increases, someone may put the question "where is the money to come from?" I do not press what I am now going to say too hard because I know what you can do with bookkeeping, but just in terms of bookkeeping I would point out that the old age security fund is running a healthy surplus, as are all our pension funds, and that the new fund that was established a year or so ago to provide escalation payments to retired civil servants, retired RCMP and retired armed forces personnel is running a healthy surplus. If you want to do it in terms of bookkeeping, there are many items of money of that sort that can be found. As I say, I do not press that too hard because in my view the basic question is what society wants to do and how we plan the distribution of what we produce. I know that there is only so much we can produce, and it is also a fact that in today's thinking in terms of saving our environment, saving our world from destruction by pollution and saving society, we may have to curtail this onward march in the production of more and more wealth. But the real problem is how we share such wealth as we are able to produce, and I am not satisfied that the dividing of the pie as we do it today is good enough so far as our pensioners, our veterans and all our older and retired people are concerned. So I call for a new look at the basic rates of all our pensions and for increases of substantial amounts in those rates.

I said I had four things I wanted to bring before the House this afternoon. Not one of them is new, but they are all put forward in the belief born of experience that it is not what you asked for six months ago or last year that carries any weight; you have to keep these issues alive all the time. The fourth of the issues that I want to press and keep alive this afternoon is that the time has come to lower the pensionable age, at least on a voluntary basis. I do not think there should be any delay at all on the part of the government in bringing in legislation to amend both the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to make it possible for those who wish to leave the labour market to draw both of those pensions, certainly as early as at the age of 60. I think also that this is a way in which some solution can be found to the problem of the younger wife who has not yet reached the pensionable age when the husband has. If you had that five year voluntary period, it would solve a great many of these cases.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

A moment ago I had the immodesty—not unique among politicians—of referring to an editorial in a west coast newspaper that supported my position on standard of living pensions. I wonder if I may now pick up an editorial from an east coast newspaper, namely, the Halifax Mail-Star of Wednesday, April 19, 1972 which carries the interesting heading "Ahead of his time". It starts off by saying:

> It is not at all surprising to find that the latest move in the House of Commons to urge the government into the payment of higher pensions at lower qualifying ages is being led by Stanley Knowles.

Then, there are a couple of paragraphs that are even more laudatory of my efforts over the years, and the editorial ends with this paragraph:

> Someday—and we hope it will be in Mr. Knowles' time—

I can tell the Halifax Mail-Star that it will be—

> —there will be more generous basic pensions and, possibly, eligibility at age 60 as he proposes. But the timing will depend upon the nation's ability to pay the bill and the politicians' ability to gear their thinking so as to catch up to the veteran pacesetter from the west.

Who would deny himself the opportunity to put that last sentence on the record, but I do so not just to put it there but to enforce my earnest plea to the members of this House that in their thinking they catch up with the needs of our day so far as pensions are concerned. One of the pressing needs, particularly with the vast amount of unemployment among younger people, is for a provision for retirement at an early age. The time for this change is now. Not many years ago we suggested pensions at 65 instead of 70, only to be told that this was impossible. However, eventually even a Liberal government was able to bring in a bill to bring the retirement age down one year at a time, 70 to 69, to 68, to 67, to 66 and to 65. Why should we not have a bill this year, patterned in the same way if you will, to start lowering the pensionable age under the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to 64 years in 1972, to 63 the year after, and so on until we get it down to the age of 60 four or five years from now. I submit that this is in line with the needs of our time and it is very much in line with a rational and sensible approach to pensions. I hope that the House and the government will give it earnest consideration.

I close by simply enumerating the four points that I have tried to make. First of all, I think that the idea of a cost of living escalation geared to the actual rise in the cost of living should be extended to all pensions which come under the direct or indirect control of the federal government. Second, I think the government should now initiate a very serious study of the principle of gearing pension increases to the rise in the standard of living. Third, I urge that the basic rate of all our pensions be reconsidered and that there be substantial increases in the light of the needs of today. Finally, I urge that an immediate start be made on lowering the pensionable age at least down to age 60.

These four changes would make tremendous improvements. I could make a speech in another vein. I could tell of the progress we have made over the last 30 or 40 years, and it has been good. Certainly, we have made real gains in the whole pension field. But in terms of what we can do now, in terms of what our people need and deserve, we have a long way to go. Let us get started now, at least on these four points.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the budget debate. The budget was presented to the House of Commons on Monday, May 8, and the fact that we are only now debating its proposals is indicative of the lack of direction and the indecision of the present government. I welcome the opportunity to speak on this measure, since June 10 was an anniversary for me as I have been some 15 years in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Take a good look at the place, Lloyd.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are just getting started.

Mr. Crouse: During these years, I have seen many budgets come and go, but few of them with more promises and less performance than the one we have presently under debate. When presenting this lengthy document, the Minister of Finance at least gave an indication that he understood some of the problems when he said, as recorded on page 1 of his text:

• (1630)

No economy is working as well as it should, if there are men and women seeking work who cannot find it.

That one statement represents the most serious charge that can be laid against the Trudeau administration, namely its waste of our greatest resource, our human resource, and the agony, frustration and humiliation which have been the lot of our unemployed people.

Apparently, the Minister of Finance at least recognizes that 6.8 per cent of our working force is unemployed and, to use his words, need "real jobs, not temporary jobs—jobs that last and satisfy." Some 592,000 people were reported as unemployed in April, and Trudeau unemployment is becoming a Canadian trademark like maple syrup, but it is certainly not as sweet to those who are affected.

Obviously, the Minister of Finance got the message, for right now some 43 per cent of the unemployed are young people between the ages of 14 and 24 years. Unemployment is a disaster for men and women of any age, but young people are especially vulnerable to the loss of dignity, and the hampering of legitimate ambition which is the inevitable result of being unable to find a job.

Further on in his speech, the minister stated:

I believe that part of my responsibility in this portfolio is to take a hard look at the rough edges of tax reform and I intend to see to it that the rough edges are smoothed out.

I ask the minister: where was he when this so-called tax reform was rammed through the House by the use of closure? Where was he when these rough edges were being put on this legislation by his own government? In his budget speech, the minister continued:

I propose to announce a number of important amendments to the Income Tax Act arising out of tax reform. The particular amendments have been selected either because they affect large numbers of taxpayers—or because the government is already committed to make them.

Then, the minister makes an astounding statement. He says:

There are a few other amendments which I have been contemplating—but I have not included these in this budget because I am still considering the best solution to the particular problems. I mention this because many people have made sensible suggestions to me, but it is not possible to deal with all of them tonight.

Talk about Nero fiddling while Rome burns! Is the Minister of Finance not yet aware that it is tax reform legislation which has created chaos, indecision and uncertainty throughout the business community, and that he should have acted in this budget on the sensible suggestions made by many people to him and to his government?

It is possible that the government could have avoided the rough edges of tax reform, injustices in law of which the minister speaks, if it had listened to the sensible advice of the official opposition last year, and delayed the tax bill until its anomalies had been straightened out. However, that course of action did not suit the government which was obsessed with the idea of using its majority power to force the tax bill through Parliament. The present Minister of Finance, who was then the Minister of Justice in the Trudeau government, must accept his share of responsibility for the present numbers of unemployed, for the costly blunders brought about by haste and political tinkering, because he meekly accepted, followed and endorsed the Trudeau policies which helped make these problems a reality.

On page 23 of his text, the minister is recorded as, frankly admitting that things have gone wrong under the Trudeau government, the government he supports. I say this because in his assessment of the budget he states:

I wish I could do everything at once. I am sure that each member of this House, were he standing in my place, would have a long list of priorities of things he would want to change, of inequities he would want to cure. The bare fact of the matter is that we cannot do everything at once. We simply don't have the resources. There are limits to the scope of fiscal policy. There are limits to stimulus and re-adjustment.

This is nothing more than an admission of defeat, a negative attitude which says to the unemployed and to our young people, "Have pity on us because we really don't know how to run this resource rich, well-blessed country, effectively." This is, in effect, what the minister is saying, for there is an old cliche which says that you cannot have your cake and eat it too. You cannot waste your tax dollars and still have worthwhile programs for the sound economic development of the country.

When the minister says, "We cannot do everything at once" what he really means is that the government cannot finance all of its pet projects and still assist industry in the creation of much needed jobs. You cannot build $25 million National Defence buildings and $30 million External Affairs headquarters and still have money to assist industry. You cannot build monuments to the ministers in this capital city, and still have funds to assist industry. It is a hollow sham for the government to say we do not have the resources to encourage employment opportunities for our people. According to the booklet put out by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent"—

Mr. Osler: Tell us about the Tories in Manitoba and Nova Scotia.

Mr. Crouse: The hon. member who, as usual, is interrupting while remaining in his seat, will have time to make his own speech.

Mr. Osler: I have already done so. I ask what about the Tories in Manitoba and Nova Scotia.

Mr. Crouse: If the hon. member would listen he would learn something. Incidentally, this booklet cost the taxpayers $72,625, and according to it the government spent a total of $10,767,000,000 in the year 1968-69 to serve 20 million people. According to this booklet the government proposes to spend $15,749,000,000 in the year 1972-73 to serve some 21,600,000 people. And since this book was printed, Mr. Speaker, supplementary estimates have brought this planned expenditure up to $16,012,000,000.

Our taxes have been escalating at a phenomenal rate. It is not honest, fair or just to say that we do not have the resources in Canada to provide jobs. The truth is that the government has been wasteful of our resources, and the wrong policies have been given priority. I cannot help but pity the Minister of Finance who showed such a strong desire to become the leader of his party, with a chance at the prime ministerial post, that he clung to his delegates votes until the bitter end at the last Liberal leadership contest. He was really the "Canadian Muskie" of that day. Now that he holds the post of Finance Minister, he will never get a chance to become Prime Minister. I say this after looking at history, where I find that since Confederation only two finance ministers have made it to the top, and none of them were Grits.

The two were Sir Charles Tupper, who became the sixth prime minister in 1896 after serving as finance minister under Sir John A. Macdonald, and R. B. Bennett who served as finance minister during the Meighen Conservative administration, and who defeated the Liberals under Mackenzie King in 1930 to become prime minister. But it looks as though one part of the history to which I refer will repeat itself for I believe Canadians are again preparing to elect a Progressive Conservative Nova Scotian as prime minister of Canada.

It is obvious, however, that the Minister of Finance recognizes a sound taxation policy when he hears one, or otherwise he would not have used the now familiar Grit tactic of strongly opposing, in Truro, Nova Scotia, on June 7, my leader's proposals as outlined when he spoke in the budget debate, covering a simple method of annually adjusting personal income tax exemptions and rate schedules to reflect increases in the cost of living. The Leader of the Opposition has stated that when he becomes Prime Minister, and that will not be very long in coming, he will implement the constant dollar approach to personal income tax payments, based upon the schedule of tax rates and personal exemptions that were set by Parliament in 1971. The aim of his proposal is to enable Canadians to maintain the 1971 equity in the years ahead. As Progressive Conservatives, we believe that the federal government should rid itself of the vested interest in inflation which arises from automatically reaping enormous additional revenues from personal income taxes when inflation is running high.

Mr. Speaker, there is a squeaky door over in that corner and I would ask you to close it, shut it up.

We also believe that low and middle income Canadians should not automatically pay a larger share of their real income in federal income taxes, especially if they do no better than keep even with increases in the cost of living. When implemented, the Leader of the Opposition's proposal would restore full fundamental parliamentary control over the effective rates of personal income taxation, which is something that is absolutely necessary but which has been lost under the present ineffective, abortive, rubber-stamping committee system. This proposal when implemented will not stop future tax increases but it will place the government under heavy pressure to carefully scrutinize its planned expenditures and to economize wherever possible before taking its case to Parliament. That is the crux of the matter, Mr. Speaker, and that is what we aim to do.

In my opinion, the Minister of Finance's speech in Truro is significant in that there is not one word in it that refutes, denies, challenges or disproves any of the basic points I have just mentioned. This is understandable, for if the Minister of Finance believes in the basic equity and fairness of the schedule of tax rates and personal exemptions which his party proposed and established in 1971, then he cannot, in all fairness, deny the need for maintaining that equity in the years ahead. The Minister of Finance was really grasping at straws when he suggested our proposal would increase government costs and likely intensify inflationary pressures. In actual fact, the constant dollar proposal could well have a beneficial anti-inflationary effect. All we need to do is look at the demands made by the workers who are going out on strike—in this year of the strike—across the nation, and we then realize that much of the pressure for higher wage settlements stems from the workers' realization that under the present tax system they need more than basic increments geared to the cost of living increases just to keep even. At the very least, some of that pressure could be eased through the implementation of the proposal put forth by the Leader of the Opposition. Obviously, the present Minister of Finance, like his predecessor, is long on rhetoric and short on understanding, and these are symptons that are easily recognized by an enlightened electorate. I believe it was Bismarck who said "Nothing can be regarded as true until it has been officially denied by the government." The Minister of Finance's condemnation of my leader's proposals is a strong indication that they have some merit and are worthy of serious consideration by Canadians.

It is obvious to most Canadians that we are heading on a collision course between government and industry under the present government's policies. Nowhere is this more evident than in the field of transportation. Whether you are in western Canada or the Atlantic provinces, the questions raised are all the same. How much longer can this federal government, its Canadian Transport Commission and the railways, ignore the appeals of Canadians for a better break on freight rate charges. When I am in my constituency I am asked, how much longer will the present government pretend that there is consistency in its national transportation and economic development policies? On the one hand, this government has set up the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which makes grants toward the alleviation of economic disparity, while on the other hand it permits rising transportation costs to strangle large and small industries in the Atlantic region. Surely the government cannot claim it has not been alerted to this problem. We have held special debates in this House and our members from time to time have moved a special motion to continue those debates, most of which have been ignored or refused by the government. Surely, they cannot claim that they have not been made aware of the adverse effects on regional growth of the eight freight rate increases in a little more than 24 months.

In his speech today, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) outlined a proposal to pay the freight on goods sold to the government. To use his words, I think he said that "Contracts would be accepted f.o.b. the factory;" that is, on any contract awarded to a factory in any part of Canada by the Department of Supply and Services. Mr. Speaker, this is a move in the right direction, but that is all. It is only a small step; it is no real solution and it is not real transportation policy. For example, if a firm in my constituency desired to tender on steel barges to be sold to the government, first it must find out the cost of the steel which has to be purchased in Hamilton, Ontario and transported to Halifax, Lunenburg, Liverpool, or Shelburne, in Nova Scotia. That cost must be added to the cost of production, and this makes that firm in no way competitive with the company located five miles from the steel factory. That is why I say the proposal put forward by the Minister of Supply and Services is a small step, but it is not a real transportation policy for Atlantic Canada.

There is nothing in this budget which indicates that the Minister of Finance is aware of our transportation problems. In fact, transportation is excluded from absolutely any aid in this budget, yet hardly a week passes without some indication that companies operating in Atlantic Canada are in trouble. Only a few years ago a new company, Anil Canada Ltd. started producing wallboard in my constituency at East Chester and from correspondence and discussions I have held with the President of that company, it is evident that freight charges are seriously hampering their operations. This is only one example, and I could cite many more. We have long since passed the day when the federal government showed any real concern for the transportation ills of Atlantic Canada.

Now, we are told that the Canadian railways will file notices of substantial increases in freight rates with the Canadian Transport Commission on June 19. A 10 per cent increase in rate charges on shipments to and from Atlantic Canada will deal a crippling blow to local industry. This is harsh treatment for our people and it is an action that we simply cannot and will not tolerate. We cannot stand idly by and let this government add further burdens to an already over-burdened economy in Atlantic Canada. When the railroads were built, there was a concept that railways from sea to sea were to hold Canada together. This concept has been forgotten by the present government, if it ever knew it, and I believe that a moratorium should be declared on all freight rate increases, until a fair and just transportation policy has been worked out that is acceptable to our people.

When the National Transportation Act was passed in 1967, Section 3 of that act promised that we were going to have, from 1967 onward, an economic, efficient, and adequate transportation system in Canada that would make the best use of the available modes of travel at the least cost. And this was to be achieved in a way to protect the interests of the users, and at the same time maintain the economic well-being and growth of Canada. The best way to do this, it was stated, was to do it by competition. This powerful regulatory commission operates on the theory that all our problems can be regulated. Unfortunately, the side effects of the cure trigger other reactions that more seriously threaten the well-being of the patient than the illness first perceived. The cost of transportation since 1967 has not become cheaper, nor has it become more efficient as a direct result of regulation. In fact, in my opinion, the Canadian Transport Commission has failed. It has let us down badly because its promise of performance has not measured up to our transportation goals.

This government must not only establish a sound national transportation policy but it must also define a sound industrial policy so that Canadian business, large and small, will know where it stands. At the present time, our businessmen are confused, concerned, and lack confidence in their federal government. This accounts for their lack of initiative in attempting further industrial development which will provide worth-while jobs for Canadians. When you are running a business, and I have some experience in this field, you must have a clearcut objective in order to be successful; you must know where you are going. However, it is obvious to Canadian businessmen that the Trudeau government's industrial policy is comparable to pouring water into a sieve; it runs in all directions.

Mr. Hees: And it is not very thick, either.

Mr. Crouse: I believe a white paper setting out the government's industrial policy would be extremely valuable in giving business and labour an idea where this government is heading. We are reforming our tax laws and our competition and labour laws without any clear idea of what this government or this country is trying to achieve. This is not good enough. The gap between business and government is widening, Mr. Speaker. What is needed today, above everything else, is the restoration of a climate of confidence and trust. We must, somehow, restore to Canadians confidence and trust in their government; and, conversely, there must be confidence and trust by the government in the Canadian people, if we are ever to hope to get the economy moving again and provide jobs for the hundreds of thousands of people who are looking for work. Our export figures for March of this year document all too clearly our world trading position and our inability to compete in world markets. With the exception of the United States, our exports declined. Exports to Britain, Japan, West Germany, Norway, Italy, Australia, Venezuela, Belgium, Luxembourg and India declined by a total of $78.2 million.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Crouse: Manufacturing, according to my figures, last month employed 17,000 fewer people in this country. Obviously, this is not good enough, and our export problems are now increasing as a result of the increase in Canada's dollar value and a weak, vacillating Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. For example, low cost imports of cotton textiles are destroying our Canadian producers, and it is doubtful whether Cosmos Imperial Mills can survive in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia without a change in government policy. Our stainless steel producers, especially Atlas Steels, are reportedly postponing indefinitely any expansion plans, owing to import competition from Japan, Sweden, Germany, France and Austria. The government apparently takes the view that, apart from using persuasion to bring down commercial interest rates, there is little it can do about the high level of our dollar or to make our companies more competitive. I, personally, cannot accept that view, for it is still not too late to strengthen further the financial position of our Canadian companies by giving them an immediate tax reduction with respect to manufacturing and processing right across the board rather than waiting until January 1, 1973, as the minister proposed in his budget. Only by enabling Canadian corporations to compete in the world as it is will we be able to provide jobs for our people.

The minister may say, no doubt, that his tax proposals should encourage industry. Mr. Speaker, one of the things this country needs is risk capital. It is all very well for the minister to say that personal savings are increasing in Canada; but he ought to realize, and I know he does, that these savings for the most part are all going into the hands of institutions which invest them in limited areas in order to obtain a safe return on the capital entrusted to them. They are not venturesome. They do not take risks. We do not, under this government, encourage the accumulation of private wealth; and, without money in the hands of entrepreneurs, there can be little or no risk taking.

I have said we need a sound industrial policy; this fact became evident even before the Nixon moves last August for it was difficult to find the basis for a strong, underlying growth trend in Canada's economy. Our plight emphasizes in the most striking way the need for an immediate cleanup of the decks on the economic front if there is to be any hope of our getting businessmen down to business. Instead, we have been caught up in a web only faintly related to the real world of decision and international competitition. The Trudeau cabinet has been so busy trying to do the things that it ought not to have done that it has not had time to do those things that it ought to have done. That is the problem, Mr. Speaker.

This budget has unfortunate implications for federal-provincial relations. The buoyancy in federal revenues has been used by the federal government for its own purposes. Approximately $1 billion at its disposal has been used in accordance with its views. It is the federal government's views on social priorities which continue to dominate, and this centralizing trend is not helping the provinces or municipalities which want to make their own decisions but are desperate for the resources needed to meet their current obligations.

My main objections to the present budget cover a number of areas. In my opinion, it makes little sense to treat different sectors of the economy in such a diverse way. It is also difficult for businessmen to plan ahead when tax rates are changed so frequently, and when selective tax cuts to corporations are unjust and inappropriate. The tax cut for manufacturers and processors is too indefinite. I ask the Minister of Finance to tell us, when he speaks, what specifically the government means when it speaks of a manufacturer, or of a processor. Why introduce a new set of distortions into the functioning of the market system, by substituting the judgments of the Minister of Finance as to what types of tax relief make for the greatest degree of growth for our competitive system? Frankly, I do not trust the minister's judgment in a matter as delicate and sensitive as this.

Why, for example, was equipment used in agriculture, in fishing, in logging, in forestry, in oil or gas wells and in the extraction of mineral resources excluded from the fast write-off incentive proposals? Once again our agricultural industry and fishing industry have been left standing by the boards, as it were, for all the consideration they have been given by this government. It seems to me that these primary industries provide considerable employment opportunities, and therefore should be encouraged. If the government is interested primarily in job creation, and all current economic texts show that the service area overwhelmingly is the biggest source of employment, why was that area excluded from assistance in this budget? Employment in the service and recreational sectors declined by 12,000 last month.

If countering the American Domestic International Sales Corporation program, commonly known as DISC, was the objective, it would have been more appropriate to introduce a similar plan in Canada to encourage exports. Quite frankly, in my opinion, erratic variations in tax rates do little, even if they are favourable or result in lower tax rates. A budget was brought down in June, 1971, and it was followed by the 1971 temporary tax reduction last October; then, the tax reform legislation was passed last December, which attempted to set out tax schedules for the ensuing three years. Now, we have another, should I say haphazard, change providing for a 9 per cent tax cut for manufacturers and processors. These shifts make it difficult to plan ahead intelligently or to take advantage of rate changes. Therefore, I believe investment plans will be postponed until there is greater assurance about the outlook or greater assurance as to what future tax rates will be.

An hon. Member: People are waiting for a new government.

Mr. Crouse: The attitude of businessmen may well be, "Why do it now; let's wait for the next tax concession." And who can blame them for adopting that posture? Large industrial organizations do their financial planning at least three years in advance; therefore, long term plans must be based on something other than the fickle, spur of the moment changes initiated by the Minister of Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—National Parks—Lake Louise project—Request for statement on government position following public hearings; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—Offer of good offices by United Nations Secretary General respecting Viet Nam war—Canadian position—Representation to U.S., and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Youth—Opportunities for Youth program—Rejected applications—Results of solicitation of companies to provide jobs.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech, delivered in a very elegant, effective fashion, contains so many stimulating and sensible proposals that it has earned for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) superlative praise. That is the way one can describe the widespread approval of the document that spells and easier load for pensioners and the disabled and more jobs for the unemployed. It is a document, sir, which marks a long advance in Canada's economic and social maturity. It spells confidence, which some people in this country had lost. The need of the time is the recovery of confidence, confidence that we can beat the unemployment problem.

• (1700)

The tax benefits to expand manufacturing and industrial development will certainly stimulate the business community to accept the challenge and become more successfully competitive in selling our products abroad. I congratulate the minister for his refreshing faith of which, unfortunately, members of the opposition appear to have so little.

In a recent news release, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce expressed pleasure with regard to the constructive budget presented by the Minister of Finance. I quote:

"The measures outlined to stimulate Canadian manufacturing and processing industries should do much to reduce unemployment and to make our competitive position stronger in domestic and international markets," said Neil V. German, president of the Canadian Chamber.

In particular, the overall effects of the tax measures in the budget will help Canadian industry to offset the adverse effects of DISC.

The Chamber was also pleased with the measures proposed in the budget to relieve the financial burden borne by those groups hardest hit by inflation such as pensioners, veterans and students.

A review of the debate on Bill C-201, a measure to provide for control of foreign ownership of Canadian companies, reveals some misunderstandings but some of the speeches were reflections of pure anti-Americanism. Fortunately, the Minister of Finance does not see it that way. The unrealistic dream of members of the committee for an independent Canada of eliminating foreign ownership is running against a contemporary world trend to internationalism and, in any case, their theories are not valid in the world in which we live today any more than when we needed foreign capital to develop our industries and create jobs to meet the needs of an expanding and growing population. Had it not been for American capital, there would not have been an iron ore mine in northwestern Ontario. I am referring to the development of the Steeprock Iron Mines in the town of Atikokan, 130 miles west of my constituency. Atikokan would still be a small hamlet. It was risk capital that insured jobs and prosperity for hundreds of people working in that area.

I wish to quote from an editorial that appeared in a recent edition of the Calgary Albertan:

In the much-discussed subject of foreign ownership of Canadian industry to that of foreign ownership of Canadian land, both crown-owned and public, there are many grey areas. While this, on the surface at least, appears to be a laudable endeavor, the problems which will arise if the policy is adopted, first on a national, and then on a provincial scale, can be enormous.

If the respective governments really intend to go whole hog on the latest bit of Canadian nationalism, two important points will have to be determined to the satisfaction of all. These are what constitutes a "foreigner," and what constitutes a "Canadian citizen."

In Canada, which will soon reach a population of 22 million, or just about one-tenth of the population of the United States, there are millions of British subjects who are not Canadian citizens, if the narrow interpretation of the word is to be employed. In the first row are the English, Scottish, Irish and Welsh.

Then come all the immigrants from the 23 Commonwealth countries, white, black, and various shades of brown.

As Canada is a member of the British Commonwealth, all of these people possess the same legal rights as native-born Canadians, once they have been accepted for domicile and have settled down in this country, and as such they are entitled to all the rights and privileges of native-born Canadians and those who have emigrated from other countries outside of the Commonwealth but who have acquired Canadian citizenship after residing here for the period prescribed by law.

The first thing that has to be determined therefore before governments get too deeply involved in the land ownership problem is—what constitutes a "foreigner," and whether British subjects who do not hold citizenship papers are to be barred from buying crown lands. Does it also mean that no person except those who hold Canadian citizenship papers are to be permitted to homestead on crown lands?

The new restrictive legislation now under review by provincial governments across Canada, is merely another chapter in the "Keep the Americans out" policy so popular nowadays.

However, the majority of the governments affected do not possess the intestinal fortitude to name the country they are legislating against, so the legislation will be such as to confine the sale of crown lands to "Canadian citizens." It would be very injudicious to name the Americans in legislation of this kind when the whole country is still desperately anxious to enlist the aid of American capital in the continued development of natural resources and industry.

I can understand why British Columbia, with its miles of ocean front, lakes, plus a myriad of islands, is anxious to reduce the volume of the sale of land to the Americans.

I too have toyed with the idea of following the birds to Victoria, or to acquire a small piece of Salt Spring Island, and there to be nuzzled by the balmy Pacific coast breezes. Every time I think of Alberta's seven to eight month winter, I find it difficult to understand why the Americans, or any other group presently being designated as "foreigners," would be interested in trying to buy Alberta land at seriously inflated prices.

Those who did buy land in the early days of the oil invasion at moderate prices, now possess a solid investment, but times are different now in the wake of the urban sprawl and inflated land values.

I thought that the Alberta government displayed great prudence when it did not rush passage of amendments to the Land Act, at the recent session of the legislature. This is a problem which is by no means as simple as it may appear.

Ever since the North West Mounted Police rode west in 1874 to bring law and order to what is now the province of Alberta, Americans have been prominent in development. They brought in the first big cattle herds from Texas in the early 1880's and in the boom years prior to the First World War, they poured across the border in an unending stream, bringing their furniture and livestock with them. Later, they provided most of the capital for the development of Alberta's oil and gas resources, and practically all of the first geologists and drilling crews were either American or American trained.

For this one reason alone, I find it impossible to join in the "Yankee, Go Home" cry presently being chanted by the Johnny-come-lately minority, whose contribution to development still has to be assessed.

The opposition is forever pounding on the gloomy side of the unemployment picture which, of course, everyone admits is not what the government had hoped it would be. On the other hand, the prophets of doom are trying to make it look far worse than it is. For example, when estimating employment statistics for young people in the 14 to 24 age bracket, the difficulty is to arrive at anywhere near the number of unemployed.

Students who register with Canada Manpower and placement officers at the various colleges and university offices, often do not notify the agency when they obtain work. There is no way of checking up on students who go out to find jobs by themselves. Many students who applied for permanent positions have not notified the manpower centres of their decision to return to post-graduate school in the fall. Several thousand students, unsuccessful in their job search, are flying to Europe and elsewhere and therefore cannot be classified as actively seeking employment. Some unemployed students have taken temporary summer work, or obtained "Opportunity for Youth" grants, and cannot be classified as permanently placed, while others wait until summer is over before looking for work.

Many corporations delayed their hiring this spring. They are still going through the process of hiring at the present time. Some universities now operate on a co-operative plan which staggers the graduates' entry into the labour market to other months of the year. The latest unemployment figures for the 14 to 24 age group available are for March and indicate an unemployment rate of 12.6 per cent, or about 273,000. This compares with 12.9 per cent jobless students a year ago. On the whole, bachelor-level graduates in commerce and business administration are finding jobs; in some instances, there are not enough commerce graduates to meet the demand from the accounting profession. Graduates from the professional schools of medicine and dentistry are always in demand, but others, especially those with just a B.A., find it most difficult to obtain jobs.

Then, there is the woman factor. A few years ago married women did not, as a rule, enter the labour market when their husbands were gainfully employed. Now, even though the husband may have a good job, the wife wants a job too, and when unemployed she registers at manpower centres as well, thus compounding the unemployment figures. Lest I be accused of being against a married woman seeking employment, I should hasten to say that she has a right to look for a job, if family conditions will allow. But let us also realize that the jobless figures do not really mean the disastrous conditions that the opposition are trying hard to convey to the people of Canada.

With respect to immigration, I should at once express my satisfaction with the new Minister of Manpower and Immigration's attitude toward applicants for admission to Canada as landed immigrants. I admire his forthright statement aimed at granting a little more flexibility in the area of personal judgment to immigration officers, such as boosting the point ratings, if necessary, given previously to unsuccessful applicants; in other words, using the criteria with flexible judgment and compassion.

With regard to the Sedgwick report of October, 1970, prepared by a Toronto lawyer who has never had the experience of being an immigrant, I suggest that it be shelved for some other era when Canada will have doubled its present population. The minister, very properly, rejected the contention that visitors are abusing the relaxed immigration provisions; and I would recommend increased reliance on the discretionary judgment of overseas' immigration officials, who are, by and large, the best trained and responsible individuals in the public service. I was pleased to take note of a substantial increase in this year's budget for increasing the number of officers, and of expanding facilities in our immigration offices around the world.

I should also add that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should be congratulated on the appointment of the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) who, when he was Minister of Labour, showed his capacity for commiseration in the face of injustice and who, in his new responsibilities, meets the problems of his department with dedication and compassion.

Canada, as a nation, will be 105 years old in less than two months from now. But Canada as a place for European settlement dates back to 1534 when Jacques Cartier came to our coast seeking a seaway to the Orient. He found, instead, a country, vast and beautiful, beyond his dreams. After the first settlers came to this land, the French and the English they were followed much later by streams of immigrants from almost every country of Europe bringing to our shores millions of men and women of many other cultures who made their homes here and helped in the development of what is now a great nation.

Baron Tweedsmuir, one of the best known Governors-General of Canada, once said when speaking to Ukrainian-Canadians:

I want you to remember your old Ukrainian traditions, your beautiful handicrafts, your folksongs and dances and your folk legends. Your traditions are all valuable contributions toward our Canadian culture which must be a new thing created by the contributions of all the elements that make up the nation.

It is with this thought, Mr. Speaker, that I express the gratitude of countless immigrants who are now enjoying the privilege of being Canadians.

A dedicated group of citizens in the City of Thunder Bay have taken on the task of organizing a campaign for funds to establish an arts centre which would include an auditorium. This city of 107,000 people lacks a suitable theatre complex to accommodate an average audience of 1,500 people. Every year those in charge of the music festival are hard-pressed to find accommodation for the various events. The various arts' societies, such as the Cambrian Players, the Lakehead Symphony Orchestra and others are experiencing difficulty in finding suitable quarters for their performances. The arts centre complex is also needed for teaching all facets of the arts, workshops and convention meetings. The federal government, under the Local Initiatives Program, has made a grant of $18,720 toward hiring a co-ordinator, a secretary, and ten surveyors to evaluate the need of the community cultural program. For this, the city is very grateful. The Mayor has indicated that the corporation will lend active support and financial assistance to the project it is hoped, which, once underway, the federal government will also assist with a grant or a loan so that this worthwhile project may be brought to fruition.

One of the most exciting projects that has ever been voiced by a Prime Minister of Canada, ranking with Sir John A. Macdonald's vision of a transcontinental railway a century ago, is a proposal outlined by the Prime Minister to build a highway to connect existing stretches of roads from the border of Alberta, at the 60th parallel, to the Arctic Ocean, at Tuktoyaktuk, a distance of 1,050 miles. In a letter to the Globe and Mail of May 2, 1972, Mr. P. Pepperrall, a professor of history from Willowdale, said in part:

In the decade of the 70's nearly a century ago, a dream of similar magnitude that was to open transcontinental communication and to perpetuate a Canada from sea to sea was also denounced as a "preposterous proposition", and "an act of insane recklessness". After all, Sir John A. Macdonald's proposed Canadian Pacific Railway to remote British Columbia would be a road to nowhere of forbidding length, built with money he didn't have, over an undertermined route, and through terrain as formidable as any in the world.

Yet these very obstacles, which people ignorant of the Canadian identity considered to be insurmountable, were the very elements which have characterized the Canadian existence, made its people unique, and impelled them to meet the challenge that was the CPR. The sense of interminable distance, lonely space, and rugged vastness was as much a distinctive part of the Canadian character and consciousness as the country that had created it. And to have failed in response to this challenge that was Canada would not only have betrayed the natural tendency and uniqueness of the Canadian identity, but also have stifled the thrust that was to carry it as a nation intact over the threshold of the twentieth century.

Canadians might do well to remember the heritage of our Canadian identity, and in particular the solitary figure of Sir John A. Macdonald earnestly making his proposal for the CPR. Sir John was the "old chieftain" whose national dream culminated in the Canada of a century ago, but the Prime Minister may well be the "new chieftain", whose vision of the north builds a Canada for the twentieth century.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the previous speaker. It is good indeed to know that there are men like him in the House of Commons who have faced a great many adversities on the road here and who can speak with a great deal of fervour and enthusiasm about the future of Canada. While I certainly cannot develop the same kind of enthusiasm for his leader that he expressed, I must say it is nice to know there are still some members of the Liberal party with that kind of enthusiasm for the leader of the Liberal party.

Mr. Jerome: There are lots of them, don't worry.

Mr. Coates: I am glad to hear the parliamentary secretary say that because it is not obvious that that is the case these days.

Mr. Jerome: Do you want to get into a contest about enthusiasm for leaders?

Mr. Coates: I do not mind getting into a contest about that at all. We happen to have two of your members over here who started off with you, and there are a couple more who are no longer with you, so I would not suggest that you start to name names, otherwise you would discover that you are in a greater deficit position now than you were when you started out in 1968. There is also a good possibility that you will be a lot worse off before the end of 1972. Certainly, you will be a lot worse off if you have to call an election.

That was not exactly the way I intended to start my speech, Mr. Speaker, but that is how it has turned out and I do not mind at all.

Mr. Jerome: Enthusiasm for leaders was your topic, not mine.

Mr. Coates: That is right.

Mr. Jerome: At least, we only have one.

Mr. Coates: We have, too.

Mr. Jerome: What is his name? Which one do you support?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order. The hon. member has the floor and his time will be running out. He should be given an opportunity to make his contribution to the budget debate.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent that hon. gentlemen opposite are pretty touchy when it comes to talking about leaders. One of the things that concerns them is that they do not know whether they are going to have their present leader when they go into an election campaign or a new leader. This is one of the things to which we are looking forward. We would certainly like to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) take his record to the people. If that happens there is no doubt at all that there will be an elimination of the present administration, perhaps even an obliteration. I am glad to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in his seat today, since I am sure we can count him as one of the casualties when the next election comes.

There are a number of matters that I should like to talk about. One of them has been developing since 1968 and the situation has become increasingly worse since then. I refer to the problem of transportation in the Atlantic provinces. I have spoken on this subject many times in the House of Commons since 1968. In recent days, we had some hopes that the government would announce a policy which would be of some value and assistance to the industrial community of Atlantic Canada, whose problems are gargantuan. We had hoped that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) would bring forward some proposals which would, at least to a degree, have alleviated the desperate situation that is developing in Atlantic Canada. However, rather than offsetting the seven freight rate increases that have been sanctioned since September 1969, on June 19 we must face an eighth application by Canadian National Railways for a freight rate increase.

I should like to put on the record what some of the businessmen in the Atlantic provinces have said recently regarding what those freight rate increases have been doing to them. Almost every area of the business community of Atlantic Canada has commented, and with very few exceptions they all say that the rates will be like a noose around their necks. Both their profits and, in some instances, the extent of their losses in the days ahead are being affected. One of the industries that we hope will continue to operate, and which has made every possible effort to continue to operate, is Cosmos Imperial Mills Limited of Yarmouth. They have increased their staff in order to increase production in the hope they can stay alive. The vice-president, Donald Cain, as reported in the Chronicle-Herald for June 10, says:

—the company's prices are fixed and cannot be raised or lowered. The increased rates will definitely push losses up—

The company had announced a modernization of the plant which will increase staff by nearly 100 persons, in an attempt to pull the operation out of the red.

• (1730)

It will be harder to compete in all their markets, said Mr. Cain. The company moves more than half of all its goods by trucks now but the vice-president figured the disadvantage. An increase in line with the rail rate increases, as has happened in the past.

In other words, when the CNR increases its rates, the trucking companies increase theirs too.

The production manager of another textile industry here, Bonda Textiles Ltd., said he expects increased rates would hurt them because a lot of their sales are in central Canada and are small orders.

Then we have a comment from another industry. Mr. A. M. King, president of Ven Rez Products Ltd., of Shelburne, states that the company was forced to quit the Ontario market some years ago because of freight rate changes. There is one example after another of companies which have had their backs driven to the wall because of one freight rate increase after another. I do not believe it is possible for many Atlantic businesses to stand still another freight rate increase on June 19. I think the government should take all these rate increases, examine them in the context of what they do to the Atlantic business community and make a determination concerning how something can be done to assist the industry of the Atlantic provinces to survive the avalanche of escalating freight rate costs which faces them. I cannot stress too strongly how serious is the situation which has been developing in Atlantic Canada since 1969 so far as transportation is concerned, and how necessary it is to secure federal government action at the earliest possible date.

I should like to turn from the subject of transportation to that of Information Canada, because Information Canada is being discussed more and more everywhere in this country. I note that on Friday the Acting Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), expressed deep disappointment at the inability of Information Canada to meet the objectives the government held for it. When Information Canada was established there was a great deal of controversy about it. We were told that the number of public relations officers in government departments was to be substantially reduced because Information Canada would absorb their duties and make them surplus to requirements.

It came as a great disappointment to me to receive today the answer to a question I had placed on the order paper on February 18 concerning Information Canada, because parts of the question dealt specifically with whether Information Canada had done its job in so far as information officers were concerned. In the first part of my question I asked what was the total work force in respect of government information officers prior to the establishment of Information Canada. In the second part of the question I asked what was the work force of all government information officers at that time. In the third part I asked for the total work force of Information Canada. The fourth part of the question dealt with the cost of Information Canada.

I tabulated the returns. With regard to the first part of the question, I was informed that prior to Information Canada being established there were 937 information officers in the public service. In answer to the second part of the question I was informed that there were 1,062 information officers in the various departments of government. That answer is exclusive of Information Canada. In other words, the total number of information officers has increased by approximately 125 since Information Canada was established, while at the same time Information Canada has 354 full-time employees plus 162 employees involved with expositions.

The total salaries and wages involved in respect of the 516 people on the staff of Information Canada is $3,132,000, out of a budget of $8,406,000 in the fiscal year 1971-72. In other words, we now have 125 additional information officers associated with various government departments plus 516 employed by Information Canada. So instead of having 937 people involved in the dissemination of information today in Canada, we have 1,578. An article from the Globe and Mail states:

> The record of the past six months . . . leads one to conclude that it is urgent to consider some projects to justify our budget and existence," says the January 24 memo from Robert A. J. Phillips, deputy director of the service.
> The memo was addressed to director-general Jean-Louis Gagnon and is highly critical of the service's operation.
> "Virtually all new visible projects have been cancelled though our budget continues to rise." Spending estimates before the Commons allocate $18,354,000 to Information Canada up $3,389,000 from the fiscal year ending next March 31.
> The public will judge Information Canada by what it does and it is unlikely to justify its existence only by efficiency in operations it took over, for equal efficiency might have been achieved without the costly overhead of a new department."

I should like to know where the efficiency is, in view of the fact that Information Canada employs 516 people and the government departments employ 1,062 people, an increase of 125 over the number employed before Information Canada was conceived. It is no wonder the leader of my party has promised—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Coates: A voice from the wilderness! It is no wonder the leader of my party has promised to eliminate whatever one might call this. One could not call it a department of government, because it was not conceived by legislation. I suppose one might call it an abortion. It certainly acts as if it were, most of the time. Whatever it is, my leader has said that he will do away with it and he will certainly save the Canadian taxpayers many dollars when he does.

Information Canada was in fact created by the ruling party having a director appointed by the Trudeau government, responsible solely to the Trudeau government, and to be eliminated or dismissed at the pleasure of the Trudeau government. Yet this is the organization the government, in its magnanimity, has given Canadians to provide objective, unbiased and full information of the goings-on of government.

The conflict of interest is as dangerous as it is evident. No one can be unbiased about his employer when he is as dependent as the Director of Information Canada, even if he is a former chairman of the Quebec Liberal Party committee—which, I might add, issued an official biography at the time of the director's appointment containing no mention of his Liberal party affiliation. It is a known fact around the House of Commons that members like myself are constantly plagued by numerous inquiries from personnel at Information Canada requesting information they in fact are supposed to have on hand.

Almost without exception, when a question of mine is answered in the House, especially one that is made an order for return, I receive a call from someone in Information Canada asking me if they can have a copy of the question. That is an example of their efficiency. One of the things Information Canada was supposed to do—I read here from some of the directives—was strengthen national identity, and this they were supposed to do by using the two official languages as equally creative instruments of information. I discovered the opposite to be the effect.

I have before me correspondence which the Amherst chamber of commerce had with the Canadian government travel bureau. The Amherst chamber of commerce wanted some travel information, and this is what they were told by the Canadian government travel bureau:

> Unfortunately, the travel information literature you requested in your letter is not, for the moment, available in both languages. We regret, then, to have to inform you that it is impossible for us to provide you with the copies requested.

In other words, if they do not have the information in both languages, it is not available—nobody gets it. It is no wonder the government does not know what to do with Information Canada. It is no wonder the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) says he is disappointed in it, and it is no wonder the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) says that when we become the government he will do away with it.

The preceding speaker spoke about two matters in relation to foreign capital. One was with regard to the establishment of industry in Canada by foreign capital, and the other was with regard to the purchasing of land by foreign residents. I cannot get excited about where the money comes from to establish industry in Canada. I think the important thing, especially when we have an unemployment rate of 10 per cent or more in the Atlantic provinces, is to develop our resources and see that our people have jobs. It is only after they are all working that perhaps we can start becoming selective.

I think it is important that we have the right type of base, that companies which establish in this country become good citizens of our country while they are here. So long as that happens, we should not become too concerned about them. At the same time, I think we have to accept the fact that some types of companies we would just as soon not have in this country, especially when they find difficulty in establishing in their own country. An example of this occurred very recently in Nova Scotia when a great deal of discussion took place at the highest level with the premier of that province regarding the establishment of a nuclear power station there.

It is my information that the people interested in establishing that nuclear power station in Nova Scotia were interested in doing so because they could transport the electricity produced to the northeastern part of the United States. One could immediately ask: Why did that company not locate closer to where the power was required—especially in view of the fact that it was an American consortium that spoke about building the nuclear power station?

I gather that the people in the area where the power is required do not wish to have a nuclear power station in their midst. When that type of thing occurs, I think the Nova Scotia government and the federal government should become very concerned. I think there should be definite laws to the effect that a firm which is endeavouring to locate in Canada, one which is not acceptable in the country of its origin, is not acceptable in this country either.

I do not think the province of Nova Scotia should be offering sites to a company producing power for the northeastern section of the United States when all we will get is pollution effects associated with the power produced. So far as I am concerned, and unless it is shown to be otherwise, that is what I would conclude about this nuclear power station.

There is one other point that I would like to make—the hon. member mentioned it also—referring to non-resident ownership of land. Ontario is a large province with many unused acres of land, and perhaps there is no concern here about United States citizens buying up large tracts of land. On the other hand, perhaps there is concern. There certainly is concern in Nova Scotia, especially about speculators buying up large tracts of our recreational and shoreland and using it for promotional purposes for their own benefit.

I have no objection to anyone, anywhere, having a cottage lot in the province of Nova Scotia and enjoying the qualify of life we have to offer, but I do become concerned when American or any other foreign interest buys up large tracts of our good recreational land, thus preventing our own people enjoying those lands now and in the future. They prevent our people having access to our beaches. I believe that steps must be taken, especially in a small province like Nova Scotia which has a limited amount of recreational property and a limited access to the ocean, to prevent those lands from being bought-up and cordoned-off so that our own people and those who visit our area are prevented from enjoying the benefits of the scenery and the quality of life that we have there.

I believe that in the public interest, in places such as Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and certainly in a place like Newfoundland and Labrador, governments must act to ensure that limited amounts of recreational property there are available to everyone. A controversy has been going on in Nova Scotia, and certainly in British Columbia, and action has been taken by some governments in this respect. I am awaiting reasonable action to be taken in Nova Scotia, but not action that will stop anyone from selling property to a bona fide purchaser or, in lieu of a bona fide purchaser, to the government at a reasonable market price.

I think action must be taken along this line to protect the public interest, to protect the people of Nova Scotia and to ensure their right to enjoy what they have in that area of Canada, as well as to ensure that people who visit our province have the right to enjoy it. However, I would certainly not go beyond that and I would certainly not set up any great difficulties for capital coming into this country, because we have many resources which can be developed before we reach our full potential.

I think people who at this stage of our development, with the degree of unemployment we are suffering, suggest stringent requirements for capital coming into the country are fat cats sitting in plush offices who are not worried about where their next pay cheque is coming from. They are not people who are looking for jobs, who do not know if they will have a pay cheque next week. If they were, they would not be as concerned about the establishment of industry by foreign interests as they would be in providing jobs for the people who need jobs—and there are a great many in this country today who do need jobs.

[Mr. Coates.]

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches made in the House this afternoon. I was somewhat surprised by the statements of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) in as much as almost every criticism he made could easily be refuted simply by referring to the facts.

I know there are some anomalies in the operation of the financial structure of government. I appreciate the points that have been raised by the hon. member who preceded me. However, I think all deliberations within the House of Commons create widespread interest among Canadians but few speeches affect the daily lives of all Canadians. I submit that the budget speech falls into the latter category. In fact, I believe I could get unanimous agreement of the House on that point.

I therefore join thousands of Canadians who have expressed their approval and support of the latest budget, and I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on his well balanced program, properly designed to provide a sound base from which both the public and private sectors of our economy can function and provide more jobs. The minister placed the emphasis of budgetary requirements on the needs of segments of our economic society where it can and will do the most good, not only in the short term but in the long term.

The Liberal party has long stood for social justice on the basis of a gradual but constant program of social reform within the framework of a democratic, private enterprise system, a system which allows maximum freedom to all individuals, including the right to explore their entrepreneurial abilities and a fair reward for initiative. Liberal governments over the years have initiated measures designed to promote greater social justice by relieving financial hardships faced by individuals or groups in our land. These have included, among many others, family allowances, old age pensions, medicare, shared-cost programs with the provinces, unemployment insurance, minimum wages, highway and railroad development, ship-building, the Canada Assistance Plan and scores of programs to alleviate the financial difficulties of farmers, fishermen and the self-employed in all walks of life. The budget of May 8 includes proposals to raise further supplementary pension allowances to enable the pensions of the elderly and veterans to keep pace with the cost of living, to further the tax exemptions for senior citizens, the blind and the disabled and to provide significant tax relief from the heavy burden of education.

It is recognized by all responsible citizens of our country that we do not, and cannot, exist in isolation on the North American continent. While we are, and must remain, alert to the needs of all our citizens we cannot and will not ignore requirements essential to the recognition of the entire economic system, a system which has provided Canadians with the second highest standard of living in the world—and on a per capita basis we enjoy the highest standard of living in the world—a system, Mr. Speaker, that the New Democratic Party apparently seeks to downgrade and destroy in favour of state dictatorship which would rob us of our right to aggressive initiative so vital to all freedom-loving people.

Even though Canada's economy grew more rapidly last year than that of any industrial nation except Japan, prices increased less here than in any other nation. While we can take pride in this accomplishment, I would not suggest—I am practically quoting the Minister of Finance when I say this—that the economy is working at top efficiency while people willing and able to work cannot find jobs.

What about jobs? Where do they surface? The minister has recognized that new jobs can be spawned only by an increase in the need for more workers. He has provided some relief to sectors of the economy which now provide the highest percentage of income to workers. I refer to small businesses, which number in the tens of thousands across Canada, to medium and large corporations and a few giant corporations as well.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of calling it six o'clock when I was discussing the importance of employment and jobs and how our government and, I certainly agree, all governments place a special importance on jobs for people. This is really the basis of a democratic society. I asked these questions: What about jobs? Where do they surface?

I would like to ask now: What about jobs? How are jobs financed? Contrary to the preachings of the New Democratic Party, my good friends to the left—

Mr. Paproski: The far left.

Mr. Pringle: —the far left, and some members of other opposition parties as well, jobs do not just happen. Contrary to the preachings of the New Democratic Party and some members of other opposition parties as well, jobs do not just happen: they must be financed by money which is surplus to operating and living costs. It is not possible to provide new jobs without funds made available for expansion of facilities and development of additional markets. Jobs are one of the most important facets of our society. In other words, Mr. Speaker, without risk capital in the hands of those willing to invest in an expanding economy, the rate of decrease in unemployment can be seriously retarded. We have many situations to prove this point. What about jobs? Is profit important or essential?

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that "profit"—a word which has not been accepted as well in the last few years as it used to be, but which will surely be accepted again—stands almost alone as a source of risk capital. How much risk capital do we get from our wages which we spend entirely on living expenses and which we need to keep our homes and to provide our families with the necessities of life and the recreational facilities so important to us? How much surplus do we have to provide risk capital? Not very much! It is the philosophy of my friends in the socialist group that business should operate on a break-even basis. That has bankrupted many businesses, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that if we in this country attempted to operate our business on a break-even basis it could bankrupt our workers and our new opportunities almost overnight.

It therefore follows that economic expansion necessary to provide more jobs and increase purchasing power can only be assured by permitting more funds to accumulate as risk capital or profit. The Minister of Finance has recognized this need, and I am convinced that thousands of Canadians will respond by again initiating a new wave of production expansion. In my riding there is already an indication that this is taking place. The minister has proposed reducing the top rate of corporate tax on manufacturing and processing profits to 40 per cent, and the rate on small business to 20 per cent as of January 1, 1973.

I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, the importance of the small business in Canada. When we talk about corporations, it is thought we talk about giant corporations, that we think of those corporations operating at Windsor and areas such as Toronto. Nevertheless, we must think about the thousands of small businessmen who line the main streets of our nation. They are the backbone, the people who provide jobs for other people of their areas. We must think of the small operator, the dairy producer, the man who operates the small store in our small towns. People like that have not disappeared. Some of them stay open after hours, for which they earn extra recompense. They provide a real service and fill a real need of our consumers. It is unfortunate that we seem to refer to giant corporations when we speak in this House of corporations, because the real backbone of this country, in my opinion, is still the small businessman.

The minister has also proposed that we should permit manufacturers and processors to depreciate fully the cost of machinery and equipment acquired, after budget night, within a two-year period. This provision is not being enacted for the giants alone; it is being enacted for the smaller processors of our nation as well as for the manufacturers: it is to benefit those in business in all parts of our country who need to be given an incentive to provide more jobs. To allow them to do this, they will not be so heavily taxed. They now know that they will not need to pay such a high percentage of their profits to the federal government but can divert some of this money and produce jobs with it.

The manufacturing and processing sector, Mr. Speaker, is the largest single source of employment in Canada, providing jobs for more than one-fifth of all working Canadians. The suggestion that employment of new workers will be negated by automation is nonsense. This concept was loudly expounded following the invention of the cotton-gin during the revolution and has yet to be proven valid. Automation has been used to relieve the worker and shorten periods of labour.

I give the labour movement and its leaders full credit for the leadership they have shown over the years. I have always given them full credit. I know that in the past the leaders of the labour movement provided essential leadership for the people they represented and a reasonable balance was struck. I wish I could say the same thing today, but I am afraid I cannot.

It has also been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that tax reductions to individuals would be preferable to reductions in corporation tax, on the basis that consumers would be given greater purchasing power. The weakness of this suggestion can be seen if one compares imports of products into Canada against increasing Canadian production which is necessary to compete with foreign imports. We are all human: we all buy where we can get the best deal, and we do not always buy Canadian-made products if we want to get the best deal possible by virtue of volume production. An increase in volume of production decreases the per unit cost. Therefore, we ought not to increase the sale of imports but, instead, increase the sale of Canadian products and in that way make it possible for costs per unit of Canadian products to be lowered, to improve. We must encourage Canadian production, not imports. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has taken the right stand in this regard.

I ask, what about jobs? Is inflation on a collision course with jobs? At this date control of inflation is virtually, in my opinion, non-existent. The voluntary approach based on gentlemen's agreements cannot work. Over the years, codes of ethics and gentlemen's agreements have been prevalent. In other words, there has been no shortage of gentlemen's agreements—just, possibly, a shortage of gentlemen.

Economists treat inflation control much as we treat the weather—lots of lip service but really no solution. A suggested cure, Mr. Speaker, which seems to be gaining popularity is the concept of price and income controls. I favour another phrase which in my opinion more properly labels the dilemma: cost control, or controls of all costs. I am speaking of all costs, not just prices charged at the grocery store or the excessive demands of organized wage and salaried earners. In this I do not include reasonable demands—I emphasize that reasonable demands I do not include—but excessive demands I do include. I am speaking of all costs.

If each Canadian were assured that cost increases were to be frozen, then the law would apply to everyone in our society, to those in the professions, to landlords, bankers, land speculators—to everyone. It sounds a bit gruesome, does it not? Well, government control of our daily lives is gruesome. However, I can think of nothing more unfair or potentially discriminatory than selective controls. We learned this during the war, although we do not like to admit it now. Let me ask, again, what about jobs, and what about inflation? These two questions, stated together, remind me of a dog chasing its tail. The puzzle is, which of the two is the dog?

One cardinal fact every processor, every manufacturer knows is that any increase in costs without matching productivity results either in price increase or bankruptcy. Therefore, it has been my experience that any increase in cost without matching productivity is inflationary. I have never seen any statement contradicting this or proving the concept wrong.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, those responsible for causing increased costs do not always pay their fair share of the increase. Two-thirds of Canadians either live on fixed incomes or are self-employed. The real threat of inflation is felt by our senior citizens, farmers, fishermen and the like. Pension adjustments and tax relief to small businesses, as evidenced in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, will help to some extent.

May I reiterate my congratulations to the minister for the relief to be given to these people through income tax measures, as announced in the budget. However, I am disappointed that adjustments were not announced which could correct some of the unfair anomalies relating to excise tax and sales tax. For example, tea, coffee and powdered drinks are exempt from federal sales tax. Ice cream cones, popsicles and the like are free of federal sales tax.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pringle: I am delighted the Minister of Finance is listening and has shown his interest. Soft drinks, Mr. Speaker, are not so exempt, being subject to a 12 per cent tax which, when fairly examined, will be seen as a discriminatory tax. I will not discuss any comparison that is based on essential, nutritional values. Anyone who has experienced, "coffee nerves" as opposed to the "pause that refreshes" will agree that all these beverages are consumed principally because they provide a pleasant break and, as well, provide some psychological relief of tension. I am not in the soft-drink business, Mr. Speaker. We in British Columbia enjoy a beautiful, balmy climate and drink many soft drinks. On occasions when people in the cold climate of the east would probably require tea or coffee, our people prefer soft drinks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, I am serious about my submission.

Mr. Deachman: Don't forget a plug for ice cream, Jerry.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Montreal is the biggest consumer per capita.

Mr. Pringle: Of course, soft drinks, tea and coffee all provide an excuse for a break from work. The choice of beverage depends to a great extent on the season of the year and the whim of the consumer.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It's the real thing!

Mr. Pringle: It is interesting to note that even with the discriminatory 12 per cent federal sales tax, the soft-drink industry has responsibly held prices to a much more reasonable level than brewed tea or coffee. If nothing is done, a rise in price is inevitable and the youngsters of Canada will suffer the most.

I am also concerned, Mr. Speaker, with the lack of direct federal support to the handicapped and retarded. It is true that under the Canada Assistance Plan we provide unlimited financial cost-sharing on a 50-50 basis with the provinces. Where provincial governments approach the problem realistically, and some do, we can help. Unfortunately, there are provinces—I fear that my home province of British Columbia is one—which are willing to provide only inadequate minimum financing though the federal government stands willing, ready and able to pay half the cost. A direct approach on our part, or at least the right to share in administration, could raise the necessary assistance to a more acceptable level.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I remind the House that a more equitable approach to imports of agricultural products should be made by this government. Although the dairy and grain industries enjoy the support of tariff commitments, the small fruit and vegetable commodity groups constantly suffer from off-season shipments of vetetables such as lettuce, celery and potatoes.

Strawberry growers are unable to realize any real stability as a result of the threat of imports from low labour cost countries—such as Mexico. An investigation undertaken by the tariff board last October has not yet been reported to the interested people in the Fraser Valley. The strawberry industry is vital to the Fraser Valley. They supply some of the best strawberries on the North American continent. Not only is the quantity and the economy being hurt by this lack of attention, but the quality of strawberries is being affected. I consider this to be a very important matter and I hope the Minister of Finance will take it into consideration.

A great deal has been accomplished through marketing legislation designed to enable producers to improve stability through marketing procedures. I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). The fowl slaughter policy recently announced by him has been unanimously accepted by egg producers. I do not expect all of those within the sound of my voice to understand the facets of this policy and I will not take the time to explain it. It has been accepted by the egg producers, not only because of the financial assistance provided but because it provides for responsible action by producers to plan production more in line with potential markets. The program will have a lasting effect in helping to stabilize the industry.

I am very pleased to support the motion to approve the recently announced budget. It is a good budget. It has been accepted right across this land. The budget was announced in the House on May 8. This is June 12, and we are debating a budget which has already been accepted by the people. Any speeches of a derogatory nature will certainly be lost as far as the people of Canada are concerned. It is a good budget, as will be substantiated over the coming months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to pass, but I believe the hon. member for Edmonton Center (Mr. Paproski) should speak.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I understand that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) wishes to concede the floor to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski).

Mr. Breau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. But I want to be recognized after the hon. member.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I suppose as long as members can get up and speak in the budget debate there is still democracy left in this country. This is one of the few remaining signs of democracy. Parliament has become hobbled by the government in the application of rules designed to frustrate and stymie ordinary MPs. What is the point of sitting in the House if you are compelled to go along in the stream of meaningless government motions and legislation that often has no real purpose but to paper-over the cracks in our society?

The application of rule 43 has become a joke. The opposition was asked to go along in order to expedite the business of the House, and we did so. Day after day we have members rising with serious and urgent matters in the national interest and trying to focus attention through rule 43, and time and again there is lack of consent. How can you bring to the attention of Parliament lapses by the government, when you have to have the consent of government members? Rule 43 has done more than any other procedure to bring this House into disrepute and make Parliament a laughing-stock.

Canadians are scrutinizing this House. They want to know what is going on. There is no way they can find out. They are wondering if the entire proposition is not a waste of time and money. The opposition sits here while the government brings in legislation, generally insufficient, watered-down attempts to get a few headlines. And when we point out the deficiences, we are stymied by the rules. Parliament should be made to operate for the benefit of the people, and not vice versa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: We are now being asked to deal with a budget. It is perhaps our only chance to say how we feel—probably the last time before the next election. We are asked to say whether we approve of the government's financial policies, and then the budget goes to committee. We are not even able to vote on the details of the budget in this House. My answer to the question whether we approve the policies or not is very simple. The answer is definitely no. How can you approve policies when you cannot find out what they are?

The former minister of finance has gone to the defence portfolio. We hope he will make as good a defence minister as he did a finance minister. If he does, the enemy will have nothing to fear. His policy was to tax and tax, to get all the traffic would bear, as he once put it. Well, they have been following that policy for ten years and I tell them that they are at the end of the line. The traffic will not bear any more. Canadians are fed-up to the teeth with high taxation: they have had it.

When Canadians have to give up from 15 to 20 per cent of their incomes to support waste and government extravagance, it is no wonder they want to call a halt. It is only necessary to look at the latest report of the Auditor General. Never has there been an indictment of a government in office by an officer of Parliament to equal it. The government has broken all the rules of responsible fiscal accounting.

This government has allowed the bureaucrats to take charge of spending enormous amounts of money. There is no one to call a halt, because the government itself is made up of ex-bureaucrats. When you allow the cats into the dairy, who is going to keep them out of the milk pail? That is what is happening today. Ministers and top functionaries are trying to outdo one another in crazy, harebrained schemes to spend and spend. Meanwhile, unemployment increases, taxes go up, waste goes on and the taxpayer becomes more and more fed-up.

Canadians are paying more in taxation than any nation in the western world, and they are getting less for it. The purpose of the policy was to tax in order to cure inflation. Now we have both taxes and inflation! We were to suffer taxes in order to provide jobs. Now we have high taxes and still no jobs. If this is policy, Mr. Speaker, I'll take spinach.

How long does the government think it can lead Canadians around by the nose? Even its own army of highly-paid flacks, its monolithic support from the CBC, its army of tame commentators and columnists, cannot go on convincing Canadians that what they have been subjected to for the past five years is good government. There has never been worse government. Its record is one of confusion wrapped in indecision, compounded by uncertainty.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Beautiful!

Mr. Paproski: Where are they going? They are so far behind that they think they are first. They don't even know where they are coming from. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how can they have the nerve to come before Parliament with a document such as the present budget? I am not criticizing the present minister: he inherited the mess. But he is known as the white-haired boy of the cabinet. And now we know how his hair became white. They ended up with a billion dollars more than they had calculated. What fine budgeting that is. It is so scientific. It is certainly budgeting for the scientific age. It is budgeting for the technological age!

Then the government took $750 millions of the billion dollars and handed it to industry. Let me make it plain that I am not objecting to industry getting something. But I do object to this government talking about buying Canada back and then turning around and handing out millions to American subsidiaries as they have in this budget. I think it is high time they took off the mask and stood revealed for what they are—a government subservient to big business and high finance. They know how to look after their own. The Minister of Finance is smiling. I wish they had given a little more to the oil industry and to the construction industry.

[Mr. Paproski.]

Mr. McKinley: Good old Canadian-owned industry!

Mr. Paproski: Oh, no. The industries that get help from the government are those that come around at election time. That is why the government brought down the so-called reform bill to amend the Elections Act in which, once again, the identity of the big givers to the Liberal party continue to be protected. Is that policy? Was it policy to produce a budget in which there is not one red cent for the ordinary taxpayer?

This government has created a financial mess such as we have not seen in this country for many years. And that is not the only area in which they have muddied the waters of public administration. The present immigration policy is inhumane and uncivilized. I refer in particular to the case of Alicia Wiercioch which was brought to the attention of this House by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). Regrettably, he was not given the necessary consent to move his motion. I say "regrettably" because the department showed lack of humanity and bureaucratic heartlessness which was almost unbelievable. It seemed certain that the House would have taken a more humane course. I am sure that if hon. members had known the facts of the case, their reaction would have been different.

An hon. Member: The minister has given the facts.

Mr. Paproski: If the hon. member who interrupted would like to speak, I would be glad to concede the floor. In the application of immigration laws we are dealing with people, people who have suffered a great deal, people who came to Canada to start a new life. They are freedom-loving people. And Alicia Wiercioch was one of these. It is too late now to help her, but perhaps we can at least give her a decent epitaph. She suffered much in Poland. Separated from her husband and with two small children to worry about, she came here from the unhappiness of life behind the iron curtain hoping to find that freedom to which everyone is entitled.

I hear further interruptions. This is the kind of nonsense we have to take over here when we try to call attention to the case of a woman who committed suicide because she could not stay in Canada. It is a stupid system. As I was saying, she arrived in 1968 and four years later her case was still not disposed of. Are people supposed to starve to death in this country? Why are they not allowed to take a job? We give handouts to people who won't work, and we deport people who want to work. There is something seriously wrong about a policy which grinds out and crushes down humanitarian considerations in a manner almost as brutal and ruthless as is found behind the iron curtain. Alicia Wiercioch was driven to desperation and suicide by the inhumanity of immigration policy and the inability of bureaucrats to visualize her problems in human terms.

When bureaucratic regulations are ruthlessly applied without regard for human values, that is not democracy. Members of this House are responsible to a point because we have allowed the bureaucracy to override human rights. We have allowed our powers as legislators to be taken over. We have allowed human rights to be trampled on. How can we tolerate a system through which a mother of two children, whose only crime was love of freedom and a desire to provide for her family, can be sent a bureaucratic ultimatum telling her she is going to lose her chance for freedom? Is this what democracy has come to mean in Canada?

Alicia Wiercioch is not the only victim. I was brought into the case of a Ukrainian girl in Edmonton who would have suffered immediate imprisonment had she been returned to the Soviet Union. And yet this person, because there was no publicity in the case, was told by the department she would have to return. I was able to get hold of the minister who is a very humane man and understands such problems, and a respite was secured. But the minister cannot handle all these cases.

My information is that many people are being sent quietly back to a living death behind the iron curtain. It is not appropriate that a freedom-loving country should be in the position of acting as a kind of enforcer for the iron curtain. This is not what the Canadian people want; at least, Mr. Speaker, not those Canadians who live in my part of the country. Nor was it ever intended that departmental officials should wield the power of life and death over helpless individuals.

The Immigration Department must be shaken up until the officials who are carrying out policies and making these decisions learn the meaning of humanity. The department has to be put under a full-time minister who will see that not only justice but mercy is applied. No one minister can be responsible for dealing with unemployment, manpower direction and training, unemployment insurance and immigration as well. The present minister has too much on his plate. The entire immigration policy must be re-examined because at present its application is inhuman and heartless. Draftdodgers are greeted with open arms while honest, hardworking people whose only desire is freedom are treated like criminals.

The principle must be accepted in law, particularly in immigration law, that people who are patently and obviously political refugees must be given asylum. Freedom cannot be for ourselves alone. Is it the attitude of the government that those who are seeking immigrant status from eastern Europe are second-class applicants? Will anyone say that immigrants from eastern Europe have not contributed to this country?

We are not going to stand still while this government reshapes this country in its own image and likeness. Seven million Canadians who are neither French nor English cannot go on being ignored. Perhaps we should be known as the silent minority. The government is going to hear from the Poles, Ukrainians, Czechs, Italians, Germans, Dutch and other races in this country, including Chinese and Hindus, who are sick and tired of being treated as though they did not exist.

Freedom cannot be a monopoly of the government or the immigration department. People who come here with a desire to be good Canadians and to work for this country should be given a fair hearing. It is time to scrap the heartless and meaningless points system which has no relation to the real contribution and the real value of people. Half of the members in this House could not qualify under the points system; neither could the majority of officials who are administering it. We do not want any more Alicia Wiercioch cases in this great, freedom-loving country of ours. We do not want people driven to suicide by unfeeling bureaucrats. As far as I am concerned, no single person should be expelled from this country from now on unless and until the case has been brought before the House of Commons, and I ask the government to give that undertaking.

We are elected to represent the people of this nation and to make decisions. I think it is time we took back some of the powers we surrendered to the bureaucrats. I am not asking for explanations from the department because I know what explanations will be forthcoming. I know that this department can produce regulations, memoranda and excuses justifying everything that took place. That is not what we want. We want a change to policies so that they will not treat people like cattle. We are supposed to be a democratic nation and it is time our immigration policies reflected that fact. I hereby give notice that I intend to oppose every case of an individual against whom no criminal charge is pending—I am not talking of extradition cases, because that is a different category—being sent back to prison and to persecution behing the iron curtain.

Immigration is a privilege, not a right; we agree about that. But that does not mean that because people come here to seek admission they give up their rights as human beings. Yet that is the attitude of the department. It has got to come to an end. It has all the appearance of being a device to keep people out rather than to allow them in.

It may be that our complacement and arrogant attitude about immigration can be justified under present circumstances from a purely administrative point of view, but I am convinced that before too long this country will be out in the immigration market begging for people to come to Canada. And when we are, we will need all the goodwill we can get. We are not going about getting this goodwill in the right way. The last time I was in Europe I met a lot of people who complained bitterly about the attitudes and the approaches of our immigration policy. I hope something will be done to correct this.

I think we have got to do more to recognize the existence of young people in this country, not by giving out one-shot handouts, like the LIP program or Opportunities for Youth, but by creating a climate in which young people will see a consistent future for themselves in contributing to the expansion of the country in new fields of research and science, the opening of the north, or new industrial expansion.

There is confusion in the country, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) contributes to it when he goes to western Canada and accuses opposition members of contributing to alienation. He shows he just does not know what he is talking about. To us, Canada means freedom. It does not mean being placed in a little straitjacket designed by the bureaucrats in Ottawa. Nor does it mean accepting cultural programs designed by academics with a kind of hothouse approach that has no relationship to what people are thinking and feeling.

I am tired of hearing people say there is no Canadian culture and no Canadian identity. This is "bull fuzz", to use the kind of language the Prime Minister likes. Canadian identity is strong in western Canada and we do not need anyone to tell us what it is. Culture comes from people, not from some hothouse plant cultivated by government experts in government offices. There is more real Canadian culture in western Canada than in all the government departments and boards in Ottawa. When they learn that, then this government may be on the way to understanding some of the real facts of life in Canada.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight to support the motion which the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) introduced and which reads as follows:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

The minister's budget is realistic, Mr. Speaker. It does not try to be dogmatic nor impose any economic philosophy. It comes to grips with the situation as it exists and deals with it in the most pragmatic way possible.

[English]

The opposition, of course, are saying that the budget is not much of an exercise in the proper management of the economy. I appreciate that it is their role to criticize, to oppose and, if necessary, to obstruct. But I am at a loss to understand the opposition parties when all they do is criticize and never suggest responsible alternatives. They say they have alternatives, but anyone can suggest alternatives and not mention the cost. I mean cost not only in dollars and cents but in the over-all effect of their proposals. All they do is try for the spectacular, the good-looking headline, and for narrow political purposes only.

The Conservative leader speaks of taxing Canadians on a constant dollar. To the ordinary Canadian who reads about this in the newspapers, it might sound pretty good; he might be led to believe that this is a practical approach. But he is not told by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfied) that for this to become a reality taxes will have to be increased each and every year, otherwise the economic power of the federal government will be eroded. Quite a bad thing to say for the leader of a party who advocates the concept of a guaranteed annual income, at a cost so high that he has not finished calculating it yet! Certainly, if he has, he has not told the people of Canada what the cost amounts to.

Neither has the ordinary Canadian been told that such a proposal would disrupt federal-provincial fiscal arrangements and make the estimates required so complex that it might ruin the have-not provinces. Quite a proposal for the leader of a party who is a former premier of a province and who preaches for more flexibility and better relations between the provinces and the federal government!

Nor has the ordinary Canadian been told that if this famous "constant dollar" concept should reduce the impact of the federal government in Canadian fiscal policy, it would mean that the efforts of the past and present to standardize basic social services in the country could not be continued. The role of the federal government as an equalizer would be minimized, as would its role in the field of regional development. Quite a thing to say for a maritimer, who like myself should be sensitive to the need of our area for more federal intervention to improve our standard of living! To impair in any way the strength of the federal government would result in a economic disaster for the eastern provinces.

There is no question in my mind, having thought of the implications of the "constant dollar" concept, that the Leader of the Opposition was sincere when he suggested it, that all he was doing—

Mr. Yewchuk: He is more sincere than you are.

Mr. Breau: If he was sincere, then all I can say is that the Conservative party is bankrupt of ideas.

Mr. Yewchuk: He also knows more about it than you.

Mr. Breau: I wish he did. If he was sincere in leading Canadians to believe that such a concept was consistent and compatible with our political system, then he must be bankrupt of ideas.

Then again we have the New Democratic Party floating from one idea to another during this debate. They are the believers in economic theology who are intellectually and politically isolated in this chamber. The one thing I regret about that party is that they have left the little man. They have forgotten about the disadvantaged, whether in terms of people or in terms of geography. The NDP is now becoming under its new leader—or old, I don't know which—the spokesmen of the bourgeois middle class. They are the proponents of universality in social programs, the supporters of programs which have not closed the gap between the haves and have-nots. I used to have a lot of respect for that party, whose members were often in the past called the social conscience of this chamber. I regret that to save their political skins they have abandoned that role to speak for the high-income labour class which pushes up costs in this country to the detriment of the more than 60 per cent of non-unionized workers, the working poor. And even worse, in respect of economic development policies they are becoming more and more the spokesmen of the Ontario-dominated Canadian business establishment, those who oppose regional development because it hurts their pockets in central Canada and because it creates competition for their products in the slow-growth areas.

How else can one explain the crusade of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) against the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, more specifically, the Regional Development Incentives Act. If they were speaking in any political constituency in the Maritimes or anywhere in eastern Canada, they would not have the guts to speak of such a thing. The truth of the matter is that the NDP believes in government control over everything. They will not admit that this would only perpetuate centralization in Canada. If they were honest in respect of their economic thesis they really would not believe in regional development. More bureaucracy, more control over the economy will only mean more for Ontario, which fortunately for them and unfortunately for the other regions of Canada, has become prosperous with nationalistic politics.

There has been a big change in the NDP. There has been a big change in the leadership of that party. It changed its leadership from one who was once premier of a province which had difficulties to one who is a member of the Toronto establishment. I can see why the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby would buy this but I do not understand how the hon. member for Regina East, who is from a disadvantaged area, could be such a sucker.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the only party which always sticks to the same social philosophy is the Social Credit Party. The only problem is the following: the Créditistes do not yet understand it and I will even add that they never could get anybody to understand it.

However, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about a much more important matter which concerns me more than the opposition parties, namely my constituency and northeastern New Brunswick. Hon. members will recall that last winter, on many occasions, there were demonstrations designed to draw the attention of all Canadians to the economic situation of that area. The federal-provincial FRED agreement has often been mentioned in this connection. That agreement has just been revised and renegotiated by the two levels of government, and it should be signed shortly.

I pointed out repeatedly to the House and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) that there was an almost total lack of flexibility in the administration of the agreement and that the lack of authority in the field contributed to making it more of a program that imposed a certain development to a group of people instead of a real program through which the resources of an area would be grouped, and the government services already there co-ordinated and improved, and above everything else the natural elements of progress taken advantage of in the area. Whether those elements are human, social, economic political or cultural, any development must encompass them all.

This also calls for the full participation of the people, as well as the commitment of every sector of society. I trust the new agreement soon to be signed will offer the people greater opportunities to particiapte in their own development.

I would like this evening, Mr. Speaker, to discuss three particular points concerning the efforts of the federal and provincial governments in northeastern New Brunswick.

I will deal in the first place with the need for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and other federal departments not to be satisfied in my area with the administration of the FRED agreement. A number of other economic sectors in northeastern New Brunswick require the special attention of federal departments. Fisheries are an example. Harbour development for deep-sea fishing in the Lamèque, Shippegan, Caraquet and Lower Caraquet area is another. A more flexible policy, more closely directed to the construction of wharves for off-shore fishing, especially in the Lower Gloucester area, is quite essential. Off-shore fishing today does not only represent a financial contribution for our area, it also has a social aspect.

Transport will not be unduly affected by the FRED agreement, whether it be road building, railway service, or air transport. In fact, northeastern New Brunswick needs a much more rational and attractive policy concerning air transport service. Instead of subsidizing an inefficient service, we should favour the establishment of a jet service which would become profitable if airport facilities were centralized.

The FRED agreement must not either become a way out for the federal departments involved in northeastern New Brunswick.

The second point that I should like to raise is of great concern to me because it is related to a problem which may have nefarious social effects in the future. I am referring to the present political context in New Brunswick, to the political fact that this government has almost no members from northeastern New Brunswick. To this I add the lack of French representation in the provincial civil service. In fact, northeastern New Brunswick has fewer civil servants than the other regions of the province in Fredericton.

Even if we all want a political system more concerned with the establishment of priorities on an economical basis than with decisions of a purely political nature, when the time comes to decide upon programs or the allotment of government funds, one has to be realistic and think that the government will always protect its political interests. It may do so by taking more or less partisan decisions, but nevertheless a government must, if it wants to survive, satisfy its constituting elements.

We must remember that the FRED agreement signed in 1966 has brought to northeastern New Brunswick capital from the provincial government through the Equal Opportunities Program that come into operation on January 1, 1967.

In the same way as the federal equalization concept, this program equalized taxation in New Brunswick, as well as social services. It extended to northeastern New Brunswick services which has been inexistent for the past 100 years and direct results have been improvement of social services to the population, with secondary effects on the economy of the region.

This means that the FRED program, at that time, speeded up and intensified the development initiated by the then provincial government. As I understand it, that is the federal government concept of regional development: the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, together with the Department of Finance, through the equalization scheme, make resources available to provinces in order to intensify their development under a special agreement.

With this new FRED agreement, we have yet to see special efforts on the part of the provincial government, even though its own resources are reinforced by some $100 million from the federal government under the form of equalization payments intended to alleviate the economic problems of northeastern New Brunswick. Without such an injection from the provincial government the FRED agreement will be distorted by a conflicting philosophy about regional development between Ottawa and Fredericton.

The FRED agreement should not be used to pay for any new project of the provincial government in northeastern New Brunswick. It was not so conceived by the federal government and I do not think it should. For the last few years the New Brunswick government not only at the political level but also at the administrative level, has had the habit, for any project in northeastern New Brunswick or as soon as the population exerts pressure to obtain something, of quite carefully looking up the FRED agreement for any available funds to meet those needs.

Clearly it means that the FRED agreement will be used to meet certain provincial expenses which should have been paid by the province anyway. And we should not forget that in addition to its own budget, which New Brunswick allocates in total freedom from federal influence, the province receives some $100 million from the federal government as equalization payments. In my opinion, it would be logical that most of these payments should be channelled toward northeastern New Brunswick because that region needs them most. Otherwise, the economic gap between northeastern New Brunswick and the rest of the province is going to widen instead of closing.

I noted with interest the statement that Premier Hatfield made recently in the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick to the effect that the province would commit itself to spend an additional amount of some $5 million under the FRED agreement. But do these $5 million actually represent an additional payment or the amount that the province expected to spend anyway as compared to what it spends elsewhere? It may well be that the provincial government appropriates $5 million for certain programs but what is the purpose of this if it spends $10 million in another area of the province to meet similar needs?

It is obvious that, over the past few years, no special effort has been made by the provincial government in the Northeastern part of New Brunswick with its own resources. There have been some efforts, but always under the FRED agreement. And I must add that the resources of the provincial government over which it has sole jurisdiction, include $100 millions in equalization payments from the federal government.

Approximately one year ago, the federal government announced a grant of $20 millions to the Province of New Brunswick for the construction of Highway 11, connecting Campbellton to Moncton. It appears that, because of this federal interference in an area of provincial jurisdiction such as highways, the province decided that the Northeastern part had already received its share for the next few years and that it would concentrate its own resources which, as I have said, include approximately $100 millions in equalization payments for the federal government and which are available for road construction in the other regions of New Brunswick. Therefore, I am asking what is the purpose of the federal government intervention in the building of Highway 11 if all it does is to make an expenditure that the province should have made anyway.

It seems to me that the province should have an annual budget of several million dollars for building highways. I feel that on top of the $20 million from the federal government, the province should spend far more than had been allocated in its highway construction estimates for eastern New Brunswick as that area has the worst highways in the province—maybe in the whole country. In fact, it is the area in which the economy makes the building of new highways most essential.

I am most concerned, Mr. Speaker, with the conflict which seems to be developing between the federal government and the province of New Brunswick over the concept of regional development and of the FRED agreement with regard to northeastern New Brunswick. Unless that province uses its own resources, which will be increased through the FRED agreement, the gap between northeastern New Brunswick and the rest of the province is not going to decrease, but rather to become ever wider, for if one excludes from the general budget of that province statutory expenses related to education, welfare and hospitalization, that budget is only going to help develop other areas in New Brunswick.

The third point I want to raise concerns not only New Brunswick but also all provinces which have negociated special agreements with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

• (2100)

I have noticed in New Brunswick that when civil servants speak about development programs which are undertaken by both levels of government, they lack understanding of each other's viewpoint. I speak, of course, of civil servants of the federal governmant and of the provincial government.

I will take as an example the Community Improvement Corporation, called the CIC, an agency of the government of New Brunswick which is responsible for the administration of the northeast New Brunswick FRED agreement. The CIC, under its president Mr. Pat Blanchard, has to be one of the most responsive government organizations of which I have ever heard. Many people have criticized it, perhaps with justification. I also have criticized the CIC in the past. But the lack of results from the northeast agreement is not the fault of those who have administered it. The fault, rather, lies in the agreement itself, its rigidity, the lack of participation and involvement of the local people themselves at the conceptual stage. The fault does not lie with the CIC.

I take the CIC as an example, however, to demonstrate how difficult it is for a group of civil servants of one government to administer a program which involves also a group of civil servants on another level of government 800 or so miles away. The negotiations for the revised northeast agreement have been unnecessarily long because the two negotiating groups were not sufficiently sensitized to each others problems. The CIC civil servant in New Brunswick lives out the problems of northeastern New Brunswick. Most of the time he is born and educated there. But he does not know and does not appreciate how the federal government functions and, therefore, feels frustrated many times when he notes a stumbling block in some of his activities originating in Ottawa.

On the other hand, how does the DREE civil servant know about the way of life in New Brunswick? Sometimes for justifiable reasons, not very much. I have witnessed hundreds of times conflicts between the federal government and the New Brunswick government which had nothing to do with the different politics of the two governments. The conflicts were neither due to difference in philosophy nor to lack of knowledge of the facts, but were merely conflicts of attitude between civil servants. This was not intentional, and often both sides were right.

However, one sometimes does not understand or appreciate what the other is planning or what he is thinking. It is impossible for a CIC civil servant in New Brunswick, for example, to grasp the policy intentions of DREE in northeastern New Brunswick after two, three or even 30 meetings. Even federal civil servants have to work here for many years before they really understand a policy of the federal government. On the other hand, it is impossible for a DREE official to grasp New Brunswick's policies and even less possible for him to appreciate the economic, social or cultural history of New Brunswick after a few visits or meetings in New Brunswick.

It is expedient that DREE implement a program of exchange of civil servants with the provinces with which it engages in special programs of development. Politicians can grasp policies faster because of the close relationship of political parties at all levels in Canada and because it is one's job in politics to continually study new policies and to read about them. However, a civil servant works in a specific field and more often than not it is too limited a field.

DREE officials should temporarily become civil servants of a province, and vice-versa, without a reduction in salary and with the least possible interference in their family lives. I am sure that even if it were done on a voluntary basis, a great number of provincial civil servants would take the opportunity of working with DREE for a period of time; and the same applies to DREE civil servants who would go on probationary work in some of the provinces as temporary provincial civil servants. I am sure that details as to the cost, because of the different salary scales of the different governments, as well as moving expenses could easily be worked out with the provinces.

For both sides, the benefit of such a program would be so huge that the extra expenses for either government would be readily justifiable.

Given the endeavours of this government in regional development, perhaps it would be only reasonable if it assumed the whole cost of such a program. I urge the government,, and especially the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to earnestly study my suggestion and to discuss it with the provinces. Perhaps he could initiate an adequate pilot project in the northeastern area of the province, particularly under the FRED agreement.

An exchange between the officials of his department who were involved in the review of the FRED agreement and officials of the CIC might be quite profitable for those officials themselves and for both governments, and might bring closer together the federal bureaucracy and the citizens of my area.

Moreoever, the result cannot be anything but better understanding between all groups concerned. Federal officials would understand provincial policies and, in turn, provincial officials could better understand and appreciate the federal policies.

I shall therefore conclude by asking the House to pass the motion introduced by the Minister of Finance that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government. As I said a while ago, the budget of the Minister of Finance is realistic and comes to grips with the present situation, and I hope that the House will adopt it.

[English]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the last two speakers on the government side. Each paid some attention to the party of which I am a member in this House. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), if I am not mistaken, referred to us as the party which would give the government control over everything. That was at the start of his speech. At the end of his speech he pleaded that the federal bureaucracy could come closer to the people of his area. I say he had better pray that the two do not get closer to each other.

It's a laugh, Mr. Speaker. It is the ultimate in humour for a member or supporter of the government to harpoon any party in this House for attempting to exercise government control. At the present time, in the Standing Committee on Agriculture we are debating a bill which will permit the government to administer $150 million through the Farm Credit Corporation over a period of years, but the government refuses even to divulge to the committee its latest study of how that money will be spent. Somebody behind the curtain says that it may be because the government doesn't know itself. Let me tell the hon. member for Gloucester, for his edification, that when the government gets that bill bulldozed through this House, as it will in due time, a fair amount of that money will be spent in his province to adjust his farming community to what the bureaucracy in Ottawa think it ought to be. And if he thinks that will be a happy event, he should ask his neighbours in Prince Edward Island what they think of it, because they are the first victims of the whole lousy scheme.

Mr. Breau: I did not refer to that in my speech. You did not listen.

Mr. Gleave: I listened. I can understand English, and when I put on the earphone I can understand the translation from the French. I am literate, Mr. Speaker; I even went to school. As I say, this has to be a big laugh.

The budget gave the biggest plums to big business. The government has created one of the biggest bureaucracies Ottawa has ever seen. When the hon. member talks about some future government creating a bureaucracy, I would point to what Charles Lynch, that enemy of the Liberals, recently wrote:

> The Privy Council Office, which includes the Prime Minister's establishment and represents our equivalent to the White House in Washington—

I think that's a nice touch.

> —goes up from $7.2 million to $10.8 million. This is more than the $6.3 million it costs to operate the Senate, and it is gaining rapidly—

This is what is happening to the present government bureaucracy, yet the hon. member talks about what we might do when we come to power.

An hon. Member: There's no fear of that.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the arrogance which habitually belongs to the Liberals. They think they have the God-given right to rule Canada forever. They have been around for a while, but I don't think they should consider themselves indestructible.

I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is not in the chamber at the moment. If he would like to have an assessment of how the people of western Canada view the budget, I suggest, that he read the Western Producer of May 18. The headline of its editorial was, "Budget ignores the farmer." That is a pretty fair assessment of the budget. It is true that the budget gives something to processors who are the people one step removed from the farmers, but the Western Producer points out that in effect the government is saying that if it gives enough concessions to industry, to the corporations, then all will be well. According to the Western Producer, the government is working on the trickle-down theory, which holds that if you put enough money up top it will trickle down to the people below. That is an old theory, Mr. Speaker. The only trouble with it is that generally it doesn't work.

The Western Producer says that the government would have got a lot more action and generated a lot more employment if it had injected significant amounts of money into the purchasing sector, which includes the farming community. Real purchasing power should have been given to the consumer sector, but instead the government stayed with the idea of giving concessions to the corporations, many of which are not even Canadian. Much of the savings which these corporations will make in reduced taxes on profits will go straight out of the country. In effect we will be subsidizing these companies and the subsidy will be leaving the country completely.

Another provision in the budget deals with accelerated write-offs. It provides a two-year write-off for depreciation on equipment bought for manufacturing or processing goods in Canada. I am a farmer; I have operated a business and I know something about what depreciation means. If someone gave me a two-year write off on the equipment I use on my farm, I would think it was one of the biggest tax breaks I could get. It is the next best thing to getting a hefty cut in your income tax rate.

The ordinary, everyday Canadian is paying for this kind of write-off. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) was crying about the small businessman. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that small businessmen, teachers, professional people, workingmen and their wives, whether they are on salary or hourly rated, and farmers are the people who will pick up the tab for the tax free concessions that are being given to big business. These are the people who will pay. I do not know how the government managed to justify this kind of approach, but I suppose by one means or another they will try to justify it to the people in addition to the concession that they have already given.

• (2120)

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) enunciates policies in this House which are different from the approach he takes on the hustings. For instance, after it had been decided to pay a subsidy on hog production, this is what he said in Quebec when speaking on this question, according to an article in the Western Producer of February 17:

Agriculture will not be able to meet the challenge of the future if it does not become economically independent.

"Like any other industrial sector, it has to operate and will have to operate without subsidies, without outside aid, as a mature organism that has developed its full potential.

"It is becoming less and less acceptable that consumers bear the cost of farmers' deficiencies."

I wonder where the Prime Minister of Canada gets these ideas about the deficiencies of farmers. I wonder how long it took some of his experts to reach the conclusion that "Like any other industrial sector, it has to operate and will have to operate without subsidies, without outside aid . . ." An article in the Toronto Star of June 10 is headed "Logging threatens Quebec's environment". I do not know whether it does or does not, because I am not an expert in that field, but it struck me that in this area concessions have been given to International Telephone and Telegraph Company from both the federal and provincial governments. This article, written by Walter Stewart, reads in part:

As part of the incentive to encourage the deal, Rayonier is receiving $57.3 million in grants and loans from the federal government and the province of Quebec, along with the timber-cutting rights.

Mr. Speaker, $57.3 million from the two levels of government, while the Prime Minister stands in the same province and says that agriculture will be treated like any other industrial sector! I do not know whether the Prime Minister is trying to mislead the people of Canada or whether he does not know any better.

Mr. Benjamin: Both.

Mr. Gleave: It is very hard to tell, at times. The article winds up by taking a very serious view of the whole development. I think hon. members on the other side of the House ought to know the serious view taken by the Western Producer, the spokesman for western agriculture, in respect of this kind of statement. The editorial of February 17 reads:

If, on the other hand, Mr. Trudeau believes what he said in Quebec, and sees it as future policy, all we can say is that February 2 was a bad day for Canadian agriculture, and at the same time a further alienation of the farm community. That, Mr. Trudeau may find, is something that Ottawa Liberals cannot afford.

That is the kind of reaction evoked in western Canada when the Prime Minister makes a speech in Quebec. Today we have television and radio, and so on. It is not like the days of Jimmy Gardiner and Mackenzie King when they could make one speech in Quebec and then go out to Saskatoon and make another. I think the Prime Minister had better realize that the time has come when these speeches are heard right across the country.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if the minister and hon. members on the other side of the House realize the effect that fiscal policies they have been following have on our exports. We can see a decline in the price per bushel of wheat, barley, rapeseed and oats by just following the upward movement of the Canadian dollar. The fiscal policies of this government permit or encourage this increased value of the Canadian dollar, and it will have its effect in one of two ways: it will result in exports being curtailed or it will result in less income in the hands of the individual or company exporting the products whether primary or manufactured. Between May 23 and June 2 the effect of this policy on the price of barley was 1½ cents per bushel. That may not seem much to members across the way, but it means a lot to the man selling the product.

Mr. Speaker, this budget does nothing about foreign ownership. In fact, by reason of tax concessions I suspect that it tends to accelerate rather than retard the pace of takeover of Canadian companies by foreign companies. I found it rather shocking, that a few days ago a committee of this House decided to hold its meeting in camera while it made up its mind who it was safe to hear on the subject so that the Committee would not be unduly influenced. The press was unable to be present at that meeting. The Citizen, in an editorial today, wrote:

> The Commons committee examining the foreign ownership bill was wrong to exclude the press from its first meeting. The action should not be repeated.

In another article on the same page, Charles Wheeler wrote:

> More than half of Canada's manufacturing industry is American-owned, so is the whole of Canada's oil industry, almost all its motor industry, and perhaps most important, virtually the entire means of exploiting Canada's vast reserves of mineral wealth.

Yet this does not appear to concern the government unduly, Mr. Speaker. The article goes on to say: "The process goes on". The proposals which the government bring before the House are not taken seriously by the press of this country. The government of Saskatchewan became concerned, and is concerned about the takeover of land in that province and has taken steps to protect our heritage there.

Land is surely one of our basic resources. For three generations people have homesteaded and developed this land. We want to protect it and make sure it remains the property of Canadians. Our desire shocks and scares to death the cabinet minister for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Land). I suppose that is understandable because his frame of mind is the same as that of his colleagues who want to do nothing about this problem. For a long time I suspected that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt did not know too much about farming: I accept that because his whole education, his training has been in law. I thought he knew something about law, considering that he was dean of the faculty of law at a university.

Mr. McCleave: Not necessarily.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, he has commented on a provincial bill which is not an act. According to my information, this bill must go to committee; it will be examined and changes and alterations may be made to it and its approach. Before this has happened the minister has commented on it. He has said, "Ottawa opposes it." He cannot wait to make his comments. He cannot wait until the clear, sharp outlines of the proposal emerge. He said that although there has been no formal communication with the Saskatchewan government, that government knows how the federal government feels.

The final sentence in the report before me says that the Saskatchewan bill has not been passed. This may be the first time that a minister of the federal government has taken a position on a bill before a province has enacted it into law. I suppose that is understandable in view of the way this government feels about foreign ownership. Apparently it welcomes it and hopes it will move in and take over larger chunks of our land and resources. The Minister of Justice said in the House, as reported at page 2353 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the bill has indeed been brought to my attention and I have sought comment on its constitutional validity. Although it is only in the bill stage, it does seem to me that if it is not unconstitutional it ought to be.

I am surprised that the minister at this stage should seek a ruling. Apparently he himself has already made one. If this government displayed half as much zeal in finding ways and means to protect the interest of Canadians so that at the end of this generation or perhaps the next Canadians could be assured that they would be master in their own house, it would be worth while.

I am not talking about our owning every tree in this country, every bit of beach, every bit of shore and every bit of cultivated land; I am talking about steps which are necessary and will make Canadians confident that they will be master in their own house. Let the government do that instead of, as it has to this time, running around and letting out screams of frustration and rage because a province is concerned and wants to protect its own resources. This concern is not peculiar to Saskatchewan. The government of Alberta is moving to protect Crown lands there. Prince Edward Island is concerned, Nova Scotia is concerned and Ontario is becoming concerned.

I wonder when the federal government will become concerned. If the minister I have referred to, or any of his cohorts think they can go to Saskatchewan in the next election and use this negative approach to carry them to victory, they will be the most disillusioned men who ever ran for office. The people of Saskatchewan know what is important and they have not forgotten the antics of men like Gardiner and Mackenzie King who tried to make all sorts of deals.

Before it is too late, let the present government take concrete action and make sure that the economy can provide for our people that well-being, material and spiritual, which it is capable of providing. The government is wrong when it says, "We must have so many jobs; let us leave it to the private sector to provide them." The hon. member for Fraser Valley East said we ought to be realistic. I am realistic. I do not expect private enterprise or business to act like a sugar-daddy. As a farmer, I do not behave like a sugar-daddy: I run a farm; I produce as well as I can and make as much as I can for myself and my family. If someone were to come along and say, "We want you to hire three more men," I would wonder who would pay them.

Let us be realists; let us be practical. It is not right to ask private industry to behave like a sugar-daddy. It is not right to put this load on private industry and say to it six months or one year from now, "You did not provide the jobs we need, therefore we are going to clobber you." This is the implication left by the government. Doing this job is the government's responsibility; it must not load somebody else with that task.

When government persists in acting in that fashion it abdicates some of its responsibilities. It is for the government to administer the financial and fiscal policies of this country. It must not turn its responsibility over to the private banks and then scourge them because they charge too much interest. It is up to the government to control interest rates in this country. That is their responsibility, and they are not discharging it. I think the members in my part of the House are realists. We know that Adam Smith is buried. I sometimes think those on the other side of the House still think he is walking around.

[Translation]

Mr. T. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, for a number of reasons I am glad to take part in this debate. The first of those reasons is that I wish to congratulate the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), a young, active and devoted minister, who has proved that he could present a budget both sensible and serious, worthy of an excellent administrator.

Mr. Speaker, this debate also gives me an opportunity to list the priorities which must apply to the citizens of my constituency, and which in my opinion most of the citizens of Pontiac would support unanimously.

And when I talk about priorities, I do know what I am talking about because I came to know them through a questionnaire which I recently sent to all the families of my constituency.

The third question of that poll was the following:

What are the major problems facing Canada today?

And the 900 answers received from all parts of this vast constituency, comprising 60 municipalities in the three provincial ridings of Pontiac, Gatineau and Labelle, all pointed out to the following problems:

1. Unemployment.
2. Roads.
3. No industries.
4. No jobs.
5. Social welfare.

It is therefore very easy to see that people are asking for jobs and an increased industrial development.

I agree with them and support their requests. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am always available to those who are interested in industry in my riding. Whenever, in my office here in this building, or at home over the week-end, I meet with any officials of companies anxious to settle in my area, I do so with tremendous interest and in the hope that the action I am taking will result in creating the jobs that are so badly needed.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is extremely important to us, and I am very happy to thank its officials for having always given me their co-operation by accepting to meet with the businessmen who are looking for information on the grants available to industry in designated areas such as mine.

Unfortunately, applications for grants are not always accepted; but to this day several have been approved and several others are under consideration. We must not give up, and this is why I go on making representations to promote industrial development in my constituency.

Mr. Speaker, the House is certainly aware that the area which I represent went through a difficult period recently. I should like to emphasize something which has not received the attention it deserved, namely, the role of the ordinary citizen in my constituency. Every time a problem arises, be it floods in Fort Coulonge or its vicinity, or the closing down of plants in Maniwaki or Mont Laurier, the people of these communities are always ready to contribute their share in seeking solutions by joining in with study groups and task forces that are set up to deal with these problems.

I wish to commend the people in my constituency who have joined these citizens committees. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that a committee representing all our social classes can help in a concrete way to find solutions to the problems which concern us all.

[English]

There is no doubt that the Local Initiatives Program put forward by this government last winter has been an outstanding success nationally and locally in my own constituency. No less than $1,600,000 in projects was approved, creating approximately 1,000 jobs in 25 different municipalities in the constituency of Pontiac. There were, of course, many more good projects which unfortunately were not approved due to budget limitations. However, the over-all results were excellent, and I ask that the cabinet members consider seriously that this program be continued next year with even more funds allocated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lefebvre: We often hear that too many unemployed persons are not willing to work. In so far as my constituency is concerned, that statement is very much untrue. I spoke to many of the project leaders and asked if they had encountered difficulties in finding personnel for their projects. In almost every case I was informed that the unemployed, when approached, were eager and willing to work.

Mr. Alexander: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says there is a right not to work.

Mr. Lefebvre: I am talking about those who are willing to work. I am talking about residents in my constituency who have proven that the often heard statement that unemployed people are not willing to work is very much untrue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lefebvre: I have visited many of these projects and have been amazed at the ingenuity of the promoters. There were a wide variety of projects, including the rebuilding of the old, historic wooden bridge in Mansfield township near Fort Coulonge, the one at Grand Remous, a handcraft centre at Maniwaki, an arena and swimming pool at Mont Laurier, many community halls and recreational projects such as snowmobile trails and day care centres.

The project in Shawville is also very interesting because it secured for this municipality the ownership of a fine old building which formerly housed the post office. When the postal department vacated the old building I was happy to co-operate with the Shawville council in contacting the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. As a result, the building was sold to the village of Shawville at a very reasonable price. Through a Local Initiatives Program grant, the council made a complete renovation of the building to accommodate the municipal offices, a meeting room and a public library. Further to this, an Opportunities for Youth grant was approved for a group of students from the area who wish to make a complete history of the district, and this will be housed in the new library.

These are some of the reasons I am a firm believer in this type of program. They involve the citizens of this country from coast to coast. This government deserves congratulation for its innovation and planning of these programs, including the highly successful Opportunities for Youth program. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country asked for government by participation, he got it. I am proud to serve with him and I hope we continue in this vein. There is a wealth of knowledge and skill in my constituency, and these programs have proved it. The people like government by participation and they want it to continue.

There have been many notable achievements in the past four years both on a national and a constituency level. We cannot rest on our laurels, however, and we, the members supporting this government, must continue our efforts on behalf of all Canadians. The new budget will result in increased pensions for our aged citizens in need of extra financial help and to other groups in need. Also of great importance is the fact that the measures announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will instil new confidence into the business community, resulting in more and more jobs for Canadians.

The region I represent possesses great potential, especially in the tourist industry. Everyone knows, of course, of the skiing facilities in the Wakefield area of the Gatineau Hills which attract thousands of tourists all winter. The new development at Mont Ste. Marie is also becoming another major winter recreational facility. The federal government, through the National Capital Commission, has been involved for many years in the tourist industry through its continued development of Gatineau Park where many of my constituents have found employment. Leslie Park, a new development in the Otter Lake area, will also help bring many more tourists into Pontiac. There is also the well known provincial park, La Vérendrye, which is continually improving its facilities and attracting increasing numbers of visitors. All these facilities are becoming year-round attractions and will eventually provide continuous employment for an ever growing number of people.

Pontiac is one of the few unspoiled areas in eastern Canada readily accessible to major urban population centres. The development of Pontiac industrially must take place bearing in mind that our lakes, forests and streams must remain unpolluted, in which case the tourist industry also can develop bringing in thousands of visitors and creating jobs for our citizens. I have been in contact with NCC officials regarding the possibility of making part of that property in my constituency available to the Ottawa Zoological Society for the establishment of a zoo. Mr. Fullerton, the chairman of the NCC, replied to my letter informing me that this is to be done and brought to the attention of the persons responsible for choosing the site of this zoo. If such a facility were established in Pontiac, the development brought about in a wide area surrounding it would be fantastic.

Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Parliament since 1965 I have learned increasingly to understand the problems of my constituents, working with them and for them. I have also learned to appreciate their suggestions and ideas, and together we have found solutions to some of these problems. In my opinion, this is the ideal way, the team work way. The citizens of Pontiac have ideas, aspirations and knowledge. They want their government and their representative to listen. This, I believe, has been done.

Another interesting project in which I have been involved is the effort to obtain recognition of old Fort William as a national historic site. This area of Pontiac county is rich in the history of the fur trading years, and I believe official recognition is deserved. The officials of the National Historic Sites and Monuments Board have replied to my letters informing me that they are at present studying the request. This area is not only of historical significance but it is one of the most beautiful along the Ottawa River. Its magnificent sand beach and towering pine trees could be developed into an outstanding tourist attraction. As far as I know, there are no official national historic sites in Pontiac, and I believe this one would be a natural choice as number one.

[Translation]

As I mentioned at the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, there were many problems in my constituency when I was elected for the first time and problems still exist. But the Pontiac citizens are aware of the tremendous efforts made by this federal government and their Member of Parliament in order to find a solution to those problems. I have always believed, Mr. Speaker, that a Member of Parliament must first of all serve his electors, that is why I keep travelling from one end of my constituency to the other so as to meet as many people as possible and offer to help them.

We have certainly improved the lot of Canadians since 1968, Mr. Speaker, the federal government's record with regard to the social measures that have been passed is very impressive.

When I was very young, Mr. Speaker, our parish priest used to say that paradise on earth does not exist, only in heaven will we find paradise. I often think of those words when I listen to members of other parties who are always criticizing and making unrealizable election promises.

The Canadian people are very well informed; they want a strong, realistic, responsible government, a government truly representative of the Canadian people, as the present government is.

Mr. Speaker, a political party which really wants to govern in a responsible manner must introduce measures for all Canadians: senior citizens, both young and not so young people, citizens from both rural and urban areas, members of both the working and the professional classes.

It is very important that we members of this House pass legislation designed to improve living conditions for all Canadians.

We must also take into account the fact that the budget of the Canadian government is that of all taxpayers, and that all citizens have to pay their share of it. A responsible government mustt bring down a realistic budget taking its priorities into consideration as well as all of the government expenditures. In my opinion, the present budget meets these criteria and most Canadians will endorse it.

• (2200)

In closing, I should like to emphasize the importance to my constituency of Bill C-5, an act to amend the Farm Credit Act, which would make it possible for the Farm Credit Corporation to make loans to facilitate the efficient operation of a farm rather than being tied to the more rigid rules laid down by the present act under which it must be proven necessary to operate the farm. There are many good farms in Pontiac. Some of the best dairy farms in eastern Canada are in operation there, and beef producers are also becoming increasingly important. I know some farmers who are rapidly approaching the age of retirement. They need an opportunity to secure loans so that younger men can take over.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has also stirred up interest by his recent statements about helping family farms so that the owner can enlarge his holdings or retire if he prefers. I am sure this legislation could bring benefit to my area, one in which farming is among the most important industries. Those engaged in it are honest, industrious and experienced. There are young men willing to take over if the opportunity is given them for a fair deal, which is all we are looking for.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL PARKS—LAKE LOUISE PROJECT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POSITION FOLLOWING PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on May 31 I questioned the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) on several points arising from the proposed village Lake Louise project.

[Mr. Lefebvre.]

Other questions have been asked in the House concerning this proposal. A public hearing has been held at which the views of various organizations and individuals were heard and recorded. To date, however, the minister has avoided giving any indication as to the government's decision with regard to the proposed village Lake Louise project.

At the outset I must say I am totally opposed to this type of commercial enterprise being allowed in our national parks. I am amazed that our national parks branch would even consider such a proposal. I am also amazed and upset that the minister in charge of our national parks system has not indicated his opposition to this type of commercialization which is entirely out of keeping with national parks objectives. It is almost unbelievable to think that any consideration would be given by the minister to a foreign-owned corporation, in this case Imperial Oil Limited, obtaining a foothold in our national parks system.

In October 1968 the minister made the following statement in a speech to the Canadian National Parks conference:

> Our national parks are special places. They are dedicated, not to providing artificial sources of recreation and entertainment, but to preserving, for the benefit of present and future generations, significant natural features of our national heritage. They do not meet the over-all need for outdoor recreation space and they should not attempt to do so.
> To do so would be to neglect the essential purpose of our present national park system—that is, the need to preserve parts of our environment in a natural, unspoiled state.

I endorse that statement, Mr. Speaker, and it certainly runs counter to the proposed building of the village Lake Louise project in Banff national park. We do not need the urbanization of our national parks, for this is what we are trying to avoid in park development. Our citizens should be able to enjoy the natural beauties of our parks without turning them into Coney Islands.

If we give way to the proposed commercialized project called village Lake Louise, then the very objectives and principles laid down for the preservation of part of our Canadian heritage for all time will be destroyed. It will be the start of a series of commercialized projects throughout our parks system. It should be stopped now. Let us at least give preference to quality of life and of the environment over the almighty dollar as far as our national parks system is concerned.

It is surprising that no thorough ecological impact study has been done by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development prior to the announcement of this proposal. To my knowledge these studies have never been made, yet they should be a requirement, especially for a project of this kind. Again, it is disturbing to think that those in control have ignored this very important aspect of conservation. This information is required before any consideration should be given to approval of the project. To my knowledge this survey has not been made. And if it has been made, it certainly was not made public at the hearings held several months ago.

I might point out that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been rather lax, not only so far as our national parks' system is concerned but also in having adequate ecological studies made, for example in the James Bay and Arctic areas. We have seen a watering down of land use permits in the north. This indicates to me that the department is more interested in the almighty dollar than in preserving the ecological balance in any part of the Canadian terrain.

I do not have much time left, Mr. Speaker, but in closing I should like to point out that Canadians generally would like to see a sharp extension of our national parks system. They would like to see more national parks spread throughout Canada. There are still several provinces without a sufficient number of national parks which would really protect the heritage of these provinces and of Canada.

But to return to the subject of village Lake Louise, we are not opposed to commercial enterprises of this nature being set up outside the park boundaries. There are many opportunities for those who wish to invest several million dollars in a topnotch ski project. This is where such a project should be built. Let us retain 100 per cent Canadian ownership of our park resources particularly insofar as village Lake Louise and Banff national park are concerned. Imperial Oil Limited, a foreign owned corporation, must be stopped from investing in this project.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the hon. member say he is in favour of a sharp extension in our national parks' system. The only thing he failed to say and to recognize is that in the past four years more national parks have been established in Canada than in the previous 50 years. We now have parks in every province and territory in Canada. Until this government came into power there were a number of provinces and territories which did not have national parks. I think a great deal of credit is due to the minister for this very sharp extension to our national parks system.

The hon. member, in his question of May 31, referred to evaluation of material gathered at the recent public hearings in respect of Lake Louise. I wish to deal with that aspect of his question. He went into the whole Lake Louise proposal. I could speak for a long time on that subject but I want to deal only with the matter he raised on May 31. The public hearing on proposals for the Lake Louise areas was the largest held to date in the series of public hearings that the national parks branch has held on national parks in Canada. We received 2,118 registered briefs plus more than 500 letters and other submissions which arrived after the deadline for official briefs. Including the transcript of presentations by 191 speakers at Calgary, the submissions and recommendations by the public total approximately 5,500 pages. This is a tremendous volume of material to review. However, we have assigned additional staff to the task of initial analysis, and the minister will soon be in a position to consider summaries and recommendations on some of the major issues.

As the minister stated on May 31, he still hopes to be able to inform the House before the summer recess of the government's decision. However, he wants to ensure that adequate consideration is given to the many reasoned and well documented submissions which were made by the public, including the recent views of the government of Alberta. I also want to point out that while many individuals and organizations adopted a simple yes or no position on the proposals, others argued in favour of a variety of modifications. Our decision is not a simple one because some future course of action must be charted for the total Lake Louise area and there is a great range of alternatives to consider.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—OFFER OF GOOD OFFICES BY UNITED NATIONS SECRETARY GENERAL RESPECTING VIET NAM WAR—CANADIAN POSITION—REPRESENTATION TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on April 25 I asked the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) the following question:

> In light of the initiative taken by the Secretary General of the United Nations in making available his good offices in the settlement of the regrettably escalating conflict in Viet Nam, can the minister advise the House whether the Canadian government was consulted on this matter and whether it is lending its support and encouragement to the Secretary General in his efforts toward bringing to an end this tragic and long continued conflict and, if so, have the views of this government been conveyed to the government of the United States?

Whereupon I received the usual answer given to spokesmen of this party when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) said:

> I will take notice of that question on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since then I have heard nothing of Canadian consultation or extension of good offices or good wishes. There are times when in this withdrawal phase of foreign policy there seems to be a determination on the part of the government to substitute wilful blindness for involvement or concern in ticklish international affairs and episodes. While, naturally, we can find many reasons for a comfortable detachment from the Viet Nam conflict, we cannot really insulate ourselves from its outfall both potential and actual. What this long-sustained war is doing to our most powerful ally and its world role cannot be brushed aside or ignored. Viet Nam has become a horrible albatross around the American neck, a grievous burden and an issue painfully divisive of the American body politic.

At the time the Secretary General made his offer there was widespread anxiety that a sharp and dangerous new level of escalation had been reached. The action of the President of the United States in ordering the new bombing of the north and blockades of the harbour of Haiphong was a dangerous move. So was the escalation of the ground fighting ordered and executed by the North Vietnamese. This regrettably came at a time when there at least seemed some reasonable prospect of the conflict winding down. Nor can we say that there is not still a grave and serious danger: as late as today the ominous rumble of thunder out of China could be heard.

While I fervently wish to see the United States disengage completely from its debilitating and painful role in Viet Nam, I do not belong to those who rail at the American role and cast upon Washington the full load of blame and responsibility. Others are fishing in troubled waters and the people of both Viet Nams continue to suffer and die. But the war cannot go on for one bruised and bitter year after another. The awful suffering and terror must end. Therefore, we should welcome the proffered initiative of Secretary General Waldheim. We should welcome, too, any conciliatory moves among the great powers.

For this reason I believe we should all welcome the fact that the recent escalation did not prevent the President from carrying out what was seemingly a very useful series of meetings in the Soviet Union. No one believes that summitry is the answer to all our ills or the balm of all international tensions. Yet the over-all result of the American-Russian and the Sino-American meetings cannot be anything but beneficial in a day and age when reduction of world tension is an absolute essential.

I think the time has come, too, for us to look carefully at our ICC role. If there is nothing that can be done, there is nothing to be gained by retaining the pretence of value. In this area a move by the British and Russian co-chairmen for another general conference on IndoChina might be useful. But there seems to be reason for pessimism in this connection. The reasons are well known.

In this difficult and painful problem I assure the government that any useful effort it attempts toward peace will have the hearty and sympathetic support of the official opposition. I should also say that we must retain a distance between encouragement and disillusionment. Without that, we cannot proceed to any useful role in this tangled, painful and difficult international episode.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are undoubtedly aware, the difficulty affecting the possible involvement of the United Nations in the Indo China situation continues to be that neither of the parties most directly concerned, South Viet Nam and North Viet Nam, is a member of the world body, and North Viet Nam and its allies have always vigorously denied the authority of the United Nations to discuss the war in Viet Nam.

The new Secretary General of the United Nations is convinced, however, and the Canadian government shares his view, that this regrettable conflict can and should only be solved through negotiations. It was in this spirit that I understand Mr. Waldheim offered the good offices of the United Nations to all the parties concerned, on condition that all the parties concerned agreed to it. Unfortunately, as the Secretary General reported in an interview a few weeks ago, none of the parties gave any clear response to his offer.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) indicated in the House on April 26, Canada would be willing to co-operate with the Secretary General in any way that might be useful in order to promote the peaceful resolution of the Viet Nam conflict through negotiations. However, the question of whether an offer of good offices, including that made by the Secretary General, will be successful depends on whether the various parties agree to negotiations and are prepared to discuss the issues. Of course, a form for negotiations already exists in the Paris conference on Viet Nam where both public and secret talks have been held. We have favoured the return of the parties to the Paris conference but negotiations cannot be forced on them.

As has been said in the House before, there must be disposition to negotiate and there must be disposition to agree. As soon as there is any hope in this respect there may then be an opening for Canada or for the United Nations to make a helpful contribution. I can assure the House that in the meantime the Canadian government will persist in its efforts to promote the resolution of the conflict through negotiation.

YOUTH—OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REJECTED APPLICATIONS—RESULTS OF SOLICITATION OF COMPANIES TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on May 31 I put a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) regarding the Opportunities for Youth program. I asked:

In view of the fact that the government has had a team calling on businessmen during the month of May to solicit private support for the opportunities for youth project applications turned down by the government, would the minister inform the House when he will publish the list of corporations that have agreed to participate in this plan?

At that time the minister said he would consider it, but he regretted to inform me that the list was not a long one. Today or yesterday I read an article, I believe in the Ottawa Citizen, which reported that a spokesman in the minister's department had said two companies had agreed to participate in picking up project applications. I cannot believe that there can only be two such companies, so I decided to raise the matter on the "late show" tonight. I believe the minister must be more successful than that. Also, today I noticed a report in the paper that Opportunities for Youth officials in Regina had talked to businessmen there, trying to encourage them to pick up Opportunities for Youth programs that had been turned down by the government.

Tonight I want to know more about this program, how many companies have agreed to participate in it, how many projects they have picked up and how many people will be employed. I would also like to know about the team that is going out to solicit support from corporations. How much is the department spending on this team and how many people are participating in it?

I think that in general the Opportunities for Youth program is basically and essentially a good idea. It is an idea that allows students to participate in creating something that they think is useful. But I do have many concerns about it. One of the chief concerns I have is shared by some hon. members opposite as pointed out, I believe, in the Cohen report that was commissioned by the department. It said that last year most of the emphasis was placed on middle-class students, that most of the jobs went to those who could afford to go to university without student jobs, that these students were wealthy enough and could get by without Opportunities for Youth grants.

This is one of the criticisms of the program. It is very middle-class oriented. This is something the government should try to correct. For that reason I have suggested that an Opportunities for Youth or similar program should be started for non-student young people so that the young unemployed, the young workers, the young farmers could take advantage of such a program. This is one of the recommendations the government should act upon if it is to make this program really relevant and meaningful to our young people.

I believe that in this year's Opportunities for Youth program only about 9 per cent of the participants are non-students. The rest are students. I suggest that this is a serious oversight. Also, the Opportunities for Youth program, in the way it is set up today, is a very short-term solution. Maybe it should be a continuing thing. The Opportunities for Youth program in many ways, for many young people is partly what they would call tokenism.

• (2220)

I would be glad if the parliamentary secretary would tell us what is going to happen to our university graduates. I noticed in the latest edition of the Financial Times an article which said that a lot of university students coming on the labour market this year are unable to find jobs. In 1965, corporations and companies were asking students to work for them, but now we find the reverse to be true and students cannot find jobs. The University of Toronto predicts that 25 per cent of the graduates will not be able to find employment, this despite the fact that many graduates will go back to university to continue their education.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to elaborate on this part of the Opportunities for Youth program. How many companies are participating, how successful are they and what are the plans to approach large corporations?

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has posed a number of questions but as we all know, I am restricted under Standing Orders to three minutes. Therefore I will attempt to deal with the major question, liaison with the private sector under the auspices of OFY.

The hon. member will appreciate that our liaison with the private sector to encourage participation in Opportunities for Youth-type projects has necessarily been experimental. Our efforts to date have established three avenues of possible involvement by the private sector in this new employment style: one, shared-coast programs on projects of an entrepreneurial nature; two, referral of submitted OFY projects for complete funding by the private sector; and three, development of OFY-type programs by the private sector.

Both Shell Canada Ltd. and John Labatt Ltd. are participating in the shared-cost projects to create 39 jobs at a total cost of $18,500 to the government and $50,000 to the private sector. An example of this approach is a project in Victoria, British Columbia, to produce toys and playground materials specially adapted for use by exceptional children. Using $20,000 and donated materials, this project will supply hospitals and institutions with equipment valued at close to $100,000 and is viewed as a pilot operation for the possible development of a new industry for the Island.

John Labatt Ltd. is also experimenting with funding projects, which are referred to them by OFY, entirely by themselves. At a cost of $15,000 they have funded a project submitted by students of the University of Toronto business school to do management consulting for small businesses in the city. Finally, many companies have expressed interest in developing OFY-type programs within their own organizations. To date, only Dominion Textiles have done so, creating 28 project-oriented jobs filled by student applicants, at a cost of $40,000.

Thus our liaison with the private sector to date has created approximately 70 jobs with $125,000 committed by business. I must emphasize that each of the projects is highly experimental and is being closely followed by others in the private sector. We feel that the success of these initial projects will encourage others with whom we are presently consulting to participate themselves.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG THOSE UNDER AGE OF 25—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Although young people constitute roughly a quarter of the labour force, figures released today reveal that 48.7 per cent, or almost half the number of unemployed Canadians, are under the age of 25, indicating a six percentage point increase in youth unemployment over the previous month involving some 269,000 young people who cannot find work. Therefore under Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley):

That this House

(1) direct the Minister of Manpower and the Secretary of State to review immediately special employment programs of their departments with a view to achieving interim expansion and maximum effectiveness;

(2) require the interdepartmental committee responsible for youth employment policies to appear before an appropriate committee of the House;

(3) urge the government to arrange a special consultation with the provinces and industry to develop immediate and long-term programs to meet this grave national crisis.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The hon. member's motion cannot be put.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since it has been some months since this interdepartmental committee was supposedly established, I wonder whether the Prime Minister or the government House leader could indicate when there will be a statement with respect to the progress made by this committee?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order.

WELFARE

REIMBURSEMENT OF PROVINCES FOR PAYMENTS UNTIL UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CHEQUES RECEIVED—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which has come about as a result of the provinces and municipalities having to pay several million dollars for welfare last winter because of the delays in the issuance of unemployment insurance cheques. Further, no arrangement has been made between most of the provinces and the federal government for the reimbursement of this money. I believe that the province of Ontario has spent some $3 million of which $1½ million should be repaid. Accordingly I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

• (1410)

That this House urges the Treasury Board to direct the Auditor General of Canada, pursuant to section 62 of the Financial Administration Act, to inquire into and report to the House upon the failure of the government to pay back to the provinces and municipalities the millions of dollars paid out by them during the winter in welfare payments and administration costs due to default of the government and the Unemployment Insurance Commission; and further to inquire into and report upon the failure of the government to offer arrangements, suitable to all the provinces, with regard to the assignment of unemployment insurance cheques in future and similar circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SOLICITOR GENERAL BILL

MEASURE RESPECTING CORRECTIONAL SERVICE PROGRAM

On the order: Introduction of Bills.

June 2, 1972—Mr. Howard (Skeena)—Bill intitled: An Act respecting the Department of the Solicitor General (correctional services program).

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, having found a procedurally correct way to cut out the fat in government I wonder whether I may have permission to withdraw this bill?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LATEST UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the unemployment figures released today which show the utter failure of government programs to improve the situation and which require the immediate introduction of new policies and programs to create jobs if the situation is not to become more desperate, particularly for our young people, in the months and years ahead.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South has served the necessary notice required under Standing Order 26. This has given me an opportunity to consider the several procedural aspects of the matter which the hon. member feels should be brought forward by way of a debate under this rule.

There is no doubt that the question proposed for consideration by the hon. member is of major concern to the members of the House and to the country at large. The Chair, however, has to make a ruling in terms of the procedural acceptability of the proposed topic in relation to the requirements of Standing Order 26. In passing it should be noted that the question proposed by the hon. member for York South has been before the House on a number of occasions during the current session. I would refer the House to one such occasion which occurred when the hon. member for York South moved a sub-amendment to the address debate on February 18, 1972.

My main reason, however, for being unable to find that this is an appropriate subject for an emergency debate at this time lies in the specific requirements of Standing Order 26 itself. As hon. members know, in determining the matter of urgent consideration the Chair must under section 5, take into account the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable time by other means. Today is June 13. During the current supply period there are 14 sitting days. Of those 14 days, under the Standing Orders there still remain seven days to be allotted to the business of supply and there remains also the final day of the budget debate today. Therefore, between now and the conclusion of the current supply period more than half of the time available to the House must be ordered for debate on topics to be brought to our attention by hon. members. That being the case, it would seem that there will be ample opportunity for this important matter, and others, to be dealt with. For these reasons the Chair cannot entertain the proposed motion of the hon. member for York South.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—ADDITIONAL MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM IN LIGHT OF LATEST FIGURES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of the shocking unemployment figures issued today by Statistics Canada. In light of these figures is the minister considering any new measures other than those proposed in his budget which he presented to the House early in May? In particular, instead of allowing the income tax to increase on January 1 is he considering some reduction in income tax, and is he also considering some inducements to investment which would be more meaningful in the formation of new companies, thus bringing more employment through investment in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the budget address which I made to the House on May 8 I warned that there would be monthly variations in the figures. I have been appraising the figures for this month. I am not happy with those figures, but wish to state to the House that I see no reason to change the basic view I then expressed. The economy is in an expansionary phase. It is strong and growing, and this has been reflected in the report of Statistics Canada which stated that there were 260,000 new jobs between April and May.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister is aware that this is only the normal increase in employment between those two months. Now that he has had his present responsibilities for several months, may I ask whether he tolerates the present level of unemployment because of his concern with inflation? Is that why the minister tolerates this level of unemployment?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition heard me on the first occasion I had the opportunity to speak in the House as Minister of Finance, and again in the budget debate, when I said that my No. 1 priority was jobs. That remains the No. 1 priority.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister has the answer. In view of the vast number of unemployed with nearly 50 per cent being under the age of 25, representing some 269,000 people or nearly 11 per cent of the total number of Canadians in the work force, is the Prime Minister going to propose any new programs or any expansion of existing programs in light of this alarming social phenomenon, or does the Prime Minister know of enough unfilled jobs which can meet this need?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the Leader of the Opposition is asking me the same question that he asked the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Baldwin: To which he did not get an answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Let's get Ben back.

UNEMPLOYMENT—NEW POLICIES TO PROVIDE JOBS NEXT FALL AND WINTER—PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE THIS SUMMER

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a supplementary question, but perhaps it would be fair if I were to suggest that Your Honour could consider it my main question. In view of the inevitable time lag which always occurs between the planning for jobs and the investing which is undertaken in order to create jobs eventually, and in view of the underlying trend which has kept the unemployment rate at about 6 per cent or over for 24 consecutive months, are the Minister of Finance and the government considering additional policies to be introduced immediately in the hope that they will produce jobs next fall and winter so as to reduce the level of unemployment?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am confident that that very concept of a time lag between the institution of an economic policy and the results, a time lag which I think has been underestimated in the past by economists, will now work in favour of the country, because the expansionary policy of the government and the expansion of the economy have now been operating for a sufficient length of time that we should soon feel the results.

Mr. Lewis: Is the minister so complacent about the situation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot preface a question that way. Perhaps he might ask the question directly.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, this is so serious a subject and the minister's—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: —answers are so irating that I think the comment was justified. In view of the obvious and utter failure of the government's policies and programs such as Opportunities for Youth, LIP and so on to have any affect on the level of unemployment in this country, may I ask whether any new policies are being prepared at least to meet the needs of our young people this summer so that their discouragement and frustration may be somewhat alleviated?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that he has no monopoly on concern for the unemployed of this country.

Mr. Lewis: Then show some.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have directed my attention primarily to that subject. I will not be satisfied until the expansion of the economy is reflected not only in higher employment, which is already the case in the number of new jobs, but in an appreciable reduction in the number of unemployed.

• (1420)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I then ask the minister this question. In view of the fact that the policies to date have not had the effect of reducing the seasonally adjusted numbers of unemployed, in view of the fact that the growth in the labour force has been a constant factor for many months, indeed, for some years, and, finally, in view of the fact that today is the last day of the budget debate, is the minister at last prepared to reconsider his policies and introduce today an over-all substantial personal income tax cut for the lower and middle-income groups in Canada so that aggregate demand may be increased immediately and the economy stimulated adequately?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I stand behind the budget policies and I assure the hon. member I have confidence that they will be justified.

SUGGESTED REPEGGING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR TO INCREASE EXPORTS AND CREATE JOBS

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister give consideration to repegging the Canadian dollar so as to expand our manufacturing complex and therefore expand the export market which would create more jobs?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the suggestion of the hon. member would have the result that he seeks. The Canadian government has decided to maintain the floating dollar until the international monetary situation stabilizes sufficiently.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT AND DECISIONS OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Inasmuch as almost one year ago the Prime Minister indicated that the government was alarmed at the growing and continuing numbers of unemployed young people, and in view of the fact that some time ago he indicated there had been established an interdepartmental committee to look at the whole question of youth employment policies, can the Prime Minister indicate whether that committee will be reporting shortly or whether it has arrived at any specific decisions with regard to this very serious situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to which committee the hon. member is referring. I would have to look up the reference he has suggested. Obviously the government has taken steps with regard to young people in our employment programs. It is as a result of government initiative that we have the Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives Programs.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUGGESTED ACCEPTANCE OF REJECTED OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROJECTS TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): With regard to these various programs and the actual increase in youth unemployment that took place during the past month, will the Prime Minister and the government give consideration to reviewing their policies again with regard to the Opportunities for Youth program in view of the fact that so many projects were not accepted which might be immediately funded in order to stimulate a certain amount of increased youth employment where it is so desperately needed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his constructive suggestion. The government is considering these matters all the time.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED CHANGING OF ADVISERS TO MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that government policy in the field of employment in this country has for some years rested on the advice of certain individuals in the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance, does the minister have any plans to change his advisers?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have confidence in the men and women who advise me. If there are to be any changes, I would certainly want to discuss them with the hon. member.

WELFARE

REIMBURSEMENT OF PROVINCES FOR PAYMENTS UNTIL UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CHEQUES RECEIVED

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister on the basis of the motion under Standing Order 43 moved by me earlier this afternoon. Why has the federal government not attempted to reimburse the provinces and municipalities which expended certain moneys for welfare as a result of issuance of unemployment insurance cheques being late during the winter months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to study the suggestion with greater care, but the way it came out it seemed to me that the hon. member did not bring much attention to bear on the fact that unemployment cheques were late in many cases without the federal government in any sense being responsible for that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: In many cases it was because applicants themselves did not fill out the forms correctly or because employers did not provide the right kind of advice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Alexander: Would the Prime Minister explain to the House why the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which has offered agreements to all the provinces in connection with the future assignment of its cheques, has been unable to formulate an acceptable agreement with seven of the provinces, and why no new agreements have been signed since early March in spite of the fact that the agreements with Nova Scotia and Newfoundland are proving extremely effective? Why has no agreement been signed with any of the other provinces?

Mr. Trudeau: I apologize to the hon. member but I missed the first part of his question because of the noise coming from his own benches.

Mr. Alexander: I will rephrase the question. In view of the fact the federal government now has agreement with three of the provinces with respect to reimbursement for and assignment of welfare cheques issued in consequence of late payment of unemployment insurance benefits, can the Prime Minister tell us what is the hold-up with respect to concluding agreements with the seven provinces which have not yet entered into such an arrangement?

Mr. Trudeau: I have not been dealing with this matter personally, but the minister who has been doing so may wish to look at the question and provide an answer.

ENERGY

CLOSING OF GENTILLY ATOMIC PLANT—SHORTAGE OF HEAVY WATER—MEASURES TO SOLVE PROBLEM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

As the Gentilly thermal station threatened some time ago to close down because it has a hard time finding heavy water, can the minister tell the House whether or not that problem has been solved to the satisfaction of the officials of the plant?

[English]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I regret to say no, Mr. Speaker. Because of the shortage of heavy water in this country, which will continue for another two years, the supply of heavy water will not be sufficient to enable us to avert the proposed close-down of Gentilly in September. In this case, however, the close-down will coincide with the period set aside for maintenance and refitting. We would hope that at some time toward the end of 1973 the plant would be able to get into production again.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—REASONS FOR PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to tell the House why the government is planning to construct a second Toronto airport when the second air terminal building, due for completion in a few days, and the construction of a second north-south runway at Malton would more than double the present capacity of the airport, and the completion of a third air terminal building as originally planned—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —would enable the airport to handle the forecast traffic for another 20 years?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is obviously impossible for me to answer that question in detail.

Mr. Hees: On motions.

Mr. Jamieson: There is, however, voluminous documentation relating to all portions of the hon. member's question and I will see he gets copies of everything.

Mr. Hees: While the minister is considering that matter will he also consider, and tell us in the same answer, the reason the new airport at Ste. Scholastique in Quebec is to be 23 times as big as the present Toronto airport and 12 times as big as the airport which serves all the needs of the giant city of Chicago and which will be able, it is forecast, to handle air traffic there for many years to come?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Trudeau: Do you want it, or not?

Mr. Hees: I want some answers. I want to save the country a lot of money.

An hon. Member: Resign!

Mr. Hees: I am against make-work programs.

An hon. Member: What about unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River has been recognized for the purpose of asking a question and he should be allowed to do so.

Mr. Baldwin: Thank you. I just wanted to defer to the wisdom of my hon. friend.

An hon. Member: God help you!

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

DOMINION AVIATION—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF APPLICATION FOR DEVELOPMENT GRANT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Some days ago I inquired about an application by Dominion Aviation, a western Canadian company involved in the development of a STOL aircraft. The minister said that he would look into this and I have not pressed him since because I realize he has had problems to deal with that have been created by his colleagues. Will he look into the matter, and is he prepared to review the application by this company for an assistance grant in light of the fact that there is an opportunity to decentralize the development of the Canadian aviation industry into western Canada?

• (1430)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I recall very well that the application was received on April 11, but I do not know whether a decision has been made since. I will find out and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the minister try to answer this question within the next few days in view of the limited life of this part of this Parliament?

Mr. Pepin: I will do so on the next occasion, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT—INQUIRY AS TO PRIOR CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES AND RESPONSE TO PROPOSALS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can he indicate whether consultations were held with the provinces prior to the preparation and introduction of the amendments to the National Housing Act, and would the minister indicate what was the response of the provinces to any consultations that might have been held?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, discussions were held on policy proposals as one step in the consultative process. I have indicated to the provinces that we will require some further discussions with them in terms of regulations and administration of any new housing policies. I cannot in the question period capsulize all of the provincial comment except to describe it as favourable.

Mr. Burton: May I ask the minister specifically how many provinces approved in general of the government's policy proposals or approach to this matter, and would he also indicate how many provinces have not expressed any view or have not responded or been able to respond to any consultations held?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the nature of this kind of discussion is confidential. I am not in a position to speak for the provinces. They will undoubtedly be making their views public at some point regarding these proposals and on the regulations, and I am ready to discuss all aspects of the policies with the provinces.

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT BETWEEN CONSORTIUMS TO BUILD MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT APPROVAL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has an agreement now been arrived at between two consortiums to build a Mackenzie valley gas pipeline from the Arctic?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, at the moment I have received no formal notification of an agreement. There has been an informal indication that an agreement was close but, as I say, at the moment I have had nothing formal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having regard to the information, even though unofficial, that the minister has received, which apparently indicates the consortiums have come to an agreement, is it a fact that it would be highly unlikely that the government would approve a gas pipeline across Canada from Alaska if the United States rejected Canada's view and approved a trans-Alaska pipeline?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it would depend on the nature of the application. I do not think that, a priori, one can say that such application would not be approved. I think it is also fair to point out, however, that, given the terms of Secretary Morton's statement indicating that a permit would be issued for a trans-Alaska pipeline, the government of Canada would not accept with respect to a gas pipeline the conditions that the secretary put on his authorization of an oil line. Any United States condition of that sort in relation to a gas pipeline would be unacceptable to Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich have any basis for the statement he made in Washington—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that Ottawa would not approve a gas pipeline unless—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the question might be considered as having been asked directly and the minister might reply.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I should make it clear that the hon. member, both in that particular comment and generally, and except where he was quoting me directly, was speaking for himself.

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then that gives me the opportunity to ask: Did he have any authority from the minister to make the statement that he did?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I have just said, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was speaking for himself.

AGRICULTURE

FEED—POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF PROTEIN CONTENT AND MINERAL PHOSPHATES UNDER FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary. I believe that representations have been made to the Department of Agriculture in this regard. Is the government giving consideration to having protein content and mineral phosphates for the manufacture of feed included under the feed freight assistance act?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not properly aware of this, but the matter has been under study for a certain time and the minister should be in a position soon to make a statement in this regard.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AEROBATIC TEAM FATALITY—PROVISION OF ADEQUATE RESOURCES TO MAINTAIN HIGH TRAINING AND SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In light of the very tragic accident over the weekend at the air show in Trenton, is the minister assured that this aerobatic team has had in the past and will continue to have ample and adequate resources to ensure that their planning and training standards are maintained at the highest safety level?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House will join with me in extending sincere sympathy to Captain Waterer's wife and relatives. I should like to indicate that an inquiry has been instituted at my instructions and when the results of the inquiry are known to me I shall be pleased to make them public. I believe that adequate funds have been provided for training purposes, but this question will be examined as well. I should point out that since aeronautics shows have been taking place during the past 24 years featuring performances of this kind there have been only seven accidents involving aircraft.

TRADE

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR LIST OF AMERICAN COMPANIES MAKING USE THEREOF—POSSIBILITY OF COUNTERVAILING ACTION AGAINST AUTO FIRMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to provide the House today with a list of all those corporations in the United States that have established DISCs?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, and I thought I had provided an explanation why I could not.

Mr. Broadbent: Is the minister in a position to tell the House how many DISCs have been established since he last reported to the House?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had given that answer last week. The figures are, as at the end of February, 1,150, as at the end of March—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was under the impression that this kind of information had been given to the House, at which time I suggested, or I suggest now if I did not suggest then, that this kind of statistical information should normally not be given at this time. Perhaps the hon. member would like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Broadbent: I did say since the last report, Mr. Speaker, but I will go on to my final question. Is the government considering taking countervailing action against firms in the auto industry which are importing under DISC along the following lines, namely, is the government considering applying financial penalties against those companies equivalent to their DISC benefits in determining their annual commitments made under the Canada-U.S. auto pact?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had answered that question in my speech on the budget but I will repeat what I said. The financial measures introduced by the budget were brought in to make up in great part at least for the situation that has been created in the United States and elsewhere in the world by export subsidies. But obviously there are bound to be specific situations where the government would like to go farther. I also indicated at that time that we were trying to develop a method by which we would be better informed—we are working on this method now—about the abnormal advantages that foreign countries are giving their exporters.

Mr. Broadbent: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby for a last supplementary and then we must move on.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, since the Ford Motor Company is the only major company currently importing cars and products into Canada under DISC, is the minister prepared to take any specific action against this clear violation of the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement?

Mr. Pepin: Not as of now, Mr. Speaker.

POLLUTION

THREAT FROM SUNKEN "IRVING WHALE"—DECISION NOT TO AWARD CONTRACT FOR REMOVAL THIS YEAR

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Transport. Is it a fact that the government has decided not to let a contract during the current year to remove the Irving Whale from the Gulf of St. Lawrence, although it is a known threat?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in order. The minister will be allowed to reply, but hon. members know it is better to ask a question directly rather than ask a minister to confirm or deny a report. The Chair is prepared to assume that the question has been asked directly, and the minister can reply in those terms.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. In other words, there will not be a contract awarded during the current year unless some new information comes to light that would ensure that the job could be carried out with absolute safety. I have written to a colleague of the hon. member and I will be glad to send him a similar letter explaining the circumstances.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Champlain to whom I shall give the floor in a moment, but the hon. member for Malpeque would like to put a supplementary question.

[English]

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he has other contingency plans to cope with this pollution threat in some other way?

Mr. Jamieson: Not on a permanent basis, Mr. Speaker, other than to ensure that it is contained. If an underwater inspection has not been carried out yet, it will be within a matter of a few days to ensure there is no threat, to use my hon. friend's word, at the present time. We do not want to move it until we are absolutely certain we can bring it up without creating an additional hazard.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—INQUIRY RESPECTING POSITION OF QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister responsible for housing.

As he tabled a bill yesterday, the minister indicated that the provinces had generally reacted favourably to it and that he intended to have new consultations with them; can he therefore tell us what position the Quebec government has adopted towards that bill?

Hon. Ron. Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that would have to come from the Quebec government.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Since the new bill provides that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could grant loans to restore family dwellings, could the minister say whether those loans could be used under CMHC supervision to repair badly built houses?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that the member is already starting a debate which could be held when the bill will be introduced in the House.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PROPOSED FREIGHT RATE INCREASE—SUGGESTED MEETING OF MINISTER AND PROVINCIAL PREMIERS TO DETERMINE METHOD TO OVERCOME PROBLEM

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact an application will be made by Canadian National Railways to the Canadian Transport Commission of June 19, for selective freight rate increases in the Atlantic provinces, will the minister give consideration to initiating a meeting with the four Atlantic premiers at the earliest possible date, if they have not already requested one with him, to attempt to determine some method to overcome the severe problem being created for the Atlantic provinces business community by this eighth freight rate increase since September, 1969?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very good idea. I indicated to the House the other day that I had met with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, which represents some of the provinces, but a direct face to face meeting with the premiers would be a very good idea. I will explore the possibility of that today.

ENERGY

NATURE OF PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—CONSORTIUMS INVOLVED IN POSSIBLE APPLICATION—POSSIBILITY OF OIL LINE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources spoke on Friday, he said, as recorded on page 3011 of Hansard, that there was an application pending or he had an indication of an application by a number of companies or consortiums to build a pipeline. Just previously he had been talking about the carriage of crude petroleum by TAPS. Was he talking about a pipeline for natural gas or a pipeline to carry crude petroleum? Second, what are the names of these consortiums, and are they United States companies or Canadian enterprises?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the pipeline I was referring to involves two consortiums, Norwest Project and Gas Arctic. This is in relation to a possible gas pipeline with the dual objective of bringing Canadian gas from the Canadian delta and possibly Prudhoe Bay gas down to the southern Canadian market. Quite a number of companies, including Canadian companies, are involved in both, and I would be glad to give the hon. member a brief of the two firms involved.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, if this is an application to build a gas line, will the minister explain to the House what assistance or help that would be as far as the question of serious pollution of the west coast is concerned, because that pollution would be caused by crude petroleum? Is there any arrangement at this stage? That is what I tried to find out on Friday and have been for the last three years. Is there any arrangement, suggestion or plan in reference to building a pipeline to carry crude petroleum down the Mackenzie delta? That is the point.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I tried on Friday to convey to the hon. member the fact that for some considerable time the government of Canada has tried to persuade the United States to ship not only gas but oil down through the Mackenzie delta system. However, the United States government has indicated, through Secretary Morton, that it has decided otherwise. We would still be happy to make provision for this. The research we have carried out in respect of Arctic ecology and the Mackenzie Valley generally would apply in respect of both possible gas and oil pipelines.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for another supplementary question, but I think we have reached the point when I must bring to the attention of hon. members that there is not much more than five minutes left before the end of the question period and there are some 20 or 25 members still seeking the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I will make my question short. May I take it from the minister's answer that in the negotiations between Canada and the United States regarding the piping of crude petroleum Canada's efforts have been a complete failure?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, notice of this question has been given to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General by both the hon. member for Peace River and myself. Will the Solicitor General cause to be brought up to date the helpful study of all aspects of capital punishment, commissioned by the late Mr. Favreau, in view of the fact this or the next Parliament will have to face the issue before Christmas?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, my officials are now updating the statistics and the contents of the study published earlier by the Department of Justice and, in due time, I will be pleased to make it public when the House will be dealing with the matter.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, will the minister do what the late Mr. Favreau very competently did, make this document available to members of all parties in order to make sure that impartiality and objectivity are retained?

OIL

ALLEGED CUT IN CANADIAN SUPPLY TO CHERRY POINT REFINERY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of a statement by a spokesman for Atlantic-Richfield to the effect that the only reason his company is importing foreign oil by tanker to Cherry Point is that their oil quota has been cut by the Canadian supplier. I should like to ask the minister whether he is having discussions with this company and the oil industry generally to ensure an adequate supply of Alberta crude to the refinery at Cherry Point so that tanker importation will be unnecessary?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with officials of Trans-Mountain Pipeline. They have pointed out that the United States refineries, particularly Atlantic-Richfield, have refused to take Canadian oil on a long-term contract beyond the next several years, so the increased pipeline capacity which would be necessary to supply the Paget Sound refinery cannot be financed. We would be quite happy, as would Trans-Mountain, to provide additional oil supplies with additional pipeline capacity to Atlantic-Richfield, but they have refused to give this undertaking. Therefore it has not been possible at the moment to expand that system.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Atlantic-Richfield has already said it might not be necessary for it to use Alaska crude if it could get adequate supplies of Canadian oil, will the minister undertake to meet with officials to determine whether this guaranteed supply could be made available, thereby removing much of the hazard that has been troubling Parliament in respect of the use of Cherry Point?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if officials of Atlantic-Richfield have been saying that it is a direct contradiction of what they have been saying both to officials of the government of Canada and of Trans-Mountain Pipeline. I would be glad to check to see whether that is, indeed, the company's position now.

FROST DAMAGE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the unseasonable frost last weekend which caused great damage in southern Ontario to tobacco, small fruits and other cash crops. The matter was brought up by a number of hon. members yesterday, and I put this question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member and his colleagues that the Department of Agriculture is aware of the situation, that officials are on the spot and that we are working in close co-operation with the Ontario government in order to estimate damages caused to several crops by the frost which took place over the weekend. When this study is over, the Department of Agriculture will be able to decide what steps should be taken further to those already taken under existing legislation.

INVITATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE TO MR. IVAN HEAD TO APPEAR AS WITNESS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has been advised of an invitation to Mr. Ivan Head to appear as a witness before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and can he advise the House whether he is facilitating the appearance of that important gentleman before that illustrious committee?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I missed the first part of the question, but Mr. Head is presently at the United Nations in New York. If the hon. member would ask the relevant part of the question again, I might be able to answer it.

Mr. Macquarrie: The question was whether the Prime Minister was aware of an invitation being extended to Mr. Ivan Head by the committee for that gentleman to appear before it.

Mr. Trudeau: I was aware of that invitation. I understand that the committee did extend the invitation, and of course I would not want to interfere in the procedures of the committee. If the hon. member is interested in my point of view, I think it is a very dangerous precedent if people in ministers' offices who are exempt staff are to be invited to speak on the ideas of the government or the policies of a minister. If such were the case, there would be no objection to summoning the research staff of opposition parties in order to question them, and so on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I think that if the committee is interested in knowing what the government's policies are the ministers are there to speak on them.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT MOTION SEEKING AMENDMENT OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT BE PROCEEDED WITH

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. On June 2 I asked, in the government House leader's absence, a question regarding item No. 25 on the order paper, a measure to amend the British North America Act standing in the name of the Minister of Transport. I asked when it would be brought forward for action by the House. At that time the acting House leader promised a reply at the next sitting.

To date there has been no reply. Could the minister give the information today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): The chances of this item being called at an early date are rather slim.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who introduced the resolution. Would he use his considerable influence on his cabinet colleagues to ensure that this resolution will be passed before the summer recess?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, when flights take place over Canada it is after consultation with the Canadian government.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about reached the end of the question period. The hon. member may ask a quick supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre for a quick question, followed by the hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister assure the House that compensation will be paid to anyone who might suffer damages from a sonic boom, for example?

Mr. Benson: These NORAD training flights take place continuously.

Does the minister know of any connection or relationship between René Lévesque's visit to France and the proposed closing of the Renault assembly plant in St. Bruno, Quebec?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any. While I am on my feet, may I answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the question period. Perhaps the House might allow the minister to reply to the question which he was about to answer and might also allow the hon. member for Edmonton Centre to ask a supplementary question.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—TELEGRAM FROM MONTREAL PORT AUTHORITIES—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Since the Chairman of the port of Montreal Authority forwarded a telegram yesterday to the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice urging them to take the necessary steps to end the conflict which has been lasting since May 16, may I ask the minister whether it is his intention to answer in the affirmative to that telegram, or if he will keep advocating arbitration?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the necessary measure to take to resolve the dispute is for one party or the other, not waiting on the other party, to take this dispute to arbitration as is provided in the Canada Labour Code and in the collective agreement. For me to take any other position would be to open a precedent that I do not think any member of the House would wish to see, that closed agreements can be reopened at the initiative of the minister when there are other procedures provided in the agreement.

Mr. Alexander: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will realize that we have now gone a few minutes beyond the question period. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, later tonight we will be asked to register our approval or disapproval of the first budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Much as many of us admire the hon. gentleman, indeed like him very much, I will have to say now on behalf of my colleagues and myself that the official opposition will be voting against the minister's first budget.

In 1971 the economy, according to the estimates of the Economic Council of Canada, operated approximately $3 billion below its potential. It appears that in 1972 the economy will operate from $2 billion to $3 billion below its potential, and that in 1973 the economy will operate at least $2 billion below potential. This is quite an indictment of the measures that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government have brought in for the conduct of the country. These figures alone, Sir, would justify anybody in not having confidence in the economic and financial policies of the government.

The figures released today by Statistics Canada—perhaps it should be renamed Unemployment Canada—show there were 9,000 more people unemployed last month than there were in the same month a year ago. This fact again casts a pitiless spotlight upon the economic climate in which the country is operating. I suggest, Sir, that the budget brought in by the Minister of Finance will simply not provide the stimulus to create demand for goods and services which would increase production sufficiently to reduce the number of unemployed. I will go into that argument at somewhat greater length in the first part of my speech.

We are faced with a seasonally adjusted figure of 6.2 per cent unemployment, and all this in the light of what the Minister of Finance has said today about the priority for the creation of jobs, and what he said on February 24, as recorded at page 217 of Hansard:

I see our first priority to be to provide good jobs for Canadians seeking work.

And later we find this:

I fully recognize that statistics are no substitute for jobs.

At page 214, the minister's statement reads:

My first and most urgent priority is to provide continuing and well-paying jobs for those Canadians seeking them.

But still we are faced with the dreary litany of the performance of the economy with regard to the provision of jobs.

One of the measures the minister seeks to use in the budget is the reduction of corporate taxation from a top rate of 49 per cent down to 40 per cent. This is done in the hopes of stimulating investment. First, I think the mistake that is being made is that the government, having fallen so badly out of favour with the business community, now uses this rather large carrot to try to get back some good will unto itself. I do not know whether or not this will work.

I think business invests productively when it believes a market exists for more goods. Can any businessman believe that the reaping of advantages to himself and his shareholders is really going to accomplish that purpose, or does he not look to his traditional customers, the public who buy, and ask: what is the budget doing to put more money in their pockets, more money which can be used to buy the goods of business? I think the government has used the wrong approach, and in doing so has made a monumental gaffe. Business would expand its activities if it had confidence in the future. And when the economy is stimulated by adequate consumer demand, job producing economic expansion is assured.

Some points can be made about the introduction of the new class of capital cost allowances. This entitles a taxpayer to claim as depreciation up to 50 per cent of the cost of an asset in the year it was purchased or acquired, and the unclaimed balance in any year following. This is for machinery and equipment to be used for the purpose of manufacturing. There are five criticisms that should be noted in regard to this measure in the budget. First, the machinery may in fact replace present workers. If the aim of the budget is to create more jobs, then this is certainly self-defeating. Second, the machinery may have a high non-Canadian labour content. Third, the machinery may displace less skilled operators who are particularly susceptible to prolonged periods of unemployment. Fourth, the form of the incentive does nothing to favour the disadvantaged regions, and in those disadvantaged regions we have pockets of very high unemployment. Fifth, the employment effects of tax incentives for business are slow to appear in comparison with the effects of a comparable personal or sales tax reduction.

I suggest that corporate income tax cuts do not provide investment and employment stimulus for firms without profits. That is rather obvious. If you do not have money to invest and you are in difficulties, then anything done for your wealthy cousin down the street will not help you a bit, but may increase your misery, (a) by making you feel envious, and, (b) by increasing his competitive advantage over you. Corporate tax cuts provide no reliable stimulus to expand jobs and investment unless the recipient corporations are assured of expanding markets. The tax cuts do not even provide indirect stimulus to such labour intensive sectors as service industries and construction.

Also even assuming for the moment that the government's proposals increase investment, it must be recognized—and this is certainly being well scouted in one of the standing committees at present—that 40 per cent to 50 per cent of all investment goods are imported from the United States. Therefore one half of the effect of the government's policies will be felt in the United States. Therefore, by a curiosity, these measures may do more to stimulate the American economy than they will do for ours. I think this point should be made with regard to the long-range effects of this particular proposal in the minister's budget, that accelerated write-offs for capital equipment purchases lower the price of capital equipment relative to the price of labour. This has the economic effect of encouraging firms to substitute labour for capital in the production process. That sounds good on the face of it because it can cause a little output and employment to increase, but in the long run such a policy will result in a more capital intensive manufacturing sector. The swing will go the other way. The government may be buying a few jobs at present at the expense of even higher and more stubborn unemployment in the future.

I would like to suggest a few things that should have been in the budget, and that my colleagues and I would have liked to see in it. The report of the Carter Royal Commission on Taxation makes the point as well as anybody, and this after very considerable study, about changes in the personal income tax. I quote from volume 2, chapter 3 of that report as follows:

The impact of a change in personal income tax upon the take-home pay of workers is quick. Across-the-board changes in personal income tax rates provide the most effective single tax instrument for changing aggregate demand to achieve full employment and price stability. Changes in corporate income tax rates and in sales tax rates are much less useful.

In all the studies that the Carter Commission made into the subject of stimulating the economy through the process of tax changes, they made the very strong point that it was the reduction of the income tax of the wage earner of Canada that was the quickest way of putting money into the pocket of the worker and thus into the economy. That, of course, is the quickest way of enabling more people to buy goods made in Canada which in turn increases our productivity and ultimately the well-being of all citizens. So I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the most serious indictment that can be levelled against the minister, and against the government of which he is an adornment, is that the wrong course has been taken with regard to the measures needed to stimulate the economy and to get us closer to the potential that the Economic Council of Canada suggests for us.

There are other methods that could have found their way into the budget, Mr. Speaker. There could have been employment support assistance for labour intensive industries; investment tax credits for manufacturing, processing and service industries; guaranteed low-interest loans for export firms severely affected by DISC and, in concert with other nations, countervailing tariffs on DISC's. Measures could have been taken with regard to housing programs and in a moment I shall deal with the announcement of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) in that regard.

For long-range measures to strengthen the economy, there should have been a reformation of tax revenue sharing to reduce the present burden on the provinces and municipalities. As suggested by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in a recent speech made in Toronto, there could be a new formula applied to the taxation system. This formula has been the subject of some lively discussions. As I have said, there should be a taxation system which does not make a bonanza of inflation but which gives the government the incentive to do what it can with the powers of taxation.

There should be measures to reduce the present levels of sales tax on consumer goods primarily produced in Canada. There should be a reorganization of legislation and monetary policy to ensure that Canada has a capital policy which provides easier money and access to more venture capital for Canadian entrepreneurs. What we are doing is erecting barricades when there should be some method by which Canadians could take greater pride in investing money in their own country. There should be acts to provide low-interest loans for housing and we should use full employment budgeting techniques to provide a more realistic and honest basis for assessing the expansionary or deflationary impact of federal budgets on the Canadian economy.

Yesterday, in a burst of optimism, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) brought in his version of the stone tablets containing the changes to the National Housing Act. A massive document was brought in at this stage of the parliamentary session and I am sure nobody in this Chamber, with the exception of the minister, could believe that this would be part of the law of the land by summertime.

There are some new techniques in the measures suggested by the hon. gentleman but if we are to do our job adequately, four or five of the important proposals should be examined closely and not simply taken at face value. This kind of legislation should have been presented to us some considerable time ago. According to a report on the CBC this morning by a correspondent of the Globe and Mail, this legislation was ready in January or February when the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) had conduct of this strange Department of Urban Affairs. If that report is correct, then we are being treated to flim-flammery, a sort of public relations exercise by which the minister hopes a lot of people in run-down neighbourhoods are going to be aroused. I would like to think that this housing legislation would be in effect by July 1. I think it would be a real lifesaver in many parts of Canada and I could see it operating usefully within my own community. But the way it is being brought in is like offering a person a full-course meal with no time to tackle it, only having time to gulp down hot dogs and root beer.

I should like to make the following comment on the proposals advanced by the minister. A few days ago when taking part in the housing debate, I mentioned the effect that the removal of sales tax on building materials could have on the cost of homes. Calculating it by the process of amortization, for approximately every $1,000 saved that way, like $3,000 or $4,000 is saved in long-range interest and carrying charges. That is a significant saving but even more pertinent is the suggestion that by cutting the cost of homes by as much as $1,000 or $1,500, more housing is put within the reach of those who at the moment cannot quite achieve that goal.

If we look upon more housing for low-income people as a desirable social goal, and I think every member in this House shares that view, then the way to achieve it is to ensure that housing costs less. I know there are some who say that if we tackle the cost of land this will be the result, but I am a little pessimistic about that, Mr. Speaker. Land has a habit of appreciating in value. If some speculative elements are eliminated, then it might be possible to hold down the cost of land a little but in the end I do not think land cost makes much difference. If we had to tackle the land cost problem, I think we would not do it through the land bank assembly plan but rather impose taxes on land that is held in order to make it unprofitable over a long period. I will not elaborate on that at the present time, but rather will explore it if, as and when this legislation gets into committee.

If we really wanted to tackle land costs, it would be a matter of getting the land serviced early so that it would be suitable for building, rather than serviced late so that it would stand idle, incurring taxes and bank charges. On the outskirts of cities such as Toronto, the value of land that is idle is rocketing sky high. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance could not have brought in a measure to repeal the sales tax on building materials so that we could have made one positive gesture towards bringing home costs within the reach of the tens of thousands of Canadians who are now almost able to reach the goal of having their own home, but not quite able to close the gap.

May I comment on the proposals the minister made yesterday. The rehabilitation of some old neighbourhoods, as a substitute for urban renewal, commends itself to me and I support the idea, though only up to a point. I do not think the minister should altogether cut out urban renewal because, in some cases, it is needed. Urban renewal projects in some parts of Canada, and I am thinking particularly of one in downtown Halifax, are proving their value. Nevertheless, I think communities should be given the option of choosing whether they want to rehabilitate old neighbourhoods, or say, "This neighbourhood is beyond recall; all the carpenters, plumbers and workmen in the world cannot bring these buildings up to modern standards. This neighbourhood is simply not good enough and it must be renewed." On the other hand, there are places where the concept of urban renewal has been used, I think quite wrongly.

I remember between 1963 and 1965 searching titles and taking part in property transactions that involved older homes in Halifax. They were to be levelled to make way for large apartment buildings. This was a matter of expropriation and involved the building of public housing. I know that the provision of public housing was beneficial for some. However, it irked me, on looking at the title of a home that had been built 75 years ago and that was still a perfectly sound property, although perhaps in need of improving by the use of home improvement loans of a sort different from those we now grant, to find it was to be torn down. True, it was in a neighbourhood somewhat run down, but quite liveable. I was annoyed to think of those families that were to be uprooted and sent packing, that houses costing between $15,000 and $20,000 were to be torn down to make way for the construction of apartment buildings.

In the name of public housing, we were committing several crimes. We were committing the economic crime of putting people into apartments that we expected would cost up to $30,000 each, and that cost could never be recovered; we were committing the crime of removing homeowners—I guess I have a prejudice towards home ownership—and dislocating them from their neighbourhood. Actually, I know of people who sat with a shotgun on their knees waiting for the approach of the bulldozer. If the bulldozer had made an early appearance outside their door, I am sure the matter would have ended in the criminal courts. After a little persuasion and the granting of a little extra money, these people were induced to move away and these crises passed.

I was offended because our urban renewal programs then were so terribly sweeping and did about as much harm as good. Now, there is a danger that the pendulum may swing completely the other way; we may consider rehabilitating those parts of cities that ought to be cleared away. Understandably, there is no provision in this measure for dealing with commercial rehabilitation; therefore, I shall put in another blow for some of my favourite characters, the mammas and papas of this country who run small businesses. There ought to be no qualms about rehabilitating some of these small family businesses. I see nothing wrong with that in principle. If people do not want to work downtown in some big factory, in a large crowd, they should be given the chance to run their own lives and run their own small businesses.

I ought to note for the record several of the points made on this subject by the newly elected president of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, Desmond Newman. He said that the minister's proposals may not be of advantage to some municipalities, because the municipalities do not have any extra money with which to operate. Some of those difficulties may be cleared up at the tri-level government conference scheduled for November. He suggests that the municipalities would like to get in on the ground floor, while these matters are being talked about and considered, before changes are made. He also makes the same point about the lack of policy relating to commercial rehabilitation that I have just made.

Then, also, he says, significantly, that there is still a gap between what an elderly couple may receive under government programs and the minimum they require if they are to own a home. I think in this area there is a serious defect in the legislation and I hope the minister, if he is to deal with this matter before the end of June, will consider it seriously. The right of our elderly people is a right for which we shall fight. I do not see why an elderly couple cannot enjoy the right to home ownership just as younger people do.

I wish to make a final point; I see that only two minutes of my time remain. Perhaps, I will not deal with it now but will deal with it when the labour bill is considered later. I think the government should take steps that will give Canadians the opportunity for greater participation in the offshore mineral and oil search, and particularly that search taking place off the coast of Atlantic Canada. Perhaps measures could be enacted dealing with work permits. I have already been in correspondence with the director general in the Atlantic region in this regard; he may be able to act on the matter so that I may be able to achieve my aim without making this a public issue. I think there ought to be more opportunities for Canadian people to participate in the offshore oil and mineral exploration process.

When the opportunity arises later, in the present session, I want to take a look at the British Commonwealth Maritime Shipping Agreement. I think it is shameful that governments, past and present, have not brought that agreement up to date, because now Commonwealth ships from other countries operating in Canadian coastal waters are not required to pay Canadian wage rates or Canadian unemployment insurance and are not required to give their seamen the benefits which flow from Canadian legislation. Once that measure has been brought up to date, it will mean that more Canadian seamen will be engaged in that coastal trade. I have not the time to elaborate on this now, although I want to do so in future.

My main point now is this: I do not think the budgetary measures of the Minister of Finance are adequate and we shall show our displeasure with them when the vote is called this evening.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion among members of the House with regard to the furtherance of this debate. Since there are still many members who wish to speak in the time available, it has been suggested that hon. members might agree to a limitation which would curtail speeches to 20 minutes. Some hon. members are prepared to agree to this suggestion, although they prepared fairly lengthy speeches. I think they would be prepared to make this sacrifice if the agreement were to be extended to other hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to comment in my name and especially in the name of my electors of the constituency of Rimouski, on the budget presented on Monday, May 8 last by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

I wish to congratulate once more the hon. minister.

No doubt most of my fellow-citizens, from the constituency of Rimouski as well as from eastern Quebec, share my view in this respect.

That budget comes under the Liberal party's program announced since 1968 and is entirely consistent with the central theme of the throne speeches and budgets we have had since then. There is in all that a sense of unity, wisdom and drive of which we are proud. Political beliefs have proved correct and the hopes of the Canadian people have not been shattered.

That budget is being examined by the House and the hon. minister has undoubtedly foreseen that it would be a butt for criticism. Such criticism should be constructive in order to ensure progress in this country. Negative criticism—we all know that—has never been useful. The critical faculty should be developed not the spirit of criticism. That may be the difference between an ideal and utopia.

It is obvious that in his speech, the hon. minister tried to show that we should first stimulate the Canadian economy while supporting at the same time efforts on the part of industry, in order to progress in the midst of competition and create employment. Thus we see that the government can reach its goal which is to encourage the dynamic role of our human, active and business generating capital. It wants to encourage the militants, the creative people, through incentives to free enterprise.

Secondly, we can see that the government, despite criticism from the opposition, shows a serious concern for social justice, in keeping with the purest democratic tradition. We have only to consider the announcement of measures designed to boost the income of those who suffer the most from increased prices and the high cost of living.

That is evidence that the government recognizes the value of men and the usefulness of some groups of citizens who might be said inactive, if considered in a certain light, on account of their age, their state of health and the length of their training for a career. Those citizens, whether disabled veterans or blind people, could be called upon to take part in the evolution of society. Even the aged could keep up with the adventure of life, share in Canada's progress and look toward an ever better future.

Spreading out our economic forces and assuring the poor of a more adequate income, such is the immediate or middle term goal. Therefore, this budget can be called a growth or expansion budget.

In 1972-73, economic growth can only result from this budget. Such growth should be felt at two levels; first, supply being what it is, an increased demand should result from the fiscal and social benefits being granted to various groups of citizens. Secondly, no doubt the benefits resulting from growth should have some repercussions in the industrial sector.

In fact, the minister told us of some new advantages related to write offs and tax abatements which can but profit manufacturers. This might encourage people to invest in the industrial sector and thereby improve our industrial situation and increase employment opportunities.

Some opposition members will certainly suggest, as they have already done, that nothing has been done to relieve the burden of the average taxpayers. I think that indirectly—and the impact will be as good as direct aid but more normal in a free society—the average taxpayer, who does not seem to be encouraged or protected, will benefit by increased demand. Increased demand can but improve the situation of merchants, small industrialists, small shopkeepers, gas station owners, etc. Generally increased demand stimulates economic activities.

I saw a case in point in my region recently where three local initiative projects have been approved and completed. These projects involved a low-income region of the Lower St. Lawrence. Even though those who benefited by it indirectly do not like to boast about in public, it remains that following confidential or private information I was told that during the implementation of these projects the small merchants, the small grocers, and the gas station owners noticed the effects of an added injection of money during the winter. These local initiatives projects did their business a lot of good even though they were not directly involved.

If I did not misunderstand the criticisms voiced earlier by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), he said that the tax reductions granted to companies only increase their profits, do very little to improve the well-being of the average taxpayers, do not create employment, etc.

And yet I have met this morning one of my friends, president and sole owner of an average industry employing almost 250 skilled workers, and he told me that a few days after the budget speech he bought $80,000 worth of equipment. In the next two years, he can reap the benefits of depreciation and tax rebate. He foresees for next year a $20,000 tax saving and he intends to reinvest this amount in his company. This means therefore that his industry and working conditions will improve, his production increase and that he will provide jobs for more than 250 people in Rimouski, the town where I live.

It seems therefore that the provisions concerning the corporate tax rebate and the benefits regarding depreciation will be to everyone's advantage.

If we consider also the second area where the effects of the expected growth will be felt, that is to say the very precious group formed by average Canadian taxpayers, we can assume that it is going to be encouraged. Thanks to the forecast investments and to a rational control of employment level, the pulse of the economy indicates a normal trend. And as the increase in demand can be an element of progress and well-being for average Canadians, such also could be the effects of investments on industry.

Therefore, it can be stated that not only pensioners, invalids, veterans, citizens with fixed income, secondary and consumer industries will benefit from this budget, but also average Canadians. The same as when a serum injected in one limb benefits the whole body, those two advantages that are granted to industries and those Canadians unable to face the rising cost of living will benefit Canadian society as a whole.

It is probably true to say that since 1968 the government has had to wage a severe battle against inflation and the emphasis it has now put on growth will re-awaken the inflationary trend, but this battle was necessary. We are told that other countries, including the United States, have had to wage the same fight. Everyone knows that the fight against inflation was predicted with candour and sincerity in a program which was not a compendium of wonderful and gilt-edged promises.

Important people from foreign countries state that, among all industrialized countries, Canada has had the greatest success in its fight against inflation.

As a matter of fact, in accordance with its commitments, the government has endeavoured to correct various traditional weaknesses of our economy that are due to the rapid changes that are taking place in this, the electronic age. Apart from fighting inflation, the government has tried to lighten the tax-load of low-income people and has implemented a degree of tax reform. This firmness, for which some have criticized the government, was simply a realistic and true expression of the power and the authority that have been bestowed on the government by the Canadian people.

The men who make up the present cabinet are undoubtedly the most qualified and consequently the most worthy of confidence and they have all the ability required to administer Canadian affairs for many more years to come. The cabinet is surely the best director general of Canadian affairs.

We believe that the government is doing its best to carry out its program and to achieve the human ideal of all Canadians, an ideal of liberty and civilization.

However, everyone knows that there is some room for improvement and that there always will be. With each step forward, new horizons appear.

We know that since it came to power, the Liberal government has always paid a great deal of attention to those aspects of Canadian policy which need to be improved constantly to allow for better implementation of such policy.

Following the budget speech, we know that the government wants to, and does, improve the fate of senior citizens. Some of our elderly constituents in the province of Quebec often come to tell us about their problems. For instance, the man who is over 65 years of age and who used to receive $135 or $137 a month will now get $150, which is at last a good increase. But it happen that his wife, who is under 65 and whose situation is under the jurisdiction of the Quebec government, receives almost nothing. There is a difference in being only 60 to 65 years of age, but from a social standpoint, I cannot see any real difference between those people and those who are 65 or over. The wife's situation comes under provincial legislation and regulations, but we hope that this problem can be solved in the near future—if necessary, in a joint effort by the federal and the Quebec governments.

Also, I cannot help but congratulate the government for its new policy on Initiatives which has already been in effect for the past two years and is designed to provide an incentive to work. The Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives programs are already in existence. An Opportunities for Age program has been mentioned some time ago. Following a report presented several weeks ago, there has been talk of an Opportunities for Citizens program. Maybe the government could consider grouping all those programs under a single structure which could be called Citizens' Initiatives or, possibly better, Opportunies for Citizens, and would be administered by a single department.

Experience acquired in the implementation of these projects has led to some soul-searching and to the realization that the government, more than ever, should concentrate on selecting competent administrators for these programs. It might also be suitable to decentralize analyses of projects and resorting at the area, sub-area and sector levels to various social agencies and contacting municipalities which have already submitted projects in the same fields, in order to avoid duplication.

It might be well to consider reducing slightly the number of projects with social and cultural aspects—in themself excellent and highly commendable—to some 10 to 15 per cent.

Young people should be involved in Opportunities for Youth programs allowing them to carry out projects with some relationship to industry, commerce, general economy, applied sciences, trades or crafts, without conflicting with free enterprise, in order to accustom them to becoming increasingly realistic and keep both feet on the ground, as the saying goes.

In my opinion, this would benefit a lot our country and such regions as that of the Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé, where I live, and about which the Canadian government has made special agreements; we are all pleased to co-operate and to take full advantage of them for the good of the whole people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I wish I could make many more remarks about these aspects of the federal policy which concern my fellow citizens: regional development, unemployment insurance, agricultural policy, in particular with regard to feed grains, which eastern Canada enjoys. Considering the agreement we reached twenty minutes ago, I hope I shall have another opportunity of dealing again with these matters.

[English]

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) spoke in this House and indicated that purchases by his department would be spread around Canada rather than all of them being made in central Canada. I am not saying that all government purchases should be made in the Maritimes or the Prairies or in British Columbia, but since the people in those regions are taxpayers, and since the minister is spending public money, the policy the minister referred to is a logical one, and I wish to compliment the hon. gentleman on his announced intention. I feel that our business people have as much right to bid on this kind of business as do businessmen in Ontario and Quebec. I am not knocking the businessman of Ontario and Quebec when I say that; I merely wish to compliment the Minister of Supply and Services. The minister's new department has roughly $1 billion purchasing power, so I suggest that quite a bit of thought and care must be exercised. For example, his department has decided to buy salt from the United States, and as the representative of an area of Saskatchewan that has a salt mine I am not very happy with this decision. I have been protesting vigorously to the minister. The effect on local people of financial decisions made by the government is not always appreciated.

I cannot understand why the Minister of Finance did not think a little more about the farmers when he made these adjustments in his budget. I was a farmer before coming here and my equipment depreciated every year by several thousand dollars. If the minister thinks that farmers make a contribution to our economy, then he might consider giving them a 50 per cent depreciation rate on some of their equipment. This, to my knowledge, he has not done. Businessmen would also appreciate the benefits that would flow from such an adjustment.

I think we should also consider the position of some of our processors. The other day the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) complimented the government for making the same concession to processors of farm products as it made to some other industries, and I am wondering whether the Minister of Finance would take another look at the farming industry with that point in mind. Perhaps the conception of farming held by Ottawa is a little removed from what it really is. Certainly, farming in my part of the world is quite industrialized. It is a cash basis operation; this is no longer subsistence agriculture. Farming is an industrial process and the farmers must realize an adequate income. They charge depreciation against their machinery and in most cases keep books. It is quite a commercial operation and I should like to think the Minister of Finance considers it as such.

I should like also to talk about one or two other things that have happened recently in relation to the Canadian economy. I refer specifically to the 2,000 boxcars ordered by the government. So far, there has been no decision on who is going to pay for them, or by what method. I did notice that they are not provided for in the estimates.

I noticed, too, that the cost of improvements to the port of Prince Rupert does not appear in the estimates, either. If some announcement regarding grain storage is going to be made shortly, or there are some improvements to be made to the rail line to the west coast, then I cannot help but wonder whether these will be another example of the ad hoc planning of this government, particularly before election time. I do not think that this sort of planning is good for the country. The growth in trade to Asian rim countries has been fairly steady and consistent for some little time, so the government should have been taking steps to handle this trade over the years rather than waiting for an emergency and doing something in a crisis situation. It is said that politicians react to situations rather than act in advance, and I must say that it appears to me this is the way the government is acting. There is too much ad hoc planning.

I should like also to comment on the present value of the Canadian dollar which has an effect on trade in my area. The Canadian dollar has been rising to $1.02 or $1.03 U.S., which means that the price of wheat will be affected since it is priced on the basis of the U.S. dollar. Every time the dollar goes up in value, it means that the problems of the people in my area increase. I asked the minister, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney), how far the government was willing to go in backing the Canadian dollar, but he said he did not know. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance at this time how high he is going to let the Canadian dollar rise in value compared with the U.S. dollar before he will take some action. This is a question about which we are all concerned.

I also asked the hon. member for Calgary South whether any planning was being done in case the Canadian dollar reached too high a point, and he told me, "no". If the Minister of Finance cares to look at the minutes of the committee he will find that is on the record. If the minister has any plans in case the value of the Canadian dollar goes too high, he has certainly not disclosed them to us. Again, I am afraid an ad hoc decision will be made without any advance thinking being done; perhaps this will be for the best and perhaps not.

I should like to talk for a few moments about the economic development of western Canada. I do not want to be parochial because I should like to see economic development in all of Canada, but I feel more at home when talking about development in my home area. It seems to me that if we are to encourage industry to expand, we should either have a market that is already there or will be there, and we should produce a product for which there is a ready sale at hand. I am not suggesting that grain or beef or any other product that we are selling abroad are not important; rather, I am thinking of new industries. There are products that are in good local supply and these could satisfy either the local or a foreign market.

I am not absolving the provincial governments or local businesses from any responsibility in this connection, but I do want to talk about federal involvement in such developments, as I see it. I want to speak specifically about the oil industry and pipelines that will be built from northern Canada to southern Canada and the United States. I attended an oil show recently in Calgary and saw a sample piece of 48-inch pipe that was made in Regina. I was told that this was the only pipe company in Canada that made pipe that large. There was also a 48-inch valve to fit the said pipe, and this particular one was made in Alberta, a complicated but excellent product. The man who demonstrated it to me was quite proud of the fact that it was a locally produced product.

I also saw some samples of track-truck machinery and other equipment that works well in northern Canada, some of which we have managed to sell to Russia. However, I should like to talk specifically about pipe for the moment because it is produced in my own province and we will need a lot of it in the immediate future. Eventually, there will be gas and oil pipelines down through the Mackenzie valley. It was recently announced that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) was going to have a survey made this summer of a possible gas pipeline route either east or west of Hudson Bay. We are talking in the order of a million tons of pipe when we talk of a pipeline along the Mackenzie valley. That is a lot of pipe. I should like to see Canadian business, including steel firms and other suppliers, put in a position to take advantage of this particular item. Had the government shown some ability to plan for the future in respect of transportation to the west coast, I would feel easier about it also doing something in this connection. This is why I am quite concerned that we look ahead. To make sure business in Canada will continue to supply jobs and provide economic activity, it should be in a position to take advantage of any natural development as a result of pipeline construction.

We have had too much ad hoc planning in the past. Let us not have more in the future. Let us look ahead. The federal government should give some direction to provincial governments in this regard, and it should give direction to business. It seems to me the government is not taking an over-all look at the problem, particularly when one considers that the market for oil and gas is to be found to a large extent in southern Canada and in the United States, while oil fields are in northern Canada. These prospective pipelines will have to cross several territories, provinces and states as well, and it is only reasonable to assume that responsibility for them will lie with the federal government. It is logical to assume that any province or individual business would be in a difficult position in attempting to assess what this project would mean to us.

A source of iron ore on the Prairies would be of great advantage to the economic development of that part of the country. We have a source of iron ore in northern Saskatchewan, although I am not prepared to suggest it is an economic source. I am not in a position to say, and no one else seems to know. The federal government should assume some responsibility for the development of a product to serve a market which already exists. I do not think this is being done. In fact, iron could be supplied to a steel industry on the Prairies and perhaps the west coast as well.

[Mr. Thomson.]

In addition to the development of pipeline services, there are a lot of other services that tend to grow as a result of the establishment of a steel industry. This development of a local steel industry would have a multiplier effect in western Canada. This has been the case in the past. When western Canada has money, it usually ends up with the manufacturing industries here in eastern Canada. This is one country, and when we do well in one part this tends to be reflected throughout the rest of the country as well.

I suggest we should do something along these lines in connection with pipelines because a great deal of time is required before an industry is capable of supplying pipe or anything else in volume. We are not going to build these pipelines all at once. We should look far enough ahead that we will be in a position to accept part of the order for pipe or other things that will be needed in the future. Let us not be in the position of having to import these items from Japan, the United Kingdom or Europe. Regina is not very many miles from Hudson Bay via the Churchill railroad, and it could be in a position to supply pipe to a great part of northern Canada. I can envisage that even a prairie industry would have a chance to compete on a local basis.

I have not kept track of my time, Mr. Speaker, but I presume you will call me to order in due course. I should like now to talk for a moment about scientific research in Canada. Scientific research is very important to the industrial development of Canada. I have suggested to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) that if we are to develop an industrial strategy we should make a selection of logical products for development here. I have also mentioned the steel industry with a pipeline industry as a satellite. The minister should make representations to the government in respect of things of this kind. It does not seem reasonable that we rush madly all over the place giving grants for research in all areas. Of necessity, much of the future development of Canada must be related to cold weather. The minister should be prepared to recommend expenditures in respect of obvious things, such as the development of rubber to withstand the cold, and steel that does not crystallize with frost. Surely a battery could be developed that would work better in cold weather. These are just examples of things which should be considered. I have experienced problems in respect of these items.

It would seem reasonable to spend money on the development of better products for use in cold weather. I have made this suggestion before and will continue to do so until such time as some obvious move is made in that direction. We need these things for our own use. A cat-truck has been developed in Canada and actually sold to Russia. The skidoo was developed in Quebec. This is another winter vehicle which has enjoyed great sales in the United States and has helped tremendously with our dollar surplus. These are only examples of things that can be developed, instead of spending a lot of money developing products warm weather countries have already developed. We should concentrate our research expenditure on problems which have not yet been solved. It seems reasonable that we should at least look at these problems.

Industrial strategy should be related to research efforts in the scientific field, because much of our development in the 20th century has depended on scientific research. If the government has not yet done so, it should establish a committee to study these problems and make firm recommendations as to those areas of manufacturing in this country on which we should concentrate our research. Logically we are not going to compete with countries which produce cotton cheaply. We should concentrate on those things which have a natural advantage here. A university professor in Saskatchewan said to me that we should spend more money on research in the area of wood products because of our natural source of supply. I suggest the government should look very carefully in this direction.

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this budget debate I should first like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on the presentation of his first budget. I had the privilege of a close association with the minister during his tenure of office as Minister of Justice. During that time he did an outstanding job, had the respect of all and was held in high esteem by members of all parties on the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I wish the minister well in his new responsibilities, and I am confident he will continue his good work in his new portfolio.

During the time allotted me I should like to express some of my views on various matters, most of which have been discussed in the House but many of which were brought to my attention by constituents in the riding of High Park-Humber Valley. Knowing the congenial nature of the hon. minister, I trust he will give at least some of them consideration.

I was indeed pleased that the new budget escalated the universal old age pension in step with the cost of living changes, retroactive to January 1, 1972, and also provided an increase in the guaranteed income supplement by $15 per month, thereby raising the old age security pension for those in need from $135 to $150 for single persons and from $255 to $285 for a married couple, also retroactive to January 1, 1972. These increases were long overdue, and although I still feel more can be done to alleviate the hardships suffered by some of our elderly citizens, nevertheless it is a step in the right direction. These increases, coupled with the special tax exemption for persons 65 and over as well as the increase in exemptions for the blind and the disabled to $1,000 from $650 retroactive to January 1, 1972, will indeed be welcomed by our senior citizens.

There are, however, some other situations to which I hope the minister will give consideration. One is the situation of a husband who is physically infirm and obtaining an old age pension while his younger wife is not and, because of the disability of the husband, the wife has to look after him so, is unable to work. Unless the couple have some savings, this situation creates undue hardship on the family unit and deserves further consideration. Consideration should also be given to those on old age pensions who have saved and skimped in their younger years, denying themselves some of the better things in life in order to secure protection for their later years. Often they have purchased a home and have been paying constantly increasing realty taxes. I would recommend for them that at least that portion of realty taxes allotted for educational purposes, which is the greater part of the taxes, should be permitted as a deduction from their income tax return.

Since unemployment is still our number one issue, I was happy to note that in the budget we cut corporation taxes to 40 per cent for Canadian manufacturers and processors, to be effective January 1973. The tax rate is also reduced to 20 per cent from 25 per cent on the income of manufacturers and processors eligible for small business incentive, to be effective from January, 1973. These are indeed welcome measures, but in view of the fact its effective starting date is January, 1973, corporations that are tempted by the tax cuts to expand their operations will probably not do so this year, while still others may resist the temptation, preferring to use the tax cuts to increase the dividends to their shareholders. Steps should be taken by the government to ensure that these tax cuts are employed for the purposes for which they were intended, namely the creation of jobs. The government should apply the budget's provision for a two year write-off on the total cost of machinery and equipment to 125 per cent or 140 per cent of the cost of new capital equipment, so firms will go out and purchase machinery and equipment and put people to work now.

The government's announced increase in public spending on housing is also a welcome measure and should assist, not only in providing accommodation but also in providing employment. It is regrettable that although the money supply in Canada has gone up by 78 per cent since 1970, and last year new funds grew by $16.5 billion, so the country appears to be prosperous, nevertheless we have failed to reduce significantly the ranks of the unemployed and appear to have created an illusion of economic revival.

In this budget, we have endeavoured to help the elderly citizens and lower income groups as well as large corporations and small businesses, but regrettably we have neglected that group which pays the bulk of the income and property taxes, the ones who are supporting the economy through their purchases of homes, cars and appliances, and yet are constantly neglected and ignored. I refer to the middle income group. They pay the high cost of the educational system and, in essence, subsidize the education of the children of the poor and wealthy alike. However, their children do not qualify for student loans or grants. They work hard all their lives and subsidize those who will not work. They skimp and save to provide security in days of illness and retirement, and at the same time subsidize others who will not provide for themselves. They pay for the high cost of police supervision at demonstrations, rock festivals and for the protection of dignitaries, yet when they get into trouble with the law they receive no legal aid but have to pay their own lawyer's fees. Indeed, in some cases their opponents in court are represented by legal aid lawyers whose fees they are paying. It is this group which has been ignored too long by all levels of government, and it is they who are now entitled to serious consideration. Even when nations compete in offering tax breaks to business, the middle income taxpayer gets it in the neck. The less you collect from corporations because of these tax breaks, the more you are going to take directly from this group.

I recommend that the minister seriously consider increasing the basic tax exemptions to $2,000 for single persons and $3,850 for married couples. I would also recommend that realty taxes up to $750 be deductible from income tax, together with interest paid on mortgage loans. In essence, this is double taxation and is repressive. In the case of interest on mortgage loans, the tax system is ridiculous. If I sell my home and, I am unable to obtain the full sale price in cash so take back a mortgage, I am required to declare all interest which I obtain on the mortgage as income. However, if I purchase a home to provide accommodation for myself and my family and give back a mortgage, I am not entitled to deduct the interest paid on that mortgage as an expense. I submit that these further tax concessions, by placing more funds in the hands of the consumer, would be an added stimulus to the economy.

I am glad to learn that our government, unlike the government of the United States, encourages the awareness of ethnic backgrounds. I trust that this is only a secondary aim, and that the main aim is to make us all good Canadians. I trust that our policy on multiculturism is indeed a genuine one and will not create national ghettos in this country which would be examples of old world rigidities. Whatever may be our national origin it is in our best interest not to divide but rather to draw together, remaining proud of our country of origin but also striving toward an integrated, united nation in which the aspirations and values which bind us are far more important than the things that divide us.

In the field of immigration, it was indeed refreshing to note that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) has decided to increase the number of special inquiry officers needed to process the backlog of immigration cases. Occurrences such as the recent suicide of a young Polish woman wishing to obtain landed immigrant status illustrate the genuine need for immigration reform. Immigration officials cannot be blamed for all these pitfalls, and I personally can state that in dealing with the large number of immigration cases brought to my attention I have had the fullest co-operation of the officials of the Immigration Department. The fault lies mainly with our immigration laws. In this regard I should like also to bring to the attention of the law societies of the various provinces the fact that numerous notaries—I am not referring to the Quebec situation here—and travel agents are holding themselves out as immigration experts and milking large sums of money from these unfortunate immigrants, while at the same time providing incorrect or inadequate advice. This practice must be stopped.

At this time I am also pleased to state that as a result of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) visit to the U.S.S.R. last year, and of representations made during and after the visit, I have been successful in reuniting a great number of families whose members previously resided in countries such as Czechoslovakia, Poland, Lithuania, Estonia, Latvia and the Ukraine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Deakon.]

Mr. Deakon: In some cases these families have been separated for more than 30 years. I am still continuing my efforts in this field, as well as carrying on negotiations for visitors' visas and the release of political prisoners presently imprisoned in the Soviet Union.

I submit further that amendments to the Citizenship Act are long overdue. There are presently gross injustices in the act preventing many residents in Canada who wish to obtain Canadian citizenship from obtaining it. The age and residence requirements should also be revised.

• (1620)

In view of the leading role of Canada at the environmental conference in Stockholm, may I recommend to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) that he take whatever measures are deemed necessary, in conjunction with the province of Ontario, to curtail and ultimately eliminate the pollution in the Humber River, which flows through the riding of High Park-Humber Valley into Lake Ontario, a navigable waterway.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I state that I really appreciated this opportunity to express some of my thoughts, and regardless of the criticisms, which I hope were constructive, I reiterate what I have said on many other occasions, that this land of ours, Canada, is the greatest country in the world. To realize and appreciate this one need only travel abroad, and on returning one will kiss the ground he walks on.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the minister for having remained in the House during the whole debate.

I wish to take the opportunity of this last day of the budget debate to deal with three matters which are very controversial in my riding and which remain one of the causes for the general displeasure showed by all of my constituents toward the administration of the present government.

I should like to call the government's attention, and in particular the minister's attention to the ever increasing problems in the area of unemployment insurance, particularly since November 1971.

When we had offices in every large community, we also had some problems, notably that of being unable to gather all the stamps of a worker who had had several jobs during the previous 104 weeks. Nevertheless, we had preserved the human contact, which is essential to any civilized society. But it seems that today, we have so much emphasized centralization that we have completely lost this human contact, and this is the most serious aspect of the problem.

They were able in my constituency to recover the services of two people who come to the offices in Dolbeau and Roberval for a few hours each week, but this is only window dressing. In fact, the problem is as serious as it ever was and it is the member of Parliament who has to act as a go-between in serious cases, which are numerous, since I have myself dealt with more than 1,000 cases since the beginning of this year. Fortunately, I get the co-operation of the whole staff in Chicoutimi, which makes every effort to give the best service possible.

But the final settlement does not rest with the staff in Chicoutimi. The Montreal office which has the computer covering the whole province of Quebec is responsible for 95 per cent of all the problems that we have to face presently. I have always held that it is dangerous to rely on one computer for issuing the cheques, without maintaining an emergency service against the possibility of machine breakdowns.

That is why we were not at all surprised to be given the same old reply: the electronic brain is out of order. Should it not be agreed that the change was made too quickly? And while the unemployed were waiting for their cheques weeks after weeks their anger fell on the officials of the Chicoutimi office, the only one left in the whole region. Indeed the local people had to get in touch with someone and this is the only office they can reach right now. I want the people to know at least where the trouble is and who are the persons really responsible for the ever-growing delays the unemployed have to put up with.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the government and to the minister in particular that when a worker has paid his unemployment insurance contribution, he is entitled to receive his insurance—and I do say "his insurance"—because it is not the government that pays this contribution; it has been withheld at the source without asking for any permission. This is the new democracy. And after generously helping itself, the government does not take the means to honour its contract. As a matter of fact, it resorts to any possible means to delay the payment.

If there are deficiencies in the way these benefits are paid, there are also some very serious ones in the acceptance of these same payments. How many hundreds of cases I have had to work out on this subject. The Unemployment Insurance Act is essentially quite good, but the regulations derived from it often cancel its effects and make them null and inefficient.

To prove my point, I shall give two or three examples. Take the case of work stoppage on account of illness. The act says that the insured is entitled to a maximum of 15 weeks of illness.

But is it known, Mr. Speaker, that there are regulations which determine for how long—two, three or ten weeks, depending on the type of operation or illness—a patient may receive benefits? But there is something which is even more serious: even a physicians's prescriptions are powerless against these regulations. Therefore, it is a civil servant who is neither a physician nor an orderly who will decide how many weeks an unemployed person should be ill.

I have seen many cases where even the intervention of the attending physician or specialist were of no avail. Is this situation normal in a civilized country which is sometimes considered a democracy? Really, this is the element which causes the most problems, namely, whether the decision of a civil servant, based on ridiculous regulations, should have more weight than the prescriptions of a physician.

The payment of benefits to retired workers is another litigious issue. They say that a worker will be entitled to benefits provided he refuses the Quebec pension. In any case, it is clearly specified in the act that if a man aged 65 voluntarily withdraws his Quebec pension plan he will not be entitled to receive at the same time any unemployment benefits. It is a glaring injustice which shows how deceitful a law can be. Note that this worker was obliged to contribute to the Quebec pension and the unemployment insurance plans; the premiums were nevertheless pocketed. In this field, governments are experts. To the worker compelled to abide by the two contracts they will say: we had you contribute to both plans, but we forgot to warn you that you were entitled to only one type of benefits. You have been had. I think it is the policy of any government to gull everybody for a while, but I am sure that they will not always be able to do so.

I shall mention now the case of those who leave their employment voluntarily; it is another contentious issue, Mr. Speaker. When a worker is not happy with his work or his salary, it often happens that he is forced to quit his job, and I do say "he is forced". I have seen really distressing cases; I pleaded them and I lost because the civil servants were right.

Some employers take advantage of that, particularly in springtime when jobs are rare, to have work done by employees under inhuman circumstances at excessively low salaries because they know that the workers cannot leave; if they do, they will no longer be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits or they will be deprived of them for four, five or six weeks depending upon the whim of the civil servant.

In my opinion, that section of the law is simply ridiculous because it gives every discretion to the employer over the employee and multiplies unfair practices. I simply ask the minister to consider the Unemployment Insurance Act and I am sure that he will move the amendments requested by the workers.

Furthermore, such a worker having been said to leave his job of his own free will, he is punished, as a child at school might be made to kneel in the corner, by being deprived of benefits for four, five or six weeks. He is not the one being punished, Mr. Speaker. His family will not get a penny for four, five or six weeks. Because the father could no longer endure his working conditions he had to leave his job and the whole family will have to suffer because he refused to put up with the bad treatment or poor working conditions the employer wanted to inflict upon him.

I wanted to bring this to the attention of hon. members, although I could give several other examples, but for lack of time I shall just limit my remarks. Their purpose was to call hon. members' attention to some shortcomings of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I should like to deal briefly with another matter I hold dear because it concerns everyone in my riding. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) beat me to it by drawing it to the attention of the Minister of Finance yesterday. In fact, as reported in Hansard on June 12th, 1972, the hon. member said, and I quote:

> However, I am disapppointed that adjustments were not announced which could correct some of the unfair anomalies relating to excise tax and sales tax. For example, tea, coffee and powdered drinks are exempt from federal sales tax. Ice cream cones, popsicles and the like are free of federal sales tax.

Mr. Speaker, the tax on soft drinks originated simply from a wrong interpretation of the terms "food products". I find it strange that tea and coffee, for instance, as served in hotels, etc., as well as ice cream cones and powdered drinks should have been classified as food products, while soft drinks were not.

One could think the government was not well informed enough but, I feel the contrary to be true after having looked into the inquiries the government itself commissioned and having done some reading on the subject. I am referring to the 1966 report of the Carter Royal Commission of Inquiry on Taxation, from which I quote the following:

Consumption statistics reveal that expenditures on food are regressive because they represent a substantial proportion of the total expenditures of the lower income groups. If food were exempt from tax the most regressive element in a general sales tax would be eliminated. It is clear that the need for sales tax exemption of food is strong and that the need increases with family size. Moreover, a tax on food would create administrative difficulties where farmers sell produce directly to consumers—

We believe that, to avoid regressiveness, there should be no sales tax on food. Furthermore, we consider that, to avoid discrimination between food products and for ease of administration, the exemption contained in Schedule III to the Excise Tax Act should be extended to the remaining taxable food products, including margarine, confectionery products and soft drinks—

And in the Smith report, we read the following:

Using similar language to that found in the Carter report, the Smith report in Ontario also recommends that soft drinks be reclassified and exempted from the sales tax.

It states:

Ontario Committee on fiscal affairs, 1967—

We have found that, in order to avoid that the tax be a heavy burden for the low-income and large families, the exemption for food products must be maintained, in spite of the fact that, at the present time, this exemption reduces tax revenue by more than 40 per cent. But the present definition of food products is a complex one which contains many anomalies. For instance, buttered popcorn is exempted from the tax, but sugar-covered popcorn is not . . . all food products for human consumption should be exempted. As we shall explain further, we see no serious inequality of treatment in the continuing taxation of prepared meals and alcoholic beverages. Accordingly, we favour exempting all edible food products, including marginal products such as candies, confectionery, soft drinks, vitamins, food supplements, diet supplements, saccharin, insulin, etc.

So, we can say that the government was perfectly well informed in this respect and I still wonder why it has not complied with numerous requests to consider soft drinks as ordinary food.

I do not think this changes a jot in the act because it is simply a matter of redefining what is a soft drink to classify it among ordinary food items.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the first budget brought in by the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), I feel compelled to make an observation that might help to explain some of its shortcomings. I should say at this point, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance has the sympathy but not the support of all members on this side, at least in my party. It is not easy for an aspirant to the leadership of his party to wear the mantle of Minister of Finance in such a way as not to tarnish his image. I am convinced he was thrown to the wolves, and that is unfortunate. He might have brought a measure of human dignity to the leadership of the Liberal party, if he had been given the opportunity, something that has been sadly lacking in that party.

On April 27, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he had given the Minister of Finance permission to bring down a budget. As usual, the Prime Minister avoided answering the question. On the following day the Minister of Finance announced, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), that he would bring down a budget and table the budget papers on May 8. He had about ten days in which to throw together a budget, have it printed and drum up a little enthusiasm for what most people expected would be an election budget. I am not saying it was done in exactly that way, although it certainly looks as if it were.

If this really is an election budget, Mr. Speaker, then I am all for it. In all my years in Parliament, and I will have been here ten years next Sunday, June 18, the anniversary date of the 1962 federal election, I have never seen a budget that so clearly vindicates the Leader of the Opposition. I must say that while this budget vindicates our leader and our party in its tax reduction measures, it does not go nearly as far as we should like; however, that is understandable. This government has drifted so far from the realities of present day Canadian life and has so completely lost touch with the people, that this budget must appear to it as the great cure all. It cures nothing, Mr. Speaker, being just a palliative.

What will be the effect of this budget on the youth of our country? I am particularly concerned, because this budget has done nothing for youth, nothing for those categories of young people who are still in school or just leaving secondary school and not yet employed and who are without any present hope of obtaining employment. The Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives Programs are mere stopgaps; these schemes are without stability or security. Benefits for recipients are neither stable or secure. When the money the government has allocated to these programs has been spent, and do not forget that these are short term programs, Mr. Speaker, the few in each community who have been recipients of this money will be no better off, except to this extent: they will have been given two months pay. At the end of that time they will not have learned enough from those brief programs to enable them to acquire steady jobs, which need a certain amount of knowledge and limited skill if they are to be retained. And, so, these people will wander through the swamps of idleness and unemployment; they will despair of their ambitions; their spirits will be dulled and, in many cases, destroyed.

In this country, Mr. Speaker, we need an apprenticeship system for our youth similar to the old, well tried and proven English system under which young people were taught certain skills. After finishing, they stood a good chance of earning a decent living. What I am saying is borne out, I submit, by an editorial which appeared recently in the Ottawa Journal, from which I wish to quote. The headline reads, "The Young Don't Want To Live on Welfare". The editorial reads in part:

> The Canadian Council on Social Development reports startling increases in the numbers of young people on welfare—
> Most of the young persons told interviewers they rejected welfare as a way of life; 97.3 per cent said welfare was only a temporary form of relief for them. More than a third considered it 'a big trap; once you get into the welfare rut, it is really hard to get away from it.'
> Why are so many young people who don't want to be there, in danger of being trapped in the welfare jungle? In March, the unemployment rate for the under-25s was 11 per cent, compared with a 4.2 per cent unemployment rate for Canadians 25 and over.
> This is a most depressing and worrying situation. Somehow our society in the private as well as government sectors must shape itself so that the young can go to work. If they do not it will mean far more than so many statistics about unemployed—it will mean the people who will compose the future of this nation are soured and frustrated, and their spirit no less than their citizenship will bear blighted fruit.

I sincerely hope that that possibility will not materialize. In fairness to the new Minister of Finance, I must admit that this budget is a beginning, albeit a small begining. Pensions for the elderly have been increased, no doubt in response to the urgings of the Leader of the Opposition. However, this measure stopped short of parity. To begin with, the basic pension has fallen far behind the rate of increase in the cost of living. The government appears to be hung up on the means test for the income supplement, and has again applied the modest increase to the supplement rather than to the basic pension. In addition, the government failed to take into account the abnormal rise in the cost of living which has taken place since it has been in power. The increase should, really, have reflected that rise, which has certainly been more than one of 3½ per cent. However, I would not stand in the way even of this slight increase, Mr. Speaker. Elderly pensioners in this country have waited long enough. I would not want them to wait until the government changes hands in the next few months; this, apparently, will happen.

Let me mention the efforts we have made to have pensions increased. Those of us who have been fighting for increased pensions for veterans would not mind campaigning on this budget. We could point out that, although the government has offered the veterans 3½ per cent extra, their basic pension rate is still $1,000 below the level established by a previous government. Some years ago, the basic pension was set at the level of the average, annual wage of an unskilled labourer. Today, that level is at $4,500 per year. Nevertheless, the veteran's basic disability pension has been allowed to drop to $3,500. The government previous to the present one allowed this to happen, and the present government has apparently not considered the matter important enough to take corrective action.

The pledge to maintain the basic veteran's pension at the level of the annual wage of an unskilled labourer was given by an earlier parliament. As a Member of Parliament I feel bound by that pledge. It is a responsibility I cannot pass off as lightly as hon. members opposite seem able to do. When this basic level was adopted, veterans' organizations approved it as being as realistic as they could hope for and they were prepared to live with it. If the veteran's basic pension were to be raised to that level, the increase proposed in this budget would be acceptable. Until that is done, Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept a total increase that resembles a gratuity more than a decent living for those who have sacrificed so much for their country.

I now turn to housing, Mr. Speaker. The 11 per cent sales tax on building materials remains, despite appeals from all over Canada for its removal. Now the government, more callous than ever, has announced a new housing program which it knows it can not implement before the next election. Government members know this. This is only an attempt to get support from a great segment of the Canadian public that no longer has confidence in the Trudeau administration.

The main thrust of this budget, Mr. Speaker, is the group of measures designed to stimulate the economy by offering incentives to industry and business, and here again the Leader of the Opposition has provided the guidelines. However, Mr. Speaker, the government has once again jumped off the boat before it reached the dock. Again, we have a token gesture on the part of the government in an area that has suffered the most in our system, the free-enterprise sector.

I can agree wholeheartedly with any measures that will compensate for the shortsighted policies that have resulted in a general slowdown in the industrial and business sectors over the past four years, with a resultant escalation of unemployment. Not only is it imperative that we take steps to revitalize the economy in order to create new jobs, it must be done in order to protect jobs that presently exist. We have had no evidence of that, particularly during the past couple of weeks. While I agree in principle with the measures in the budget to encourage production, I cannot accept the government's view that they have provided the answers to the problems that exist. I do not think they have gone far enough, and I do not think that there are enough built-in incentives to create jobs as well as increase production. Jobs are not created automatically when production increases, nor are jobs created in proportion to production increases.

While I quarrel with the substance of the incentives in the budget for industry and business, I reject out of hand the spurious argument of the leader of the New Democratic Party. I do not think it is evil to make it possible for industry and business to turn a reasonable profit. Profit is the stimulus that keeps our economy vital and promotes healthy economic growth. The incentive to realize a profit from one's investments creates jobs, and that is the way jobs are created in our system. I remind the leader of the NDP that the majority of Canadians like our capitalist, free-enterprise system. Indeed, it would be well for both the Liberals and the NDP to take some notice of the rejection by the Canadian people of socialism and government control of every aspect of daily life. We in this country respect the right of free choice and the sanctity of the individual. We do not need socialism, and we do not want socialism. It would be a poor substitute for what we have now.

As with every budget tabled by this government since they gained control of our country, this budget is more significant and remarkable for what is missing than for what is present. There is no mention in the budget of measures to establish a more equitable schedule of disbursements from the coffers of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This greatest pork barrel in the history of Canada keeps growing larger, more cumbersome and the department becomes less equitable in its approval of projects.

DREE is a political football unmatched in magnitude in the annals of Canadian government. It is a comedy of errors and, more correctly, a tragi-comedy. It is a tragedy because the money being disbursed by this department is tax money. It belongs to all Canadians. It is tragic because it is being used by this government to attempt to build political strength in areas where that strength, or support, has to be bought. It is tragic because this government cannot buy respect and support from any part of Canada with dollars, however many they are willing to spend. No government can buy respect and confidence. It must earn the confidence of the people and respect will follow. This can only be done if a government demonstrates that it is prepared to listen to the people, heed the people and govern for the people.

The mandate won by the government in the last election is not in any way reflected in this budget, Mr. Speaker. The mandate of the official opposition is, in some facets, reflected in this budget and there is a measure of poetic justice in the fact that the government is on the point of going to the Canadian people for a new mandate. There is a distinct possibility that the government will hesitate to put this budget forward as an election budget. In that case, we can expect a new one in the not too distant future, Mr. Speaker, and I can suggest what the government might put in that budget. First, it should go all the way on the recommendations of the Leader of the Opposition on old age pensions instead of stopping short of parity. There is no parity in a measure that does not take into account the rise in the cost of living, or of the fact that inflation is now out of control. I suggest that in the next budget the government restore the schedule of veterans' pensions whereby the basic pension is equal to the annual wage for unskilled labour. No one could accept a level that is lower than that for unskilled labour.

If the government is really serious about wanting a new mandate, Mr. Speaker, and I cannot imagine them wanting to give up the keys to the kingdom at this point, I suggest that they include in their election budget measures to eliminate the incredible waste that has marked their years of misrule. They should abandon the wasteful projects that are siphoning off the hard-earned tax dollars of our citizens and fire the ministers who have been handling them. They have had their fun and nothing can last forever. Just tell them that there comes a time when all good things have to end. Since the present government has been in power, just four years, the cost of government has doubled while the national budget has increased by 50 per cent. Using that as a yardstick, if the present government is returned to power, Canadians can expect their national budget to be double what it was in 1968. No one can deny that the present government is playing a dangerous game of brinkmanship with our economy. Every year that the present government is in power, we move closer to national bankruptcy. While such a prospect would play into the hands of the socialists in our midst, it is cause for alarm for the rest of us.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

I wish to refer to an editorial in today's Ottawa Journal pertaining to our National Debt. I will quote from it presently. This is a vital question. The minister has completely ignored that most onerous item, the cost of carrying the total public debt which now stands at $2,022 million for the fiscal year. We are now paying 14 per cent for our money. No home owner in Canada would accept this rate for a first mortgage on his or her dwelling. Accordingly, they ought not to tolerate a 14 per cent mortgage rate on our country. I now quote from the Ottawa Journal:

> The net national debt at March 31 was $17,922,000,000, an increase of $600,000,000 compared with March 31, 1971. The gross national debt, which includes assets such as government loans, advances and investments, was $47,633,000,000, an increase of $4,658,000,000 in the year.
> The cost of carrying the total public debt, chiefly in interest, rises year by year—$1,301,000,000 in 1967-68; $1,480,000,000 in 1968-69; $1,717,000,000 in 1969-70; $1,920,000,000 in 1970-71 and $2,122,-000,000 in 1971-72.
> This means that each Canadian has an interest bill of some $100 staring him in the face each year. Interest charges are not an abstraction. In 1971-72 the public debt costs were 14 per cent of the budgetary expenditure and exceeded the bill for defence.
> Every government can spin a tale on how it can not help increasing debt. Yet it still seems daft always to be paying more and more in interest when money could be employed—if debt were reduced—in improving the amenities of life and reducing taxes.

If one increases the debt, one increases taxes. We must reduce our public debt to a level more in keeping with the taxpayers ability to bear it. No one can really fault a brand new Finance Minister for adopting a protectionist posture when tabling his first budget, especially if the minister concerned aspires to lead his party. However, we have reached a point at which a budget, any budget, is of paramount concern to the average Canadian citizen. We have reached a point at which a budget must reflect the government's confidence in its ability to solve serious problems and face up to the realities of Canadian life. A shrug of the shoulder is not a good substitute for concerned leadership. Nor is a budget of this sort an answer to the longstanding ills in our economic system or to the inequities suffered for so long by the disadvantaged, the elderly and the veterans. I would not say this is a budget of confidence. I call it pussyfooting around the issues.

I had hoped I would find evidence in this budget that the government plans to decelerate its reckless program of spending and direct its fiscal strength toward productive benefits for our troubled nation. The government has not done so.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the budget debate provides Members of Parliament with an opportunity to discuss important economic issues. Today, I should like to discuss what I and many of my constituents consider to be the most serious economic issue facing the country today. I refer to the problem resulting from unsatisfactory labour relations and, in particular, to the right to strike in essential industries and in the public service.

Since the beginning of this year, my city of Montreal has been plagued by a continuing wave of serious strikes. There was the common front strike of 210,000 provincial employees which lasted for 11 days. Taking part in this strike were teachers, hospital workers, court employees, hydro workers and so on. This dispute has not yet been settled. There was also a strike of blue collar workers which started back in February. The men were ordered to return to work but the strike is presently being continued. Taking part in this strike are garbage workers, traffic maintenance men, sewer workers and the like. I might also add that there were garbage strikes in Toronto and Vancouver. All these strikes are, of course, within the provincial sphere of responsibility, but I draw attention to them because they have an impact on the entire national economy and are interrelated with labour relations in the federal field.

On the federal scene we have witnessed a strike of air traffic controllers, the NABET strike and, now, the strike of longshoremen in Quebec and the St. Lawrence ports. Both the air traffic controllers strike and the longshoremen's strike have been marked by serious economic consequences not only to Quebec but to the whole nation. As a result of this experience, people in all parts of this nation at all economic levels are seeking a better way to resolve disputes between labour and management. Labour, management, government, blue collar workers, white collar workers and all serious labour analysts are reaching the conclusion that nobody gains from a long strike. This is particularly true of strikes involving essential services which enjoy a monopolistic position.

It is evident that in most strikes more is lost by the strikers than is ever gained through wage increases and better working conditions. And we must take into account losses suffered by employers, the loss of markets, sometimes permanent, loss of work in related industries, loss of production and the loss to the community as a whole. It is my opinion that the strike is an outdated weapon in accomplishing legitimate economic goals and that where essential services are involved it is a form of anarchy, a kind of warfare between vested interests. It is very often a form of blackmail directed toward the general public, a conflict which recognizes that might is right with little concern for justice or social needs.

What I say with respect to the right to strike I apply as well to the unlimited right of lock-out. The distinguishing feature of our strikes in the public service is that the public service is monopolistic and, moreover, paid for through taxation. When a certain segment of the public service goes on strike, it is in effect, attempting to reallocate the expenditure of tax money, sometimes unjustly. Alternatively, the general level of taxation is forced up. For example, a government could be forced to spend relatively more on television services than on medical care, even though a parliament or a legislature might have decided that it was more important to spend money on medical care than on television.

There are other serious side effects of strikes in essential public services. The consumer is directly affected. Society as a whole bears the brunt of such strikes twice over, first by being deprived of certain goods or services for the duration of the strike and, second, by being made to pay in the form of higher prices the cost of the gains made by the unions. There is also the inflationary impact on the economy to be considered. In order to discourage public servants from striking, governments are often compelled to grant large pay increases with the object of placating the unions. Both the Economic Council of Canada and the Public Service Commission have admitted that this practice encourages prices to follow wages and contributes to the inflationary spiral.

There are other serious spill-over effects. For example, the 12-day strike by air traffic controllers in 1972 was the consequence of a $3 million difference between the government and the union. But the loss to the economy as a whole as an indirect consequence of the strike has been estimated at $150 million. So what was originally a dispute over $3 million resulted, due to the strike, in a loss to the general economy of $150 million.

I should like to refer, now, to some of the public opinion polls in connection with strikes in essential services. I shall read first the results of a public opinion survey published in the Ottawa Citizen on April 29. The question was as follows:

> Some people believe the right to strike has outlived its usefulness and that before any strike is permitted both management and labour should agree to abide by a voluntary arbitration decision for at least a year. Do you favour or oppose such a plan?

On a national basis, 78 per cent were in favour, 12 per cent opposed and 10 per cent undecided. In labour homes, 74 per cent were in favour, 16 per cent opposed and 10 per cent undecided. In executive and professional homes, 81 per cent were in favour, 13 per cent opposed and 6 per cent undecided. The results of a national Gallup Poll were published in the Montreal Star on May 15. The following question was asked:

> What about strikes in occupations where the public is seriously inconvenienced—such as strikes by employees of the postal service, airlines, railroads or the telephone service; do you think they should or should not be permitted to strike?

On a national basis, 32 per cent said they should be permitted, 57 per cent said they should not and 11 per cent were undecided. In union homes, the corresponding figures were 48 per cent, 41 per cent and 11 per cent and in non-union homes, 61 per cent, 28 per cent and 11 per cent.

Another poll was carried out by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion and the results were published in the Ottawa Citizen on April 19—these are all recent polls. The question read:

> As you know, there have been a number of strikes recently. In general, how serious do you think such strikes are for the Canadian economy?

I shall summarize by simply saying that in non-union homes 68 per cent of those asked described the effect as very serious, 25 per cent as fairly serious and 4 per cent as not very serious.

I should like to refer as well to some statements made recently by Mr. George Meany, head of the AF of L-CIO in the United States. According to Mr. Meany, labour should voluntarily replace strikes with reliance upon binding arbitration for a one year period. He said that the strike is a 19th century tactic, and with the advent of corporate giants and correspondingly super-unions, strikes become even-matched struggles which drag on for weeks, radiating economic shock waves far beyond the limits of the actual conflict. That is what Mr. George Meany, one of the top union executives in the world today, has said about strikes. While it is easy to recognize the frustration of management, of labour and the public with respect to such strikes, it is not easy to find workable solutions. Extremely complex problems are involved and there are no panaceas. The suggestion that we can solve the problem merely by making strikes illegal is totally unrealistic. The mere passage of a law declaring a strike illegal may not settle anything.

The present longshoremen's strike in Montreal is illegal. The Montreal policemen's strike which took place a few years ago was illegal. We have had many serious strikes which were not legal. In Australia, where there is compulsory arbitration, there are five times as many illegal strikes as there are legal strikes in Canada.

The problem with illegal strikes is to find an appropriate sanction that will deter such strikes or prevent them happening. Some suggest fines against the union, the union leaders or the strikers, but it is not always easy to enforce execution of such a provision. Others suggest that we put strikers or union leaders in jail; but we cannot jail all the strikers in a large strike, and even if we could this would not provide us with the services needed. We cannot pick men off the street to fill highly skilled and difficult jobs. With regard to jailing union leaders, we have seen that such a measure can easily lead to an escalation of the dispute and perhaps to serious political confrontation. Others suggest decertification, withdrawal of the check-off provision, or similar sanctions.

Many would argue that the most effective sanction and the greatest incentive to settle a dispute is loss of wages to workers and loss of revenue to employers. Many believe that this is the most important sanction that will lead both sides to negotiate a settlement. I shall point out later that many experts today question that particular means of settlement in certain public service and essential services disputes.

Even if we could legislate men to stay on the job, we cannot guarantee that we will get better results. We may still be faced with work to rule situations, slowdowns, wildcat strikes, product sabotage, rotating strikes and study sessions. All these tactics have been used by unions when they have deep founded grievances and no other method of settling them. In recent years there has been great concern voiced by many Canadians on this subject and there have been several studies, royal commissions and legislative provisions. In 1967 this Parliament passed the Public Service Staff Relations Act after exhaustive committee hearings. This law gave the public service unions the right to organize, to carry on collective bargaining and to strike. The right to strike was provided for, except in the case of designated employees whose duties were necessary for public safety and security. I presume the groups covered by that provision were the RCMP, the armed forces and other similar groups.

It was stipulated in that law that unions could opt for one of two routes; either for binding arbitration or for the right to strike. The majority of the unions opted for the arbitration route at the beginning, and I should like to refer to the percentage that did so. During the initial stages after passage of the Public Service Staff Relations Act in 1967 there were 81 occupational groups that applied for certification. Of those 81 groups only 10 opted for the strike route; all the others opted for the arbitration route. However, as of March 1972 the number of groups opting for the strike route had increased from 10 to 18, with the number of employees involved rising from 38,000 to 64,000.

We might ask what is the reason for this change from 10 to 18 groups in favour of the strike route as opposed to the arbitration route. Some have argued that those who originally chose the arbitration route found that they got smaller settlements than unions in the private sector who had the right to strike. Businessmen and others in the private sector should remember this when they criticize different governments for giving the right to strike to the public service. They cannot expect workers in the public service to accept smaller wage increases through arbitration procedures when they see their co-workers in private industry negotiating higher settlements with the threat of a strike hanging over the whole issue.

In 1967, the government of Lester Pearson appointed the Woods commission task force on labour relations. I should like to give the House some of the findings that commission made with respect to strikes in essential services and in the public sector. The commission said that in their view collective bargaining was the most acceptable form of resolving disputes. They said that this "antagonistic co-operation" must be contained, however, in the interests of labour, management and the public. They recommended that the services of a conciliation officer be imposed on the parties before they are permitted to engage in a strike or lockout. They also said that it was extremely difficult to say in advance in what industry resort to strike our lockout should be curtailed, and that the length of a strike or lockout is frequently the critical factor in such an assessment. They felt that we should have a flexible approach and that the determination that a given stoppage of work should be terminated in the public interest was a political decision. They said this political element is an inducement to the parties to drive them to settle their dispute.

I wanted to go into the whole subject, which I consider to be most important, in great detail, Mr. Speaker, and I was going to refer to the experience of other countries. However, since preparing my remarks the time of speeches has been reduced from half an hour to 20 minutes, so I shall have to skip a lot of what I was going to say. Therefore, I will come to my concluding remarks since I have only a few minutes left.

One of the principal points that I want to make is that in addition to the right to strike and the right to lockout there should be a right to service, especially essential services. The basis of the right to strike, which is that the cost to both union and to management will eventually force both to arrive at a compromise, I submit is no longer valid since, first of all, the cost of many strikes is now borne by the public, particularly in the service industries such as transport, education, garbage removal and so on. Second, in other cases the cost of a strike is carried by suppliers and sellers of a product. For example, a recent cannery strike ruined many small tomato growers, while only inconveniencing the union and the management of the cannery. There may have been no cost to management or labour.

The spread of techniques to save management from loss is shown in the agreement that when one airline is struck the extra revenue gained by other airlines is given, after deduction of costs, to the struck airline, or management can simply raise prices. Workers can often expect to make up their lost wages in overtime. In a recent New York school teachers' strike, the teachers demanded the opportunity of extra teaching time, even if much of it were useless. In short, the cost of most strikes is now paid by the public. Consequently, we must recognize a new right, the right to public services. I believe firmly what we must do is make the arbitration provisions in our Public Service Staff Relations Act more attractive so that more of our unions in the public service field will resort to arbitration rather than to the strike.

We should also assure that there are better grievance, conciliation and mediation facilities. We should provide for continuous bargaining to get to the trouble spots well in advance. In respect of essential services where a strike may seriously affect the economy, public health or safety, there must be provisions to prevent or end such strikes. Such provisions now exist in the act, but maybe they should be extended. It is merely a question as to where we draw the line. Parliament has always reserved the right to pass special legislation to end a strike and this has been done on several occasions. The question arises again as to whether this right may be left with Parliament or whether it should be delegated to the government to use as it sees fit.

Before I conclude, I should just like to emphasize these points. We must seriously re-examine our labour laws, especially those relating to essential and public services. We must admit that some factors do not apply today as they applied in the 1920's, 1930's and the 1940's, when labour was poorly organized and often exploited; nor is management organized in the same way. We must recognize the public's right to services, especially the right to basic essential services such as security, safety, health care and so on. We must recognize the right of elected officials to determine the priorities in allocating tax funds and the general level of taxation in order to serve the general needs of all the population, not just the demands of organized labor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret that I must inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity this afternoon to participate in this debate. I am delighted to participate for a number of reasons, but first because there was so much time spent in the committee and, indeed, by this House dealing initially with that voluminous document. I am delighted to participate because the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is sincerely trying to find a workable plan in the mess he inherited from the former minister of finance.

Before I get to the budget itself, I should like to take the opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) and the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Deakon), both of whom dealt rather extensively with the inadequacies of our immigration laws as they exist today. I intended initially to deal with some of the anomalies of that act, hoping to give those Canadians, seven million in number, who are of European or other extraction than English or French an opportunity of feeling they are part of the Canadian community. I think those two gentlemen covered the inadequacies of that act, so I will not deal with it further.

Referring to the budget itself, sometimes referred to as the pride of the Liberal party, it is amazing to recognize how quickly this government points out that there are so many thousands of Canadians who will not pay any tax at all, or will indeed have their tax reduced, while at the same time they say nothing about the thousands who will pay much more. I liken this budget to FISP and other family allowance programs recently before this House because the Liberals went across the country publicizing the fact that, under these plans, 1.5 million Canadians would get more, but they said not one word about the 1,200,000 who would get nothing.

It is true that through the budget the government has reduced corporate taxes, but it has said nothing about how it is going to maintain that tax reduction. This is a temporary measure, of course, to say the least, in the absence of any consultation with the provinces about proposed reductions in their corporate income tax. These proposed reductions depend entirely on provincial governments not changing their corporate tax structure. I should like the minister to indicate whether he has had consultation with provincial governments in this regard. I should like to know whether he has dealt to any extent with the 30 per cent credit for dividends from taxable corporations which would only have effect if provincial governments do not change their structure or grant similar credits. Will the minister consult provincial governments in this regard so the corporate structure of Canada can be made aware of provincial attitudes?

There is something wrong with government fiscal and monetary planning when we find small businessmen feeling pinched day after day, many of whom have been going out of business because there was nothing for them in the budget. There is something wrong when we find municipalities arranging their financing needs or borrowings out of the country in order to make a saving. They can get reduced interest rates. There is something wrong when we find municipalities begging for funds and assistance to establish land banks for future use. Whatever money is available to them now for this purpose comes from foreign countries. There is something wrong with the budgetary processes and policies of this government when in urban centres in Canada it is virtually impossible to build a modest home for under $18,000; when the cost of living in this country is going up constantly, and when unemployment is increasing rather than decreasing. There is something wrong when the Minister of Finance, new as he is, stands pat on a budget which is devoid of remedies for the ills of our economy. There is something wrong when the government has to resort to stop-gap measures such as LIP and the Opportunities for Youth program instead of creating the kind of economy which would provide the long-term jobs that the youth of our country are looking for and need.

Getting back to what the minister may or may not have done with the provinces, I should like to pursue this matter a little further to find out what undertakings he has received from various levels of government across the country. In the absence of such undertakings, the tax proposals in this budget could further widen the regional economic gap in Canada. One can foresee corporations phasing out their operations and moving from one area or province to another to take advantage of the absence of estate or gift taxes. In spite of DREE, these moves will take place, particularly in circumstances where existing plant facilities have been fully depreciated. One major move out of any number of regions in Canada could create untold hardship on the citizenry.

I would like to know if the minister, since taking over the Benson brainchild, has given the fullest consideration to the impact on the free enterprise posture of the country of the imposition of the capital gains tax. Has the minister seen what has happened to the corporate profit structure in the country since 1968? I wonder if he is aware that the best performance of the corporate structure in Canada was before the 1968 general election. I wonder, also, if he is aware of the impact on entrepreneurs of the dividend tax credit proposals. Is he aware that the industrial structure of this country which is most capable of buying Canada back has had, by these tax measures, its appeal to making investments in Canadian corporations made less attractive than ever before?

I wonder if the minister is aware of what has happened to taxable income in the rural communities, the farming enterprise of our country, in recent years. Is he aware of the declining total tax payable by the agricultural sector of our country? Does he know that since 1968 the agricultural economy of the prairie provinces has dropped and is staying at that low level, yet there is nothing in the budget to ease the burden of the farmer? I am expecting, Mr. Speaker, that the attitude of the new Minister of Finance may not be the same as that of the former minister toward the western provinces.

Another strikingly strange development in the House over the months has been the silence of those who expounded views on Canadian nationalism and economic nationalism. Almost daily in this House, and certainly two or three times a week, the NDP asked the government what they were going to do about buying Canada back. Suddenly there was DISC, and suddenly there was a surtax. Just as suddenly, the NDP and the Liberals who spoke about the possibility of buying Canada back clammed up; there was no more interest in economic nationalism.

What would be the result if foreign investment withdrew from the country? I would not suggest that the nation would go bankrupt immediately, but certainly the standard of living would drop to anywhere between 40 per cent to 60 per cent of what it is now. I ask how many Canadians are prepared to give up 10 to 15 years of this standard of living to buy back foreign-owned Canadian industry. However, there are reasonable alternatives and solutions with a minimum of impact on foreign investors which would at the same time encourage Canadian investors to invest in Canada more.

For a nation that is some 100 years old in terms of governing ourselves, the lack of attention given to corporate law is most deplorable. I have no qualms about attracting foreign investment to Canada. Let us invite the wealthy nations of the world to bring in all the capital they can spare. We need all the capital we can get. That is how Canada was built in the first place. But we need rules and guidelines.

Let us deal for a moment with a hypothetical situation and take Germany as an example. That country invests in Canada $100 million in German marks deposited in Canadian banks. They would have to search out our export and import markets in the hope of selling and buying goods from Canada, because for a number of reasons they would have a major investment in Canada and would have to negotiate a trade arrangement to get back some of the invested money.

What is needed is a set of foreign investment laws or guidelines so that the multinational corporations would know what they have to live with. The foreign investor will not, and cannot be expected to invest in Canada or in any other country where there is any threat of nationalization or takeover. Assurances must be given that the laws governing foreign investors can be tolerated. I give the example of a law passed in Mexico not many years ago under which it became illegal for any foreigner to own more than 49 per cent of a corporation or business in that country—51 per cent had to be Mexican owned. Yet in the long run that legislation has not stopped foreign investment in Mexico.

On the other hand, let us examine the example of the Bahama Islands. The picture is entirely different. Foreign investment has dried up almost totally there because of the government's negative attitude toward foreign investors. Surely the minister knows that acceptable foreign investment guidelines and laws can be formulated. The present foreign takeover policy, the Gray report, is meaningless and gutless. It reflects only the incompetence of this government to deal seriously with the problem. In the absence of a sound, long-term policy in this area the government has had to resort to political gimmickry in an attempt to dupe the Canadian people into believing that they have taken serious steps in an area of great concern to many Canadians when in fact they have done nothing.

I want to see a great deal of foreign investment in Canada, but I want to see it here in cash. I want to see multinational corporations with established credit bring cold, hard currency into this country and put it to work. I do not want to see multinational corporations borrowing from our leading institutions, because of their multinational credit ability, so as to acquire Canadian companies. In far too many cases the acquisition of Canadian industry by the transfer of shares and the acquisition of necessary credit from Canadian banks has resulted in a Canadian-owned company becoming foreign controlled.

I do not find withholding taxes offensive. I am sure that most corporations cannot dispute the validity of a just withholding tax. The other disaster, of course, as it has its impact on the Canadian corporate structure and is the direct responsibility of this government, is the floating of the Canadian dollar. The long-term adverse consequences of that move have not yet been fully realized.

There are other serious government instrusions into the corporate sector of the country. We have the competition act and the new labour act. Some of the strangest thinking emerges from this government on occasion. Millions of dollars are poured into the Canadian industrial complex to stimulate the economy, to stimulate business activity, to create jobs and to create business stability. DREE is trying to do all this, and the government after all this effort then introduces the competition act. The explanatory notes or preamble state that a dynamic and efficient market economy is the basis of the Canadian economic system and that the purpose of the competition policy is to keep the market as efficient as possible. Those are beautiful words. But what is necessary for a good and orderly market economy? There are a number of things necessary. There is the right of people to produce, the right of people to buy, the right of people to sell, the right of people to distribute goods and services of their own choosing, the freedom of an individual to do what he wants to do and how he wants to do it.

If you subject our industrial complex to rules and regulations that govern all aspects of commercial life, if the restrictions are so all-encompassing, so restrictive, so extensive as to regulate individual action, then those rules are no longer defensible. The sum total of restrictive legislation is that it leaves no area of freedom. The competition act is not only highly complicated but it is an administrative nightmare; it is unworkable from the business point of view. Instead of promoting efficiency and more vigorous competition, the reverse will be the end result; we will get less efficiency, less competition and less production.

A more serious effect could be that the industrial complex in Canada will have to seek greater integration with the United States of America and surely will be compelled to develop very different economic policies both domestically and internationally. I presume my time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate to outline some of the concerns I have about the government's proposals within the budget. I begin by complimenting the hon. member who has just finished speaking for outlining the basic philosophy taken by the Conservative party. He outlined a policy on the one hand of saying the government does not go anywhere in terms of its foreign ownership legislation, and on the other hand of calling for absolutely no restriction on foreign investment. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that they are trying to walk a middle line. Sometimes this works for some groups, but I suggest to Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition that the people of Canada are waiting for some direct and comprehensive policies on their part and not a continuation of their trying to walk a middle line, trying to go in two different directions at the same time.

This budget was introduced as one——to buttress the Canadian economy, to provide incentives for Canadian industry to grow and compete and provide jobs.

The document entitled "Budget Highlights" described permanent incentives to strengthen the competitive position of our manufacturing and processing industries as follows:

General corporate tax rate reduced to 40 per cent on Canadian manufacturing and processing income only, effective January 1, 1973.

Tax rate reduced to 20 per cent from 25 per cent on manufacturing and processing income eligible for small business incentive, effective January 1, 1973.

Two year write-off introduced for machinery and equipment . . . for manufacturing or processing in Canada.

That was assumed to give the Canadian economy the incentive to create employment, to go ahead in terms of benefits with jobs for Canadians, With all due respect, may I point out to the government that there is no guarantee that tax cuts of this nature will go into the development of more jobs for Canadians, that in fact the only role this kind of budget plays is in fattening the profits of corporate interests. There is no guarantee in the budget of one more job being created. One can only wonder who are the types who can praise this type of budget. I note that in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 7, the president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association was reported as saying:

This is a Minister of Finance who speaks our language . . . he did not deliver more than was necessary, but he did deliver, and come next January we will feel the beneficial effects.

I wonder who the "we" will be. I assume it will not be the vast majority of the Canadian people. The "we" will be the corporate interests in the Canadian Manufacturers Association. That is a fundamental point in describing the philosophy of the government toward multinational corporations. It is coupled with a piecemeal, loose, totally irrelevant piece of legislation concerning foreign ownership. In the finance committee today we were given a complete outline of how this legislation is worse than useless. That will be a committee report which every member of this House should read.

What did the budget do in terms of the agricultural sector of the economy? It did nothing. As a matter of fact, in terms of manufacturing and processing, in terms of who will have their taxes reduced, the ways and means resolutions accompanying the minister's speech provide as follows:

—for the purposes of this provision "Canadian manufacturing and processing profits" of a corporation for a taxation year means the amount, determined under rules prescribed for that purpose by regulation made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, of a corporation's income for a taxation year from the manufacturing or processing in Canada by it of goods for sale or lease except that, for the purposes of this provision, the manufacturing or processing of goods for sale or lease does not include

(e) farming or fishing including the processing of any produce of farming or fishing for the purpose of preparing that produce for marketing,

(f) logging including the processing of timber in the course of logging operations—

Farming and fishing, including the processing of any produce of farming and fishing for the purpose of preparing the produce for marketing, will not be included. When he was questioned in the agricultural committee, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) showed that he was not even aware of this particular aspect of the budget. His government has given no answer to the question as to whether this tax cut will in any way be related to the agricultural industry.

At the same time as that problem develops, we see at page 22 of the booklet entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent" that two cents of each tax dollar will go to the agricultural industry. In terms of the importance and significance of this industry, that is a disgusting, almost irrelevant situation created by the government which offers nothing more than corporate tax write-offs without dealing with the basic problems of the individual, of the personal income taxpayers who include the farmers.

At the same time as this government introduces fantastic cuts in corporation taxes, we remember how over the years they have proposed to introduce so-called tax reform. Last fall they claimed there would be a more equitable tax system and that they would be carrying out the recommendations contained in the Carter commission report, the concept that a buck is a buck. Then they backed down, and we still have a tax system of special privilege where a single person earning $10,000 a year in wages or salary pays $2,285 in taxes, the individual making $10,000 a year through capital pays $833 in taxes, and the individual earning $10,000 in dividends from a Canadian corporation pays a mere $193 or less. Under this Liberal government that is what is called a just society. But in the spring they brought in a budget which further reduces taxes paid by corporations. They have the gall to call this equity in our tax system.

Mr. Speaker, there has been some suggestion that the cut in corporation taxes will help our industries to react to the United States DISC program. However, it is interesting that in the finance committee today it was learned that a company can very easily keep the manufacturing of auto parts in the United States and set up the assembly plant in Canada, thus benefiting from the DISC program in the United States and the corporation tax cuts in this country. This is an atrocious manner in which to run a government and it is an atrocious claim that employment will be created through this kind of activity.

Today we have seen the unemployment figures and note no substantial change. This budget is not an answer to the unemployment problem. What is the alternative that the Tory party has been suggesting in the last couple of years for the more equitable distribution of income and the creation of full employment? All we have is a greater cry for some kind of incentive, a greater cry for a further reduction in corporation taxes, a greater cry to treat the large corporate interests in an easier manner than even this government has done. But Mr. Speaker, that is even less of a solution than what is proposed in this budget.

As time goes on we must decide the economic policy of this country. We need to develop an industrial strategy related to the creation of full employment while at the same time attacking the problems of inflation. Until the government develops a full industrial strategy instead of merely putting band aids on those parts of the economic system that keep splitting, we will not develop anything like a just society or the kind of society where each knows that the other is paying his fair share of taxes.

This government could easily have used the money provided to the corporations by way of tax cuts to reduce the taxes of the individual taxpayer in the lower and middle-income groups. This would create considerable consumer demand for goods, thus creating employment and providing for the money to flow back into the economy. But neither this government nor, I would suggest, the official opposition are going to forget their friends who sit in the corporate boardrooms and cry for concessions in order to make greater profits.

There has been considerable talk in this budget debate, Mr. Speaker, about foreign takeovers and direct investment, particularly by members of the Tory party. They say that if foreign investment were curtailed it would be a disaster for Canada, ignoring the sound economic statement made by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) who pointed out that investment in this country is not so much the problem as is the expansion of foreign firms already operating within the Canadian economy. If we are to survive in the twentieth century as an independent nation, this is the problem we must come to grips with. This budget does not deal with the farmer, the small businessman, the ordinary citizen of Canada; it deals mainly with the corporate interests and the self-interests of the party in power.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock when the House adjourned for the dinner hour I was discussing the fallacy behind the corporation taxation cuts, suggesting they would not affect the ordinary citizen of Canada. I referred to the economics relating to those cuts and suggested it was a fallacy to assume that such cuts would be instrumental in creating jobs for Canadian citizens. I submit they will merely provide additional profits for the corporations involved.

I said that in the last few years our tax system has been changing constantly. The Carter commission's report was brought down, then the white paper was presented by the former minister of finance. The House debated the so-called tax reform bill in the previous session. Amendment were moved to that bill, and then those amendments were amended. Now the government has introduced a budget which totally disregards equity in our tax system. So we have seen considerable changes. One might say this situation can be compared to a caterpillar turning into a butterfly: the butterfly is not half as pretty as one might expect. We live in a society that is still full of inequities. These extend to our tax system and to the special privileges this government has given to the private, corporate sector of the economy.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) for his budget, which has been realistic in all respects, taking into account the difficulties of our times and tending to create employment, something which we greatly appreciate.

The welcome given that budget by the Canadian people is a good indication that the minister, who has been holding his portfolio for only a short while, will be as successful in his new functions as he has been in his capacity as Minister of Justice.

As I said the measures which he announced in his speech have been welcome by most Canadians who have judged them objectively. For that matter some have already been passed and more than 1,800,000 Canadians are taking advantage of them.

Those measures are consistent with the spirit of the white paper tabled recently by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), which set objectives for those Canadians who are concerned about creating a more viable social environment. It is therefore natural that sufficient income should be guaranteed everyone within a federal state.

The budget speech also announced fiscal measures to stimulate the economy, measures that I should like to dwell upon at greater length to bring out those elements capable of promoting the creation of new jobs. All the advantages stemming from those measures are possible and are given the Canadians without tax increases.

The minister has been accused of having brought down an election budget. Mr. Speaker, the same accusations were made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) in june 1971, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought down his budget. The hon. member was so convinced he was right at that time, that he even had the audacity and arrogance of betting that a general election would be held in the fall of 1971. Each budget, over the past two years, has brought forth the same reaction from opposition members. They clamour that an election is close at hand. How can they, on the one hand, accuse the government of introducing an election budget, then on the other say there is nothing in the budget? The only ones to be taken in by that little game, Mr. Speaker, would seem to be the press, who trumpet forth that there will soon be an election, because a number of opposition members say so.

[English]

Among the social meausres indicated in the budget speech is the escalation of the basic old age security pension to the full increase in the consumer price index, effective January, 1972, and the increase in the maximum payment under the combined old age security guaranteed income supplement by $15 per month for a single person and $30 for a married couple as of January, 1972, with full escalation after April, 1973.

The announcement of these measures, together with the special exemption for taxpayers aged 65 and over to $1,000 from $650, along with a similar exemption for the blind and those confined to bed or wheelchair, came as a consequence of the will of the government to enlist the economy of the country in reaching the objectives of human development and social justice. In this endeavour the measures announced are a step in the right direction.

The increase in the old age security guaranteed income supplement is a recognition of the important contribution the people receiving it today brought to our country in their productive years, a large number in wartime, working long hours in war plants or on farms, contributing with their income tax to finance their country's total war effort. They were in the front line as active participants in the development of our country. They helped bring into being this great Canada that has so much to offer to the young generation, and they did it without many of the social benefits which today we take for granted. I have no resistance to giving our senior citizens a better life. There is no conflict in my mind as to the distribution of social assistance. While I recognize that we must give some priority to youth, we must not neglect our senior citizens.

[Translation]

The budget, Mr. Speaker, justifiably I believe, has been called a budget for old people, young people and industry. First of all, it seeks to restore the competitive potential to Canada's manufacturing industry. It also aims at neutralizing the impact on the country's economy of recent changes which have taken place on the international scene, such as the emergence of new trading powers like Japan and the nations belonging to the extended European Economic Community, or the protectionist trend imparted by the Nixon administration to the commercial policy of the United States. Furthermore, it aims at improving the economic status of several more or less marginal groups of citizens: old people, veterans, students, people who require medical care and those in need of transportation for the purpose of receiving medical treatment. Finally, it is aimed at speeding up as a result the creation of permanent and lasting employment.

Those announced measures are an indication that the minister has faith in the Canadian industry. The effect of those provisions on the economy is largely dependent on the willingness of the industry in each province to take advantage of the proposed tax concessions. It is also an act of faith in the economic potential of the country which has succeeded in creating more employment than several European industrialized countries combined.

The tax concessions granted to the manufacturing and processing industries will from now on quite favourably compare with those already granted abroad, especially in the United States and the member countries of the European Common Market.

Consequently, it is to be expected that those measures will surely become substantial incentives for the establishment in Canada of new manufacturing plants or for the expansion of existing facilities by allowing the increase of the income to be produced finally by the capital they will have invested.

Those measures may also be a first step towards the adoption of a national industrial strategy taking into account the needs of the various industrial sectors in our country. In our view, the best industrial policy would be to concentrate our efforts on those fields in which we are already successful.

• (2020)

The number of our achievements in industry may be most impressive, but we must still concentrate on traditional activities which have enabled us to demonstrate our capabilities to all other countries.

Among these activities, there is, for instance, the pulp and paper industry which is still recovering from last year's slump which was one of the worst in the past 40 years. Seldom have so many adverse factors come together in such a short time, in one particular industry: precipitation of the Kennedy Round tariff agreements, increase in value of the Canadian dollar which has now gone up nearly 10 per cent compared to 1970; finally, the 10 per cent American surcharge imposed last August, and a slowdown of the economic activity.

As a result, plants in Canada have been forced to reduce production to avoid the accumulation of excessive inventories whereas during the previous years many of them had increased their production capacity so as to be in a position to meet a world demand which was expected to be higher than it has really been. Many of these companies have had to establish large-scale programs to cut all non-essential expenses and consequently they have had to reduce to less than $50 million in 1971 their expenses for new machinery, compared with an annual average of $150 million over the previous ten years.

Another field in which we excel is aeronautics. The aircraft industry is one of the most important employers in this country, particularly as far as the production of the short take-off and landing aircraft (STOL) is concerned.

The products of this important industry are very popular throughout the world and we see Caribou, Otter and Beaver aircraft used both in highly industrialized countries and in the bush of under-developed countries.

If we want our sales promotion campaign to be successful, we must necessarily demonstrate the great merits of the STOL aircraft. It is up to us, the manufacturers, to use it, to show its great usefulness to the best advantage and to advertise its relatively low cost.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the remarks the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) made and which can be found in Hansard for June 5, on page 2847, while dealing with the act on the review of acquisitions of control of Canadian business by foreigners. I quote:

> Technology for what? To produce things people do not want. It may be the moon, supersonic aircraft or technology to provide services the people do not want. They have the same priorities for destroyers, CF-5's or hydrofoils. Now, the current one going on is that somehow there is a technology of STOL aircraft—
> —for Short Take-Off and Landing—

[Mr. Dupras.]

> —which might place Canada in the forefront.

Mr. Speaker, our interest in this aircraft is quite obvious: both in the development and sale of such aircraft, we should consider the possibility of giving a Canadian industry a development which would place it among the most important in the world. Our intention to use these aircraft between Montreal and Ottawa to test their value and that of other electronic devices connected with this type of operation is justified.

Again, I don't understand why the former minister is questionning the wisdom of the government in establishing this type of service between Montreal and Ottawa.

I do not think it is aimed at saving a few minutes to hon. members and other travelers, but by helping an industry which has given proof of its efficiency it is a way of demonstrating that the aircraft has a wide range of possibilities.

Neither do we intend to underestimate the importance of the manufacturing and service sectors in which we excel; we must also encourage the development of the primary industry. We could hardly expect the establishment of an expansion-oriented policy without national development in this field of activity. We obviously need a balanced expansion and we should move toward a national strategy.

In drawing up this industrial policy, we should take into account that belief which is of concern to our fellow citizens to the effect that we exercise a kind of monopoly over our natural resources and that we can exact a ransom from all other countries by using such resources as a bargaining tool in international trade negotiations.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that nothing can be farther removed from the truth than this belief and I find this argument utterly absurd. We are surely the largest producers of some metals such as nickel and zinc. As for other important metals, our reserves are considerably smaller.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the statement that the rest of the world would use up its mineral reserves thus increasing the value of ours is not true in terms of mineral products, since the possibilities of new discoveries on land, apart from the sea bottom, continue to exist. Land and sea contain unlimited amounts of most metals. Technology will certainly make these reserves available to us.

Indeed, our mineral resources are only valuable when they are discovered, mined and developed and if we do not reach this goal, we run the risk of losing our position on the world market. Those who believe we should spare our natural non-renewable resources should take into account that the need for some of them can disappear. Without running the risk of using up our present reserves, it would be unwise on our part not to develop them and, later on, possibly face the situation where the demand for such supposedly limited reserves of the mineral could progressively decrease on world markets.

I think for instance of coal which is mined in the eastern part of the country but which is needed increasingly less.

The changes in technology indicate that it is not impossible that natural non-renewable resources which we consider so important today because of their value can be replaced tomorrow by others of easier extraction and cheaper development.

[English]

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate for a few minutes in this debate. I feel that at the outset I should warn Your Honour that my remarks will be of a somewhat parochial nature inasmuch as I propose to deal with the serious economic situation facing the Atlantic area. I make absolutely no apology for this approach, because the economy of the Atlantic provinces is a system upon which depends the livelihood of more than two million people in the region. We did enjoy a period of great prosperity during the first half of the nineteenth century. Our fish was sold in the British West Indies, our timber found a ready market in Britain, we carried on an extensive shipbuilding industry and in general the economy was not too bad.

Unfortunately, the basis of our prosperity was undermined when ocean transportation was gradually replaced by air and rail transportation. The Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations made this clear in its report, from which I quote the following:

> With the cheapening of transportation and the growing advantages of large-scale production, industry was drawn nearer to the rapidly increasing populations of western Canada and the central provinces and nearer to the centre of United States industry which financed and controlled so many of the Canadian manufacturing enterprises.

In other words, we could not compete and an increasing number of small establishments in the Maritimes were compelled to close down. As a result, many of our people were obliged to leave for other areas. It is alarming to note that between 1961 and 1969, a period of only eight years, 150,000 people left the Atlantic area. Of these, 36,000 were from Newfoundland, 7,300 from Prince Edward Island, 58,000 from Nova Scotia and 49,000 from New Brunswick.

Perhaps the most alarming aspect of this trend is the fact that two-thirds of the 150,000 persons who found it necessary to leave were between the ages of 15 and 34, the really productive years. As a result, in my own province of Prince Edward Island today 44.2 per cent of the population are either under 15 or over 65. I notice, according to figures released a few days ago, that our province, proportionate to its population, has among its citizens more voters over the age of 65 than any other province in Canada. In the province of Newfoundland, 45.2 per cent of the population are either under the age of 15 or over 65. In Nova Scotia, the percentage is 41.4 per cent, and in New Brunswick 42.7 per cent. The Canadian average is 39.4 per cent.

Thus, we in the Atlantic area are well above the Canadian average in terms of people who have not yet reached, or who have gone beyond, the really productive years of their lives. I suggest that a lowering of the level of migration can only be achieved through the generation of employment at a sufficiently high level of income to make remaining in the area an attractive proposition.

The key to regional development is to narrow the income gap between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada. But this is a key which unfortunately nobody has apparently yet been able to turn. I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to take note of the fact that without question we are the backward area of the nation. The main impetus for development in the Atlantic provinces must come, I suggest, from the establishment of secondary manufacturing industries. It has been estimated that we need 170,000 new jobs in the next ten years in order to encourage our people to stay in the area. It has also been estimated that in order to achieve this objective the total capital investment required will be in the vicinity of $25 billion.

The people in my province are dependent to a great extent on agriculture, but unfortunately our farms are becoming fewer and fewer in number. From 1961 to 1966, a period of five years, the number of farms declined by 2.5 per cent in Newfoundland, 13.3 per cent in Prince Edward Island, 23.1 per cent in Nova Scotia and 26.1 per cent in New Brunswick. I suggest this is a very serious situation in an area so dependent upon agriculture.

Our farm labour force has declined. In 1956 there were 49,000 people engaged in farm labouring, but by 1969 it had dipped to 26,000, which represents a drop of 53 per cent. During the past 25 years some 6,000 farmers have been forced off the land by economic circumstances that unfortunately continue to plague us even today.

I was interested in some figures recently released by Statistics Canada showing that the net income of a farmer in British Columbia is the highest in Canada. After all deductions are made, the net income of a farmer in British Columbia is $4,260, compared with the net income of a farmer in Prince Edward Island of $913. In other words, the farmers of British Columbia receive five times the net income of farmers in Prince Edward Island. Therefore, how can you expect young men to enter agriculture? Indeed, how can you expect anybody to continue farming when they have a foreseeable net income of only $913? Farm income is decreasing. Last year, 1971, there was a decrease in farm income in Nova Scotia of $5.5 million, a decrease of $6.3 million in New Brunswick, $7.2 million in Prince Edward Island, for a total decrease for all three provinces of $19 million. This compares with an increase in the prairie provinces of $400 million.

Our per capita income is low. In my own province in the year 1969 it was $1,818, compared to the Canadian average of $2,913. In other words, we are a little over $1,000 below the Canadian average. The Senate Committee on Poverty found that the level of income in 68 per cent of the families on P.E.I. was less than $3,000 a year. That, again, is a very serious situation.

I suggest to the members of this government that we in the Atlantic area are not getting our fair share of money under programs such as LIP. Out of a total of almost $160 million last year, the Atlantic provinces received only $41,517,000. On the other hand, the province of Quebec received almost $63 million. I suggest that $41,517,000 is insufficient in an area so badly in need of assistance as ours. My own province of Prince Edward Island received just over $2 million. We are thankful for what we have received, it has been a help to us; but I suggest in all seriousness that it is not enough.

Spokesmen for the government tell us that we in Prince Edward Island are being taken care of under this famous development plan. Under the development plan as it is presently set up, $725 million will be spent over a 15-year period. At first sight that sounds very good, but let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that of that $725 million only $225 million is being contributed by the federal government, the rest has to be contributed by the province itself.

Therefore I ask, where is this $500 million the province must contribute going to come from? There are only 111,000 people in the province of Prince Edward Island and today our direct debt is $110 million, about $1,000 for every man, woman and child in the province. According to the latest figures released by our finance department, to service that debt alone will cost about $11 million, which is about $100 for every man, woman and child in P.E.I. So before the government can turn the wheel at all it must raise from the taxpayers—who are not able to pay—$11 million just to pay the interest on what they owe.

I always maintain that governments are very little different from individuals. I can go to a bank and borrow a certain amount of money. However, there comes a day when the banker says to me, "I am sorry; I just cannot go along with you any longer. You do not have the assets to back up your loan". As sure as I am speaking here tonight, Mr. Speaker, unless the situation changes this is what we will be facing in the Atlantic provinces. People will not buy our bonds because they will say there are insufficient assets to stand behind them. Recently, student researchers conducted a survey and out of 1,841 questionnaires that have been evaluated, 1,136, or 62 per cent, see the plan killing small farms and businesses. Only 667, or 36 per cent, are satisfied with the direction the plan is taking. In all seriousness again I suggest that the development plan is not the solution to our problems.

Let me repeat that the problem confronting all four of the Atlantic provinces is that of slow economic growth. The manifestations of this slow economic growth are lower per capital income levels than the national average, higher unemployment rates, and substantial migration. The ultimate objective must be the fullest and most efficient use of the human and material resources of the region. The opportunity for productivity, for productive work, must be made available to all our people; and our greatest hope is access for maritime manufacturers to the markets of Ontario and Quebec.

In this connection, I was particularly pleased yesterday to hear the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) announce that tenders for the supplying of commodities to the federal government would be considered f.o.b. factory. This is what he said as recorded at page 3040 of Hansard:

> A proposal which I intend to discuss further with my colleagues is the establishment of a policy under which any Canadian who wishes to sell to his national government can bid on the basis of his costs at his plant, that is his bid will be judged f.o.b. plant rather than f.o.b. destination which would of course then include transportation costs to destination.

There is no question but that this is very admirable and will probably help us in the Atlantic area, because we cannot compete by reason of high transportation costs. Let us not lose sight of the fact that this is not the only cost, that is, moving the product out of the Atlantic area; we also have the cost of moving raw materials in. In a great many of our manufacturing plants the raw materials must be brought in. In my own province, where we have been denied the causeway, the cost of bringing raw material in is a very material factor added to the cost of the finished product. Consideration should also be given to that factor, but the fact that bids will be considered f.o.b. factory will be of help. I suggest we must not forget the cost of bringing raw material in, because it increases the cost of production.

During the years immediately following the last war the Canadian economy enjoyed one of the greatest expansions in its history. But the Atlantic provinces shared only to a very limited extent in this prosperity, and it is beyond dispute that the rapid expansion of the Canadian economy as a whole has not improved the relative position of the Atlantic provinces within our national economy.

We in the Atlantic area want to contribute productively to the national output. We do not want to be dependent on any of the provinces of Canada. We do not want to be a poor relation. I know that some of the richer provinces of Canada are beginning to complain because they have to contribute to the poor provinces such as my own. We do not want to be dependent on handouts to stay alive.

There is no doubt that we have potential in the Atlantic provinces. We are well located in relation to the large markets on the eastern seaboard of the United States. We have an intelligent and hardworking labour force. Unlike many other provinces, we are free of serious problems of congestion, and our problems of pollution are very small. In fact, they are minimal and in the few cases where pollution does exist it is much easier to control. We have the potential; all we need is impetus. We need money poured into the area to encourage industry to settle there. I suggest seriously that industry will not settle in that area, because of the obvious disadvantage of transportation costs, unless help is given by the federal government.

I say, therefore, without fear of successful contradiction, that with an improved program for regional development we can and will be self-sustaining. Give us the tools and we will do the job.

Mr. Walter Smith (Saint-Jean): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to take part in the debate on the budget presented to and digested by people all across Canada. It was a very good budget and I can assure you it was well received by citizens in the county of Saint-Jean, which I have had the pleasure of representing since the last election. I should also like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and wish him much success in the portfolio he now occupies, which he is fulfilling in a magnificent manner.

Let me quote from Mr. Gerard Filion, president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. He was praising the federal government for coming around to industry's position on a number of economic matters, the free enterprise system for the high level of material benefits it bestowed, and the Canadian Manufacturers Association for its strength in vigilantly pursuing the manufacturers' cause. He said:

This is a Minister of Finance who speaks our language . . . He did not deliver more than was necessary, but he did deliver, and come next January we will feel the beneficial effects.

The opposition has not surprised me in the least in its ocmments during this budget debate. It seems its hon. members are determined to criticize practically everything the government proposes. There is never a word of praise or of constructive criticism.

This government has increased old age pensions and supplement pensions for our senior citizens. The maximum supplement has been increased $15 for single people and $30 for married couples. The tax exemption was increased from $650 for citizens over 65 to $1,000. I suggest that the opposition is constantly criticizing the government for the high unemployment rate. In the five-year period from 1965 to 1970, more than one million jobs were created. This figure exceeds the total number of new jobs created in the same period in Belgium, Germany, Italy, France, the Netherlands, Sweden and the United Kingdom combined. The total population of those seven countries, about 12 times as great as Canada's, had fewer jobs created than Canada. This momentum is continuing in Canada.

This government created the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and has spent over $900 million in the past three years in creating new jobs in the regions of Canada in greatest need. In the county of Saint-Jean many industries have taken advantage of federal subsidies for the construction of new industries and for the expansion and modernization of others. This county has been declared a designated area since December, 1970. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) extended the deadline from June of this year to June, 1973.

The county of Saint-Jean welcomes this extension because it will encourage more industry to our cities and towns. We find Canadians of different origins, French, English, Scottish, German, Chinese and many other ethnic groups working together as Quebeckers and Canadians. Many new jobs have been created in my riding under the Local Initiatives Program. This program has been well received. Unfortunately, some of the projects submitted were not accepted. Close to $1 million have been allocated to date under this program in the county, and many thanks go to the officials of the Department of Manpower and Immigration who have approved constructive projects. The officials of the local Manpower centre in Saint-Jean and others have been very helpful in preparing and suggesting projects to be created which correspond with the local needs of each section of the county.

Many new projects were accepted this year under the Opportunities for Youth program which had much success last year when it was first started. Students welcome such initiatives and it is hoped that many worthwhile projects have been accepted for this summer, permitting students to earn enough money to continue their studies next fall.

Agriculture is very important in the county, and the dairy industry perhaps employs more people than any other. Only two years ago this industry was not too healthy, but thanks to the dairy commission and the federal-provincial marketing plan which was put forward and accepted by the dairy producers, today they have nothing but praise for the government's guidance in the production and marketing of dairy products. The price of butter, milk, cheese and milk powder has increased in the past year. My congratulations are extended to the industry for their co-operation and understanding.

Market gardens occupy an important sector of the county, especially in the area of rich, black soil where each year several thousand acres are sown to potatoes, carrots, turnips, onions and many other small vegetables. Nevertheless, more protection should be given to producers of green vegetables during the fall season by imposing better controls over imports from the United States at that time of the year. Most of the carrots and turnips in the region find a good market in the United States and Great Britain.

Thanks should be extended to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) for his understanding and good judgment of the textile industry which only two years ago was threatened by imports. Much improvement has been noted in this industry in the past year and more employment has been created in the past few months. The Canadian Textile Institute has admitted that the government's policy has stimulated investment and restored confidence in the industry. However, more improvements are necessary because the industry accounts for slightly more than half the total market of textile products and our imports are higher per capita than those of Great Britain, the United States and the European Community; so the situation leaves something to be desired.

In the county of Saint-Jean there are over 100 industries manufacturing many products such as carpets, household equipment, building supplies, prefabricated homes, cables, and many others. In the past year the cities of Saint-Jean and Iberville have seen the construction of a multipurpose school erected in each city. I was happy to learn that the federal government's contribution to each was close to $2 million.

I have noticed that I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker. There are many other subjects on which I wanted to comment. However, before my time expires I would like to say a few words regarding an important problem which Saint-Jean, Iberville and many smaller municipalities have encountered each spring, especially in the past three years, namely, the flooding of the Richelieu River.

Thousands of acres of land on each side of the river are flooded every spring, and good farmland is being eroded and damaged to the extent that several acres cannot be cultivated and sown in agricultural products until late July. Damage to homes has been very high in the past three years. Last spring the water level remained high for about six weeks and millions of dollars of damage was suffered by the residents of the area.

The rock between Iberville and Saint-Jean is apparently the cause of the flooding, delaying the excess flow of water which comes from the Adirondack Mountains and Lake Champlain in the United States. In the mid 1930's when the Friers Dam was built below Saint-Jean, I am informed that plans were made to remove the rock, thus permitting the water to flow downstream toward Sorel into the St. Lawrence River, but because of the war in 1939 this project was not realized.

I understand that a joint committee has now been created jointly by the province of Quebec and the federal government to discuss the possibility of removing the rock in front of the city. The construction of a dam just below the rapids is also under consideration. This dam would allow the lowering of the water level in Lake Champlain during the winter months, thereby eliminating much of the surplus water that flows down the Richelieu toward the St. Lawrence. I would like to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Forest) for his interest and continued support in finding a solution to this grave problem.

May I conclude my remarks by saying that the government has resolved several of our problems. I hope this government will be re-elected to finish the job which we undertook a little over three years ago, to resolve all the present problems and those that may arise in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is in his seat, and we are pleased to make a few recommendations concerning the budget he brought down here on May 8.

Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the Minister of Finance for having had the courage to read out the budget speech with a broad smile, but I hardly believe the taxpayers will accept it with a broad smile. Reading between the lines, we realize that this budget again benefits those who control our economic blood.

Mr. Speaker, the minister did not mention the increase in the national debt, nor the increase in the interest rate citizens will have to pay. He did not mention that individuals will pay an extra billion dollars in taxes. He did not breathe a word about the federal government's constant deficits, nor of the rising cost of living nor, finally, of the decreased purchasing power of the dollar.

The government seems to be in a permanent state of deficit, particularly since the years 1961-62, when deficits reached $791 million and for 1972-73 the anticipated deficit is $800 million, all these deficits, since 1961, totalling $6,285 million.

Mr. Speaker, our national debt has increased over six years: in 1967, by $421 million; in 1968, by $784 million; in 1969, by $576 million; in 1970, by $392 million; in 1971, by $417 million and in 1972, by $552 million.

I shall now indicate the figures of interest payable yearly and daily on our financial burden. In 1970-71, interest on the national debt reached $1,800 million, representing $5,150,680 a day. In 1971-72, interest paid totaled $2,030 million, representing $4,561,643 a day. And in 1972-73, the figure will be $2,260 million, representing $6,191,100 a day.

Mr. Speaker, the government is rather generous for the controllers of our economic blood while over the year in interest alone we pay $6,191,000 every day to help financiers go on crushing us.

The government suggests that we now have a problem of overproduction. Accordingly the government tries to boost its trade on international markets and if a country has no money to buy our products, the government generously hands it an interest-free loan over a 50-year term and if necessary it grants it an extension of 10 years; in other words, that country can take 60 years to pay the loan back.

Here are the names of a few countries to which the government has granted low-interest loans over 50 years or more: Ceylon, 10 loans for a total of $15,500,000 at ¾ per cent interest; India, 24 loans for a total of $265,333,000, interest-free; Pakistan, 17 loans for a total of $123,238, interest-free; Jamaica, 15 loans for a total of $11,500,000, interest-free; Brazil, two loans for a total of $10,167,000 at 1½ per cent interest; Tunisia, three loans for a total of $56,000,000, interest-free.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on listing 12 other countries to which the government has granted interest-free loans. If it is possible to grant interest-free loans for a period of 50 years to all these countries for building roads, bridges, dams, water works, schools, hospitals, why does the government not want to do the same in Canada for Canadians to build everything that is related to public services through loans granted by the Bank of Canada, as we say so often?

Mr. Speaker, charity begins at home.

The budget provides that the government will collect $1,125 million more in personal income tax than in 1971.

As to the so-called gifts of the government to the corporations, I do not believe in them.

The government will pay $500 million more to our senior citizens and $425 million more to our veterans, that is, a total of $925 million. This means that the government will on the one hand distribute $925 million more, while on the other hand collecting $1.125 billion more from the taxpayers. What a gift! Once again, the taxpayers in the middle income bracket will be the big losers.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, I shall refer to our neighbour the United States which has adopted nearly the same monetary system as Canada and which is regretabbly facing problems somewhat similar to ours.

Today, the world's wealthiest country is broke. Last year, the American economy reached a new high of $1,000 billion; however, the administration of their 21 most important cities lack funds to pay their policemen, their firemen, their teachers and other employees. Because of a shortage of funds, the New York Civic Library will have to cut by half its time of operation: it will remain open 40 hours a week only instead of 78 hours, as previously.

The city of St. Louis cannot hire the policemen or firemen it needs. The city of Boston is on the verge of bankruptcy and cannot replace its 102-year-old wooden sewers. Mr. Speaker, such are the wrongdoings of our present system.

I noticed that several members dealt with the budget but that nobody, except the Créditistes, said a word about our famous limping monetary system.

[English]

Who has the right to create money?

Meyer Amschel Rothschild is credited to have said, "Give me the right to create the money of a nation and I don't care who makes its laws."

Who has the right to create money? The answer to this question is quite simple and should be obvious to everyone. Because money today represents goods and services, the people who create the goods and services should have the right to monetize them. The main reason why so many people have the wrong conception of money, what it is, and who should have the right to create it is because, for many centuries, gold and silver were used as a medium of exchange. This creates a lot of confusion among people today. The reason for this confusion is that gold and silver were not only a medium of exchange but were also commodities, because they had intrinsic value, the same as tea, furs and many other commodities that have been used as money in the past. On the other hand our modern money, paper currency and bank deposits, have no intrinsic value; they only represent goods and services. This is so important that I must emphasize it again. Paper money and bank deposits have no value in themselves. They only represent value.

I think this is quite clear, Mr. Speaker.

Here are a number of quotations from the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. During the session of 1939 the committee held 30 meetings. Its proceedings covered 850 pages. These are questions and answers made by Mr. Graham Towers, the Governor, at the time, of the Bank of Canada. How money is created by banks:

Banks issue a substitute for money.

Q. When you allow the merchant banking system to issue bank deposits—with the practice of using cheques—you virtually allow the banks to issue an effective substitute for money, do you not?

MR. TOWERS: The bank deposits are actually money in that sense.

Q. . . . As a matter of fact they are not actual money but credit, bookkeeping accounts, which are used as a substitute for money?

MR. TOWERS: Yes.

Q. Then we authorize the banks to issue a substitue for money?

MR. TOWERS: Yes, I think that is a very fair statement of banking. (p. 285)

I think this is quite clear, Mr. Speaker. That matter was discussed in this House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, although there are enough resources in Canada for everybody to live decently, one realizes that there is much poverty. Indeed, two or three Canadians out of five live in poverty. In my constituency—and I believe it is the same everywhere—the 50, 55, 60 and especially 65 year-old people are the ones who are suffer most. They do not have enough income to make both ends meet.

Recently I met a 69 year-old man whose wife is 63 and who gets only $135 a month for both of them. And recently, the provincial government told them they would not get any welfare when old age pensions are increased to $150 a month.

I see that one of the government members finds that funny, but older people do not think it is funny.

I hope the hon. Minister of Finance will take notice of our recommendations.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the last moments of this debate I want to refer, not in a very sensational way, to what to some might not believe to be a very sensational subject, that is, some matters concerning my own riding which are affected by federal expenditures. Before doing so I want to join with others in this House who have extended their congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on assuming his new portfolio, and to congratulate him in particular on the introduction of his first budget.

The riding of Vancouver Quadra is a city riding, a slice out of residential Vancouver. It has no industry, no great commerce. It is essentially a riding made up of residences and has, in fact, very few new high-rise towers. It is really an old-fashioned residential district. It has, however, within its boundaries some institutions to which, over many years the federal government has made very substantial contributions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: I refer to the University of British Columbia, situated at Point Grey in the city of Vancouver. Let me give you an idea of the size of this university, Sir. On a year-round basis, 50,000 people work or teach or learn on this campus. During the daytime it has the population of a small city. Despite the fact that it is essentially a provincial institution, the impact of the federal government upon it is substantial. I shall not refer at length to the per capita grant formula, to student loans and to other ways in which federal funds go toward the support of the university and the students, but in particular to a few projects which are remarkable and which I think should be drawn to the attention of the House.

One such project is the health sciences centre which has been under development of the University of British Columbia for the past decade. When completed, this health sciences centre, combining all the disciplines of medicine and paramedicine in the University of British Columbia, will have a teaching hospital of some 350 beds, research and teaching facilities involving the teaching of 450 medical students and 600 nursing students. In addition, an estimated 3,000 students of allied health professions will receive part of their training in the university hospital. The allied health professions include rehabilitation, dentistry and dental hygiene, social work, pharmacy, psychology, home economics and physical education. If you were to visit the University of British Columbia today you would see buildings housing these various teaching, research and healing institutions in the process of construction or already constructed on the campus.

The contribution of the federal government, which is to be matched by the provincial government, toward the construction of the health sciences centre was recently announced at $24,389,533. The press release which made that announcement went on to say that $36,272,788 has been contributed to the University of British Columbia for the health sciences centre since the establishment of the health resources fund in 1966.

Almost equal in size, and eventually to be almost equal in impact, is a little known project now under construction at the University of British Columbia called TRIUMF. The letters stand for Tri-University Meson Facility. Essentially, what that means is a cyclotron into which has gone some 5,000 tons of steel. It looks like a battleship being built on the promontory at Point Grey. The steel for it was fabricated at the Davey shipyard in Lauzon, Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: This yard was the only one in Canada capable of handling pieces of steel of the required size. The problem of shipping this steel to British Columbia and assembling the pieces on the campus of the University of British Columbia was enormous. The federal contribution to this cyclotron is $23,300,000. This is one of the three meson factories now under construction in the world; the others are at the Swiss Institute for Nuclear Research near Zurich, and the Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory in New Mexico. Less powerful accelerators for somewhat similar purposes are being constructed at Columbia University in New York, at the European Centre for Nuclear Research at Geneva, and in the U.S.S.R.

When TRIUMF is completed and in operation, the experimental work there will combine scientists of many disciplines—physicists, chemists, biologists, therapists, metallurgists and others—in a common new research facility that will be unique in the world. It should also be stressed that TRIUMF will welcome research workers from all across Canada. Indeed, proposals for use of the facility have already been received from the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Newfoundland as well as the neighbouring province of Alberta.

I wish also to refer, Sir, to some other projects of interest which are under construction or just recently completed on that campus. Through the agency of Central Mortgage and Housing during the years 1970 and 1971, loans have been made for the construction of new student residential towers in the amount of $12 million. To an increasing extent students are being housed on the campus. This is made possible through the resources of CMHC.

I refer, also, to a new and very interesting project in which I recently played a small part.

• (2120)

Mr. Stanfield: We do not want to embarrass the hon. member, but he might appreciate a little applause.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, on May 20 I had the pleasure of going to the University of British Columbia with a cheque in my pocket for $2,500,000.

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: This was part of the $10 million contribution of the federal government to the B.C. centennial celebration of 1971.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the government issue all its cheques in B.C.?

Mr. Deachman: I had the pleasure of carrying this one, sir. The $2,500,000 was given for the construction of a museum on the campus of the University of British Columbia. It will be a showcase for the university's collection of artifacts and northwest coast Indian art. The archaeological collection contains 70,000 pieces—

[Mr. Deachman.]

Mr. Stanfield: The museum will be a good place to bury the remains of the Liberal party.

Mr. Deachman: —mostly from B.C. sites, which are important to the study of North American pre-history and which, incidentally, are not now being displayed, most of them being stored in boxes. The northwest Indian art collection of 10,000 items includes the most comprehensive Kwakiutl collection of any museum of the world. A major part of the museum's art collection will be donated by Walter Koerner of Vancouver, a member of the board of governors of the university and former board chairman.

Mr. Stanfield: The museum would be a good place to house the artifacts of the Liberal party.

Mr. Deachman: Since he came to Canada from Czechoslovakia in 1938, Mr. Koerner has been collecting masterworks to illustrate the achievements of tribal art. These collections altogether will make this museum which is to be constructed on the university campus one of the most outstanding archaeological museums in Canada.

Sir, if time permitted I would describe the impact on the University of British Columbia of a number of national health grants, of grants made by the Fitness and Amateur Sports Council, of grants in the field of architecture made by Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, and of aid extended by agencies such as the Canada Council which has contributed much to the development of scholars, teachers and people from all walks of life at my university.

An hon. Member: And Members of Parliament.

Mr. Deachman: I include Members of Parliament because there are some in this chamber tonight who are graduates of that university.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say something that every member of this House knows who represents a constituency in which there is a university, teaching institution or institution of higher learning. Sometimes we are prone to forget the impressive impact of federal spending in the shaping of the role of universities in Canada and in the shaping of men and women who attend those universities and who want to teach and to learn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity, even though only a few minutes remain, to take part in the debate on the budget. I have always felt it a great privilege to be given the chance to speak on the budget. In the budget debate, of course, we learn the ways and means by which the minister proposes to tax people and to achieve those objectives which the government thinks are desirable. I have always felt that it is a great privilege to speak in a debate like this, because if there are things you do not like about the budget you can pick them out and tell the minister what you think.

I congratulate the minister for the budget speech he made and trust that some of the objectives he has set for this government will be met. He said that it was his aim and objective to bring down a budget that would provide more jobs. Those words did not fall on deaf ears so far as I am concerned. Everyone in the chamber applauded his statement. We all hope, trust and pray that the minister's objectives in that respect will be realized.

Mr. Bell: We want more jobs.

Mr. Flemming: However, I have some misgivings about the budget; they have arisen principally because I have found it is difficult to find people who will do certain jobs which require to be done. I believe that many jobs are available which could furnish employment but that people are not anxious to take them. Forestry work is a case in point. To my knowledge, people can earn an excellent wage by working in the woods and cutting trees into logs which in turn are processed into lumber. The lumber is then processed and used for housing and industrial uses.

People are saying, "Why should I take a job when I can get more from welfare than from working?" I know something about wages and salaries and I question the assertion that people can get more money if they are on welfare. However, that is what some people think and that is what they say to me.

When I spoke recently to a man from New Brunswick he was terribly concerned because he could not get help. He had to move his equipment 200 miles because the people needed to furnish the raw material he used were not available. It seems to me there ought to be better co-ordination among various departments of government so that available jobs are advertised and made known to people who under ordinary circumstances should be able to perform the work. I should think that Statistics Canada in Ottawa could furnish unemployment figures and, as well, figures relating to the available jobs in various categories. It seems to me that these figures could be produced from information that could be made available from Manpower offices.

The other day in New Brunswick I was told of a plant—I can tell the minister its name if he wishes—that may be forced to shut down in mid summer, when unemployment is supposed to be lowest, because not enough people were available to supply the raw material necessary to keep the plant going. So it seems to me that the government should try to bring about better co-ordination among the activities of various departments so that we might know what jobs are available and which people are available to fill them.

I have never thought that people should be able to choose between working and living on welfare. I do not think we ever intended people to be given that choice. I do not believe anybody ever intended that the productive ability of our people should be disregarded. What makes the matter worse is that a good many of us are being taxed to provide the welfare that is paid to some people as an alternative to working.

What am I recommending to the minister, Mr. Speaker? I think he ought to use his intelligence and great influence with the government and see that common sense is applied at the administrative level. I suggest that steps should be taken so that all local activities coming under the auspices of Manpower, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and social welfare programs are carried on in the same office. Steps must be taken so that there is frequent, almost continuous consultation among the officers in charge of each of these divisions. Available jobs must be advertised; there must be publicity in this regard. Also, there must be publicity with regard to the general category in which people available are willing to work. There must be information as to their physical strength and willingness to perform the tasks stipulated. Experience in this field will soon be acquired, I suggest because our people soon acquire skills. Personally, I believe people prefer to work rather than not work. Also, the health of the worker would improve and his self-respect would be greatly enhanced. If the minister is to achieve his objective of providing more jobs, he must get down to a grass roots examination of the problem and make up his mind that the provision of handouts is not a permanent remedy.

I believe there is definite satisfaction with the increase in the old age security pension for people who have no other means of income. As for the veterans' pensions, I always thought that veterans who volunteered their services, fought the country's battles, risked their lives in various theatres of war when a great deal was at stake, were entitled to the most generous consideration possible. We voted that way. I am sure everyone within the sound of my voice is pleased that that bill carried.

Then there is the matter of the reduction of the general corporate tax rate. Also, the first $50,000 of corporate income is reduced by 5 per cent. Both these reductions are on manufacturing and processing income. I am not certain what will be considered manufacturing and processing but I assume that any business which changes raw material of any type by manufacturing and processing, thereby enhancing its value, will be eligible. Usually secondary industry is established, at least in my part of the world, because someone has vision. As a general rule, someone has vision and wants to do something. We have an outstanding illustration of that in the constituency I have the honour to represent. I refer to McCain Foods.

I believe I should give the House and the country some very pertinent information relative to McCain Foods and the contribution it makes to the general well-being of that part of Canada in which it is located, which happens to be my native New Brunswick, my own county of Carleton, and to our country in general due to the volume of its production which is exported to the United States. The grant which they received, which has received some publicity since the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) appeared before the committee, has contributed to the tremendous expansion of McCain Foods. This has had beneficial results in a part of Canada which is suffering from economic disparity. That grant will result in the creation of 770 jobs or it will not be paid.

The grant was based on a total capital expenditure of over $17 million and was, I am satisfied, entirely in accordance with the terms of the act and not due to any special treatment. It was much more justified than was the expenditure of a great deal of the taxpayers' money by this government. In fact, the spending of many millions of dollars is completely unjustified when one thinks of the wasting of $150 million last winter on local projects and $30 million more this summer, the cost label being put on without any call for tenders or anything. If I had enough time I could give details that would scare hon. members. With this sort of expenditure one cannot help but wonder where it will all end. I suggest to the minister that if he wants to go down in history as being a great Minister of Finance, he should keep better watch than has been the case so far on this whole question of expenditures.

While on this subject I wish to go into the history of the events leading up to the establishment of McCain Foods. I know a good deal about it, for various reasons. During 1956 the government of New Brunswick was approached by four McCain brothers. They presented to the government, of which I was the premier, figures to show that we were importing certain foodstuffs, especially french fried potatoes, to such an extent that a local industry providing it would have good prospect of success. As a basis for the government of that day guaranteeing their bonds, they undertook to provide substantial equity financing to the full extent of their financial ability and of any credit they were able to obtain. They carried out their commitment to the letter.

The government of the day complied with their request and guaranteed their bonds. That decision has turned out to be a good one. It has never cost the people of New Brunswick one penny. It has been a success story from the start. The business has never ceased to expand. It is still expanding. It has spread into the United Kingdom where they have established a branch plant. It has spread into Australia with another branch plant established there. But it retains its head office in Florenceville, Carleton Country, New Brunswick, Canada. They have gone north into Grand Falls where they have established another plant. The direction for this worldwide empire comes from the head office in Florenceville.

But, Mr. Speaker, the end is not yet. These young men are not through expanding the business. With the research which they have established and is available to them, and the experience they have acquired, they are prepared to expand further. Indeed, they advise me that already they have made progress with certain plans for further expansion at Florenceville which in time will be discussed with the government. I for one recommend to this government that they be given the utmost consideration in accordance with the provisions of the statute under which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion operates.

In closing, let me quote the progress made by McCain Foods in a comparatively short time, about 16 years. I have secured information in this regard. This company, in business less than 20 years, now has the following achievements to its credit which I am pleased and proud to place on the record of this House. The minister knows about this New Brunswick plant because the McCains are not particularly strong Conservatives. As a matter of fact, it is quite the opposite. That makes no difference to me at this moment in bringing their accomplishments to the attention of the House.

The value of farm products purchased by McCain Foods in the year 1971-72 was $6,400,000. The average daily purchase of farm products by McCain Foods is $40,000. The number of employees in New Brunswick working for McCain Foods is 1,607. Altogether, in all their enterprises, they employ over 3,000 people. McCain Foods is the largest food processor in the world, excluding the United States. The value of McCain Foods exports of foodstuffs for the year 1971-72 was $3,040,000 processed in New Brunswick. The total value of the New Brunswick potato crop is $15 million: McCain's purchase a substantial portion of it every year. McCain Foods process 21 different food products. At Florenceville and Grand Falls, New Brunswick, their two plants represent a capital investment of $29,500,000 and cover an area of 21½ acres. This is the story of McCain Foods.

These are the things I would like to bring to the attention of the minister. By encouraging this sort of enterprise the minister will achieve his objective of supplying more and more jobs for the people of Canada. This is a part of the country that has the very definite label of disparity on it. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I give the minister this information because I feel he should be in possession of the facts.

I do not need to tell members of this House of my complete confidence in this company and the McCain brothers who direct its activities. The government of which I had the honour to be the head indicated its confidence in 1956 by guaranteeing their bonds. That is the acid test of confidence, is it not—to guarantee bonds for a substantial amount of money? Our government indicated this confidence in 1956. That confidence has been completely justified by subsequent progress and success. So far as the officers, management staff and personnel of McCain Foods is concerned, I have the greatest respect for every member of the organization including the McCain brothers themselves. Their ability has been demonstrated and their personal capacity and integrity I have never doubted or questioned.

Whatever criticism I have of the government for waste and extravagance, I include none at all for the assistance they have given to this industry located in a part of Canada generally recognized to be suffering from what is known as regional disparity and handicap. I can think of no better way to bring about an improvement in economic conditions in this or in other areas than by assisting an industry such as McCain Foods Limited. I reiterate my recommendation to the government that it continue to extend the utmost consideration to any planned future expansion of this outstanding industrial undertaking.

FEASIBILITY OF USE OF UNIT TRAINS FOR SHIPMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I request the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter of the most urgent and pressing necessity. The subject is the government's proposed policy to utilize the inland terminals at Saskatoon and Moose Jaw to assemble unit trains to ship cleaned grain to export positions and the subsequent purchase of 2,000 new hopper cars to implement that policy. In view of the well-founded criticism that the use of these trains for grain shipping will add additional costs to the grain moving system, and therefore to the producer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture be instructed to investigate the financial feasibility of the use of unit trains for grain shipment from inland terminals, and report back to this House as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be proceeded with.

RAILWAY BOXCAR ALLOCATION TO MEET FARMERS' DELIVERIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion in the following case of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of the lack of boxcar allocation by the railway companies to meet the specified time of Wheat Board quotas, thus creating inability on the part of farmers to deliver their grain within the specified time, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave):

That the question of boxcar allocation by the CPR and CNR be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and that the standing committee report to the House thereon by the end of the month.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a matter of pressing necessity, concerning the longshoremen's strike which has been lasting for months in the ports of Quebec City, Montreal and Trois-Rivières, on account of one item in an already signed collective agreement which is interpreted one way by the employers and another by the unions.

As the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) does not permit the employers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must state, without making a speech, what the purpose of his motion is so that the Chair can ascertain whether or not there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I was indicating that my motion is intended to ask the Minister of Labour why he denies the employers the right to prosecute the unions because of an illegal strike.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House directs the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration to study this situation and, if necessary, that a recommendation be made to the minister to use compulsory arbitration as a means to put an end to a labour conflict which has lasted too long, causing difficulties for Quebec consumers as well as employees and employers and which is resulting in the import and export trade being diverted to Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

WHITE LAKE DOMINION RADIO ASTROPHYSICAL OBSERVATORY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion related to the pressing need to protect the important research work being done by the White Lake Dominion Radio Astrophysical Observatory near Penticton which is being threatened by encroaching land subdivisions. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose):

That the matter of the White Lake Dominion Radio Astrophysical Observatory and the severe damage which will result to its outstanding research facilities from encroaching land subdivisions be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates for study and report.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXHIBITIONS ASSISTANCE BILL

MEASURE TO PROMOTE AGRICULTURAL AND FISHERIES EXHIBITIONS AND DEVELOP COMMUNITY FACILITIES FOR USE IN CONNECTION THEREWITH

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-214, to promote agricultural and fishery exhibitions and to provide for the development of multipurpose community facilities suitable for use in connection with such exhibitions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Question No. 528—Mr. Burton:

1. What was the total cost to the government of construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway?

2. Since completion of the St. Lawrence Seaway, what was the total spent on the Seaway?

3. What is the total cost to the government, to date, in developing harbour and grain storage and loading facilities at the Port of Churchill, Manitoba?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question being quite lengthy, I would ask that it be printed in Hansard and taken as read.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to reads as follows:]

1. At 31 December 1959, the year in which the Seaway opened, the cost (in thousands) to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority was $310,691,000 comprising: Montreal-Lake Ontario section, $284,971; Welland Canal, $25,720; Total $310,691.

2. Since 1959, up to 31 December 1971, the construction cost has been increased by: Montreal-Lake Ontario section, $51,773; Welland Canal, $75,902; Welland By-Pass, $144,570; Total $582,936. (Construction cost—31 December 1971 (including interest during construction—$36,431.))

3. The National Harbours Board advises as follows: The cost of berthing facilities, land, buildings, grain elevator system and equipment is $19 million at the end of December 1971.

LIP—CENTENNIAL PROJECTS FOR QUEBEC PARISHES

Question No. 619—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Have projects been submitted under LIP to help organize centennial celebrations of Quebec parishes and, if so, (a) what are the projects (b) what parishes are involved (c) what projects were accepted?

[Translation]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Records of all projects submitted are not maintained by the Local Initiatives Program under such categorical listings as "projects to organize centennial celebrations of Quebec parishes". A file search of active LIP projects reveals that: (a) no such projects can be identified; (b) parishes cannot be identified; (c) no such projects would seem to have been accepted.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT AGENCIES AND DEPARTMENTS—CHANGE OF NAME

Question No. 133—Mr. Coates:

1. How many agencies of government have had a name change since June 25, 1968, and in each instance, what was the former name and what is the present name?

2. What has been the cost to the federal treasury of eliminating stationery and other such matters associated with the operation under the former name and what has been the cost of replacing such necessary requirements of these agencies under their new names?

Return tabled.

Mr. Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I bring to the parliamentary secretary's attention question No. 525 of April 25. Would he look into the matter of having that question answered?

Mr. Jerome: I will do so, Mr. Speaker.

Motions for Papers

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 50 is acceptable to the government.

CONTRACTS DEALING WITH PUBLICITY FOR DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Motion No. 50—Mr. Nystrom:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all contracts dealing with publicity and/or information entered into by the Department of Labour (including the Unemployment Insurance Commission) in the fiscal years 1970-71 and 1971-72.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion No. 12.

COPY OF FEASIBILITY STUDY COMMISSIONED BY AIR CANADA REGARDING CONSOLIDATION OF RESERVATION OFFICES IN CANADA

Motion No. 12—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all papers including the Feasibility Study commissioned by Air Canada in respect to the consolidation of reservation offices of Air Canada in Canada, including estimates as to the savings to be made by the Company, the reduction in staff complement, etc.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move the motion on behalf of the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this motion was dealt with in the last session. It was explained at that time that the feasibility study requested relates to an aspect of Air Canada's internal operation. The report is considered privileged. In these circumstances, the hon. member may be willing to withdraw his motion.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Jerome: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate. Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on two or three occasions I have raised the matter of notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 52 to 55 inclusive which relate to correspondence and documents regarding the possibility of assistance being given for the building of a fish processing plant in the vicinity of Prince Rupert, B.C. With the sad event last week in which another cannery and part of the waterfront of Prince Rupert were destroyed by fire, these motions take on even more significance. The parliamentary secretary has committed himself on two occasions that he would deal with them expeditiously. I wonder whether he could explain what he meant by that?

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I do not recollect that that was my choice of language. I did say that we were having difficulty in answering some of these. There was a series of five which the hon. member put forward. We also indicated to him that another notice of motion for the provision of documents which he tabled will be dealt with next Wednesday. We are trying to do as much of this as we can in the time available and will continue to do so.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSITION OF MINISTER REGARDING INTERVENTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour with regard to the dock strike in Quebec. Can the minister inform the House whether he has personally intervened in the Quebec dockworkers strike? If so, can he indicate what action he has proposed?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not personally intervened in the sense that the Leader of the Opposition probably means. I have on repeated occasions urged the parties to do that which they are obliged to do having regard to their obligations to each other, their obligations to the port and their obligations under the law. That kind of intervention I have indeed pursued vigorously.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the minister feel that there is no position that it is appropriate for him to take other than to urge compliance with the agreement that exists between management and the dockworkers? Is it the position of the minister that the strike must continue with the government standing by except for urging compliance with the agreement?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, there is more than compliance with the collective agreement involved: the law must be complied with. I am placing myself in the position of urging that position on the parties. I go beyond that and say that for the long-term interests of the docks and the long-term interests of the port of Montreal, in which we are all vitally interested, the two parties must come to a mature position of honouring their agreement for the public interest as well as their own. If we permit them some escape from their obligation, the long-term interests of the port of Montreal will not be well served.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that the country is being very ill served by the strike, which has been described as calamitous by the president of the Wheat Board and is costing millions of dollars, is the Minister of Labour not prepared to intervene personally and actively with a view to bringing about a situation that he regards as necessary for the long-term health of the docks and the industry associated with it in Montreal and other ports in Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me this is essentially a repetition of the first question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps for the moment we might allow the hon. member for York South to ask a supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question to the minister is simply this: Is he not prepared to intervene actively, personally, in order to bring about the result he says is essential and desirable rather than simply stand up here and preach?

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—USE OF ARBITRATION PROCESS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Permit me to say to the minister that I appreciate his position in connection with the need to observe the collective agreement as well as the law. But may I ask him to inform the House whether either of the parties has declared itself ready to use the arbitration machinery provided for in the collective agreement? As I understand it, not only is there provision for arbitration machinery but a panel of arbitrators has actually been named, headed, if I remember correctly, by Judge Gold. Has either of the parties agreed to use that arbitration machinery and, if so, why is it not doing so as it has to do under the law?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Maritime Employers' Association has expressed its willingness to arbitrate. It has, however, not initiated the proceedings. The International Longshoremen's Association has put its position somewhat in this fashion, that it is open to the other party to initiate proceedings but the longshoremen do not themselves wish to initiate these proceedings. But their own agreement provides that either party may begin arbitration proceedings. It is not enough to express willingness; one must take action.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the provision in the agreement and, if I remember correctly—I have not looked at it for a long time—the provision in the relevant section of the act that either party may initiate arbitration proceedings, and in view of the fact the employers have said they are willing to go to arbitration, may I ask the minister, first, whether the employers are demanding as a condition of going to arbitration a prior commitment on the part of the union that it will accept the arbitration award, as it is required to do by law in any event, and, second, whether the expression of willingness on the part of the employers does not open the door for the minister to enter and make sure that they write the necessary piece of paper which would start the procedure?

Mr. O'Connell: They do not need a piece of paper. The grievance procedure does not call for the other party in the dispute to make any prior commitment as to the result, and it is not proper, in my view, for one party to anticipate either the nature of an award or the posture the other party might adopt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South on a further supplementary and then the hon. member for Témiscamingue for a following supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: I could not agree more with what the minister has just said. Therefore the employers are obviously playing some kind of game in failing to initiate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate. Perhaps the hon. member would now ask the supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: I was about to do so, Mr. Speaker. This is the reason for my question. In view of the fact the employers have no right to anticipate either the result of the award or the posture of the union if the award goes against it, is it not the minister's duty to make sure, now, that the arbitrator under the collective agreement is appointed? Has he not the authority to appoint an arbitrator and start the arbitration proceedings going?

Mr. O'Connell: There are two aspects of that question to which I ought to reply. First, I would not follow the hon. member in laying the onus entirely on the employers. The Longshoremen's Association is as much in violation of the agreement and the law as are the employers. They, too, if they are aggrieved, ought to initiate proceedings. As to the second point, I do not have the authority under the law or, of course, under the terms of the collective agreement to appoint an arbitrator. I would point out that the two parties themselves appointed the arbitrators and that four arbitrators are named in the agreement. The initiative falls on one or the other of the two parties. They each have the obligation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE TO SECURE COMPLIANCE WITH COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I have just arrived from Montreal where I appeared this morning on a television program and I was asked by longshoremen, over the telephone, to invite the minister to intervene in their dispute. Does the minister recognize that, first of all, the provisions of the present collective agreement have not been respected by shipowners, computers, which were to be introduced only as from September, having been put into operation earlier, actually in May? Is the minister prepared—I believe he has the power to do so—to intervene in order that at least the provisions of the collective agreement be adhered to?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the collective agreement provides the means for resolving that dispute. The minister is not in a position to resolve the dispute for the parties.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Is it not a fact that under the collective agreement it is the grieving party that must start the arbitration proceedings? In this case—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might like to rephrase his question. First, he might resume his seat. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, but when a question is prefaced by "is it not a fact" that such and such is the situation, that is clearly argument. It seems to me that the last questions have clearly gone from questions to argument between the minister and hon. members. I would think that we should try to return to the question period and perhaps after a while recognize an hon. member on the next question. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Mr. Allmand: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. member for York South was argumentative and put to the House something that was incorrect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF DEPARTMENT TO ALLOW SHIPPERS TO SUE UNIONS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put another question to the Minister of Labour.

Can he tell us whether his department has denied shipowners the right to prosecute the unions for calling an unlawful strike?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the last part of the question escaped me, I regret to say. I wonder whether the hon. member would kindly repeat it.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether it is true that his department has denied shipowners the right to prosecute the unions for calling an unlawful strike.

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Maritime Employers Association did at an earlier point request consent to prosecute. At that time I declined on the ground that other remedies more rapid than a court proceeding were available to them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As hon. members recognize, we might go on for the whole question period on this subject. For the moment the Chair will again recognize the hon. member for Shefford, and then the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings who seems to be very worried that he may not have a chance to ask a question.

[Translation]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—PROPOSED MEASURES TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the House what remedial measures he would suggest to conclude an agreement as quickly as possible, since he has just admitted that there are other remedies?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add further to the responses I have given this afternoon.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In searching for a means by which the minister might be able to be of assistance in bringing this disastrous strike to an early and satisfactory conclusion, has he conferred with his predecessor who once described himself as the "Babe Ruth of the bargaining table" so that he might try to make a few hits himself in this important matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE—CANADIAN POSITION ON RESOLUTION TO BAN NUCLEAR TESTING—FURTHER STEPS TO OPPOSE PROPOSED TESTS BY FRANCE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps I might direct my question to the Prime Minister. It concerns Canada's posture at the Stockholm conference in abstaining on the resolution banning nuclear testing. Does this indicate a new policy and does the government or the minister intend to announce a new policy in light of Canada's abstention on this very important issue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer the question on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The abstention was in committee at a preliminary stage of the resolution. The reason for it was that the Canadian delegation, after consultation among its members and with Ottawa, found the resolution could be improved by not being directed at one country in particular but by expressing more thoroughly Canada's opposition to all forms of nuclear testing. It is because this type of amendment was not brought into the resolution that we indicated some dissidence at the committee stage but, as the minister has said publicly, if no amendments are brought forth we still intend to vote for the resolution in the plenary session.

• (1430)

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his explicit response. In view of that response and Canada's action in sending a note of protest against the proposed French south Pacific tests, does the government intend to take further steps to oppose the forthcoming tests in the south Pacific scheduled for this summer?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, when the question is before the plenary session, if it has not already reached it, we will of course vote for the resolution. That is one further step that comes to mind immediately. I have no other that I can indicate at this time.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, was the government of Canada consulted before the decision was made to abstain on the interim resolution? Were instructions given by Ottawa?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know there was consultation between the delegation in Stockholm and the Department of External Affairs here. I cannot say that instructions were given. It was not a matter that was raised at the cabinet level. But the officials, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of the Environment have great experience in these things and they took what was the best tactical position in order to further our aims at the conference.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPERCUSSIONS FROM VISIT OF RENÉ LÉVESQUE TO FRANCE—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister who must know that René Lévesque is now in France.

A morning paper reports what a French official said, who calls Mr. Lévesque "Mr. President" and expresses the wish that Quebec separate from the rest of Canada indicating that France would support him completely.

Does the Canadian government intend to make representations to the French authorities with regard to the attitude of that French official?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about that story, but should it be as the hon. member has just told us, it seems to me it would be improper for the federal government to worry about what an unknown civil servant might be saying in France.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I did not say "an unknown civil servant" but "a French official", a man who belongs to the French government and who calls Mr. Lévesque "Mr. President". It is also said that separatism is inevitable—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his supplementary?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, what I want to say requires a preamble, but that is done.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to protest against that behaviour of a member of the French government who interferes in the affairs of Canada, which are our business and not that of France?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows how much we agree on the heart of the matter but, as I said, I am not aware of the statement to which he referred and I do not know who made it.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose that we could call Mr. Lévesque president of something even though this is not very important for us. So, I cannot very well see for the moment any cause for concern to the government, except that I think it would be a mistake to give too much publicity to a Canadian who travels in Europe, as he is perfectly entitled to do, in order to get votes there because he cannot find enough here.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

INSTRUCTIONS TO EMBASSIES CONCERNING VISITS BY LEADERS OF CANADIAN POLITICAL PARTIES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Does the government give special directives to its embassies when the leader of any political party of the federal or provincial scene visits foreign countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do not issue special directives. I said a moment ago that all Canadian nationals who hold a Canadian passport—whether they are proud of it or not is another matter—are entitled to the services of their embassy if they so wish.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for South Shore on a supplementary question, but we should try to move on more quickly. Hon. members will appreciate that we have not yet completed the first round of questions. I would invite the co-operation of hon. members in limiting the number of supplementary questions, if we are going to make some progress.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister on the subject of Canadian affairs. Having gone from the NDP to the Liberal party, does the blue carnation he is wearing today mean he is going to consider joining the Conservative party?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF NAME AND ADDRESS OF LOCAL PROJECT CO-ORDINATOR

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact I have been refused the name and address of the project co-ordinator of the Opportunities for Youth program in my area, information I require for reasons well known to the minister's office, I should like to ask whether this concealment of information is the result of a directive of the minister or some other member of his staff and, if not, could I be supplied with that information forthwith?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might reply, but I have some doubts about the kind of question asked by the hon. member. It seems to me that we will have a debate on this subject in a few minutes. I sometimes think that hon. members during the question period set foundations for the contribution they intend to make in the debate later during the day. Having said that, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the truth is that I did not conceal anything. I gave the telephone number and I do not know what more the hon. member wants. Apparently he has not had success with that telephone number. I tried it myself an hour ago and got all the explanation I wanted. The hon. member says the telephone does not ring or that it is not answered. This was not my experience.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning the concealment of information brought about by the fact that a member of your staff refused to give me—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering whether the hon. member is addressing the Chair.

Mr. Hales: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I shall address the question to the minister through you. The fact is that a member of your staff refused to give me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hales: —a member of the minister's staff refused to give me the name and address of the project co-ordinator. He informed me he had received a directive that this information must not be given. My point of privilege, and it affects all hon. members, is that concealment of information should not take place. I ask the minister why this information is concealed from hon. members? It is well known that the information I want cannot be obtained in Ottawa and that it is easier to get it at the local level. However, we are not allowed to find out the name and address of the co-ordinator.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that if the hon. member has a question of privilege he ought to give notice in the usual way and the Chair would then rule whether privilege is involved. It seems to me the hon. member has asked a question and the Chair has allowed the minister to reply. If the hon. member has a supplementary question perhaps he might try to clarify the situation in that way but again I must remind hon. members that we are running short of time.

• (1440)

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary will be very brief. Will I be provided with the name and address of the project co-ordinator in my particular area?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that according to my information the hon. member has been provided with all the information, but apparently he cannot make any better use of it than he did the telephone number.

FINANCE

GRANT TO EDMONTON EX-CONVICTS SOCIETY—MISSING FUNDS—INTENTION TO PROSECUTE

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): In view of the fact that the ex-convicts society in Edmonton, which received a large grant from the Secretary of State's department, has now revealed that approximately $10,000 is missing from that fund and that someone absconded with the money, is it the intention of the department to prosecute the guilty parties, if caught?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the case mentioned by the hon. member and I question quite seriously his allegations, but each time irregularities have crept into the management of a project—very seldom fortunately—order was restored, appropriations were cut off and even reimbursements were demanded.

GRAIN

WHEAT—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF DELIVERY QUOTAS BECAUSE OF ALLEGED FAILURE OF RAILWAYS TO ALLOCATE BOXCARS TO MEET NEED

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that Canadian National and Canadian Pacific rail car allocation is not meeting the needs of the Wheat Board quota system, can the minister inform the House whether or not quotas will be extended so that rail cars may be properly allocated and farmers may meet their delivery requirements?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as has been explained to the hon. member from time to time, the allocation of cars is handled effectively by the Canadian Wheat Board. So far as I know the railways have been meeting the requests of the Wheat Board for the spotting of cars. There are difficulties from time to time about the exact number of cars to meet total quotas and these are dealt with especially by a very effective Wheat Board.

Mr. Knight: In view of the fact that the last car allotted for durum at Crane Valley was on October 19, 1971, and that quotas will soon run out, would the minister consider extension of the quotas at least in the Weyburn block?

Mr. Lang: The Wheat Board had this matter brought to its attention and in the past they have handled it very effectively. If there is a special difficulty to which I should direct my attention I will be glad to do so.

[Mr. Hales.]

REQUEST THAT AVAILABLE SPACE IN COUNTRY ELEVATORS TAKEN OVER BY POOLS BE LISTED

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the pools have taken over many of the country elevators and there is no longer competition at many points, would the minister ask the Canadian Wheat Board to request elevator agents to list the amount of available space at these points, because there seems to be some discrimination against shippers who were formerly not pool customers? Will he ask the Wheat Board to list the amount of space at these particular points so that these people will have the same privileges as other customers of the pools?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): There have been thorough discussions between the Canadian Wheat Board and the various elevator companies in connection with the operation of the distribution of cars during the months of May, June and July. A satisfactory agreement was reached about the handling of this matter to ensure that every producer would have the opportunity to deliver grain to the elevator of his choice.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I happen to have had a different experience from that related by the minister. I ask him whether he will ask the Wheat Board, or will the Minister of Agriculture ask the Canada Grains Commission, to instruct elevator agents to list the amount of available space each day so that every customer may have an opportunity to deliver?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation on the part of the hon. member.

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD TO COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Is he now prepared to refer the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board to the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that answers to questions like this can be sought?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, reference of the report to the committee is on the order paper. I take it that discussions are going forward in the ordinary way about moving this recommendation forward. For our part we are ready to go ahead at any time.

Mr. Speaker: Again I wish to point out to hon. members that there are five or more supplementaries and perhaps 25 other members seeking to ask questions. There are just a few minutes remaining before the end of the question period. Hon. members who have questions that can wait until tomorrow should resolve right now that they should be postponed until tomorrow. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville on a supplementary.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my question is not a supplementary.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICES

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continued decline of prices for wheat, barley and rapeseed and the disastrous effect this will have on the income of farmers in western Canada, I should like to ask the minister whether it is his intention to review and increase initial prices for the new crop year under the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to reject the premise in the opening remarks. Declines in prices have not been continuing. Levels of prices have remained fairly constant in a number of grains to which the hon. member refers. There are, of course, periodic fluctuations in the case of rapeseed. There is certainly no intention to make any change at this stage in the initial prices.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville on a supplementary, but we must try to give other hon. members an opportunity to ask questions.

OATS—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1970-71 CROP YEAR

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. On May 3 and again on May 31 I asked the minister about the status of the final payment on deliveries of oats for the 1970-71 crop year having due regard to the fact that a credit of $4.5 million appears in the pool account as indicated in the Canadian Wheat Board annual report. On one occasion he advised this could be discussed when the Wheat Board appeared before the committee, and on another occasion he advised that the information would be supplied to me. Can the minister provide further enlightenment on this subject?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Canadian Wheat Board closed that particular oats pool effective May 19. It ordinarily takes approximately a month for it to finalize accounts. Before very long I should think the final cheques will be going into the mail.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEETING OF CULTURAL AND TECHNICAL CO-OPERATION AGENCY IN PARIS—ALLEGED MISUNDERSTANDING ABOUT SEATING ARRANGEMENTS FOR CANADIAN DELEGATES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State.

In view of the imbroglio at the Paris meeting of the directors of the Agence de coopération culturelle et technique, could the minister tell us if there were previous agreements in that connection between Quebec commissionner Yves Michaud and the Canadian delegate, Mr. Bissonnette?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the particulars regarding the imbroglio mentioned by the hon. member, but I can assure him that an agreement was concluded between the federal government and the provincial government of Quebec to the effect that the delegates of each government could occupy the two seats provided for Canada on the board of that agency.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO TASK FORCE ON TRANSPORTATION ANNOUNCED BY PREMIERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the meeting yesterday of the maritime council of premiers at Charlottetown and their decision to establish a task force on transportation, and in view of the soon to be implemented further freight rate increases, does the Prime Minister know whether the Minister of Transport has been in touch with the Maritime premiers and has indicated whether or not some assistance, both financially and in terms of information, will be provided so that this important task force can be effective?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can say the minister has been in touch recently with some Maritime premiers. I cannot answer the last part of the question, but I am sure the minister will give it consideration when he returns from Toronto.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that yesterday the Minister of Transport undertook to contact the Atlantic premiers, and also in view of the fact there has been an expressed inability to acquire sufficient information on transportation problems within and to the Atlantic region, would the Prime Minister undertake to contact the Atlantic premiers so that such information might be available to them?

• (1450)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am frequently in contact with the Maritime premiers. We exchange telephone calls and visits, and I am sure that if they have something to raise with me they will do so immediately.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL IN SEARCH FOR BOY LOST IN BUSH NEAR CALABOGIE, ONT.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does the Department of National Defence make Canadian Armed forces personnel and equipment available for search and rescue operations within the province of Ontario, as requested by the Ontario Provincial Police, and, if so, can the minister assure the House that every possible assistance is being offered by the Canadian Armed Forces in the search for five year old Adrian McNaughton, lost since the evening of June 12 in dense bush near Calabogie, Ontario?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have a helicopter and over 100 servicemen taking part in this search. We are willing, of course, to give all the help we can.

PUBLIC SERVICE

USE OF FORM LETTER BY COMMISSION TO NOTIFY APPLICANTS OF ERROR IN STARTING SALARY QUOTED

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Why is it necessary for the Public Service Commission to have a form letter to notify recruits that an error has been made in the starting salary quoted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that that question might be placed on the order paper. If this is a matter of urgency, which is not obvious at least to the Chair, it might be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Cadieu: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question would be: how many such errors have occurred in the past six months where the salary quoted has been downgraded?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not saying the matter is not important—I am sure it is—but the supplementary seeks statistical information and I would urge the hon. member to consider the advisability of placing the question on the order paper or giving notice to the Chair to discuss the matter at the time of adjournment.

GRAIN

ECONOMIC VIABILITY OF UNIT TRAINS FOR SHIPMENT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. With reference to my proposed motion under Standing Order 43 of a few minutes ago, will the minister make a full statement on motions as soon as possible to clear up what appears to be a serious credibility gap between statements he has made recently with respect to the economic viability of the unit grain train experiment and the answer given to me by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council on May 24 as found on page 2502 of Hansard?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a credibility gap between those two answers. I will give the hon. member an undertaking to make a statement in the House. We are undertaking some pilot projects and when we have the results there will be some useful information to give to the House.

[Mr. McBride.]

Mr. Southam: Can the minister assure the House that if there are any increased costs because of the trucking of grain to inland terminals the farmers, directly or indirectly, will not have to bear the cost of these experiments?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, in the announcement of the experiments it was made clear that we were participating financially.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I had a question I wanted to ask the Minister of the Environment, but in his absence may I direct it to some British Columbia minister or related minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might give that some consideration. For the moment I will recognize the hon. member for Waterloo.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST THAT PERSONS EMPLOYED BE ALLOWED TO CONTRIBUTE TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the discouraging employment figures for the young and the projections that unemployment will continue to be a serious problem for them, is the minister giving consideration to permitting young people working under the Opportunities for Youth program to pay into the unemployment insurance fund so they can collect unemployment insurance benefits when their projects no longer exist?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the people whose projects are subsidized within the framework of the Opportunities for Youth program must be compared to independent entrepreneurs. They are involved in carrying out a task for which they receive a grant. As far as the provincial laws, the minimum wage or other matters are concerned, they are dealt with by the promoters of these projects and have nothing to do with the program itself.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might spend the last two minutes of the question period on supplementaries. We will reach the end of the question period very soon.

Mr. Saltsman: In view of the fact the government is paying these young people salaries, is the Secretary of State now prepared to remove their designation as self-employed, which is a legal fiction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Oxford.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH AND LOCAL INCENTIVE PROGRAMS—ACTION IN THE EVENT MONEYS EXPENDED NOT ACCOUNTED FOR

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State and also the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. With respect to the Opportunities for Youth program and the LIP program, is it necessary that those in charge of the various projects keep accounts, keep track of the moneys that are expended, and if the moneys cannot be accounted for what happens to the people concerned?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question, it seems to me, should be placed on the order paper.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—ACTION ON RECOMMENDATIONS IN ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL STUDY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. What action is he taking on the recommendations put forward in a special study commissioned by the Atlantic Development Council on the failure of the Regional Development Incentives Act in Newfoundland and how to make Newfoundland more attractive under that act? This question is particularly appropriate in view of the fact the recent unemployment figures for May show that the province of Newfoundland still lagging behind the rest of the country—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question and the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am just back from Newfoundland. I have been in the Burin peninsula and the programs of my department there were very successful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Has the minister received this study from the Atlantic Development Council, and what action does he propose to take on the recommendations contained in the study?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I have received the report. There are some parts of the report with which we agree and some with which we do not agree, and we are acting on it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary to the previous question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the House will allow the hon. member for Egmont to ask a supplementary but we have reached the end of the question period. I must apologize to hon. members who have not had a chance to ask their questions today.

Inquiries of the Ministry

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER FUNDING

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put questions to the Prime Minister in terms of possible further funding of these special programs in view of the high rate of youth unemployment, and the Prime Minister said it was a constructive suggestion and was under consideration. Could the Secretary of State say whether in fact this matter is being seriously considered, and in view of the shortness of time whether there might be an announcement in the next few days?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this is obviously a matter that does not fall within the purview of my department, but of the government as a whole.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the question was directly with regard to the special program known as Opportunities for Youth for which the minister does have responsibility. Perhaps he did not fully understand my question. It was with regard to possible potential further funding in view of the very high rate of youth unemployment.

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, that is what I said, that potential higher funding is in the hands of the government, not of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At considerable personal self-sacrifice I have had consultations with the other House leaders and it has been suggested that we might cut down the length of speeches on the supply motion today to 20 minutes each for the mover of the motion and the first speaker on the government side and 15 minutes for all other speeches. I think there is a general disposition to accept that. It might add to the quality of the debate and provide more opportunities for hon. members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, we all agree.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: As there is unanimous agreement it will be so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE ADEQUATE INFORMATION WITH REGARD TO PUBLIC BUSINESS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved:

This House, conscious of the failure of the Government to keep the Canadian people and Parliament adequately informed, urges that steps be taken by legislation and otherwise to provide clear rules for freedom of information with regard to public business.

He said: Mr. Speaker, because of the lack of time I shall deprive myself of the opportunity of giving by chapter and verse the many situations where the government has failed to provide to members of this House the information to which they are entitled. The lacklustre and sorry performance today of hon. gentlemen opposite, from the chief offender down, gives undoubted corroboration to the motion I have put before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, if one looks at the written questions, one will find that a large percentage of them are questions which have been on the order paper for more than two months. If one looks at the requests for production of documents, one will find that many of them have been on the order paper for three months or more. If one listens to the questions asked by hon. members in the opposition and hears the alleged answers given by hon. members in the cabinet, the most objective, independent and impartial observer must conclude that there is a great need for this motion.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) placed before the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) an oral question with a preamble which I think illustrated my point. In the preamble, the hon. member stated that somebody in the department had followed the instructions given to him. Following a request that the name of the program co-ordinator for an Opportunities for Youth program be made available the hon. member was told, and the House must accept this, that instructions were given by a very high source that such information was not to be given to a member of this House, acting either for himself or the people of his constituency. This is the kind of performance, Mr. Speaker, which makes it essential to put this motion.

In addition, I have in my hand a copy of an Order in Council dated May 4, 1972 which reads as follows:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, pursuant to section 34 of the Broadcasting Act, is pleased hereby to appoint Mr. Laurent Augustin Picard to be President of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to hold office during good behaviour for a term of seven years, effective August 1, 1972, and to fix his salary at the rate set out in the schedule hereto.

The schedule is attached and provides for an annual salary of $60,000 but in front of that Order in Council there appears the following statement:

The Specific Salary of any person named in the attached Order in Council is Confidential information. It must not be divulged to unauthorized personnel. Please attach a copy of this notice to any duplicate which you may make of the Order in Council.

Is this the kind of freedom of information we are going to have in this country, under which mundane matters such as the salary of an official of a public corporation is to be considered an official secret, bound by the provisions of the Official Secrets Act? We have come to a sorry pass in this democratic country if not only members of this House but the public who pay the taxes from which is derived the salary of the President of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or the head of any public body, are not allowed this information. This is a pretty sad state of affairs and it is something which must be examined.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the very fact that I found it necessary to put this motion is proof that need exists; the very fact that the public is unable to secure the information it wants; the very fact that hundreds of written questions are not answered or are not answered adequately; the very fact that oral questions are not answered adequately or properly or are stone-walled by a minister's answer, these examples are all proof that something must be done. The performance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and members of his cabinet with regard to providing information to the public is shoddy and discreditable. Accepting this assumption, what I seek to do by this motion, and by steps I have taken on behalf of this party in the past, is to reverse the existing process.

Today, anyone seeking information from the government must go, hat in hand, saying "Please, kind sirs, will you provide these facts to us?" If the government thinks it is right to do so it will say "Yes, you are good boys and we will let you have this particular fact or produce this particular document for you." What I seek, Mr. Speaker, is to reverse that process and show that there is and must be at all times an obligation upon the government to furnish to the people of Canada, to the media, to members of this House and the other place, information which they request as well as documents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I will be the first to admit that there must be exceptions to this. Obviously, in cases involving such things as national security where the statutes provide that certain information or documents shall be exempt—and a government always has this remedy, to pass a statute to exempt information—or where an investigation with regard to a criminal offence is taking place or in income tax matters, I readily accept the proposition that these should be exempt. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I contend that there is still ample room for an act on the statute books of this country to provide for the right of the public to information concerning public business.

Two years ago I proposed a private members public bill. I put it back on the order paper this session in order to question members of the government, from the Prime Minister to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) with regard to a bill of this kind. The bill is simple. Clause 3 reads as follows:

Any Canadian, or any person not being a Canadian who resides in Canada, may apply to the government for a record made in the course of public business and the government shall, within a reasonable time thereafter, provide a copy of such record to any person who so applies or make such record available for inspection by him.

The bill provides for exceptions and there is a further provision that if the document is not made available a member of the public could apply to a court for an order that the document be furnished. On a hearing, it would be competent for the government to plead that such a document fell within the exceptions. I am not taking the position that these details are things which are absolutely essential. Any bill which may be passed must conform strictly to this general principle but, of course, there is room for change. Before this debate is concluded I should like to hear from some member on the government side that they are prepared to consider that a measure of this kind or a white paper or the subject matter, should be referred to a committee for consideration.

• (1510)

As I said, I simply propose to change the burden of proof. Responsibility must fall on the government to justify its refusal to furnish any information or document. Surely all members can accept this. Important people in various organizations have accepted this proposition.

I noticed the following statement which appeared in Volume 1 of the Report of the Task Force on Government Information:

There were two other conclusions or, rather, principles that were basic to our thinking, and we suggest them as the very cornerstone of a new policy on information. They are that, the Government has an obligation to provide full, objective and timely information; and that the citizens have a right to such information.

Do any hon. members opposite disagree with that proposition? If so, before the debate ends I hope they will stand up and say so.

I have before me an excerpt from something a distinguished Canadian wrote in 1964. In part, it reads:

Democratic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information. In this way people can objectively evaluate their government's policies. To act otherwise is to give way to despotic secrecy—

I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was not listening. He was closely involved with the writing of those words. Would he like me to repeat them?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, read that again.

Mr. Baldwin: If he identifies these words, he may claim to be their author. I repeat what was said in 1964 by this distinguished Canadian who had not yet risen to his present position in this House:

Domestic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information. In this way people can objectively evaluate their government's policies. To act otherwise is to give way to despotic secrecy—

Mr. Trudeau: That is why we created Information Canada.

Mr. Hees: But the government has given way to despotic secrecy.

Mr. Baldwin: Ah, Mr. Speaker, how the author of those words has been seduced by four years in power as Prime Minister!

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We set up Information Canada, did we not?

Mr. Baldwin: I will now refer to a speech made on May 21, 1970 by the previous minister of justice who now has been promoted—a term I use with trepidation—to the position of Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Speaking to the Conference on Computers, Privacy and Freedom of Information, held at Queen's University from May 21, to May 24, 1970, the hon. gentleman said:

—the right to know is fundamental to any participation in democracy. The public cannot be expected to dialogue—still less decide—meaningfully if it is refused the very information which would make such a dialogue and decision-making possible.

What is necessary, then, is a Freedom of Information Act entitling the individual to information which the government authority has arbitrarily seen fit to withhold.

The minister said later in that speech, "... the criteria for non-disclosure should be set forth publicly in the statute ... ".

I tried to take the minister's advice. I brought forward a bill which incorporated views and thoughts I had held and expressed publicly in this House, hoping the then minister of justice would support my bill and that the Prime Minister would forget partisan politics and say, "Yes, this is a good bill; we will support it and adopt it as a government bill."

Mr. Trudeau: It was badly drafted. The hon. member should go back to the drafting table.

Mr. Baldwin: I questioned members of the government about this matter. On June 28, 1971, following the report which had been made by the Science Council of Canada, I directed the following question to the Prime Minister:

In light of the charges made in the report by the Science Council of Canada to the effect that the Canadian people are being deprived of access to certain information, will the Prime Minister ensure that that information is made public and certainly available to the Science Council of Canada?

The right hon. gentleman said he was not aware of the charge and would look into it. I then asked the Minister of Justice of the day if he would support the principle of Bill C-250, the bill I mentioned just now. The minister said:

I share the objective of the hon. member, as he knows, Mr. Speaker. I should like to thank him again for his help on the Statutory Instruments Act—

That act had nothing to do with my question. This shows in what manner, when we attempt to bring before members of cabinet legitimate and proper proposals, we are sloughed off, as it were.

Earlier that year, on September 27, 1971, I directed the following question to the then Minister of Justice:

In light of the very strong recommendation in the report of the Economic Council of Canada that the government should proceed as quickly as possible to clarify the rights of the public to access to public information without bureaucratic or political strings, is the government planning to bring in a bill to this effect?

There was no answer at all. In light of these facts and this record, it is high time this question was considered by this House, by the country and by the media. We need legislation in this field. The Official Secrets Act ought to be modified. I have lost hope for this government, the members of which were spawned in a bureaucratic muskeg. This is a government of bureaucrats, run by bureaucrats for bureaucrats. So far as we are concerned, it will take an election and a new government to rectify the matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The right hon. gentleman said something about Information Canada. Mr. Speaker, Information Canada has been set up. I point out that there are some gems to be found in the report of the task force which ultimately was instrumental in the development and establishment of Information Canada. This organization was conceived in an establishment orgy of confusion and dissimulation. It was born in an atmosphere of political controversy and double talk. There is no hope for Information Canada. Even the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) who can usually, quite successfully surround, envelop and ultimately swallow issues of this kind was compelled to admit, under strong pressure, that Information Canada is not as valuable as it ought to be. That is strong language for that hon. gentleman. Consider, also, the Phillips report which was leaked. Mr. Phillips, the deputy director general of Information Canada, in the report said more or less what I have said: that, so far as Information Canada is concerned, it ought to go.

I see my time has about gone. May I address this question to hon. members of this House: in the light of what I have indicated, in the light of facts of which the government is well aware, does the government not think it is high time that, for the benefit of this House and the people of Canada who pay for the gathering of information, there should be embodied in the statute books of this land and in the practises of this House some rule, some law, which would enable the people of Canada to receive the information to which they are entitled and which is gathered for their benefit?

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, we, of the New Democratic Party, support the motion of the official opposition, for two reasons. First, we believe the people of Canada are entitled to full and clear information on how their business is being conducted by government. We do not think they are being given that full and clear information at the moment. Second, we believe that the methods the present government uses to disseminate government information are ineffective, costly, duplicative and carry with them this danger: They permit the government to give the public information about government, that is, information the government wants to give, rather than information the public would like to be given. No wonder the people of Canada and their representatives in this House are concerned about not obtaining full and clear information about the way their business, government business, is conducted by the federal administration. Consider the money involved alone, Mr. Speaker. In this place, we are the trustees of the spending of the public's $15 billion or $16 billion of tax dollars a year. The public is into a variety of enterprises and services ranging from the delivery of mail, the rubber business, the mining business, housing, highways and even movies and television.

There is one item that was approved in this House a few years ago. I refer to the decision to construct a National Arts Centre. That one decision cost every Canadian, man, woman and child, approximately $2.20. I am sure that most members of this place, as well as Canadians generally, approve of that decision, but I bring it up now to point out how one little item of government information can be of real interest to the taxpayers of this country.

The reason I am speaking for our party at this time is probably that I have a bill on the order paper, Bill C-98, which deals with secrecy and how to avoid it. The bill standing in my name relates to public access to government information. Aside from that, I am also very much interested in government information as a whole and the individual information services. I will say something about that a little later in my remarks. It sometimes seems to me that government information and government secrecy are interchangeable terms.

The present government has been spending millions of dollars getting out government information. For the most part, as far as I can judge, it is publicity about the government. It spends this money through various departments and agencies of government, many of which are staffed by good friends of mine. They are good fellows, former newpaper and public relations people. I know that in every case they are anxious to do a good job in their fashion, but they have to operate in line with today's set up of government information services.

A few years ago we received a report of a task force on government information. I want to emphasize that this was not a report by an opposition group or committee. This was a report by a government committee set up by the government. That report, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has already indicated, strongly criticized the government for its failure to provide the information sought by Members of Parliament as representatives of the people of Canada.

It is a fact that at this moment there are many motions for the production of papers on the order paper. We are all familiar with the set phrases used by spokesmen for the government in denying members of this House information they seek on behalf of the public. The aim of the motions which we and other members put forward is to gain access to information which will reveal some very interesting facts to the voters and taxpayers of this country. It would reveal the basis of the decision of the government on matters of vital interest to the Canadian public because these decisions and the manner in which they are arrived at affect the lives and dollars of a great many of our people. To the extent we are denied that information, there is government secrecy.

At this point I wish to quote the explanatory note of the bill covering this area which I put forward on behalf of my party:

This bill is in aid of the public's right to know in what manner a government is administering the public duties entrusted and delegated to it by the people: save for exceptions that are in the public interest the bill enacts Bentham's basic parliamentary Rule that public affairs must be conducted publicly.

I will not go into the details of the bill. My time is even more limited than that of the official spokesman for the official opposition. However, we have a bill which, if enacted or even sent to committee for approval, will result in a great gain with regard to opening the gates of government information to the representatives of the people here and the public. I wish to again refer to the task force report which was very critical of the government on this point. It pointed out that while the government was spending an estimated $3 million a week to provide publicity, largely to say how good the government and its agencies were, it withheld the basic facts that many people wanted to get at in the way of data and information which determines government decisions.

When Information Canada was established, it was set up partly to co-ordinate and improve the efforts of existing information sections in the various departments of government. The idea was that the cost of these services could be reduced and co-ordinated. In fact, Information Canada has become another layer of costly information while the departmental information sections remain in business and have actually increased their numbers and, in some cases, their costs. The situation is rather like that of a metropolitan council being set up in an area where there are a number of municipalities to co-ordinate and reduce the costs and do better planning for the whole area. In actual fact, with regard to Information Canada we have had another level of government information established. Actually, the costs of the various individual departmental and government information services have been increased rather than reduced since Information Canada came into being. Not many months ago, one of the officials of Information Canada indicated that unless Information Canada could find something useful to do, it would have difficulty justifying its expenditures.

In February, 1971, the government replied to some questions of mine with data which indicated that, despite the creation of Information Canada, most government departments were continuing to increase their staffs and salaries of their particular information branches. The government departments and agencies have increased their information staffs to 992. This is the individual sections of the individual departments. That was up from 900. They gained about 10 per cent since the advent of Information Canada. The staff of Information Canada in 1971 numbered 381. Today, the comparable figures are as follows. The staff members of individual information department sections have increased from a figure of 900 before Information Canada came into being to 1,091 today. The staff of Information Canada has jumped from 381 people in February, 1971, to 516 at this time.

When the second top official of Information Canada stated in a memo that that body had better find something to justify its existence, I asked the minister reporting for Information Canada what was the situation and what he proposed doing. He replied at that time, as I recall, that there was an overall look being taken toward improvement and organization. I see the minister is here today. He can correct me if I am mistaken. I said then, and I am still of the same opinion, that unless Information Canada and, indeed, some of the information agencies in the individual sections of those departments, can be straightened out, and I refer now to Information Canada, they should be wound up.

Without any thought of boasting, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this. As a former newspaper person, a man with some knowledge of advertising and publicity and perhaps a little knowledge now of politics, I can undertake to consult with anyone on the government side who is interested in saving the public of Canada a good many millions of dollars a year through an improvement in the coordination of Information Canada and its services and, without the loss of any essential information now being provided, perhaps even increased information going out to the people. Mr. Speaker, the function of handling government information or publicity is not being any better administered now than it was last year or, in my view, before Information Canada was established. The cost of Information Canada runs into many millions of dollars, and I am sure a good many of these millions could be saved without the public suffering any real loss in terms of the information available to them.

• (1530)

In conclusion, I wish to urge, first, that the government make available to the public, and in particular to the representatives of the public here in this house, the information which is really desired by them. I have indicated what kind of information this is. Second, the government should either wind up or straighten up Information Canada, and improve the effectiveness of the publicity sections now attached to the individual departments. Third, I urge the government to concur in the appointment of a committee, headed by an opposition member, to which representatives of Information Canada and of the various departmental information agencies could report from time to time. This would, I am sure, result in the public being far better served, and at a cost far less than they are presently paying for the information they are entitled to get.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the motion submitted today by the official opposition reads as follows:

This House, conscious of the failure of the Government to keep the Canadian people and Parliament adequately informed, urges that steps be taken by legislation and otherwise to provide clear rules for freedom of information with regard to public business.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution is curiously similar to the statements we have heard in this House and from the public before Information Canada was created. If we judge only from this motion, we are led to conclude that Information Canada is a failure since this resolution urges the government to take new measures to give the people free access to information.

However, before the creation of Information Canada, one could read for insance in Le Meunier québécois of December 1970 this editorial by Mr. René Blanchard, and I quote:

—information is a public interest service.

In a sound democracy information must escape from ... the claws of a partisan politic power and from the powers of money represented by pressure groups.

Information is a right as are education and health. It is also a major branch of continued education.

I think that this editorial which was quite appropriate two years ago is still so today. And I quote again:

Through the written and spoken media each of us is in a position to keep up with the profound changes taking place throughout the world. Our newspaper is window on the world. It is therefore important that its panes be kept clear.

And God knows how often the panes are not so clear in our newspapers and news agencies.

But what can we do if information is to escape from monetary powers and political parties? ... means should be taken to prevent information from being treated as a commodity that is sold for profit or used to magnify prejudices and hatreds, to sustain personal or collective selfishness, to cultivate chauvimism, racism or class struggle. Every newspapers has a duty to be free, whatever the community it is intended for and it should be responsible for stating out the facts and events, explaining social trends, taking position against prejudices and demystifying them by unveiling to the public's eyes the mechanisms that are used to perpetuate them.

If the world today is at a loss and the old political recipes are still rehashed—

—and we in this corner of the House understand each other when we speak of old recipes—

—without relevance to contemporary problems ... It is surely because too many people are not free, free to act and, above all, to express their thoughts since they are prisoners of mercantile interests and government constraints.

We, of the Social Credit party, have repeatedly noted that information has, for a long time, been biased and this is why the government has set up a commission of inquiry which has published the first volume of a task force report on government information, has made a recommendations and instigated the creation of Information Canada. And no doubt it is to ensure that Canadians obtain a better quality of information that the government—to which we grant once more the benefit of the doubt—has established this agency.

But for the past two years, before analyzing the work of this new agency, Information Canada, we could also read an editorial of CFTM-TV, channel 10, Montreal, dated Monday, March 2, 1970, where the lack of information in Canada was denounced, and I quote:

—information within the federal government leaves to be desired from the viewpoint of efficiency; incoherence of information distributed among the numerous ministries, departments, and agencies of the government; overlapping in the use of personnel and material; blocking of communications in the various information services following the inevitable bureaucratic inertia ... Undeniably, citizens must be made aware of available services and told where and how to obtain them. So, it is desirable that Information Canada should address itself directly to the public—

I could say now that certain doubts that we had before the establishment of this agency, more than two years ago, have proved justified.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

I keep on with the quotation:

However, on account of the measures Mr. Trudeau's government intends to take to that effect, people are somewhat mistrustful.

In order to inform the Canadian people—

—the government wishes to proceed by way of public opinion polls, which obviously implies questions provided by the government, which also prompts us to ask ourselves whether the government wishes to comment or to provide the information. It is not for any agency like Information Canada to represent the Canadian people or to hold a dialogue with them. It is up to the Parliament members to do that. Such an agency should look after the needs of the public in as far as information is concerned and not ask them by means of inevitably biased questions, their opinion on anticipated policies.

Mr. Speaker, the distrust we felt on March 2, 1970, proves justified two years later. Nevertheless, the task force that studied the information problem in Canada did worthwhile work. In fact, one can read at page 21 of the report about:

—the mess in government information.

All that to say that following an inquiry and the publication of the report, following the disclosure of the lack of coherence in government information, we are no further ahead today than we were before. There is still the same lack of coherence in the various departments, we can also note that during the last two years, Information Canada has been used in many circumstances. And I have not enough time to try to sell the government's program to the Canadian people.

I quote from Chapter V of the report of the Task Force on Government Information:

TWELVE EASY STEPS TO A QUICK UNDERSTANDING OF THE MESS IN GOVERNMENT INFORMATION

The failure of successive governments to establish general information policy; the lack of interdepartmental coordination of information services; the triumph of departmental sectionalism in the information field; the confusion as to whom each division is addressing; the variations, department by department, in everything from morale to accounting methods; the absence of a central set of standards by which ISOS might measure their own achievements. Such inconsistencies and failings have all contributed to an atmosphere that has tolerated bungling, nurtured professional lassitude, lent security to the incompetent, and allowed supreme disorder.

That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the paragraphs of the report of the task force that was appointed to make a survey on information in Canada. Two years after the setting up of Information Canada, results enable us to state today that there has been no change, and this text applies very well in 1972, just as it applied before the establishment of Information Canada, which has a budget of more than $7 million a year.

At page 31 of the report, one can read the following:

Some business leaders claimed that DBS figures were frequently so late that their usefulness was doubtful. One businessman stated, "We are still (January 9, 1969) awaiting the publication of the DBS report on 1966 operations of the pulp and paper industry,—

Three years before, they had not yet received the statistical data on the operations of the pulp and paper plants. I resume my quotation:

—although the figures it will contain were made available to us for one of our publications six months ago ... The last updated catalogue came out in 1964." DBS works so slowly in some fields that a financial writer says he frequently gets his figures somewhere else.

One must refer to private enterprises to get federal government statistics. Even through Statistics Canada, the federal government is unable to supply the business community with firsthand data on manpower or other subjects justifying the existence of that federal agency whose cost is supported by the Canadian taxpayers.

And the report goes on to say:

DBS works so slowly in some fields that a financial writer—

—as I have just said,—

—says he frequently gets his figures somewhere else and then, when DBS does report them, he writes in his column,—

Mr. Speaker, while we are discussing Statistics Canada, I should like to object to the figures concerning manpower in order to show that that agency, to me, at least, is totally inefficient. In the past this House had opportunities of studying official data published by Statistics Canada. The whole thing spells obsolescence. Statistics Canada does surveys concerning unemployment; it hires from three to six people per constituency, all over Canada, one week a month. They visit country parishes, especially during winter, when unemployment is less acute than in the cities. Investigators are sent into the cities during the summer when unemployment is less severe.

Mr. Speaker, I could speak for an hour on the very bad methods used to establish the so-called statistics on unemployment in Canada. In fact, investigators are told to call during six successive months at the same house, on the same farmer, to ask him: Sir, are you unemployed? During how many hours have you worked last week? And the good farmer answers: My situation is the same as it was last month. This is the fifth time that you have called, I still have the same herd of cows, I still must work the same number of hours during the week. Yet, the investigator returns—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allowed to him has now expired.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to know whether the House would agree to my going on with the interesting remarks I have to make on Statistics Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. To my mind, a decision was made about the length of speeches and, unless I am mistaken, it was understood that hon. members would not ask for additional time. However, it is up to the House to decide.

[English]

Does the House consent to let the hon. member complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Information on Government Business

[Translation]

There is not unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to finish his speech.

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments made by the hon. member. I think that we in this House, as well as the country generally, agree that the informed judgment of citizens is indeed the basis of a well functioning democracy. A citizen must have information in order to participate, to present his own interests in light of the facts of a given situation. He must be informed in order to present the interests of groups with whom he freely associates and to present his view of the public interest to government as he sees and expresses it.

Therefore, access to information, which lies at the root of a well functioning democracy, is a continuing obligation of government, and this access must be improved and maximized. I will go further and say that, if we think about it for a moment, we are today experiencing extremely rapid change, social, economic and political. Changes in the development of technology, particularly in communications media, result in a steady bombardment of facts and opinions, often conflicting. In these circumstances the citizen frequently feels bewildered by the flow of information, and it is therefore incumbent upon government to come to his support. I think there are at least two ways in which a review of information flows ought to be made at this time and, indeed, are under way. One would be in the more legal and complex fields of information, by defining more precisely than hitherto the boundaries between factual information and more confidential or secret information, with the objective of establishing a base for the fullest possible disclosure.

We have a tradition here of parliamentary responsibility and we also have secrecy. What we can and ought to do is undertake a more precise definition of the distinctions to be made between that which is factual and that which is confidential. I do not think we will make much progress in the objective we all share to increase the flow of reliable and objective information unless we get down to the business of defining in more specific terms the boundaries between different kinds of classified information. I think all in this House would agree that with respect to the public service, the information often sought in this House which has been obtained through the advice and recommendation of public servants must be kept confidential in order to have good government.

The other step to which I would refer is already underway. One of the most recent moves, two years ago, was the establishment of Information Canada. The object was to relate the government more closely to the needs and interests of citizens for information. I should just like to indicate a few ways in which this agency is undertaking to fulfil that function. Perhaps I should first say, as categorically as I can, that there is no intention to follow the contradictory advice of some members of the opposition to disband Information Canada. This agency is only at the beginning of its experience, and only at the beginning of its usefulness to Canadians. I want to affirm in the most positive way possible my own and the government's commitment to expand its functions in the service of Canadians.

First, let me point out some of the characteristics of Information Canada which are not always fully recognized. This agency inherited two existing major functions of government. One was the Canadian Expositions Commission, which is a highly skilled, technical group of persons who create and develop exhibits throughout Canada and, indeed, throughout the world, on behalf of every department of government. Exhibits convey departmental messages and services to Canadians and people around the world. In addition, Information Canada as a department inherited the Queen's Printer bookstores, of which there are now six across Canada and, hopefully before this year is out, there will be some 10; that is to say one in each of the capital or major cities of the provinces.

Some 70 per cent, if my memory is correct, or two-thirds to three-quarters of the staff or personnel of Information Canada is composed of those persons who are working in these agencies, the Expositions Commission and the Queen's Printer bookstores. Other small agencies were also taken on, for example the still photo division of the National Film Board. The other personnel are obviously those persons who have been recruited to fulfil other functions of Information Canada. One of those functions is to expand the bookstore service to include an inquiry service. We hope to have each of the major centres incorporate an inquiry system. We are already active in a number of centres so that our personnel there can respond in useful ways to the inquiries of citizens. The staff will not have all the information about all the services and programs of government at their fingertips, but Information Canada is developing a data bank which will make it possible over a period of time to respond, through its own inquiry officers, to many of the questions that come forward.

However, the main function will be to refer those questions to the appropriate government departments and, indeed, to the appropriate persons in the various government departments so that citizens will not get what they frequently think is a runaround, getting lost in a system that is very large and complex. Through this service they will be able to tap into the various services of government and be referred to other levels of government, if that is the appropriate agency to respond.

In addition to those activities, I should like to refer to another service within Information Canada which was in the original mandate and recommended by the Task Force on Information, and that was to assist the information divisions of various government departments to evaluate and improve their services. A division has been established within Information Canada to perform that function. One of the recent activities of that division was to assist various departments, which do not have well developed information services, to provide information to the public; sometimes to a special public and sometimes to the general public.

A typical example of that kind of support activity provided by experts in communication within Information Canada was in connection with the special employment programs during the past winter, including LIP. With its support service, Information Canada officers helped to coordinate the information activities of four or five different government departments. Thus, one of the ongoing functions is coordination and supplying expert personnel to various departments participating in that combined program. They assisted them to gear up to an extraordinary demand on their information services. Information Canada is prepared and has undertaken to evaluate programs and to look at the effectiveness of advertising programs. It is prepared to advise departments and to provide them with the highly skilled and expert personnel which it would not make sense for each department of government to recruit and maintain within its own services. In this sense, it is acting as a central agency in respect of other departments.

It may be of interest to some hon. members to look at some of the more practical and down to earth efforts of the officers of Information Canada and the personnel recruited by them to do a job for Canadians in the day to day information activity. I refer to two Information Canada officers who are currently working in southwestern Nova Scotia on a summer project. The objective there is to bring to the people in that area the kind of information they need.

In this connection one begins the community, one does not begin with government brochures or existing information services, delivering them to the community. What we are trying to do is find out the needs of various communities, the attitude structures that exist and the impediments to the flow of information. We are trying to find out how Information Canada can advise the various departments, while in no sense taking over their information services, on how better to serve the needs of such communities.

Briefly, these are some of the things these two information officers discovered last week in this particular community, and some of the activities they undertook. They arranged a meeting to tell unemployed students about the student manpower centre in Yarmouth, and about various openings for students. One might say it is up the citizen to find out about these various services of government, but research reveals that people do not know that services exist for their benefit. What we are doing in Information Canada is getting out in the field where the people are, finding out their needs and trying to help the departments respond to them.

In all this, we will not take over the information function. We will assist other government departments to do their job better. In a survey of 26 grade 8 students it was found, for example, in one community that only four reported that their families took a newspaper of any kind. One man thanked these officers for having pointed out that there was an unemployment insurance office in a certain community. He did not know of its existence.

Let me say also that last summer, in an effort to look into the nature of the communication problem— and I may say I was disappointed in the remarks of the mover of the resolution because although he had an opportunity he did not lay out some of the problems—Information Canada commissioned eight information studies in more isolated parts of Canada such as southern Nova Scotia,

Labrador, Gloucester county in New Brunswick, Scheffer-ville, Quebec and Riverdale in Toronto. Riverdale is not exactly an isolated part, but it had some special characteristics in which information problems existed. These studies were also commissioned in St. Boniface, Manitoba, the Crowsnest pass area and the sugar beet fields of southern Alberta.

Graduate students and others, in teams of two, one of whom was familiar with the neighbourhood, went into these communities. We did not sit here in Ottawa and cogitate about the problems. Information Canada took the initiative and went to these communities. Five reports have been released and the others are in the final stage of publication. They will be released shortly. I noted that in a radio interview this morning an hon. member opposite suggested that the reports had been leaked. This is not the case. These reports are being released. Even though the officials of Information Canada may not always agree with what is contained in the reports, these reports are released because the idea behind the research is important.

First, as I indicated, these projects started with the communities themselves. Second, the reports went to Members of Parliament, local officials and federal government departments involved in the communities as well as to many of the people who live there. These people have been asked to comment on the reports. The hope is that this will result in more meaningful communication between the federal government and the people it serves. We will not always agree on the findings in the reports. Not all communication between government and people can start at the local level. The researchers may have been wrong in some of their conclusions. But if the experiment succeeds even in part, the federal government will be in a better position to fulfil its first information priority of distributing information which people need more widely and more effectively.

I wish to assure hon. members that Information Canada and other departments are now actively following up on these and other information studies. How then can one respond to the suggestion of opposition members that Information Canada be abandoned? Are they not interested in the needs of people for information such as is being discovered here? If we discover that things are not as well as we like, are we to run to cover or try to improve the situation? Surely, the latter Information Canada officers are working in Nova Scotia and are also following up the results of the study in Manitoba. This summer there is a mobile information office working with the Indian people in Alberta's sugar beet fields. This is a direct result of the research conducted by Information Canada. This is in addition to the function of the central office of supplying information, answering inquiries and assisting various departments.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is running out and we must all observe the 20-minute rule. If I might, I should like to comment very briefly on information statutes. We know there are information statutes in various countries. It is being proposed that there should be such a statute here. This matter is under study by Information Canada. I would be less than frank, however, if I did not say I am not persuaded that a statute is the right way to go about the question of accessibility to information. We could look at other countries which have information statutes such as the United States, for example. We might look at the problems the citizens there run into in respect of obtaining information even though there is a statute which grants access to information. Freedom of Information statutes of necessity have many exceptions to the general rule which we all wish to support. There are so many exceptions that we find governments hiding behind the exceptions rather than coming forward with information.

The exceptions become statutory and subject to very wide interpretations. Legal suits result from them. I would recommend or suggest that hon. members also look at the Swedish approach where for some 200 years there has been a statute on the books concerning access to information. The experience there I believe is no better than the experience in other countries, and certainly no better than the experience in Canada.

I shall conclude simply by saying that Information Canada as an agency is dedicated to the proposition of co-ordinating and assisting government departments to do a better job. We should not deceive ourselves that, as a result of some sleight of hand, this will cost less money. It cannot. Government programs grow in scale and we are all involved in developing new programs and policies to meet the needs of people. They grow in complexity. This complexity must be explained to people. We would only deceive ourselves if we thought this would cost less money rather than more. We will evaluate the progress made thus far and do our best as a central agency to assist departments to obtain greater productivity for funds spent.

We will continue on in this way. We will not sit in our major inquiry centres but will try to move out to where people are in order to distribute printed and other forms of information to them and to provide them access to government through our enquiry service. We will not remain in Ottawa but will establish centres in the regions of Canada so that there can be appropriate responses given to special regional needs for information. We are looking at the question of mobile information offices and are testing this concept. We are considering a host of other interesting and challenging developments in information services. Information Canada, Mr. Speaker, is only at the beginning of its useful service career in Canada.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would permit a question before he resumes his seat?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. There is a difficulty. The hon. member knows there has been a limitation placed on time. The minister's time has expired. A question can be asked only if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid we have to be very strict about this. If the hon. member should have an extremely interesting question, the minister conceivably could take more than 20 minutes in replying to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It is the right of hon. members to refuse to give consent. I now call upon the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather).

Information on Government Business

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, may I say, with very great respect to the minister, that I was disappointed because his speech was discouraging to those of us who believe there should be accessibility of information and much less secrecy. In the few minutes I have, I propose to discuss the matter of government leaks, confidentiality, administrative secrecy, and finally and briefly, the kind of scrutiny that sort of died a'borning and in respect of which nothing apparently has been done. Then, if I have a minute, I will end with a plea for plain language and frankness in dealing with an increasingly frustrated public.

• (1610)

While members and the public find it difficult to get information necessary for the performance of their roles, there has been no shortage of information leaked to the press and the public. It might be interesting, Mr. Speaker, to have a list of these leaks since 1969. One, in 1969 a research study for the bilingual and bicultural commission was leaked to La Presse; two, in 1969, sections of the study of the Housing Task Force was leaked to Time magazine; three, June, 1970: excerpts from recommendations of the Le Dain Commission were leaked to Time magazine; four, in 1971, four staff members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty left the staff and published a conflicting report, using in part information gathered during their official tenure; five, in 1971, draft portion of the Gray Report on Foreign Ownership; six, in 1971, a record of a cabinet decision in reference to the Gray Report; seven, December 23, 1971: details of two 1970 cabinet documents relating to law and order and possible use of the War Measures Act, suggesting the use of the act was contemplated before the October crisis of 1970, leaked to the Globe and Mail; eight, December 30, 1971: excerpts from two 1971 cabinet documents relating to the government's northern development policy for the next ten years, again leaked to the Globe and Mail; nine, February 2, 1972: cabinet document on aid to the publishing industry in Canada; ten, February, 1972: cabinet document on foreign ownership, and official documents, although not cabinet documents, all classified; eleven, document on low income housing; twelve, Anton Sobokha file—an abortive espionage case; thirteen, report on collective bargaining in the public service; fourteen, confidential evaluation of summer work programs of 1971.

While there is no complete certainty as to who is responsible for the individual leaks, the possibilities have been narrowed down in every case, except for the Senate Committee on Poverty, to those engaged in the service of the government, either permanent, full-time public servants, temporary public servants, or those engaged only for specific projects. I suggest that they resort to leaking because of prohibitive, restrictive and quite ridiculous rules about secrecy.

In a speech in St. John's, Newfoundland, on June 6 of this year, Gordon Robertson, Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet, attacked those individuals who had leaked information contrary to their oath of secrecy. He deplored the lack of public complaint about the reprehensible conduct of individuals who had provided confidential government information to the public. He justified his attack on the basis that the governments need to keep much information confidential. I quote him as follows:

In short, the collective executive that is the heart of our parliamentary system must have secrecy: it cannot work without it.

I suggest that this is a sacred cow, and that it is time this sacred cow was put to rest once and for all. No one would argue that secrecy is often crucial to the success of an executive and of a government. However, Mr. Robertson, I suggest fails to broach the problem that too much government material is labled confidential unnecessarily, and that information that should go to the public as a matter of course is withheld—hence, the leaks. Most of the leaks of the past few years fall into this category. None can be said to involve information risking national security, and none really risked the privacy of individuals, something that we would all want to protect.

Kildare Dobbs, a well-known Canadian writer, who spent a short time working for the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), summed up well the stupidity of confidentiality procedures in the federal government. He said:

I could never quite understand by what alchemy the words rattling loose inside my head became confidential the moment I wrote them down. But that was what happened. A few strokes of the borrowed ball point and presto! I was spinning state secrets out of my own innards.

And further:

With superfluous caution, they put up a smokescreen of security, mindlessly stamping everything on their desks Top Secret, Eyes Only, Secret, Confidential. As if anybody cared. Not only where these documents unreadable; many of them, on close inspection, proved meaningless.

These words are contained in a statement he made to Macleans magazine in September last year. The government has not yet managed to balance well its need for secrecy against the public's need for information. I do not deny this need when secrets of state and the privacy of individuals are concerned. But otherwise, I think it is pure nonsense to believe there should be so much secrecy.

To understand whether a minister has chosen a proper course or whether a department is operating efficiently, Parliament must know what information is available and on what basis a decision was taken. Francis E. Rourke makes an important point that should not be overlooked:

The fact that a policy is convenient or saves embarrassment is not necessarily an admission that it contributes to administrative efficiency . . . Responsiveness no less than competence is the hallmark of a successfully functioning democratic bureaucracy.

The tendency in recent decades has been for the executive to interpret the public interest more in terms of its own efficiency than in terms of popular control. The experience of the United States when President Kennedy cut back drastically on the use of the doctrine of executive privilege to withhold information from Congress indicates that the passionate prophecies about the destruction of good government are greatly exaggerated. With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I wish that Mr. Robertson had read Francis Rourke's book "Secrecy and Publicity" before he made his speech last week in Newfoundland.

There are additional reasons for the growth of secrecy in recent decades. The impact of the cold war did much to heighten secrecy in connection with the security of the state. The Report of the Royal Commission on Security, abridged, interestingly enough, in 1969 did not hold out much hope to those who favoured greater access to administrative records. The report did say that there were many complaints made about over-classification, but found it impossible to suggest any "very sweeping changes in present procedures." In defence of this position, the Commission offered the standpat observation that:

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

> The present system is reasonably well understood and established, and it would appear to us that very compelling arguments would need to be advanced for major changes.

I am sure that my hon. friend, the member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who moved this motion feels, as I do, that there are compelling reasons, and I hope that today's debate will bring some of them forward.

The present classification categories were admittedly vague, but the Commission felt that it could do no better. It could not endorse a general approach to declassification, which should involve primarily departmental judgment, although the departments should be constantly reminded of the value of downgrading documents. More attention should be paid to the "need-to-know" principle, that is, the dissemination of security information only so far as is necessary for the conduct of business as determined by the proposed security secretariat.

In the Commission's view the Canadian Official Secrets Act is "an unwieldy statute, couched in very broad and ambiguous language." The poor construction of certain sections of the act, along with the "extraordinarily onerous" evidence requirements contained in the act have led officials to rely for prosecutions mainly upon the conspiracy sections of the Criminal Code. I know that in the few minutes remaining to me I cannot go into an exhaustive discussion of the Official Secrets Act, but I am quite certain that a committee of this Parliament should take a look at the whole matter of secrecy, as well as the right to know, and a system for declassifying documents should be very much before that committee.

Mr. Baldwin: As they did in England in the Biafra case.

Mr. Fairweather: Exactly. My hon. friend says this subject has been dealt with in the United Kingdom Parliament just recently.

We could have had a weapon or Parliament thought it had a weapon to deal with one other aspect of the public's right to have scrutinized for it some of the administrative decisions of government in the form of regulations, in the excellent report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments. I should like to give this short chronology of events. The committee was appointed on September 30, 1968, its membership decided upon on November 8 of that year and it reported to Parliament on October 22, 1969. There followed some eloquent statements by the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Turner. He said that the idea was long overdue and went on to say:

> We have allowed, by enabling powers and statutes, legislation to be delegated to the cabinet, to ministers, to boards, to commissions by way of regulations ... beyond the control of Parliament, beyond the power of Parliament to review and revise, and thereby beyond the power of the people to challenge.

What has been the result of this eloquence, Mr. Speaker? On both the Senate and the House of Commons side, we have had a special committee. The House of Commons members on that Committee were named on March 22 this year, yet three months have gone by and that special committee on scrutiny has not been activated. I think it is fair to ask about the reluctance of the government. There should be a staff. We are well on our way to an adjournment, possibly even, to an election, and many valuable months will be lost before this committee reports. It was launched with such eloquence and such a resounding hosanna of trumpets but now, Mr. Speaker, the trumpet sound is uncertain indeed.

I have been interested and moved by a most eloquent letter from a person living in Claremont, Ontario, not in my constituency, who is opposed to the decision of the government to locate a new international airport at Pickering. I am not entering the debate about the location of the site at this point. This lady says that she is sick of receiving government form letters; she is tired of standardized replies and she is sick of being told that she has a right as a citizen to participate. She is sick of the clichés about participatory democracy and then having all these clichés set aside because the decision is taken before there is any opportunity for useful participation. I think we all bear a responsibility for the cynicism of the public with regard to government. Other members have spoken of the twin uglies, dehumanization and depersonalization. Because of those uglies, I think it is more important than ever that the public have access to information and that we, as Members of Parliament, stop treating citizens as some sort of receptacle for pieces of legislation that are almost incomprehensible. We must deal with the public in plain language, free of cliché and, if possible for parliamentarians, without resort to the usual puffery that seems to be endemic when politicians exchange letters with the public.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) which is before the House today opens wide opportunities for debate on a subject on which many members of this chamber have very strong feelings, and with which they have considerable familiarity. The wording of the resolution makes it possible for members to consider not only the failure of the government to keep the Canadian people adequately informed but Parliament as well. So, there are two aspects to the resolution. The aspect I want to talk about for a few minutes deals with some of the steps that the government has taken in order to bring about better communication with Parliament and the way in which Parliament has come to recognize what government is doing.

Many members in the chamber this afternoon will remember how bills and estimates were dealt with in committee of the whole under the old rules. The chairman of committees would sit at the head of the table and call out the estimates item by item. We would go through the chant of approving millions and billions of dollars without having the opportunity to examine any public servants on the issues and programs. We remember how the minister used to carry bills through this House in committee of the whole. A public servant would come into the chamber and sit at a little table in front of the minister. Every time a question was asked in committee regarding a clause of the bill there would be a whispered conversation between the public servant and the minister, then the minister would get to his feet and parrot what the public servant had told him. It was often the case that a good minister knew as much about the bill as the public servant and could carry the bill through the committee with adequate explanation, adequate at least for the House on that day.

Let us consider what takes place under the new rules and the way the problem is tackled today. Bills are no longer dealt with on the floor of the House in committee of the whole but are referred to a committee where the public can attend and where witnesses can be called. Public servants who may have played a role in the development of a particular bill can be called and questioned on every aspect of it. Let us also consider what takes place now when the estimates are automatically referred to committees of the House instead of being dealt with in committee of the whole House without the benefit of any examination of departmental officials.

I can recall that when we went into committees for the first time there was some contact between the public servant and the members. I remember how nervous the public servants were in those days in case members would bully them and push them around. I remember that the ministers would often still attempt to play the old role in committee that they had played in committee of the whole of having the public servant give the information to them and then they would relate it to the committee. Bit by bit, an aura of confidence grew between the public servants and the Members of Parliament when dealing with estimates in committee and examining various government programs. Public servants began to talk to members telling them about the hopes and aspirations of the programs of particular interest to an area which a member represented. For the first time, public servants were expressing themselves to Parliament in a way in which they had never been able to do before. For his part, the member was able to do what only ministers had been able to do heretofore, to question a public servant in detail in regard to a particular program.

I want to mention some other ways in which we have learned to communicate with government and acquire a better idea of what the government has done. I refer to some of the things that our committees have learned to do over the years. Consider, for example, the defence committee, which was first established in its present form in 1963. As time went on it became one of the standing committees of the House. Consider the way in which that committee set about examining the affairs of an extremely complex department, which it then was, as hon. members will remember.

The Defence Department spent a quarter of all our tax dollars and Members of Parliament had no idea how it did that. We did not truly comprehend how on earth that department spent a quarter of our tax dollars, or $1.5 billion which increased to $1.8 billion. We learned. The members of this House gained a comprehensive idea as to how that department spent its money. We know what happened to us. We, of this chamber, became more expert on what went on in the Department of Defence and how that department spent its money, than the press. At that time, the press printed boloney every day, which we accepted and used in debates in this chamber. That was one way we learned to use our committees differently, and to benefit from them.

I want to speak for a moment about the committees which are doing excellent work in moving around the country and meeting the people. The transport committee and the agricultural committee have travelled most, I think. In their travels they have heard what members of the public have had to say about the important subjects of concern to those committees. This process has evolved in the past few years and has enabled Parliament to keep in touch not only with Crown corporations and departments of government but, as well, with people who are affected by what those Crown corporations and government departments do.

I now want to mention the growing use of expertise in our committees, and I will speak particularly of the work of the Finance Committee in its examination of the tax bill and in its examination of extremely complex subjects such as the revision of the Bank Act, the Bretton Woods agreement and the anti-dumping duty legislation. The members of that committee of the House became expert in these areas. The Committee employed experts, which enabled members to deal with these subjects more adequately and to understand them more fully.

I also want to speak of the work of the Public Accounts Committee in its investigative role, and of the effectiveness with which it has carried out that role. As hon. members know, the chairman of that committee is chosen from the opposition. That chairman, I am glad to see, is in the House and listening to my remarks. I think we all want to compliment that committee, and its chairman, on the effective role it played, for instance, in the investigation of the refitting of the Bonaventure.

Mr. Bell: Please! Not too loud!

Mr. Deachman: That was a classic case to be investigated by a Canadian parliamentary committee. Not only did that chairman and that committee carry out that investigation effectively, but the leader in the investigation, and I am talking of those Members of Parliament who were on that committee and took part in that work, was a member from the government side rather than from the opposition side. So, we can see the way committees have expanded and carried out their investigative roles, roles in which they have met the people and roles through which they had developed their own expertise and judgment. Mr. Speaker, Parliament is evolving and, in recent years, it has been evolving quickly.

Hon. members who spoke earlier told us that, as a Parliament, we lack some capability. An hon. member suggested that we have not fully carried out our role in overseeing what government departments and the public service do. I cannot accept the words of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who believes we have failed. I do not believe we have failed. I believe we have made giant strides in this Parliament and have become more expert than many in some fields, no mean achievement in an age when technology and complexities of all kinds increase every day.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow the chief government whip. I must say that he struggled along much more adequately than did the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) who replied officially on behalf of the government. The speech of the Minister of Labour was so weak, so irrelevant that, if Information Canada had anything to do with the preparation of the speech, I would be willing to agree that that body should be disbanded immediately, here and now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: There are two aspects to this matter, Mr. Speaker and they are slightly different from those mentioned by the last speaker. They have, first, to do with the evolution of Information Canada, and, second, the government's responsibility to inform itself.

We all recall the early days of Information Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), still under the aura of the just society, decided to set up a task force on information. That task force has been referred to, and from it came the recommendation for creating Information Canada. That sounded like a grandiose idea. All the same, I think members of the House on both sides were afraid that the management of news, which was implied in the setting up of Information Canada, would be a serious matter for us all.

We know Information Canada failed. Everyone knows why it failed. Many have said publicly why it failed, both inside and outside Parliament. It failed, first, because Information Canada was not answerable to Parliament. Its activities were to be referred to one of our committees, and I will deal with the success of our committees later. The second, unsurmountable reason behind the failure was this: The government appointed as Director General of Information Canada a Liberal hack, a man who had been a full time, professional Liberal politician in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, professional, Liberal politicians in Quebec are just about as bad as you can find, if you exclude some I know of in New Brunswick. That man was appointed to head this body. Its duties were delicate, and we all know what happened. We watched the mistakes it made. Hon. members no doubt remember the photographs of nudes that came out, with the Canadian flag draped in the background of the picture. Unlike the nudes you see in Playboy Magazine, these nudes apparently were unidentifiable.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Bell: I doubt if any hon. member of this House will stand up and say that Information Canada has been of appreciable help to our committees. I have never heard anyone claim that it has been of assistance. I know that these flat pins, or whatever you can call them, are given out to members and they may be in great favour. Much depends on the area of Canada from which you come. The whole thing has been a failure, as recent reports indicate. Information Canada, "Misinformation Canada", or "Manipulation Canada"—whatever you want to call it—is a lame duck, just like the Vancouver hockey team which the government whip knows about. The team was of no use for the last part of this season, at least.

An hon. Member: Do not cast aspersions.

Mr. Bell: It is a lame duck, just like this parliament, and I doubt if it will be possible to bring about any recovery.

The other aspect I mentioned was the responsibility of the government to inform itself. We all know that old adage, "Public affairs must be conducted publicly.". Of course, Parliament is the forum to which the government of the people of Canada is responsible and it must see that correct information is brought forward. The task force was not asked to deal with government responsibility but, very bravely, it said:

> In keeping with the principles of participation and freedom of access to information, the government provide more informative replies to questions raised in Parliament than has been the tradition.

• (1640)

That, Mr. Speaker, was quite a while ago. We all know the question period that we have here and the type of answers we receive. My thoughts go back to the days when well-known Parliamentarians were in previous governments. I will mention their names; Messrs. Martin, Pickersgill and Chevrier. When a question was asked by the opposition, they never failed to give an answer in this House. They prided themselves on the fact that each day they would stand up and give an answer. It might have been a lengthy one or all the facts might not have been correct, but at least they gave information. We know what we get today. We do not even get the ministers to their feet half the time, if we can even get them in the House.

The other day I did a random check of the attendance of ministers. I am not trying to be a schoolteacher and check everyone's position. As far as the attendance goes on both sides of the House, there is no difference. It is not good. I am talking about the members of the treasury benches who have a responsibility in this Parliament. For a three week period in May, there were four, five or six ministers away each day when, under the famous roster system, they should have been here.

Mention was made by the chief government whip of the success of committees. I do not think that committees are all bad. We had to make moves toward a professional committee system. Some of these moves were good. We are now receiving expert advice and we are travelling; that is good. However, you will have to do a lot of talking to convince me that the system we are now using in dealing with estimates has any value. It embarrasses me to no end to sit in this House, as I will do in a few days, and have billions of dollars pass through in two or three seconds under the eyes of the press gallery and the Canadian public. Under the old method, we had a chance to confront the minister and the civil servants. We could threaten to hold up the estimates, to not pass them and make ministers do without their money if they did not provide the correct answers. Now, we still have the whispering back and forth in committee, but the civil servants are not giving us the type of answers that I feel we should be getting.

I remember the days when civil servants attended the opposition caucus and gave us their thoughts. There was not a press man around. They told us what they thought about different policies and the like. Do you get that now? They are scared to death. You never see a civil servant talking to the opposition. Everything is too big now. I do not think there is the slightest improvement in so far as the committee system of dealing with estimates.

Mention was made a few moments ago by the chief government whip of the Auditor General and the Bonaventure. We know what we have been through with the Auditor General. Hopefully the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) gave us the facts and information the other day about items to which the Auditor General had referred in his department. How about the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury)? There is the one man in this whole House who is an authority on the Bonaventure. We recall how he got up and said that under the new system we were going to use there would never be another situation like the Bonaventure. We now have another such situation in the making in the DDH program.

If you want to talk about the Bonaventure, there may be some credit in that for the Committee. The membership was bipartisan, there is no question about that. However, there has never been any ministerial responsibility fixed for the Bonaventure matter; questions asked in this House are not answered and attendance under the roster system is poor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: I said that there were two related matters, the failure of Information Canada and the responsibility that has traditionally existed on the government from time immemorial to inform. Everybody wants to take part in our democracy. They want to have their views passed on to the right people. They want them accepted. They want to know what is coming back. However, so far as Information Canada is concerned, which apparently is on its death bed and this was certainly confirmed by the speech today by the Minister of Labour, the grandiose plans of this method of informing Parliament and the people have all been washed out. Responsibility now rests and can only rest with the government. They must see that their policy of evading questions is changed. A policy of giving better answers to tabled questions must be followed. I have taken a random look at the order paper. I find that as of today, 42 questions have been on the order paper since February; 53 since March; 35 since April and 63 since May. Where is the responsibility of the government? They are suppressing reports. The general attitude of condemning Parliament by these just society boys has to stop, if it is not now too late.

As stated in the motion of the hon. member for Peace River, which I had the honour to second, our concern is with people and Parliament. The responsibility in our democracy rests with the government through our political process to see that this leadership is shown here. This was borne out in the task force report. There must be greater access to information for all members. As the mover of this motion stated the onus has to go back to the government. They can have their exceptions, but the responsibility to inform has to be transferred back, not to Information Canada, the opposition or the people outside, but to this Parliament and, in particular, the cabinet, the members of the treasury benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to follow my colleague from New Brunswick, the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell). For one reason or another, I do not agree with many of the things he said. He talked about the importance of providing proper and impartial information to the people of this country. I agree with that in principle, but being a good politician, as he is, his speech today illustrates the strength of our political system. On the other hand, with regard to elements of the political system such as the opposition putting across their point of view, they give one biased opinion. If we want our system to work, the government has to respond to the statements of the opposition in the same way.

The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster talked about the government giving information. As far as I am concerned, there are two functions of information that are of importance. The hon. member referred to the question period. I think the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) also mentioned that. I have to smile when I hear the opposition being touchy about the government responding in what we might call a political way to questions asked during the question period. They seem to take the attitude that their questions are impartial, looking for the facts and asked without any ulterior motive. I do not have anything against them having these motives. I think this is essential in our political system. Their role in the question period is not only to obtain information, but to make political points.

Mr. Baldwin: We are sure successful.

Mr. Breau: I think you are successful. I hope that some day I will have the chance to answer some of your questions. I would succeed in scoring political points, too. I think ministers tend to try to be too impartial and non-political when they answer questions. The function of the opposition in this context is not primarily to gather information, because that would imply they were impartial; they are not out to get facts but, rather, to make political points. I admit at once that this is an important function in our political system; on the other hand, the opposition should not, for example, ask leading questions and then say, when a reply in political terms is given, that the government is not supplying impartial information, and relate all this to Information Canada.

• (1650)

The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster is, as we know, an experienced member and I do not believe he would wish to lead the House into the error of believing that Information Canada has done nothing positive. I should like to refer him to the study conducted in my constituency, one which brings out some very pertinent facts. It was undertaken last year by a group of students with the sponsorship of Information Canada. Again, I wish to emphasize the difference between information which, of necessity, will be biased because the government is asked biased questions, and factual information given in response to a public need.

The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster would agree, I am sure, that it is a function of government to explain its actions in a political way. On the other hand, there is the function of providing information to people who, for one reason or another, cannot get the facts they need out of the political system or the House of Commons. The study to which I have referred deals with that situation and I again refer the hon. member to this report which was commissioned by the planning services of Information Canada and carried out by two students, Helen Sinclair and Pierre Tremblay. It is a very good study and I will send a copy of it to the hon. member. Once he has read it, I doubt he will again tell the House that Information Canada has done nothing.

In my view, we are only now beginning to realize what the role of Information Canada should be. If there was one error which was made it was, it seems to me, in calling this organization Information Canada. We should not have called it that, because in our political context, the context of the House of Commons, I think it implies information which is biased because of the very nature of our political system, as I have explained. How can one expect a minister to get up and answer a question in a scrupulously non-partisan way when a member such as the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster, for example, has put the question to him? If I were the minister concerned there would be no chance of my answering him in a non-political way—maybe I would do so in my constituency, but not in any other forum. When that opposition member asks a question, a minister would be foolish to answer in a non-partisan way because the member is smart enough politically to load his question. To appreciate the role of Information Canada in this context, we must admit that possibly the name is wrong. It is true that in terms of semantics, information is the correct word but possibly we should call it a centre of resources—

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Breau: Or, possibly, an animation centre—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or, Propaganda Canada.

Mr. Breau: Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was not listening when I explained the difference between propaganda and information. I said there was a need for propaganda in the present system because members like the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are experienced politicians, and when they ask questions a minister would be foolish to answer them in any other way than by propaganda. That is because their role here is purely a political role. Their role is to try to lead the public into believing what they believe. I do not think this is anything to be ashamed of.

Mr. McCutcheon: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the hon. member who has the floor is imputing motives to various members over here and saying that ministers have to reply with propaganda. I do not think he has the right to impute motives to my hon. friend from Saint John-Lancaster.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it might be better if I said nothing about the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. Breau: You know, Mr. Speaker, sometimes one can impute motives which are bad motives, but there is nothing wrong about imputing good motives.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The rule does not make that distinction.

Mr. Breau: I said I agreed that this was an important function of the opposition in our political system. I would never try to play down the importance of that aspect of our political system. However, I am pointing out that an organization like Information Canada should also be a centre of assistance to citizens—a citizenship development centre or an animation centre.

Citizens groups are forming across the country. Those who were responsible for the study to which I have referred sought to evaluate the way in which an ordinary citizen in a constituency such as mine, which might be called a disadvantaged area where many problems arise, cultural, social and political, derives information about government programs and governmental decisions which directly concern them. Does he get his information through the civil service, or through political channels or by other means? How is this man being reached by governments whether at federal, provincial or municipal level? And, when contact was made, was he supplied with facts, arrived at impartially, or with propaganda? In other words, does he get information by reading in the newspapers that some member of the opposition had posed a political question and been answered in a political way, or did he have access to the real facts? I will go further, Mr. Speaker. What these people need is not only facts but a means of obtaining advice as to methods of implementing intentions they may have in mind—ways of putting into practice projects they have conceived. This study deals with all these matters. It is a most pertinent one and has been well carried out. I believe it shows that in this context Information Canada has an important role to play in our political system and in our society generally.

As I say, more and more citizens' groups are forming in this country, calling themselves poor people's groups, animation groups and so on. We all agree with the concept. Those who join them and organize them find they need facts on the basis of which to counter propaganda and biased information. It is of great importance that those we are trying to help should have access to impartial information, to non-partisan information outside political channels. As long as this can be done, organizations like Information Canada have a pertinent function to perform. In the absence of such facilities, people are apt to mislead by the role played by opposition parties in the House of Commons, or in legislative assemblies.

As I have explained, it is not always possible for governments, which are politically motivated, to give completely unbiased information. What is the situation with regard to animation programs carried out through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and other branches of the federal government? Provincial governments have experienced difficulties in this direction, also. I think the role played by Information Canada is an important one. It is the sort of thing that makes the political system in this country work. If we want to change the name, then let us go ahead and change it. But if the information that Information Canada gives is interpreted as biased information or as propaganda, then it is not functioning properly.

Another function of Information Canada is to collect resource information on behalf of the people of Canada. For some reason or other, it has not been able to fulfil this role or to implement what it conceives to be its role in the political system, be it municipal, provincial or federal. I suggest that an agency like Information Canada will stop the trend that has led these groups in Canada to allege they are being given propaganda or biased information. Hon. members opposite say that they are being put in the position of giving biased information to the people they represent because of the infrastructure that collects such information. They include in this infrastructure the media, big business, the big labour organizations—anything that is big. They claim that the little man has no access to information. It seems to me that a role Information Canada can play is to try to find ways to help these groups get not only the facts but any information they need to fulfil their aims.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to compliment the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), for presenting a motion that is not only important to the members of the opposition but to every member of the House. Information should be provided when requested. At no time should there be concealment of information.

Before proceeding with my very brief remarks, I would be remiss were I not to say thank you to the chief government whip, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), for paying some very glowing tributes to me as chairman of the public accounts committee and to members of the committee generally. I can only say that this committee could not function as it does were it not for the co-operation of government members as well as other members of the committee. I see that my right hand man on the committee, the former vice-chairman, the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre), is in his seat and I should like him to know that I appreciate the work on the committee that he has contributed down through the years. I also include the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Whiting), the present vice-chairman of the committee.

Mr. Levebvre: That is a good place to stop now.

Mr. Hales: Yes, I will stop while I am ahead. We on the committee have achieved results because we have tried to be as non-partisan as we could. Sometimes it is a little difficult, but most times it works very well.

The motion before the House states that the government has failed to keep the Canadian people and Parliament adequately informed. I am prompted to speak to it because of something that occurred no later than this morning. I telephoned the Department of the Secretary of State asking if I could be provided with the name and address of the area project co-ordinator for an Opportunity for Youth program. I am sure that many members of this House have programs in their areas about which they would like to know a little more or in regard to which they may have received complaints, as I have about projects in my area. Many complaints have been made by parents to the effect that they could not locate the person in charge of this particular program. They were given a name, an address and telephone number, but they could get no answer either to their telephone calls or to their letters. These parents wanted to enrol their children for a canoe trip program for which the person in charge was provided with $7,162.

Naturally, I wanted to know what could be done about this so I telephoned the Ottawa superintendent responsible for projects in Ontario, Mr. Izlesias. He relayed my inquiry to the co-ordinator for the province of Ontario, and it is his telephone number that the minister told me today was available. However, when I got down to the grass roots and attempted to talk to this person, I was refused his name, his address and his telephone number. I say this is concealment of information. Every elected member in this House is entitled to have this person's name and address, and I see no reason whatsoever why I or any other member should be unable to talk to him. He is the on-the-job man, and I should like to tell him that I am receiving complaints about the project and to ask him to look into them. Why does the minister not want to disclose this man's name and address? The only reason I can think of is that he is afraid his area representative will get him into trouble or will tell us too much, or something of that kind. But the point is that information is being concealed which every member of the House has a right to have. As I said, we are the elected representatives of the people and are entitled to this kind of information.

While on the Opportunity for Youth program, I learned today that there is going to be a lot of concealment of financial information regarding programs. I am told that this year only projects costing $15,000 and up are going to be audited. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, any project worth only $6,000, $8,000 or $10,000 is not going to be audited; the people in charge will be home free! Last year there was a floor of $25,000 and up, and only those projects were audited. The taxpayers' money is being used to finance projects that are not even audited. This again is concealment of information. There is no access to information here. I am told that the Secretary of State's department asked the Department of Supply and Services audit services bureau to audit only those projects costing $15,000 and up and said that they should forget about the others. This is ridiculous and I was unaware that this sort of thing was happening today. Certainly spot audits should be made of projects.

Last year I refused to deliver the cheque for a project because a U.S. draft dodger was in charge of it. However, the government forwarded the cheque to him and as a result I asked some questions about the project. Let me give you two answers I received. I was told it was not the policy of the department to divulge publicly either the name or the place of residence of each employee of a project. Why are we not entitled to that information? I asked whether an audited statement was available, and from whom. I was told that the audited statement would be prepared by the Department of Supply and Services, but this statement constituted an internal document for the use of the department and other government agencies only. How often do we hear that answer? We cannot get the information because it is for the use of the government. I suggest this is concealment of information.

Why was I not told on that occasion that only projects involving $25,000 and more were audited? I understand this particular one was audited because I asked that question. When I put the question on the order paper, I sent a copy to members of the civil service who knew what I was doing. That is the reason this particular one was looked into. Because those answers were not satisfactory, I followed up this year with more questions about the same project. These questions have been on the order paper since March 16, but I have not received an answer from that date to this. I am sure this is another example of concealment of information, or the curtailment of freedom of information.

We are happy to have these programs in our area, and we hope that in most cases they will work out all right. Out of a total of some $80,000 to be spent on these projects in our area, only those involving a total expenditure of some $60,000 will be audited. I will enlarge on this subject later on at the proper time and place. When we realize that the Opportunities for Youth program involves the expenditure of $34 million this year, with only a small percentage of that expenditure audited, it is time some serious thought was given to steps to correct the situation.

Another matter which has been brought to my attention is the fact that the National Harbours Board annual statement for 1971 has not yet been tabled. According to the law passed by Parliament, that statement should have been tabled by March 31, 1972, yet some three months later this report has still not been tabled. This is a violation of the regulations of this House. This is concealment of information. I am told the reason it has not been tabled is that the Auditor General cannot certify the financial statement contained in the National Harbours Board report.

Mr. Baldwin: What about the Northern Canada Power Commission?

Mr. Hales: That is another matter for concern. This involves an attempt to conceal information, hide the facts or sweep them under the carpet, and it is not right. It is contrary to the rules and regulations of Parliament. I could go on with other examples, but I do not wish to take the time of the House to do so. I could talk about contingency vote No. 5.

Mr. Baldwin: What about Deputy Minister's salaries?

Mr. Hales: We cannot find out what a deputy minister is paid today. We can find out within a certain range but we cannot pin it down exactly. There is no difficulty in finding out what Members of Parliament are paid. That information is published all across the country so everyone will know. Deputy ministers are paid more than Members of Parliament, but we cannot find out how much they are paid.

In connection with contingencies votes, at the end of the year the reserve for retroactive salaries, or the balance thereof, is transferred to the reserve account. I think the last amount was $100 million. Once that amount gets into that reserve account, there is no accounting for it. This is a very complicated matter and I will not take the time of the House to go into it further.

Those are a few of the things that have come to my attention. My participation in this debate was brought about by the refusal to divulge information to which every member of this House should be entitled. For that and other reasons I was happy to take part in the debate.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker in entering this debate I will adhere to the 15-minute rule we agreed upon earlier in the day. The terms of the motion indicate that this House, conscious of the failure of the government to keep Canadian people and Parliament adequately informed, urges that steps be taken by legislation and otherwise to provide clear rules for freedom of information with regard to public business. I would submit that, therefore, the most meaningful step to be taken is an examination to understand the rules and procedures of the House as they exist now in affording opposition members the opportunity to get information from the government through Parliament. I am dealing specifically with the area of the motion which concerns itself with the criticism of this government in respect of information given to Parliament.

In that respect, it is appropriate to point out at the very beginning the rules and procedures of this House which accrue to the benefit of opposition members in their appointed task of getting information from the government. To begin with, in the number of days which make up each session there is now allotted a fixed number of opposition days, divided into trimesters. There are, in addition, certain days set aside for debate on the Speech From the Throne and for the budget debate. It is well known that on all of those days the input in the debate of this House is controlled by the opposition. It is a time when opposition members are entitled to deal with a wide range of subjects. On these days hon. members seek information on a wide variety of subjects. In addition to that, on each day, as Your Honour has pointed out on many occasions in the past, it has become the practice of opposition members to misuse Standing Order 43, taking up several minutes each day seeking the unanimous consent of the House to debate a motion of the opposition's choosing, or individual member's choosing.

Mr. Baldwin: Like the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle).

Mr. Jerome: Although rule changes in the first years of this Parliament did much to reduce the abuse of Standing Order 26, applications under that Standing Order are still made from time to time. We have a question period during which it has become the habit of the Chair to recognize in very great majority, if not exclusively, opposition members. This is not the proper time to decide whether that is the right way to conduct a question period, but the fact of the matter is that is what is done. The merits can be discussed at another time. I submit it is a significant factor in debating this motion today that this is in fact the case. The question period is devoted almost exclusively, or certainly the majority of the time, to opposition members.

• (1720)

Three questions from the daily question period can be set aside, if the opposition so chooses, for discussion on the late show or adjournment debate. The private members' hour involves four hours per week. This combination of events, procedures and regulations of this House, I submit, gives opposition members in their quest for information through Parliament at least 75 per cent of the debating time on the floor of this House and 75 per cent of the questioning time. Three out of every four minutes and three out of every four questions as well; three out of every four hours, three out of every four days and three out of every four weeks is devoted to the opposition's occupation of the time of this House. This is something I suggest the opposition might very well reflect upon. This motion does not go into the effectiveness of the opposition in the use of the considerable regulatory provisions which benefit it in its search for information. It suggests instead, by legislation or otherwise, that further changes be made which would permit it to have greater access to information in this Parliament.

Nothing could be more ridiculous than to suggest that the opposition should have more opportunity, more facility and more access to debate and to the time of this House than it has already. Twenty-eight days out of every session are now being used by the opposition in an excessively wasteful manner to the extent that the opposition now confesses, in its most candid moments, that it has too many days on which to suggest a subject matter for debate in this House. Perhaps if the motions of the opposition are no more effective than the one today, the rule should be changed so that such days could be devoted to some other pursuit of information on the part of the opposition members because they have certainly not distinguished themselves in their search for information on these days.

In addition to that, we might consider the performance of opposition members in committees. One of the most important rule changes in the first year of this Parliament was to shift to the committees a tremendous responsibility for the consideration of legislation, for the examination of estimates and for dealing with other subjects and problems which might arise from time to time. If one wants to examine what has been done in committees, one need only examine the respective attendance of opposition members as opposed to government members. Of course, there is a vested interest on the part of government members in attending committees. They must respect the need for a quorum and the need to carry on government business. Members of the opposition have the ministers present before them. They can ask questions and pursue points. They have the opportunity to summon other officials under the minister whom they are able to question and from whom they can seek information.

Members of the opposition do not do those things they ought to do. They could take an active part by developing team work and a concerted effort in seeking the information they want. It is significant that the procedures of the House permit any member to attend a committee whether or not he be a member of the committee. The rules give him the right to attend any committee hearing of his choice. Not only that, but he can participate if he so desires in the questioning of witnesses. That is the privilege of every member of this House, whether or not he be a member of the committee. He is prevented only from voting on a motion. In their quest for information, all members of the House, including all members of the opposition, are at liberty to attend any committee meeting.

[Mr. Jerome.]

We have gone one step further recently. We have established a set of committee schedules which was the result of a very systematic and extensive study in an effort to try, on the basis of past performance of attendance, to accommodate that solid group of members from all parties which does attend committees by reducing to the minimum the conflict of interest in respect of committees. Even this system has not accomplished anything in upgrading attendance of members of the opposition at committees where they could seek information on any subject. Every minister of the government must attend committee meetings in order to have his estimates approved. He must attend at one time or another and this is obviously an opportunity for members of the oppositon to seek information. Opposition members could attend and exert the kind of keen effort which is required in order to obtain the information they seek.

On the subject of providing information to this Parliament through the rules of this House, I would refer to the number of questions and statistics that are readily available to all members. It is interesting to compare the written questions placed on the order paper during the years of Parliament from 1957-58 through 1962-63 when the party of the mover of the motion was in power and in the years since that time. The number of questions dealt with by parliament in the period 1957-58 was 437. In the first year after their defeat in 1963, when a Liberal government came in, 1,906 questions were dealt with. In any year since this administration came to power the same kind of comparison can be made. I am safe in saying it has dealt with three or four times as many questions, and three or four times as frequently as the previous administration which put forward this motion of criticism of the supply of information to Parliament.

The record stands to show, in addition to that, that at the present time we are maintaining a 70 per cent rate of answering written questions in this House. One should bear in mind that at any given time the two or three out of ten questions which remain unanswered fall in a category which would be embarrassing to members of the opposition because of vagueness, irregularity and impossibility of answering, if not for the terrible complexity in respect of the number of man hours and expense required in answering some questions. I could read some questions from a list I have. Every one knows, however, that many of these questions require that many hundreds of man hours be spent by staff members in tabulating answers. In such cases the expense to the taxpayer would be out of all proportion to the importance of the question, even if it were possible to provide an answer which should be given in this House. At the present time seven out of every ten written questions placed on the order paper in this session of Parliament are answered and dealt with. This is a record this government can be proud of and which every member of the Canadian public would accept as an exceptional performance by this government in supplying information to Parliament.

The last point with which I want to deal is a most telling one. Before moving on to it, however, there is another category of questions which remain unanswered in that 30 per cent. There is a list from which I could read of questions tabled which require information that has already been provided in answers given earlier in this session or in other sessions of this same Parliament, which again indicates that there are mitigating circumstances in respect of the remaining questions which are unanswered at the present time.

• (1730)

But the last, and I think most telling area in the disastrous use of the facilities of this House by opposition members in respect of their quest for information, came with the provision in 1969 of research funds to opposition parties in order to assist them in their understanding of parliamentary affairs, in order to upgrade their quest for information, and their ability to criticize government legislation and government policy. Mr. Speaker, I am going to quote from a document which is in front of me:

> In 1969 for the first time in the parliamentary system, the Canadian House of Commons allocated $195,000 to be spent on research assistance for opposition members—
> Most governments can find more deserving people on whom to spend $200,000 than their obvious political foes. The government of Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau was something of an exception. For many years, opposition members of all parties had complained about their obvious inability to compete with the expertise, inside knowledge, and extensive bureaucratic research resources available to the government.

This fund was provided to offset that. But the question is: how has it been used? How effective have opposition members been in their use of it? This document discusses the problems which beset the opposition, in particular the Conservative party, in its use of these facilities. The conclusion that is reached is a most telling one and, Mr. Speaker, I will quote it to you right now in closing. I submit it is most interesting because the document is a paper prepared and delivered to the Institute of Political Science by the man who was the first director of the research unit for the Conservative party, Edwin R. Black, of Queen's University. I quote:

> The Opposition Leader's personal staff, including his chief political advisor, underwent considerable change during this period, change that had serious consequences for the research office. One was the shifting of responsibility for question period from the leader's personal staff to the research office. The present Opposition Leader has been trying to change the parliamentary question period from the essential free-for-all that it was under his predecessor to a major instrument of parliamentary control.
> Never, however, would the opposition caucus agree on a set of basic priorities. Tory members remained a gaggle of political private enterprisers who selfishly preferred to pursue their separate ways to the electoral gallows rather than hang together and work as a united opposition. Under such circumstances it was impossible for the research office to discontinue the plethora of daily services provided to the members in favour of concentrated effort on a few party-determined issues.

I will close by simply saying—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret that the time of the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the Parliamentary secretary who has a great deal of responsibility for the answering of questions placed on the order paper, questions that are not political but that seek information from the government. I have used that facility a great deal for many years in an effort to secure information that is useful in making a determination of how the government operates, and in making a determination of how it spends the taxpayers' dollars.

It was wonderful to listen to the parliamentary secretary. It is amazing that he did not need medical attention before he sat down, because I am sure I heard his arm break as he was patting himself so strongly on the back. I cannot agree with him on the effectiveness of the government in answering questions. There is a lot of evidence available to indicate that when the parliamentary secretary talks about three outstanding questions not being answered he, in effect, is admitting that any question that has any detrimental overtones for the government is delayed, delayed and delayed before being answered. No better example comes to my mind than when I endeavoured to determine how much the Prime Minister was using aircraft for which the taxpayers of Canada were paying. I waited through two sessions of Parliament, some 18 months, before I could secure the answer. Then, instead of getting the type of information that had been requested, I was given very minimal information so that is was impossible, without asking another series of questions, to determine exactly what use was being made of the aircraft by the Prime Minister, whether on government business, political business, or monkey business.

I had to wait 18 months for an answer, yet all that was necessary was to take the logs of the aircraft and provide the information from them. But on top of that, I never did receive information on the persons who were flying in those aircraft with the Prime Minister. I was given the number but nothing else. Apparently nobody has a right to know why or how the Prime Minister selects his company when he is flying around this country or other countries, and what are their purposes in being on the aircraft. That is none of our business. We pay the bills, but who the Prime Minister decides to carry around is none of our business.

Another example which I used in debating in this chamber on Tuesday relates to Information Canada and the number of public relations employees in the various government departments. I asked for this information. It should not be difficult to answer that question. First of all, the estimates of Information Canada could quickly supply the number of personnel in it on the date I placed the question on the order paper, February 18. And it should not have been difficult to get the number of public relations people associated with the various departments of government. It took four months to provide that information, Mr. Speaker. If you call that speed and efficiency, then I would not want to see the government start to slow down. Right now there are dozens and dozens of questions on the order paper unanswered. The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) gave some examples. I will repeat them just in case the parliamentary secretary did not hear the hon. member. Some 42 questions have been on the order paper since February; 53 since March; 35 since April, and 63 since May. This is certainly not an example of efficiency in the answering of questions.

These questions seek information and nothing more. The Speaker of the House will not allow questions to go on the order paper that do anything more than seek information. In many instances the questions asked could be answered within a week, if the government wanted to put its mind to it, and information could be provided in a really effective way. But all too often the government does not want Members of Parliament to get information, because just as soon as they get it they are able to point out how the government is wasting the taxpayers' money. That is why we do not get the answers when we should get them.

I would like to turn from that to talk about the roster system. This is another one of the effective ways in which the government has made Parliament more efficient. On September 25, 1968 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced the roster system for ministerial attendance during the question period, he recognized the importance of members being able to question ministers of the Crown and promised that the roster would be varied only in very exceptional circumstances.

Let us look at the figures for three weeks beginning May 1, May 8 and May 15. During the week of May 1 there were 18 ministerial absences, that is if absences are measured against the roster sheet. During the week of May 8, there were 25 such absences; on one day only 11 ministers were present and nine were absent. During the week of May 15, there were 19 absences, making a total for the three weeks of 62. The exceptional circumstances mentioned by the Prime Minister may have been the assumed approach of an election. Whatever they were, there was scant opportunity for members to question ministers.

The mover of this motion, when the Prime Minister announced the roster system, made the following statement which appears at page 801 of Hansard, on October 4, 1968. He said:

> I believe that the statement and the plan constitute a calculated contempt and an infringement of the privileges of this House, of all members of this House, including all the members of the opposition and government backbenchers, in so far as both tradition and the Standing Orders of the House are concerned.

The hon. member for Peace River said a great deal more, but that pretty well sums up what happened. The roster system has done one thing very effectively; it has prevented members of the opposition from getting the facts.

There have been many areas that the government could look at to see what happens when a government endeavours to stop the public from having information. It could be done by the roster system or by not answering questions but when it is, other people step in. This government knows better than any government in Canadian history just how effectively other people can step in and what happens when they do. Government leaks happen. At one point in this Parliament the leaks became a flood because people in the public service who felt that the public should know about certain things and who knew that Members of Parliament could not secure the information from the government, provided the information themselves.

Let me give a list of the leaks that have occurred since 1969: 1969, a research study prepared for the B & B commission was leaked to La Presse; sections of the study of the Housing Task Force were leaked to Time magazine; June, 1970, excerpts from the recommendations of the Le Dain commission were leaked to Time magazine; 1971, four staff members of the Special Committee on Poverty left the staff, published a conflicting report using, in part, information gathered during their official tenure; 1971, draft portions of the Gray report on foreign ownership; 1971, record of cabinet decision in reference to the Gray report; December 23, 1971, details of two 1970 cabinet documents relating to law and order and possible use of the War Measures Act, suggesting the use of the act was contemplated before the October crisis 1970, to the Globe and Mail; December 30, 1971, excerpts from two 1971 cabinet documents relating to the government's northern development policy for the next ten years, to the Globe and Mail; February 2, 1972, cabinet document on foreign ownership; 1972, official documents, not cabinet, but all classified including a document on low income housing; the Anton Sobokha file, an abortive espionage case; report on collective bargaining in the Public Service and a confidential evaluation of summer works programs, 1971, that was the Francophone university program.

These are all examples of information that was leaked. When the opposition endeavoured to get the information, they could not get it from the government and people involved in high places felt that the information should be made available to the public. The Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet, Mr. Gordon Robertson made a speech recently in St. John's, Newfoundland regarding government leaks. He justified his attack on the basis of the government's need to keep much information confidential and he said:

> In short, the collective executive that is the heart of our parliamentary system must have secrecy: it cannot work without it.

Mr. Speaker, if things are secret and should be secret, I have no argument with what Mr. Robertson says. But all too often our government considers things secret because it is politically expedient to do so and there is no justification for them being so classified. That is the problem we face in this Parliament and the thing we complain about so publicly and so often. It is the reason for this motion before us today.

Kildare Dobbs, a well-known Canadian writer, who spent a short time working for the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) summed up the stupidity of confidentiality procedures in the federal government in an article which appeared in the Maclean's magazine in September, 1971, when he said:

> I could never quite understand by what alchemy the words rattling loose inside my head became Confidential the moment I wrote them down. But that was what happened. A few strokes of the borrowed ballpoint and presto! I was spinning state secrets out of my own innards.

And later:

With superfluous caution, they put up a smoke screen of security, mindlessly stamping everything on their desks Top Secret, Eyes Only, Secret, Confidential. As if anybody cared. Not only were these documents unreadable: many of them, on close inspection, proved meaningless.

Those are the facts surrounding the great secrecy about so much of what is happening in government today, most of which should be out in the open where it could be examined by the public. If we could get that kind of information we would not be so concerned that we would move the motion before us. However, we have moved it because we believe that this government feels it in their interests to prevent us from getting information.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Is the hon. member getting up to speak or to ask a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Believe it or not, Mr. Speaker, I rose to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. In all fairness, I think I should recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the generosity of my friend in yielding to me I shall try to say what is mainly on my mind in five minutes and leave three or four minutes for him to make his speech.

I should like to say that I believe this has been one of those debates in which good speeches have been made on both sides of the House. I have no hesitation in saying that even though he was speaking in a political vein, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome) scored some very strong points. I should also like to commend the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) on his speech. I thought his analysis of information of various kinds was good, and I thought his description of the daily question period was one to which we should pay some attention. On this side of the House, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) introduced the debate with a very constructive speech. I believe my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), also made some very valuable and very helpful suggestions. I also think one of the highlights of this afternoon was the speech made by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). I could go further, but I think I have gone far enough to demonstrate my point that good speeches have been made by members on both sides of this House.

I could go into this matter at length but I have agreed to be short, so may I concentrate on two areas in which I think we could make a real effort to improve things. Both relate to the question of information being provided to Parliament.

First, may I support the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) and other hon. members who suggested that the roster system is for the birds. It is not so much the non-attendance in this House of ministers on a certain day when members want an answer to a particular question that bothers me, but, rather, the downgrading of the question period which is produced by the non-attendance of a third of the ministers every day, and frequently by the non-attendance of half the ministers.

I think we ought to accept the criticism of the hon. member for Gloucester who suggested that opposition members do not always ask the brightest questions. I suggest, however, that upgrading the question period is a responsibility that must be shared on both sides of this House; and, just as the questions of hon. members on this side ought to be good and sharp, and aimed at advancing good ideas and at getting information as well as at advancing political points, so the government should take the question period seriously. That means that all the ministers ought to be here almost every day. If it does not happen in this Parliament, then, in the next Parliament I hope this roster will be torn in shreds; I hope we will return to the old system and that all ministers will be prepared to answer questions every day the House sits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a simple request, Mr. Speaker, and merely needs the exercise of the will to achieve it.

My other point is this: We should take a really good, hard look at how we handle estimates. I agree with hon. members on the other side who suggested we have improved the parliamentary process with respect to legislation. I think the committee arrangements and report stage arrangements we have made are good. I also agree that committees do good investigative work, and are to be commended. I think those processes are good. But the process by which we handle estimates, to put it mildly, leaves a great deal to be desired.

Let us not deal with this matter by suggesting that the government is all right and that the opposition is all wrong, or vice versa, or that we should keep this system or go back to the old system, although the old system was better for its time. I think that, somehow, members of parliament must become involved in the whole process in relation to the estimates. We may even need to modify the sacred concept of government responsibility and make provision for members to become involved in the preparation of estimates. The blue book of estimates is a big one, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) has told us he has given us more information than we can possibly digest. Yet the book really does not tell us how departments of government build up their lists of expenditures and how the decisions are made that determine how the taxpayer's money is spent. Mr. Speaker, I am not defending the present system or the old system; I am trying not to be partisan; I am merely asking for a new study of the whole question of how we vote the money for which Parliament is responsible. Perhaps we shall need to examine estimates on a two-year basis, instead of a one-year basis. Possibly, we should go for an examination of the estimates of each department once every three or four years. Perhaps we shall have to tear up the whole system we now have with respect to estimates and come up with a brand new technique. I hope that somewhere, somehow, we can do this, and we should get at it very soon. I could continue, Mr. Speaker, but my hon. friend from Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe) is seeking the floor, so I yield to him.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was instrumental in curtailing the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I wish to talk about a request, I placed on the order paper, with respect to which I was not given adequate replies. In three and a half minutes it will be somewhat difficult to put my case on record. The matter has to do with the second international airport for Toronto.

Some weeks ago, I put on the order paper the following notice of motion for the production of papers:

> Than an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, special study reports between the Government of Canada or any department thereof and the Government of the Province of Ontario relating to the question of the second international airport in the Province of Ontario.

The notice of motion is dated April 13. After I prodded the minister a great deal, he said he was willing to accede to my request and to make that information available to this House. Not until May 24, did I obtain that reply.

The reply disturbed me, Mr. Speaker. After all, considering that the studies were said to have extended over months and even years, since the second airport would be a most expensive proposition running into the billions of dollars, I expected more than was given to me. I was told that the studies had gone on for a long time, yet what did I obtain? The minister's return consisted of a neat package of press releases, ministerial letters, and so on. For instance, consider this release headed, "Transport Minister Don Jamieson discusses Toronto's second international airport with area Members of Parliament". It reads:

> Transport Minister Don Jamieson met last Friday with Norman Cafik, M.P., Ontario (riding), Barnett Danson, M.P., York-North and John Roberts, M.P., York-Simcoe to discuss aspects of the Federal Government's plan for the development of a second Toronto international airport—

That is playing politics. Those members represent constituencies in the area. I asked several times for a complete study of the matter and suggested that the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications should sit down with the people in the areas concerned and discuss with them a project as big as this. That did not happen. However, according to the press release, the minister discussed the matter with three hon. members representing affected constituencies.

Consider the following headline carried in a Toronto newspaper, Mr. Speaker: "High-priced advice taken on airport, McKeough asserts". Mr. McKeough tabled some documents in the Ontario Legislature, in Toronto. He provided more information than the minister. According to the post office scale, the package the minister provided weighs two pounds four ounces, whereas the documents Mr. McKeough tabled weighed five pounds. Mr. Speaker, I feel that information that ought to have been made available was not made available with respect to a decision as important as the one involving the new Toronto international airport on which we will spend possibly billions of dollars.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It being six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), to inform the House that proceedings on the motion have expired.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 15, 1972

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKASEY—CORRECTION OF PREVIOUS ANSWERS CONCERNING SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege based on responses I gave in the House on June 9 and June 12 to the hon. members for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) and Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), as reported on pages 2993 and 3036 of Hansard, with regard to the death of Mrs. Alicia Wiercioch.

After a complete inquiry into her case I find that the information on the basis of which I answered the hon. members was not entirely correct and that my response was ambiguous and would tend to mislead the House and members of the media. This is why, Mr. Speaker, I trust you will allow me this opportunity to briefly set the record straight.

Mrs. Wiercioch applied for landed status on September 30, 1968, one month after she arrived in Canada on a six month visitor's visa. Because of procedures which were in existence at the time, her husband had to fill out an application form on his own behalf so that the entire family could be processed. This caused a delay since her husband was in Poland and had to be processed through our Geneva office which was the regional headquarters for Europe at that time.

During this delay Mrs. Wiercioch accepted work without permission after signing a written statement that she would not do so. Once she informed my department of this, she immediately could no longer be a successful applicant for landing. The department sent her a letter asking her to depart voluntarily, failing which she would be ordered to an inquiry to decide whether or not she should be deported. She had her inquiry on September 24, 1970, at which time she was ordered deported but given permission to work after she stated that she would pursue an appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board.

On March 15, 1972, the Immigration Appeal Board dismissed her appeal against deportation and declined to exercise their discretion to allow her to remain on compassionate grounds. Her attorney then made a motion to the Federal Court to have the time limit extended for submission of a motion to seek leave to appeal. This motion was still before the Federal Court at the time of her death. Because the case was sub judice the department had no intention of effecting deportation when Mrs. Wiercioch died.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I stated to the hon. members for Hamilton West and Edmonton Centre that she was not ordered deported for working illegally. I can assure the House that I did not give this information in bad faith but based it on the preliminary information then submitted to me by the department, which I have now found contained errors that are being investigated. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to set the record straight.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, I see the hon. member for Hamilton West seeks the floor in order, I assume, to discuss this important matter. I am not sure that the matter was raised correctly by way of a question of privilege. Perhaps it would have been better had it been raised by way of a statement on motions, which would have permitted the hon. member for Hamilton West to respond. With the consent of the House, perhaps we might deem that the minister's statement was made on motions, which would allow the hon. member for Hamilton West to speak in reply.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I think it is in order for me, on behalf of my party, to thank the minister for setting the record straight. Unquestionably there was a conflict of evidence which raised many questions in the minds of many people about our whole immigration procedure. Because of what has happened, and because of the outdatedness, if I may use that expression, of our immigration procedures, especially those relating to deportation orders, I hope the minister will make sure that there will be early implementation of those amendments that he believes will make the Immigration Act more acceptable so that in the long run equity will prevail and the act will work more expeditiously.

I would hope that the minister has learned how his departmental officials work. I do not know what action he intends to take, but he has certainly been misled. I notice the minister has drawn his thumb across his throat, indicating that someone is in trouble. It is right that this should be so because of the seriousness of this matter in that this person, who had great respect for this country and wanted to live here in freedom, decided, because of the hangups in the present immigration laws, to take her own life.

I again thank the minister for attempting to set the record straight with regard to this matter.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I, too, thank the minister for his statement, but I think this tragic episode underlines the necessity for a thorough review of the whole question of immigration procedures. A serious problem arises, as the minister knows, owing to the fact that in large urban communities such as Toronto there is a lengthy delay following the decision of an immigration officer in the special inquiry to which a person is entitled.

I know the minister is making moves to deal with this problem, but I think the whole policy regarding the issuance of work permits to people while they are waiting, through no fault of their own, for these lengthy procedures to determine their rights should be reviewed.

I suggest to the minister that the time has come to review the policy of allowing the final discretion as to clemency in these matters to remain with what is in effect a court of law. I think that Parliament made a mistake when it deprived the minister of the final right to extend clemency in especially hard cases. I hope that the whole situation will be reviewed because the present situation is entirely unsatisfactory. It is unfair to immigrants and I think it is unfair to the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the remarks that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has just made about the minister's statement concerning immigration. Indeed, immigration regulations should be revised and carefully considered in order to enable immigrants to identify themselves quite easily with our society and prevent undesirables from entering Canada.

In my opinion, the proposal made by the hon. member for Greenwood is fully justified and I suggest that the government and the minister should follow up that matter as soon as possible.

MR. MUIR—INACCURATE INFORMATION IN BOOKLET, "ON THE ROAD"

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all members of the House, particularly those from Atlantic Canada. It relates to a publication, sponsored by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), produced at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer and distributed free of charge by Information Canada and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The publication in question is entitled "On The Road" and is supposed to be "a guide for youth travelling Canada." The news release that accompanied this booklet states as follows:

> The booklet has been designed to present helpful hints, in a comprehensive but simplified manner, to Canadian youth on the move ... whether the trip is long or short, whether walking, driving or riding a bicycle, Canadian youth will find the map section of particular value.

My question of privilege deals with the information contained in the map section of the booklet. On checking the maps of the Atlantic area, I was absolutely astonished to see that the city of Sydney, in my constituency on Cape Breton Island, is designated as being over 300 miles away on mainland Nova Scotia in the historic Lunenburg area. Having removed the city of Sydney, they attempt to eliminate Cape Breton Island by disposing of the Canso causeway. I want to tell the Minister of National Health and Welfare that efforts to ignore us will in no way eliminate us. I might also add there were fears expressed at the time the Canso causeway was constructed that the remainder of Canada might try to swallow our island as Jonah was swallowed by the whale.

In view of the fact that I have mentioned Sydney, Lunenburg, the Canso causeway and Cape Breton Island, which are all part of Canada's ocean playground, I should like to inform those who prepared the booklet that I am somewhat dubious about some of the instructions. For instance, on page 4 the booklet states: "Drowning is unhealthy".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: We in Cape Breton consider it fatal. It would be bad enough if the only mistake made was to remove Sydney from Cape Breton Island and put it on the south shore of Nova Scotia, but that is not all. They have taken the town of Truro and moved it from the Minas Basin to the center of Nova Scotia where Mount Thom was when I was last there. They have taken the Scottish heritage from New Glasgow and, apparently aware of the recent controversy over the sale of Grassy Island to an American, they have replaced the Scottish name with a bovine heritage and named it New Glas-cow!

I would like to stop there if I could, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot. Dalhousie has been moved from New Brunswick and appears to be in Quebec. Newfoundland has a new abbreviation—N.F.—apparently in keeping with the government's policy toward that province. I assume it stands for "No fish."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question of privilege is obviously receiving a very sympathetic response from all hon. members, and I would not want to limit unduly his right to express his views with respect to the matter he is bringing to our attention. Nevertheless, to this point I find some difficulty in recognizing the question of privilege, in other words, precisely how the hon. member's parliamentary privileges have been infringed. I hope the hon. member will not pursue the matter much further. I gather that he is coming to the end of his statement.

Mr. Muir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I truly respect your opinion, as you well know. I shall not take much more of the time of the House in outlining the shocking discrepancies in the map section, but I must refer to one other inexcusable inaccuracy which appears on page 31 of the booklet in reference to hospitals in Nova Scotia. The booklet lists only two hospitals in Nova Scotia and they are both mental institutions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: This makes me wonder whether the author of the book felt any of the youths visiting our province would require this type of treatment. It might also suggest that when the individual or individuals concerned were preparing the booklet they were on a trip of the variety examined by the Le Dain Commission and not the type of trip I hope the youth of today will be making this summer. Still further, the mental institution referred to in the city of Halifax is not given its correct name, nor is it located at the address given. If anyone were to try to find this institution, he would certainly need its facilities before he finally got there. It would be amusing if it were not so serious.

In recent days there has been growing concern about the usefulness of Information Canada. If there was ever an example of its uselessness, this booklet is certainly it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now arguing a case against Information Canada. I wonder how this can be related to parliamentary privilege. Hon. members must realize that parliamentary privilege arises from a very special case which might be made out successfully at times by hon. members. A responsibility rests on hon. members who believe they have a valid question of privilege to state what the privilege is as quickly as possible.

Mr. Muir: I fully agree, Mr. Speaker, with the statement you have made, but I am sure you will agree with me that no more grievous blow could be dealt a Member of Parliament than to remove the largest city from his riding and reflect on the people he represents. Day after day the evidence piles up. It is appalling that Canadians should be so irresponsibly misinformed. I believe that not only the people I represent in Cape Breton-The Sydneys but other people in Cape Breton Island, in the Province of Nova Scotia and, indeed, in Atlantic Canada have been outrageously insulted.

It is because I am utterly opposed to the operations of Information Canada that it is my intention to file with the House a notice in opposition to vote No. 25 of the Department of Supply and Services appearing in the estimates for the fiscal year 1972-73, which involves the expenditure of $10,354,000 for the operation of this agency.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has given notice of his intention to file a notice on the order paper. That, I assume, would be the remedy that he is seeking. Therefore the Chair will have to rule that the matter cannot be pursued further as a question of privilege. I am sure the hon. member will agree with that ruling.

IMMIGRATION

PROPOSED COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to propose a motion under Standing Order 43. The need for the motion has been quite apparent during the point of privilege raised by the minister, for which I give him credit, and during the remarks following. It is a motion of pressing and urgent necessity for which I am seeking unanimous consent. The administration of the Immigration Act and regulations has created confusion and misunderstanding, as evidenced by numerous incidents which have become public knowledge recently. The motion I shall move if unanimous consent is given is as follows:

Inquiries of the Ministry

That a special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to examine and report upon the present administration of the Immigration Act and regulations and make recommendations designed to bring about suitable changes; and that the committee have power to report from time to time, to appoint subcommittees, to send for persons, papers and records and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and that a message be sent to the Senate requesting their Honours to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems so advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

I have struggled to remove any controversial or hostile comments from the motion, and if there is unanimous consent to accept it I would be glad to have that done without debate at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSSIBLE RECOURSE TO ARBITRATION—INTERVENTION OF MINISTER

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Labour.

In view of the extremely important situation that prevails in the harbours of Montreal and Quebec City, I should like to ask the following question of the Minister of Labour: since the deadlock between ship owners and longshoremen seems to be dragging on, and since both parties stated that they were prepared to go to arbitration, though they have not yet started any proceedings in that direction, can the minister tell the House how, in his opinion, that dispute will be settled without his personal intervention?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept all of the premises in the hon. member's question. Both parties have not agreed to arbitration. I am staying in very close touch with the situation and I hope some movement may take place soon.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege or a point of order, whichever the Chair decides.

The minister has just said that both parties have not agreed to arbitration. I should like to refer the House to page 3124 of yesterday's Hansard where the Minister of Labour is reported to have said:

—The Maritime Employers' Association has expressed its willingness to arbitrate. It has, however, not initiated the proceedings. The International Longshoremen's Association has put its position somewhat in this fashion, that it is open to the other party to initiate proceedings but the longshoremen do not themselves wish to initiate these proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, the minister has just answered that the two parties did not speak of their intention to resort to arbitration—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member might put a supplementary question. To my mind, an apparent or obvious contradiction in the information given to the House cannot be considered as a point of order or a question of privilege. The hon. member might perhaps want to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour to kindly throw light on the present position of the longshoremen and ship owners, that is to say to tell us whether one or the other party has indicated its wish to resort to arbitration and whether one or the other has undertaken procedures to that effect?

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I cannot add anything to the statements and answers I gave in the House yesterday. I would simply say to both parties that they have an obligation under the law and under their agreement to either singly or jointly arbitrate the difference that has arisen between them. They owe that obligation not only to themselves but to the community of Montreal and to the country which is gravely affected by the unwillingness of either or both to take the action that is clearly in front of them and which they should be taking now.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put another supplementary question to the minister. In view of the importance of the problem, I know that the minister will readily give a clear and specific answer. Can he tell the House whether one of the parties has let it be known that it would be ready to resort to arbitration, if he would personally intervene?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on a supplementary.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I think that the minister was ready to answer, but he needed a few seconds to think over what he would say. I feel that the minister should answer.

Mr. Speaker: Such is not my impression.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

[English]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTED TAKEOVER OF LONGSHORING OPERATIONS BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, last week I directed a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board asking whether he would act on the request of the National Farmers Union, that the government should take over the operations of the stevedoring firms at the St. Lawrence ports and carry on operations until such time as an agreement is reached between the operating firms and the workers. Is the minister now ready to give consideration to and act on that request?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, I am not considering that step.

[Translation]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—INQUIRY RESPECTING MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER AND PARTIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

I know that the minister is closely examining the situation in Montreal. Yesterday, he answered rather precisely the questions directed to him but I would like to ask him whether he has communicated with the employers or the union representatives and whether he expects that an agreement will be reached by the two parties involved?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any direct communication with either of the two parties. I simply state that the settlement of this dispute is in their hands, and that is where it belongs. They should get together and bring about a settlement of the dispute.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are five or six supplementary questions. We will try to proceed in an orderly fashion. I will first recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue and then return to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar for a supplementary to his question.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a further supplementary question.

Can the minister say what is keeping both parties from meeting in order to reach an agreement?

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I rather think I fully explained that situation yesterday and I have not very much more to add to that.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTED TAKEOVER OF LONGSHORING OPERATIONS BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the evident unwillingness of the Minister of Labour to act effectively in this situation may I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether he can assure members of this House that grain exports will not suffer as a result of the continued inoperation of those ports?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the movement of feed grain is proceeding through alternate ports in the east, as well as at very rapid rates through other ports. Naturally the capacity for moving grain into export at any moment in time is less without these facilities, but the alternate facilities are being operated long hours at their fullest possible capacity to try to carry the load.

• (1430)

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Labour. Does he intend to continue the government's laissez-faire policy and allow an illegal strike to remain unsettled by default and the usual government capitulation in these matters?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That obviously is not a question. The hon. member for Joliette.

[Translation]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTION THAT MINISTER REQUIRE PARTIES TO RESPECT OBLIGATIONS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Since the minister has said clearly that both parties had obligations concerning the public, will he compel them to respect them?

Mr. Speaker: It seems that many questions are basically repetitions of those put previously and that the question of the hon. member for Joliette has been put earlier today.

[English]

For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South. If there is a disposition on the part of hon. members to return to this matter later we will do so.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for York South.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Joliette rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I realize many similar questions have been raised but I believe those concerned are most eager to know whether the hon. minister is going to take a stand regarding the conflict. I just wanted to ask the hon. minister whether, without replacing the parties concerned, he will at least hold them to the commitments he has mentioned.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: I must say again that I consider that question has already been raised.

HOUSING

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT—NATURE OF PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—PROVINCIAL REACTION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who according to the roster should be here today—I am sure he is away for good reason—I wish to pose a question to the Acting Prime Minister on the assumption that the matter was discussed in cabinet and he would know some of the answers. In view of the fact that Mr. McKeough, the provincial treasurer for Ontario, stated in the legislature yesterday that it would be incorrect to say the province had been consulted about the proposed amendments to the National Housing Act, would the Acting Prime Minister inform the House what exactly was the nature of the consultation the federal government and the provinces had in respect of these amendments and whether any provincial governments made substantive comments, criticisms or suggestions when they saw the proposals?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of question that can be answered adequately only by the minister in charge. I will see that the question is put to him and he will answer at the next opportunity.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, this time my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council as government House leader. We have had first reading of the amendments to the National Housing Act. I should like to ask him whether there is any intention on his part to bring the bill forward for second reading, or is it to be housing by headline for election purposes only?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot ask a question in those terms. I again take exception to hon. members who ask a question that they should know is out of order and then, when they are called to order, seek the floor again to put it in proper terms. I think the question should be asked properly in the first instance.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will not take the time now, but there is reason for my comment. May I ask the government House leader whether he intends to bring forward for second reading before the end of this month the bill amending the National Housing Act?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have already had discussions with the opposition House leaders concerning what items of legislation will be brought forward before the end of the month. Since that discussion the National Housing Act and one or two other items have come forward. I hope to state quite definitely next week all the items that will be called before we can look forward to an adjournment. Certainly the National Housing Act is one which has attracted a good deal of support in the country and it would be desirable to deal with it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I hope you will notice, Sir, that the sin is on both sides, if it is a sin. May I ask either the government House leader or the Acting Prime Minister—if neither one of them can answer perhaps it could be taken as notice—what I suggest is an important question. In view of the fact that most of the amendments to the National Housing Act require co-operation from the provinces as well as the municipalities and, indeed, require that funds be made available by the provinces and municipalities, may the House have a brief explanation concerning why the bill was introduced even for first reading without, as I on good information am informed, all the provinces even approving of the amendments proposed by the cabinet?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the legislation had not been brought forward I am sure the criticism would have been even more severe.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF DEPARTMENT TO ALLOW SHIPPERS TO SUE UNIONS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

As recorded in yesterday's Hansard at page 3125, the minister said, and I quote:

—other remedies more rapid than a court proceeding were available to them.

I should like to ask him the following question. Since these other remedies are not yet known to the members of this House, would he tell us how much longer his department intends to refuse the shipowners the right to prosecute unions for calling an illegal strike?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the other measure to which I referred yesterday was the arbitration procedure. Of course, if the two parties do not wish to use this it is open to them, under their agreement and under the law, to come together and renegotiate an agreement, if that is their wish. It is not for me to intervene and suggest they reopen their agreement. That is for them. My position is that the law requires arbitration. That is the other procedure to which I referred.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I should like to know why his department prevents the shipowners from prosecuting unions for calling an illegal strike.

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, in my view nothing would be served by going into court. That procedure was followed a few weeks ago and then withdrawn. The proper procedure, that which is required, is available to the two parties. It is a wide open procedure. It is arbitration, and that is the procedure that either or both of the parties should now adopt.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Shefford, after which the hon. member for Sainte-Marie will be able to put his supplementary.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTION THAT MINISTER ALLOW SHIPPERS TO SUE UNIONS

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, since neither party seems to be willing to resort to arbitration, would the hon. minister allow the party which wants to bring the conflict to an end, i.e. the shipowners, to prosecute the unions, so that the courts may decide whether the strike is legal or not?

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, of course I am always prepared to entertain applications for consent to prosecute from either party to the dispute. It is open to them to make an application at any time.

[Translation]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—PROPOSED MEASURES TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary to the minister?

In view of the disastrous effects of this situation for the country as a whole, and in particular for the city of Montreal, can the minister tell the House whether he expects an early settlement of this conflict?

Can he also say when he replies to this question whether he has consulted with his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) who participated in the preparation of collective agreements and in negotiations and whether he has made suggestions to the cabinet for solutions in order to bring about a settlement of the conflict?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): I sincerely trust that the two parties will come to their senses, recognize their obligation to themselves and the community and undertake the necessary steps to resolve the dispute.

Mr. Woolliams: You have that line memorized.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West —and then the hon. member for Joliette.

[Translation]

[English]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the fact it can now be concluded that neither party is prepared to pursue the remedy available to them in the agreement and that have shown no respect for the minister's telegram, and in light of the fact that the public interest is now being adversely affected, will the minister personally intervene now, go to the parties and indicate to them that this matter must be brought to arbitration, failing which the government must intervene? Will the minister do that rather than take the indirect approach?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply, but again it seems to me that this question has been asked a number of times today.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): I am not contemplating that action at the present time.

[Translation]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—INQUIRY RESPECTING IMPOSITION OF ARBITRATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

As the minister believes that this conflict can be settled only through arbitration—and I fully agree—could he tell the House whether he will compel the parties to accept arbitration?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think I made it clear on a previous occasion in an answer that the act does not give the Minister of Labour the power to oblige or force, which was the other word used by the hon. member, the parties to arbitration. That is not the authority I have. The law contemplates that the parties will live up to their obligations under the law.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN CMHC INTEREST RATES IN LIGHT OF PROFITS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who is responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation I should like to put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the increasingly high interest rates charged under the National Housing Act by CMHC for NHA loans, and also in view of the very high profits reported by CMHC for the years 1970 and 1971, is the government considering advising CMHC to lower its interest rates on NHA loans forthwith, particularly for low-income individuals?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, these interest rates are the subject of consideration by the government from time to time, and I am sure that when they come before the government again this point of view will be borne in mind.

Mr. Ryan: Would the government consider referring this very important question of the profits and interest rates of CMHC to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs forthwith so that consideration may be given to the over-all picture as it is now because the matter is urgent?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the intention.

FINANCE

BANK INTEREST RATES—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION OF PRIME AND OTHER RATES—RATE PAID ON SWAP DEPOSITS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with interest rates. In his answer on Monday he stated that he has an agreement with the Canadian banks to reduce the interest rate on certificates of deposit by a certain percentage. I should like to know if the minister can tell the House and the people whether there has been any agreement with the banks on the prime and other lending rates?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Sir, the banks have not asked me for any acquiescence in that type of agreement.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to ask the minister, without commenting on the great vacuum between the certificate of deposit rate and the lending rate, and in view of the fact the minister indicated earlier in the House in answer to my question that he would use moral suasion with the bankers in Winnipeg, as a result of which we did have a change in the deposit rate, whether he has received any information at all from the banks as to what they are paying for their swap deposits with the United States?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the banks are as aware of the problems with respect to swap deposits as they were with respect to certificates of deposit that they were issuing for short-term loans to them.

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the fact the minister said he was going to travel about the countryside speaking to provincial governments about their involvement with the United States securities and exchange market for dollars, is he speaking directly to the Canadian chartered banks, which are one of the most aggressive borrowers in this whole area, to dissuade them from putting pressure on the Canadian dollar with their massive borrowings in the United States? This brings us back to the question I asked earlier.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Pressure caused by the competition that the banks were exercising for short-term money has been relieved in that particular area by the lowering of the rate paid on certificates of deposit from about 6½ per cent last Friday to 5½ per cent on Monday, and that particular problem seems to be in hand.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GRANT OFFERED TO MANIWAKI FOREST PRODUCTS—NEW JOBS TO BE CREATED—LEGALITY OF GRANT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has the minister investigated the development incentive grant of $181,000 offered by his department to Maniwaki Forest Products Limited in view of the fact that the grant includes a sum of money for the creation of new jobs while the manager of the plant has said that the number of employees will not be increased? Could he report on the situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the situation is very, very simple; without this grant, the plant would be closed and 170 workers unemployed. By giving this grant, we were creating 170 jobs.

[English]

Mr. Burton: Would the minister agree to subtract the figure of 74 from his estimate of the number of new jobs created through the program, and would he also undertake to inform the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase the supplementary question. Certainly the first part is not in order.

Mr. Burton: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Has he obtained a legal opinion from the Department of Justice to ensure that within the terms of the legislation now in effect he can make a grant of this sort under these circumstances under the Regional Development Incentives Act?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the department has its own legal advisers and up to now they have never indicated that there was any doubt as to the right interpretation of the act.

[English]

Mr. Burton: I have a further supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have to try to make some progress. The Chair will allow the hon. member for Regina East to ask a supplementary question, but hon. members will recognize that a number of questioners are seeking the floor. I suggest to hon. members that perhaps we should try to limit supplementaries.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I have one further short supplementary question. Would the minister undertake to consult the Department of Justice in order to make sure that he is not contravening the terms of this act?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, unless the legal advisers of the department express doubts as to the legality of the action taken by the administrators, I do not see why—because the hon. member should wish to obtain some legal advice—I should have to ask for it.

HEALTH

POSSIBILITY OF COST-SHARING FOR ONTARIO HOME CARE PROGRAM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the galloping increase in health care costs and in light of his statement yesterday that Ontario's coverage of nursing home care may be considered for some degree of cost-sharing, will the minister advise the House whether such an extension would cover as well the Ontario home care program which is intended to remove the burden of patient care from overburdened hospitals and nursing homes?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): What I did indicate was that the first proposal being a component of the over-all health cost proposals of the federal government to the provinces it would provide for federal financial contributions toward various kinds of intermediate care, and possibly nursing homes would be one example. I was pointing this out as an example of why I thought we should expect a favourable reaction from the provinces to our proposal.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Rynard: I want to thank the minister for this answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I call again on the co-operation of hon. members to limit the number of supplementary questions. The hon. member for Simcoe North may ask a brief supplementary.

• (1450)

Mr. Rynard: Will the minister say how long it will be before he will extend this program in order to cut down mounting health care costs?

Mr. Munro: We feel it is very good proposal, and I am glad to hear that the hon. member does as well. I am sure he will join with me in wishing that the provinces will agree to it as soon as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUEBEC—CONTRIBUTIONS OF SEASONAL EMPLOYEES—AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that the seasonal employees of the Quebec Department of Roads are not eligible for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, may I ask the minister whether there are discussions at the present time with the Quebec government aiming at settling this problem and having this group of workers covered under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman's information is either incorrect or incomplete. To the best of my knowledge, all Quebec civil servants are covered by unemployment insurance. Perhaps after the question period we could pursue the matter at greater length.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I accept the minister's reply that my information is wrong, but I would like to ask him the following question. If the seasonal workers, whom I have just mentioned are covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act, how is it they have not all been informed of this and keep making representations to us on this matter?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

KILLING OF TANYA BUSH—INQUIRY AS TO INVOLVEMENT OF PENITENTIARY INMATE ON TEMPORARY LEAVE—PAROLE POLICY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General in reference to information I have received from British Columbia about a young girl named Tanya Bush who disappeared and whose body has now been found. Has the minister anything to report to the House on whether any of the penitentiary inmates who were given temporary leave have been connected with the foul play resulting in the death of this young girl?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by the RCMP that an investigation is being made and, of course, I would not like to interfere with the police investigation. I asked the Commissioner of Penitentiaries to make a complete report on an inmate who may be considered as suspect. I have also asked the Chairman of the Parole Board to send me any available records on that person.

Whatever the case may be, I would like to express my heartfelt sympathy to the young girl's parents, considering her father is a member of the Canadian Penitentiary Service.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: I agree with the minister in this regard but I am not seeking information about the investigation. I hope the minister will make a statement in reference to these temporary leaves and the parole system as it is working today because there have been several news items across the nation indicating that people given temporary leave over the weekend have just disappeared. I think we are entitled to know how this system is working, particularly as there seems to be some suggestion of foul play in reference to Tanya Bush.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have given answers on many occasions concerning the temporary leave program, which has worked out wonderfully in 99 cases out of 100. I answered all questions on this matter before the House of Commons committee when my departmental estimates were being discussed.

REPORTED OIL SPILL AT RESOLUTE BAY—STEPS TO MINIMIZE DAMAGE—APPLICATION OF PROPOSED REGULATIONS UNDER NORTHERN INLAND WATERS ACT

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister inform the House of the amount of damage done by the spilling of 40,000 gallons of oil at a tank farm located at Resolute Bay in the Northwest Territories, and can he also inform the House as to what steps are being taken to minimize the damage and to repair any already done?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire and supply particulars to the hon. member, but I wonder if that concerns Resolute Bay. Should it not be Spence Bay?

[English]

Mr. Rowland: According to my information it is Resolute Bay. While the minister is looking into that matter, could he also check another point? On May 24 in reply to my question he said that, while the regulations under the Northern Inland Waters Act had not yet been proclaimed, companies in the north had been instructed to abide by those regulations as though they were in force. I should like the minister to indicate to the House whether the tank farm and the oil transfer line involved in the spill comply with those regulations and, if so, is consideration being given to modifying the regulations in order to prevent such occurrences in the future?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I can hardly answer that question because the hon. member refers to an act which does not apply under the circumstances. I will meet him after the question period and I will then be able to obtain further particulars.

YOUTH

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKLET "ON THE ROAD" AND FIRING OF THOSE WHO PREPARED IT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in regard to the subject I raised earlier today on a question of privilege. The pamphlet or publication entitled "On The Road" has a notation on the back cover, "Published by the Authority of the Hon. John Munro, Minister of National Health and Welfare". May I ask the hon. gentleman to issue orders immediately to cancel distribution of this jokebook across Canada? Would he also cause an investigation to be carried out to ascertain who the incompetents were who made up this map, this distortion and abortion, and fire them immediately and thus save the taxpayers some money?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with many of the comments of the hon. member. Perhaps he would like to get in contact with many of the young people travelling across the country who have already used this book and found the information most helpful.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: You've got to be kidding!

Mr. Munro: Certainly it is helpful in combating some of the diseases articulated in the booklet and certainly it is helpful in its advice concerning drug abuse.

Mr. Muir: With all due respect to the minister, Mr. Speaker, I feel this is not quite what has transpired and I would suggest that he cancel the booklet immediately. We must save the taxpayers some money by not putting out junk like this. The minister had better check into it.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question prompted by the remark of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that he does not agree with the comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys. Will the minister familiarize himself with the health facilities in Nova Scotia, which he should be familiar with but about which he apparently is ignorant? Through the ignorance of Information Canada the Canadian taxpayers' money is going down the drain and the minister is pushing it.

An hon. Member: You are a pusher, John!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF DEADLINE TO ENABLE COMPLETION OF CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Having regard to the fact that a number of projects under the Local Initiatives Program, particularly construction projects, have had difficulty in meeting the June 16 deadline because of weather and shortage of materials, could the minister inform the House whether any consideration will be given to granting an extension to many of these worth-while projects, particularly construction projects?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I announced a blanket extension for municipalities. I am prone to look with some sympathy on individual construction projects being reviewed on their merits. Provided they do not cost the taxpayer any more money, perhaps they should be completed by allowing an extension. I am inclined to look on them with some sympathy and I welcome the hon. member's representation.

Mr. Mazankowski: I can assure the House that these projects will be reviewed and extended to the point that the money that has been allocated will be used by the respective projects?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I would have to make it quite clear that we would have to examine them case by case. Knowing the hon. gentleman to be a very fair individual, I would welcome his representations on behalf of his own programs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: I would hope to be recognized by Your Honour tomorrow.

INQUIRY AS TO PROCLAMATION OF ARCTIC WATERS POLLUTION PREVENTION ACT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Your Honour will recall that some weeks ago I put a question to the Minister of the Environment asking when the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act passed by the House about a year ago was going to be proclaimed. The minister, who is at present in Sweden at a very important conference, said that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would make a statement on this matter within the next few days. Some weeks have passed and I am wondering whether the minister may have a statement for the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the situation is always the same. A delay of 60 days must elapse between the publication of the list of anti-pollution zones and the proclamation. We only hope that all the conditions will be met so that the act can be proclaimed early in August.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—POSSIBLE ADOPTION OF PURCHASING POLICY OUTLINED BY MINISTER IN LIGHT OF FREIGHT RATE INCREASES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the impact on the economy of Atlantic Canada of eight freight rate increases in some 24 months, has the new purchasing policy outlined by the Minister of Supply and Services when he spoke on Monday on the budget debate covering freight rate payments been accepted in principle by the government?

• (1500)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Minister of Supply and Services was stating some general objectives for purchasing which I am sure would be agreeable to the hon. member.

Mr. Crouse: May I ask a brief supplementary, Mr. Speaker. When will a formal statement of policy be made in the House on this matter?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thought the Minister of Supply and Services made quite a formal statement. The budget debate is one of our more important debates, and I thought he did well.

Mr. Bell: This is old stuff.

Mr. Crouse: That statement was nothing but window-dressing.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT IN FUNDING

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development regarding the merger of two consortiums for the construction of a gas pipeline from the Arctic area through southern Canada to the United States. Has the minister been in consultation with these consortiums, can he tell us whether there is to be any government involvement, either in equity capital or loan capital, and can he tell us what will be the proportion of Canadian investment and American investment in this project?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and myself were advised a few days in advance of the merger of those two companies.

With regard to the capital required for the project, all the details will have to be given by the companies when they apply to the government for a permit. That matter will be decided by the government when it has received their proposals.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—COMPLETION OF ECOLOGICAL STUDIES

If not, when will they be completed, and what particular route do those studies cover?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust that the minister will not attempt to give all this information at this time. Normally that should be done by way of a statement on motions, and we are running short of time.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us whether the ecological studies have been completed and, if not, when they are likely to be completed?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have already told the House that the studies with regard to the construction of a pipeline for natural gas will be completed this fall and that we will then be willing to receive applications. The situation is still the same.

ALLEGED ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN AGENTS—REQUEST THAT SAVINGS ACCRUE TO BENEFIT OF FARMERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. As the Canadian Wheat Board appears to be making a move to eliminate grain agents in the movement of grain from Thunder Bay to eastern ports, can the minister assure the House that any savings resulting from that move will be passed on to the farmers and not eaten up by increased costs of the bureaucracy which will be incurred by the Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, any saving made in the movement of wheat is automatically passed on to the farmers.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House leader could at this time, despite what he said earlier about next week, indicate what is to be the business for the rest of this week and for next week. Could he also say at this time what firm commitment he can give about the date for the conclusion of this part of the session and, bearing in mind the number of government days left, what business the government hopes to have concluded by that date?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today is an allotted day, as is tomorrow. In order to complete the supply period, I should like to designate the first four days of next week, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, as allotted days. That will permit us to continue our discussion of government legislation afterward. On May 29, I indicated informally to my hon. friend that I hoped we could draw this part of the session to a close at the end of June. At that time I related that date to a number of items that I should like to see completed, which included the privacy legislation, the bill with respect to benefits in respect of children, the occupational training bill, the representation commissioner bill, the Wheat Board Act bill, the financial mechanisms with respect to mortgage markets bill, the election expenses bill, the foreign takeovers bill, the Canada Labour Code amendment and the Farm Credit Act.

Mr. Bell: Is that all?

Mr. MacEachen: I indicated those items at that time. They are still on my list and since then new items have been added, including the housing bill about which the hon. member for York South has shown a keen interest today. Those are the items that I should like the House to deal with, if possible, before we rise. Next week, I will be discussing with my hon. friends the possibility of additional hours of sitting in order that we can complete these items. Most of them, by the way, have been advanced quite considerably. A good number of them are at the report stage or will be at the report stage soon, so it is not an overwhelming task to complete them by a reasonable date.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a brief supplementary question. As June 24, St. Jean Baptiste Day, is a parliamentary holiday when it falls on a week day, and as it falls on a Saturday this year, is the government giving any consideration to following the example of Quebec and taking the following Monday as a parliamentary holiday in order that our colleagues from Quebec can go back to their homes and celebrate this great holiday?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in view of our legislative program and the short time at our disposal, I think it would be inadvisable if we were to consider taking that day away from legislation. Perhaps we could do more for Quebec by passing some of this progressive legislation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government House leader having to do with the number of items he listed and with his suggestion that the House might recess on June 30. Can he tell the House which goal, in his mind, has priority, getting certain legislation through or recessing on June 30?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, they operate in my mind simultaneously, and I am not sure that one is more important than the other.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If that is the case—

An hon. Member: Do not take up the time of the Creditistes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If that is the case, and as the minister has given us a program for July, may I ask what are we to do in August?

An hon. Member: Campaign.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker I rise on a point of order.

We had a few meetings with the other House leaders and, in my opinion, an agreement could be reached towards restricting the length of the speeches as follows: 20 minutes each for the mover and the government spokesman and 15 minutes for any other member.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE PROFIT-SHARING AND STOCK PURCHASE PROGRAMS

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska) moved:

That this House deplores the fact that the government has not adopted the appropriate measures for involving workers in Canadian firms through profit-sharing and stock purchase programs as a means of promoting social stability, reinforcing our country's economy and ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour.

—Mr. Speaker, seeing the multiplication of problems which arise in the field of employer-employee relations, we thought that it was appropriate to bring to the attention of this House a few suggestions whose effect, in our view, would be to harmonize relations between workers and employers, in areas where participation could apply.

In other areas, we are inclined to believe that a genuine labour court would help eliminate several difficulties, but today, I shall limit my remarks to possibilities of participation.

We have anticipated the reaction of some hon. members who agree too easily with existing situations, and prefer to take refuge in the federal jurisdiction, in the field of employer-employee relations, and conclude that labour legislation respecting profit sharing is more a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

We are going to try to clearly define everyone's responsibilities in a matter of great interest to all Canadians. Even if the application of proposed measures were restricted to the industrial sector under federal jurisdiction, and though a good many workers are employed in various administrative services, we agree that the government should set the example by establishing, wherever possible, a plan of involvement of workers in the development and profit of business. There are so many ways and means to encourage participation.

Given the contradictions inherent in the present system, I recognize that it is not easy to propose solutions to the many problems of workers. If finance reflected the true image of reality, if a social organization automatically issued new credits to finance any new production, it would not be necessary to put an end to the primacy of capital because such evil would not exist.

Capital would spring up as efficient technicians and workers would undertake and follow up the development of the country's raw materials, and that capital would be available to those who thus create new wealth.

But even if a promoter starts out with his own capital or with capital from associates, even if at the outset he owns means of production, can the same thing be said of the development? Let us suppose an industrialist has the capital needed to establish a paper mill costing $1 million and that he is known as the owner of it. The concern flourishes, its products are good and sell well, the industrialist is making profits and considers expanding his firm because it has been successful. Why has it been successful? Is it only on account of the initial capital he has put in? Is it not also and chiefly because there is wood in the forest, there are workers to make paper out of wood and customers to buy the product? Should the development belong only to the industrialist? Why should it not belong also to those who contributed to his success?

The industrialist may say he paid a salary to his fellow workers and therefore he is even with them, free from any obligation. That is easy to say, but the salary was to provide workers with a living. The plant's prosperity gave them a living, that is true, but the industrialist also lived out of that. If that prosperity can also lead to development, should all those who contributed to that prosperity not get their share of that development?

The initial capital, that was the industrialist's business, but the development is not exclusively his.

We believe the development benefit not only the promoter but also the staff who work with him.

If another million is needed to expand the firm and the equipment, that money should be put in by both the employees and the promoter.

The new capital could be set up from 10,000 $100 shares which would be distributed among those who contributed to the establishment of the business.

We all readily recognize that any business that wants to remain solvent must see that its revenues so exceed its material, transportation and overhead expenses that it can pay, under the present system, its employees' wages as well as dividends or interests on shares.

• (1520)

The situation would be exactly the same under a plan of industrial copartnership. Instead of salaries, there would be advances on dividends. As with present weekly salaries which are paid out of the firm's income, the advances on dividends would also be paid weekly from this same income. And in as much as salaries are taken into account to determine the price of commodities, a minimum dividend corresponding to present salaries would, under an industrial copartnership plan, serve to determine the cost price.

When deliberative meetings are convened, every worker would have the opportunity of freely airing his views and the meeting's decision would be final. The workers as a whole choose their representatives to the shareholders' meeting. They also choose the delegates who will represent them within the board of directors. This kind of capital handling by workers is thus carried out through association or the acquisition of shares.

The workers are not unionized people claiming their rights anymore, but partners who express their opinions. Hence, work performance is significantly improved. Everyone will work better and more and no one would think of bringing down the plant. We could even honestly ask ourselves if present shareholders' profits would not increase in such a favourable work climate.

Initiative entrenches the work force into capital, provides them with additional income that reduces their dependence on salaries and produces capital for the people. Share income promotes interest for one's work and is commensurate with productivity. This interest for work increases the feeling of responsibility and creativity. When employees start to think and act as shareholders, they better understand their claims and their needs.

I think I have already mentioned in this House several factors which must be considered when establishing the working and living conditions of an employee. Consideration must be given to the fact that he is a human being, not a machine, that he wishes for security and stability, and usually wants the place where he works to be well organized and well managed. It is normal that he should be treated fairly. The worker also wants to be informed of the business situation of the company, and to be assured that he will receive a fair income—so many basic realities of human nature.

All available means must be used to create a stimulating atmosphere which preserves the good relationship needed between the workers and the managers of a company. It is in this spirit of agreement and mutual understanding that we proposed the motion which is now being debated.

We expect to see varied reactions to the profit-sharing concept. But in the face of numerous strikes in all areas, we felt that it was in order to try, in the light of facts, to give labour legislation a new thrust so as to lessen as much as possible the bad effects of numerous strikes, which are always harmful for workers and create a climate of defiance which disorganizes the economy.

It can hardly be denied that we often witness glaring contradictions in the field of labour-management relations, especially as concerns full hiring and automation.

In all developed or developing countries, great efforts are made to improve production techniques, to produce more faster, and to invent and operate machines which will produce better and faster than the men whose place they will take.

First it was mechanization, then motorization and we have now entered the automation era.

Progress usually reduces employment and our managers recommend integral hiring, which means striving to find work for the man whom progress has left idle. This is an unavoidable contradiction because our monetary system is not keeping pace. Another contradiction is that popular theory about higher salaries and fewer hours of work.

It is generally recognized that a salary is a reward for work done. If higher salaries are requested for less work, this is no longer seeking a reward for work that is accomplished, it is rather for money not connected with work. This is why the Créditistes are asking for "dividends".

A closer study of current labour legislation will show easily that it is very difficult to apply in several areas. Efforts are now being made to find a solution to technological changes in production methods.

The labour representatives would like to see the employers insure, through different compensatory ways, continued employment even though production methods are improved through mechanization. On the other hand, the employer is not always willing to pay salaries to those who have been replaced by machines. Made responsible for ensuring the workers an income, the government gets involved in more contradictions by imposing restrictions in the large amount of complicated legislation that we know of. This often contributes to having legal advisers interpreting the law and its regulations as they see fit. Therefore, contempt of court sentences are increasing, injunctions are considered detrimental and every kind of method is used as being appropriate for defending the rights of some people without taking into account the duties and rights of others.

This confusing situation which is so blatant in the methods used for solving labour problems leads us to conclude that we have too many novices who pretend to be knowledgeable. The results of their long years of theoretical studies of labour issues show that many of them are in need of retraining from scratch.

They fail to realize that science and industry are the cultural heritage of nations. Science, applied to agriculture, trade, industry and communications, has resulted in huge progress. During the last centuries, man has learned to modernize production through the use of machines which has resulted in solving production problems. Some of our alleged scholars have yet to understand that. One should nevertheless recognize the existence of that heritage and the rights of the inheritors.

There is something disturbing in the Canadian Bill of Rights, the fact that the economic rights of Canadians are not mentioned anywhere. If an individual has the right to life, that individual must at the same time have the right to things necessary to life.

I thought it proper to point out various factors causing misunderstandings about the methods used up to now, which calls for a new pattern in labour legislation in order that workers and employers may be interested in an active co-operation in profit-sharing.

In a brief submitted in March 1970 to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, the profit-sharing institute claimed that profit-sharing had an important part to play in Canada's orderly development and economic growth. Here are some excerpts of this brief under the heading

"Challenge of the future"

Profit-sharing has characteristics which gives it advantages that other forms of remuneration do not hold to the same degree;

This is a very flexible system, for it allows employees to be financially rewarded in times of prosperity without hindering the employer in times of depression;

It pays employees on the basis of values which they contribute to create;

It is a form of co-operative return which rewards teamwork and favours industrial harmony;

The system provides for both savings and investment at the same time. It allows employees to share in the rights the ownership of the means of production of the community represents; this is one of the main characteristics of many of the larger profit-sharing systems whose members, in some cases, own up to 25 per cent of the outstanding shares. It increases the output of the enterprise, lowers the cost of production and gives an added advantage from the point of view of international competition.

Further on, one reads this:

There was a time when profit-sharing was considered by many as an incidental benefit or a paternalistic measure on the part of employers. But now, as it becomes more general and more complex, it brings the hope that closer co-operation between employees and employers will supplant obsolete antagonism and conflicts. It holds the promise of producing a new motivation in industry at a time when the computer has created confusion.

In the years to come, it could well be that profit-sharing could become a fundamental if not the main form of remuneration, meeting the social needs and economic objectives of our new society.

We are fortunate in being able to add that several industries, in France, the United States and elsewhere, have adopted sharing programs. Their terms and conditions may vary according to the industry, but it is important that legislation be passed to encourage sharing. That is the spirit in which we moved the motion now before the House.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, at present less than 10 per cent of Canadians own stocks or shares. This is an unacceptable level of participation and therefore in a general way my colleagues will support the motion proposed by my hon. friend. We look to greater financial participation in Canadian industry and business by individual Canadians, and we hope to bring forward measures that achieve this. We think that this is a proper way to develop self-respect and individuality, which can only be achieved when more Canadians, who are presently relying on wages, possess some independent income and therefore have more of a stake in their country. In a society that is increasingly dependent upon capital-intensive industry, the importance of capital ownership becomes more immediate. There is a blight in a society where the means of production are owned almost exclusively by the state or by a few individuals. We must develop adequate incentives and policies, and must implement those policies here, so as to achieve more participation by individual Canadians in capital ownership.

One way to promote Canadian ownership—I suggest this is one matter that should be considered by the committee considering the foreign takeover legislation—is to give more encouragement to Canadians who work to own part of the company by which they are employed. This is not a new concept but one that is promoted vigorously in other countries. For example, in France the state makes profit sharing compulsory for all companies employing more than 100 workers, and these earnings are not subject to personal income tax. There would obviously have to be ground rules for workers to purchase shares in such companies. The transactions would have to be at arm's length. There would have to be confidence between management and labour, something that perhaps does not exist in all companies in Canada today. However, I suggest profit sharing would be one way to bring this about.

In a study entitled "Does profit sharing pay?" by Bert L. Metzger and Jerome A. Colletti, a study conducted in the United States, the following recommendations are made for greater success in promoting profit sharing concepts. I will put them on the record because this particular issue of Hansard is apt to provoke some considerable interest in this subject. The following is the result of boiling down the views put forth by these two authors, and I am referring to chapter 7 of their study.

There should be mutual confidence and respect between management and employees. In a particular company where profit sharing takes place the workers should be paid competitive wages and fringe benefits. It should be recognized that profit sharing is not a substitute for a proper standard of living for the worker employed by that company. Neither is it a substitute for competent management or for sound personnel practices. That is to say, the employee-owner should be in no better position than any other employee; he must remember he is there to do a job. In addition, the company should employ top management staff. The coverage should be as broad as practicable. The plan should be sufficiently flexible that the profit sharing formula is not of the peanuts variety but is significant in itself. There should be appropriate profit sharing education, communication and participation, and there should be competent administration of profit sharing and productive investment of the funds.

How well does this concept work, Mr. Speaker? The authors have gone into this question and at page 7 they list a group of profit sharing companies. The companies referred to are actually department stores, and mighty big ones at that. We have Broadway-Hale Stores, Bullock's

Inc., Federated Department Stores, Gimbel Brothers, R. H. Macy and Co., Merchantile Stores, J. C. Penney Company and Sears, Roebuck. Also listed on the same page are some non-profit sharing companies, and these are Allied Stores Corporation, Associated Dry Goods, City Stores Company, Gimbel Brothers—this was in the years before Gimbel Brothers went the profit-sharing route—Marshall Field and May Department Stores. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, there are some giants on either side of this particular comparison.

The conclusion reached at the bottom of page 7 is that the profit-sharing group of companies turned in a much better record than the companies without profit sharing. Not only did the profit-sharing group improve its ratios; the profit sharers increased their return from 10.41 per cent in 1952 to 12.78 per cent in 1969, a gain of 22.8 per cent. During the same period the non-profit sharing firms improved their return only slightly, from 7.78 per cent in 1952 to 8 per cent in 1969, a gain of only 2.8 per cent. The report goes on to say:

> With respect to net income on net worth, the non-profit sharers for all practical purposes merely maintained their 1952-53 level of performance through all the years, except for a spurt in the 1964-1966 period. Since 1966, the non-profit sharers' ratios have declined from 10.34 per cent to 8.00 per cent.
> In 1952, the profit sharers' return on equity capital was 34 per cent higher than that of the non-profit sharers; in 1969, their return was 60 per cent higher.

Perhaps comparisons such as that do not prove the case, but I think they are significant as indicating there is some considerable merit in the concept of profit sharing and that it is something well worth our consideration.

I turn now to another side of the story and it relates to a matter that came before Parliament a few months ago. I refer to the income tax treatment we gave to deferred profit sharing. I note that in Canada companies that share their profits employ more than 100,000 persons. I refer to companies such as Dominion Foundries and Steel, Canada Packers, Simpsons, Simpsons-Sears, Shell Canada, Proctor and Gamble, Imperial Oil, Texaco, Gulf Oil, Warner Lambert and so on.

I had an exchange the other day in the finance committee regarding the treatment of profit sharing under the capital gains portion of the new Income Tax Act. I think it is relevant because it illustrates my point that we must offer greater incentives to Canadians to make them interested in the profit sharing plans of companies for which they work. I think it is appropriate that I put this exchange in Hansard since it will go forth to those Canadians who are interested in this concept of profit sharing. As reported at page 15 of volume 16 of the committee proceedings on May 30 last, I had this to say:

> The final point I would like to make is one that we never really did get into until it was passed in the House and then all sorts of people became concerned. I am referring to the deferred profit-sharing plan, what is the plan of Simpsons-Sears, Simpsons and a good number of other companies across Canada. Is there any immediate plan to bring about changes there.

I was referring to changes in the Income Tax Act. The Minister of Finance replied:

• (1540)

Perhaps the best thing to do, Mr. Chairman, is to repeat what I said in the budget speech, and for the convenience of Mr. McCleave and other honourable members of the Committee it can be found on page 17 of that speech.

I said:

> I am not persuaded at this time that a lump sum payment out of a deferred profit-sharing plan should enjoy any special treatment. It seems to me that payments out of such a plan should be treated in much the same manner as payments out of pension plans and registered retirement savings plans. All three of these types of plans have in common the deferral of income tax on the contributions to and the income of the plan. The government has previously indicated that it is conducting a general review of the taxation of retirement income plans. I have, therefore, concluded that this specific problem concerning the deferred profit-sharing plans should be considered as part of this general review.

MR. MCCLEAVE: This is the difficulty, Mr. Chairman, with the transition from one minister to another, because I think sometime in December, in the final moments of the debate on Bill C-259, I raised the question in a general way to Mr. Benson by asking whether they were going to be continuing to take a look at some of the sections of Bill C-259 and, in his reply, because he knew I was raising it on account of the interest in the deferred profit-sharing plan, he mentioned it specifically. So a good number of people did think that provision in Bill C-259 would eventually be altered. All I can say, in making a representation, is to suggest to the minister that he see the exchange between Mr. Benson and me on that particular day in December.

Then, the Assistant Deputy Minister, Tax Policy, made the following point, and this will conclude my remarks in that direction, Mr. Speaker:

> MR. COHEN: Mr. Chairman, if I may make a comment, I think the point to which Mr. McCleave is referring is not the treatment of lump sum payments but deals with another point, the application, so to speak, of the transitional rules to deferred profit-sharing plans. There were two specific concerns. One had to do with how much money standing to an employee's benefit on January 1, 1972 would be eligible for the old form of averaging. That point was dealt with in the budget measures and we have shifted the definition from the amounts vested in an employee at January 1, 1972 to the amounts credited, and I think that was the specific point of concern, and it was dealt with.
> The second point had to do with if in a particular year, an employee or an individual in receipt of certain special types of income, one of which was a payment out of the deferred profit-sharing plan, elected to take advantage of the old forms of averaging. Under Bill C-259, as it stood last December, he was precluded from taking advantage of some of the new forms of averaging. That point has also been dealt with in the budget measures and the individual is now entitled to take advantage of old forms of averaging for the old sum as well as new forms of averaging for any current contributions. So, I think those were the two points Mr. Benson was specifically referring to and you have met both of those problems.

That concludes my submission on that technical matter. I hate to go on at length about something like that, but it has never been presented adequately in any news report I have seen. We know now that at least 100,000 Canadians are very much concerned about the points I am making here this afternoon, and by getting them recorded in Hansard it will be possible to send copies of Hansard to those who make inquiries.

Finally, I should simply like to say that because the motion before us has as its major principle the idea of giving an opportunity to 90 per cent of Canadians to acquire some form of Canadian ownership, I think it is generally worthy of support and I intend to support it.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the motion put forward by the Social Credit party is certainly interesting and I congratulate them for attempting to put forward some solutions to some of the problems that face Canada in terms of industrial relations, one of which would be to give the workers a chance for a piece of the action and perhaps a chance to move in the direction of the people's capitalism. Like many beautiful ideals, the examples we have seen up to now tend to suffer in practice.

I can recall about 25 years ago being very impressed by an article in Reader's Digest outlining the experience of the Jack and Heinz Company in the United States. It was involved in the production of war materiel and had a profit-sharing plan. I was unable to locate the article, but if my memory serves me correctly, because of this profit-sharing a sweeper in the plant had an income one year of approximately $19,000. Perhaps Jack and Heinz was working on a cost plus basis.

The motion is particularly ambitious in that it seeks to involve workers in Canadian firms, enhance social stability and reinforce our country's economy. These seem to be laudable enough objectives, but I will attempt to show in the time I have at my disposal that profit sharing, at least as we know it now, is unrealistic, and has not really lived up to its claims.

For some time now many people including politicians, academics, bureaucrats, management and workers have been concerned with the attitude of workers to their work. Contrasting pictures have been painted about the dissimilar attitude of the British worker to that of his counterpart in Germany and Japan. Good Calvinistic doctrines such as incentives, diligence and loyalty have been cited as high ideals applied to those two countries because their success in the post-war industrial sector has been outstanding. Part of this has been due to the attitude of workers. There is no doubt about that. Probably the more important reason these two countries have leapt ahead as industrial nations since World War II has been that the governments of these two countries have been actively involved with industry in a priority planning process. I do not think this necessarily reflects just on the attitude workers have to their work. I do not deny that is important or that it is different from the North American or British concept.

The particular category into which this discussion falls is industrial democracy. When you are speaking of industrial democracy, I think what you are really referring to is shared decision making. In other words, if there is to be democracy in industry, since there is only so much power to go around, if the workers are going to have more, management will have less. I do not think that profit-sharing plans, as we know them, really anticipate this at all. If they did, I would be much more attracted by this motion.

I think we are going to see more industrial democracy. It is sort of a big thing for workers to have the opportunity of deciding their hours of work, rather than follow the clock as in Dickens' time, as well as safety factors involved in their work. We often see an involvement by workers in their security, after their working days are over, through their pension plans. We see unions bargaining for the power to have a say in respect of the kind of product a plant should produce and the kind of pollution control a plant should be establishing. While all of us are interested and certainly concerned about the worker's commitment and how this affects our society, I do not know that any group of workers has actively sought profit sharing. Profit sharing seems to be initiated by management. I do not pose as an expert in the field, and when I say I do not know that does not mean something does not exist. I do feel that, in the main, the profit sharing established by the firms cited by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) was initiated by management rather than the workers. I do not think the motivation came from the workers.

Now, there is a problem of alienation among workers. Management answers motivation with a judicious mixture of the carrot and the whip. If you provide workers with enough motivation to produce, they say they will increase productivity. I do not know why it follows, but it seems to follow that you will reduce the number of strikes and labour disputes. God knows, we do not need any more. I am not suggesting we need more. The Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) has enough on his plate already. I think it is often convenient for management to forget that motivation is much more than economics. It is a political relationship which has to do with the right of workers to make decisions in areas which affect them. It is much more than just a pay cheque relationship. I see the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) writing letters over there. He has a long history of being associated with the trade union movement. I am sure he would agree with me when I say that the determination of whether or not a worker is motivated is related to more than economics.

While I am talking about this matter of industrial disputes, I do not believe we can ignore the fact that in today's society with repetitive, dull, meaningless assembly line jobs often the only reassurance a worker has of his personal worth comes through his pay cheque. The only reason he has to believe he is a man and is getting ahead is if he gets ahead through having a fatter pay cheque. I think it is the means. It is not the pay cheque itself so much, although that is important enough. Rather it is the reassurance of a man's dignity. That, I think, lies behind a good deal of it. The commitment to profit sharing demands that the workers forget their interest in job safety and the satisfaction of a few more dollars. I think the move further enhances the attitude on the part of workers that they are a commodity. If they have this attitude, then there is fertile ground for breeding further dissatisfaction. They become a commodity and they race one another around the treadmill, often doing piecework.

I think the movers of the motion have forgotten that profit sharing tends to undermine rather than strengthen collective bargaining. If you are involved in profit sharing you are interested in maximizing profit and have to obey management. More profit sharing tends to increase the workers' dependence upon management rather than decrease it, therefore the power workers have to affect decisions about their jobs is reduced rather than increased. This, in the end, reduces the involvement of the workers. Profit sharing plans pit worker against worker.

The end result I believe is a rigid internal structure with increased conformity at the expense of a worker's dignity.

One further thing about increasing the worker's motivation is that most profit sharing plans tend to be "announced" by management. This I believe is an example of a paternalistic system. Some workers might take the opportunity, but in the end I believe this paternalism seduces further motivation among workers. Profit sharing in that area, therefore, tends to work against itself. My friends in the Social Credit party, like many other people, dream of social stability. If stability means sanctifying the status quo, with all its injustices, then I do not want any part of it because I do not think progress comes with stability. If I could be convinced that if one kept quiet and were a good boy, that is that the meek would inherit the earth, then I could believe their argument. However, at the moment I cannot.

What is the point in perpetuating the status quo, if that is what they mean. One does not have to be an expert to know there are profound inequities in our society, in the production and consumption of goods and services and in power. Read the book "Who Owns America" and you will find that a relatively few people, less than one per cent of Americans, really have all the power in that society, certainly the economic power. The situation is not very different in Canada. In Canada, 46 per cent of our corporations pay no income tax. In the United States the figure is 37 per cent. Social welfare is private enterprise. I think management often hopes to use profit sharing plans to undermine unions. This reduces the strength of the workers and the possibility of strikes. It is a funny thing that whenever labour loses its voice, for a while everything is quiet. But, because tensions and conflicts tend to build up there is eventually an explosion, whether or not you legislate unions out of existence. I think Australia is a prime example. Arbitration is compulsory there, and I believe the Minister of Labour will agree with me that there are far more industrial disputes and work stoppages in Australia than in Canada.

So, if you legislate people out of their right to strike, ultimately, in a free society—if you are talking about a fascist society that is something else—tensions build up, wildcat strikes become uncontrollable and you will probably cause more harm than good. I am sure members of the Social Credit party do not want that. I think the obvious ploy is to pre-empt unions from being organized. Even sadder, many people believe in this. Many people do not like it, and there are good reasons for that. There are good reasons for people to like unions also. People forget that with the rise to a decent income, through unions mainly, we have created in Canada for our people a vast internal market which we never had in the 1930's. Often people say that they do not need to organize in their company because their company pays union wages. I recall when I was a teacher being very grateful to the fireman because I received a raise as a result of their efforts. They were very helpful. They had a union and we had a federation.

An hon. Member: You did not get the hose!

Mr. Rose: No. People who are organized in this society are getting the hose, including people who have rejected a union and have been bought off by profit sharing. We know the people who have been able to organize. Let us mention a few of them. There are the trade unions, the doctors' union, the lawyers' union, and the teacher's union. These people have been able to reduce disparity in our society and have not been tied to the valleys of the economic ups and downs, the cycling. This is what the government found out—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the Social Credit party, through the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), has brought forward this question for debate today. I say that partly because all of us are seeking ways to improve industrial relations, to enhance industrial peace and to provide in some manner a sense of involvement in enterprise and indeed a commitment on the part of all parties to the undertaking, to the work or to the enterprise in which they are engaged. I was particularly struck with the point made by the hon. member for Kamouraska that science and industry are part of our cultural heritage. Indeed, they are. He, like all of us, is seeking ways of ensuring that the benefits of that heritage should be accessible to all. He raised the question in particular in terms of labour and management and of the people who are actually working in the economy from time to time. He suggested that profit sharing is one of the ways of ensuring that the benefits of that heritage are accessible to all and of ensuring participation in the over-all development of the country. He gave us a number of supporting arguments.

• (1600)

He also expressed the view, if I understood him correctly, that profit sharing may indeed be a unique means for the future of sharing in the benefits of this industrial age. He made some valuable suggestions, but the problem may not be with the concept of profit sharing but rather with the fact that workers in North America appear to be interested in many other ways of sharing in the development of the country than this particular technique. I would only mention in passing a few of those ways that are currently prominent in the bargaining process in the relations between the two parties. For example, the question of labour standards is one of those; so is the hours of work, the question of holidays, the question of separation arrangements, and the question of job security.

It is difficult to see how profit sharing will help resolve the concerns of working people over the security of employment. This is a prominent concern today, more prominent than ever because of the rate and extent of technological change. The impacts of technological change are another issue; so is the enrichment of jobs, the sense of participation in decisions, and the quality of the working environment. These are questions prominent in all labour and management relations today and, as I say, it is difficult to see how profit sharing will assist in approaching their resolution. None the less, they do not stand in the way of progress in the profit sharing field.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the federal legislation on industrial relations promotes a plan under which workers are entitled to take part in the establishment of employment conditions through freely chosen negotiators. It provides a framework for relations between employer and employee, but it is not inherently aimed at determining the applicable conditions of employment. The industrial relations plan affords workers the opportunity of sharing the profits of the undertaking through higher wages and better social benefits. As for the remainder, it rests with the parties involved to decide if they will endorse or reject official profit sharing and share purchasing plans in accordance with the free enterprise system which the legislation protects and promotes. The parties can decide that to opt for profit sharing and share purchasing plans, but they are absolutely not compelled to do so.

There are profit sharing and share purchasing plans in operation in some Canadian firms, but they are the exception rather than the rule, apparently because they lack the support of the workers, or of management, or of both.

According to data obtained through Department of Labour surveys on salaries and working conditions in firms of a size sufficient for purposes of comparison, the percentage of workers involved in profit sharing plans has gone down slightly from 5 per cent in 1950 to 4 per cent in 1969. The 1969 Labour Department survey revealed that 8 per cent of all non-office workers in Canada are involved in profit sharing plans, but as no prior figures are available no comparison can be made. The restricted scope of the survey makes it inadvisable to draw too many conclusions from this trend, but it can nevertheless be noted that the percentage of workers involved in profit sharing plans is low.

In this connection, it is interesting to note the various points of view that prevail even within the labour movement. For instance, in a speech delivered before the special congress of the United Auto Workers on collective bargaining, before opening wage negotiations with General Motors in 1967, the late Walter Reuther said in support of profit-sharing plans: "The time has come for American industry workers to have their basic salary definitely fixed; then, they can fall in line near the oven with the shareholders and directors, and when the cake comes out, take their share as everyone else."

On the other hand, there are comments like those of Mr. John Eleen, Research Director of the Ontario Workers Federation. According to the Monetary Times of February 1970, Mr. Eleen is reported as saying: "We are expressly opposed to profit-sharing in the present socio-economic context."

If labour cannot agree on a single point of view on this subject, it is not surprising that management can do it even less.

The idea of allowing workers to share in the profits is not new. In fact, such programs have been more or less popular since the international congress on profit-sharing outlined in Paris in 1889 the basic rules for their establishment. No doubt that the income curve of businesses tends to conceal the appeal of profit-sharing plans.

Firms providing profit-sharing plans would want as their main objectives to instil into their employees the sense of sharing, to promote group initiative, to increase productivity and to ensure the workers' security. Differed profit-sharing plans would also enable us to fight inflation. Finally it is argued that such plans are used as shields against inflation.

In order to prevent hon. members from being swept away by their overwhelming enthusiasm for profit sharing, I think we must examine why such systems are not more common in Canada. Here are some of the shortcomings of such systems: Profit sharing affects the income level of the workers, thereby creating some uneasiness among the labour force. It is alleged that there must exist a close relationship in respect of time between the performance of worker and his remuneration. The differed profit sharing systems hold very little attraction, because a lot of time is necessary to realize them. Furthermore, the profits do not depend directly on performance in the case of a great many workers: actually, they are subject to the whim of the management and most employees have no control over them.

At the national level, profit-sharing systems can tie workers to particular companies. One must keep in mind that these systems can hinder manpower mobility, which we try to promote in Canada through the programs of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Another important factor which hon. members should take into consideration is that these systems could not be applied to the public sector, which is non-profit. Would these systems then create inequalities in the salary structure of public servants as compared to that of workers in the private sector? If such were the case, it would be illogical to expect greater social stability.

I wonder also whether workers in the private sector who share profits also expect to share to the same extent the losses of the company. Profit-sharing systems have always been attractive in times of abundance and have always lost their appeal in periods of recession.

One could use the telling argument that the collective bargaining system to which the government committed itself is already a kind of profit-sharing system in that sense that workers are asking from time to time for an adjustment of the benefits they draw from their employers.

• (1610)

The words "appropriate measures" contained in the proposal might be given any interpretation but they apparently suggest that the system of freedom of choice, briefly described, should be modified so that the workers may participate in profit sharing and stock ownership programs. To this end, we should of necessity modify the principles of the industrial relation system and this would be probably unacceptable to the Canadian people.

Apart from the industrial relations aspect of the proposal it should be emphasized that workers, and in fact all Canadians, are given the opportunity to participate individually and collectively in industrial growth through saving and investment schemes including cooperatives and investment companies. In many cases, these plans enable people to invest small amounts periodically and to increase their own capital invested in the company, while minimizing the risk by investing joint capital in various endeavours. Moreover, the government has taken steps aiming at giving Canadians more opportunities of participating in industrial growth with the help of the Canadian Development Corporation.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my gratitude to the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), for having given this House the opportunity of discussing the question of profit sharing in Canada. The concept of profit sharing must take into account so many factors such as the nature of the business, the importance of its operations, the willingness of both employees and employers—that I would find it difficult to impose it upon all Canadians through legislation. But through various tax and budgetary measures, the government is encouraging Canadians to become more and more the joint owners of their concerns and more and more "masters in their own house".

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, before making my remarks proper, I would like to say that profit sharing has shown to those who already used it that it has given very good results so far, particularly in the improvement of labour and management relationships.

It is noted that those who struggle with labour-management litigations are against profit sharing because with the latter the leeches of labour-management conflicts will loose their rationale. Those people who seek to exploit workers or management need bad labour-management relationships, in order to be able to exploit both, and therefore they want no part of profit sharing.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to second the motion moved by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), because it brings an answer to the requests of those people who, at the present time, have given up all hope of ever finding a remedy to economic problems and who are ready to follow some people who believe that the only viable solution will be found in Marxist socialism.

It is a fact that at the present time, a few labour leaders and a few workers' groups are markedly turning towards the marxist left wing.

However, Mr. Speaker, before analyzing these people's behaviours and deciding whether their attitudes are acceptable or not, one must have a look at the present economic and social situation and wonder whether our economic system does not also tend to discourage the workers and prompt them to consider other systems which, according to some people, cannot be worse than our present capitalist and corrupt system, which we call "economic liberalism". Here are the remarks of a businessman in this respect:

> Let us get rid of poverty in our towns and of the sort of social discrimination that it means, and we shall deprive at the same time agitators of their motives for action. The present have-nots no longer accept to be deprived of the basic necessities. We should be quite naïve to believe that they are not aware of the situation and never think of riot.

These remarks, Mr. Speaker, were made by Mr. Alfred Rouleau, chairman of Desjardins Life Insurance and la Sauvegarde, while addressing the Board of Notaries at its convention held in Quebec on October 13, 1970.

The workers are discontented and dissatisfied; they are infuriated at a system that keeps them unemployed, that deprives them of their salaries through ever increasing taxes. They are fed up with a system that takes away from them half the salary increases they obtain on account of rising prices.

They are fed up with a system that orders them to refrain from asking for further salary increases but does nothing to prevent scandalous profit increases for some industries, particularly the banks, which we are alone in this House to denounce, while they make or break all the other industries in Canada.

The workers resent those who preach patience and submissiveness or lectures them free of charge while enjoying incomes exceeding $50,000 per annum, if not twice that amount.

Among others, Mr. Speaker, I want to mention Mr. Louis Rasminsky, who, in his Economic Review at the time he submitted the Bank of Canada's Annual Report, practically castigated the workers as being mainly responsible for increased prices. Quite candidly he said:

> One way or the other, salaries and prices must be so directed as to bring increases in actual gains more in line with productivity.

Mr. Rasminsky is in a very bad position to speak about productivity as if there is a totally unproductive institution in Canada, it is the Bank of Canada.

On the other hand, data published by Statistics Canada on May 27, 1971 as the result of an analysis of weekly salaries paid in the Canadian industry and of price trends show for the information of workers in the manufacturing industry, that inflation has absorbed 60 per cent of the value of salary increases over the past ten years.

Some ten years ago, the workers in Canadian plants earned an average of $75 per week. That average increased to $125 in 1971, but an amount of over $30 out of the $50 increase has been swallowed up by inflation. In 1961, the dollar value in relation to food, clothing or housing prices, etc, was such that the average weekly salary of $75 at the time was only worth $95 in 1971. In other words, the plant worker only earns per week $20 more than ten years ago, which means an increase of $2 for each year after 1961. Our suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is rather unusual. It is therefore not surprising that the president of the Quebec Federation of Labour has declared to Mr. Claude Piché of Maclean magazine, in the March 1972 issue: "The system must be brought down." And how does Mr. Louis Laberge intend to bring it down? After having constantly been an opponent of separatism, the last QFL convention rejected a resolution condemning separatism and then carried the following resolution:

> Resolved that the QFL state its support for a sovereign Quebec originating from labour and that the QFL take all necessary steps to carry out shortly . . . The process must be carried out in accordance with the needs and aspirations of the working people.

However, Mr. Laberge is not alone. What is more serious is that he has found some supporters among other labour leaders. The following was approved in the manifesto of the Quebec Teachers' Corporation:

The workers are identifying more and more clearly their common enemy: the capitalist system.

That is what our children will be thought tomorrow at school, that is what professors are presently teaching their pupils: Down with the capitalist system! Long live Marxist socialism! Power to the workers! Schools to teachers and pupils!

Mr. Speaker, should someone have any doubts as to the tendencies and development of the labour movement, they would need only to analyze the CNTU manifesto entitled: "Let us rely on our own means only" to be convinced. Everybody will realize that the present goal is the establishment of a socialist system, a sort of Cuban or Chilean democracy, as well as the suppression of classes of society, the seizure of profits, the nationalization of business undertakings and alleged power to the workers.

What is called the CNTU manifesto is above all a reaction against American imperialistic capitalism that controls almost all economic activity in Canada and in Quebec.

According to the manifesto, a capitalist seeks profit and since profit is the source of power, big capitalists are trying to eliminate small ones in order to concentrate power into their own hands, which leads to the creation of giant monopolies.

Such monopolies determine prices and the quantity of goods to be produced, which plants will produce or will close down and which people will work or will be unemployed. The economic power is in the hands of a few and acts upon and against the workers. Such is, Mr. Speaker, corrupted capitalism, the "economic liberalism" we live in and object to.

In its analysis of the present situation, the CNTU manifesto calls the quiet revolution a "flop", the regional planning schemes a "failure" and the laws that created the Economic Planning Board, the Regional Economic Councils and the Quebec Planning Bureau, "botched legislation". According to the manifesto, and I quote:

The government cannot plan an economy it does not own and no concerted action is possible between the workers and the bourgeoisie where workers do not control the means of production.

Thus, with the Société québécoise d'initiative pétrolière (SOQUIP), the Société québécoise d'exploration minière (SOQUEM), the Société d'exploitation et de récupération forestière (REXFOR), the state is dependent on foreign monopolies.

What does the CNTU manifesto suggest to change the current situation? Here it is:

Economic freedom should be sought elsewhere than in capitalism, (. . .) the only way for labour to neutralize the American giant lies in socialism. A labour-dominated economy can be nothing but socialist.

With socialism they mean, firstly, that society through the state owns the means of production (factories, land, raw materials); secondly, that the workers are participating directly and collectively in management and economic decisions; thirdly, that economic activities are planned directly by the state.

And the manifesto ends with this appeal to the CNTU rank and file:

• (1630)

The CNTU rank and file should commit themselves to devote their best efforts to inform the Quebec workers of their hopeless economic and social situation under the current system, to encourage them to consider jointly possible solutions under a people's democracy and finally to urge them to start concrete struggles whose ultimate objective is to replace the current bourgeoisie-dominated system by a classless system, namely a labour-controlled economy.

Part of this is true since most criticisms contained in the CNTU manifesto, for example, are acceptable. It is a fact that American capitalism dominates our economy and makes profits at Canadian workers' expenses, that unemployment and insecurity exist, and that the workers have to pay for the damages sustained by the economy.

It is a fact that workers do not fully reap the benefits of the economy as capitalists do. It is also a fact that they have almost no say in the conduct of economic affairs in which the only part they play is limited to working with their hands and paying taxes. This criticism is not new.

At this point of my comments, I would like to read into the record some of the criticisms made against corrupt capitalism by His Excellency Mgr. Desranleau, on the occasion of his inauguration as first archbishop of Sherbrooke, in 1951, when he addressed 22 archbishops and bishops, numerous prelates and some high-ranking officials. He had castigated the presently tainted capitalist regime by saying, and I quote: "The struggle against capitalism has begun. For more than 60 years now, the church has been denouncing that aspect of capitalism which is opposed to nature."

Here again is another excerpt from Mgr. Desranleau's speech as reported on page 34 of the publication Exhortation, and I quote:

We should stare capitalism right in the face and in the light of the teaching of sovereign pontiffs; it derives its name and origin not from capital, but from the worst excess that takes place within the economic and social order, that of "excessive concentration of private assets into the hands of a few powerful wealthy men", while hundreds of thousands of others are being deprived thereof and suffer in their body and soul. This clarification of both the idea and its formulation has been made recently by His Holiness Pope Pius XII.

This regime which is initially unnatural is maintained only by a series of excesses leading to "the rule of the economy by gigantic industries and the prevalence of an unrestrained thrust into politics", all without the slightest moral concern (Pius XII). Established by money magnates and protected by political influences, capitalism seeks by every possible means at its command, even under the mantle of civil law and without the slightest care neither about the plight of the people nor the death of the poor who lack food and clothing, to reduce production,—

This is what we experience every day in this House. I quote again:

—to reduce crops, to make money scarce, to destroy the most immediately vital commodities, and all this, for the sole purpose of causing prices to rise and of increasing profits. Let us only consider the present abuses of American and Canadian capitalism with regard to three commodities which people cannot do without: flour, which gives us bread, milk, which gives us butter, and potatoes, which are the bread and butter of the poor and the hungry. As long as we see, in North America, those three commodities being bought up, made scarce and destroyed by monopolies under the indifferent eyes of governments, we will have to admit that vitiated, corrupt and corrupting capitalism prevails in North America. And I am not even talking about housing, which is shockingly inadequate, neither about clothing, which has been ferociously taken over by foreigners, nor about the exhaustive development of natural resources, as if it were necessary, in order to enrich a class of privileged people, to ruin this country's future and to deprive generations to come.

It is that capitalism—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I really must remind the hon. member that the time allowed to him has expired, and as I understand the order made earlier, hon. members have agreed not to ask for an extension of time. I, therefore, have to stick to the rule.

[English]

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this motion which reads:

That this House deplores the fact that the Government has not adopted the appropriate measures for involving workers in Canadian firms through profit-sharing and stock purchase programs as a means of promoting social stability, reinforcing our country's economy and ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour.

I congratulate the Creditiste party for moving this motion. I think it is very worthwhile. I believe that the concern today of the average working man is, first, security of his job and, second, his take home pay. I say this for two reasons. First, as a man becomes older, often technology phases out his job or for some other reason he finds himself unemployed, and he experiences a lot more difficulty in finding employment. The fact that technology has created a large amount of unemployment goes without saying. Today, in Canada, we have well over 500,000 unemployed, regrettably many of them under 25.

I believe that the simplest explanation as to how labour has been replaced by machinery is the following one. I apply this to rural Canada. In 1900, one person produced enough food for himself and one other person. Today, one person in agriculture produces enough to feed 40 people in addition to himself. This has been accomplished through technological advances from horse-drawn power to motor power and from the reaper to the combine. No industry has so readily adapted itself to technological change as the agriculture industry. Today, Canada is one of the nations enjoying the cheapest food in the world on the basis of per capita dollars earned.

The same technological change has occurred in industry which was speeded up dramatically in the last world war. At that time Canada reached a stage in her development when this House argued whether or not tanks could be produced in Canada. This was very interesting. A Conservative member from Toronto, a doctor whom I know very well and respect and who founded the Wellesley hospital, argued that it could be done. He argued against one of the great men in this House, the late Hon. C. D. Howe. He was finally able to convince him and tanks were produced in Hamilton. As I said, it was a very honoured member of my profession, Dr. Herbert Bruce, who brought this about.

As a result of the tremendous technological changes which have been made, larger and larger industrial complexes have developed. In addition, increased participation by foreign owners brought in the skills to develop our industrial complexes. Since my original argument was that these tremendous changes in technology resulted in a lack of job security, which to many is more worrisome than their take-home pay, it seems increasingly more evident that this job security could be better stabilized and guaranteed by having the workman share in the profits of that industry. All we have to do is examine what is happening in the United States, where approximately 90 per cent of production results from capital invested in land, structures, machines and working capital, and 10 per cent from the input of labour. This estimate is based on a judgment as to what the relative value of capital and labour input would be if each were competitively evaluated through free market forces. Ownership of this capital is concentrated in approximately 5 per cent of American families. The shareholdings of most of the 30 million American stockholders are of negligible income significance.

Approximately 95 per cent of the people in the United States, those who have only their labour to offer,—I am citing the United States because their statistics are probably a little more sophisticated than ours—are perennially short of purchasing power. However, they need and want many things and services that industry could easily provide. The affluent capital-owning 5 per cent, on the other hand, cannot support mass production. Their factories habitually run at 80 per cent of capacity or less, even though a significant number of American families live in poverty or near poverty. Our economic thinking on these aspects has been a little bit fuzzy.

With regard to labour, ever since the Employment Act of 1946, government has been forced to adopt policies which distort the economic facts and redistribute purchasing power. We see examples of that in the welfare program and the make work programs which we have. It is not 90 per cent to capital and 10 per cent to labour, as their relative inputs would justify, according to the United States study to which I referred, but more like 22 per cent to capital and 78 per cent to labour through ever higher wages for fewer hours of work, and to the unemployed through make-work programs and welfare. This road has led to crisis measures. I do not believe the answer lies in redistributing our existing capital, and let no one think I am a socialist, from the 5 per cent to the 95 per cent as socialism does.

• (1640)

I believe there is a better alternative. It involves methods of financing future growth, a significant and progressively greater proportion of each year's new capital formation, so that the net increase will be bought and owned by new owners representing 95 per cent of our population who now own little or no income producing property. In time, the number of people who do not possess capital will be reduced from 95 per cent on a family basis to 70 per cent, 30 per cent and eventually to zero. As stockholders, all Americans would receive purchasing power from their capital holdings as well as from their labour. In ten years, perhaps $500 billion of newly formed capital would be owned in moderate-sized holdings by individuals and families who today own little or nothing and who have no hope of ever acquiring a piece of the action. Capital ownership to the employee by the employees of the American industry will increase the purchasing power of the employees and motivate them to greater productivity, thereby lowering costs. And this can be done without touching the capital owned by the 5 per cent who today own 100 per cent of the action.

I believe this can equally be applied to Canada. Indeed, it could well be that shares in companies ought to be set aside for employees who could accumulate them over the years. The longer they stayed with a particular firm, the greater their stake in it would be and the greater their incentive to remain with that firm and share in its prosperity. The industry would be increasingly sure of loyal support from its work force. This could be brought about by the government making provision for tax advantages in connection with programs of profit-sharing and stock purchase. The possibility of requiring all companies, whether Canadian or subsidiaries of large foreign-held corporations, to make available a percentage of their shares each year to their Canadian workers, should be considered. These are steps which in my opinion would go a long way toward ensuring a satisfied labour force and avoiding so many strikes which are disastrous to everyone concerned, including people who are not directly involved in them. They would create a Canadian labour investment in the industrial complex of this country. In addition, of course, it would encourage a greater measure of investment by Canadians in their own nation.

There are other advantages. Possession of capital, possession of a share in industry, gives an individual a degree of independence and flexibility of choice which is not shared by those who are entirely dependent on wages, on welfare, or on the handout. For my part, I would welcome any move to provide such an opportunity to a young man starting out, so that he might become part of a thriving industrial complex rather than just a number. This is a goal of vital importance to all Canadians who believe, as we do, in the importance of the individual. I would go a little further by recommending some related steps toward this objective. For example, I believe we should remove the sales tax. Sales tax accounts for a considerable part of the price of a house and, over the years, the effect of provincial and federal sales taxes are multiplied many times. Furthermore, I would encourage individual home ownership and provide incentives designed to encourage this trend, for instance, by allowing purchasers of homes to deduct from income tax the interest payable on loans. Thus, I would encourage people to own their own homes, to become, in a fuller measure, part of our society not only in the industrial complex by owning shares but by virtue of direct property ownership. This, I believe, is the sense of the motion before us and by these means we could elevate our society to a level at which poverty would all but disappear.

[Translation]

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) on his motion. I must apologize to my colleagues of the Social Credit party for not being able to express all my ideas in French. I did take a course in French, and even went on a crash course in French in Saint-Jean, but although I have a lot of ideas to express, unfortunately my vocabulary is limited.

[English]

The motion put forward by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) is interesting, but I wonder how carefully he and his hon. friends have considered it. I say this because it carries certain implications with which I cannot agree. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) express some of these ideas this afternoon.

First of all, this idea of sharing in the ownership of a corporation is fine for an individual in his early twenties, say, who is reconciled to the idea of spending the rest of his life working for a particular company. But I am afraid if he locks himself into one situation to the point that he has a stake in the achievements of the company, he will not enjoy the mobility which I think every Canadian should be able to enjoy. I do not think Canadians should be locked into jobs. To my mind, one of the things that has made Canada such a fine country is the fact that individuals have been able to move from region to region and to take on various jobs. I am a strong believer in the idea that an individual should follow at least four careers in the course of a lifetime. If workers are locked into their employment, as suggested in this motion, I think the situation is to their detriment rather than to their benefit. Consider the situation as it is at the present time. If a worker feels he wishes to invest in the company for which he works, that option is surely open to him. It is open to him, if he wishes, to buy shares in any corporation, whether a Canadian corporation or one of the multinational corporations about which we have heard so much recently.

The motion speaks about ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour. Well, if this could be brought about, I am sure everyone in Canada would say amen. In the relationship between capital and labour, there has to be a greater degree of sophistication than in the past. I recall attending several meetings with the former minister of labour; companies and labour unions set up consultation committees, committees which operate after collective agreements have been signed, so that labour and management can iron out difficulties and, in many cases, head off confrontations—in particular, strikes. In the absence of this degree of sophistication, industry often ends up in two camps, enemy camps almost, with labour on one side and management on the other.

• (1650)

I have seen factories in which they have one cafeteria for the management and another for the workers. It is unfortunate that these two groups do not eat in the same cafeteria so they have an opportunity to discuss affairs rather than leaning toward a separation of management and labour. If we continue to develop opposite camps, let us remember that both have something in common; both want the company to succeed. I should like to see the two groups work together, rather than working toward the same end but unhappily along different routes.

In Japan an individual who gets a job with a company locks himself into the company, in effect, and will do almost anything in order that the company succeeds. This is admirable, but it is not the way that Canadian workers think or the way they should be expected to think. I am a strong believer in the collective bargaining process, and I think it can be enhanced with labour-management consultation committees. Wherever possible we must head off confrontation.

I think it is fair to say that one of the debates current in Canada today is whether strikes in the public service should be allowed. This government has decided that public servants should have the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike. Those opposed to that position are watching the situation carefully. They are watching negotiations with the railways, postal workers, air lines and civil servants to see how these unions handle the new responsibility given to them. Quite frankly, they are watching with a jaundiced eye in the hope that collective bargaining will fail. I should like to see it work, and I think that management, labour and the unions have an obligation to see that it does work. People working for the government or in essential services should have the right to use the ultimate weapon of the strike.

However, in my opinion, in management-labour confrontations today the strike has become, rather than the ultimate weapon, the inevitable weapon. It seems to me it is almost a ritual now when the contract comes up for renewal, negotiations for a new contract break down, a strike vote is called, and the union representative goes on the air and states that 98 per cent of his members have voted to strike. Once this juggernaut starts to move, it is difficult to stop it. All too often, when workers decide to strike they do so in the heat of battle, as it were, at a meeting in some arena or union hall. Those who want support for a strike get on the stage and tell the assembly they have to show management that they are united and stand together, that anyone who votes against a strike will be looked on with more than a jaundiced eye.

It seems to me that in the interests of the worker there should be some kind of cooling off period, and opportunity for the worker to go home and discuss whether or not he should strike. In this day of women's lib I think the housewife, the woman who stays at home and has to put up with a guy who is on strike for 24 hours a day, should be given an opportunity to vote on the issue. Certainly, she has much to say about what takes place over the three or four weeks that her husband is not working. Let the worker discuss the matter with his wife and family and try to come to an intelligent decision, such as that perhaps they should do more bargaining before striking. Perhaps if the wives had an opportunity to vote, the workers would have second thoughts and try to find some other route before resorting to the ultimate weapon that hurts everyone. This is not meant to weaken the position of the union but to strengthen the position of the worker. Then, if he did go on strike, he would be bargaining from a position of strength.

Another sad feature of the strike is the confrontation that takes place at the factory gate or fence. I think both sides are at fault here. Both sides have their angers and their frustrations, and unhappily both have their vicious participants. There are those who drive into a picket line, not necessarily trying to knock people down, but failing to recognize that those who are picketing are human beings who are trying to make a case. Actions of this sort fuel the angers and frustrations already felt by strikers. Then we have the kind of striker who reacts by smashing and damaging factory property and machines. There is no question that this is to the detriment of the public image of the union involved.

Another matter that bothers me is this. The CLC is supposed to look after the interests of the working man, yet it sees fit to support, at least on the surface, only one political party. I think this, too, is to the detriment of the working man. A Liberal candidate in an election—or a Conservative candidate for that matter—may be the obvious choice to represent the interests of the working men of the area, but because he is not an NDP member propaganda is disseminated to the effect that only the New Democratic Party is interested in the working man. This propaganda ignores all of the good legislation that is brought down, not only by Liberals but Conservatives, both provincially and federally.

I am not saying that unions should not participate in politics because that is one way of getting their message across. But I am suspicious that they reflect the policies of the NDP when they make representations to government, that they will knock anything that the government does and forget to give their support to the good measures the government introduces. The CLC weakens the position of the working man when it climbs on one political party's bandwagon. You cannot pigeonhole the workers of Canada. Some are prepared to go on strike and fight in that way. Others feel that some sort of arbitration should be followed to settle a dispute. Since others feel they should join an organization, not necessarily a union, but an employees association. They feel they can make their case best in this way as they are going through the collective bargaining process. The workers should have a choice in this regard.

I disagree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) who describes these people as parasites. He said that because the firemen got a raise, other people who did not belong to their group were parasites because they got the same raise. There is much to be said for employees associations, which can put money aside to be used for better things than strike funds which often are soon dissipated.

Once again I congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska for introducing this motion because it gives those of us who feel for the working man, and want to see his rights protected, the opportunity of expressing our views.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ESTABLISH PROFIT-SHARING AND STOCK PURCHASE PROGRAMS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to commend the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) who has proposed this motion concerning the sharing of profits between corporations and workers.

In view of the many criticisms by labour of the present capitalist system, this motion in my opinion is most timely and I hope that most hon. members will support it.

One must know and understand what the workers really want, not only in Canada, but throughout the world.

In this connection, I should like to quote a page of the findings of a study published in the Action Nationale of February 1972, under the signature of Rev. Father Jean Genest. He says:

Did you know that through a series of ever more comprehensive laws, from 1951 to 1956, Western Germany has renovated the internal organization of entreprises by initiating co-management which, far from being a failure, "equal co-management" such as it has existed for more than 15 years in the mining and steel industry, has proved itself.

Did you know that order No. 67-693 of August 17, 1967, in France, has laid the foundations and conditions of participation by wage-earners to the benefits of the economic expansion and has made its application compulsory in all businesses employing 100 or more employees, effective January 1, 1968?

Did you know that in the United States, more than 100,000 firms have initiated a profit-sharing program for all their employees, either in the form of a cash payment, shareholding or a saving plan? The most famous among these firms are Procter and Gamble, Eastman Kodak, Sears and Roebuck, Johnson and Son, Sanborn Co, etc.

The point is therefore, in the western world, to make every effort in order to overcome conflicts between capital and labour, between management and unions, and between social and economic aspects of a business, to achieve through industrial democracy, an involvement of all members in a corporation's success, either on an economic or a human point of view. "The key word is involvement".

Mr. Speaker, workers also call for this right to participation. In an article published in the February 1972 edition of the review entitled The Canadian Worker, the official medium of the Canadian Labour Congress, a union leader who cannot be said to be an anarchist, namely Mr. Donald MacDonald, chairman of the CLC, deals with the right of workers to be involved in corporate management. In an article entitled "Industrial democracy in the 70's", Mr. MacDonald, who was speaking during a conference on industrial democracy which was held in Ottawa in last January, stated, and I quote:

There seems to be general agreement with the principle put forward in the resolution passed during the statutory meeting of the CLC held in Edmonton in 1970.

This resolution read as follows:

"Whereas it is not proper in a free society for workers to be subjected, on the premises of their jobs, to an excessive supervision that would not be tolerated in the community as a whole;

Whereas historically the main forces which have fought for freedom are those of the union movement;

It is resolved that the Canada Labour Congress insists that the principles of freedom be also respected on work sites by fighting for the extension of collective bargaining in order to abolish management's unconditional right to keep the labour force unjustly in stride;

It is further resolved that the Canada Labour Congress, although acknowledging that the role of workers and management does not coincide, supports the extension of collective bargaining to include all questions concerning the industrial life of workers, including the results of technological changes and otherwise for workers, by insisting particularly on the implementation of the recommendations of the Freedman report, production programs, future industrial expansion policies, restraint of operations, methods and processes of operation and pollution control."

Mr. Speaker, the vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Joe Morris, spoke of the experience in the field of participation and joint decision by union leaders in Germany. Here is what he said:

The position of German unions stems from their belief that the economy is not an exclusive monopoly of capitalists or of economic decision-makers, without consideration for the effects or the consequences such decisions may have on employees individually or collectively, or on the community. In their view, industrial ventures are no longer private institutions: they are part of the social structure of the country and should therefore be responsive to the needs of the community. They claim that factories and firms can no longer be viewed as mere agglomerations of physical goods. An industrial enterprise is unthinkable without its workers, its relationships with the world in which it exists, its place within the national economy. Therefore, if its existence affects groups other than its share-holders, these other groups should have the opportunity to influence its policies and its operations. This is the kind of reasoning guiding German unions in their position on co-determination.

As for Mr. George Home, director of the Political Education Service of the Canadian Labour Congress, he talked about the Danish workers' fund contributed to by all employers, including the government, in order to provide workers with dividends. Here is Mr. Home's thesis:

The Danish Workers Federation . . . has passed during its convention of May, 1971, specific proposals for the establishment of a "workers' returns and investments fund".

In fact, Mr. Speaker, this is basically a formula under which all employers, including the government, would pay a contribution to their investment fund at the rate of 1 per cent of the wages in the first year and 0.5 per cent more for each subsequent year, up to 5 per cent after 8 years.

Such payments would be added to the usual pay.

This plan also provides that the contribution paid on his behalf will become the worker's personal property through shares.

The worker will keep these vested rights even if he changes job or retires.

The shares from this fund are not negotiable, that is not on the stock market, but they can be redeemed after five years, at the time of retirement or in case of death or serious injuries.

The purposes of this fund are as follows: to insure to all wage earners, irrespective of their place of employment, a share in the capital growth of the firm and the revenue derived from this capital; to contribute to the democratization of the economy in insuring a greater degree of equality in the distribution of wealth and income; to contribute to the savings growth and, by the same token, to the increase in the money supply in the Danish industry and other important sectors of the economy.

In each company, the "wage earners' capital" supplied by the company will be invested in shares and at least one workers' representative will serve on the board of directors.

• (1710)

This representation will increase in line with the capital of the workers, and so will their influence at the general assembly where they will be represented by delegates directly nominated by all the employees.

The shares handed over to each worker in proportion to investment benefits are calculated not on the basis of his own company's dividends, but on that of the profits made on the capital as a whole.

Here at home, in Canada, even in Quebec, Mr. Speaker, the profit-sharing concept, the shareholder-worker concept is becoming more popular, even in the close family to the Quebec Prime Minister.

Here is a paragraph extracted from the newspaper Le Soleil of March 31 last and entitled: "Marine Industries employees could become shareholders". I quote:

Marine Industries Limited wants to remain a private concern, and the recent decision by the great majority of employees to become shareholders in the company is evidence of the confidence in which the people of the Sorel area have always held this industry which continues to bring wealth to the regional economy.

A recent survey indicated that 85 per cent of the 2,750 shipyard workers are interested in buying 500,000 shares at a cost of $5 each, and a formal offer to this effect has been made to the Société générale de financement. As it is well known, SGF some time ago asked for the nationalization of the corporation by the Quebec government.

The reaction was not long pending, since a number of Marine Industries trustees came up with this idea, which also meets with the consent of the Simard group which holds approximately 40 per cent of all shares.

Mr. Speaker, in the spring of 1971, the National Research Council published in its quarterly a most interesting article on the participation of workers in the life of the industry. It was signed by Mr. Leonard Hynes, chairman of the board of directors of Canadian Industries Limited, in Montreal. I quote:

Doubtless, work can be made interesting in various ways within one's own organization. Thus, we have constituted at Canadian Industries Limited what we have called a "participatory management". We do not claim that it is anything new except in the sense that we have adapted the concept to our own particular needs.

"Participatory management" as the expression indicates is an attempt to bring more democracy to the organization and, generally, to express the fact that we recognize a hierarchy of needs according to the concept of the American psychologist, Abraham Maslow. Those needs are as follows: the physiological need to survive above everything else; the need for security that grows after physiological needs are met; the social needs that appear when conditions in the environment are stable; the egocentric needs linked with esteem, a good reputation and the recognition of our competence and finally the need for personal achievement, the highest of all which reflects everyone's wish to achieve one's full potential. In North America, the first three requirements are usually met and the fourth also is to a large extent. There is now the matter of the fifth one which participatory management is attempting to accomplish and this is what led the CIL to launch itself into a program which is based on the first five key points.

[Mr. Godin.]

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that these learned words, these well-wishing ideas and these declarations of pious intentions must be abandoned. Angry workers will not fall for propositions like that. Good intentions are however indicated. These statements indicate that various employers are aware of the problems. Like some labour unionists, they are still pursuing possible and better solutions, so that co-operation may exist between capital and labour and so that production, capital and labour may become true partners.

Mr. Speaker, now there remains to be seen which are the best formulas for arriving at the desired results. My colleague the hon. member for Bellechasse will be called upon to explain it later on, I hope.

[English]

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) for introducing his worthwhile motion this afternoon. I have no hesitation in supporting the thrust of it. It gives members an opportunity to become involved in a little ideological exercise here this afternoon. As I read the motion, it seemed to me that its fundamental objective is an endeavour to restore initiative to the people of this country. I believe there is nothing more important to a person than having a personal stake in an enterprise. I spent much of my life engaged in personnel work among people involved in sales. I might mention a good old fashioned philosophy. If a salesman does not own a share in or believe in the product of a company, then he is no dashed good as a salesman. He cannot sell automobiles, he cannot sell insurance and he cannot sell anything else unless he is prepared to have some personal participation.

Having that view, I enjoy the opportunity to discuss the motion of the hon. member. There are, of course, in Canada many employee plans. A good example is the Bell Telephone Company whose employees over the years have had an opportunity to purchase stock in that corporation. Unfortunately, in many other industries where there are employee participation plans it is only the top executives who seem to be able to or seem to wish to participate. I wonder what the reason is. I have my own personal view on that. I believe it has been made evident this afternoon by some of the remarks made during the debate. I choose to call it a good old Canadian syndrome in which security, pensions, retirement plans and so on are much more important to the individual, or seemingly so, than any idea of participation, taking a chance and, as the Americans say, getting a piece of the action. We buy pensions out of our savings. We buy life insurance. We represent the largest group per capita of owners of life insurance of any nation in the world. As a nation, we are more tied to the idea of security than of taking a chance and trying to build this nation.

In order to change that syndrome, that conservative—and I use a small "c"—attitude in respect of investment, we must have some leadership from different places to encourage personal initiatives. Our governments must provide a climate which encourages this. In France, tax emptions are used in respect of employee plans as a form of encouragement. The results there, however, have not been too good. Here, our industry has a rather paternalistic attitude. One often notices in the newspaper that Mr. Smith, employed for 40 years with a certain company, was granted a $250 honorarium because he submitted a good idea to the industry which perhaps resulted in a benefit to the industry of $100,000. This is the kind of paternalistic approach we have here. As a society we have failed to actively encourage increased participation by workers in the businesses which employ them.

I was rather surprised at the remarks of my good friend, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who complained about the danger of employees being locked in by participating in an employee investment program. I submit he completely misses the point. If a man wants to move around, I submit he can move pretty dashed freely in this country if he should find a little box full of securities.

The opportunity currently presents itself to adopt measures which, in my opinion, will combine two objectives: first, an increase in the number of individuals who are active participants in the economic system and widespread ownership of the means of production; second, a reduction in the proportion of foreign ownership—this is very important—by an increase in ownership by Canadian workers. A society that is sincere in its desire to promote a truly participatory democracy and greater Canadian participation in the ownership of Canadian industry would surely welcome the opportunity that profit sharing and stock purchase programs could provide for the accomplishment of those goals. Not only would such programs promote greater Canadian ownership and participation in Canadian industry, I submit that this approach would also promote the self-respect of workers, the creation of a property-owning democracy, and a reduction in the intensity of industrial strife.

We could proceed by providing tax advantages for profit sharing and stock purchase programs. Another approach that should certainly be examined is that of requiring all companies or subsidiaries of large foreign-held corporations to make available a percentage of their shares each year to their Canadian workers with a view to establishing the long term possibility of returning the ownership of such companies to Canadians. The use of an imaginative and innovative program of encouraging worker participation in the ownership of Canadian enterprises could go a long way toward resolving many of the difficulties presently confronting the government. These approaches are not ones which may be expected to change the nature of our society overnight or immediately solve our problems. The effects of such programs are gradual and so will bring results in the long run rather than immediately. Gimmick solutions may attract the eye of some of us, but I prefer the results of patience and determination. No better time may be found to start this necessary program than now. My only regret is that so much time has already been lost.

I sincerely believe that the Canadian economic dream is, and always has been, the opportunity to get "a piece of the action". The earliest settlers realized this dream directly through the open frontier. The hope of acquiring their own land was what brought most of our forefathers to this country. This was accomplished by our original Dominion Land Act. It is interesting to note that in the United States Abraham Lincoln based his first campaign on the homestead proposal. The homestead bill itself was the first law he signed. The Dominion Land Act and the homestead laws in the United States were responsible for promoting in North America the philosophy of private property, free enterprise and capitalism. They stabilized our economy for over half a century. Today, when different "isms" mean redistribution from haves to the have-nots, it might be useful to remember the wholesome populism of the last century which gave us the economic foundation of the whole country. That populism was based on making haves out of have-nots without making have-nots out of haves.

When the frontier ran out, to a large extent the possibility of realizing our Canadian dream seemed to run out with it. The current crisis we are experiencing in so many areas of our economy should provide us now with the opportunity to renew our commitment to private property for every family and individual. I submit that it is time for an industrial homestead act, an act for the purpose of broadening capital ownership in the process of financing corporate growth, an act that will enable the man on the street to increase his purchasing power in a non-inflationary manner while simultaneously acquiring "a piece of the action" in the form of stock ownership of our major corporations. I repeat that this has to be a step by step long-term policy to be implemented by labour, business and government. An additional virtue of the plan would be to bring labour and business together in a creative way that would be good for both and good for the country.

The possession of capital gives individuals an independence and a flexibility of independent choice not permitted to those dependent on welfare or wages alone. The encouragement of the self-respect and opportunity provided by the widespread ownership of property must be a fundamental aim of our democracy. For example, in North America today 90 per cent of productive input comes from capital, 10 per cent from the input of labour, but 95 per cent of the North American population has only labour to offer and they are perennially short of purchasing power. What a shot in the arm it would be if we could change that percentage from 95 per cent to 90 per cent and even down to 75 per cent as stockholders purchasing power from their capital holdings would eventually be realized.

May I say with great respect that this afternoon the minister in his remarks, it seemed to me, missed the thrust of this motion. He referred to union agreements, etc. I submit that the ideal of individual motivation has escaped him. I suggest that benefits from this type of participation will be measured more in attitudes and in productivity. The minister said further that all employees would not want to participate. I say to you, so what is new? Not everybody wants to be a Liberal or a Communist or a Conservative. But this is the whole thrust of this motion. Let us create a climate where individualism can once again thrive. We have gone too far down the slippery road already to grey anonymity.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) for bringing forward his motion today which allows us a chance to debate this very important subject. The hon. member for Kamouraska and I have sat on the Committee of Manpower, Labour and Immigration, in my case for the last four years and in his, I gather, for a number of years more. I found him to be a very congenial and interesting member of that committee.

During the nearly two years before last October when I was chairman of that standing committee, I greatly increased my knowledge of the significance of the Canada Department of Labour and its objectives in relation to industrial stability, the quality of life and economic health that we all desire in our Canadian society. The traditional role of this department, which has remained virtually unchanged since its inception, is to promote the improvement of industrial relations and working conditions. From this role has been derived such goals as strengthening the collective bargaining process, improving employment standards and safety levels, ensuring the provision of equal pay for equal work and achieving equality of opportunity in employment.

• (1730)

New legislation initiated by the department supports these principles. The former minister of labour, now Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) brought forward in 1971 and obtained approval for an act to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. These amendments were considered by the standing committee while I was the chairman, and the act and its related regulations have now been fully brought into force. A short time later a bill to amend the Canada Labour Code (Industrial Relations), well known as Bill C-253, was introduced. As hon. members are aware, a successor bill, Bill C-183, has also been introduced, has received second reading and is before the standing committee, receiving detailed clause by clause study. The volume of briefs and letters received and the number of delegations that came to Ottawa following the introduction of Bill C-253 could be used as a case study of participatory democracy. The response also illustrates the importance of the proposed legislation to the economic well-being of Canada.

The successor bill, Bill C-183, reiterates the government's commitment to the proposal that technological change and its impact on employees should be subject to collective bargaining. It will provide a framework for encouraging employers and unions to negotiate the adverse effects on employees. It is my view that this bill when enacted will contribute to industrial stability and peace.

Regulations as authorized under the provisions of the Canada Labour Code (Safety of Employees), have now been fully drawn up by the department. Of the more than 20 sets of regulations, 17 have been approved and promulgated. The remainder are expected to be brought into force in the near future. Among these are important regulations limiting hours of work in the motor transport industry and requiring periodic medical examinations of drivers. These have been fully developed and are now awaiting final approval. In addition, a comprehensive revision of the Coal Mine Safety Regulations (DEVCO) is also nearing completion. First reading has also been given to Bill C-206 respecting changes to the Canada Labour Code (Fair Employment Practices). Work is also advanced on changes to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

In the areas of both legislative and non-legislative activities of the department, I understand it is the intention of the minister to strive for increased consultation in the coming year with the representatives of all those sectors integral to economic and social progress in Canada. Both labour and management, by their actions and public statements, have shown that they want to engage in dialogue with the government. Further, these groups and the general public as a whole expect the government to provide the leadership necessary to establish the ways and means for such dialogue.

I also understand that this subject will be pursued in various ways by the department and by the minister. He is personally looking forward to frank discussions in the coming months with the object of considering social and economic goals for the 1970s which can be mutually agreed upon and fully supported by all those groups which will be directly and indirectly affected. The department hopes that it can engage in more systematic consultation with labour and management to bring them into closer relationship with government and, indeed, with each other, looking at the longer term for industrial relations in Canada as the over-all economic and social environment changes. In this way perhaps we can hope to at least keep up with and anticipate changes that will come and not leave all of us locked into positions of controversy and conflict—to try to find where the public interest resides as well as the private interest engaged in this field. Non-legislative approaches are being increasingly used by the department to meet its objectives, particularly to reduce the causes of strikes, to reduce conflict situations in federal jurisdictions and to reduce the emphasis on the adversary approach.

The industry specialist program, designed to reduce conflict in union-management relations, is about to the strengthened so that early and sustained assistance can be given disputes, or potential disputes, where labour and management wish this kind of aid. The object of this service is to help parties move away from crisis bargaining. The value of the program is borne out by its success rate in achieving satisfactory results in 75 per cent of the cases in which it has been involved since its inception. Indeed, its record in resolving conflict has brought about an increase in demand for its services; hence the strengthening of the service that I have mentioned.

Labour and management are also soon to be offered an industrial relations advisory service which will be created by reorienting and expanding the work of the labour-management consultation branch. Its main task will be to produce procedures for joint discussion and negotiation of problems during the closed period of the contract, those problems that otherwise might be deferred and unnecessarily create heat and congestion at the bargaining table or, worse, blow up into wildcat strikes.

This advisory service will be concerned with the attitude of the parties toward one another and toward the concept of improved industrial relations. For this purpose the advisory service will seek to acquire stronger professional competence in communications and human relations. Where labour and management are prepared jointly to seek outside advice, the advisory service will be readily available to them; and where it does not itself possess special competence we proposed to draw on the expertise that may be available elsewhere in the Department of Labour or other agencies.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister also wants to put in motion a strengthened and reoriented research effort concerning rates of pay, conditions of employment and other factors affecting the climate of industrial relations. To support the expanded non-legislative mission, the department will concentrate on five areas of research activity which I think are relevant to the improvement of the quality of employer-employee relations and the effectiveness of the bargaining system. The first is an industrial relations analysis program to monitor social and economic forces likely to affect collective bargaining in the future. The second activity is to provide better and more up to date factual information on wages, working conditions and provisions prevailing in collective agreements, all of which should be an aid to collective bargaining.

The third is research specifically aimed at supporting the industry specialists' program and the work of the advisory service, to which I have already referred. The fourth activity is support to industrial relations training programs. When reporting at the end of 1968, the Woods task force on labour relations claimed that a serious shortage of competent personnel existed in virtually every phase of industrial relations. We hope to look at the effectiveness of the various programs, particularly as they relate to mediators and arbitrators, as a prelude to continuing departmental support. The fifth activity relates to international programs. I believe that programs designed to improve industrial relations can be strengthened by information on activities in other countries, particularly in Europe, and by international exchange of experience.

Let me turn for a moment to another important activity in the department, that of the women's bureau. The bureau is expanding its work with regard to the special problems of working women, who make one-third of our total work force. Indeed, the bureau plays a full part in relation to the recommendations of the interdepartmental committee on the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. In the past year the bureau has received encouraging support from many public and private organizations at the provincial, national and international levels. In particular, the communication media in Canada are generous in the time and space they allot the activities of the bureau.

The Canadian Department of Labour continues to participate actively in the work of the International Labour Organization which, as hon. members know, has been going through difficult times. The Canadian government has helped the organization deal with its financial crisis by paying our assessed contribution somewhat in advance of the due date. Moreover, our delegates to ILO meetings in Geneva—such as the one that I had the privilege of attending two years ago—have been working in close co-operation with the ILO and other delegations to strengthen the organization's program performance.

As ILO matters fall within both federal and provincial jurisdictions, the department has been making special efforts to involve provincial departments of labour as fully as possible in ILO activities. One result has been to gain agreement of the provinces that Canada should ratify a basic ILO Human Rights Convention, No. 87, dealing with freedom of association and the right to organize. This convention was recently ratified by Canada. In addition, the federal government hopes shortly to be in a position to ratify convention No. 100 concerning equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value.

I see my time is coming to an end, Mr. Speaker. I conclude my remarks by saying that there is no doubt that collective bargaining does not work perfectly: it has its limitations and its weaknesses; it cannot be expected to solve all problems. But we all know—this is my conviction—that no better system has been devised for a free society; and we know, too, that society would not be free without it. Its successes and its benefits far outweigh the problems with which it struggles. Free collective bargaining is not only sound fundamentally; it is an essential element in a democratic society and in an economy such as ours. It was this conviction that lead the government to include in the revisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code now before Parliament a preamble supporting free collective bargaining. This preamble sets forth the purpose of the government, which is to support both labour and management in their efforts to develop good relations and constructive collective bargaining.

It is not good enough to ask labour or management alone to improve the system and to improve stability. The responsibility lies jointly with all three parties involved, labour, management and government, to work in co-operation and consultation with each other to achieve this end. The key to success and the only way to face this challenge is to increase the degree of co-operation between the three partners, employers, workers and government. Only in this way will we succeed in reducing conflicts to a minimum, in improving working conditions and, finally, in ensuring the survival of our system of free bargaining.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock, since we are expecting a message from the Senate presently?

Mr. Speaker: I would rather suggest that the hon. member proceed with his speech, because there is no indication that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod will be here soon. There may be some delay and there is a possibility that we could waste 15 minutes of the time of the House.

The hon. member, anyway, may proceed with his speech. He may have a chance of delivering a good part of it before the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod arrives.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I simply wanted to abide by the advice that was given to us. At any rate, I am willing to proceed with my comments on the important motion introduced by my hon. colleague from Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne).

I would like first of all to commend—even in his absence—the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) for having delivered a major part of his speech in French, which I deeply appreciate. For that matter, another government member did deliver the first part of his speech in French. It has surely been the intention thus to acknowledge the bilingual aspect of the House, and since the mover is French-speaking, a great spirit of co-operation has been displayed.

Mr. Speaker, the motion introduced by the member for Kamouraska is not aimed at making compulsory, through special legislation, the involvement of workers in the development and profit-sharing programs of Canadian firms, but rather at promoting a climate of co-operation through tax adjustments which would encourage that involvement.

Due to the short time allotted to me, I wish to limit my comments to a single aspect of the motion, namely the involvement of workers in profit-sharing programs of firms, without overlooking the fact that the workers must take part in the development of Canadian enterprise, and I insist on the word "development", not merely by investing their work capital which is, in my opinion, most important, but also, by investing cash capital, whenever their income will allow them to do so, or in any other way.

Mr. Speaker, the International Congress on profit-sharing held in France in 1889 did define profit-sharing as follows:

> An agreement freely entered into and providing that the employee will receive a prefixed part of the profit.

As for the Council of Profit Sharing Industries of Chicago, here is its definition:

> Any arrangement by which an employer pays or makes available to his regular employees, in addition to their usual wages, immediate or deferred amounts of money based on the company's profits.

Another authority defines this sharing as follows:

> Any arrangement for increasing the output and for reducing costs through human co-operation resulting from the employees sharing directly (in addition to their regular salaries) in the company's returns as measured profitwise.

According to historians, it is a Frenchman who holds the distinction of having initiated the first profit-sharing system. Edmé Jean LeClaire, a painting contractor living in the 19th century was once impressed by a remark made by a friend and business competitor, to the effect that the only way to suppress any antagonism between employers and employees was to make the latter share in the benifits of the firm. And, after thinking for a long time and having to face other difficulties with his employees, he told himself that the experience was worth a try.

On February 12, 1843, he called a meeting of his employees and advised them that he intended to share his profits with them. They were somewhat skeptical, whereas the Parisian gendarmes, who were told about the decision, undertook to pester Mr. LeClaire because he was using unfair competition practices. Hark! This man had the courage to stray from the old paths. This was something new!

On February 15, 1843, Mr. LeClaire held a meeting of his 43 eligible employees and surmounted their incredulity by a dramatic gesture: he emptied onto a table before them a bag containing 12,266 gold francs which he distributed among them in proportion to their annual earnings.

Their misgivings thus overcome, they returned to their paint-brushes with greater zeal, realizing that as their work improved the company would become more profitable, to their mutual advantage. This is quite logical.

The plan continued in operation and Mr. LeClaire expressed surprise at the results of his experience. His employees no longer worked as ordinary workers who operate like machines and drop their paint-brushes on the stroke of five. They all had become partners and self-employed.

Subsequently, Mr. LeClaire somewhat altered his system of yearly cash distributions, depositing part of the profits in a fund to cover occasional illness, retirement pensions and compensation for accidents.

In 1926, an American study brought out the fact that the LeClaire Company was operating under another name, but this new firm, Laurent, Fournier et Cie, had kept the profit-sharing plan after 84 years in operation. This company had then 1141 employees, and was still engaged in painting, redecorating, in Paris and other cities in France.

On July 19, 1963, The Profit Research Foundation learned through the French Embassy in Washington—

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1800)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

> An act to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Criminal Code 1967 Amendment Act, the Criminal Records Act, the National Defence Act, the Parole Act and the Visiting Forces Act—Chapter No. 13.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ESTABLISH PROFIT SHARING AND STOCK PURCHASE PROGRAMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dionne:

That this House deplores the fact that the government has not adopted the appropriate measures for involving workers in Canadian firms through profit-sharing and stock purchase programs as a means of promoting social stability, reinforcing our country's economy and ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, when hon. members left to attend royal assent in the Senate Chamber, I was making the history of a well known French firm, Maison LeClaire, which operated for 121 consecutive years, and with much success, with its employees sharing its profits.

Today, such profits are being shared as follows: 6 per cent for the two owners; 44 per cent for a mutual aid fund; 50 per cent for the workers, over and above their salaries. That policy produced excellent results in France and could do the same in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from a study which was prepared by an expert on the matter and the conclusions of which were published by l'Action Nationale in its February 1972 issue. That expert, Reverend Jean Genest, describes how ideas have evolved concerning profit-sharing by workers in Canadian businesses. Here is what he said:

To those thinkers co-management was a duty for management but, in 1970, Mr. Philippe de Woot turned it into a right: "Participation has become an individual's right. Each individual is co-author, co-responsible and co-beneficiary of common work. Subsequently, it is every individual's right and duty to participate in this work. Under this philosophy, the problem of participation should be considered in terms of the individual's right rather than in term of management's duty. Participation should go as far as transforming the firm's structure. This new structure should permit a dialogue. However, it should not go as far as sharing sovereignty". Whether such participation is a worker's right may lead to considerable discussions but it remains that the entrepreneurs in general followed their interest rather than their duty. Today any misunderstanding as to labour's way of thinking is no longer permitted. Their often systematic refusal of any participation in a certain management of the enterprise is the great reason urging labour and unions towards socialism and its extreme form, communism. Their unassumed immense and serious social responsibilities are paving the way for a decade of violence and restlessness. Something must be done.

The second element of social transformation is profit-sharing for workers. Profit-sharing is generally classified into three main categories: (1) A pure and simple cash payment as soon as profits are known, on the basis of a previously determined percentage; (2) a form of savings bond redeemed in case of illness, departure or retirement; (3) allocation of corporate shares, known as industrial co-partnership, whose merit is to make workers the legal owners of the corporation on the same footing as its shareholders.

These three types of profit-sharing plans have a very strong psychological and social effect primarily because of the interest which they arouse in the workers for their employer and the feeling of participation which creates solidarity among them. Of the three types of profit-sharing plans—bonus, savings plan and industrial co-partnership—the latter two have held our attention the most.

Mr. Speaker, there are other plans which enable workers to share in the profits, in the property and in the management of industries. Foremost among them is the plan put forward in the United States by Louis O. Kelso in various books he has published.

The Kelso plan amounts to the following: Recognizing that it is increasingly difficult for workers to use up their energies in salaried productivity since machines and automation have replaced them and acknowledging also the continued industrial concentration, Kelso's wish is that workmen should all become capitalists by obtaining the means of being shareholders in the industries which employ them and he makes the following suggestions:

1. Intensification of a program providing for a distribution of shares within the industry.

2. Amendment of tax legislation in respect of estates and gifts so as to encourage the formation of a larger number of rich people who are able to provide for their families and whose wealth can be passed on from one generation to the other.

3. While the transition towards capitalism is proceeding, to bring about the repeal of income tax on limited liability companies together with a tax reform on personal income in order to increase, fairly and equitably, the government's income from the members of the economic community.

4. Elimination of government measures which directly increase concentration of capital ownership.

5. Effective regularization of the economy by the government to ensure the maintenance of free and possible competition on all markets, except in the rare instances where monopoly has to be allowed for technical reasons.

6. Recognition by the government of its duty to ensure all members of the society a reasonable participation in the production of riches, so that they can all receive sufficient income to subsist.

All those are the things which everybody wants. Everybody wishes to have sufficient income to subsist. I continue with the quotation:

7. Enactment of legislation which would make it compulsory for limited companies which are already well established to distribute 100 per cent of their profits to their shareholders.

8. Development of a preferential investment system for all families who do not have enough capital to subsist, in order to encourage them to acquire capital, the income from which would be sufficient to ensure their subsistence.

As reported in the newspaper La Presse of September 28, 1970, a Quebec executive, the vice-president of Dupont (Canada) Limited, Mr. F. S. Capon, asked that the small wage-earner be given the means to invest in companies in order to himself become a capitalist. The article, entitled: "Why not investment on credit for the small wage-earner?" went as follows—I quote:

Mr. Capon suggests a solution. Each household should participate in active capitalism by investing in economic growth, and thus drawing benefits from such growth. To that effect, the speaker stated, why not have investment on credit?

Mr. Speaker, we are thus able to realize that many persons knowledgable in this field expressed very valuable views, and this is one of the reasons that has led the Social Credit Party to move a motion today, asking this House to carefully consider the possible development of a profit-sharing plan, in order to involve most workers in the development and management of our natural resources, as well as to increase their standards of living and to enable them to live with their own income, to alleviate unemployment and to encourage the next generation to carry on the work of involvement and of development of Canada, for the greatest benefit of the community.

Mr. Speaker, if we considered all the government investments that are made in the various departments, and if we managed to get the workers to benefit from all these investments, from all the benefits that are granted, I think that we might succeed in getting in our country a really interesting social atmosphere which might be beneficial to the whole society.

I could continue and say a lot more on this subject, but, to summarize, let us say that if we were to introduce such a policy, we should certainly take a step in the right direction, in order to eliminate the causes of labour-management disputes, that is between money-capital and labour-capital and ensure social peace, economic affluence for all of us in friendship and justice, which would make easier the very settlement of problems that may arise between the State and its employees by providing better guidance for discussion in the public sector.

[English]

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the resolution we are considering in this debate reads as follows:

That this House deplores the fact that the government has not adopted the appropriate measures for involving workers in Canadian firms through profit sharing and stock purchase programs as a means of promoting social stability, reinforcing our country's economy and ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour.

This is a very interesting and fundamental resolution and the mover deserves credit for bringing it to the attention of the House. I was interested in some of the speeches made, especially the speeches of the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead), because they quickly diverted the attention of the House from the main subject to the consideration of labour relations problems with which our labour system is plagued. This could have been a clever ruse to distract us from the main theme. However, I do not believe it was. I think, rather, it stems from the almost universal attitude of governments, and of necessity in our situation, which are so busy looking at the trees that they do not have time to sit back and look at the forest as a whole. I do not say this in a critical way of individuals who support this government, or of members of the government; but I think the situation should be corrected.

I believe it is essential that somewhere as an emanation of Parliament—I believe it should be part of the government itself—there should be a small committee, preferably composed of senior cabinet ministers, whose duty it would be to oversee the general economy and thrust of government so that programs put forward by various departments would be coherent and would express the general aims and objectives of the country as a whole. Therefore, I think ministers without portfolio should not be junior ministers but a small group of three, four or five senior ministers who have had the responsibility of holding a portfolio; and in this important task they should not be weighted down, as ministers are, with detailed work. Most ministers have to sign documents of various kinds, by the hour, every day, until they have writer's cramp or neither the time nor the energy to give thought to these overriding considerations.

I have digressed, Mr. Speaker, and I do not intend to do so any longer. I wish now to return to the subject matter of the resolution before us. As time goes by in the rapidly increasing technology of production with which we are all acquainted, it becomes evident that less and less of the requirement for production consists of labour and more and more of it consists of capital. As an illustration of this, we might consider that when Canada set out on the great nation-building process and built the first continental railway, it involved the employment of thousands of men. Most of these men could be put to work with a capital expenditure equal to what would be required to buy a shovel, probably around $1.50.

In this modern age a contractor engaged in the earth-moving business probably has an investment of $100,000 in equipment such as an huge, earth-moving machine which involves the employment of only one man. I remember a few years ago when a runway at an airport in my riding was being built. I asked the contractor how much of the general cost involved labour. He figured out that less than 5 per cent of the cost was involved in labour and said, "Look at that machine which takes $25 an hour to operate." He also said that a man's wages were less than 10 per cent of the total cost, and that the machine represented more than 90 per cent of the total cost.

In the United States today, approximately 90 per cent of their productive input comes from capital—land, structures, machines and working capital—and 10 per cent comes from the input of labour. This estimate is based on a judgment concerning what the relative value of capital and labour input would be if each were competitively evaluated through free market forces. Ownership of this capital is concentrated in approximately 5 per cent of the American people. This means that approximately 95 per cent of the people of the United States, those who have only their labour to offer, are perennially short of purchasing power even though they need many services which industry could easily provide.

The affluent, capital-owning 5 per cent, on the other hand, cannot support mass production. Our factories habitually run at 80 per cent capacity or less, even though a significant percentage of families live in poverty or near poverty. What is the government's reply to this problem? Their reaction is that the rich must be soaked. This is not right. Therefore, there must be progressive taxation to funnel-off the accumulation of capital, not production in the form of investment capital but in transfer payments by government for many apparently worth-while causes. But the net effect in Canada is that there is a vacuum so far as risk capital is concerned, with the result that much of the risk capital we require comes from outside our borders.

• (2030)

This system produces three undesirable effects: first, it concentrates wealth in the hands of a few; second, it provides a diminishing role for labour in the production of wealth and, third, it creates a heightening struggle by an expanding labour force to obtain an adequate means of livelihood from a diminishing role in production. Fourth, the few hands in which capital is concentrated tend to become more and more foreign and less and less Canadian.

I think our objective should be that more people should have a stake in our country, more people should own not only the labour but the capital content of production; more people should be able to earn part of their income from capital investment and only part of it from labour, as is the case in the agricultural industry. That is why I think many people stay in agriculture when from a purely economic point of view this field of endeavour is not competitive with other forms of activity. However, it is satisfying because the farmer is both a capitalist and a labourer; he has a twofold interest in production.

It is easy enough to perceive problems—but how does one solve them? Several suggestions have been made, some of them contained in the resolution. One is to profit-share with the employees of companies in the form of bonuses. In some cases this includes small, compulsory savings by employees. Second, we should introduce a tax system which would make profit-sharing attractive both to labour and to capital.

Third, I think a guaranteed insured loan system whereby individuals could borrow money for the express purpose of buying capital shares in Canadian operations should be considered. If this could be achieved, a number of beneficial effects would result. One would be that labour would have a stake in the profits of the companies for whom they work. This would reduce in many cases, as has proven in the United States, friction between labour and capital. In this way I think more people would get some of their income from capital, and this income would continue whether they were ill and unable to work, on vocation or beyond the working age, and it would be transmittable to their heirs.

Also—and this is very important—it would provide a source of investment capital from which Canadians could invest in their own country and thereby make us less dependent on foreign investment in this country. A very interesting article appeared in the Globe and Mail of November 11, 1971, regarding this matter. The author, Mr. Ronald Anderson, had this to say:

> The increasing scale and incident of social unrest that have figured so largely in news reports over the past decade indicate that a serious malfunction has developed in the working of the social and economic system.
> Reports of unruly demonstrations, violence, work stoppages and protest movements—not in some far off country but near at hand in stable, conservative Canada—have become daily fare for newspaper readers. Environmental pollution, unemployment, bitterly contested wage demands, rejection of authority, poverty in the midst of affluence, and the pressure of inflation on those who have few defences have become commonplace topics of conversation.
>
> What does all this mean? Why have the troubles erupted so suddenly and on so many fronts? Where is it leading?—
>
> One Canadian businessman who has given long and serious thought to the problem is Frank S. Capon, president of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. Mr. Capon at present is outlining his views in a series of speeches in the Atlantic provinces.
> Mr. Capon is disturbed over the trend of developments, which he sees as a grave threat to the free enterprise system of industrial organization—the system that, he believes, is best able to provide the innovation, productivity and technical progress needed to produce affluence for all humanity. At the same time, he is convinced that the opportunity is present, if the destructive potential can be contained, for a dramatic step forward to a very high and broadly distributed level of affluence for all Canadians over the next quarter of a century.

Mr. Speaker, my time has almost expired so I will not continue to quote. However, let me say that the crux of this matter is that this man believes, as do many others who have given the matter a great deal of thought, that it is essential that some of our investment capital as a means of production must be put into the hands of more and more people as labour becomes a factor of less importance in production and capital becomes more important. Profit sharing is not a new idea. There is an excellent round-up of the results of profit sharing by many United States companies in the September, 1969, issue of Reader's Digest. I have no time to refer to it further, but I commend it to hon. members who wish to learn the facts of profit sharing.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, the days which are allotted to opposition parties do not always have the same interest because matters under discussion are often a repetition of questions which have been dealt with in the course of ordinary sittings.

But I must admit that today's subject matter is highly interesting and I would like to congratulate the mover of the motion for affording us the opportunity to participate in this debate and express ideas on a subject which is of present concern.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that this motion is being introduced by a right wing party which, in my opinion, is much more oriented towards government non-intervention. I wonder if, at some point, our Creditistes friends were not siding with the socialists. I may say that I like them much better when they are themselves, and I am sure that after that brief foray into an area which is not favourable to them they will come back to the fold.

Mr. Speaker, social peace, social stability, improvement of the economic climate and better relationship between management and labour are valid goals and in my opinion all hon. members are willing to try and achieve those goals in the best possible way, which is not easy. Sensible people—and I think that most hon. members are sensible people—who can place themselves above partisanship and discuss as objectively as possible, will admit that the government, without having solved all problems, without having fulfilled its aims completely, has nevertheless made valid efforts to try and improve that social climate and establish better relationship between employees and employers.

To my mind, the government has really adopted a realistic attitude in order to create a stable economy in terms of social and economic needs and in order to satisfy the individual worker as much as possible. It has done so without contravening unduly the basic principles in existence in Canada, namely those of private or free enterprise.

The interest manifested by the government is reflected more particularly in the creation of the Canadian Development Corporation, in the recent incentives to industry contained in the May 8th budget as well as its policy on foreign takeovers and finally in the overall industrial strategy frequently mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie).

The following extracts are no doubt of great help to support the views I just expressed.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Benson), who was then minister of Finance, made the following statement on February 22, 1971, regarding the Canada Development Corporation and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, the purposes of the CDC are essentially twofold; first, to help develop and maintain strong Canadian-controlled and Canadian-managed corporations in the private sector of the economy and, second, to give Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada.
> The corporation will be expected to work very closely with other members of the Canadian business and financial community. Ideally, many of its actions and investments will be in response to proposals made to it by others. It should concentrate the exercise of its own direct entrepreneurial functions in those areas of particular promise and interest to the Canadian economy where there is not otherwise likely to be a sufficient degree of Canadian participation.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) stated among other things in connection with the budget brought down on May 8:

> Ours is essentially a free enterprise system, not one whose every movement is determined by the state. Certainly the federal government can—and will—play a central role in setting its course. But every day millions of Canadian consumers—workers, farmers, fishermen, businessmen, investors—make individual decisions in the market place which over time have a massive impact on the state of our whole economy.
> There are some basic things which I think we must take into account in evolving this new policy. I think most Canadians would regard it as fundamental that any new industrial policy maintain and, indeed, raise our standards of living,. Canadian standards are high in comparison with those in other countries. Most of us want to keep them that way. Secondly, we want the opportunity, as Canadians, to participate at all levels in the economic life of the country. We want to exercise our rightful role in shaping the country's economic future—on the production floor and in the executive suite. I have said before that the real priorities for the 70's are economic—the bread and butter issues. I believe we must improve the quality of life. But I believe, too, that includes providing everyone with the means to earn a decent living—and to me that requires good, productive jobs.

Bill C-201 has also been introduced. It provides for the setting up of a screening process under the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to assess potential acquisitions of control and ensure that future takeovers are to be of a significant benefit to Canadians.

We have also proposed—with respect to the subject-matter of the motion now before us—some profit-sharing and stock purchase programs.

It seems that the important issue of profit-sharing and stock purchase programs falls under the jurisdiction of individual companies or employers.

• (2050)

It is hard to conceive that this government may or should influence the decisions of the management of these individual and private firms, through a legislation or otherwise, because we are supposed to live under a free enterprise system . . .

Mr. Rondeau: Wash your hands . . .

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I shall remind my friend, the hon. member for Shefford, that I may have to wash my hands, but that he might have something else to wash, and there is no need for me to specify.

This government is in principle favourable to a direct participation of employees in Canadian firms.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Shefford rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the Standing Orders allow my hon. friend to level such charges. If he spoke more often in this House, perhaps he would realize that this is contrary to the spirit of our rules. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I beg you to ask the hon. member to withdraw his words which have doubtless gone beyond his thoughts.

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I think that I merely answered my hon. friend's invitation who is free to interpret my words as he wishes. As far as I am concerned, it is not the number of speeches that counts, but what is said and my friend might be better off if he spoke less often and thought more about the things he says. That might be more profitable.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I leave it to your parliamentary good sense to ask the hon. member for Lapointe to withdraw his words.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford suggests that the words spoken by the hon. member for Lapointe are not parliamentary. I do not think I can accept the interpretation of the rules suggested by the hon. member for Shefford. I listened to the hon. member for Lapointe, and I really do not believe the Chair should, if the hon. member does not pursue his allegations further, ask him to withdraw what he has just said. I am sure that, upon consideration, the hon. member will realize that it was rather a matter for debate and I am under the impression that the hon. member for Shefford is prepared to accept my interpretation of the Standing Order.

At any rate, if the hon. member for Lapointe were to express himself in a manner not in keeping with the Standing Order, I should unhesitatingly invite him to withdraw what he has said, but I do not consider there is occasion to do so now.

Mr. Rondeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have great respect for you, but less for the hon. member for Lapointe, whose contributions to the proceedings of the House are so infrequent that they are practically inexistent.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need answer. My hon. friend has revealed his character by the language he used in the presence of other hon. members of parliament. I need not add anything else.

The government as a matter of principle favours a direct participation of the employees of Canadian corporations in the sharing of profits and in the co-ownership of the company where they work. The government has demonstrated its interest particularly with positive action in the field of income tax.

Indeed there are in the new and thoroughly revised Income Tax Act special provisions that recognize and even promote participation and co-ownership.

Of course it must be noted that these special arrangements must not privilege unduly those who contribute to these plans at the expense of other workers and that there should be no tax abuses.

As far as stock-options or profit sharing are concerned, the existing act provides that if a corporation agrees to sell or issue parts of its share capital to its employees at a discount, the employee must include this profit in his income.

The former income tax act provided a special method of calculating income tax on profits. While this method has been retained, it was amended, and I think this was done for the benefit of workers.

Other provisions in the tax legislation encourage the workers to become co-owners of the business concern, either the one where they are employed or others.

I might mention the 3 per cent deduction up to a $150 maximum and also the $500 deduction per child over 14 up to a maximum of $2,000, for child care.

But, Mr. Speaker, as the time allowed to me is almost up, I should like to conclude my remarks with these comments which seems to me to be more to the point.

The government's legislation on labour relations favours the principle whereby employees have the right to take part in the establishment of working conditions through their freely-chosen bargaining agents.

The legislation provides for a structure and a setting which should favour employer-employee relations, but does not try in any way to—for indeed it cannot—impose the terms and conditions under which employers and employees should live, nor can it try to determine what form they should take.

The present system provides the employees with the opportunity to share in the profits of the firm through increased salaries and benefits. In addition to that, the parties are free to decide whether or not they want to negotiate formal agreements as to the sharing of profits or buying of shares.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

• (2100)

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) on the motion he introduced this afternoon, which reads as follows:

> That this House deplores the fact that the Government has not adopted the appropriate measures for involving workers in Canadian firms through profit-sharing and stock purchase programs as a means of promoting social stability, reinforcing our country's economy and ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour.

My Creditiste colleagues, as well as many hon. members of other parties, have put forward arguments in favour of profit-sharing, co-management and co-ownership by workers through stock purchase programs.

Does this mean that these proposals are complete and offer a solution to the present economic problems? Does this mean that the Creditiste philosophy is now at a standstill? No, Mr. Speaker. The Social Credit party is beyond this kind of participation, this even more frightening kind of concentration of the whole economy in the hands of the present banking system.

For instance, if you analyze the whole Kelso program you find that the workers would obtain the money to buy corporate stock merely by borrowing this money from banks. The banks would be glad to oblige because those loans would be guaranteed by a State "super bank" or even by the country itself. They would have nothing to lose and everything to gain since they would control almost all the country's corporations by keeping as collateral the stock bought by the workers until they can get them back with interest.

Another mistake in the Kelso program is that it suggests that it would increase the purchasing power.

We know that increasing production does not increase the purchasing power for a given production period. Consequently, stockholding workers investing money borrowed from banks would not spend this money to buy production but rather to increase it by investing into their corporation. With this increased production the purchasing power would be increasingly inadequate to buy the goods produced.

On the other hand, let us suppose that 80 million Americans each get $4,000 from banks to buy corporate stock. This would mean that additional credits amounting to $320 billion would be suddenly injected into the American economy without price control. What a disaster if protective measures as proposed by the Social Credit party were not implemented in the form of compensated discount or by decreased production costs.

Every reform presently advocated either to fight unemployment or inflation, or to promote regional development, or to reform tax legislation or to enable the workers to share in the profit and in the decision-making process of industry, in short, every reform advocated in various sectors will only be a stopgap of little effect if a rational monetary reform is not undertaken concurrently.

Everybody agrees that a monetary reform is needed, and among others Mr. Claude Lemelin who wrote in Le Devoir of May 10 last, the following and I quote:

How to avoid the recurrence of such crisis? By simply bringing about and as soon as possible a reform of the monetary system which was established a quarter of a century ago. The very minor role played by the United States in the settlement of the crisis where the dollar was yet the main currency affected, marks the end of the American monetary hegemony; it would be desirable for international monetary institutions to reflect this new reality. The terms of the Bretton Woods agreement regulating exchange rates and their fluctuations should also be made more flexible. This is what the International Monetary Fund, while the crisis abated for a year, should have started to do as early as last September when the General Assembly convened in Copenhagen. This is what the International Monetary Fund was adamant to do either through inertia or conservatism. This is why the Washington institution is now being shortcircuited by other monetary agencies.

I would like now to quote from Fortune magazine which is not a Creditiste publication. In its issue of December 1971, there is an article by a Lawrence A. Mayer entitled and I quote:

A world monetary reform: a system to be reviewed.

Speaking more specifically about special drawing rights, the writer replies to the following question:

How does the International Monetary Fund create special drawing rights?

Reply: By a stroke of the pen ... special drawing rights are entered in the books as in a bank booklet. But SDR are not money but they are used by central banks only, not by the public.

Question: How do central banks use them?

Answer: At present, for international payments between banks, but special drawing rights never leave the International Monetary Fund. The Fund only makes transfers from the account of one country to that of another country. There is, however, a great deal of discussion going on at present about expanding and changing the role of special drawing rights, which could, for instance, absorb the dollar surpluses which exist in certain countries, so that SDRs would practically replace the dollar as reserve currency.

The author then specifies that special drawing rights are not based on gold and cannot be converted into gold. Concerning gold, the following question is asked:

Question: Thus, gold will still remain the basis of the system?

Answer: Not necessarily. Theoretically, anything can be used—for instance, any other commodity or, as has been suggested by some economists, a group of commodities or a group of national currencies.

This takes us back to the proposals of the Social Credit Party according to which the present system leads to ruin, as consumers never have enough money to buy the production offered, and production never puts enough money in the hands of consumers to equal the sum of prices, considering that manufacturers have to make profits in order to invest in businesses.

But as the founder of the Social Credit Party explains, just because the profit system leads to unacceptable consequences is no valid reason for trying to abolish profits altogether. We must however seek a system which will allow for the entrepreneur or capitalist to be rewarded and which will at the same time ensure better distribution of the wealth produced.

Appearing before the MacMillan Commission in Great Britain, Mr. Douglas was saying about the effects of savings on the economy, and I quote:

The investment of funds saved means that the same amount of money is bound to reappear in a new price aggregate, so that whenever a given amount saved is re-invested, a new price aggrevate is created without a corresponding change in the purchasing power.

This is why we must find new methods of financing our business and production, because the means of financing which are presently recognized and generally accepted contribute to reduce the consumers' purchasing power and to increase their disatisfaction.

By the way, workers have come to think like members Créditistes in this respect.

In Volume 5 of the labour relations task force, prepared in 1968 Mr. Jack Chernick, from the University of New Brunswick, New Jersey, provides interesting explanations on the attitudes of labour as regards profit sharing.

First of all, about the point of view of the workers of the United States automobile industry, he said that they want the same principles applying to General Motors shareholders and officials to apply also to workers. The members of the executive of the company first of all pay themselves a basic salary and put aside the amounts to be distributed as dividends to shareholders. If profits exceed a certain yield, they receive, over and above their basic salary, a bonus proportional to the surplus profits. Sometimes, when business is really good, they will decide to distribute an extra dividend to shareholders. Consequently, the automobile workers have asked the following question:

Any reason why this calculation should not apply to employees as it does to shareholders and administrators of G.M.? Why should the workers not receive, over and above their basic earnings and other marginal benefits obtained at the bargaining table, part of such profits that their work allowed to be made?

Such questions are raised not only in the United States but in Canada. In Le Travail, which is the voice of the CNTU, one can read the following comments on the discussions held during the 1967 convention:

Everyone knows that an undertaking or an industry pays salaries to its employees and gives out dividends to its shareholders. But there is a third portion of the profits that goes neither to the first nor to the second group. That portion is simply reinvested in the company. That is what we call self-financing. The question is, should that third portion be the property of shareholders only? Should not the workers receive a part of it? That question, which is greatly discussed among non-communist French trade-unionists is most important because it opens the possibility of workers sharing in the company's decisions in the economic field.

So the Confederation of National Trade Unions wonders whether workers should not be entitled to a portion of the profits that are reinvested in undertakings. In other words, the CNTU wonders whether the enrichment of an undertaking, whether the undertaking that has become able to increase its production, to expand, to produce more, belongs only to the holders of the initial capital. The CNTU wonders whether employees are not entitled to a share of that enrichment of the undertaking. Social Credit says: Yes, workers are entitled to share in the enrichment of the undertaking.

• (2110)

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, I should like to contribute the experience of a man who has spent 25 years of his life in the labour class, as a factory employee, who has been closely involved in several discussions, experiences and conflicts, but who still has known a good many satisfactions.

The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), in his motion, is to some extent blaming this government for not having taken steps likely to have labour concerned with participation in business management.

I would like to recall, Mr. Speaker, a few experiences that I have lived in my community, a rather well-developped one—tied in with the aluminum industry—where, as many already know, pay-checks are quite fat and trade-unionism quite advanced. In recent years, the workers have tried various experiences aimed at achieving what the hon. member is wishing for and that is social peace and co-operation between capital and labour.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say incidentally that such co-operation of capital and labour, more or less questioned here, does exist. It is too easily forgotten that there are over 6 million workers in Canada and that collective agreements are being signed every day, attracting no attention precisely because they are entered into amicably, as a result of properly planned and properly implemented co-operation between groups in several sectors.

To be sure, conflicts attract more attention than anything else. This is normal. People thus tend to think that everything is going badly, that management and labour no longer agree, and that chaos prevails.

Such disagreements, of course, do occur for some groups of workers. But I must say that co-operation between capital and labour does exist in most cases, which is fortunate. It would of course be desirable that there should be 100 percent co-operation, which I personally hope will come about. But things being what they are, and man being eternally dissatisfied with himself, it is not likely that a system can one day be devised in which everything would fall perfectly into its proper place. This indeed would be too good to be true, Mr. Speaker, so that we would have to assume that we are no longer among the living.

Do Canadian workers really want to take part in the operation, the administration and the ownership of business?

I should like to mention here a number of examples I have experienced personally. Some years ago, Alcan and Price Company Limited had set a program whereby employees could buy share in these companies at a very low price.

I have personally bought shares of these companies through salary deductions. This was a scheme the companies had conceived to give their employees the possibility of buying shares at a very reasonable price. Actually, we could avail ourselves of a reduction of 15 per cent.

What was happening, Mr. Speaker? It gives an idea of the disposition that can prevail amongst an unfortunately too high percentage of workers. Most of them refused to jump at the offer, even though it was most obvious that as soon as one bought the shares one made a 15 per cent profit. All that had to be done was to buy the shares, pay for them, and upon delivery run to the bank, or to any investment dealer and sell them at a 15 per cent profit. Three quarters of the workers refused to buy shares in spite of the incentive to encourage them to do so. Not only did they refuse to purchase them, but I saw some workers relinquishing their privilege to the very ones they were regularly criticizing, that is the rich man, the influencial man in the community, the lawyer, the doctor, in short, the well-to-do. The workers were handing the certificates over to these persons enabling them to acquire share of the Aluminium Company of Canada Limited, up to 10 per cent of their wages. The professionals in the community thus made considerable profits in a relatively short period of time.

As one can see, the workers are not necessarily willing to participate in the management and ownership of the business because they fear that by being a participant, they might loose some of their freedom, the freedom to criticize the firm. It is unfortunate, but only time will enable us to make improvements in this field.

Today the worker, at least in my social class, tends to enjoy life and the maximum confort he can immediately obtain. Very often workers do not think of saving some money for a later opportunity and that for various reasons, Mr. Speaker. First, there is inflation. Today, the worker who saves $1 deprives himself of the goods he could purchase with this $1, while in 5 years time inflation will have eroded the purchasing power of his dollar and perhaps he will only be able to purchase 75 per cent of the merchandise he could have procured originally.

This is why the worker whose income is limited does not deny himself anything today in order to save because he is afraid that this saving will turn out to be a bad investment. Of course, he could invest this money and get a return that would compensate him for the loss of purchasing power. But here again—and I repeat a suggestion I have already made—the only thing in my opinion which would encourage the worker to save would be for the government to set a tax free amount of up to $500 in earned interest and dividends.

This could mean a total saving of between $5,000 and $10,000 depending on the rate of dividend or interest paid by the company where his funds are invested. This would encourage Canadians to salt away at least $10,000 and I think that a Canadian who has saved and invested that much is a more responsible citizen who demands less from the government as he knows very well that it is he who will have to foot the bill if he demands more.

I have already made this suggestion and I would like very much to see it implemented.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), obviously encourages workers to economize. Of course, when I receive dividends on shares of Canadian corporations, there is a 20 per cent tax reduction on such dividends. This is some incentive. It may not be enough, but should we go much further than this? This is a good question.

Have any serious proposals been made in order to ensure that workers have a greater share in the management and profits of businesses?

My colleague, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) said earlier that, up to a point, workers share in the profits of companies. The company which makes profits is in a position to pay higher salaries and to offer better fringe benefits. Thus workers share in profits insofar as they negotiate contract settlements and get benefits when the company can afford for them.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this is not true of all companies, and I know of several which, because of their low profits, cannot pay the very high salaries which some others pay to their employees.

• (2120)

It was reported in one of today's newspapers that workers in the Seven Islands area are, on the average, the best paid in the country, and we are glad that this is so. But it does not necessarily mean that those people enjoy a higher standard of living, because you have to take into account the high cost of living at Seven Islands, where everything has to be brought in, where practically nothing is produced and where there are great distances to be covered.

Before concluding my remarks I would like to quote some examples which have been lived, some attempts which have been made.

The government is constantly asked to take action. The Quebec government did so a few years ago. It created the General Investment Corporation in order to allow Quebec to control its own economy, and to give the people a chance to participate to a greater extent in industry, by enabling workers to become owners of their industries. We know that after five, six or seven years, the General Investment Corporation has practically ended up as a failure.

Is this attributable to bad administration or to errors by those who headed this business? Possibly.

Is it also due to our lack of business experience or to the lack of industrial knowledge of a certain part of the Quebec population? This is also possible.

I think that the establishment and evolution of an industrial approach is something which takes many years to realize. We certainly will have to wait for several years to achieve this goal, as has been the case in other countries such as England, Germany, or even in Ontario where industry has been established for a longer period than in Quebec.

Lately, experiments have been carried out in the Saguenay region. I am referring for instance to the Couture concern, a casting and machine shop, whose workers decided to acquire the plant by setting up a kind of co-operative at a time when the management was in some trouble. The outfit seem to operate well for the time being, and I only hope that this experiment will be conclusive, that it will be pursued and prove successful, for I believe that it is a kind of experiment which must be tried.

In conclusion, I should like to mention that through its legislation, the government has allowed many such experiments to materialize. One has only to think about the Department of Regional Economic Expansion headed by the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand), and which now provides incentives to small and average concerns, thus allowing many to start, many others to expand, either in Quebec, in the Maritimes or elsewhere in Canada.

These are concrete incentives which enable workers to start businesses, to own, and manage them, to work there and make profits.

I think that governments cannot solve all problems. A government is a group of men with all their good and bad points, without inborn knowledge, and who cannot run everything. I believe that it is from the people themselves that most solutions must come, and workers, in Quebec or elsewhere, can become the owners of an increasing number of firms as long as they are willing to practice self-discipline, save, invest and get assistance from the various levels of government.

If we are really to find again the social balance some claim we have lost—although I do not agree that the disorder, is as serious as some claim—I feel that the only way to do so is through fundamental participation to the creation of jobs, the setting up of enterprises. We will then have greater social participation and better distribution of the benefits that can be assured by the sound evolution of our economy.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I think that we have held today one of the most interesting debates judging by the full significance of the speeches delivered on both sides of this House. I would say that most speakers have readily approved the motion put by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), except for a few doubts raised here and there by some members.

As I will probably be the last member to speak today I would like to make a review of those speeches.

The representative of the New Democratic Party has shown that he does not know much about the principle of workers holding shares in a business. He feels that the worker's only safeguard lies in the employer state or the master state. He does not realize that the worker is as intelligent as the industrialist or any politician or government official in a socialist or totalitarian government.

According to the spokesman for the New Democratic Party, the only solution would be a socialist government vested with full authority to control industry throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe Canadians are prepared to accept such a system in their country. Some government corporations, such as the Canadian National and many others which could be enumerated, come up, at the end of each fiscal year, with balance sheets showing deficits instead of profits.

Similar corporations, privately owned, such as the Canadian Pacific, for instance, involved in transport like the Canadian National, produce each year a balance sheet showing profits.

Many such examples could be given, demonstrating that share-holders and workers in private enterprise in Canada show much more initiative and have participated in the success of each business.

If instead of fighting so often in a void labour unions had fought with the goal of obtaining shares for labour in businesses, we should not now be facing the problem of inflation and most workers would be share-holders, instead of proletarians.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) is concerned about labour-management negotiations. Even if workers became share-holders, I am convinced that they would still need to group themselves in unions in order to be represented at negotiations, which would remain quite as necessary as they are now, but would be much more effective. Such bargaining would provide working standards and the employee would practically be his own employer since he would be sharing in profits, thus becoming much more interested in the undertaking where he works.

The minister is also wondering how it would be possible to establish standards for holidays, employment security and retirement pensions.

• (2130)

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is much difference between the stock purchasing system and the existing system.

I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) is much more aware of the labour problems than he let on this afternoon. The minister fears also for the public sector. He sees quite clearly that in the private enterprise, workers will get a better deal through higher wages and greater business returns. He sees that workers in the private sector will be receiving higher incomes than public servants. Therefore, the minister seems to fear that it will be difficult for the public service to find the needed staff to make up the establishment.

Mr. Speaker, should the worker stock purchasing program take hold, we would see less competition for public service jobs and political patronage would have much less grasp over these people. The governments will only have to adapt themselves to the private enterprise instead of, as is the case today, the private enterprise having to adapt to the public service.

The minister also fears for some firms that show an adverse balance and are facing bankruptcy. The fact that the worker will be able to share in the firm's profits, will be a profitable incentive, and even the firm will benefit from it.

I am thinking of some mining industries, and in particular the NORMETAL mine, where miners receive a salary on an hourly basis and, in addition, a bonus every two weeks for the work done, according to the production volume. So, if production has increased, the bonus is higher. Miners are thus encouraged to produce more, and if a miner lags behind, it is not the foreman or the boss who will warn him, but the other miners.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, under a system of stock purchase by workers, the problems of unprofitable businesses would be negligible.

Today, because of the pressure exerted by companies, the government grants many tax exemptions which benefit to shareholders. The workers have only a slightly better chance of getting a job and paying taxes to the government to compensate for losses incurred because of tax exemptions granted to these companies. Under a stock purchase program for workers, the latter would receive their share of the tax exemptions.

Moreover, the grants awarded by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion would also benefit the workers. Today, most undertakings depend on "social welfare" grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Still, who is benefiting? The undertakings! The worker gets nothing. All he can do is work in order to pay his taxes and replenish the consolidated revenue fund of Canada so that other grants may be awarded to corporations which will employ other workers.

In other words, this means that you work now and pay later.

Another interesting example is forest resources development. If workers participated in this system under a stock-purchase plan, lumbermen could buy free of sales taxes the tools that they need in their work such as chainsaws, steel-cap shoes, security hats, and what have you.

Today, whereas the contractor is entitled to tax exemptions, the worker must pay federal and provincial taxes on his tools.

Miners, for instance, could become important and valuable shareholders of their companies. Most of those who work for 15, 20 or 25 years in the same mine or for the same company lose their health in the process. And when they retire, they have practically no savings to speak of because they have had too much to pay in taxes. As a result, these workers are very often dependant on the public.

On the contrary, under a capital sharing system, retired miners would at least have shares to sell at a profit, and those moving into early retirement would have savings on which to live pending the receipt of their first Old Age Security Pension cheque.

Generally speaking, people say that capital is some sort of accumulated work. However, since no one can do everything, some people work while others accumulate. The Social Credit Party wants all workers to become capitalists so that they may own something.

It is with this in mind that the hon. member for Kamouraska introduced this motion we have before us today, and we urge the government and the House to examine it carefully.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to sincerely congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) for the motion which he introduced and which reads as follows:

> That this House deplores the fact that the Government has not adopted the appropriate measures for involving workers in Canadian firms through profit-sharing and stock purchase programs as a means of promoting social stability, reinforcing our country's economy and ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour.

A quick look at statistics, Mr. Speaker, would show that the business concerns in which profit sharing and co-management prevail are few and far between. Even if the results obtained to this day are not very conclusive, I think that we should encourage both management and labour to work toward the establishment of profit sharing and co-management programs.

I think that it would be appropriate to make a thorough study of this formula and to make every effort to find mechanisms which would make it of simple and easy application as well as interesting for both parties.

The Canadian government has never, paid much attention or given much importance to profit sharing plans. As we all know, the Department of Labour, when making its yearly investigations on the working conditions prevailing throughout the country, has at one time gathered and published some information on profit sharing plans, but it has given up this practice since 1954.

• (2140)

For his part, the Minister of Finance has not encouraged enough this form of participation, judging by the new Income Tax Act.

In the present Income Tax Act passed last December, Division D dealing with deferred and other special income arrangements is not very helpful to the members of these sharing plans, except for that subsection 5 of section 144 allows an employer to deduct from his income the amounts paid to a trustee. On the other hand, the capital gains of such a trustee and the amounts received by the beneficiaries from the trustee, if they derive from capital gains from the said trustee, are taxable. Moreover, the amounts that a worker withdraws under a supplementary unemployment benefit plan, are regarded as income and are therefore taxable, according to subsection 3 of section 145 of the Income Tax Act.

Pension funds to which employers contribute part of their profits are also a form of profit sharing known as deferred profit sharing.

The present legislation does not do much to promote such a policy, particularly when profit sharing plans are set up in favour of workers who are also shareholders. The tax reform has squeezed those profit sharing plans. It is known that most businesses which set up such plans are mainly family businesses and that often members of the same family sit on board of directors of the company.

In his analysis of the white paper on taxation which was published under the title "The Benson Iceberg", Mr. I. H. Asper specifies that the Department of National Revenue, more than a year before the tabling of the white paper, had refused to accept the registration of those pension schemes designed for the benefit of employees who are also shareholders in the business.

As a consequence, these business are denied the tax rebates granted to businesses having pension funds. Would the same rules apply in the case of profit sharing by all the employees? This is an interesting question to which the minister should give an answer. Otherwise, it should be said that the government policy is to treat profit sharing plans unfairly.

Before the tax reform, businesses which had employee profit sharing plans were penalized by being denied tax rebates granted to other businesses.

[Mr. Rodrigue.]

I am quoting the following from Mr. Asper:

> The new legislation is maintaining this discrimination. Furthermore, it is forbidding trustees of those pension funds to invest funds in shares, bonds or debentures of the employer's businesses.

In conclusion, Mr. Asper says:

> In many cases, this discriminatory step will deprive small businesses from an important source of liquidities.

In Canada, there is no organized movement to promote the association of capital and labour. There are, of course, a limited number of experiences of associations of some kind or other, that are more or less authentic, but the phenomenon is not widespread; it is almost unheard of. The vast majority of Canadian businesses are of the traditional capitalistic type and working for wages is the almost universal system across Canada.

Profit-sharing is the only form of association that enjoys even a minimum of popularity in Canada.

One of the most dependable sources of information is doubtless the Council of Profit Sharing Industries. This organization has, amongst its Canadian members, a firm of professional advisers who specialize in giving technical assistance to those who wish to set up a profit-sharing plan.

The same organization is much more specific in its statistics and closely sticks to reality, when referring to profit-sharing experiences with deferred distribution.

In its brief submitted on March 9 1956 to the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects, it suggests that there are in the country 150 such cases at the most, among which about a hundred only are recognized by the federal government for income tax purposes as pension funds. The other fifty come under section 79 of the Income Tax Act. The Council bitterly points out that the hundred cases recognized by the government only represent 7 or 8 per cent of the aggregate pension schemes recognized by the Canadian government, while in the United States that percentage reaches 35 per cent, that is about 8,000 out of 28,000 as of December 31, 1955.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the present economy could not be converted into a sharing economy without major changes in our way of seeing things and expressing them in economic terms.

In the face of powerful industrial monopolies, pursuing the accumulation of gains much more than the common good, we may certainly wonder whether they are really exercising rights of ownership.

Socialists seize this opportunity to call for nationalization of major firms, as if the fact of replacing the industrial monopoly with a state monopoly would correct the monopolistic nature of the enterprise. Will the worker, depersonalized and having become number 253 employed by Capital-Anonymous Company, cease to be No. 253 punching the same clock, doing the same work, when the shares have been purchased by the state? Taxpayers will have paid for this purchase and will not draw one cent in dividends.

Something else is needed.

In the magazine Jeune Patron of May 1951, Mr. Alexandre Dubois, an employer himself, son, grandson and great-grandson of an employer, wrote an article that many would find bold, under the heading "Moving ahead of the capitalist undertaking." He begins with this revolutionary sentence: "Enterprise is not ownership."

He explains:

In our opinion enterprise is not an object which can be owned. Man can own things. Enterprise is not a thing, it is an act. To undertake is to act.

—An enterprise is not a property, that is, it does not belong to anybody but is common to many once it is launched into the economy. Everyone is free to undertake, but he is no longer the master of the enterprise he has created when others have participated in it through their labour, their capital, their payments for services rendered—

So Mr. Dubois sees in the enterprise far more than mere investment. Capital investment does not confer sovereign and exclusive rights, especially not in the case of an expanded enterprise which has become a giant, through self-financing and reinvesting of the benefits included in its prices and taken from the public."

If financial interests were a true representation of reality, if a social organization were to automatically issue new credit to finance any new industry, it would not be necessary to put an end to the rule of capital and this evil would not exist then.

Money-capital would arise as technicians and skilled workers would undertake and carry on the development of raw materials and natural resources of this country. And this capital would be controlled by those who thus create a new wealth.

The present method used to finance a new industry or expand an existing business, entails two undesirable results: first of all, it alters the balance between prices and the purchasing power, since it adds to the cost of production the cost of an increasing production capacity; also, it enables whoever owns capital to increase his assets at the expense of consumers who have to pay for it. So you have, on the one hand, always a fewer owners with bigger and bigger properties and, on the other hand, an increasing number of proletarians who can live only with the permission and under the thumb of the former.

This is an inhuman lot that would be easy to change gradually but quickly by applying a financial system in accordance with facts.

Now is the time to apply the principles of sound finance. This is a development, therefore new wealth. If we wish to finance it through money already in circulation, we prevent money from buying products already on the market.

Any new production must be financed through new credits just as any destruction of wealth should lead to a corresponding cancellation of credit.

Therefore, it is the national credit agency which grants money according to the development of the country.

If finance is considered as an accounting of facts, there is no further financial obstacle to physically possible achievements. It is also easy to have finance as a servant of the workers as much as of the first shareholders.

Therefore, the workers could gradually become co-owners of the business which is their employer. The more the business would expand, the quicker this accessibility would be. Instead of increasing the number of proletarians, the growing industries would free the worker from his proletarian status.

Co-operative management of big industry would be taken over from the "money men" without trouble, confiscation or nationalization.

Naturally, none of this will be possible until such time as the necessary changes have been made in our present financial system.

At the present time, finance has no close or constant link with reality. Wealth is created without money being created. Wealth disappears without money disappearing. Some people create wealth: others create money and appropriate it for themselves.

As long as that confusion reigns, it will be useless to seek logical solutions anywhere, for finance acts as the policy everywhere.

One change is imperative: we must set aside the present method of putting out money and recalling money and credit; let the government take over the control of the creation of money and credit, according to the proposals of the Social Credit Party of Canada.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION—SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we were all shocked to hear about the tragic death by suicide on June 6, 1972, of an unfortunate 35-year old Polish woman and mother, Alicia Wiercioch, who was under a deportation order, having lost her appeal before the Immigration Appeal Board on March 15 last.

As is the case with so many other people, she was so favourably impressed by the quality of life in this country that she decided to take the necessary steps to obtain landed-immigrant status. But various unfortunate circumstances and misunderstandings finally led to her despair and, eventually, to an untimely and tragic death. What a sad end in Canada to this visitor who only four years ago was filled with so much hope for a new and better life! This tragedy, as well as other near-tragedies and hardships of people who have to deal with our immigration and deportation laws and regulations, has finally given a sense of urgency and gravity to a review of the laws and regulations now being carried out by the department.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

It is regrettable that the House did not grant me, on June 7, unanimous consent to move my motion as follows:

That the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower, and Immigration investigate the circumstances of the suicide of Alicia Wiercioch, who was ordered deported by the Immigration Appeal Board, and that the committee review the Immigration Appeal Board Act and related federal legislation and regulations and consider amendments to these and other acts as necessary.

From newspaper articles in the past few days it should be clear that the many statements, allegations and accusations that have been reported call for an investigation of this case. I join many of my colleagues in this House and members of the public who have, in their statements in the past week, called for changes in the laws and regulations regarding deportation and immigration matters. It is not right to enforce impractical and harsh laws or regulations. I believe that justice should be tempered with mercy and compassion, and these should guide our decisions. There are often complex circumstances in the life of a human being, and these should be taken into account, especially by those in positions of responsibility.

In view of the tragic death of Alicia Wiercioch and the many complaints from potential immigrants and their sponsors, and especially in view of the hardship resulting from long delays before hearings are brought before the Immigration Appeal Board, I believe the government should give immediate attention to making the necessary changes in proposing to Parliament appropriate amendments to our laws governing immigration and deportation so that all these hardships will be removed.

I would also like to stress the need and importance of improved communication between government agencies and the public. Where indicated, adequate interpretation and counselling services should be clearly offered and readily provided. Instructions printed in many languages in information bulletins such as, for example, in the ethnic press, would greatly assist in providing better communication. I believe that this House and the nation are impatiently awaiting prompt action by the government in matters of immigration and deportation regulations.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for the manner in which he has pursued this matter from the outset and used all the channels open to him. As you are aware, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) earlier today spoke on this subject in an effort to clear the record.

In case some members were not present at the time, I will try, in the limited time available to me, to set out the facts of this tragic case. The straight, unembellished facts are that Mrs. Wiercioch came to Canada on August 19, 1968, for a six-month visit with a distant relative. Shortly after arrival, on September 30, 1968, she applied for permanent landing.

At the time of this application, as is customary, she was asked to sign and did acknowledge in writing her understanding that she could not work in Canada without the written authorization of an immigration officer. When first interviewed on October 10, 1968, Mrs. Wiercioch informed the officials that her husband and two children would be able to go for a trip to one of the European countries where they would apply for political asylum. She stated that her husband had given permission for her to come to Canada and he wanted to join her. She was therefore supplied with immigration application forms for forwarding to and completion by her husband. In early January, 1969, Mrs. Wiercioch brought in the completed forms and her husband's employment reference as an engineer.

At this stage the matter of the examination of the family overseas to determine their ability to meet normal immigration requirements appears to have run into some difficulties. When she was again interviewed on November 25, 1969, she stated that she believed her husband wanted a divorce but that she would still wish to bring out the children. It was then that she disclosed that she had been working without permission. Because Mrs. Wiercioch had effectively disqualified herself from the benefits of that part of the immigration regulations which provide for the admission as immigrants of non-immigrants applying within Canada, the application was refused. She was then given the opportunity to leave Canada voluntarily but she decided, instead, to come before a special immigration inquiry.

At the inquiry, which took place on September 24, 1970, she was ordered deported—basically because she had taken employment here without the authorization of an immigration officer. As is well known, she then appealed to the Immigration Appeal Board, and on March 15, 1972, the appeal board, having found no evidence that she would be persecuted if returned to Poland, dismissed the appeal and directed that she be removed from Canada as soon as practicable.

On March 30, 1972, the department was informed that her counsel had filed a notice of motion on her behalf with the Federal Court of Appeal seeking time within which to appeal the board's decision. Following this notice of motion, as the House has already been informed on previous occasions, all further departmental action respecting Mrs. Wiercioch was immediately suspended and the department received no further communication from her or her counsel until her untimely death.

As the minister pointed out earlier, the refusal of her application was necessary under the existing legislation because she had disqualified herself as an applicant in Canada by taking employment without authorization. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) must by now be aware of all this from the minutes of the appeal board hearing which I understand were forwarded to him last week. I think it is to his credit that he has asked for as much information as possible, and I am sorry that time does not permit me to complete the answer.

POST OFFICE—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO IMPROVE SERVICE IN RURAL MANITOBA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the deteriorating postal services in rural Manitoba and especially in my home constituency of Lisgar. This is a subject which I have brought to the attention of the minister and his parliamentary secretary both by letter and in the question period, yet it seems that they are ignoring my complaints.

In a question to the parliamentary secretary some time ago, I pointed out that our local postal service left much to be desired in terms of efficiency, and in his response he denied the premise of the question. I find his attitude toward this problem quite extraordinary. I have had dozens of letters on this matter from my constituents—businessmen, housewives and farmers. The parliamentary secretary might note that I have even had complaints from his own constituency which is adjacent to mine. Could it be that the hon. gentleman is not only ignoring my complaints on the matter but is ignoring also the complaints of his own constituents?

I hope in his reply tonight the hon. member will not once again deny that the postal service is deteriorating. I will not accept this because I know that our postal service is not what it should be in Manitoba. It is my contention that the Post Office has sacrificed its service to rural points in order to streamline its urban services. I submit that the Post Office should not be allowed to create priorities as to which areas should receive better service than others. This is not in the spirit or tradition of our postal service. My point is, that despite theories of rationalization of postal services, cost-cutting and other similar programs, every citizen of this country is entitled as a right to have prompt, efficient postal service the same as we have grown accustomed to over the years.

Now, what is the problem in rural Manitoba? It is simple. It is taking twice or three times as long as it should for letters to reach their destination. I could list dozens of examples. One constituent of mine had advertisement letters sent out within a 60-mile radius ten days before a sale in his business. Most of the letters arrived after the sale was over. He thus incurred a large loss of potential business, plus considerable postal costs which were also lost.

I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, another example of our poor postal service—two letters addressed to the same firm in Winnipeg, from Carman, Manitoba: one was sent on May 13 and the other on May 26. They both arrived on May 29. These letters contained important business documents. I hope the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) and his parliamentary secretary realize the ramifications of such poor service. Business which relies on efficient service suffers accordingly. If the parliamentary secretary wishes, I will give him dozens of examples; but they are all the same.

The parliamentary secretary cannot deny the premise because, as I have said, I have ample evidence that postal services are in fact deteriorating. The minister at times seems incapable or careless about how the Post Office is run. I would urge him once again to contact his departmental officials in Winnipeg and find out where the troubled spots are and rectify them as soon as possible.

Until recently, Canada has enjoyed one of the most efficient postal services in the world. This is rightly so. A country as vast as Canada needs a highly efficient postal service. Our citizens and businesses have grown accustomed to this good service. This is the standard which we are used to and it is the standard which should be maintained.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make two points. The first is that my constituents—and the parliamentary secretary's constituents, for that matter—will not accept statements that the Post Office is running as efficiently as ever. This we know not to be true and we will not accept it. My second point is that no matter what excuse the hon. gentleman is likely to give, as long as it is an excuse it is not acceptable. There should be a common standard of postal service in this country: it is a prime element of business efficiency and this common standard of postal service should be available to every citizen as a right no matter where he lives.

Now that I have made these points, Mr. Speaker, I will give the floor to the hon. gentleman because I am very interested in hearing what he has to say.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member, after asking his original question and raising this subject, did not see fit to present to the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) or his parliamentary secretary concrete evidence to substantiate the kind of complaint he has registered. Anyone can get up and say that the post office service is bad—

An hon. Member: Are you doubting his word?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That's typical Liberal arrogance.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, apparently hon. members do not want to hear the facts; they are drowning-out my words with the noise they are making.

An hon. Member: Wake up.

Mr. Cullen: I am merely saying that it would have been better if the hon. member had presented to the parliamentary secretary or the Postmaster General specific examples and specific evidence relating to his complaints. These could have been investigated. When the parliamentary secretary hears complaints like that, he brings them to the attention of the minister. That is what the hon. member ought to have done, instead of making these charges.

The Post Office Department has conducted an intensive study of rural mail delivery service in Lisgar. The quality-assurance investigation was extended to every village and municipality in the constituency, and no delays in the delivery service were found. As of June 5, 1972, this study was enlarged to encompass surrounding constituencies. A report from the investigative team on service in these areas should be ready in the coming weeks.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that it is virtually impossible to verify delays in postal delivery service in any given locality unless specific cases are given, so that they may be traced. This the hon. member has not seen fit to do; he has simply generalized. Some people do not always get mail in time and some businesses do not always get it either. It would have been better if the hon. member had done a little homework and research, if he wanted to help the Post Office Department, and not hinder it. The frequency of postal service in rural areas is determined by a set of guidelines. These are the same for all Canada.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—GRANT OFFERED TO MANIWAKI FOREST PRODUCTS—NEW JOBS TO BE CREATED

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on June 6 the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) issued one of his regular news releases announcing offers of grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act. Part of the news release relating to an offer reads as follows:

> Maniwaki Forest Products Ltd. of Montreal has accepted an offer of approximately $181,000 for a new veneer facility at Maniwaki. The project is expected to create an estimated 74 jobs. The incentive is based on a rate of 15 per cent of the approved capital costs, estimated at $472,000, plus $1,500 for each job created.

A little arithmetic will show that 15 per cent of $472,000, the approved capital cost, comes to a little over $70,000, and 74 times $1,500, the amount for each job expected, equals $111,000. The two amounts added together equal $181,000. I want to make it clear at the outset that I am quite aware that the community of Maniwaki has encountered serious problems. I sympathize with it and think a good case can be made for public assistance to that community through a number of means. I want to make it clear that I recognize the particular problems that community faces, as I have said.

I am not dealing with this matter merely because it affects Maniwaki, and I would not want anyone to think that I am particularly talking about Maniwaki or any firm in Maniwaki. I intend to approach this matter from the standpoint of the broader policy and legal questions involved which have come to light as a result of this case. My cause for concern came about as a result of a news story which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 8. I raised the matter on a question of privilege the same day, and the government was aware of my concern about this matter one week ago. Today I asked a question in the House about this matter. The news story in the Ottawa Journal of June 8 in part reads as follows:

> Maniwaki mayor Louis-Pierre Larocque welcomed the announcement of a $181,000 federal government grant to Maniwaki Forest Products as 'good news for the town,' but plant manager Antonio Cuccaro said the number of employees would not be increased as a result.
> • (2210)
>
> Mr. Cuccaro said most of the money would probably be used to modernize the wood veneer plant.
>
> "We'll replace our outdated machinery," he said, "and we'll still operate on a one-shift basis with our 74 employees."
>
> Mr. Cuccaro said the company did not plan to increase production with its new machinery.
> "The number of employees will remain the same for some time," he added.

Today I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he would investigate this particular grant in view of the fact the grant was supposed to be for new jobs while the manager of the plant suggested the number of employees would not be increased. In his reply the minister indicated that he had looked into the matter. His answer was that if a grant had not been given, the plant would have closed and there would now be 170 less jobs in existence in that community. The grant corresponded to creating 170 jobs, as I understood the minister.

I have no doubt that there were problems facing this industry. The minister may very well be right when he states that without assistance this plant may not have stayed in operation. I have no idea where he got the figure of 170, since the reference in the official report is to 74. I note in the news story that in 1970 this plant had 180 employees. Perhaps that explains the minister's reference. It seems that he is getting his figures mixed up.

As a result of the answer given by the minister, in which he gave no explanation for this problem concerning the creation of jobs, I asked whether he had investigated the extension of grants under this legislation where new jobs were not being created but existing jobs were simply being maintained. The minister said that the legal advisers in his department said everything was all right. He turned down my request to ask the Department of Justice and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) for a legal opinion on this matter. This raises some very serious matters, first from the viewpoint of legislation. After all, the minister does have authority within the terms of the legislation: section 5(2) of the Regional Development Incentives Act clearly states as follows:

> The amount of a secondary development incentive shall be based on the approved capital costs of establishing or expanding the facility in respect of which the secondary development incentive is authorized and on the number of jobs created directly in the operation and shall not exceed
> (a) 5 per cent of those approved capital costs, plus
> (b) $5,000 for each job determined by the Minister to have been directly in the operation.

When referring to the creation of jobs, I have always understood the term "create" to mean to bring into being. What we are doing here is maintaining a status quo. That is not creating jobs. There may be a case for providing some assistance to an industry in trouble: in fact, that is provided for in section 5 where a primary development incentive grant may be given simply on the basis of certain capital expenditures and is not tied to employment in any way. However, the minister cannot claim that jobs are being created on the basis that he set out with regard to the case that I raised today.

I asked how many of the 58,000 jobs which he estimated have been created under this industrial incentives program are on the same basis. They are not new jobs at all; they are simply salvaging jobs in industries which are in trouble. In some instances there may be a case for providing assistance. If we want to maintain existing industries and tie this to employment maintenance, there should be a clearcut policy in this regard: the legislation should spell that our clearly. However, the minister should not be in a position of contravening legislation, as could very well happen in the case which I raised today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member undoubtedly knows, Sogefor, the previous owner of the Maniwaki veneer plant, publicly announced its intention to close the plant in December, 1970. In February, 1971, Maniwaki Forest Products applied for incentive assistance, indicating a willingness to purchase the assets of the Sogefor plant in an arm's length transaction and an intention to introduce changes which would make the operation viable in the long run. The company also indicated a willingness to reopen the plant on a reduced scale as quickly as possible in order to offset almost immediately, if in a limited way, the effect on employment of the previous closure. It proceeded to acquire the assets and reopened the plant on June 1, 1971, having obtained from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion an understanding that these actions would not prejudice its application for assistance.

Evaluation of the viability of the project was somewhat delayed because of time required to assess the implications of the detailed plans for changes in the operation. When the evaluation had been completed, an offer of incentive assistance was made. It is this offer that was recently accepted and announced.

In the view of the department, all the actions taken were in accordance with the provisions of the law and the intentions of Parliament at the time it was passed. It is clear that these actions, which helped greatly to offset the effects of the closing and which should make it possible for the plant to continue on a viable basis, were highly desirable. If any member of this House thinks otherwise, I suggest he discuss the matter with the people of Maniwaki.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST THAT MINISTER MAKE STATEMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I meant to put a question to the Minister of Labour or the Acting Minister, but since both are absent, I shall put it to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could he give any information concerning the situation which exists at the port of Montreal, and does he anticipate any possibility of a settlement?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no reports later than those given to the House yesterday by the Minister of Labour who I thought made it quite clear where the responsibility lies. He is doing his best to get each of the parties concerned to live up to their obligations. I hope he also has the support of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Since the Minister of Labour has not yet come back to the House—probably because he is being held by official duties—I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Minister of Labour will take part in the debate on the motion now before us, and whether he thinks that his colleague will make a statement likely to make the people aware of the situation which exists at the port of Montreal?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thought the Minister of Labour answered the questions very clearly and quite adequately yesterday, and I am sure he will respond again on other occasions.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS BILL—SUGGESTED PROVISION FOR MAJORITY OF CANADIANS ON BOARDS OF DIRECTORS AND COMPLIANCE WITH CORPORATE BEHAVIOUR RULES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Following the announcement in the Ontario legislature yesterday that the Ontario government intends to take steps to ensure greater Canadian control of foreign-owned firms, and the announcement made yesterday in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs by the chairman of that committee that the minister would be working this weekend on amendments to the foreign takeovers bill, will the minister now assure the House that among the amendments he will bring before us next week will be one to make it mandatory for foreign-owned firms in Canada to have 51 per cent Canadian membership on their boards of directors?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. I explained that. I have given the reason why we thought as a general approach the screening method for takeovers was more realistic and more meaningful than a general automatic rule of Canadian participation. As a government we have explained ourselves fully on that. The hon. member is aware, however, that in Bill C-201, among the factors to be considered in the case of takeovers is Canadian participation, so obviously then participation is not pushed aside as meaningless by the government. What the Premier of Ontario did yesterday shows how right the Prime Minister was when he said that if some provinces feel that Bill C-201 does not go far enough they can always add to it. That is obviously what the Premier of Ontario is doing at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has answered that he does not intend to provide any such 51 per cent requirement. Would he, then, consider another amendment, namely, that all foreign-owned corporations operating in Canada must act in accordance with a fixed set of rules for good corporate behaviour formulated by the federal government, failure to comply with which would result in sanctions?

Mr. Pepin: We already have a set of guidelines for good corporate behaviour, though they do not enjoy the status my hon. friend would like. We have a number of these rules for good corporate behaviour, they were proclaimed in 1967 by one of my predecessors who was then Minister of Trade. These automatic rules by which one prescribes for example 51 per cent of the board of directors must be domiciled in Canada, and so on, are possibly useful rules—I am not denying that—but as I pointed out in the House in the course of my speech on second reading of Bill C-201, it is possible to find ways of getting around these rules and making them, in effect, meaningless. I am not saying they are not useful. I am just saying, as I said previously, that to us the screening method for takeovers is more realistic.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby for a supplementary, but hon. members may feel we are anticipating an order of the day. Hon. members are aware that this subject is due to come up for discussion next week. I would think that would be the time at which to engage in the debate in which we appear to be engaging now.

Mr. Broadbent: Bearing in mind the minister's feeling that none of these amendments would give greater substance to the bill, and his comments with reference to the action of the Ontario government, may I ask whether the federal government has decided, because of the high concentration of industry in the province of Ontario, that one province, namely, Ontario, is going to establish a national strategy with respect to Canadian industrial development.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that is argument and confirms my suggestion a moment ago that we were engaging in debate.

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS BILL—REASON FOR VISIT OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE TO TORONTO

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether the visit of the Minister of National Revenue to Toronto today and the meetings which I believe he is holding with the Ontario government are part of the consultative process in which he is engaged in connection with Bill C-201? Or did the visit come about as a result of the developments yesterday in Toronto?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It is my understanding that the Minister of National Revenue is in Toronto on a mission of consultation. He has visited most of the governments in the eastern part of the country. He is now in Toronto. I hope he will be visiting all the provincial governments to ascertain their reaction to Bill C-201 and that we shall receive, as we expect, very close co-operation from the provinces.

Mr. Burton: Bearing in mind the content of the Gray report which was tabled in the House, and the approach taken to Bill C-201, can the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether the Minister of National Revenue is now acting as a consultant to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or is he acting as a consultant to the government of Ontario?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are getting somewhat far from the original question. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal for a supplementary and perhaps we should then allow the hon. member for Shefford to ask his question.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I shall attempt to return to the subject and be in order, Mr. Speaker. When does the Minister of National Revenue expect to complete his round of visits to the provinces in order that he can give the evidence we are expecting about provincial reaction before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Legal Affairs?

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Sharp: I will check with my colleague. I know he has been very actively engaged. I have had some informal talks with him and I gather there has been a very co-operative attitude on the part of the provincial governments he has visited so far. On the basis of my own conversations with the Ontario government, I expect the same reaction there.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—INQUIRY RESPECTING POSSIBLE INTERVENTION OF QUEBEC MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister.

This morning on the news the Quebec Minister of Labour, Mr. Cournoyer, announced that he intended to intervene as soon as possible in the longshoremen's strike. Is the Acting Prime Minister aware of offers made by the Quebec Minister of Labour in order to settle this dispute which has been going on for too long already?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this but I do understand that the Minister of Labour may be here today and will be able to answer these questions.

IMMIGRATION

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT REGARDING INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO ACT—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE INQUIRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and all related functionaries, may I put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement made yesterday by the minister regarding the Wiercioch case, in light of the statement made by his predecessor, the present Minister of Justice, in Montreal last December that he had no real control over his far-flung network of offices and officers and that there is often a difference between official policy and what happens in the field, and in light of the fact that for the last two sessions there was a note that legislation would be introduced to amend the Immigration Act, which note has not appeared this session, has the government now abandoned any intention to legislate in regard to this very difficult matter and is it going to continue to act by executive decree and ministerial bull in regard to these problems?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I understood the statement of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, what he wanted to ensure was that the present legislation is carried out in the spirit as well as in the letter of the law. With this I entirely agree, and I am sure that that would be the view of my hon.

friend. The government has not abandoned its effort to amend the legislation but, as the hon. member knows, this is one of the most difficult, delicate and complicated matters that can be put before any government. We are very anxious that our immigration laws should continue to be liberal in the best meaning of that word.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I will reject the opportunity to make the obvious statement, but I should like to ask the minister this question. In light of the fact that this is a very important and sensitive matter and that the people of Canada have a vested interest in it, acting through their representatives, would he discuss with his colleagues a review of their decision so the matter might be brought before a parliamentary committee and/or dealt with by way of legislation, as otherwise there would appear to be a rejection of the right of Parliament to deal with this matter?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I deny the allegation made in that assertion. The Parliament of Canada has approved laws which are now in effect. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration is trying to ensure that they are carried out effectively throughout the whole of Canada and by all the bureaucracy. The government has been considering this matter, I am quite free to say, over a period of many months. It is extremely complicated and difficult, and I would be much more anxious to get the right answer than to rush the process.

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF APPEAL BOARD MEMBERS BECAUSE OF REASON GIVEN FOR REFUSING APPLICATION TO REMAIN IN CANADA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Acting Prime Minister ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to read the judgment of the Immigration Appeal Board which sets out the facts and the reason why the immigrant in question was not permitted to remain in Canada? The judgment sets out very clearly that the person in question was refused admittance because of her ambition to have a job and work in Canada. Will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who said he had misinformation from his department, take steps to remove the Immigration Appeal Board members and bring about the liberal interpretation he has been talking about?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In reviewing this matter would the government take a look at the white paper published by the government in 1966 which contains several recommendations regarding improvement of the legislation that have not yet been brought before the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

AIR TRANSPORT

HIJACKING—CANADIAN POSITION ON REQUEST THAT UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL ACT—REQUEST FOR OUTLAWING OF BLACKMAIL PAYMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What attitude is Canada taking in reference to the prospective submission to the United Nations Security Council of the question of hijacking? What are the expectations of any action being taken by the Security Council having regard to the divided opinion among several members of that council?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House of Commons the other day, the Canadian government would be very happy if this matter were brought before the Security Council. We are not members, but in general we have been supporting the idea. We also support action by ICAO, where we are represented, and where we believe that action which might be even more effective could be taken. I think the prospects are not too good, but we are still hopeful that some action will be taken because we would like some declaration by the United Nations or its principal agency that hijacking must be dealt with effectively and enlisting the support of all countries to deal effectively with hijackers by making sure they are brought to justice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whether or not the Security Council will act, of course, is very problematical, and it is almost impossible to anticipate favourable action. Having regard to the fact that there are deep fears of hijacking among passengers using aircraft in Canada and that each nation should take individual action in that international action is difficult, will the minister give consideration to having brought before the House before the adjournment an amendment to the law to provide that ransom or blackmail payments shall not be paid, thereby removing the incentive of the highly attractive remunerative opportunities which seem available to hijackers today?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I ought to preface my answer to that question by saying that Canada will be ratifying the international convention on hijacking now that the legislation has been approved. I expect this will be done on Monday. I have signed the necessary papers.

As to the second question of whether one can effectively legislate against blackmail, this is a problem with which the right hon. gentleman, I am sure, has been familiar in his practice. I think it is virtually impossible to prevent people from making payments in order to save the lives of those they love.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there are many laws that are virtually incapable of full enforcement, but does the minister not consider that the removal of the incentive of potential gain under the law would certainly reduce the probability of many hijacking operations such as are taking place today? Would the minister say whether this matter has ever been considered instead of giving an offhand opinion such as the one he has just given?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I greatly respect the views of the right hon. gentleman in this field. He has obviously had much more experience in these matters than I, and I respect his judgment. From time to time we have looked at the general question, and undoubtedly we will have to look at it again in light of recent events.

HIJACKING—REQUEST THAT DISCIPLINARY ACTION NOT BE TAKEN AGAINST PILOTS WHO MAY BOYCOTT CERTAIN FLIGHTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In any boycott by airline pilots of flights to countries that extend asylum to hijackers, will he assure the House that if Canadian pilots participate in such a boycott no disciplinary or reprisal action will be taken against them?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member will admit that his question is hypothetical.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat fearful of this question as it seems so simple to me. Would it be a good idea if those countries which do not provide for extradition were excluded from any use of international airports? Why not just exclude those countries that do not provide for extradition?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that is a representation.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POLICY RESPECTING PROVISION OF EXPENSE-PAID TRIPS TO EMPLOYEES BY BUSINESS CONCERNS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. I preface my question by saying it is founded upon the disclosure recently before a committee of the Ontario legislature that the Olivetti Business Machine Company provided an expense-paid trip for two public servants of the government of Ontario and subsequently sold some equipment to that government. Would the minister be prepared to make a statement in the House outlining federal government policy in respect of expense-paid trips for public servants arranged by businesses or corporations, particularly those that do business with the government?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the reference is to paid trips for individuals who are, I understand, selling to the Ontario government. It does not come directly within the jurisdiction of my department to examine payments to anyone travelling at public expense.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rephrase the question. I am asking the minister about federal government policy in the area of potential trips for public servants that are paid for by business concerns. Would the minister make a statement outlining federal government policy in that area?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, this is not exclusively my area but I will be glad to consider the problem raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister to find out which department or minister has responsibility in the area in question, and whoever it is, if it is anybody, would he be prepared to make a statement on federal government policy in respect of business concerns paying for trips and excursions for federal public servants?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would think it concerns all members of the administration. If there is some particular case the hon. gentleman would like to discuss which does affect a federal civil servant, perhaps he might bring it to our attention.

AIRPORTS

MOUNT HOPE, ONT.—DETAILS OF EXPANSION—HOLDING OF PUBLIC MEETINGS TO HEAR REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport but he is not here. I do not know whether I should direct it to his parliamentary secretary; I think I will. It concerns Mount Hope airport. In view of the fact it appears that the minister and his department have revealed no detailed plans regarding the proposed expansion of Mount Hope airport, can the minister advise whether such plans have been finalized yet and when he expects to make them public? I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary can answer that question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I take this question as notice and I will relay it to the minister. I would simply say that according to the information I could get this morning, the reports in the Globe and Mail are greatly exaggerated.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: I shall ask the parliamentary secretary another question which he may wish to take as notice. In view of the fact the minister assured the citizens of Hamilton and all interested parties that public meetings would be held pending the final disposition of the matter, can the parliamentary secretary advise whether in fact such a meeting or meetings have been lined up and when they will occur?

[Translation]

Mr. Duquet: I will take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: I have one last supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I might as well get this all on the record so that I can follow it up on Monday. In light of reports indicating that land acquisition for the airport expansion will begin very shortly and that construction is due to begin before the end of this year, can the parliamentary secretary advise whether such speculation is correct and, in any event, will he immediately contact the mayor of the city of Hamilton in order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is out of order. The hon. member is inviting the parliamentary secretary to comment on what he himself calls speculation. Certainly a question in those terms is out of order.

• (1130)

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the minister is not here today even though under the roster system he is supposed to be here, and in light of the fact that this matter is extremely important to the city of Hamilton and other interested persons, I thought I would lay the whole matter before the parliamentary secretary so he could advise the minister that I will be following up the matter, on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That has nothing to do with a point of order. The hon. member has asked three questions. I suggested to him that the third question was out of order, and it will not be more in order on Monday.

POST OFFICE

POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS ON NEW CONTRACT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Now that the Council of Postal Unions has placed a demand before the Post Office and Treasury Board negotiating team calling for a 14 per cent pay boost and a 35-hour week for its 24,000 workers, will the Postmaster General be making a progress report to Parliament on the matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has obtained the figures or the requests made by the unions. I was not aware they had been published. I have absolutely nothing to add except that I hope that the meetings concerning negotiation will take place more frequently from now on.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the strong opposition on the part of the postal unions, to the regional pay proposals, will the government be withdrawing this part of its package of proposals from the current negotiations?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): That is a question that has to be discussed at the bargaining table, Mr. Speaker. I think that we will have to change our position and that the union will likely have to change its own.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Is it the intention of the government to use the services of the special negotiators from the Department of Labour in order to facilitate an early settlement of this important matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): We are ready, Mr. Speaker, to take all necessary means to reach an agreement as soon as possible, but it is exceedingly important, I believe, to hold meetings where negotiations could be carried on.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE— POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION BY PANARCTIC IN CONSORTIUM

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has Panarctic joined the consortium formed recently to build the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, or will the government be encouraging it to do so?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will bring that question to the attention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I have not followed recent developments.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE— INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING CANADIAN PARTICIPATION AND CONTROL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I should like to put to the Acting Prime Minister. As there is much mystery and secrecy about this new pipeline, would the Acting Prime Minister advise us whether a special bill will be brought before the House with reference to this consortium, setting out what kind of Canadian participation and how much Canadian control we will have in this new pipeline, or is a licence just going to be granted under the pipeline legislation on the statute books?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I would think that one of the relevant considerations in the application will be the degree of Canadian participation.

Mr. Woolliams: The Acting Prime Minister seems a little worried about the possibility of another pipeline debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Woolliams: I will put my question now, Mr. Speaker. Would the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that before any decision is made on a licence or any consent is given to any persons or corporations a full statement will be made to the House on what policy the government is really following, because there is secrecy and mystery about the whole thing?

Mr. Sharp: I hope I do not look worried. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is no secrecy or mystery about this. Apparently the hon. gentleman knows a good deal about this matter. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has made one or two statements about the proposal. We are encouraged by the fact that there is the possibility of a gas pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley to move Canadian gas and perhaps Alaska gas, as well. It is most encouraging to us that Canadians are showing a real interest in getting this gas pipeline going.

PARLIAMENT

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST ON PART OF SENATOR—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): My question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to investigate the conflict of interest charges resulting from committee hearings in the other place?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. gentleman follows the proceedings in the other place better than I do. Would he explain the point?

Mr. MacInnis: There is no need for the Acting Prime Minister to remark on the obvious. Everybody on this side follows matters more closely than he does.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might ask his supplementary.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, if the minister wants a further explanation, the fact is that during committee hearings in the other place conflict of interest charges were raised against a member of the other place by another member of that other place involving special interest groups being served by members of the other place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I say in further clarification for the Acting Prime Minister that the other place is what we usually refer to as the other half of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: I was just trying to penetrate the secrecy and mystery. Now I understand it better.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, now that the Acting Prime Minister understands it, may I ask whether the government is going to investigate these conflict of interest charges that have been made?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we will certainly look at the evidence before the committee and see whether there is a basis for any government action.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege for the obvious reason that Parliament is involved, and when Parliament is involved each and every Member of Parliament is involved. The members of this House are answerable to the public because they are elected members. Therefore any conflict of interest charge in the other place is something that the government should investigate immediately so that members of this House will not have actions of the other place held against them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR AGED

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wanted to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence, and I believe that of his parliamentary secretary, perhaps some minister would take note of it or perhaps answer it. Is it the intention of the government to proceed with the earlier announced New Horizons or opportunities for the aged program this year, and are old age pension organizations being involved in the planning of the program?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe there will be a government announcement soon.

FRUIT

STRAWBERRIES—STEPS TO PREVENT IMPORTS FROM MEXICO DAMAGING INDUSTRY

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. A news item datelined Mexico City recently announced that a Mexican trade mission has released information of the sale to Canada of fresh and frozen strawberries to the value of $2.8 million. What steps will the minister take to prevent this importation from seriously damaging the berry-growing industry in all parts of Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have a variable import levy on fruits brought in during seasons when there is no great production in Canada or when they are out of season so far as Canadian production is concerned. Although I read that press release also, I could find no evidence within Canada that would substantiate some of it.

GRAIN

PRICE OF RAPESEED—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FLOOR PRICE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It arises because of the fears aroused among rapeseed producers on the Prairies because the price of rapeseed has come down from the top price during the year by about 41 cents. Can he give an explanation as to the reason for this because this is a question that is being asked everywhere?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I could do so, Mr. Speaker, but I suppose it would take somewhat longer than the time that would be given to answer a question. The price of rapeseed in Thunder Bay yesterday was $2.35 a bushel, which was substantially higher than the low point that was reached, for example, last January. It is not quite as high as it was some days last August, but it is certainly not at the low point for the year now, nor has it happened suddenly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister failed to say that it is also very much lower than the price during the year on several occasions. Under the circumstances, because we are not going to be able to have the benefit of his explanation of the unexplainable, will he advise us whether the government is giving consideration to setting a floor price that will assure the farmer a fair return?

• (1140)

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman asked that question about three or four weeks ago, and I think the answer I gave then is still valid.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question with reference to the last words of the minister that the answer today was as good as the one given four weeks ago. I would say it is just as bad.

Mr. Olson: It is still valid.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him now to answer the question: is the government giving consideration to providing a floor price to assure that the rapeseed farmers will have a reasonable return?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, as I replied a few weeks ago, there is a bill before Parliament dealing with rapeseed, rye and flax in the context of the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. The right hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the initial prices paid under the Wheat Board do in fact constitute a floor price. This bill is already before Parliament, but we do not have the authority at the moment to do this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You don't have the authority? The government certainly has, and the minister knows it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPLACEMENT FOR ARGUS AIRCRAFT—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence although there are several supplementaries I would like to ask other ministers. In any event, I direct the question to him because he may be elsewhere next week. Has any decision been made with regard to a replacement for the Argus and, if so, have proposals gone out to aircraft manufacturing companies for their consideration?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: When will there be a decision on the Argus replacement?

Mr. Benson: The matter is being studied, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: So are you.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT FOURTH TRAINING SQUADRON BASED AT ESQUIMALT WILL BE OPERATIONAL THIS SUMMER

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. During the course of the hearings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence with respect to the defence white paper it was suggested to the committee that the fourth training squadron based at Esquimalt might not be operational this summer because of difficulties in finding the four to eight necessary engine room personnel. Since that squadron is capable of training some 500 reservists from all parts of the country during the summer, can the minister assure the House that it will be operational this summer?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check on its current status and report back to the House.

DATE OF UNFREEZING OF DEFENCE BUDGET—CRITERIA TO BE USED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is perhaps related to the one just asked. It arises out of the mounting pressures and difficulties the forces are having in meeting their standards of training as a direct result of the prolonged frozen budget. Can the minister say when this situation will be corrected? As a supplementary, can he say whether or not any decisions have already been taken, or are at the consideration stage, with respect to the criteria that will be used in the unfreezing of the defence budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as indicated in the white paper the defence budget is to be unfrozen for the 1973-74 fiscal year. As to exactly what this involves, negotiations and planning are going on with the Treasury Board.

Mr. Forrestall: Inasmuch as the forces will be undertaking their budgetary planning for the coming year very shortly—indeed, in some instances they are already doing it—have any instructions gone out to the various commands with respect to their programs for spending under the unfrozen budget?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, with respect to 1973-74 the departmental budgetary estimates have been prepared and are now a matter of discussion with the Treasury Board. Here we are talking about the forward fiscal year beyond this one.

AGRICULTURE

SMALL FARM ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—FURTHER DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the small farms development program about which we have been hearing something of late. Does the government expect that there will be further discussions with the provinces on this program, and when does the minister expect that the program will be taking effect?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. I cannot give a precise date as to when it will take effect. In those provinces with which we reach an agreement, obviously the agreement will specify when it will be operational. I want to repeat what I have said a number of times. I am disappointed and impatient that the provinces have not come forward more rapidly. If they do not sign pretty soon we will operate it ourselves.

Mr. Murta: As it appears almost certain that at least some of the provinces will not accept the criteria laid down by the government, how much duplication can be expected with the provincial and federal programs overlapping in certain areas?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, this would be minimized to a great extent if the provinces would co-operate.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question with regard to the small farm rationalization program. In view of the fact the provinces have firmly rejected the present proposals of the government, would the Minister of Agriculture give consideration to bringing in enabling legislation so that there could be some co-operation between the provinces and the federal government?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how you can legislate the provinces to sign an agreement. I would not even try that. We already have authority from the House so far as federal participation is concerned.

SMALL FARM ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—RESULT OF MEETING BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC MINISTERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since the Quebec government had also made some reservations about that policy, can the minister tell the House whether he has been in touch lately with the Quebec Minister of Agriculture in connection with that program and whether those talks have actually given some result?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been many discussions with the Minister of Agriculture of Quebec. I think there is no great disagreement on the features of the program, but there is some disagreement on who will administer those features.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—REASON FOR CHARGE FOR BUS TRIP BETWEEN TERMINALS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport in the absence of the minister. As the planned moving sidewalk between terminal one and the newly opened terminal two at Toronto International Airport has not yet been installed and a temporary bus system has been set up, would the parliamentary secretary tell the House the reason for the 25 cent charge which is being made for this very short trip?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have very serious doubts whether this question should be asked during the question period. If there is urgency about the charge to which the hon. member refers I would think the question should be raised at the time of adjournment. Orders of the day.

Mr. Ryan: Ten o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT INTERVENE TO SETTLE QUEBEC LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie) moved:

This House regrets the Government's continuing refusal to this date to intervene in the impasse between the International Longshoremen's Association and the Maritime Employers' Association despite the short and long term damage to the St. Lawrence seaports, to the users of the national transportation system and to the economic well-being of Canada and despite the sufferings of the longshoremen and their families; and therefore this House, in the public interest, calls upon the Government to intervene forthwith to end the strike.

Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the matter which I have brought before the House this morning as a motion, I would like to invite the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) who is directly involved and responsible to the House for the administration of legislation regarding working conditions in Canada and for disputes which may concern the federal government directly or indirectly.

I wish the Minister of Labour were present in the House but in his absence, the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) at least should be here as Acting Minister of Labour, because when disputes cannot be settled by the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is often asked to step in. I am truly disappointed to see that neither of those ministers are present to reply to a most important question.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to start a useless quarrel but rather to acknowledge the unfortunate situation which prevails in Canada due to a most serious problem affecting thousands of workers and the Canadian economy.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Minister of Labour will soon be here—

Mr. Valade: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tells me that the Minister of Labour will soon be here. I hope so, but it is unfortunate just the same that he is not here for the beginning of our proceedings since such a question falls under his jurisdiction.

But if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wants to assure me that the Minister of Labour will be here in a few seconds, I am willing—

Mr. Pepin: I am taking note of your views right now—

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce advises me that he is taking note of my views, but he can also take note that in the National Assembly the Quebec Minister of Labour has blamed the federal government for his inability to intervene in this conflict in order to settle it. So, if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wants to take note of my comments, he might also take note of those from the Quebec Minister of Labour, who is a member of a Liberal government, and yet is well known for his unfortunate interventions in the labour disputes occurring in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the matter is so obviously serious that I would not want to imitate the frivolous talk of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, nor fall into the thoughtless and unreasonable reactions or remarks from the government's spokesmen.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. members would stop yelling, I might be able to continue my remarks. For the last half hour, we have had nothing but bedlam in the House.

Mr. Speaker, the motion that I move today on behalf of my party—and I trust on behalf of all hon. members concerned with public interest—is, I think, abundantly clear.

Mr. Speaker, what has made this motion necessary is the obvious indifference shown by the Minister of Labour since this dispute started, and his refusal to give clear replies to the questions of hon. members of the House, to whatever party they may belong.

I should not like to be partisan, to the extent of saying that government members take no interest in the matter. I believe all hon. members, whatever their political colour, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) included, have also risen in the House in an effort to force government action in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, the motion is clear and I believe—

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Valade: I believe the motion I submitted is clear and explicit enough, as I said earlier and it comprises five major points.

First of all, the refusal—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Valade: —would the hon. member please be quiet? If he has anything to say, he can do so later.

Mr. Speaker: Order, the hon. member is rising on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Valade: Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have clearly said that I do not wish to associate this very important matter with this sort of pranks played by some members and I regret that the hon. member does not take seriously so serious a question as that which we are discussing this morning.

Mr. Speaker, the motion contains five major items: First, the refusal by the government to break the deadlock through some positive action; second, the short and long-term damage to the St. Lawrence ports; third, the damage to the users of the national transportation system; fourth, the damage to the economic well-being of Canada and, by implication, of Montreal and Quebec; fifth, the human aspect involved in the hardship of the longshoremen and their families.

Representing a constituency which is at the heart of Montreal harbour activity and where a very substantial number of longshoremen involved in the dispute live, I had to intervene to protect the interests of my constituents and of the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec City have been paralysed for more than 30 days because of a conflict involving both the shipping firms and the longshoremen which only a few weeks ago had come to an agreement whereby the former Minister of Labour and member for Verdun would insure order in the ports for at least the next three years. Now, both parties find themselves right back where they started about their collective agreement with all the efforts made by both sides to come to a satisfactory agreement wasted.

An exact description of this situation was recently published as an editorial in the June 5, 1972 issue of Le Journal de Montréal, editorial which I wish to quote for the accuracy of its insight. In this editorial, Mr. Paul Gros d'Aillon puts the problems in its proper perspective before public opinion, and I quote:

Quebec Longshoremen's Strike

The conflict is so pointless, so subtle that no one really knows how to interpret it. No one knows either who is wrong or who is right. The employers interpreted in their own way the terms of the labour agreement on the constitution of the unloading crews. The union members countered and quit work. The employer retaliated and everyone was fired. The courts before which the case stands wonder what to do and the federal department of Labour refuses to grant the employers in the three ports of the St. Lawrence the right to take the longshoremen's union before the courts.

Arbitration should therefore be resorted to, to settle the conflict, but both sides attempt to lose themselves in a judicial jungle which camouflages the basic truths of the problem. In other words, no one will budge.

There is the gist of the problem, Mr. Speaker. Both parties are watching who is going to make the first move. In spite of the fact that either party, or both, would do well to go to arbitration, there is an accepted procedure which is contained in the collective agreement that was signed on March 29, 1972 and which is in force until December 31, 1974. This is indicated in paragraph 11 of section 1 and more specifically in paragraph 5, concerning grievance procedures.

However, as the editorial writer said, it is a matter of no one wanting to budge.

Notwithstanding this procedure provided in the collective agreement in cases of grievances, none of the interested parties has indicated its willingness to use it so far. This is ridiculous and unjustifiable.

It is a matter of mutual "pouting", Mr. Speaker, between the parties concerned, where the government and the Minister of Labour find themselves in a moral and political obligation to intervene in this conflict.

Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member is hard to follow.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has both his ears plugged and does not understand, let him sleep as he has done since the beginning.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are all mixed up and we cannot understand a thing.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member did not understand a thing, he certainly is ripe for defeat in the next election. He had better go back to the trough where he comes from.

• (1200)

Mr. Speaker, it is ridiculous that a member should act so irresponsibly in the House when we are dealing with a dispute affecting our whole economy and the well-being of longshoremen. He is not willing to—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for St. Boniface is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the member for Sainte-Marie that at least I attend the sittings of the House, that I go to committee meetings every day of the week, and that I have the pleasure of seeing the member in the House once a month.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member will agree that he is only raising a point of discussion and that his point of order is not well taken.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, may I ask Your Honour to direct members on the government side to allow the hon. member who has the floor to speak. They are making loud noises to disguise the fact there are so few of them in this House.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. If the hon. member who has the floor would stop making nonsensical references to members on this side of the House, he would not be interrupted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I think we might best solve the difficulty if we allowed the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) to complete his remarks as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member for Témiscamingue rising on a point of order?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I have known the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) for many years now. I knew him when he was the level-headed mayor of St. Boniface. But in this House, although we do not always share the views expressed by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, I think in all fairness that the hon. member for St. Boniface should stay quiet, keep silent and listen to what the mover of the motion has to say. If he disagrees, then he will have the privilege of making a speech, but he should let us listen quietly to the hon. member who has the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, I request the co-operation of hon. members. I think the hon. member for Sainte-Marie should be allowed to proceed with his comments. I do not believe that these exchanges enable us to progress satisfactorily and I would urge hon. members to listen carefully to the comments of the hon. member who has presently the floor; later on, and in turn, they will be afforded the opportunity of making their comments either criticizing or supporting what has been said. It is customary for members in this House not to blame each other because of absences nor to check the attendance or absence record of hon. members, otherwise we would never make any progress.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a question of privilege and also on a point of order.

My point of order is that I hope the time spent on totally insignificant and frivolous interjections should not be at the expense of the time allocated to me; also I wish to see the procedure and practice of this House respected. When a motion is submitted by an hon. member, he should be allowed to speak and should be respected, and later it will be possible for hon. members to express their views.

As the hon. member for Témiscamingue and leader of the Social Credit party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) said, anyone who does not agree with me must let me know, but must give me enough time to conclude my remarks on such an important matter.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for St. Boniface on a question of privilege.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to see the debate go on without reference to hon. members.

I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker, that I listened with pleasure to the remarks of the hon. leader of the Social Credit Party and I wish to tell him that I am happy to see him also in the House.

The hon. member who has the floor is referring to people he sees whenever he is in the House, and before making any remarks, he should know for sure who makes references—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Again, I urge hon. members to help the Chair, and in this way, the debate will certainly progress much further. I will ask the hon. member for Sainte-Marie to go back to the matter without delay and may I ask other hon. members to stop making such interventions.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly limit my remarks to the matter under study, as I feel the latter to be far too important for anybody to waste the time of this House in replies and exchanges of that kind.

I was talking, Mr. Speaker, of a conflict which is extremely serious. I spoke about the points which I raised in the motion. There are five of them, and it seems to me that they are clear. I concluded by saying that the only solution which seems practicable to solve this conflict at present, to put an end to the deadlock, is to take it to arbitration.

Mr. Speaker, if this was only my suggestion, I think that some hon. members would have the right to challenge this conclusion. But this solution, which seems to be the only feasible one at present, does not come from me alone. I have also consulted newspapers and certain reports, certain statements by responsible men whose advice has been taken in previous strikes—among which the former Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Verdun, who recently said, concerning this strike, that the only solution left was arbitration. It is reported in the newspaper Montréal-Matin of Wednesday, May 24, 1972, that the hon. member for Verdun, the former Minister of Labour, was behind the signing of the collective agreement between the shipowners and the longshoremen. The hon. member for Verdun is reported as saying that arbitration was most advisable under the circumstances.

Last night, Mr. Speaker—whether the hon. member for St. Boniface likes it or not—the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is on a tour in Labrador City, made some very interesting statements. An article in today's issue of Montréal-Matin reads as follows:

—Mr. Trudeau replied that it would be a very good idea indeed, and that arbitration should be extended to all activities, "because, he said, strike is a last resort, somewhat similar to war. Eventually, everybody loses by it."

Then, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister himself is in favour of arbitration to settle disputes of that kind.

This morning also, during an interview on a Quebec radio network, the Quebec Minister of Labour accused the federal government of failing to do anything in this dispute between ship-owners and longshoremen. Mr. Cournoyer, Minister of Labour in Mr. Bourassa's Liberal government said that if the federal government was not going to do anything about it, the provincial Minister of Labour will have to intervene even if that dispute does not come directly under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. Mr. Cournoyer blamed the incapacity, the "wait and see" policy and the inaction of the federal Minister of Labour, because he is concerned just as we are about the disastrous effects of any extension of such a strike on the general economic activity in the province of Quebec. He also said that if the federal Minister of Labour did not settle the conflict, he would have to interfere himself.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, whenever such a situation develops, the matter is serious enough, I believe, for the federal government to get involved in the settling of the dispute. They should get involved because the former Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Verdun, did have his say in the drafting of the collective agreement between the longshoremen and the ship-owners.

Mr. Speaker, the minister answered various questions in this House on that subject. He said among other things that he could not intervene, that the collective agreement provided for arbitration, and that both parties had to comply with regulations. Now in answer to a question directed to him, the minister said that the Maritime Employers' Union was prepared to accept arbitration, but that it had not yet started the procedure to that effect.

• (1210)

On the other hand, it is reported that the longshoremen are also prepared to go to arbitration, but that they do not want to initiate it.

Here is the crux of the matter, Mr. Speaker. The problem is that according to an established procedure, if a dispute arises between the two parties, it must be settled through arbitration, but neither party wants arbitration. Then how should the government or the public get this problem solved?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here the collective agreement which was signed on March 29th, 1972. I shall quote now article 1.11:

Should a conflict arise concerning new methods of work, the loading or unloading of ships or any related operation that affects the health or security of the workers, the parties shall meet to solve the dispute, and failing an agreement, it shall be submitted to arbitration according to the procedure set out in other provisions of this agreement.

Now, for the information of the members, I point out that the other provisions are seriously involved in the problem, as one realizes on reading the introduction to the chapter entitled "Grievance procedure". I quote:

> Any disagreement as to interpretation or application of the present agreement is a grievance as defined within the agreement. Grievances are settled according to the following procedure—
> If the grievance committee fails to settle the grievance within the five (5) following working days, the grievance shall be submitted to a sole mediator, chosen in conformity with the present agreement. The mediator shall render his decision within the seven (7) following working days, or within a longer period agreed upon by the parties.

Paragraph (d) deals with requests for arbitration, which I consider to be interesting because this is where we find the provisions actually related to the conflict. I quote that paragraph:

> The request for arbitration can be filed either by the Union or by the Maritime Employers Association. The party making the request for arbitration shall make a written outline of the conflict submitted for arbitration and send copy thereof to the other party.

In the present dispute, neither of the parties has filed an application for arbitration with the other party. Each side stands by its position. The collective agreement also provides for who can act as an arbitrator in case of a dispute.

Paragraph (d) in the same section reads as follows:

> The single arbitrator shall be selected from the following list: 1. The honourable Chief Justice A. B. Gold; 2. Hon. Justice Elphège Marier; 3. Hon. Justice Jacques Vadboncoeur, and 4. Mr. Raymond Leboeuf, barrister.
> It is agreed that the arbitrator designated by the parties on any occasion shall be available Mondays to Fridays—

These are matters of detail, but what is important is the provision in paragraph (f) of section 5, which reads as follows:

> In case the arbitrators referred to in the above paragraph should be unable to act, the arbitrator shall be chosen by the parties or, in the absence of an agreement, by the federal Minister of Labour.

In fact, we can read clearly here that the Minister of Labour and the federal government are involved in the grievance procedure concerning a dispute such as this one which now opposes the longshoremen of St. Lawrence ports and the shippers.

If the contracting parties cannot agree on the choice of an arbitrator—I understand that the arbitrator is involved—it is stated that the federal government, through the Minister of Labour, must intervene to designate him.

Now Mr. Speaker, since we are faced with two entirely antagonistic parties which have never expressed the wish to meet, in my opinion, it goes without saying that the federal Minister of Labour, according to the spirit and letter of that clause, could and should intervene in case of disagreement.

Mr. Speaker, I do not at all understand why each time that some conflict has risen with serious consequences for Quebec, especially for the Montreal area as well as for the entire Canadian economy, the minister has fallen into the nasty way of taking refuge by saying: The minister cannot interfere, the parties must get together and come to an agreement. We cannot interfere.

Unless this negative attitude is reversed, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how long it will take before a solution is found to this problem.

In my view, the former Minister of Labour, when he spoke to the House in 1966 regarding harbour difficulties involving the same parties was not saying the same thing. It would certainly be most interesting to read some statements that the hon. member for Verdun made on June 7, 1966, as the then Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour concerning the conflict existing at the port of Montreal. The hon. member for Verdun was then answering the liberal member for Trois-Rivières, the late Mr. J.-A. Mongrain, who was asking the federal government to intervene in this conflict. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières, for whom I had a lot of admiration and respect, said when asking the minister to intervene in the dispute at the port of Montreal, and I quote:

> In view of the disastrous circumstances of the present longshoremen's strike, should the minister not take drastic and extraordinary steps so that the activity will be resumed while negotiations are under way?

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières was making these comments in the House on account of that strike.

And the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Verdun, now Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who was also at one time Minister of Labour and who had drafted the collective agreement, replied to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières as follows:

> I noted . . . the very intelligent remarks of the hon. member for Three Rivers—

He had just talked about compulsory arbitration—And further the hon. member for Verdun said:

> At the same time I realize, as do I am sure most members of the house, that some extraordinary measures will eventually have to be taken if this longshoremen's strike is to be brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

Those were the remarks made by the then Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, who became later Minister of Labour and who is now Minister of Manpower and Immigration. He said in the House that extraordinary measures would have to be taken to find a solution to the longshoremen's dispute.

The situation that prevails at this time, Mr. Speaker, is almost identical to the one existing then, except that it is more urgent now, since this dispute is in its fifth week and there is no end in sight. It will soon enter in its sixth week.

Mr. Speaker, the economic implications of this strike, the effects of this deadlock on the future of the Quebec ports are obviously disastrous. One could talk of immediate and long term implications of the situation on the economy at all levels: national and local, on the future life of the St. Lawrence ports, on the families of employees who are suffering from this strike.

• (1220)

It is well known that harbour activities on the St. Lawrence River are the most important industry in Quebec. The port of Montreal, being the largest in the system, is more directly and strongly affected.

Moreover, this conflict has arisen in the most active part of the season, that is the months of May, June and July. Under normal circumstances, the port of Montreal can count on the presence to at least 125 to 150 ships at this time of the year. There were merely 7 of them a few days ago.

A good number of ships have returned to their port of departure or were rerouted. Some of them have been able to drop anchor in the ports of Toronto, Halifax and St. John's. But these harbours having limited facilities, many ships have set sail toward American ports. Montreal will have lost to date some 525,000 tons of cargo including 225,000 of general merchandise which is the main source of direct tax income for the federal government.

Some importers have advised their suppliers to refrain from shipping cargo via Montreal.

Some important shipowners such as McLean Kennedy Limited and Furness Withy & Co. Ltd., have already moved their harbour facilities from Montreal to Halifax.

Will shippers who, in spite of the last dockers' strike had once again relied on the St. Lawrence harbours, sever their ties with Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec? Some business circles fear this possibility.

Mr. Speaker, if we were seeking to permanently destroy the harbour system which is still vital for the maintenance of Quebec's economic prosperity, we would not act differently.

It would be right to seriously ask oneself this question in the face of a situation that was literally and wilfully left to deteriorate.

The slightest permanent decrease in harbour activities at Montreal, Trois-Rivières or Quebec that this conflict might entail, would cause not only serious gaps in the local economy but would also be a grave threat to the jobs of thousands of workers directly or indirectly linked with harbour services.

The laissez-faire or wait-and-see policy of the government, and particularly the Minister of Labour, demonstrates such unawareness of the disastrous consequences of this situation that we must denounce it most vigorously.

The predecessor of the present Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Verdun, would certainly not have taken this matter so lightly, had he still been in office. It is unfortunate that the considerable efforts made by the hon. member for Verdun at the time when he was Minister of Labour in order to achieve the signing of the collective agreement last March have failed to ensure the promised stability.

This conflict will have a serious impact on the national economy, as the government will be deprived of the substantial revenues derived from operations in Quebec harbours.

In fact, in 1970 and 1971, the government received over $329 million yearly in direct revenues under the customs and excise acts.

Harbour operations are therefore an extremely important economic generator which the minister cannot afford to ignore, especially in the difficult times which we are going through in Canada, and particularly in Quebec, at present.

It is estimated that every ton of goods handled in harbours represents an economic generation factor of between $12 and $14 per capita.

Over the last five years, operations in Quebec harbours have provided the government with revenues of $3.5 billion.

Now, it is clearly urgent for the government to take the necessary steps in order to resolve this conflict, not only because of its serious impact on the Canadian economy and the future of the St. Lawrence harbours, but above all because of the human problems which afflict the employees concerned and their families.

I said in my opening remarks that I represent a constituency which is particularly affected by this strike. I had occasion to meet with longshoremen who told me of their concern over the situation, which does not seem about to be settled.

They made me understand the difficulties their families had to face as a result of the strike, for we all know that with this conflict, the families of longshoremen on strike cannot count on social welfare—since they cannot get it under the provincial law—nor on unemployment insurance benefits, since the unemployment insurance act has no provision concerning these conditions. They are not entitled to any other relief funds, which means that the affectef families are most depressed and they can only expect to get assistance from a few benevolent societies, like the Société Saint-Vincent-de-Paul and other organizations of this kind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired, while making allowance for the interruptions that took place at the outset of his speech.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, could I be allowed to conclude my remarks, with the consent of the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member knows that he can only do it with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to carry on his speech?

Mr. Caouette: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Apparently, there is no unanimous consent. The Chair will therefore recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Sainte-Marie rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Témiscamingue would not agree that I be given a few minutes more, in view of the numerous interruptions during my speech. I have only a few—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member knows the rules. When unanimous consent is sought, under the rules, there can be no discussion on that question of unanimity.

I might put the question once again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Témiscamingue on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, recently we were not allowed to continue our speeches. Today, I object to the hon. member being entitled to conclude his own.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I will say to the hon. member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I think that we are creating a precedent. It has always been agreed that when the spokesman of a political party in the House initiated a debate by introducing a motion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I am explaining my question of privilege and I suggest that you should allow me to complete my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I must point out to the hon. member that the Standing Orders, as we all know, clearly specify the length of speeches. When a minister introduces a motion concerning a bill, the Standing Orders provide that the minister may be entitled to an unlimited time period, but in this instance, since this is a motion from the opposition, a time limit for speeches must be set. The House even places upon itself sometimes restrictions which are even stricter.

So, there is no way by which we may discuss this practice established for the past few years, and I must recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I wanted to conclude by making concrete proposals in order to settle this conflict. Since I cannot make them in this House, I shall do so in front of newspapermen, and I shall say that the leader of the Social Credit Party who often speaks of democracy, objects to my—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I invite the hon. member to resume his seat. The hon. member knows as well as I do that the point he is raising is in no way connected with the question of privilege. A few minutes ago, he blamed other hon. members for preventing him to speak. I think that at this moment, he must realize that the Chair must recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the tie-up on the waterfront at Montreal, Trois-Rivieres and Quebec City is, indeed, a very serious matter and we earnestly hope that it will soon be settled. I remain to be convinced, however, whether the kind of speeches that may be made in this chamber today, such as the one we have just heard, will expedite that settlement. I hope that some good will come out of this debate, but that remains to be seen.

When I read the terms of the motion put down by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) I wondered what he meant by the concluding words which call for the government "to intervene forthwith to end the strike".

Mr. Valade: That is what I wanted to say in my conclusion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member had 30 minutes. In fact, he had 35 or 36 minutes. I listened carefully to his entire speech. I regret to say that it was necessary for me to listen to the translation of his speech, but at least that had the effect of forcing me to give it my full attention so as not to miss anything. He said several times that his motion was explicit. He said several times that his motion was very clear. Toward the end of his speech he called on the government to take measures to resolve the conflict. But at no time did he tell the House what he meant.

Mr. Valade: I have it all here before me and I wanted to put it before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At no time did he tell us what he meant by government intervention, and I do not think that what he has in his hand will do that, either.

Mr. Prud'homme: He has a secret weapon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What the hon. member says in his motion is that the government should intervene forthwith to end the strike. I must say that if he has in mind steps to put this matter before the courts, then we would disagree. If he has in mind some sort of strike breaking action—though it is a little difficult to use that phrase because it is not a strike, it is a lock-out—again we would disagree. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) disagrees with what I am saying about the dispute being a lockout, but there we are. If the hon. member has in mind calling upon the government to bring in legislation to put these employees back to work, the employees who may not be employees because they have been suspended, we do not agree with that either.

• (1230)

I know there is a great deal of current feeling about strikes, about unions and about workers, and I understand it, particularly when it affects the public generally.

But let us not forget that the sanctity of the law and the sacredness of rights must include protecting the law at all times and protecting those rights which have been established in a society such as ours. The right of employers and employees to disagree and to carry that disagreement to the point of a stoppage of work is one of the factors of our society. We have had to live with this for a long time. Someone may come up with a better way and he will be a great hero when he does. In the meantime, we do not aid the cause of amity or industrial peace in our society simply by putting the blame on trade unions, on workers and on strikers. Neither do we solve the problem by making generalized speeches for 30 minutes calling upon the government to intervene and end it without saying what the government should do.

I intend to be very brief. One or more of my colleagues may speak later in the day and, if they do, they, too, will be brief. There is the suggestion that has come from the National Farmers Union that if there is no solution for some time to this matter the government might consider taking over the operations, putting them under an administrator or something until an agreement can be reached. That point will be put forward later, but we contend that even that should not be proposed until a serious effort has been made by the Minister of Labour along the lines he is already following.

If we have a quarrel with the Minister of Labour, and I speak for my leader who happens to be away today, and for the rest of us in this party, it is not with the nature of what he is doing, it is with the degree and the vigour of it. He said the other day in response to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that he was doing his best to get the two parties to have regard for their obligations to each other. Then, he used this sentence:

> That kind of intervention I have indeed pursued vigorously.

He looks at me and seems to be asking if I want him to be more vigorous. That is right. Later on that same day, Wednesday, June 14, we find another response to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). The sentence I have read was from page 3124 of Hansard. Looking over at page 3125, I find this response at the end of a series of questions:

> I would point out that the two parties themselves appointed the arbitrators and that four arbitrators are named in the agreement. The initiative falls on one or the other of the two parties. They each have the obligation.

I agree with the minister's statement as a description of the situation as it obtains legally, but the public interest is involved in all of this and it is the job of the Minister of Labour to represent that public interest. Our suggestion, our plea and our urging to him is that he regard what he has called vigorous in the past as not vigorous enough, and that he make every effort he possibly can to get the two parties together in a place they choose, or let him choose the place, and stay with the two parties hour upon hour, day upon day, night upon night if necessary until they either reach an agreement or until they agree to send the matter to arbitration. Our suggestion is as simple as that. We are not asking for legislation. In fact, we do not want it. We are not asking for police action and we are not asking for the matter to be taken to the courts. We are trying to avoid the mistake I think the last member made in calling for something to be done and not saying what he meant.

I almost have to say that in a sense I like the stance of the Minister of Labour in respecting the law and the rights of both sides. We appreciate the fact that he appreciates the rights of the workers and I cannot quarrel with his respecting the rights of the employers as well. That is the way it has to be. Unfortunately for him, as a new Minister of Labour trying to find his way in this important area, he has this problem on his hands and we think there is no other reasonable and decent solution to it but the one we are suggesting, namely that he do everything he can, and that does not mean legal action or throwing his weight around as a minister of the government who would have the power to bring in legislation, but rather as the Minister of Labour, to get these people together in an appropriate room in an appropriate place somewhere and say: Boys, we are staying here until this matter is settled. Let the government pay the cost of the room and provide the meals when keeping them there until, for their own sake, for the sake of the families of those involved and for the sake of the economy of the country, this matter is settled.

I say again, Sir, we are not asking the minister to adopt in nature something he is not now doing. He has talked to both sides, but we are asking him to carry this to its ultimate conclusion by actually getting both parties together and keeping them there until they, under his guidance and direction, settle this dispute for the good of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that earlier I objected to the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), who is the mover, continuing his remarks because allegedly he wanted to submit solutions. He had exactly 40 minutes, I believe, to submit them, and he did not put them to good use. It was not my intention to prevent him from submitting solutions, but to prevent him from taking up the time of other hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, I rather endorse the views expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the effect that the minister should meet the two parties involved, because public interest is at stake and settlement does not concern merely shipowners and longshoremen, but a a great many people involved in trucking, business, etc. Moreover, there are people who have been expecting goods from Japan and other countries for nearly a month and a half and cannot get them.

So, in the interest of the community and the people as a whole, the minister must give orders, meet the leaders of the International Longshoremen's Association and the representatives of management and bring them together around a table to discuss the problem.

Not only the strike is at issue. I can understand the situation on both sides. Wednesday morning, I was in Montreal, speaking on Mr. Jarraud's program on CKVL and a longshoreman called me. He was almost crying while describing the terrible situation in which the longshoremen find themselves at present and he told me that this whole dispute could have been avoided from the beginning in less than 24 hours if only the parties had been willing to meet.

But nobody would give in. The union leader, Mr. Saint-Onge, refuses to meet the employers, saying that they have bent the provisions of the collective agreement stipulating that the computers will be used as of September and not May. Now, the use of the computers started as early as may, which did not please Mr. Saint-Onge.

However, that his was not the only thing that started the dispute. Before this long one, there was a one-day dispute and that was not provided for in the collective agreement. It was decided to strike on that day to support the famous Quebec Common Front of labour unions, but Mr. Saint-Onge does not talk about that. True, the collective agreement contains provisions for the use of computers as early as September, but their use, since May, has not prejudiced those who were working in the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec City.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, one must be honest and straightforward, and call a spade a spade. There are lots of problems, and not only on the ship-owners' side, but also on the longshoremen's side.

I was even told by a docker that some workers steal boats, motorcycles, radios and television sets. The insurance companies have to refund the price of the goods stolen in the ports along the St. Lawrence river.

That is not provided or in the collective agreement; yet, such is the practice. The union leaders do not mention that. Mr. Saint-Onge did not refer to it. However, he is always criticizing the employer, the ship-owner, and so on.

Not long ago, a $2 million loan was suggested with a view to replenishing the strike fund of the Montreal dockers. As for me, I say to fellows like Saint-Onge et al. Why not be honest about it? Instead of borrowing $2 million to replenish the strike fund and telling the longshoremen that they will continue to get $20 or $25 a week even if they do not work, why not buy ships and become shipowners and treat the workers as they would like to be treated? But no. They borrow to go on strike. They do not have the courage to borrow to build something.

Mr. Speaker, the problem is difficult but still a solution is possible. Arbitration is necessary at this point. One of the shipowners is willing to go to arbitration, but the union leaders will not hear of it.

That is why, in the name of the common good, of the public interest, the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) should intervene. Even then, the shipowners should not be kept from going to court to establish who is right or wrong in this case, and arrive at a judgment or decision that would let us know where we are going.

This morning, the radio announced that the Quebec Minister of Labour had bluntly stated this: If Ottawa does not get a move on, Quebec will.

And because this matter comes under federal jurisdiction, the Minister of Labour told us yesterday that he could do nothing more, that all they have to do is negotiate or request an arbitrator, The minister will not assume his responsibility in this respect.

[Mr. Caouette.]

This morning, his Quebec counterpart stated: This is none of my business but since the federal government will not take any action, I shall do so in its place. And he offered his services.

This is why I claim that it is the minister's imperative duty to obtain that both parties come to the bargaining table or accept arbitration, in order to end this disastrous strike, because neither the union leaders nor the employers will provide for the wives and children of the Montreal longshoremen. At the present time, there is undeserved misery in Montreal, and everybody complains about it, including the mothers.

A trucker called to tell me: We might lose our trucks since we cannot meet our payments because the strike prevents us from working. A whole group of people is in the same situation and mainly small businessmen who fear bankruptcy because of this disastrous strike.

And Wednesday morning after I was interviewed on television, someone asked me: What is the federal government waiting for to do something and reach a decision? All the Montreal longshoremen are waiting for this.

Let nobody think that all longshoremen approve their union leaders' statements. Last Monday morning, it was a shame to see the longshoremen gathered at the Paul Sauvé centre in Montreal willing to go back to work, while another group insisted on picketing. And labourers working on the same sites were fighting like cats and dogs and tried to break each others legs. Why? For the common good? No. They do not even know why. They fight each other when they need to cooperate in order to obtain justice for everyone.

Unfortunately, many union leaders disagree on this point. Since some employers have also been unfair to the workers, this proves that both parties are to blame, but it is not by keeping them apart that we will get satisfactory results.

• (1250)

That is why it is imperative for the minister to take action and not to allow himself to be outdone by his Quebec counterpart. It would be funny if we heard tonight that the Quebec Minister of Labour (Mr. Cournoyer) had a meeting with the shipowners and labour leaders this afternoon and that it had been decided to put an end to the dispute. The responsible federal minister would look a little foolish, and I will be watching him on Monday to see if that has happened. In the meantime, however, I would ask whether it would be possible for him to see these people over the weekend and arrange for a meeting.

As far as the computer quarrel is concerned, I cannot accept that is very logical. Perhaps some conditions of the collective agreement have not been observed because of the use of computers in May to decide whether the services of 8 men instead of 10 or 16 would be needed according to the ship's tonnage.

Whether computers are used in May or September is of no serious consequences. However, under the terms of the collective agreement, they are to be used in September. This is a case where the shipowners have not observed their part of the agreement.

On the other hand, employees have been told: You will not be replaced until September. In this case, the labour leaders have no reasons to get excited because nobody is losing his job.

Mr. Speaker, this is the serious situation in which the longshoremen find themselves and which is affecting the economy of the entire province as well as that of the rest of Canada.

I repeat that I am in favour of unions, but the Montreal maritime unions are members of an international association. How can there be talk of union solidarity when ships are being turned away from Montreal so that they will be unloaded along the American seaboard by members of the same association? Talk about solidarity!

Mr. Speaker, the longshoremen in the province of Quebec, along the St. Lawrence river, understand the situation and are eager to see this dispute come to an end. If some union leaders and ship-owners do not see it that way, the minister has the responsibility of saying: Come and negotiate immediately so that we may end this dispute, have the longshoremen return to work and restore some order in this very important field of economic activities for the benefit of our whole country and in particular for the benefit of the province of Quebec.

Here are the remarks, Mr. Speaker, that I wanted to make today; there is only one solution, in my opinion, under the circumstances: the minister must take action.

The minister recently replied to my colleague the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) that he had prevented the ship-owners from prosecuting the union because there were other ways to settle the dispute. Now six weeks have elapsed and the other means have not produced results because nothing has been done so far, whereas an injunction or proceedings might have solved the problem by now.

So I should like to know today what means, what solutions the government has in mind or intends to bring forward to settle that labour dispute that has already lasted six weeks and should not have happened.

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully and with a great deal of interest, particularly to the remarks of the Leader of the Social Credit party. I found the tone in which he made his remarks very reasonable and helpful indeed. As to the few proposals which he put forward toward the end of his remarks—that is another question. I also appreciated very much the approach taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I want to reject completely and at once the charge of indifference, the charge of laissez faire, levied by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) who introduced this resolution. It is a complete misrepresentation of the activities in which I and the departmental officials have been engaged. I want to say also that I have had the benefit of continuous consultations with my colleagues who represent Montreal and who sit on this side of the House. I have had representations from them. I know their concern, which I share, about the tragic situation which is now afflicting that port.

I should say at the opening of my remarks that I am now, and always have been, ready to meet the parties to this dispute at any time that it would appear useful and in the public interest to do so, but I will not undertake to take steps that would be useless in the situation, that indeed would be counter-productive. I will not take steps, which some have suggested, that would in fact work against the long term interests of the port of Montreal. This is a crucial time in the labour management relations in the port of Montreal. Some two months ago the parties came to an agreement. That was one of the best agreements, certainly in North America, to regulate the relations between employers and employees in any dock system in North America. It is very important, therefore—and I know all members of the House will agree—that the steps the parties take, particularly the steps which the Minister of Labour takes at this time, confirm and support that agreement and do not in fact undermine the long term interests of the port of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, I will have more to say about the resolution put forward by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, but at this point I would like to look at the port situation as it has developed over the past ten years to try to get a better picture in front of the members of this House of the perspective we should take in looking at this particular dispute. I see it is virtually one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps before I enter into that part of my remarks I might call it one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I do now leave the chair. The House will resume its work at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, labour-management relations at the port of Montreal have been a source of trouble since the early 1960's. They have been the subject of special industrial inquiries and, in 1966, of special legislation. Under my predecessor, working conditions at the port of Montreal were substantially improved. An important collective agreement was reached in 1968 with great difficulty. This was followed by continuous efforts to improve the climate of labour-management relations on the docks.

Ports throughout Europe were visited by representatives of both parties, assisted by the federal Department of Labour. Some eight months of constant and intensive mediation, led by two senior officers of my department, culminated in the collective agreement reached in April, 1972, just a few short months ago, an agreement ratified by an overwhelming majority of the union membership. Mr. Speaker, this is not an ordinary collective agreement. Its provisions promise to set labour-management relations on the docks at Montreal on an entirely new course. They promise to set the port of Montreal in the forefront of world ports. This agreement coped with the impact on dock workers of the rapid technological changes which have come about at docks all over the world in the methods of working ships, in loading and unloading, in the use of mechanized equipment.

This agreement provided very significant inprovements in pension benefits. It coped with job security of longshoremen with a guarantee of 37 weeks of pay per annum, and it provided for the new and essential levels of productivity required by the employers to pay the enhanced benefits to the workers and to attract and hold business in the port of Montreal. Increased productivity levels required the break up of established work gang systems, and the introduction of new methods of work assignment related to the introduction of a computer. Productivity by the men was the exchange for the job security and the pension and wage benefits. That was a breakthrough in industrial relations at this port.

Throughout the period from 1962 to 1972, eight major work stoppages and five lesser strikes occurred on the Montreal docks, involving in the major instances between 2,000 and 4,000 workers and lasting from one day to well over a month. Why and how did the present dispute arise, and what is the basic nature of the present dispute? The basic issue which precipitated this particular dispute—and I want to stress that it is a dispute which is part of a series which have disrupted the Montreal docks over the past decade—was whether or not management, under the new agreement, at this time had the right to break up longshore gangs prior to the introduction of the computer dispatch system to be inaugurated by mid-September.

Management took the initiative of breaking up a gang working a hatch and ordered some members of the gang to work in a shed. The International Longshoremen's Union contends that management does not have this right until the introduction of the computer dispatch system. While this is the basic issue, other issues have subsequently arisen. The suspension of longshoremen by the Maritime Employers' Association and the question of the collective agreement are examples of additional issues. However, in a nutshell, these are the basic issues in dispute and, without going into all their complexities, I may say that additional issues have become involved in disputes of this nature.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to comment on the position of the parties or to enter into any debate on the merit of the position of either party, as this involves interpretation of the collective agreement. I have repeatedly said that there is a provision in the collective agreement, as the law requires, for either or both of the parties to put this question of interpretation into arbitration, that is, to arbitrate it.

May I pause at this point and respond to some of the remarks hon. members have made in interpreting this matter. It has been said that I have condoned the decision taken by the Lonshoremen's Union. I did not condone that decision; I did not endorse it. The longshoremen had a remedy, which was to go to arbitration. The law gave the longshoremen no right to engage in an illegal work stoppage. I do not agree with those who say this is a lockout. Those questions are not the important ones that we must settle in this House. The root questions we are concerned with are the remedies provided by law and the use that must be made of those remedies if we are to sustain the collective bargaining system in Canada rather than undermine it by rescuing those who will not adhere to their obligations.

The procedures, Mr. Speaker, are crystal clear and there are no questions concerning procedures to be followed in this particular instance. They are clear in the Canada Labour Code and clearly set out in the collective agreement that was signed by both parties one year ago. Section 125(1) of the Canada Labour Code provides:

> Every collective agreement shall contain a provision for final settlement without stoppage of work, by arbitration or otherwise, of all differences between the parties to or persons bound by the agreement or on whose behalf it was entered into, concerning its meaning or violation.

Subsection (3) of that section provides:

> Every party to and every person bound by the agreement, and every person on whose behalf the agreement was entered into, shall comply with the provision for final settlement contained in the agreement and give effect thereto.

Let us turn for a moment to the collective agreement affecting those who, over a period of time, have brought the Port of Montreal into the forefront of the world's ports. What did the parties agree to? They agreed that they would take their grievances over interpretation of their agreement and their disagreements over the interpretation of those provisions to arbitrators whom they had the foresight to name in the agreement. Four arbitrators stand by ready to respond to the application of either party for the arbitration of differences. Paragraph (d) of article (5) of the collective agreement sets out the situation where the union or the employer wishes to submit a matter to arbitration. It provides that either party may initiate a request for arbitration. The parties requesting the arbitrator must set out in writing the matter submitted to the arbitrator and send a copy of it to the other party. Paragraph (h) of that article in the agreement provides that the arbitrator's decision shall be final and binding. Paragraph (i) provides that the men are to return to work pending completion of arbitration procedures.

Perhaps I ought to pause here. Let us ask ourselves, what is the value of an arbitration procedure? What role does it play in collective bargaining in Canada? It plays a unique role, an extremely important role, in Canada; and here the situation with respect to collective bargaining is unique. Once an agreement is concluded and the contract is signed, that agreement is closed, if I may use the expression which is current, and it cannot be broken by strikes or lockouts.

Mr. Rock: But if it is, what do you do?

Mr. O'Connell: Work stoppages during the period of a closed agreement are not legal. Once you close an agreement in fashion in Canada, a work stoppage is not legal. There are no parallel agreements which are closed in other countries. The agreements are not the same in the United States, where lockouts and strikes may occur. Of course, during the closed period of an agreement, most frequently the parties concerned waive rights to strike or lockout voluntarily, but in Canada this is the law. Once an agreement is signed and sealed, it is closed.

How is relief provided with respect to disagreements, if one is to make strikes and lockouts illegal for a two or three year period. There must be provision for some relief, because grievances will arise and differences in interpretation will arise. It is the role of the arbitrator to provide relief and the parties agree that, in exchange for stability during that period of the closed contract, they will arbitrate their differences. The statute requires that they do that. If any collective agreement does not include within it any provision for arbitration, the Canada Labour Relations Board may prescribe an arbitration proceeding and this will be deemed to be part of that agreement. So, we can see in Canada how extremely significant is that arbitration proceeding. It is there to ventilate grievances and to settle differences during this closed period and is a concept which both labour and management in Canada have accepted and supported for 30 years. It would be an extreme step if anyone were to attempt to undermine the arbitration procedure, and to set it aside, if the parties will not willingly make use of it but wish to use another proceeding. That would be a precedent which would strike at the very root of the system of free, collective bargaining, as practised in Canada.

I repeat, these arbitration procedures are crystal clear. There is no question about them. The arbitrators are named, the obligations are there and I and my officials have repeatedly instructed the parties to follow those procedures. As I understand it, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) intended to propose to the House—I regret that his time ran out before he had an opportunity to make his suggestion—that the Canada Labour Code should be amended so that the minister may impose arbitration on parties unwilling to obey laws already existing.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. O'Connell: I think he is saying that under the present provisions of the labour code there is no authority to seek arbitration—

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the minister can be allowed to presume what suggestions I may have put forward, because the House refused to give me the opportunity to put them forward. Unless I am given the opportunity to bring those suggestions forward in a clearcut fashion, I do not think the minister should be allowed to comment on what he thinks I would have suggested.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member had the opportunity to deliver his own speech. Therefore he should let the minister complete his remarks.

[English]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I object categorically, and I am rising on a question of privilege. I do not think the Chair ought to make that type of ruling—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

[Translation]

Order. I must nevertheless draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that even questions of privilege raised in this House are governed by Standing Orders and it is the duty of the Chair to see that hon. members do not raise questions of privilege that are unfounded.

In short, the hon. minister has the floor and I thought that the hon. member was rising to clarify a point, but since it was not the case, I was bound to make this comment.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I believe that Your Honour has not fully understood the meaning of my interjection. The minister alleges that I have made some statements while actually I was denied the right to proceed with my speech and offer some suggestions that could lead to a solution of the conflict. The minister stated that I had suggested such and such a way of solving the conflict, while I was denied this right and I think that he is not entitled to interpret, as he sees fit, the statements I would have made.

Mr. Béchard: You made them in your speech.

Mr. Valade: This is not true; you prevented me from doing it.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I have underlined the extreme importance to the system of collective bargaining in Canada of the arbitration provisions. Are there alternatives? It has been suggested that mediation should take place. There is a place for mediation in collective bargaining. Its proper place is in the open period when the parties are negotiating.

In this particular case, I have already referred to the intensive effort over many months to bring these parties together to improve the climate of their relationships. But to mediate a grievance dispute is an entirely different matter. Mediation normally takes place over interest disputes; conditions of work, questions of pay, holidays and technological change. These are matters of interest to the parties, but once the agreement is signed and a grievance arises they are not mediated by a mediator. The grievance dispute is settled by an arbitration procedure which is binding on both parties and fundamental to keeping the contract closed. If we set aside mediation, we are in effect opening the agreement and saying, "change it, mediate". We are saying to one party or another to a dispute, if you hang that is tough. If you take illegal action or if you refuse to use the legal proceedings, the arbitration proceedings, then at some point the public interest will be so engaged that you will be taken off the hook. That is the way to underline collective bargaining in Canada.

You can go across this country and you will find that trade unions and management will support the arbitration proceedings and will stand firm against a mediation process that undermines that. It is said by some that mediation is a last resort. A last resort comes when everything else has been tried. The point here is that the proper procedures have not been tried. It is open to the parties to try them. I ask them to come to their senses and make use of those provisions that are in their own agreements which they only recently and solemnly agreed to honour.

There are other alternatives open to the parties. If the parties wish to mediate that is up to them, but there are hazards to mediation initiated from outside. In the first instance, it must be appreciated that arbitration of such disputes is required by law. In the second instance, mediation is totally dependent upon voluntary participation by the parties concerned and cannot be a substitution for the provisions of the law. To mediate such a dispute, even in the event that the parties agreed to such an approach, would establish a precedent by giving recognition to mediation as a substitute or alternative to the law in such circumstances.

One of the cornerstones of sound industrial relations is the fact that parties to a collective agreement should settle, through the grievance and arbitration procedures of their collective agreement, any disputes which arise as to the meaning of an agreement they freely entered into. A departure from this concept, based in law, through the provision of mediation services by the Department of Labour, is fraught with danger and could lead to difficulties. It would invite both labour and management to avoid the grievance and arbitration procedures where it suited their particular interest of the moment, and would encourage illegal work stoppages. Responsible officers in labour and management who have to cope with day-to-day contract administration would take a very serious view of any initiative by the Minister of Labour which would set a precedent whereby disputes involving interpretation of a collective agreement would be subject to mediation.

Where management and labour are dissatisfied with any particular provision of a collective agreement they have entered into for a set term, there is a remedy under Section 126 of the Canada Labour Code. Subsection 2 reads:

> Nothing in this Section prevents the revision of any provision of a collective agreement other than the provision relating to the term of the collective agreement that under the agreement is subject to revision during the term thereof.

If the two parties do not wish or will not use the arbitration proceedings, it is open to them to change provisions of the agreement if they mutually agree to do so. Another alternative exists. It is not one that I recommend. However, it has been suggested that an industrial inquiry commission be established. Under Section 159 of the Canada Labour Code, the minister may, either upon application or of his own initiative, appoint an industrial inquiry commission to inquire into industrial matters, and such a commission may make recommendations to secure industrial peace and to promote conditions favourable to settlement of disputes.

Such commissions have been appointed in the past, but not in a situation where the dispute involves interpretation of the collective agreement and where a remedy is provided to the parties through the grievance and arbitration procedures in the collective agreement. Commissions take time. The appointment of an industrial inquiry commission does not ensure resumption of work unless the parties agree to resume operations while the industrial inquiry commission hears the dispute. In the current situation involving the Quebec ports, this would require not only an assurance by the union that the employees would return to work, but it would also require the Maritime Employers' Association to lift the suspension placed on the employees. If the parties jointly request the Minister of Labour to appoint an industrial inquiry commission with the assurance that there will be a resumption of operations in the St. Lawrence ports, the minister will give immediate consideration to such a request.

In summary, let me say that the remedies are crystal clear. They are open to the parties. I have expressed willingness at any time to meet with the parties to this dispute, provided that will serve a useful purpose and will not be taken by either party as turning back the clock in order that either of the parties may succeed in disrupting the port and then ask the government to take action. Those who say the government should settle that dispute by certain means, by legislation or mediation or trusteeship are wide of the mark. I set my face against those who would propose those measures at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Connell: What is at stake? It is not only the serious situation in the Montreal ports, but a much larger question. The only way collective bargaining can be made to work is by the parties living up to their obligations. It is a system for free people. If they use it to turn their private rights into public wrongs, they drive another coffin nail into this system of free collective bargaining.

I again ask those parties to come to their senses. I ask them not to use the institutions of liberty to destroy their own freedom. Those who will not use the system as it is established by law must take the consequences. The government will not be prepared to frequently intervene on an ad hoc basis to serve the convenience of parties when they willfully set aside their obligations in circumstances that are gravely injurious to the public interest in Canada and to the interests of their community. If we are called upon frequently to do this, then the system of collective bargaining has broken down, and that is a very serious matter indeed, and it will not be enough to call government in to rescue missions. What the parties will find if they wilfully decline to work the collective bargaining system is that a more searching look at the possibility of modification of the overall system will have to be made. In conclusion, I therefore once again call the attention of the parties to this dispute to their obligations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this motion because it has implications which directly affect all Canada. I shall direct my observations to the manner in which the dispute we are considering will affect the western part of the country. I listened with interest to the minister's speech. It seemed to me, to recall a familiar quotation, that it was full of sound and fury but in the end it signified absolutely nothing. Neither the government nor, in particular, the minister responsible, has had the fortitude to step in to settle this obviously disastrous strike. In these circumstances, I feel compelled to support the motion before us.

Everyone is asking what is the reason for the government's decision not to intervene. In past years, the previous Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) appeared quite adept at settling or promoting a settlement in disputes of this type. Now, in an election year, it seems to me the Liberals are afraid they might antagonize labour in Quebec and lose their already diminishing support. If a dispute of this kind had occurred in the Port of Vancouver, I feel sure the government would have stepped in long ago and the strike would be well on its way to a resolution. Once again it would seem that political considerations are taking precedence over the more important ones, such as our national economy. Now that the strike has been going on for almost six weeks, and since the union has seen fit to ignore several court injunctions, with the result that grain shipments are being tied up and the economy of Montreal is losing $1 million a day, I think the government should realize that things have gone too far. I would like to know why the minister is hesitant to act.

Mr. Speaker, the first and foremost industry affected by this strike is that of grain exporting. In a recent statement, the Chief Commissioner of the Wheat Board said that the board was frustrated and alarmed at the tie-up in grain shipping. He described the situation as calamitous. Although no sales have yet been lost, it is possible that this strike will lose for Canada possible future sales. The approximate loading capacity of the St. Lawrence system is six million bushels a day. Because longshoremen in Baie Comeau, Sorel and Port Cartier have decided to stay on the job, the St. Lawrence is not shut down completely. Thanks to the extra efforts of the longshoremen in these ports we are able to ship three million bushels a day. But this is hardly sufficient.

However, these delays are not only costing vessel owners millions of dollars, they are harming Canada's image abroad. Our overseas customers must be confident that we are able to meet our commitments and that we stick by our agreements. If we acquire a poor reputation in the grain-buying countries, it will surely affect their decision as to whether they should buy grain from us in future. This would apply to any business contract. There is a concept in contract law called frustration which could discharge parties to an agreement if there were events beyond their control which altered the terms or arrangements of the contract. Mr. Speaker, this does not apply here. In fact, the federal government and the minister have every power to control the situation in Montreal and yet they refuse to act.

The astounding thing about the whole affair is that it is revealed that what is primarily a western Canadian industry can be so radically affected by events in the east with which westerners would otherwise have little concern. Because the health of western agriculture is so vitally dependent on foreign sales, it is clear we must devise a transportation system which is free of impediment and which can funnel the product directly to market. Indeed, in a year when foreign sales have been relatively high, and the government has been loudly proclaiming its own success in that regard, it seems a direct contradiction that the government should allow a situation to develop in which it could lose the very sales it says it has worked so hard to gain for us. What is even more disconcerting is that not only could lack of action on the part of the government affect present sales, if action is not soon taken irreparable harm will be done to our ability to find export markets in the future. Inaction by the present government simply does not make sense. In effect, it is an omission which is sabotaging the efforts of the Wheat Board which is just reaching the point of good salesmanship.

This strike has also shown, along with other events, that our transportation system for exporting grain is in need of revamping. About 60 per cent of the grain destined for overseas goes through the St. Lawrence River terminal elevators and about 35 per cent goes through the west coast. This leaves 5 per cent going through the Port of Churchill. This strike has one useful purpose in that it demonstrates to me that we in the west are entirely too dependent on the port facilities of the St. Lawrence for our own good. Of our export grain shipments, 60 per cent are entirely dependent on this system whose terminal is 1500 miles away from western Canada. Now, it is being demonstrated to us with frightening clarity that a strike or some other unforeseeable political event can devastate our western agricultural industry which is so dependent on foreign sales. I think it is time the federal government started spending more money on the Port of Vancouver. It has been pouring money into the Port of Montreal. Also, it is about time that the government realized the potential of Churchill as a prairie port. The fact that it handles only 5 per cent of export grain when its potential is so much greater is conclusive evidence that the government is favouring eastern interests once again. Mr. Speaker, this strike only proves the necessity of alternative port facilities. Otherwise the west is once again going to suffer because of some event 1500 miles away over which it has no control and for which it has no responsibility.

There are many other aspects of the strike of which I should like to remind the minister and which he certainly did not mention in his speech. I hope that while the minister is pondering his inaction, he realizes the devastating effect that the strike is having on the already depressed economies of Montreal and Quebec City. I imagine that we will hear further about this this afternoon from members associated with those areas.

So far over 135 ships and 425,000 tons of cargo have had to be diverted to other ports. This is costing shipping agents upwards of $100,000 a day and the city of Montreal, which indirectly benefits to the tune of some $200 million in the shipping season, is losing millions of dollars. This is not only a blow to the economy of Montreal, it is also a blow to the economy of Canada. With unemployment in Quebec as high as it is, probably hundreds more have had to be laid off because of the indirect effect of this strike. Apparently the port of Montreal is the largest single economic component in the city, with some 10,000 people depending on it directly for their jobs and many others in service industries also affected.

I sometimes wonder at the logic behind these strikes. From my understanding, it is not only an illegal strike, but the reason for it is that management was going to implement a clause to which the union had already agreed. Nevertheless, the union went on strike and even refused arbitration. I should like to know why this particular union should be immune from the law. I am beginning to think that the Quebec provincial Liberals are even exceeded by the federal Liberals in their inability to deal with strikes. I am beginning to think that this union must be more severely dealth with. Although I am not anti-labour, I do not agree with pampering unions which do not act reasonably or within the law. By his inaction, this is what the minister is doing.

The minister, as mentioned today, should be prepared to meet directly with the parties involved and spend as much time as necessary with them until a settlement is reached. I know what a Conservative government would do in this situation: we would have the courage to enforce the law if need be. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Labour that he look very seriously at some form of binding arbitration. I think the situation is getting serious enough that this course must be looked at in a realistic light and without any political overtones.

I should like to make reference to an article that appeared in the Montreal Gazette for June 10 dealing with this strike. It quotes the port manager as having said that the loss of the grain trade is the most important effect of the strike. He said that this was the staple upon which the port depended. It seems that everyone is agreed on the disastrous effects of this strike—the port manager, the business community of Montreal, the Wheat Board, the farmers, the shipping agents and the opposition. I suggest that the Liberals join this group and do something about this strike before irreparable harm is done to potential future grain sales as well as to the port of Montreal itself.

One other point in the article that I should like to comment on is the statement that the Wheat Board officials deny there was any definite plan to circumvent the port. I have come to the conclusion that alternative routes for exporting grain will have to be found, and I will not accept any argument to the contrary. In my view, there is no way that we in the west should tolerate this form of strike, or, for that matter, neither should any other area of Canada. Some 3,200 longshoremen hold the present and future prosperity of western Canada in their hands, in effect, by refusing to come to an agreement. If the port of Montreal is going to be subject to irrational union acts such as this which so drastically affect the future of other innocent regions, then I must say that I am in favour of finding ways of circumventing this port and letting the port pick up its losses from grain in some other way when the strike is over.

I have one final point to make. I think that these illegal strikers and the government should realize that they are doing the port of Montreal a disservice by allowing the strike to continue. It can only harm the port and possibly end in a laying off of the longshoremen. The volume of trade is certainly going to be affected for a long period of time, even after the strike is settled. If this is the case, then all I can say is that these strikers and the government will have brought this upon themselves.

In conclusion, I should like to say that we in the west are sick and tired of unions that ignore all reason and go on strike, tying up the Canadian economy. We are also tired of a government that sits back, does nothing, thus raising many questions about its political conduct.

[Mr. Murta.]

Mr. Pepin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce desires to ask a question.

Mr. Pepin: I just wanted to be sure that the ultimatum that my hon. friend gives the port of Montreal and the union is sent to both coasts, to Vancouver as well. I assume that he wants his message to have national scope and that he does not want to restrict it to the Montreal area. I want to give him a chance of saying so.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the longshoremen's strike in Montreal, which has been underway for nearly six weeks, has caused great harm to the port of Montreal and to the general economy in the Montreal area. As a Montreal Member of Parliament, I have said on several occasions that our port is an essential and basic element to the entire Montreal economy. Montreal has gained its prominence in Canada and throughout the world from its importance as a transportation centre. Montreal is the headquarters of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, Air Canada, many trucking companies, and it has been the site of the most important port in eastern Canada, a port which feeds into all the other modes of transportation. Montreal has been the gateway for the vast bulk of all our commerce passing between Canada and Europe.

The present longshoremen's strike not only threatens the port of Montreal but has the potential to destroy it as well as a large part of the Montreal economy. It seems to be a suicidal or masochistic exercise on the part of those involved. While it is easy to recognize the damaging aspects of the strike, and the anger and frustration of those who need the port of Montreal to carry on their business, it is not so easy to find effective solutions. There are no prototype solutions or magic formulae to settle such strikes.

I discussed this on Tuesday evening when I spoke about this matter during the budget debate. What is required is flexibility and discretion. What will work in one case will not work in another. There was great satisfaction in Montreal several months ago when the longshoremen and the Maritime Employers Association signed their new collective agreement—without a strike, by the way—which was praised on all sides as a significant breakthrough in labour relations for port employees. Many persons were forecasting a renaissance for the port which had suffered from continual labour problems in recent years after experiencing a golden age during the 50's and early 60's.

If I understand correctly, the present dispute has arisen in the following way. The collective agreement stipulated that there were to be no changes in work gangs until the fall when the computer dispatch system was to be introduced. Recently, the Maritime Employers Association introduced certain managerial or administrative changes as permitted by the collective agreement. The longshoremen submitted that these were changes in the work gang, but management said they were not. Following this change by management the longshoremen walked out. This was surprising behaviour because the collective agreement signed by the ILA and MEA only a few months ago provided that such disputes on the interpretation of the collective agreement were to be settled by arbitration, and that any party so grieved could have recourse to such arbitration.

In this case, however, the longshoremen disagreed with a move made by management, but they have not made any move to follow the arbitration procedures in the contract. The minister has said that both parties have the right to apply for arbitration, and he is right. It would be highly unusual for management to request arbitration on their own actions, that is on a change which they consider to be legal and which they introduced under the collective agreement. Furthermore, the longshoremen have stated they will not go to arbitration and they will not recognize arbitration in this manner. This means that if management went to arbitration on their own, they would not only be appealing their own actions but would be involved in ex parte arbitration, running the risk that the arbitration board might rule against them, while on the other hand, even if they should win they would gain nothing. The longshoremen stated they would not recognize the ruling, consequently can the Maritime Employers Association be blamed for not going to arbitration by themselves? The Maritime Employers Association has said it would be willing to go to arbitration with the longshoremen and that it would recognize the arbitration ruling whether it won or lost.

This is an illegal strike and, with all due respect for the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler), it is not a lockout. I have not heard anybody claim it to be a lockout until this point.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am sure this is said in error, that I termed it a lockout or something. I do not recall having said anything about this strike today, yesterday or any day in the immediate past.

Mr. Allmand: I apologize to the hon. member. I was referring to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this is an illegal strike and we should ask what can be done. In the first instance, the Maritime Employers Association or the government could prosecute the union and union leaders under the provisions of the Canada Labour Code, but it is questionable whether this would be the best means of settling this dispute at this time. This action could be taken under Sections 128, 147 and 152 of the Canada Labour Code, Revised Statutes of Canada 1970. The government could intervene either by putting the port and union under trusteeship, or by imposing compulsory arbitration on its own. This could be done either under the labour code or by special law, and I will discuss this in greater detail.

Section 159 of the Canada Labour Code, which was Section 56 in the former Revised Statutes, reads:

> The Minister may either upon application or of his own initiative, where he deems it expedient, make or cause to be made any inquiries he thinks fit regarding industrial matters—

I am not referring to that part, but it continues:

> —and may do such things as seem calculated to maintain or secure industrial peace and to promote conditions favourable to settlement of disputes.

That section sets out the ways in which this could be done, and suggests certain action that can be taken. The government has intervened in this manner in the past, and also through legislation. It has always reserved the right to do so when the public interest requires it. The manner in which this action is taken, however, is extremely important. If the government announces immediately that it will intervene if a settlement is not reached by a certain deadline, then all pressure is taken off the parties to reach a settlement themselves.

Furthermore, in a case like this, if the government had intervened immediately it would not have helped the long-term interest of collective bargaining or freely arrived at collective agreements. This was pointed out by the minister. What value would there be in negotiating a collective agreement, including an arbitration provision, if one of the parties could disregard its own signed agreement and have the government intervene to impose a settlement or a new type of arbitration? If this became a precedent, collective bargaining would become useless. That having been said, there is a time for the government to intervene, but such an intervention should not be a precedent; nor should it be announced in advance. This type of action must be taken with great discretion and wisdom.

During the last few years we have had two important commissions on labour relations. One was the Woods Commission appointed by the Pearson government in 1968, and the other was the recent Cohen Commission in Newfoundland. The report of the latter commission was tabled recently by the Newfoundland government. Let me refer to some of the things the Woods Commission says about public interest and essential service disputes. The report makes seven observations. It is extremely difficult to say in advance in what industries a strike or lockout should be curtailed. The length of a strike or lockout is a critical factor. There is no one policy that can work with uniform success. Flexibility of approach is essential. The determination that a given stoppage of work should be terminated in the public interest is a political decision. This political element is an inducement to the parties to drive the dispute beyond any procedural device and into the political arena. Circumstances may be expected to arise in the course of the industrial conflict in which the fear of the law will be not so strong it will forestall the breaking of that law.

The Woods Commission recommended a three man public interest disputes commission. It recommended that this commission have two functions; first, to determine special procedures for resolving disputes in industries under federal jurisdiction which are prone to disputes that jeopardize the public interest. These procedures might include non-binding arbitration and voluntary binding arbitration as well as the involvement of the commission itself. In the handling of actual disputes by this commission, in which the public interest is threatened, the government should be able to request from the commission a report recommending procedures to terminate the dispute, including possible seizure, trusteeship, partial arbitration of a statutory strike or compulsory arbitration. This could be implemented by act of Parliament.

I, personally, feel that when the strike begins to seriously affect the public interest, then the government must intervene. I have come to the conclusion that this should have been done as of yesterday, and I said so publicly at that time. I feel that the government should order that the men be returned to work and that all outstanding issues be referred to arbitration. If it is necessary, this should be done by special legislation. The minister has said he would not want to do anything to undermine the collective agreement or the collective bargaining process. Generally, I would agree with him, but in this case at this time I believe the collective agreement has been undermined, if not completely destroyed.

• (1500)

The minister has stated that there are arbitration provisions in the collective agreement. He once again appealed to both sides to use them. It seems to me the time has come when we cannot leave this question to the private decision of management and labour alone. I must remind the House once again of some of the things I said last Tuesday evening. Labour relations are such today that there is not only a management and labour interest but also a public interest. In many cases a long, serious strike hurts the public interest much more than it does management or labour.

Mr. Thomson: You said that the other day.

Mr. Allmand: Yes. I am repeating it because it is important. I should like to quote some of the things I said on Tuesday evening. As reported in Hansard at page 3104, I said:

> The basis of the right to strike, which is that the cost to both union and to management will eventually force both to arrive at a compromise, I submit is no longer valid since, first of all, the cost of many strikes is now borne by the public, particularly in the service industries such as transport, education, garbage removal and so on. Second, in other cases the cost of a strike is carried by suppliers and sellers of a product.

I gave the example of a recent canning strike which ruined many tomato growers while only partially inconveniencing union and management. There was hardly any cost to management and labour but the tomato growers were completely ruined by the strike. I referred to agreements arrived at recently in certain countries where the employees of one airline were on strike. It was agreed that the additional revenue gained by other airlines would, after deduction of costs, be given to the struck airline, or management simply could raise prices.

I conclude by again referring to a quotation. I do so because it is important. I wish to repeat the quotation I gave in the House the other night and to which many people have recently referred. Mr. George Meany, head of the AF of L-CIO, stated recently that labour should voluntarily replace strikes with reliance upon binding arbitration for a one-year period. He said that the strike is a nineteenth century tactic, and with the advent of corporate giants and correspondingly super-unions, strikes become even-matched struggles which drag on for weeks, radiating economic shock waves far beyond the limits of the actual conflict.

I cannot understand the minister when he says that government intervention at this time would destroy the collective agreement or destroy the collective bargaining process, because we have intervened in this way in the past. In this case the parties to some extent have already destroyed the collective agreement. It seems ludicrous to me that as Montreal goes down the drain, the government, which is to protect the public interest, clings to principles which have already been thrown out by those whom they are meant to serve.

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), has conscientiously and seriously presented a motion calling on the government to immediately end the dock strike. As a member for the Montreal area of Lachine, Dorval and Ste. Claire I am proud to have seconded the motion. It is too bad that just at the end of the speech of the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) refused to allow the hon. member to finish his speech, because there were important proposals the hon. member wished to make. As the seconder of his motion, I want at the outset to read into the record his proposals, if you do not mind, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The solutions proposed by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) are as follows:

The Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) should:

A) call the bargaining agents who have participated in the preparation of the agreement for both parties and invite them to convince their respective groups to use arbitration;

B) make a specific statement in which he should establish the disastrous effects of this impasse on our economy and indicate clearly that in the public interest the situation could not last longer;

C) advise the parties that if they do not start arbitration procedures pursuant to their agreement within 48 hours, the minister will appoint one of the arbitrators designated in the agreement;

D) implement section 5-01 (7) concerning grievances;

E) immediately express his intention to amend the Canada Labour Code so that the Department of Labour could intervene immediately by imposing arbitration when the parties refuse to do so;

F) provide for a procedure ensuring that in any labour-management dispute under his jurisdiction, the federal government will see to it that a secret ballot is compulsory in labour union meetings and reflects a minimum membership participation for a work stoppage or strike to be decided.

[English]

It is too bad the hon. member for Témiscamingue did not give the hon. member permission to put forward these proposals at the end of his speech. I think this was stupidity on his part.

The Quebec illegal, wildcat dock strike is the worst strike in Quebec's history. In economic terms, its effects will be very harmful to Montreal for years to come. In fact, there will be no catching up; what is lost will remain lost. The $200 million yearly input into the Montreal economy is being dwindled away, and 10,000 jobs are directly affected. An equal number of persons are indirectly affected. Alternative shipping routes have been found. As a result of these alternative shipping routes having been established, the shipping that has been lost may not return to Montreal.

The transportation hub of Montreal is threatened to such an extent that this loss may be permanent. One hundred and thirty-two ships left Montreal with full holds or were diverted to other ports at the beginning of the strike. Prairie grain is being shipped by alternate routes. There is talk of flour mills moving their operations out of our province. This would result in loss of jobs, pensions, and so on.

Management has appealed to the federal government to take action to stop the strike. The Montreal Chamber of Commerce has asked that the federal government take action. The only action taken so far by the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) is indicated in a release from his department entitled "Labour News Headlines", issued by the Canada Department of Labour on June 2, which reads:

> Labour minister, Martin O'Connell, has refused to permit St. Lawrence stevedoring firms to prosecute a union of 3,250 dockworkers on strike for more than three weeks in defiance of court injunctions.

• (1510)

The government is shirking its responsibility in this illegal, wildcat strike. As always in situations such as this, the government has taken a laissez faire attitude. Like an ostrich, it has hidden its head in the sand and hopes that the problems will disappear by themselves. This government has allowed the deterioration of port business in the Montreal area to take place. This has affected 10,000 jobs directly and another 10,000 related jobs.

In other words, this government has again capitulated, as it has in the case of every strike affecting the federal jurisdiction. It capitulated in other dock strikes. It capitulated when our airports were shut down. It capitulated in the seaway workers' strike. It has often capitulated by allowing things to happen and never taking the initiative. This government is so weak that it has lost its credibility. It should not remain in office. This government has allowed the U.S.S.R. to build turbines for Canada, to the detriment of Dominion Engineering Works in Lachine and of Canadian expertise. It has allowed the importation of huge generators and transformers, to the detriment of Canadian manufacturers and Canadian expertise. It has allowed the importation of machinery for the production of paper, to the detriment of Canadian manufacturers and Canadian expertise.

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rock: Later, Mr. Speaker. I want to finish my speech first. Since 1968, when this government took office, Dominion Engineering has laid off over 900 workers and Northern Electric has laid off over 3,000 employees. Presently, Northern Electric is in the process of laying off approximately 370 more employees, many with 25 or 30 years of seniority. On many occasions the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has implied that this is not happening. He has done nothing to alleviate this serious situation: he takes an ostrich-like attitude and buries his head in the sand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rock: I believe that Bruce Taylor of the Montreal Gazette put it correctly in that paper's issue of Wednesday, June 14, when he wrote the following:

> The shadow of the axe hanging over the Northern Electric employees looms larger. Jobs continue to dwindle, salary slashing is in the works, and more departments will be phased out or shifted to Ontario before long. (Company denials will come, but won't mean much. It's denied other such reports that time has proved to be accurate).

When I have asked questions in this regard, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has joined Northern Electric in their denials which later were proved to be accurate. So here we have a government which has adopted a policy of laissez faire and has capitulated at every turn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat, please. Would the hon. member indicate to the Chair the relevance—I am not suggesting there is no relevance—of his remarks to the motion before the House. Would he indicate the relevance of the employment situation, to which he is referring, to the motion before the House?

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to give examples of how this government has allowed things to happen which are detrimental to the economy of our country. I am referring to strikes and other situations in which the government has taken no action. Since 1968 this government has capitulated whenever a strike has taken place. It has allowed our economy to deteriorate by adding more unemployment to the unemployment already caused by its policy to fight inflation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has publicly confessed to this policy on many occasions.

This strike is now in its sixth week, and the government continues to refuse to intervene. It has failed to put an end to the strike. It has capitulated at every turn. This government does not lead, nor is it led. It has lost its credibility, and in fact it has no moral right to remain in office after June of next year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rock: May I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I believe this government must adopt the motion put forward by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, and it should intervene forthwith to end the strike immediately.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the matter before us is not only of concern to members from the province of Quebec; it is a national problem and as such we are all concerned.

Mr. Woolliams: We want to know which side you are on, the farmers' or the strikers'.

Mr. Thomson: Quite frankly, as a farmer I myself can get the grain to market. If the hon. member can tell me, when he makes his speech, how I can get the grain past the port of Montreal, the port of Vancouver, or somewhere else, directly to the customer I would be only too happy to hear how it can be done. I like to think that people who work at these ports recognize that they have a product to handle and it is important to people such as myself, representing a farm community which grows a product, to have it shipped to the customer. We live in an interdependent world. The matter before us points this up more than anything else.

I would be cautious about laying the blame on either management or labour in this respect. I am not close to the situation and therefore I am not in a position to judge. But I do stress the importance of this problem not only to the city of Montreal, the city of Quebec, the province of Quebec or the businessmen there, but to the economy as a whole, particularly to the people of Saskatchewan, the province from which I come.

As I listened earlier to the minister speaking about the problem, I was reminded of the story of the businessman who was travelling on a train. He went into the diner and ordered a particular pudding for dessert. For some reason this pudding was not available. The businessman became very angry and said, "My company gives this railroad hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of business every year, yet when I get on this train you cannot even supply me with a dish of pudding". The chef happened to know that they were coming to a large city and he wired ahead to have the pudding ready when the train arrived there. Just as the train was pulling into the station it was time for dessert, and they rushed a dish of pudding to the businessman and offered it to him. But the businessman would not eat it. He said, "I would rather be mad".

When I listened to the minister refer to these two parties not even wanting to come to the bargaining table, I was reminded of the story. They would rather be mad at each other than get together and solve the problem. I suggest that perhaps the two parties concerned should look at the situation in that light. I would say to them: Grow up a little.

We in the Prairies have known for some time that we must ship much of our grain to markets outside of Canada through the St. Lawrence Seaway, and in this case much of it goes through Montreal. This just goes to show that if someone sneezes in Montreal, someone on the Prairies is apt to catch a cold. If there is no sale or movement of grain on the Prairies, this is soon reflected in the industry of Ontario and Quebec. It all demonstrates how interdependent we are in this age.

This points to the need to develop new measures to solve industrial disputes. I ask you to notice, Mr. Speaker, that I do not say labour disputes. They are industrial disputes because there are two sides to them. As I say, we have to evolve new methods for solving them. I have some ideas but I hesitate to suggest them in an emergency situation that has given rise to an atmosphere where anger and hard feelings have been shown. But we can point to other countries where workers do not go on strike over every little problem that develops. Here I think of Sweden especially.

As a Saskatchewan farmer, I emphasize the importance of sales of grain to export markets. At the moment these sales are quite large. But it is not enough that we sell the grain, we must also get it to market and, logically, much of it must go through the port of Montreal and the St. Lawrence Seaway. While the price we get for our grain may not be as attractive as farmers would like, the large volume of sales has somewhat alleviated their problems. As a result, it is necessary that we keep a large volume of grain moving. Much of it must go through the St. Lawrence Seaway.

The problem is not confined to this year alone. If we have an unfavourable labour record at Montreal it will jeopardize our sales in succeeding years. Customers wonder about our ability to move grain. A similar situation arose recently in the port of New York. There were many problems at that port, many industrial disputes, as a result of which businessmen started to arrange to transfer their business elsewhere over a long period of time.

As a grain shipper from western Canada, I would like to point out to hon. members who represent the city of Montreal that western farmers are concerned about the reputation of the port of Montreal. If we cannot ship our grain through Montreal we will have to take a closer look at developing the port of Churchill, at enlarging facilities at Prince Rupert and placing better facilities at Vancouver. But logically Montreal is one port through which we should be shipping grain. Let me simply say that if the problem continues we will have to look elsewhere. This is a problem that affects not only Montreal but the people of the Prairies.

The National Farmers Union has suggested that, if necessary, the government might take over the port facilities at Montreal until the present problem is resolved. I suggest that the Department of Labour should be looking at this matter quite closely if the strike cannot be resolved by some other means. I heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) argue with a great deal of eloquence about the way strikes are settled in this day and age. But, Mr. Speaker, this strike is not being settled. I think the minister might use his moral authority a little more forcefully. Sometimes in a situation of this kind the moral leadership given by a minister can bring the parties together and make them ashamed of themselves for not negotiating. It is not enough for the minister to sit in Ottawa and scold them from a distance; he should show a little more initiative and leadership directly on the spot, in the hope that this might resolve the situation.

One hon. member from Montreal has reported on the effect of the dispute on business in that city. This reminds me of a friend who once told me that it is a poor business deal that does not benefit both parties. Mr. Speaker, in this case the public is the third party and it is a poor deal for all parties when there is no settlement of the strike. I wish to make just one more point. I recall working one winter on the railway in the city of Toronto. I came from the Prairies, where everyone is known and, indeed, where everyone is important. There is no problem there about identification. But I came into a big city and began working for a big railroad. The workers were represented by a big union and I can recall wondering about the problem of self-identification. I may have felt quite important back home, but nobody seemed to care in Toronto. If some day a man didn't show up for work, they just got somebody else to take his place.

I cannot help feeling that part of the problem connected with the settlement of disputes is that nobody knows, nobody cares. Whether you go to work or do not go to work is not noticed, unless there is a strike. Sometimes the only reward or attention you get is when you do something out of the way. This is part of the total problem. This sense of identification, of being needed and wanted, must be examined in a society where cities are growing larger, where businesses are becoming bigger and where labour is represented by larger organizations. If this problem is tackled, some of the other problems may be easier to resolve.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Saint-Henri): Mr. Speaker, allow me to rise and discuss the question raised this morning by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade).

The hon. member dealt with the question of the port of Montreal and said it was urgent to move a motion to this effect. However, it is unfortunate that himself and the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Rock), who just resumed his seat, turned the serious problem of the strike in Quebec ports into a political issue.

Speakers from the two other parties have dealt sensible with this problem and proposed to the minister and the government various ways of settling it. But they did not try to turn it into a political issue which, I suggest, would have been quite out of place. There is an appropriate time for everything. Some issues may be used for politicking but I think that this problem is so serious that we should refrain from petty politics as has been attempted today.

I might go as far as agreeing that this motion had become necessary, even though I do not fully endorse it, because it must be kept in mind that even though this motion comes from the opposition, there are Montreal members on this side of the House. And even if, day after day, we do not put any questions to the minister in this connection, this does not mean that we are not concerned. In fact, as a member from Montreal, I can state along with my colleagues from that area that we have discussed this matter many times with the minister and that we are quite anxious to find a solution to this problem which threatens to get worse every day.

If the government tries to settle a public problem too hastily, it is told: You have not given the union and union members enough time to settle their problems with their employers. If the government postpones its intervention and gives more freedom to the union and union members for further discussion with employers, it is told: You are too slow to act.

In fact, I can affirm that my colleagues from the Montreal area, as well as myself, have often discussed this matter with the minister. We are quite willing to find a solution to the problem which might get worse as the days go by.

True, as I said a while ago, we are aware of the prejudice caused by this dispute to the economy of Montreal and the area. It is estimated at $1 million per day. Since the goods cannot be unloaded in the port of Montreal, they must be routed to Toronto, Halifax or elsewhere, which, besides causing a direct loss to the port of Montreal, results also in losses for the Montreal area carriers who used to provide that service.

Some goods are held in other ports, so that dealers run the risk of losing sales. Extra storage, trucking and freight charges add to the cost of such goods, which is prejudicial to the economy and explains why this problem has become quite serious. And this is why we have had extensive public discussions with the minister and some of his officials.

When the collective agreement between the Longshoremen's or "Stevedores" Union—as they like to be called—and the Maritime Employers Association of Montreal harbour was signed last March, it was hailed by both parties as the best agreement in North America. Everyone gloried in the fact that for the first time in years peace might have returned to Quebec harbours which could thus resume their former place in Canada. Actually, it must be recognized that for the last four or five years, the situation in Quebec harbours, particularly in Montreal, has not been an easy one. And following the signing of this collective agreement which gave Canadian longshoremen greater benefits than American stevedores enjoy, people thought that the situation had been settled and that within the next two or three years, Montreal harbour would thrive once again, that jobs would be created and, by the same token, that the whole metropolitan area would reap these benefits. Unfortunately, this agreement was short-lived.

As a solution, it was suggested that an inquiry commission be established. As the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) has indicated, the establishment of an inquiry commission would delay the solution of the problem. Too much time would elapse before the chairman of this commission could be selected, before hearing the evidence of those who favour or oppose the establishment of the commission, and before being acquainted with the views of both parties, in order to reach a decision.

Today, I am of the opinion that the minister has waited for the parties to come to an agreement, but they do not want to. The matter is becoming more urgent day by day.

The hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) read into the record this morning the French version of the collective agreement dealing with grievances, but I must now quote from the English text since it is the only copy at hand. Subsection D) of Section 5 of the Grievance Procedure is very clear, and I quote:

• (1530)

[English]

(d) A request for arbitration may be initiated by either the union or the Maritime Employers Association. The party requesting the arbitrator shall set forth in writing the matter submitted to the arbitrator and send a copy of it to the other party.

[Translation]

Today, Mr. Speaker, the employers' syndicate says: We are quite willing to go to arbitration, but the International Longshoremen Association does not agree. The longshoremen union says: "We refuse, and we are right to do it."

Nor do we, the Minister and I, want to act as arbitrators. Nor does the government. In view of the fact that this collective agreement was freely entered into by both parties and since it is provided in this section that either party may ask to go to arbitration, the dispute can only be settled now if the longshoremen union or the employer's Association applies for arbitration. If either party can apply for it and if the appeal can be heard as provided in the collective agreement, I call on the more intelligent of the two parties, to take such action.

Let neither of the two say: I do not want to do it because the other party does not want to. Is either of them afraid of the arbitrators' decision?

This collective agreement also supplies the name of four persons who could be chosen as arbitrators to settle a grievance. And I know from good authority that the first name on this list is the hon. Mr. Justice A. B. Gold, who is ready and available for hearing this dispute. But if the judge wishes to hear the grievances, they must be presented.

That reminds me of a small family quarrel, when husband and wife through pride or conceit do not want to give in.

It is necessary in the public interest, in that of the Canadian economy and particularly in that of Quebec which suffers so much from all those conflicts between unions and management, to come to an agreement.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to say here that employers are wrong or blame the longshoremen's union. It will be for the judge to find the solution to the problem.

The few notes which I have on the collective agreement are very simple and very clear. Section 5 (g) reads as follows:

[English]

(g) The arbitrator will have jurisdiction over any question relating to the interpretation or application of this agreement as well as the application modalities and implementation of an arbitration decision, but he will in no case be empowered to amend, add to, or delete any part of this agreement.

(h) The arbitrator's decision will be final and binding.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is clear and simple. If the two parties involved do not step forward and ask for arbitration—and I trust the Minister of Labour—the two parties will have to sit at the same table and a final decision will have to be reached.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that both parties know, the longshoremen's union as well as the employers' association, that sooner or later solutions will be applied. I wonder, however—because I know they are intelligent men—whether after five weeks of delay that have forced 150 ships to sail to other Canadian ports, it might not be time for the parties involved to ask for arbitration themselves.

This is only a plea. I do not accuse one party or the other. I would not want to be the judge who will decide, but the collective agreement is quite clear. I am not a lawyer, but it is so clear and simple that I have easily understood that the parties have all the powers, but they will have to put their pride or self-respect aside and refer their problem to the judge, so that he may consider it, in order to find a solution.

We must keep in mind that the economy of Quebec is affected by that conflict, as I said a while ago. It is losing $1 million daily.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask again the employers' organization as well as the longshoremen's union to resort to arbitration.

So far, questions have been put to the minister in the House, and he has repeated, day after day—and I would have said the same thing—that he dared not get involved in a collective agreement which, as I said earlier, has been signed in good faith by both parties, an agreement in which the use of computers is dealt with.

The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) said this morning that computers were already installed. If my information is accurate, they are not, but will be only in September, and there seems to be some disagreement, now, regarding this. If I remember correctly—I do not have the text of the agreement before me—as long as the computers are not working, the clauses of the old agreement will apply.

It seems that following the one-day walkout, out of sympathy for the labour common front about the troubles which occurred recently in the province of Quebec, the Maritime Employers' Association has changed its position and said that this one-day strike was a breach of contract. It may be true because such a day was not provided in the contract and there was a breach of contract.

I think this was unfortunate and I appeal to altruism because there is no doubt employers are never affected by a strike; it is the employees who suffer. Unions always manage rather well, but the employees get hurt.

• (1540)

I was talking yesterday to one of the Montreal blue collars who have just ended a 5-week strike and I jokingly welcomed him and his truck to the Montreal area. He pointed out to me that before the strike he was eating in a restaurant but since he was not working he ate sandwiches.

I will spare the House the language he used as it would not be parliamentary. I mean to say that the same thing happens each time there is a strike.

I received between 1 and 2 o'clock a group of young students from my constituency who attended part of the debate. They asked a few questions about its nature and its effects. And I was pleased to tell them what it was all about.

There is a solution which other hon. members have mentioned, and I believe, it is getting increasingly imperative to come to it in labour-management relations. More than ever before, I think, it is time to establish in all fields of endeavour—and I spoke to the Minister of Labour about it—a council or a supreme labour tribunal, because on many occasions strikes are settled only after 5, 6 or 7 weeks and often the employers' proposals made in the beginning of the negotiation period are accepted. The pattern is always the same: it is always the small man who suffers.

I live in a labour district where strikes are frequent, and those who are the most needy are always the ones who suffer the most, and not union leaders nor management, because these have always the means to wait and to recoup. And management often brings pressure to bear against unions.

It is time to start establishing fair and effective standards and making available to employees all the means and resources required to air their grievances. I am generally in favour of labour unions, although in some cases I may have reservations about their integrity.

About a year ago, I made a speech in which I was condemning the unions on a specific matter. As a general rule unions have a right to exist, but there are still too many workers who are not unionized, unfortunately.

We may hope that in the present conflict union members will land on their feet and those aware of the terms of the longshoremen's collective agreement know that their remuneration is quite high. However, they themselves will be penalized and the consequences will affect the economy.

I therefore renew my request, appealing as sympathetically, as humanely as possible to both the Employers Association and the Longshoremen's union, that one of the other party call for arbitration. The collective agreement, I repeat, was signed in good faith, both parties agreeing to the paragraph I mentioned providing that if either party files such a request for arbitration the mediator will have to hear the case and render a decision, since something must be done, and otherwise the government will eventually have to take action.

If the Maritime employers' Association or the International Longshoremen's Association do not fill out a request by this weekend, I shall urge the minister of Labour to intervene early next week.

I understand his reluctance to get involved in an agreement that was concluded between these parties, but if neither of them, as prescribed by the collective agreement, files a request for arbitration, I would ask the Minister of Labour to intervene at the very beginning of next week so that a solution to the problem of Quebec ports may be found.

[English]

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of my announcement earlier that I was retiring from active politics, an event that may come later this year may mean this is my last opportunity to address the illustrious members of this august House. I want to take this opportunity to personally thank Your Honour and, through you, all the other Speakers, Deputy Speakers, officials of the House and members of parties connected with the conduct of business here for the courtesy and kindness extended over the years to me, my wife and family. I would also like to say that if any members visit the great province of Saskatchewan, they are more than welcome to drop in and visit us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Southam: It goes without saying that when we have before the House an issue such as we have today, as a western member vitally interested in the transportation of grain to market I should rise in my place and comment on this very serious situation.

First, Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) for bringing forward the important matter of the Montreal dockworkers' strike through his motion under our rules which allow opposition members to raise matters of great urgency. I also compliment the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) and the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Rock) for their very comprehensive remarks in connection with this serious matter.

I should like to review some of the events leading to the present serious situation. I trust hon. members will excuse me if I take up the time of the House for a few minutes; I was not here during all the speeches made this afternoon. In any event, I believe the people of Saskatchewan will be interested in the preliminary observations I have to make in connection with the great port of Montreal and the effect the strike there will have on the Canadian economy generally as well as upon Montreal itself.

I should like to list a few of these events. National Harbours Board ports in Canada handled a record 93.7 million tons of traffic in 1971, up by 7.9 per cent from 1970. The port of Montreal, however, showed a decline of 5.4 per cent in tonnage handled during the same period. Since May 16 the port of Montreal has been paralyzed by striking longshoremen numbering about 3,200. The ports of Quebec and Trois-Rivières are also affected. Grain is the staple item of commerce on which the ports depend, and since the strike began 500,000 tons of grain have been diverted to other ports.

According to the chairman of the Wheat Board, Canada will be unable to honour her commitments in respect of European markets because of the strike. I shall repeat that statement because it is of vital interest to myself personally, to my province and, I am sure, to all of western Canada. According to the chairman of the Wheat Board, Canada will be unable to honour her commitments respecting wheat shipments to European markets, as planned, because of the strike.

I should like to give the House some background information with respect to this strike which is paralyzing the great harbour of Montreal. It is costing shipping agents in Montreal alone an estimated $100,000 a day. The cost to the community in lost salaries and direct income exceeds $1 million a day. At least 132 ships have sailed from Montreal or have been diverted from the port with full holds. This represents a loss of 425,000 tons of cargo. Ten thousand people depend directly on the port for jobs, and many times this number employed in service industries are adversely affected by the strike.

The port pumps approximately $250 million a year into the Montreal economy. A consortium of five large Japanese shipping companies which has been scouting for an eastern Canadian terminus for its ships has decided to give Montreal a wide berth even as a secondary distribution centre. A foreign automobile manufacturer who had been seriously considering Montreal as a base for increased unloading capacity in eastern Canada, is having second thoughts. Material for a display destined for China and vaunting the strength of the Canadian economy is held up in the strikebound port. Export grains shipments to Russia and other destinations across the Atlantic have been rescheduled out of terminals on the north shore of the St. Lawrence River and more than 100 jobs in the Montreal area could disappear as a result.

Quebec Longshoremen's Strike

Mr. Speaker, I believe hon. members would be interested in a further brief outline of the main events in this dispute. On March 30 of this year management and labour signed a three-year contract aimed at improving the port's obviously low productivity by eliminating the outmoded gang system. In return, the employers provided the men with job security and a lucrative pension scheme. The agreement was subsequently ratified by the union rank and file. Irregular work stoppages began on May 9, culminating in a walkout by 3,200 longshoremen on May 16. The strike directly affects the harbours of Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières, paralyzing transport over much of eastern Canada.

What was the main cause of this strike? The main gripe which set off the wildcat action arose from dissatisfaction over changes made in the system of work gangs. In the last labour contract management won the right to break up the work gangs. They were to be replaced by a computer system which was to come into effect this fall. Instead of a constant unit of 17 men doing all jobs, the computer would call up only those men needed for any particular task. The men signed and ratified the agreement, but when the break-up of the work gangs started, they walked out.

What was the reaction of management to this situation? Attempts at negotiation failed and three court injunctions ordering the men back to work were ignored. On May 31, the Maritime Employers Association suspended the striking longshoremen. Management has offered to ask for arbitration providing the union will attend the sessions and abide by the decision of an independent arbitrator. As yet there has been no success in bringing the two parties together. Labour took the following position: the day after their suspension, about 300 members of Montreal local 375 of the ILA voted to continue the walkout at the three St. Lawrence ports. Only about one-tenth of the available union members took part in the vote. The union president said the men were prepared to stay out for as long as was necessary to gain a satisfactory settlement. An unnamed spokesman for the union stated there was no question of arbitration.

The federal government took its usual position in such cases. The Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) has repeatedly called on either or both parties to make use of the arbitration clause in their contract in order to settle the dispute. He has often declared his intention not to interfere, both to this House and to the press. It is the usual story—Nero fiddled while Rome burned.

Let us review, now, the short-term problems resulting from this strike. Until the early 1960s the port of Montreal enjoyed an enviable reputation. It could handle goods more cheaply than anywhere else in North America. Labour relations, though paternalistic, were good and strikes were infrequent. In the late 1960s, government and labour forces pushed through a contract on behalf of the International Longshoremen's Association which, among other things, fixed the size of labour gangs unloading ships at an arbitrary number regardless of the number actually needed. Production declined drastically. One Montreal company estimates that in 1966, 20-man gangs handled about 35 tons of flour an hour. Today, 17-man gangs handle a maximum of 16 tons an hour. This means ships stay in port for longer periods at a cost of between $2,500 and $3,000 a day. This has grave implications for the future of the port since an important factor in the scheduling of shipping today is the speed at which cargo can be unloaded.

Statistics Canada reports that more vessles visited Montreal in 1971 than in 1970, and figures issued by the National Harbours Board shows steady increases in general cargo tonnage handled over the past five years. Nevertheless, the effects of United States dock strikes on certain Canadian ports may have inflated the figures in relation to the total cargo handled. In fact, Montreal's through cargo declined by 5.4 per cent in 1971.

• (1600)

Canadian Pacific, although its headquarters is in Montreal, located its new container terminal in Quebec City, claiming it was more economic. And last summer a gang of shippers suggested that one solution to Montreal's labour problems would be to close the port. "Most of us can do our shipping through maritime ports with only minor inconvenience or additional cost; it is drastic but it might be the only way," said one company president.

Federal intervention has done little to ease the problems plaguing the labour situation. In the recent Montreal longshoremen's strike federal intervention has been non-existent. Despite pleas by the Montreal Chamber of Commerce and the Quebec Truckers Association, the Minister of Labour has refused to interfere. Rather, he has repeatedly called for either or both parties to make use of an arbitration clause in their contract to settle the dispute. Federal failure is not limited to labour relations. Its transportation policy, as it applies specifically to Montreal and generally to all ports under the National Harbours Board, has failed adequately to assess the needs of and directions for the future administration of the port.

A year ago, on May 12, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) announced a new policy for ports. He proposed creation of local port authorities for each of the nine major ports now administered by the National Harbours Board. These local port authorities were to be representative of all local interests including management and labour, municipal and provincial authorities. Each was to have a good deal of authority, including consultation in the appointment of port managers, the preparation of budgets, forward planning and other important matters. At that time the Minister of Transport stated that the federal objective "must be concerned with the good of all Canadians and not just with any particular vested interest".

However, various comments by those asked to serve on the local port authorities raise serious questions about the eventual success of the federal government's objectives. In Montreal, several men asked to serve and the port authorities flatly refused. They pointed out that they could not very well run a major enterprise which would require them to make decisions regarding their own competitors. There could be also a conflict of interest with labour appointees in a decision between the efficient running of the harbour concerned and the demands of the labour union members. Conflicts of interest could well cause serious damage to the harbour concerned. Instead of serving national interests, the port authorities could easily become involved in individual concerns, reflecting the make-up of the local boards.

What is therefore needed, and what has not yet been suggested by the Minister of Transport—despite the fact that members of the port authorities of Montreal, Halifax, St. John's, Saint John, Quebec, Trois-Rivières, Churchill, Manitoba and Vancouver have been announced—is government controls. The Minister of Transport must place controls on the power of the National Ports Council's influence over the Department of Transport and the National Harbours Board. He must also establish who is going to be responsible for policy-making and for coordinating the activities of the various ports. These controls are essential if the outcome is to be fair to all concerned in all regions of the country.

What is the long term prospect, Mr. Speaker? A major problem affecting Montreal in the long run, as in the short run, is its lack of effective administration. The newly established port authority in its present form does not promise much improvement over the past administrative performance of the National Harbours Board. And yet the future of Montreal's harbour depends upon adequate planning and definition of goals. Further, it is important that the establishment of these goals be made in the context of nationwide transport policy which realistically reflects the potential of Montreal within an integrated national system.

The future of shipping lies in containerization. A critical factor in profitable and efficient ocean container transportation is to see that inland container movement and inland terminals adapt to increasing flows. According to R. R. Cope, vice-president of research for the Department of Transport:

> The critical factor in influencing the directional flow of containerized cargo between the Atlantic hinterland and overseas points through the Atlantic and St. Lawrence ports will likely be the adjustments made by the inland carriers in rates and services to accommodate containerization.

In the context of substantial increases in container traffic, Montreal's future is not good. The port's potential is limited by its spatial placement between the river and railway tracks. There is little room, and no plans for future expansion to permit quick unloading of large quantities of containerized cargo. As well, the proximity of the harbour to the downtown centre hinders quick and easy access to and from the waterfront both by trains and/or trucks. Essential to efficient sea-land transport is the facility of access for loaded vehicles to main trucking and train routes.

Obviously, the direction of future development for the harbour of Montreal must be studied carefully. It is most important that the port's potential be seen in the context of national goals. If an east coast port, such as Halifax, can be more suitably developed as the main container terminal for eastern Canada, then futile dreams of maintaining Montreal as the country's premier general cargo port must die. The port's future role must be assessed according to its potential but, as has been stressed, in the context of future directions of transportation methods as they affect the entire country.

Bringing this matter closer to home rather than speaking in general terms about how it affects the entire country, I ask, how does it affect our agricultural industry? It affects it in a most serious way, particularly my province of Saskatchewan which produces so much grain and depends on our major ports to keep this grain moving to world markets. Our party, on checking only yesterday with officials of the Canadian Wheat Board, found that the board, as well as all other representatives of the Canadian grain trade and farm organizations, are expressing the greatest alarm at the cutback in grain shipments from the port of Montreal. The government cannot salve its conscience by saying the grain will move through other ports. The fact is that these ports are now working to capacity in most cases and can not be expected to handle the extra volume of large amounts of grain. This means delayed deliveries to our customers, possible loss of markets to certain customers and a direct drop in farmers' income.

The fact is that the only remaining hope that even our large grain producers in the west have is that they produce large yields per acre and market these yields on a larger quota annually, having regard to the much lower price per bushel our farmers are now receiving for all their grain products. I want to re-emphasize what the hon. member for Lisgar referred to in his speech a few minutes ago, and that is that the effect of the Montreal dockworkers' strike more than points up the fact that the government should immediately take steps to enlarge grain handling facilities at both the ports of Churchill and Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to inform him his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as a member from the Montreal area and representative of a riding through which the St. Lawrence Seaway passes, I am very much interested in the prosperity of the port of Montreal, as are also several of my fellow-citizens from the south shore area of Montreal.

[English]

A number of factors with which we are all too familiar have combined during the past few years to put, if not the future at least the future greatness of Montreal in doubt. Located at the entrance to the Great Lakes industrial heartland of North America, surrounded by the richest agricultural land in Quebec, within easy distance of abundant mineral resources, and endowed with one of the world's most scenic locations, Montreal attracts an energetic and cosmopolitan population which gives to this city an incomparable spirit and character. Being so richly endowed with human and physical resources, I am convinced that Montreal's future is to be to Canada what New York is to the United States. Yet if that is Montreal's objective, we have lost ground.

• (1610)

[Translation]

Never before has it been more important to fight against the narrow-mindedness which, if it were successful, would make Montreal a city of strictly regional or provincial importance. The authorities in Montreal and Quebec, as well as the federal member from Quebec, must give strong support to broadening Montreal's national and international role. One essential element of Montreal's future depends directly on the federal government, and that is our port: it stands closed today almost forsaken by all maritime transport companies.

[English]

The strike now in progress, unexpected as it was in the midst of the general euphoria surrounding the signing of the three-year contract, is a terrible setback not only to Montreal's legitimate aspirations to greatness in maritime commerce but to the entire business atmosphere of this great city. The side effects of port activity on Montreal business are enormous. This port brings in revenue from customs and excise duties, not necessarily all attributable to maritime activity, of $329 million a year. In addition, the money generated by port activities is a figure somewhere around $225 million. I think that is probably a low figure.

As a result of the present strike at least two shipping companies have moved their lifters and transporters by train, in one case to Halifax and in another to Saint John, New brunswick. The Canadian Importers Association has now advised its contacts and its principals in Europe and elsewhere in the world to re-route cargo into Montreal by methods other than the maritime method, at least from now until the beginning of September.

We in the Montreal region are in the midst of a crisis which I do not think too many of our citizens yet appreciate. We have tended to have strikes and see them settled on a more or less acceptable basis over the years. I submit this situation is more dangerous than any I have witnessed since I first entered the House of Commons in 1963.

The situation, as I read it, has deteriorated to the point where the employers, in agreeing to this three-year contract, have tied themselves into a fairly expensive provision of annual wage guarantees to the dockworkers. It would appear the employers now find themselves in a position where, even if the port is immediately reopened, they will be in serious financial difficulty. Ships have left, they have been turned away, and ships headed here have been diverted elsewhere. The employers would find themselves in extremely serious financial circumstances in maintaining the financial terms of the contract they entered into if the men were to go back to work tomorrow.

The background of this dispute is still not completely clear to me or, I suggest, to anyone else. There are a number of factors affecting the union's attitude and a number affecting the employers' attitude. From my understanding of the situation, there is a considerable amount of fault on both sides to this dispute. In most instances this is the case. There are usually two sides to the story and the Montreal strike is no exception. There is serious fault, in my view, on both sides and there is no inclination that I can see by either party to take the measures, open and incumbent upon them under the law, to submit to arbitration.

Given these circumstances, I say to the government there is no longer any choice. It must, in my view, adopt more than the passive role it has taken up to now. The Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) has acted correctly in saying to the parties that under the law he cannot force them to enter into arbitration. He has pleaded with them to do so. He has asked both sides to submit to the legal method available to them to resolve their disputes. But both parties have refused.

We have waited for several weeks for a move, but nothing has happened. We can no longer allow the business atmosphere of Montreal to be poisoned or the future of the port to be permanently damaged. I was not surprised, but very depressed this afternoon when I heard members from western Canada more or less write off the port of Montreal. The message is clear; people are writing off the port of Montreal and its future. The port of Montreal is far too important to Canada as a whole to be written off.

The two parties to this dispute appear unwilling or unable to make a move. The government, in the public interest, must now move into the situation and by legislation if necessary and trusteeship if necessary force a conclusion to what is now occurring in Montreal. As a general rule, the federal government in its labour relations suggests it does not believe in the idea of stepping into labour disputes because such action tends to prolong the dispute and the parties wait until the government steps in to solve things for them. They decline their responsibilities when there is a hope that the federal government will step in.

As a general principle I accept this as a logical and good argument, but in this instance I feel a number of factors have entered into the situation which make it unlikely that either party will take the initiative in instituting arbitration proceedings. That being the case, there is no choice and we should step into the picture. If nothing happens between now and Monday, I say to the Minister of Labour, through you, Mr. Speaker, that we must think in terms of legislative action.

The malaise which is the principal topic of the debate today, the strike, is not the only ill which affects the future of the port of Montreal. During the past year and a half we had high hopes that with the establishment of a new port authority there would be more rapid movement toward resolving some of the problems which have been plaguing the port of Montreal. This movement, however, still is not visible. The creation of the port authority took much longer than had been expected. When it was finally set up—I believe about six, eight or nine months ago—we were led to believe we would see some fairly rapid results of its activities.

So far we have not even seen a movement toward some of the activities for which a number of interested people in Montreal have been pushing for at least 12 years, such as an analysis of the land owned by the port with a view to developing the Montreal port to its maximum economic use. We find there are areas belonging to the port of Montreal which are underused in comparison to their economic possibilities. There is the question of whether or not the port of Montreal, in order to fully develop, should expand across the river into the south shore area from Boucherville down river.

There is a question which bothers me considerably in respect of this possible port expansion. I refer to the question of what will happen to the Boucherville Islands immediately in front of Boucherville. These islands have been partly acquired by the port of Montreal. In my view they are an ideal site for recreational activities for the population of the eastern part of Montreal particularly. I have argued that the port of Montreal should move directly to the south shore rather than to these scenic islands which have tremendous recreational possibilities for a population which at the moment does not have major recreational facilities available to it.

Not only the port of Montreal, but in fact all our eastern ports are in desperate need of promotion. The major ports around the world sent emissaries to all world trading centres with the objective of bringing trade to these ports. Montreal, Halifax, Saint John and all our major eastern ports are in need of a much more effective promotion policy. In my view this has been a serious deficiency which reflects on the effectiveness of our National Harbours Board. The National Harbours Board has been sadly remiss in this area.

I understand there are now some moves afoot to correct the lack of commercial acumen which this government organization has demonstrated for so long. Hopefully, once a promotion is under way it will benefit not just one port but the entire eastern seaboard of Canada. With an excellent work force, efficient shippers and shipping agents we are in a position to compete very effectively with the United States ports which are now busy taking business away from the three Quebec ports which have been tied up by this most unfortunate strike.

One further point I feel should be made this afternoon is that the new Montreal port authority when it was set up was given a fairly flexible framework so far as membership is concerned; the number was not tied down completely. However, only one member on the labour side of the picture was appointed to the port authority. I would recommend strongly to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of Labour that the labour representation on the Montreal port authority be increased. Perhaps I am engaging in wishful thinking, but it seems to me that had this been the case and had there been additional labour representation on the Montreal port authority, it would perhaps have been able to play a more effective role than it has in the resolution of the very grave labour difficulty which has afflicted the port of Montreal for the past number of weeks.

In closing, I urge again that the Minister of Labour at the beginning of next week, if there is no sign of improvement or movement, take the necessary steps to bring the parties together into arbitration if they will agree, and if they will not agree then I suggest we have no alternative but to consider establishing a trusteeship for the port of Montreal.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, having on many occasions during the past few weeks put several questions to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) concerning the longshoremen's strike in Quebec ports, and as the representative of an electoral district near the port of Montreal, I take pleasure in participating in this afternoon's debate on this unfortunate strike, which has lasted far too long.

Mr. Speaker, we are faced with an illegal strike where the parties refuse to resort to arbitration or to meet, and on the other hand the minister tells us that although procedures are clear there has been no request for arbitration.

Faced with such a conflict and such confusion, the federal Minister of Labour, however, is also unable to claim that he cannot take action by hiding behind procedure as everyone agrees that the strike, which is indeed very serious, has lasted long enough, that losses on all sides, both to workers and employers in Quebec and Canada, are huge. It is time an end is put to the conflict and that a settlement takes place.

I should like to give a chronological outline of this strike which I followed, long and short, from the start.

On March 27, the officials of the employees union and of the shipowners accepted, on principle, a collective agreement. On April 4, this agreement was submitted to and practically unanimously accepted by longshoremen by a vote of 2,400 to 6.

On April 19, after acceptance of the agreement by the longshoremen, the federal government mediator, Mr. Poirier, who is an excellent mediator, a capable person, personally prepared, drafted and finalized the collective agreement which was signed by employers and employees in his presence.

All went very well until May 9. The agreement was signed on April 19, and it does not seem to me that there were problems until May 9, that is, nearly three weeks after the agreement was signed.

But on May 9, at eleven o'clock in the morning, there was a walkout in Montreal and other Quebec harbours for no known reason. The longshoremen walked out at eleven o'clock on May 9 for no known reason. But a few days after this walkout took place, we learned that it had been called out of sympathy for the leaders of the Common Front of Labour.

In relation to this walkout, the shipowners obtained an injunction and the longshoremen had to go back to work on May 10. On May 11, everyone was back to work and at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the shipowners, or management, learned from the unions that they had violated section 9(11) of the collective agreement only three weeks after its signature.

This section had to do with the employment of men in the holds or on the decks of ships or in the warehouses in the harbours of Quebec.

When for example an employer needs 16 men to load or unload a ship, they make up a gang. When eight members of the team are working on the bridge and four in the hold—that is 12 men out of 16—four remain idle on the bridge or in the hold. Now, Mr. Speaker, the employers hired them to work at something else in the sheds. The unions would like those four men who belong to the gang to remain idle, on the wharf or on the bridge while under the collective agreement, the employers can make them work in the sheds. It seems that such is the clause at stake in the present strike.

Mr. Speaker, while everybody was at work on May 12 and 15, meetings were held in the presence of the federal conciliator. The union leaders stated: "Injunction or no injunction, we will disregard any legislation and we refuse arbitration". This is quite different from what my hon. colleagues were saying a moment ago: "They refused arbitration because the conflict in connection with Subsection (11) of Section 9 cannot be subject to arbitration". They claimed that they would close the ports, and this is effectively what has happened. The strike has been on since May 15.

For the past month, approximately 500,000 tons of goods have been lost and I regret to say that Canada must depend for supplies on foreign shippers who look after the transportation of our goods, as Canada does not have her own merchant marine as yet.

We are now facing the following situation: the longshoremen are on strike and the shipowners have no more shipping to do. They are facing this dilemma whereby a collective agreement has just been signed which guarantees job security for the employees. Therefore, in what way could the employees be given job security in the future when the ports of Quebec remain idle, ships have gone away and there would be no work if the strike were settled? The shipowners are facing the following problem: that is to guarantee job security whereas they have no work to offer.

Mr. Speaker, this is a case where the minister must take action and must intervene. Once the strike is settled—I hope it will be soon—it will take from eight to ten weeks before the situation becomes normal in the Quebec ports generally or in the port of Montreal. That is to say that it will take from eight to ten weeks to have enough merchandise to load or to unload so that longshoremen will have some work to do.

I say it again, shipowners have signed a collective agreement which guarantees job security whereas, because of the strike, they have no work for the longshoremen.

Under these conditions, Mr. Speaker, there is a procedure to be followed. There is a solution. It is no more a matter of arbitration, because one of the interested parties has clearly said that it had no faith in arbitration and that it would not use it.

Now there cannot be any arbitration if both parties are not there.

When arbitration is impossible, one has to or resort to mediation. And the Minister of Labour should step in as early as next Monday and ask both parties to come to a settlement.

And in order to make mediation easier, the Minister of Labour for instance could ask both parties to suspend the somewhat embarrassing clause on job security, for eight to ten weeks, so that the situation may go back to normal in the Quebec ports and especially in the port of Montreal, so that ships may come back to our ports, that work may be resumed and that employers may guarantee job security as was provided for in the collective agreement.

The Minister could even offer to guarantee the longshoremen income security for 8 to 10 weeks, and if they do not want to lose their pay for not having worked during the strike, the federal government could, through a mediator, offer them income security until the situation goes back to normal and the provisions of the collective agreement concerning job security are in effect again.

However, arbitration has turned out to be impossible, so far. However, next week we could put an end to the strike, and I suggest we allow the Minister of Labour this time to resort to mediation and bring both parties to their senses.

But the Minister of Labour cannot hope to solve this dispute by simply inviting both parties to come to an agreement without offering them some concessions.

If arbitration does not work out next week the Minister of Labour could submit to the House a bill to settle this dispute.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I must say that there have been enough pleas. Parliamentarianism as well as negotiations in the House have lasted long enough. Enough questions have been asked the Minister of Labour. It is high time for action and I hope that next week the Minister of Labour will step into the second stage in the settlement of this dispute by doing everything he can to bring both parties together and by making, in the name of the federal government, offers likely to help in settling this problem.

All of us will be happy if, through arbitration, we reach a settlement of the dispute. In case of failure, we will be glad in this House to study any legislation to put an end to it.

[English]

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be brief. I shall deal with just one point which has been raised by several of the members who have spoken, including the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell). It is central to the question of compulsory arbitration in strikes which affect the public interest.

The point which more than one hon. member has touched upon is that in certain areas of the Canadian economy, in which both management and labour know that the service which their industry provides is vital to the economy, there is a continuing tendency for both sides to enter so-called negotiations from extreme positions, in the full knowledge and expectation that they will eventually reach compulsory arbitration imposed by the government, if necessary by act of Parliament.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I think it might be generally agreed that often such negotiations are not conducted seriously or in very good faith because arbitration, by its very nature, becomes mere compromise. It isn't greatly different from what we call mediation. And when the point is reached at which arbitration is imposed, the arbitrator in fact is in a position of finding a middle line between the opposing positions.

Therefore, not only in this strike in the port of Montreal, in which of course the parties have not yet been brought to the point of arbitration, but in railway disputes and other disputes affecting the national interest I suggest to the House that our present system encourages the two parties, management and labour, to stay apart rather than to come together.

It discourages serious bargaining, because if one party or the other acts in the pretty sure appreciation that eventually they are going to go to arbitration, and in the pretty sure appreciation that most arbitrators do little more than find a middle line between the extremes, its interests obviously for its own group, whichever side it is representing, management or labour, is to begin from the most extreme point.

For this reason I want to put before the House today a bill which has been before the United States Congress this year. Without saying that I endorse it, I would say that it is imaginative; and I would think that in labour negotiations in Canada, particularly in areas such as the dock strike, we need some imagination. I would like to discuss briefly the form and content of this bill. It is a Senate bill, S.3232, and was put forward by 29 Senators headed by Mr. Packwood. The bill is dealing specifically with strikes similar to the Montreal dock strike. I quote from section 208(1) dealing with a strike which——affects an entire industry or a substantial part thereof engaged in trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several states or with foreing nations or engaged in the production of goods for commerce—

It is a lengthy bill. It provides for cooling-off periods and for various other forms of labour negotiations with which we are familiar. But there is one specific section of the bill which I wish to draw to the attention of the House. It appears at page 13 and is entitled "Final Offer Selection." This may not be new to some hon. members, but it is new to me and I find it a most intriguing proposition.

Essentially, the proposition is that before arbitration is imposed in a strike in the United States affecting the national interest in the areas I have quoted, each party would be obliged to make a final offer and one alternative final offer. The major and significant difference which this bill proposes from anything which we know in Canada is that the arbitration board, chosen in the normal manner—a three-man board—would not have the choice to alter final offers; it would be obliged to select holusbolus one or the other. I would like to read these sections, Mr. Speaker, and I think I can do it quite quickly. Section 219 reads:

The President may direct each party to submit a final offer to the Secretary of Labor within three days. Each party may at the same time submit one alternative final offer. The Secretary of Labor shall transmit the offers to the other parties simultaneously.

(2) If a party or parties refuse to submit a final offer, the last offer made by such party or parties during previous bargaining shall be deemed that party's or parties' final offer.

(3) Any offer submitted by a party pursuant to this section must constitute a complete collective bargaining agreement and resolve all the issues involved in the dispute.

(b) The parties shall continue to bargain collectively for a period of five days after they receive the other parties' offers. The Secretary of Labor may act as mediator during the period of the final offer selection proceedings.

(c) If no settlement has been reached before the end of the period prescribed in subsection (b) of this section, the parties may within two days select a three member panel to act as the final offer selector. If the parties are unable to agree on the composition of the panel, the President shall appoint the panel.

There are other subsections here which I will not read, but subsection (g) provides:

The panel shall at no time engage in an effort to mediate or otherwise settle the dispute in any manner other than that prescribed by this section.

Subsection (j) provides:

Beginning with the direction of the President to submit final offers and until the panel makes its selection, there shall be no change, except by agreement of the parties, in the terms and conditions of employment, and no strike, lockout, or similar activity shall take place. In no instance shall such period exceed 30 days.

(k) The panel shall not compromise or alter the final offer that it selects. Selection of a final offer shall be based on the content of the final offer and no consideration shall be given to, nor shall any evidence be received concerning, the collective bargaining in the dispute, including offers of settlement not contained in the final offers.

• (1650)

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that is an imaginative approach which is worthy of the consideration of the House. If, on reflection, the two parties to a dispute recognize that in going before an arbitrator they must arbitrate not merely a middle line between opposing positions but put forward a final offer and win everything or lose everything, it seems to me that both parties, management and labour, would be obliged to consider seriously the provisions contained in their final offers because they would know that compromise is not the solution since they will stand to win or lose everything.

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do hon. members agree to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11) the proceedings on the motion have expired.

At 4.53 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 19, 1972

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

On the order: Introduction of Bills.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council did not overlook something. Would he not like to move the first reading of the bill in the name of his colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, so that we could advance it as quickly as possible?

Mr. MacEachen: I would be happy to move it for the minister. I was engaged in conversation with a colleague and, unfortunately, I missed it.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF COMMISSIONERS AND AD HOC COMMISSIONERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-215, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

QUALIFICATIONS OF MANPOWER COUNSELLORS

Question No. 12—Mr. Marshall:

What are the qualifications of Manpower counsellors who work with the unemployed?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: University graduation or equivalent (secondary school and years of related experience); evidence of ability to carry out counselling duties through work history; general awareness of acts, regulations and programs related to the duties; ability to communicate effectively, both orally and in writing; ability to establish and maintain effective working relationships with both departmental staff and members of the public; ability to adapt to changing conditions; initiative, tact, discretion, firmness and persuasiveness. The language requirements for each position depend on its location and the service which is to be provided to the public by the incumbent. Accordingly, appointees may be required to be qualified in the knowledge and use of the English language or the French language or both.

PER CAPITA COST OF HEALTH CARE

Question No. 78—Mr. Rynard: (supplementary)

1. What was the per capita cost of health care for each province for the period January 1, 1969, to January 1, 1970?

2. What was the per capita cost of hospital care for each province for the period January 1, 1969, to January 1, 1970?

3. What was the per capita cost of medical care for each province for the period January 1, 1969, to January 1, 1970?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The per capita cost of health care for January 1, 1969 to January 1, 1970, includes: mental, tuberculosis and non-shareable hospital care expenditures, non-shareable personal health care, health administration, public health and general health expenditures. Excludes capital expenditures—

Province	Per Capita Cost
Newfoundland	124.31
Prince Edward Island	123.88
Nova Scotia	158.17
New Brunswick	151.05
Quebec	172.87
Ontario	202.58
Manitoba	178.05
Saskatchewan	163.15
Alberta	196.80
British Columbia	185.62
Yukon & Northwest Territories	128.50

2. The current estimated per capita cost of in-patient hospital services for each province for the period January 1, 1969 to January 1, 1970 is as following:

Province	Per Capita Cost
	$
Newfoundland	58.79
Prince Edward Island	52.12
Nova Scotia	70.41
New Brunswick	73.36
Quebec	88.55
Ontario	84.62
Manitoba	72.04
Saskatchewan	76.71

Questions

Alberta	81.54
British Columbia	72.81
Yukon Territory	68.66
Northwest Territories	79.38

3. The Medical Care Program operates on a fiscal year basis from April 1st to March 31st. As a result, precise per capita cost of insured services are available on a fiscal year basis only. For the fiscal year 1969-70 the medical care per capita cost of insured services by province is as follows:

Province	Per Capita Cost
Newfoundland	23.86*
Prince Edward Island	—
Nova Scotia	28.93*
New Brunswick	—
Quebec	—
Ontario	34.65*
Manitoba	40.60*
Saskatchewan	32.38
Alberta	35.60*
British Columbia	53.59
Yukon Territory	—
Northwest Territories	—

* As the provinces joined the Medical Care plan during the year, their cost of insured services does not represent a full 12 month per capita cost.

NOTE:* Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec and the Territories did not join the plan in 1969-70.

EGG IMPORTS

Question No. 115—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Does the production of eggs in Canada meet the demand of the domestic market?

2. What was the volume of whole egg imports during the past 12 months?

3. What quantity of eggs in other form was imported during the past 12 months?

4. From what countries were eggs imported?

[Translation]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. The following table provides data on the egg market in Canada for the past year (1971).

	Jan. 1 to Dec. 31 1971 (million dozen)
Stocks of eggs as of January 1	5.8
Production	499.3
Imports	7.3[1]
Total Supply	512.4
Less: Exports	3.7
Stock at end of period	9.3

[1] Includes 3.2 million dozen eggs for hatching.

2. Import of whole eggs from January 1 to December 31, 1971 (the latest twelve month period available): Quantity (dozens): 4,523, 678; Value: $5,424,000.

3. Import of eggs in other forms from January 1 to December 31, 1971 (the latest twelve month period available): Quantity (pounds): 3,065,902; Value: $899,000.

4. Eggs (whole) and egg products were imported from the following countries between January 1, 1971 and December 31, 1971: United Kingdom, Belgium-Luxembourg, Denmark, France, West Germany, Netherlands, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China, Taiwan, Australia, New Zealand, United States.

CBC STRIKE

Question No. 244—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What dollar losses has the CBC experienced in terms of work done for programs subsequently cancelled or postponed as a result of the strike of CBC technicians?

2. Were any contracts for advertising cancelled on CBC radio or television as a result of the strike of CBC technicians and, if so (a) how many (b) what was their dollar value?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the CBC as follows: 1. It is not possible to make an accurate calculation as to the dollar value of work done on programs and subsequently lost because of cancellations or postponements due to the technicians' strike. Programs which have to be postponed for showing at a later date are held in inventory and when later shown represent no loss of production costs, although there may be revenue loss or gain from advertising depending on the nature of the program and the time of showing. Programs which have to be cancelled (because work on them has been interrupted and they cannot be completed), or which, if completed, cannot be shown at a later date because they become out-dated, represent a dollar loss which is difficult to calculate accurately. In some cases the expenditure on an uncompleted program is actually less than the expenditure which was budgeted for that program and an actual saving results even when the cost of the cheaper replacement program is taken into account.

To illustrate the difficulty of making an accurate assessment, the sum of $55,000 was expended on a program which had to be cancelled because of work stoppages, without any salvage values accruing from the expenditures already incurred. On the face of it this represented a production dollar loss of $55,000, but in actual fact the amount which was budgeted for this particular program was substantially greater. The uncompleted program was replaced in the schedule by a program already in inventory which cost much less than the under-expenditure on the originally scheduled program. The result was a loss of a valuable program of high quality, so far as the viewers were concerned, but in terms of the Corporation's expenditures there was a saving in dollars. Subject to the foregoing qualifications, the best calculation which can be made of the dollar value of production losses up to February 29, 1972 is less than 1 per cent of the Corporation's program production budget for the year ($1.2 million out of $151 million) and this in turn was offset in large part by savings in wage and overtime payments not made to striking technicians.

2. As of February 29 no contracts had been cancelled. One was withdrawn before it came into effect, the amount involved being less than $10,000 (covering both radio and television).

MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN, UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN CONTROLLED FIRMS OUT OF CANADA AND QUEBEC

Question No. 352—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. For each year 1961 to 1971, how many (a) Canadian controlled firms (b) American controlled firms (c) other foreign controlled firms have moved their (i) head offices (ii) plants out of the Province of Quebec?

2. For that same period, how many (a) American controlled firms (b) other foreign controlled firms have moved their (i) head offices (ii) plants out of Canada?

3. If this information is not available, does the government intend providing it before the end of 1973 and, if not, for what reasons?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Statistics Canada is concerned: The information requested is not available and Statistics Canada has no plans to develop such information before the end of 1973.

PURCHASES OF BARLEY BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD IN ALBERTA

Question No. 495—Mr. Horner:

How many bushels of barley have been purchased by the Canadian Wheat Board in the Province of Alberta through the elevator system each year 1962 to 1972 (until March, 1972)?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice):

Crop Year	Alberta Receipts from Producers (Millions of Bushels)
1962-63	35.9
1963-64	50.0
1964-65	41.1
1965-66	37.6
1966-67	56.6
1967-68	46.4
1968-69	43.4
1969-70	74.3
1970-71	109.5
1971-72	48.9 (to Mar. 30, 1972)

CANADIAN BIRTH RATE

Question No. 508—Mr. Mather:

What was the Canadian birth rate in 1940, 1950, 1960 and 1970?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports as follows: The following table provides the rate of live births per 1,000 population for the years 1940, 1950, 1960 and 1970:

Canadian Birth Rate per 1,000 Population Year	Rate
1940	21.6
1950	27.1
1960	26.8
1970	17.4

FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES—COST OF MAILING

Question No. 526—Mr. Mather:

1. How many Family Allowance cheques are mailed monthly?

2. What is the total postage per month for mailing such cheques?

3. Is consideration being given to reducing this cost by mailing the cheques less frequently than once a month with detachable sections of each cheque good for one month?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. 3,023,000.

2. $241,840.

3. It would not be practical to issue one cheque with detachable sections to cover entitlement for a number of future months for several reasons. The monthly entitlement is affected when a parent ceases to maintain a child, a child dies, a child ceases to attend school, the parent or child leaves Canada, or a new child is added to a family. The detachable sections could be lost and, in some cases, negotiated by unauthorized persons. Also, some persons would find ways and means of cashing these sections in advance, and would not have the money when it is due and needed. However close attention is always given to ways of reducing mailing and other administrative costs, and proposals such as this are reviewed from time to time.

CBC CREW ATTENDANCE AT PEARCE COMMISSION SESSIONS IN RHODESIA

Question No. 537—Mr. Robinson:

1. What was the cost to Canada of the CBC crew that attended the Pearce Commission sessions in Rhodesia?

2. How much film was obtained and how will it be utilized?

3. Was any report filed with the government by the CBC in connection with its attendance in Rhodesia?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the CBC as follows: 1 and 2. A CBC crew did not attend the Pearce Commission sessions in Rhodesia but some news items were provided by NBC and Visnews and these were carried by the CBC news service.

PROVISION OF LIVING ACCOMMODATION FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 542—Mr. Rodrigue:

Does the government provide accommodation to public servants on duty in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto and, if so (a) what is the total value in dollars (b) how many public servants so benefit?

Questions

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The government normally does not provide living accommodation to any public servant within the city in which his regular workplace is located. Such accommodation is provided only in special circumstances as described below: 1. When a public servant moves to a new location, he is permitted to stay in temporary accommodation at public expense (for a period normally not exceeding 21 days) until he is able to locate and get settled in permanent accommodation.

2. A public servant may otherwise be provided accommodation in commercial facilities within his headquarters area only in very exceptional or emergency situations, which require the employee to remain close to his post for periods long in excess of normal working hours.

3. When a public servant is a participant in a conference within his headquarters area, which involves having the delegates housed under one roof for a full-time program, including evenings, then he may be provided with overnight accommodation within government conference facilities or university or college facilities; however, accommodation in commercial facilities for this purpose is excluded.

INTERNATIONAL COFFEE AGREEMENT—CANADIAN POSITION

Question No. 543—Mr. Brewin:

Has Canada supported the United States in refusing a proposal of the coffee producing countries within the International Coffee Organization for an increase of four cents per pound of coffee to offset the loss occasioned to them by the United States devaluation of the dollar and a further proposal accepted by some of the importing members of the International Coffee Organization to accept two cents per pound increase as a compromise and, if not, what is the Canadian position in respect to these proposed increases in coffee prices?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Canada did not support the proposals of the coffee producing countries within the International Coffee Organization for adjustments in the price ranges for coffee to offset the devaluation of the U.S. dollar for the following reasons: (a) the ICA price ranges are only trigger points at which export quotas are adjusted and, therefore, are not minimum or maximum prices directly determining producer returns; (b) agreeing to an upward adjustment in the ICA trigger points would have decreased export quotas thus reducing the amount of coffee coming on to the market and creating an artificial shortage of coffee amounting to almost 10 per cent of annual availabilities; (c) the ICA trigger points are set annually taking into account the availability of coffee which, in turn, is reflected in the level of the annual export quota established. At the time of the proposals, already half of the coffee year had passed. In August, the Council of the Coffee Organization will have the opportunity to change the trigger points for the new coffee year taking into account not only any effects of the devaluation of the dollar but also the expected level of trade in coffee for the coming year; (d) Many producing countries immediately devalued their currencies in line with the USA dollar thus offsetting any adverse effects which they might have foreseen for their exports.

MERCURY CONTENT PERCENTAGE TOLERATION IN FISH

Question No. 566—Mr. Matte:

1. Does the Department of National Health and Welfare check the mercury content in food on a continuous basis?

2. What is the content percentage tolerated in the case of fish, particularly pickerel and pike?

3. Are studies carried out with a view to accepting a higher percentage tolerance of mercury in pickerel and pike?

4. Does the government check the mercury content of imported fish on a continuous basis and, if so, in what manner?

5. Is the mercury content tolerated for pickerel and pike caught under a commercial fishing licence the same as for sport fishing?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. The Department of National Health and Welfare examines, on a continuing basis, a wide variety of individual food items for mercury. The Department also examines total mercury content. In addition, the Inspection Branch, Fisheries Service, Department of the Environment, examines large numbers of fish for their mercury content.

2. The Department of National Health and Welfare has established a guideline of 0.5 parts per million of mercury for fish, including pickerel and pike. Fish containing levels of mercury in excess of this amount may not be offered for sale in Canada.

3. No. However, the Department of National Health and Welfare does maintain close surveillance of studies conducted in various countries around the world on safe levels of mercury in fish and other foods.

4. Yes. Fish are checked at the point of entry into Canada by the Inspection Branch, Fisheries Service, Department of the Environment.

5. Yes. The 0.5 parts per million guideline for mercury in fish applies to all fish offered for sale.

PORT OF VANCOUVER—DEMURRAGE CHARGES

Question No. 583—Mr. Murta:

What was the total amount of demurrage charges paid during the 1971-72 crop year at the Port of Vancouver?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): $1,081,529.43 has been paid to May 23, 1972.

AGRICULTURE—PAYMENTS TO HOG PRODUCERS

Question No. 617—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many hog producers, in each province, received payments under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and Agricultural Products Board Act for 1971?

2. What was the total amount distributed in each province?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): As at May 19, 1972, the situation was as follows:

1. Provinces	Producers Paid	2. Amount Paid
Newfoundland	22	18,635.00

P.E.I.	711	221,450.00
Nova Scotia	228	129,585.00
New Brunswick	371	110,675.00
Quebec	3,015	1,345,910.00
Ontario	14,046	4,979,455.00
Manitoba	8,534	1,992,530.00
Saskatchewan	13,051	2,328,655.00
Alberta	10,291	2,450,215.00
British Columbia	187	56,675.00
Canada	50,456	13,633,785.00

INCENTIVE GRANTS—CANADIAN PROTEIN PELLETS LTD.

Question No. 649—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Was an industrial incentive grant awarded to Canadian Protein Pellets Ltd. of Saskatchewan and, if so, what amount was awarded?

2. What was the date of application and approval by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

3. Was an extension for the grant requested and, if so, for what reason?

4. What was the date of application for extension?

5. When was approval of extension granted?

6. Who are the principal shareholders and directors of this Company?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. No grant has been paid, but an offer of $215,000 has been made and accepted.

2. Date of application: December 29, 1969. Date of approval: August 19, 1970.

3. Yes, because the company was unable to acquire equipment.

4. September 30, 1970.

5. No extension was granted.

6. Information provided by business firms in the course of government investigation of proposals is on a confidential basis.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—ASSERTION OF OWNERSHIP BY ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question arising out of the communiqué on offshore mineral rights issued by the governments of the four Atlantic provinces and the government of the province of Quebec, asserting the ownership by those provinces of offshore mineral rights. What is the attitude of the right hon. gentleman's government in light of this communiqué and this assertion of rights by those provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a telegram, of which I took notice only five minutes before coming into the House, from the premier of Nova Scotia to the effect that they had arrived at certain positions and that they would be prepared to sit down and discuss them with me. My answer will be that I of course look forward to such discussions as soon as convenient to them.

Mr. Stanfield: The communiqué indicates that there has been an assertion of rights and a claim to full benefits. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his government accepts the claim of the five provinces to virtually the full benefits of offshore mineral rights?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not see anything in this telegram which refers to full benefits, though there is something on the ownership of resources. The Leader of the Opposition may be right in regard to the discussions which took place; I was not, of course, party to them. But I think there is a willingness on the part of the provinces to discuss certain federal responsibilities and, I take it, the benefits that would go with them. However, I cannot say any more than what the telegram has stated.

Mr. Stanfield: Without being controversial or provocative, may I ask my right hon. friend whether he would not agree that an assertion of ownership amounts to a claim to full benefits? It was for that reason that I asked the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that question as posed is an argument rather than a question.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the question of offshore mineral rights has been under discussion for several years, may I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the government has prepared a series of proposals or counter-proposals or alternatives to the original plan regarding the formula for sharing the benefits, and will it be presented to the provinces and to the Canadian people?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Since the position that we made known to the provinces in November, 1968, there have been many meetings between the premiers and myself and between the various provincial ministers and the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In each case we said that we were prepared to take our position as a starting point and to negotiate from it. There have been many indications of this to the provinces. Also there have, indeed, been some attempts by the Atlantic provinces to arrive at a joint position with the province of Quebec. But there has never been an indication as clear as this one that they were prepared to sit down with us and discuss, and I am very happy that this is apparently now the case.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the position announced publicly in the communiqué issued by the four Atlantic provinces and Quebec to the effect that they lay claim to offshore mineral rights in toto, can the Prime Minister say when we may expect a formal response from the federal government which will either accept or offer counter-proposals to the various provinces in response to their representations?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can give that assertion clearly now. We do not admit that offshore mineral rights belong in toto to the provinces. Indeed, we have some evidence from the courts that the contrary is the case, that the federal government has ownership of offshore mineral rights. However, we have been discussing the allocation of resources from these rights, and I might answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition by saying that we have never claimed that we wanted the revenue obtained from such resources in its totality. This is what we are prepared to discuss with the provinces, at their convenience.

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE RESPECTING ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has an agreement been reached with the government of France in respect of sharing offshore mineral rights as they relate to the territorial rights of France over the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

HIJACKING—CANADIAN ACTION TO SECURE BOYCOTTING OF COUNTRIES HARBOURING SKYJACKERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arises out of efforts being made today by airline pilots round the world to get something down about skyjacking. In particular, may I ask him what steps Canada is taking, either by itself or in concert with other nations, to meet the request of the pilots for the boycotting of those countries that harbour skyjackers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have, of course, been supporting the idea of a meeting of the Security Council in New York. Although we are not a member, as I said in the House, we would be very happy if a meeting were to be held. We ourselves have been taking initiatives in Montreal at the ICAO conference, along with the United States, trying to get some international agreement for enforcement of the conventions to which we subscribe.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CLOSING OF CIP PLANT IN TEMISCAMING—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC AUTHORITIES AND BUSINESSMEN RESPECTING RE-OPENING

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Last Monday I put a question to him concerning the closing of the CIP plant in Temiscaming, about three weeks ago. Has the minister had talks with the provincial authorities respecting the establishment of new factories that the federal government would subsidize?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as for the second question that the hon. member put to me last week, I said I had already answered it, which was not true. I apologize.

In fact, there have been no discussions with the province of Quebec, but officials of my department are in contact with the group responsible for the industrial development of the Kipawa area, and we hope we will eventually find a firm interested in operating the existing industrial plants.

HIJACKING—CANADIAN ACTION TO SECURE INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT ON METHODS OF PREVENTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the fact that Donald Watson, President of Pacific Western, and directors and management of commercial airlines in Canada have supported the protest action of the International Federation of Airline Pilots today, and in light of the fact that the minister said on June 9, as recorded on page 2987 of Hansard, "we are trying to take whatever action we can", I should now like to ask what definite action he is taking internationally, what liaison work in particular is being done, and what inducement or even pressure the Canadian government is affecting to obtain full international agreement on a set of principles and laws which would not only bring about expeditious international crime detection but would also act as a deterrent to any kind of hijacking in the future?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is a very complicated question. Unless the strike of the airline pilots interferes, we intend to deposit our instrument of ratification of the international convention today. We have also been trying through ICAO to strengthen the enforcement of the conventions that now exist and to which we are party. My colleague, the Minister of Transport, could certainly give an account of the extra measures that have been taken to protect the travelling public against the possibility that hijackers may be aboard or may have some instruments in their baggage. We have taken a number of measures that I hope will be effective, although I have to say what I have said many times before, that I do not think there is any single way or even a combination of ways which could prevent hijackers from operating under certain circumstances.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question, and perhaps I can make it a little more plain. I am looking for action rather than words. What action has the minister really taken on behalf of the government to bring the members of the Security Council of the United Nations together to get ratification of the law he has been discussing so there will be international teeth in the law to bring about a proper deterrent in reference to the crime of hijacking? That is what I am asking for rather than answers such as "I am trying to do this and trying to do that".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

Mr. Sharp: We are not members of the Security Council, and we could hardly force anyone to attend even if we were. It is my understanding that the Security Council is meeting today. I hope there will be useful results. I think it is equally important that in Montreal ICAO, which is concerned directly with this question, is meeting today, and I hope will carry certain proposals and initiatives now being taken jointly by Canada and the United States.

HIJACKING—INQUIRY AS TO IMPOSITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT OR AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary which I should like to direct to the Minister of Justice. In section 75 of the Criminal Code for 1971—I believe the sections are numbered differently but I will paraphrase it—in respect of piracy on the high seas it states that anyone who commits violence and murder will be found guilty of murder, and then of course capital punishment would apply. Is it the intention either to amend the Ciminal Code or introduce amendments to the new act which has just been passed by the House of Commons and I believe approved by the Senate to see that capital punishment for violence and murder in respect of hijacking will be carried out according to the code, or is it the intention of the government to amend the section in respect of piracy on the high seas which is now outdated?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might attempt to reply to that question, but it seems to me that we are getting into the area of debate.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to apply the law as it exists and as it has just been amended by the passage of new amendments to the hijacking provisions, and to apply them to the extent they apply. It is not our intention to bring forward further amendments in that connection.

HIJACKING—REQUEST FOR OUTLAWING OF BLACKMAIL PAYMENTS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether Canada will give leadership in outlawing the right of any airline in Canada to pay ransom to anyone as a method of preventing the hijacking of aircraft, and make this suggestion at the United Nations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a similar question was asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert last week. I replied that I was very doubtful whether this would be of very much value inasmuch as, under certain circumstances we can all imagine, people would be quite prepared to break the law in order to save hundreds of lives.

NATIONAL PARKS

WOOD BUFFALO—USE OF HELICOPTERS IN ROUND-UP OF BISON—ALLEGED CRUELTY RESULTING IN DEATHS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development having to do with the round-up of bison in Wood Buffalo National Park. This round-up took place with helicopters and as a consequence of the terror of the animals stampeding took place and many died. Has the minister looked into this matter and does he have any information? Is there any reason that the round-up should have been carried out in this way when it could only result in much cruelty against these wonderful animals?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have been given no details on this matter, but I will make inquiries and I will be happy to report to the House as soon as I have this information. Unfortunately, I have not yet been informed of this incident, but I will be happy to supply the information to the right hon. member as soon as it is available.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The reason I asked the question is that one department of the government had pictures taken. I have them here and they show a slaughter of these animals which is totally inexcusable.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when ministers do not know they need help.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT—ALLEGED INTRODUCTION OF BILL PRIOR TO RECEIVING VIEWS OF ALL PROVINCES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who is responsible for housing. In view of the fact a majority of the provinces have not yet had time to respond to a request to comment on proposed amendments to the National Housing Act, can the minister inform the House why the cabinet decided, in full knowledge of this fact, at an evening meeting on Thursday, June 1, to proceed to introduce the bill in Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that a question asked in those terms cannot be in order.

Mr. Broadbent: I will rephrase the question. Can the minister inform the House as to the government's reason for proceeding with the introduction of the new housing legislation in view of the fact that the request that had gone out to the provinces to submit their views had not been met by a majority of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that question is inviting debate, the kind of debate that should take place if and when the legislation in question comes before the House. If the minister can reply briefly he will be recognized for that purpose, but I suggest to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that his question really involves debate rather than a search for information.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in this case the provinces were given more details and the proposed housing legislation was discussed with them more than had ever occurred before. Many have had an opportunity to comment in detail. In addition, the hon. member's party and the Official Opposition were demanding the immediate introduction of housing legislation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a supplementary question, but the reply by the minister indicates why I felt that the question really invited debate. This is what we will get, I am sure, if we pursue this line of questions and answers.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will try to implement your stricture. In view of the fact that the new bill is essentially the same as that recommended by the hon. member for Trinity and approved by the cabinet on March 30, 1970, can the minister tell the House why we have had to wait two years for its introduction?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that this question is not much better than the others—from a procedural standpoint, of course.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Last Friday we discussed the longshoremen's strike and the conditions in St. Lawrence ports. I would like to ask the hon. minister if, during the intervening week end, anything new has happened. Has he been in contact with the parties involved or has he some news to give us on this matter?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had contact with the parties. This morning I sent a wire advising the parties that unless they undertook to make use of the arbitration procedure as provided by law it was my intention to appoint an industrial inquiry commission, provided the work stoppage was ended and the port was put back into full operation. I also advised the parties that I was prepared to meet them at any time at their earliest convenience to discuss these arrangements.

Mr. Stanfield: Things have matured a lot over the weekend.

FROST DAMAGE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of his visit to the areas where crops were damaged by frost in southwestern Ontario and because of certain statements attributed to him as reported in the press, will he make an early statement on motions dealing with government proposals of financial aid to the producers of the various crops involved and stating whether loans or grants will be made now or at harvest time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a number of questions have been asked respecting this matter. I made no commitment. What I did was to make a commitment that we would be as helpful as possible through the people we have in research stations in various parts of Canada in assisting farmers to determine whether or not they should reseed some of these crops or take other appropriate action that would reduce the damage as much as possible.

[Later:]

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that progress has already been made in reseeding and looking after the crops, will the minister make a statement on motions dealing with the government's proposal with regard to the financial aspect of the crop losses?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, it is quite impossible to deal with the financial losses until it is known what they are. When I was in the area last Friday everyone agreed that it was too early to assess the damage. I have, however, in keeping with the commitment I made, sent a press release to that particular area advising farmers of the services we will make available in addition to those already there, in order to be helpful immediately in this situation.

SURPLUS HENS REDUCTION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT IF QUOTA EXCEEDED IN VIEW OF PRICE DROP

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister make a further statement on motions relative to the surplus poultry program? If the quota for the removal of a million surplus hens from production is exceeded—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts about this being a supplementary question. It is supplementary in the sense that it is addressed to the same minister, but not much more supplementary than that. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member in view of the fact he has already asked half the question. Perhaps he might be allowed to ask the other half now.

Mr. McCutcheon: I assumed it was supplementary because we were both asking for statements from the minister. If the quota for the removal of one million surplus hens from production is exceeded, and present indications point that way, will the minister make a further statement covering this aspect in order to stabilize the market in view of the drop of two to two and a half cents per pound in prices now being offered by processors?

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My suggestion to the hon. member is that the supplementary or related question is hypothetical.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—INTENTION RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF REQUIREMENT THAT MAJORITY OF MEMBERS OF BOARDS OF DIRECTORS BE CANADIANS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the Minister of National Revenue, speaking in Toronto on Friday, described as "a good first step" the Ontario government's newly announced policy to require all foreign-owned corporations operating in Ontario to have a majority of the members of their boards of directors as Canadians, is it the intention of the government to introduce a similar measure for all such companies operating in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We would let the House know, Mr. Speaker, if it were around, when we took any further steps in this regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hees: Thanks for the non-answer. I have a supplementary question. As the Prime Minister stated the other day that he would hold Members of Parliament responsible for holding up the foreign investment in Canada bill past the end of June, who does the Prime Minister intend to hold responsible for the year the cabinet wasted in fiddling and diddling over the Gray report before it arrived at a non-policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REASON FOR DISMISSAL OF CHIEF OF INFORMATION SERVICES IN ONTARIO

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Secretary of State, or possibly the Prime Minister might know—the fountain of knowledge. Can the hon. gentleman advise if Mr. Norman Severud, the $14,000 a year chief of information services for the Opportunities for Youth program in Ontario and summer employment, 1972, was summarily dismissed last Friday, and was his dismissal because he was made the scapegoat for several projects that went sour and received adverse publicity in the press?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice on behalf of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister ask the Secretary of State to make a statement on the matter in the House at the earliest possible moment and include in that statement an explanation of why this federal government employee was dismissed by John Watkinson, who is not a federal government employee but is a member of a public relations firm in Toronto which has a very close association with the Liberal party?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I will draw this representation to the minister's attention.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FOOD PRICES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION IN LIGHT OF POSSIBLE FURTHER INCREASES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of reports that United States food chains are forecasting further price rises, and because Canadian food prices invariably follow American prices, is it the government's intention to investigate this situation and take steps to deal with it?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the general aspect of food pricing in the supermarkets is under constant review by my department.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mrs. MacInnis: In view of the fact that Statistics Canada reports wide variations in food prices among Canadian cities, with western cities higher than the rest, will the Minister of Corporate Affairs look into this matter so as to ensure that every Canadian from coast to coast will get a fair break from the food chains?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that variations in prices from coast to coast do not represent some form of food store competition, but I will be glad to take the hon. member's suggestion under consideration.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, if the minister is inhibited in investigating the situation as Minister of Corporate Affairs, would he look into it as Minister of Consumer Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

TERMINATION AT END OF JUNE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the Prices and Incomes Commission to be disbanded at the end of June?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is addressing his question to the wrong minister. I do not have responsibility for the Prices and Incomes Commission.

Mr. Hales: Then may I address it to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I assume the responsibility has remained with him. Is the Prices and Incomes Commission to be disbanded at the end of this month?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, the commission itself, but it may be necessary to keep on a small group.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—WHEREABOUTS OF "GREENPEACE III"

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he advise whether he has definite word that the French government, in the face of world criticism, is proceeding with its scheduled nuclear test, and can he also advise whether the government has any information on the whereabouts of the Greenpeace III and its fine, public-spirited crew?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the nuclear test is scheduled to begin in the Mururoa Atoll zone at 8 p.m. tonight, eastern daylight, time. We are not quite sure whether it will take place as scheduled because meteorological conditions may not be favourable. I regret very much that this is taking place despite the representations we have made and that many other countries have made. It is our hope that the French government, notwithstanding this particular test, if it proceeds, will join with the rest of the world in trying to stop all nuclear tests both in the atmosphere and underground.

Mr. Macquarrie: Would the minister direct himself to the other part of my question regarding those fine people of the Greenpeace III?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I understand it, the Greenpeace is somewhere in the area.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: That is about as close as you fellows ever come.

Mr. Sharp: This is not a Canadian ship. It is not registered here. It does not carry our flag. It is very difficult for us to keep track of a ship sailing under some other flag or some other ownership. We understand there is a Canadian aboard, and of course I do hope the ship is not going to get involved in the explosion and that the necessary steps will be taken to see it is removed from the area.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has a supplementary to the previous question.

COMBINES

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED PRICE-FIXING BY FERTILIZER COMPANIES

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether, in view of the information he received from the National Farmers Union alleging price fixing among fertilizer companies in Canada, any investigation is under way into the allegations that have been made?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if these allegations have in fact foundation, then the director of the anti-combines investigation section will carry out his duties in that regard.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, what I am really asking is whether any investigation is under way. I will put this question to the Minister of Agriculture. As I have made some attempt to satisfy his request for further information, has he initiated any investigation into this matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to have a matter investigated respecting price fixing or violations of the anti-combines legislation he knows that the action he referred to a moment ago is the proper procedure.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—DISCUSSION WITH DELEGATES TO UNITED NATIONS ENVIRONMENTAL MEETING—SETTING OF DATE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that the United Nations conference on the human environment has terminated at Stockholm, would he state whether any discussions were held among the delegates in attendance with regard to the 1973 law of the sea conference and, if so, would he indicate whether any date has been set for this important conference?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any reports to that effect, but the Minister of the Environment will be home soon and I hope that he will give us all an account of the very successful efforts he has made on behalf of Canada.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs with regard to the report of the Prices and Incomes Commission. From time to time questions have been asked about it. Can the minister now give us an approximate date when we may expect this report to be made public?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it will be made public very soon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will it be worth publishing?

OIL

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—RESPONSE TO REQUEST TO UNITED STATES TO JOIN IN REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he received any reply to the letter he sent to Secretary of State Rogers asking the United States government to join with the Canadian government in a reference to the International Joint Commission concerning the Valdez to Cherry Point route for the shipment of oil?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on June 16 I received a reply and to my disappointment, and I am sure to the disappointment of the hon. member and all members of the House, the United States has rejected the Canadian proposal for reference of these problems to the International Joint Commission. However, the United States government has indicated that it is prepared to discuss the matter further in a committee on trans-border environmental problems which involves, on the United States side, the chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality and, on the Canadian side, the Minister of the Environment. The United States has suggested that the agenda for such meeting could include consideration of the problems put forward by Canada in proposing the reference to the International Joint Commission. Under the circumstances I believe we should accept this offer since it will get the question discussed between ministers and officials of the two governments.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the disappointing nature of this reply I should like to put a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. As his discussions with President Nixon indicated that the latter was favourably disposed toward such a reference to the International Joint Commission, would the right hon. Prime Minister be prepared to take up this matter personally with the President of the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is wrong in saying that I suggested that President Nixon was favourable to that approach. What I said was that we put that position to him and he said he would consider it. Furthermore, I do not see why the hon. member assumes that it is a disappointing response. Surely it is results we want. I do not see why the hon. member is so concerned about the form provided it produces the right effect.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask why I have not the right to be disappointed while the Secretary of State for External Affairs has the right to be disappointed?

Mr. Trudeau: Because the Secretary of State for External Affairs has much higher standards than the hon. member.

MANPOWER

ADULT VOCATIONAL TRAINING, CAPE BRETON—POSSIBLE PROVISION OF FUNDS FOR NEW INSTITUTE BY DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of comments within the past few days regarding the necessity for a new institute of adult vocational training in Cape Breton and in view of the discomfort and problems faced by the students and teachers in that area and in the present building, can the minister advise whether DREE is going to fund a portion of this school or would he have that information available at the present time?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if we ever do it it will be at the request of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who has authority over adult training programs.

Mr. Muir: I want to thank the minister for clarifying the situation with regard to that point at least. May I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration the same question? Is he in a position to cast some light on this very interesting subject?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to get the written assessment of the hon. member as to exactly how dilapidated are the conditions under which these students are forced to study in order that I may assess the situation properly and decide whether I should make a recommendation to my colleague.

MANITOBA BILL IMPOSING TAX ON OVERFLIGHTS ACROSS PROVINCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MAINTAIN FREE USE OF AIR SPACE

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on May 15 I put a question to the Minister of Justice regarding Manitoba's Bill 21 and he said he would look into it. Can he now cast any light on this cloudy and ominous threat to the free passage of Canadian citizens and Canadian goods from one part of our country to another?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not have any final position to give to the House at this point.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, has any major Canadian airline advised the minister that it intends to challenge the constitutionality of some aspects of this bill as it seems to impede their ability to service the country?

Mr. Lang: I do not believe we have received any such communication, Mr. Speaker.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ANNUAL REPORT OF CANADIAN COUNCIL ON RURAL DEVELOPMENT—ACTION ON RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Does he intend to act on the recommendations contained in the annual report and review of the Canadian Council on Rural Development which was released last Friday, specifically on the recommendation calling for greater provincial input in departmental planning, or does he intend to continue ignoring this important submission?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the last part of the question. As to the first part, we are now studying those problems with the new government of Newfoundland. The studies are going very well and I hope we will find solutions to all the problems.

Mr. McGrath: Has the minister in fact studied the latest annual report of the Canadian Council on Rural Development, and does he intend to act on any of the recommendations contained in that report?

[Mr. Muir.]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I have read the report and now it is being studied in the department. I do not run this department alone.

Mr. McGrath: That is obvious.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is obvious and it is good because I believe in democracy and I believe in the civil service, which the hon. member does not seem to. We are dealing with the government of Newfoundland and I think they are much more amenable than the hon. member.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED ADMINISTRATIVE AND LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the public concern in respect of the administration of the immigration laws, which the minister apparently shares, would he make a statement on motions outlining the changes in the administration and in the legislation which he proposes to clear up this situation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I said last week that I would not be bringing forward legislation until this fall but I would be bringing before the House on motions some time later this week administrative changes to deal with the growing backlog of cases at the special inquiry officer stage.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ARGENTIA TASK FORCE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Can the minister tell the House whether a report has been received by his department from the Argentia task force? I am asking this question in light of a similar question put to the minister last December and also during the recent meetings of the standing committee—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might allow the minister to reply to the first question.

• (1450)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I believe we have received these reports; we have taken several decisions about this area in Newfoundland, but there is nothing more we can do for the time being.

[English]

The Argentia task force is over and now we are studying with the government of Newfoundland what we can do in order to help these people.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister say whether a report has been filed since the one dated November, 1971, I believe?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think there was another one, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to check before giving a definite answer.

GRAIN

EFFECT OF LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE ON SHIPMENT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. What success has the minister had in dealing with the problem of moving grain in view of the Montreal port strike, and will the strike result in a significant delay in deliveries of Canadian grain, estimated to be as long as five months by the head of the Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the other ports in the eastern region are going all out to try to handle shipments of grain which are scheduled. The result of not having Montreal and other facilities available has meant some significant delays in the rate at which vessels are loaded at other places, but so far they are being loaded. One would hope that the ports will be back in operation and that we can catch up fairly promptly with the very high level of orders.

HEALTH

SUGGESTED INCLUSION OF HEALTH WARNING IN PRINTED ADVERTISING OF CIGARETTES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Having in mind the recent decision of the United States federal trade commission requiring that in all advertising of cigarettes published in the print media there shall be included a very definite health warning, has the minister given consideration to a similar requirement in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, we have, Mr. Speaker, although as the hon. member is aware we do have a warning of a different nature from that in the United States. There is a warning now on every package.

NATIONAL PARKS

POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH ONTARIO FOR DEVELOPMENT OF NEW PARK IN GEORGIAN BAY AREA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and concerns national parks. What progress has been made in the negotiations with the province of Ontario for the development of a new national park in the Georgian Bay area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his interest in this problem, but unfortunately I cannot report any progress at this time with regard to these negotiations.

The provincial authorities are taking into consideration the proposal we put to them and we are waiting for an answer.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I say that there have been discussions among House leaders regarding the length of speeches for today. Initially, it is our proposal that there be no change from the provisions of Standing Order 58(13). However, I wish to reserve the right to suggest a shortening of speeches later in the day if that should become necessary. To begin with, the rule will apply, and it is understood that no one will ask for overtime.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PRODUCE PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville) moved:

That this House regrets the failure of the Government to produce a comprehensive and coherent program to deal with the growing unemployment among our young people and its disregard of youth's legitimate aspirations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion that we have presented to the House today deals with the question of high unemployment among the young people of this country. We are primarily concerned with the high unemployment among young people under the age of 25.

First, I must say that in Canada we have the unfortunate record of having the highest unemployment rate of any industrial country. Naturally, when you have such a high unemployment rate, you are going to have a very, very high unemployment rate in groups such as the young people of this country. The government should be ashamed of this. Indeed, it is not acceptable for Canada to have such a high unemployment rate when this country has so many resources, technology and educational skills among our people.

When you analyse the employment statistics, you find that the rate of unemployment among the young people of this country under the age of 25 is about twice as high as the unemployment rate among Canadians in general. I suggest that this is a very serious problem. It is something to which we must address ourselves. There are not many excuses which the government or the minister can put forward. We are tired of empty rhetoric. Now is the time for action.

We all realize that there are some problems. We realize that there are a lot of young people hitting the labour market. In spite of that, we must look at the feelings and realities behind the statistics. Over one quarter million young people under the age of 25 in this country are unemployed. No rhetoric in the world can cure this. What we need is action. We need policies to face this very important problem.

At the outset, I wish to read a couple of very short paragraphs from a report that was prepared by the Canadian Council on Social Development as a result of their study of the problems of young people. I quote the last couple of paragraphs. In summary, I believe they set the tone for the debate I am trying to precipitate this afternoon. The Report of the Canadian Council on Social Development reads:

> The choice for Canadians is between tinkering with existing programs for the wrong reasons, or embarking on new ventures in policy made imperative by the transitory nature of society and our inability to cope with present difficulties.
> This study of youth applying for social assistance illustrates the need for many reforms in the policies, practices, and programs of our social welfare system. But we believe that even more important is recognition by a greater proportion of the general public that the private market economy in its present state cannot by itself provide youth with the opportunities they seek for self-fulfilment, constructive contribution to, and meaningful participation in Canadian society. Acceptance of this premise will demonstrate the need for a comprehensive and integrated approach to policy formulation and implementation encompassing all levels of government and the major social systems—education, manpower, welfare, plus the major institutions of the private market sector.

I think that the approach being used by the Canadian Council on Social Development is one that is on the right track. What we really need are some new approaches and some new values. We cannot rely on the conservative status quo we have been following in the past. Obviously, the approaches we have been taking have been failing. All you have to do to realize this is to look at the statistics. We have many unemployed young people who are totally frustrated and alienated because of the type of system we have in this country. If we look around us, we see that life is rapidly changing each and every day. Technology is far outstriding the change in our social and economic institutions. It is about time that our social and economic institutions caught up with the technological part of our society. We must not just repair the old ship. What we need is a new ship. If we are going to solve this problem that is facing so many Canadians, particularly those under the age of 25, we need a new direction.

According to the latest report from Statistics Canada, the unemployment figures for May are startlingly high. There were 552,000 Canadians unemployed. Of this number, almost half were under the age of 25. Some 269,000 young people under the age of 25 are unemployed today. This represents 48.7 per cent of the total unemployed in this country. In other words, nearly half the unemployed people in this country are under the age of 25. A large segment of our unemployed is composed of young people between the ages of 14 and 24, but they only make up 26 per cent of the total work force. As you can see, proportionately the rate of unemployment among people is twice as high as it is among Canadians in general. The government must face up to this fact and bring new policies forward in order to cope with the problem.

The rate of unemployment among the young people in this country has been increasing. In May of this year, approximately 13 per cent of young people on the work force between the ages of 14 and 19 were unemployed. Between the ages of 20 and 24, 10.2 per cent of the young people were unemployed. I want to emphasize that these figures do not take into consideration the fact that a lot of the university and high school students are seeking jobs. All you have to do to realize this is to go back to the statistics for the month of January when students were in school. In the month of January this year, 16.6 per cent of the work force between the ages of 14 to 19 were out of work and 11.1 per cent of the work force between the ages of 20 and 24 were out of work. The number of unemployed youth has grown drastically over the past few years.

I wish to refer to one more statistic. In 1966, 6.2 per cent of the young people under the age of 25 were unemployed. The figure for 1972 is 11.5 per cent, thus it has almost doubled in a period of seven years. The situation we are now faced with is indeed serious. In many cases, the young people who are unemployed are just starting a new life, getting married and raising a family. These people do not have jobs. They do not have an adequate income which would enable them to supply good housing, clothing and food for their families. Indeed, this starts off a whole cycle of poverty, financial poverty as well as social and cultural poverty. The children of these families may follow the same route.

Although I do not want to spend too much time on this, the situation facing students in this country is very serious. According to the Department of Manpower, in 1971 there were 1,184,000 students in this country seeking work. Out of that total, there were 212,000 who did not find a job. They could not find a summer job of any sort. Many of those who did, could obtain only temporary or part-time jobs, or else some work which brought them only minimum wages and kept them at a bare subsistance level. As a result, many students were unable to return to university last fall. We find that even those who completed their university education are experiencing difficulty in obtaining employment of the kind they believed they would obtain when they entered university. We found examples of men with Ph.D degrees driving taxis, students with masters degrees working as clerks or secretaries. In the Finance Times of May 29, it was stated that 20 per cent of those who graduated from the University of Toronto this year will not have found jobs by the end of 1972. The article suggests that even this figure may be misleading because half of these students might drop out of the labour market or return to university to continue their studies there. So, the figure might be 40 per cent.

• (1500)

We should remember, too, when we are talking about jobs, whether for students, graduates or young workers, in all too many instances, women are discriminated against. The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women emphasizes this fact. I should like to urge the government, once again, to take action on the recommendations contained in this report, because there is continuing discrimination against women in many sections of our society solely on account of their sex, without account being taken of their knowledge, experience or ability. It makes me angry to hear the old Elmer Fludds in this Parliament refusing to recognize the fact that women are discriminated against in our work force and in our society generally. I could give hon. members dozens of examples from my own University of Saskatchewan showing how hard it is for women to find jobs. Many of those who do succeed in finding work must take low paid jobs as waitresses or secretaries, receiving only minimum wages. The government must take action to improve this situation as soon as possible; we are already years late in reforming our system.

Mrs. MacInnis: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: The result of the situation I have been describing is this: students are increasingly questioning the validity of the university system. I remember, back in the 'sixties, we were told: If you go to a university you will have a guarantee for life that your income will be higher; you are likely to get a much better job than others; you will find it far easier to raise your family properly. Today, we find this is not true, at least with respect to many of those who are leaving our universities, and old values are being shot down as we find university graduates, those with M.A. or B.A. degrees, failing to find jobs, or finding jobs they could have filled without going to a university at all. As they look across their backyards or alleys they see some of the people who dropped out of school, perhaps holding down a unionized job and making between $10,000 and $12,000 a year while they, with their university education, are not making as much. As I say, many young people are questioning the value of the university system today.

Many universities are becoming increasingly elitist. The Conservative government in Ontario has just increased education fees. This makes the universities more elitist. Most of the students who graduate as lawyers or doctors and business executives come from upper middle-class families. It is almost as though they inherited a medical or legal degree. The chances are that their fathers and mothers were involved in those professions; they had access to a lot of money; they were brought up in the proper milieu when they were going through the school system. Anyone who has studied social psychology knows that young people are influenced by their environment, their families, the books they have in their homes. It is obvious that access to an expensive university system tends to be limited to the sons and daughters of the wealthy. It is they who will enter universities and succeed in finding the better jobs. It is time we got down to grass roots issues and put into force policies relevant to the working class people of this country, the young farmers, the average young citizens of Canada. It is time we got away from old policies which are obviously failing, given the fact that half the unemployed are under the age of 25.

Look at some of the answers we have been given by the Liberal government. Many of them have been short term answers. Some have been mere tokenism. Other have been patronizing. Obviously, they have failed. Some have been good.

A few weeks ago the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) introduced amendments to the Manpower Training Act reducing the number of years during which a person had to be in the work force in order to qualify for benefit under the act, from three to one. This is a good move, a step forward. It is a move many of us have been suggesting for years, along with representatives of organizations concerned with young people.

But consider the Opportunities for Youth program. Many of us believed the concept was a good one, one which enabled young people to submit to the department programs in which they were interested, created their own jobs and carry out their own administration. In practice, what has happened has been this: the jobs have gone to the students who do not really need them. That this is the case is apparent from the findings of the Cohen Report. Many of the jobs have gone to the sons and daughters of the upper middle-class. These are the young men and women who are best able to fill in application forms; it is they who have the right contacts and who can afford to gamble because they always have father's bank account to fall back on. As I say, the government realizes this. I am suggesting that hon. gentlemen opposite do something to make sure that jobs created by the Opportunities for Youth program go to those who really need them, not to those who don't.

In this connection, I should also like to mention the travel exchange program and the travel grants. Again, many of these grants go to people who do not really need them; they go to people who would be working or doing something in any case. A press release issued by the Department of the Secretary of State on May 25 announced two travel grants to youth orchestras in Alberta. I have nothing against youth orchestras or the work they may be pursuing, but I question the validity of grants being made in such a direction. In this connection, I quote from the press release.

> Grant of $11,375 to the Edmonton youth orchestra for visit, July 22 to August 17, of 100 of its members to Lausanne, Switzerland, for two-week stay, and then travel to Germany and Austria.

The orchestra will, of course, be giving concerts, and it will travel to Germany and Austria. The second grant, of $7,500 has been made to the Calgary youth orchestra; 75 students will take part in a concert tour of England, Germany and Holland from July 2 to August 1. Rather than spend money in this way, it might be better to grant money to people who will be remaining in the country, people who really need it to feed themselves and, perhaps, go on to receive university or post-secondary education at some future date. Despite these programs, not only are more people unemployed and living in a situation of economic stress, but increasing numbers are becoming frustrated, adding to the tension we find, especially, in our larger cities. Unless we take some corrective measures soon, we are going to have more and more violence in the years that lie ahead. Obviously, we must search for more solutions.

• (1510)

There are people in the country who tend to give up, who tend simply to go on welfare because they have been unable to find a job, and there is no other choice for them. They find themselves in a system that encourages them not to find work or to have any motivation for finding work. Then again, we have some of the older people in society who like to criticize our young people for being lazy. They criticize their standards, the fact they let their hair grow long or the fact they challenge the norms of present day society. Something must be wrong with a society in which our young people do this, and which forces them into the situation they are facing. I suggest we have to act and to act soon. If we do not, we will have more and more of our young people saying that any value placed by society on institutions is irrelevant, that society must be changed. Perhaps others will declare that they must resort to violence, and this is what I do not want to happen.

Much of this reaction would be prevented if we had programs that provided work for our young people, which gave them something meaningful to pursue in their lives and in the lives of their families. This is why there are a number of suggestions that I want to make. I am repeating suggestions that have been made by this party, by the Canadian Council on Social Development and various other institutions. In talking about unemployment among young people, you cannot divorce it from general unemployment in this country. The important reason there are so many young people unemployed in Canada today is that there is so much general unemployment. The economy is not operating correctly, and I suggest there is no excuse for this. There is no reason for over half a million Canadians being unemployed. No rhetoric or excuse can justify that.

If we are to solve youth unemployment, we will have to start the economy rolling again, and there are a number of ways of doing this. First, we have to solve the problem of foreign ownership. We need more research and development. Many of our graduates go through university but are then unable to find work. Obviously, this research and development is not going to be done if parent plants are not located in Canada. We will have to locate them in Canada if we want to create more jobs in this country.

If I may turn now to something more specific, I should like to detail some of the things that can be done for our young people. I suggest we put more emphasis on on-the-job training so that our young people, regardless of their educational background, receive training on the job. This is very important. Sometimes people have to be retrained three or even four times during their lifetime, especially in a fast-moving technological society. Some of the regulations have to be much more flexible if people are to qualify for training courses of this kind. On-the-job training is relevant today, and is something that should be emphasized a great deal more than it is.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Second, if we are to continue the Opportunity for Youth program, opportunities for youth should be directed more to those who really need those opportunities. Perhaps more importantly, Opportunity for Youth programs or similar programs should be brought in for non-students, for the working class or young farmers, or for those young people who want to start up a business, and so on. Only 9 per cent of the jobs provided through OFY go to non-students. If we continue this program, we must have a similar program for those who are not students.

I also think we will have to have more programs for young people starting farming. In my province and across the country I am told that the average age of farmers is about 57. I think this tells us a great deal about rural Canada. We will have to offer more training for your young rural people, with interest free loans and similar financial help, if we are to provide jobs for our young people in rural Canada.

Then, we will have to do more for young married couples. Many of these young couples are in very severe economic straits and need to be helped. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has already mentioned that day care centres should be readily available. We should spend more money on day care centres rather than giving gifts, write-offs and tax concessions to the rich corporations of this country. Day care centres provide our young women with an equal opportunity to go out to work or to pursue what they wish to pursue. In addition, there should be more public housing and a greater availability of loans at low interest rates so our young couples can make a better beginning as they enter their working life.

Then, we must have such programs as early retirement for our older people. I do not see why our older people should not have the chance to retire and to draw benefits from security plans, such as the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act at the age of 60. If that were the case, we would open up a whole series of new jobs for our younger people, and it would enable our older people to pursue a more interesting life.

These are some of the things that can be done, so we are making these concrete suggestions today. We will have to do some of these things if we want to find work for a quarter of a million young people who are unemployed today. There is no excuse for this number of unemployed. If we do not do something about it, the situation will snowball; it will worsen and we will then be faced with many more serious social problems. I trust that when the minister speaks he will reply to some of the points that we are going to raise, and will explain to us why the government is not pursuing some of these ideas. Perhaps he will announce new programs that he may have for this quarter of a million young people who are unemployed. They are a very important part of this country and they need jobs as much as anyone else. With that I conclude by once again emphasizing that unemployment is a very serious problem that we cannot overlook, one that will have serious repercussions for the future if we do not act now.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I congratulate my colleague to my left for introducing this motion which is a very succinct one, very much to the point, and perhaps one of the most important motions that will be debated in the remaining part of the session.

If I recall correctly from my limited knowledge of history when Alexander the Great was causing great devastation militarily a number of centuries ago, he spared one city because the city fathers indicated to him through an envoy that they were prepared to give him anything in the city with the exception of their young people. Alexander the Great replied that anyone with that kind of attitude, anyone who had that kind of foresight, did not deserve to suffer a military attack. That was the reaction of Alexander the Great.

Today we have "Pierre the Great", the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has quite a different attitude. If I can quote the Prime Minister, who was speaking in London, Ontario on November 11, 1971, he said:

> Isn't it true that perhaps more and more people are turning away from the work ethic . . . And some of them are unemployed, but their life is more meaningful being unemployed—that's their judgment—than somebody else who works a 40-hour week and produces something which in their judgment is of no use to society and perhaps may even be of negative use—

The Prime Minister is claiming that our young people are turning away from the work ethic, that in fact they rather enjoy being unemployed, that they do not aspire to be creatively employed but are enjoying life just lying around in various parts of the country. As someone has just indicated to me, Pierre the Great should heed the lesson of Alexander the Great. I think the Prime Minister was correct when he said that young people today and people generally would question whether in fact work should be defined as only the creation or production of material wealth. I agree with him in that, but think he is very much out of touch if he still thinks young people in Canada today are satisfied to be on the unemployment roll and wandering across this country in search of jobs. That is certainly not the attitude of the young people I have talked to in the last several months. As a person who has been actively involved with a number of young people across Canada, and as a Member of Parliament talking to those who visit here, I have been very impressed with the attitude of young people as far as future employment is concerned. I suggest that today the greatest significant effort of our young people is the endeavour to find employment. They are as concerned as any age group about becoming productively employed.

• (1520)

One of my colleagues to my left has indicated the statistical problem in some detail. In the last several months I have been accused of emphasizing the statistics of unemployment to a greater extent than I perhaps should, so I will leave that matter as it now is on the record. The hon. member indicated the number of young people in the age group from 14 to 24 who are looking for work, and has also indicated the national average in respect of employment of those under age 24. He has referred to the 30,000 jobs created under the Opportunities for Youth Program, and emphasized the fact that we have spent some $30 million. He indicated that approximately two million Canadians, and the figure 1.8 million is quoted frequently, between the ages of 14 and 25 years are looking for employment.

Unemployment among Youth

What concerns me much more than these statistics and the impact of our economy on these young people, is the fact that from the first day they enter school, that is from kindergarten through the entire educational system, they are urged by their parents, their teachers, their community leaders and their governments to strive to reach that great plateau when they have gained an education and can enter constructive fields. However, there are tens of thousands of young people in this country who have gained university degrees, graduation from technical trade schools and various colleges and high schools, who find themselves frustrated in an unfriendly economy in which they cannot find employment. I think these unemployed young people represent the most serious component of the problem we are discussing today.

I am not going to become involved in a long discussion of this problem, but I could spend a great deal of the next few minutes talking about the magnitude of it and quoting examples of the devastating effect unemployment has on these people. I could quote examples of representations we have received in recent weeks from urban groups, especially those in Toronto, but perhaps I should move on to a discussion of the responsibilities and where they lie, with some elaboration of the suggestion made by my colleague.

We must take first matters first. The fact of the matter is that the problem of unemployment among young people can never be considered totally a government problem. The government should recognize this fact. Regardless of what type of program it adopts, including the Opportunities for Youth program, there is no way this problem can be resolved by purely narrow government involvement. The government must acknowledge the fact that we have to consider the total economy. It must recognize that unless we get industry more actively involved in an effort to create employment for young people we will continue for the next several years with a very heavy degree of unemployment among young people.

In its haste to create a favourable political climate by bragging about the Opportunities for Youth Program, the government has failed to recognize the problem, and has overlooked the importance of getting the economy moving. The government should make more effort to get industry involved. It should provide some kind of incentive to industry to show how worthwhile it is to employ young people. I firmly believe the federal government has never really paid enough attention to the federal-provincial-municipal aspect of this situation. The federal government announced the Opportunities for Youth Program without any consultation whatsoever with the provinces. The province of Ontario, the province of Alberta and other provinces have brought in their own programs and if I can judge by comments made publicly, there was never any great effort to integrate these policies and programs.

I would hasten to add that the federal government is not totally to blame. Certainly, all three levels of government must be brought into play if we are to have a significant impact. The first thing that must be said is that the Opportunities for Youth and the Local Initiatives Programs must undergo very serious re-evaluation. We are talking about 30,000 jobs and about literally hundreds of groups of young people who have had projects and programs rejected. I suggest they have not fully understood the criteria. Other groups in other communities have had similar projects accepted. The frustration and anxiety caused by this type of activity on the part of the government can in many cases make these programs more destructive than useful.

The fact of the matter is that rural parts of Canada, particularly small communities, have received a great deal less benefit and less opportunity under these government programs. They have less opportunity to become involved in these activities. The hon. member also referred to the lack of opportunity for young people from poor families. It certainly is a fact that very few people from poor families really understand the power structure in order to take advantage of these types of programs. This situation certainly must undergo serious scrutiny.

We must give credit to the minister for his forward looking attitude in respect of manpower programs and for his introduction and passage of the bill which eliminated the three-year requirement of involvement in the labour force. There are many areas of our manpower programs that could be amended to help young people, and one is the 52-week maximum time for upgrading skills. An individual can go to an upgrading school, but after 52 weeks, regardless of whether he has completed his program, he is dumped out. That is one thing that ought to be changed in this type of manpower training program.

We must look as well at the idea of taking these young people from manpower training programs and somehow integrating them into the economy. There is no point in putting people into manpower programs, going through the expense of training them, and then dumping them into an economy in Canada in which there is no opportunity. In many cases, the government has been more interested in taking people off the unemployment rolls than it has been in creating job security. In other words, it has been devising welfare programs. A great deal more effort has to be made to integrate these training programs with the demand for trained workers in our economy. I hope the minister will tell us what he thinks about a five-year program in which industry can be involved in order that when these people complete training programs they can be placed in industry, finding a way from one stage of development to another.

I would say that our educators across the nation, even though education is sometimes thought to be purely a provincial matter, should reassess the type of education they are giving our young people.

• (1530)

I would like every Member of Parliament and every educator in Canada to read a book which has been a bestseller for the past six or seven months. The book is entitled "Future Shock". Perhaps every Member of Parliament has read it. There is a chapter in that book which is devoted to the theme that the educational system is directed more towards producing people geared to many aspects of society in centuries past rather than to people who would fit into the present system. I think everyone should read "Future Shock" to learn the way in which our educational system today produces people, even after 15 or 20 years in the system, who are not really qualified to fit into the society of the 1970's. I would like to say, as a teacher more than as a Member of Parliament, to educators across this country that they must start re-evaluating their educational process so that it will be relevant to the 70's. I submit that what we are providing our young people with today in the way of an education is irrelevant. It is completely out of tune with the 70's, let alone the 80's for which we should be planning. I will debate this with any educator in this country.

I have a couple more points I wish to cram into the 20 minutes allotted to me. My colleague, who speaks for our party in respect of the national health and welfare aspect of the federal government will be touching on this in more detail. However, there must be a re-adjustment of our attitude toward young people so far as welfare is concerned. If I may use the phrase "the adult world" to refer to people beyond age 25, that world refers to young people as being great recipients of welfare. If any one would read the very impressive argument put out by the Canadian Council on Social Development, it would be seen that there is not a preponderance of our young people on welfare. The figure is less than one per cent in the 14-25 year old group compared with in excess of two per cent in the group beyond that age. The fact of the matter is that we must change the attitude we have toward our young people who find themselves in trouble and need a little assistance under our social welfare schemes. If they need assistance they are just as entitled to it as is any adult in Canada.

We should make available to our young people opportunities which would make it possible for them to avoid the necessity of requesting assistance under social welfare programs. More importantly, I would like to see a long serious look taken at the Canada Assistance Plan. At the present moment, no province is entitled to adopt policies which would allow it to replace welfare schemes with work schemes. For example, if the province of Quebec desired to give its young people $100 a month plus a few dollars from its own coffers rather than $50 a month welfare, along with the $50 a month which is available from Ottawa under the cost-sharing agreement, and put them productively to work, that province would not be entitled to do so because under this legislation the provinces which encourage people to work are refused the federal share under the Canada Assistance Plan. In other words, the federal government says that if a province wants to use the payments it receives under the Canada Assistance Plan to put people to work, those payments will be cut off. I believe that is grossly unfair. I think a more liberal attitude could be taken so that provinces which are capable of designing work schemes to productively employ young people would be able to use the federal share of welfare assistance for this purpose.

I have a final comment. I do not wish to dominate the discussion today because I know a dozen of my colleagues on both sides of the House who wish to become involved. In the past several days, I have watched a number of television programs covering various festivals. Last evening everybody saw on national television a program covering the festival held by the "Jesus Freaks". I am not very much aware of the motivation behind these festivals or the psychological motivation behind tens of thousands of young people getting together and worshipping in the way they do, listening to music or getting turned on, or whatever it is. I am not familiar with the psychology behind this, but there are hundreds of thousands of young people who find the energy to get together and enjoy music festivals, religious festivals, or whatever it is.

I wonder whether anyone has seriously considered challenging the young people through federal assistance, to take part in some kind of activity related to their own future. I should like to see some kind of national conference. It could be called a rock conference, a religious conference, an employment conference or something else. Let us have some type of federal encouragement and federal funding which would enable thousands of our young people, not when the problem is right on us but at some appropriate time, to get together and offer their suggestions on what they believe can be done to help alleviate unemployment among young people. I know the Canadian Council on Social Development had a great many of these young people involved in its survey procedures. However, I have never seen a means by which the young people from each province could get together to spend some time in offering suggestions as to ways in which their own future could be assured.

Too frequently politicians like myself and other members, as well as the Minister in charge of youth, whom we never see in this House—what is his name? I forget his name. It is the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), the Opportunities for Youth king. I should have liked to see the Secretary of State here today. I know my colleague on the other side, the outstanding minister, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) will be back in a few minutes to participate. The government is also bringing on another heavyweight, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Roberts). I am very serious about this. I should like to see the federal government challenge the young people from St. John's, Newfoundland, Vancouver or wherever to come to Ottawa and spend a few days talking about their problems. Perhaps they have all kinds of ideas which we have never really tapped.

I remember a few weeks ago a group of young people from Toronto came to my office. They represented a variety of groups which received local initiative grants. They offered numerous suggestions. I must admit, having listened to them for a few minutes or half an hour, I learned a great deal more about the problems of young people than I could learn from Members of Parliament in the next six years. So, why do we not accept this challenge and offer it to our young people. We could tell them we would sponsor a conference of representatives from the universities, schools, councils of all kinds and organizations, to talk about their problems. Perhaps in this way we would receive a little guidance, because I am convinced that if we have to wait for the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State to solve the problem of unemployment among young people we will have to talk about 1980 instead of 1970.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the motion introduced by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is very serious since it deals with an apparently insoluble problem. In fact, we have been hearing about it for many years, without any solution having ever been found.

The situation in which young people under 25 must live nowadays is neither very nice nor very interesting to observe. We hear people say that today's youth does not want to work anymore and that is why they are in such an unfortunate situation.

Mr. Speaker, today's young people are our children, just as we once were our parents' children, and they are not so different from what we were. They haven't changed, but life styles have however. Twenty-five years ago, it was rather easy to find a job; today, the number of young people being maybe ten times larger, there is a surplus of young manpower in our country. That some young people do not want to work is not new; we always had them. Those who do not want to work do not include only young people 20 or 25 years old. In fact, some people 40, 50 or 55 years old would rather receive welfare allowances than work. They are not so much better than young people 20 or 22 years old.

However, I notice, Mr. Speaker, during my travels across Canada, that our young people are interested in their country, that they want to become part of the Canadian society, if they can, if they are permitted to do so. This is exactly the permission they cannot find.

A while ago, the mover said that 250,000 young people less than 25 years old are unemployed. Yet, these are young people qualified to work and seeking employment. At this time of the year, 1,400,000 students ask permission to work during the summer months in order to continue their studies in the fall, and the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) came up, after the Christmas and New Year's holidays, with the Opportunities for Youth program to offer some help to young students and young unemployed.

These days, we receive from the Department of the Secretary of State—I do not write them, but we receive them—letters stating that 19,000 serious requests were received and that approximately 3,000 were accepted. About 16,000 projects under the Opportunities for Youth programs have been rejected. Perhaps not a single day goes by without a member of Parliament receiving a telephone call from someone in his constituency asking for reconsideration of a project submitted in January, February or March that was refused because it involved spending too much money on purchase of materials, because all the funds and more have been spent, and so on. No request for review can be accepted because the funds have run out. The minister says: We have no more money. But the young people are still there. As indicated by the letters received, these projects are serious and valuable and would help young people. Unfortunately, we do not have the financial means to implement them.

Mr. Speaker, I do not accept to be told that we do not have the financial means to help the young. They represent Canada's future and we have no right to gamble it away. Our duty is to build the future and not to gamble it away.

Unemployment among Youth

Mr. Speaker, on several occasions, I said the following: If war was declared tomorrow morning, the 250,000 unemployed under 25 and the 1,400,000 students now looking for summer jobs, that is 1,650,000 young people altogether, would all without exception be enrolled in the armed forces, clothed, fed and housed, and also paid to wage war, to destroy. Anywhere in the world, the necessary funds would be found; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Secretary of State could not say that there is a shortage of money.

In case of national emergency, we would mobilize all our young people, without exception, to have them wage war, but if we want to develop our country, build something and not destroy, help shape Canada's future, the minister will reply: We have no money. Some citizens play with that. The media find that normal. The minister said there was no money; so there is no money. Why should money be scarce in time of peace and not in time of war? This is miraculous, something that defies comprehension, a real mystery.

Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate that many young people realize today that they have been and are still being deceived.

I remember that during the second world war, when I was 20 or 22 years old, a great many young men did not want to enlist in the army. For 25 years, the Liberal party had boasted that under a Liberal administration, we would never have another war requiring military service. In 1939, when war broke out, the mayor of Montreal was advising young men not to enlist or register. He was locked for five years in a concentration camp. He stayed there five years, not seven days like Pépin, Laberge and Charbonneau who had asked their followers to disregard the law. Today, the situation has changed, but it was very difficult then to get out of prison.

In 1939, young people my age were emerging from an economic crisis that raged from 1929 to 1939. No matter what colleges we graduated from, be it that of Limbour where I studied, or Victoriaville, or Montreal, or even university, and no matter what diplomas stuffed our pockets, there were no jobs available, because of the economic crisis. As soon as war broke out, on September 1, 1939, the then Liberal government, as if by magic, announced suddenly the following day: "Come on; no time to waste. We have found the money. War has just broken out." They were ready, then, to provide us with all our requisites for war.

The same thing is happening today. Of course, we are enjoying peace, but for our young, it is a time of economic crisis even worse than that we have been through, because in 1934-35, we were satisfied with far less than we require today. There is now such a variety of products and entertainments of all sorts available to our young that they are placed in a totally different social environment than the one we had.

Let us take the case of young man or woman of 20 today, who attends university or a CEGEP and holds a job in a plant or office. When the week-end comes, they are still obliged to go to their father and say, "Dad, as I work, could you not lend me $10 or $15 for the week-end?" If the father has five or six other children, if his income is not adequate, they understand. They know what the family situation is; they do not revolt against the family but against society that keeps them from living decently.

Instead of blaming society for refusing to allow the integration of the young, we call them hearless or ill-mannered. We tend to blame the young generally. In fact, as soon as a small group revolts, we are ready to crush youth as a whole to safeguard the system, the financial system. Nobody denounces financing which is easily available in wartime, but not in peacetime.

Mr. Speaker, we all know—the young people as well as hon. members—that nothing is done in Canada to develop our natural resources. Let us consider the north and everywhere in our provinces. There would be lots of things to do, but since we have no money we remain idle.

I refer particularly to roads, especially Highway 8 between Hull and Montreal whose broadening has been promised for 40 years and which is still being promised for the next election. During an election campaign, numbered stakes are driven in along the highway, making electors believe that the road will be built. The day after the election, the stakes are removed and put away till the next election and the highway remains exactly as it was—

An hon. Member: They are put up elsewhere.

Mr. Caouette: Yes, they are put up elsewhere in case of a by-election.

An hon. Member: You are asking for it—

Mr. Caouette: In Ontario it is the same thing.

Today the road is good from the eastern border of Ontario up to Montreal. But on the Ontario side up to Ottawa and where traffic is very heavy there is a small two-lane road hardly allowing two cars to meet. Why not build a four-lane road and recruit young people to do it? This would create employment in asphalt plants, jobs for truckers, in short employment everywhere. Such roads have to be built all across Canada.

In another field, such as health, many things could be done, such as for instance the use of nursing and medical students where there is a possibility of using their skills. If we invested the required funds in all fields of economic and social activity in our country, there would be enormous possibilities.

We have the same situation internationally. I was in Cameroun for Easter. Mr. Speaker, there I noted that sending technicians to train these people for various jobs is a waste of time because they do not want to learn anything. What they need in these countries is social advisers to make the people aware of their situation. For 100 years we have been spending huge sums to help them. They have not yet understood the reason because their education is not in that direction. Therefore we should be sending them teachers.

In India and in Iran where I went, the same situation prevails. It is not the revolutionnaries who have to be sent there, but social workers who would appeal to the logic of the human being.

In every field in Canada, there are possibilities for helping young people provided the government, no matter which, decides to take the bull by the horns—not by the tail but by the horns—in order to find a solution to the problems of young people, and indirectly help fathers and mothers who would like nothing better than to see their children busy at something for the development of Canada. That would allow them to be themselves and not think of themselves as numbers in a socialist or communist state, or in some group, but as free human beings, able to use their personal resources, to find their whole indentity and to put them at the service of this country.

[English]

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I was a bit surprised that this motion was put down in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who is, I believe, and who prides himself on being, a progressive socialist. I would not have been surprised if the motion had been put down by one of the fossils from the official opposition, but I do find it surprising that it should stand in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, one of the youngest and most idealistic members of the NDP.

What this motion asks is that the House express regret at what it calls failure to provide a "comprehensive" and "coherent" program. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that those who stand in the way of progress have often been those who said, "You cannot take one step now because you have not drafted the final and complete program." The enemy of the good is often he who pretends to demand the best. Is it the hon. member's prescription that we should not act until we have taped every facet of a problem, until we can bring every weapon in our armoury to bear on its resolution? It seems to me that in his motion the hon. member is lobbying not for a program with action, but for inaction. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it was not surprising to me that, in fact, he did not talk about his motion.

The hon. member did not talk about the need for a comprehensive and coherent program because I suspect that in his heart of hearts he, too, wants us to take practical steps forward whenever we see an area in which we can assist people who have social problems. I doubt that he really wants to insist that we should do nothing until we can do everything, or that we must know everything before we can take any action at all. What the hon. member spent a great deal of the first part of his speech discussing is a serious and grave problem—the extensive unemployment in that sector of the public under the age of 25 years.

This is a problem, a grave problem. It is not a problem that has been generated immediately over the past two or three years. It stems from structural factors in the Canadian economy which result from demographic patterns. Unemployment among the young is part of the general structural difficulties that the Canadian economy faces, not only this year but will face over the coming decade. I would suggest that that challenge is part of the special position of the Canadian economy; because, while our economy provides unique opportunities it also confronts problems that are not found in any other society.

Unemployment among Youth

There is, and the hon. member alluded to it, a problem of high rates of entry into the working force, higher than in any other developed country. There are problems of low levels of productivity, and there are problems of regional disparity, with which the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) has been much concerned. There are problems in deciding how we should use our great economic asset, the fact that we are resource rich, in determining a general industrial policy for this country.

The problem of unemployment among the young, which the hon. member has described, is one very important part of the more general question, namely—which is the appropriate industrial policy for Canada to pursue. If one looks back over the past four years of the government's policies, Mr. Speaker, I think one will see that most of them, in the economic area, fit around those four great themes. I have outlined the problems of unemployment, productivity, regional disparity and resource development. No one on this side of the House would suggest that we have dealt with these long term problems perfectly, although we have shown an increasing awareness and understanding of them—I would suggest a much greater understanding of them than any of the opposition parties.

• (1600)

The policy of the New Democratic Party toward developing an industrial policy for Canada is basically the ideal of nationalization. Of course, one is not always sure these days whether it does stand for nationalization. If I understand correctly, the policy of the Waffle group is to press for nationalization but this seems to be resisted by the leadership of the party. It is hard to know which is greater, the dismay of the leadership of the New Democratic Party that some of their followers take these ideals seriously or the disillusionment of the followers that the leadership of the party does not take them seriously.

The proposals made by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville were rather thin. He suggested that we should expand on-the-job training, seemingly unaware that one of the things the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) has already done has been to increase the grants for manpower training from $20 million to $50 million. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that proportionate to their place in the labour force, youth has a far greater share in manpower programs than do other members of the population. Manpower services are actually heavily tilted in favour of young people who, though forming but 26 per cent of the labour force, claim over 40 per cent of available occupational training places under our Canada Manpower training program. This proportion will likely increase if the eligibility requirements for training and allowances are broadened. Youth seeks the services of Canada manpower centres to an extent far outweighing their relative number. Almost half the people seeking full-time work through Canada manpower centres are under 25. Young workers are among those who are vigorously assisted to find employment and take up new opportunities. In 1970-71, 35 per cent of all those relocated through this program were under 25 years of age.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to stray too far into the field of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who, I understand, will be speaking later in the debate. However,

I want to emphasize that, through the provision of career and employment counselling to post-secondary education institutions and through other programs, over 142,000 students were placed in jobs last summer by Canada manpower centres. As I said earlier, on-the-job training grants were increased from $20 million to $50 million and 64 per cent of the people who benefited from these schemes were young people. The hon. member's criticisms of the program, and his suggestions for doing things that we are already doing, brings to mind a line describing a not too successful British politician. It was said that he was "indebted to his memory for his ideas and to his imagination for his facts".

I have not yet discussed the use of the Local Initiatives Program in respect of providing employment for young people, but perhaps before I do that I should say something about the remarks of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

Mr. Lundrigan: I was beginning to feel a bit lonely.

Mr. Roberts: When I was speaking about fossils in the official opposition who might appropriately have proposed the motion proposed by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, I was not thinking of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. He is a "progressive" Conservative and should be proud of that fact, as I am sure he is. He did not take the approach that is unfortunately taken by too many members of his party, that the Opportunities for Youth program and the Local Initiatives Program are gifts to our shiftless, lazy youth who are depriving other people of jobs. He did not take that approach and he is right because a Conservative should welcome these programs. I will expand on that later.

He did mention two major factors, however. One was the question of increased incentives for employment. The remarks I have just made about what we are doing under the manpower programs, particularly in respect of the young people, should lead him to conclude that we, as a government, are heading in the right direction. His second suggestion was that there should be a national conference for the young people of this country. As a private member and a backbencher, I would support that suggestion. It has a great deal of merit and should be seriously considered.

What has disappointed me most in the reaction of the first two speakers from the opposition is their failure to give credit where credit is due. In their heart of hearts, both the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville and the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate support the principles which were developed by the government in the Local Initiatives Program and the Opportunities for Youth program. I know it is the duty of the opposition to oppose, but it is not necessarily their duty to oppose everything at all times with all the force at their disposal. Their remarks might have gained more credibility if they had admitted that these are sound imaginative proposals which should be accepted and welcomed.

I said earlier that the Conservatives should support Opportunities for Youth and LIP. If there is one thing that we on the government side hear from the Conservative side it is that big government saps the initiative of citizens and bureaucracy takes away the capacity of the individual to assist with the problems of society. In these two programs, we have not created a large bureaucracy to establish and administer them. We have gone to the people and said, "Let's have your ideas, your enthusiasm, your suggestions, your initiative and we will work with you to assist you and to meet a social need." I suggest that a Conservative, particularly a "progressive" Conservative like the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, should understand, appreciate and support the concept of a government approach which says, "Let us, with a minimum of bureaucracy and red tape, tap the enthusiasm, the idealism and the initiative of the people who have something to contribute to our society."

It is obvious that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville should support these programs and principles because they are progressive and pragmatic. Of course, they do not claim to cover all the problems of every individual in society, but with a minimal amount of money enormous numbers of people have been assisted not just to do things for themselves alone but to help other people in the community. I would have applauded the hon. member if he had said that clearly, as I believe it is what is in his heart.

The fact of the matter is that in dealing with this problem of unemployment among young people we have developed programs under LIP and Opportunities for Youth which have been enormously successful and which have not been tried in any other country. Indeed, people from other countries come to see how we administer these programs and to learn our secret. I am not the only one to say that the programs are successful. There was an article in the Toronto Star of June 3, written by Trent Frayne and I would like to quote from it at some length—not that he is more eloquent than I, Mr. Speaker, but because members of the House may be prepared to believe that he is less biased in favour of the government than I. He says:

> It was as imaginative an idea for combating high unemployment as anything in western society. It was unique in that, instead of devising winter work projects for the people, the government turned to the people themselves for ideas about the kind of work they wanted to do.
> To see how this concept has worked out in practice, I travelled from coast to coast to look at LIP projects. I interviewed dozens of officials and critics, people who got grants and people who received help from projects. My conclusion: The LIP program is a runaway success.

What are the ground rules? A project should be of benefit to the community; it should not compete commercially with established businesses and it should give work to people who need jobs. What Canadians did within these guidelines was as innovative as it was varied. Mr. Frayne listed 30 or 40 projects that have been assisted by the LIP concept. His conclusion—not the conclusion of a government representative, or a backbencher, or an official spokesman for government programs, but the viewpoint of a disinterested journalist who made an extensive study—was as follows:

• (1610)

> The point is, though, that the abuses were remarkably few and the criticism soon muted, and what really mattered about the LIP program was that it caught up more than 90,000 people who would otherwise have had no work, permitted them the same freedom of invention and ingenuity that the wealthy enjoy, and directed them towards a new frontier in Canada, social justice for all.

That applies to the Local Initiatives Program. Of course, the Local Initiatives Program is not directed solely toward young people, but a large part of the projects undertaken have been ones in which young people have been involved.

There was only one comment by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate which really aroused my ire. That was his suggestion that these programs, such as Opportunities for Youth, are something in the nature of a welfare program or might be used just as a welfare program. I resent that because I think it is wrong—

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My remarks with regard to welfare had to do with the Manpower adult occupational training program where people are placed in these programs in order to be taken off the unemployment list. The hon. member should know this. I did not use the word "welfare" in connection with Opportunities for Youth or Local Initiatives Program.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a question of privilege. The hon. member does have the right to rise on a point of order to explain or clarify his remarks.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to learn that I was mistaken in my comprehension of what the hon. member said. I am sure he welcomes the opportunity to put right the impression which otherwise might have rested with some members of the House.

Earlier I referred to the view of some members, in fact many members, of the Conservative party who regard these programs as simply give-aways or contributions to shiftless youth who do not need assistance or help. That is an unfortunate way of looking at these programs. This is not a system by which we give anything away. It is a situation in which the government works with young people to tap their ideas and do things which need to be done at low cost.

What most impresses me about young people in our society is the very strong desire that most of them have to contribute to this society. We all give lip service to the turbulence among young people, their criticism of the society we have, and their opposition to the "system" of the "establishment". I think we should debate more often in the House the problems of concern to young people.

Among young people, there have been two reactions to the society which confronts them, a society which, as we all know, is far from perfect. Some of these young people choose, perhaps through frustration, to opt out. There are people on the drug trip, people who abandon the life of their communities to live in communes, and people who say that our society is so rotten and corrupt that they simply want to amputate themselves from it and hope that they will be uncorrupted by the society in which we live.

There are others, much more numerous and I believe more admirable, who, although disliking many aspects of our society, decide that they will not opt out, but will opt in. They are not pursuing selfish goals for themselves, such as a higher salary, increased security or an easy and soft life. They are young people who feel they have something to contribute in helping their fellowman in this society. These are the people to whom Opportunities for Youth and the Local Initiatives Program have been directed. It has given them a chance to contribute their energy and ideas to a society which desperately needs their enthusiasm and ideas. These young people are our best hope for the future. If we ignore them, or reject them, it will be to the peril of our society.

Since I have discussed the Local Initiatives Program at some length, I should say a few words about Opportunities for Youth. The programs which we have had under Opportunities for Youth have given the young people in our society an occasion to contribute, something which has been too often neglected in the past. Perhaps I might be pardoned if I make reference to the kinds of things being done in my own area, the constituency of York-Simcoe. I confess that when the idea of Opportunities for Youth was first broached, many constituents in my area were uneasy about the idea. They were concerned about the novelty of it. They were not sure it would be of great benefit. However, when you describe what has been done and what will be done this summer in my area, they become enthusiastic supporters of this concept.

Under Opportunities for Youth, there will be support this summer in my area for a mobile day camp concentrating on the arts, drama, music and related activities for young people between the ages of 10 and 14. There will be ecology studies, a youth involvement project, a co-operative between local businessmen and farmers in the rural area of my riding to find employment, and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure that the hon. member has 30 minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: According to my understanding, the parliamentary secretary is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, one gains the impression that only the Liberal party has any sympathy for the youth of this nation. When you look at the problems of youth from either the federal or provincial point of view, this is far from the truth.

I was also interested in listening to his remarks about on-the-job training. What he neglected to state was what happens to these people after the program is completed. The number who are laid off go back on the unemployment rolls. I suggest that many of these programs, such as the Local Initiatives Program and Opportunities for Youth, are in one sense stop-gap or short-term measures to reduce the number of unemployed. I am not suggesting that the Opportunities for Youth program is bad. I think the concept is a healthy one. It is one we should pursue further. The unfortunate aspect of it is that while there may be duplication on one hand, there is always the problem that such a program will not, and in fact does not, reach out to involve the entire community. In fact, in this summer of 1972 only 30,000 of the 250,000 unemployed young people in this country will be involved. This is tragic. It should have been broader in its scope to include more of our young people.

It is my privilege today to enter this debate on the many problems and frustrations facing a substantial proportion of our younger people, notably those in their twenties who are just beginning to attempt to establish themselves in our society. Perhaps I should say "find themselves", for surely society today is changing so rapidly, it is so complex and confusing, that even the most secure and stable are often unnerved with apprehension. In urban Canada there are three major social and economic areas of great concern in which tension creates either violence or soul destroying frustration and crippling boredom. These are the lack of proper housing, educational systems that are out of touch with the realities of today, and the absolute boredom of the factory and office. No doubt there are many others, but I will limit myself to these three.

It is certainly ironic to me that while we have talked more about housing in the last four years than in any previous Parliament, lack of proper housing is still the number one problem in our cities. The present administration has deliberately ignored the needs of the low and middle income earners for proper living accommodation. It deliberately shelved urban renewal plans well under way in the mid 1960's, and only now at the eleventh hour the minister responsible for housing has brought in a bill to help save his government.

When I talk about housing, I am talking, first, about cost, because cost is obviously the barrier to adequate housing. A recent government task force on low income housing headed by Montreal architect Melvin Charney concludes that 49.5 per cent of Canadians cannot afford decent housing. This 49.5 per cent is in a group which ranges from families on welfare to those earning $6,500 a year or less. Many of our younger citizens are also in this category—under-educated, improperly educated, coming from homes where poverty has denied them the incentive for self-improvement, where squalor has depressed them to the point at which many just don't care.

Row housing, which is the type of home built mainly for the poor—and this is a mistake—dropped by 8 per cent in 1971 while more expensive housing starts increased by 38 per cent. I say row housing is a mistake because very often the people who live in this type of housing have many problems adjusting to conjested living conditions. Very often built of inferior design, these housing units frequently degenerate into modern slums. Moreover, people cramped into row housing find it difficult to relate to the community outside the "compound", if I may use that expression, because they feel inferior by the very nature of their segregated living quarters. Again, it is my personal experience that many of these people are young. Before they have a real chance in life, they are barricaded behind the poverty wall.

Among the villains in the cost of housing are land speculators. Cost of land rose in nearly all metropolitan areas in 1970, with increases of more than 10 per cent in Halifax, St. John's, Saint John, Montreal, Ottawa, Hamilton, Toronto, Sudbury, Edmonton and Vancouver. Another factor in the high cost of housing, and a major contributor to inflation, is the present method of financing home ownership with high interest loans. A house priced at $20,000 typically would receive a first mortgage under NHA of $16,500. Interest over 25 years at 9 per cent would be $24,500. Principal, interest and the original payment of $3,500 would bring the cost of that house over 25 years to $44,500, more than twice the original price—hardly a bargain.

The tragedy of this situation is that most young married couples with a couple of children just cannot afford the down payment necessary to secure a first mortgage so are forced into a second mortgage situation which saps them of what money they should have left for ordinary family needs. The situation is aggravated by the fact that they are obliged to live in small apartments, many of a run-down nature, at the very time when their children should be enjoying the pleasures and security of a private home. Again, we see frustrations and tensions made even worse throughout the tenure of this administration by massive unemployment, particularly among the young. Young couples, because of interrupted earnings, have been forced to accept, where it is available, substandard accommodation. The unemployment insurance cheque comes in one day and the rent cheque goes out the next. This is another aspect of the Just Society.

In a 1971 report, the Science Council of Canada concluded that by sustained development of housing technology, even using conventional materials and methods, housing costs could be reduced by 15 per cent or more below the present norm in Canada. That represents a saving of $3,000 on a $20,000 home. The Science Council also endorsed a policy long advocated by the New Democratic Party—a vigorous program of land assembly by governments at all levels. Leadership in this field would have to be given by the federal government in co-operation with provincial governments, as municipalities are not in a financial position to do this effectively. A massive program of home construction would also reduce present high levels of unemployment especially among those 240,000 Canadians who are under the age of 25.

Mr. Speaker, if we intend to make a real effort at solving the tremendous social problems associated with, and to a great extent caused by, poor housing in our urban areas, we must launch an all-out attack against slums, high rents, high interest rates, land speculation and crowded and congested substandard accommodation. The time for talking and arguing is over. We must begin and begin now, or our cities will resemble the decay and rot that we see to the south.

It always seems a pity to me that we in Canada are unable to learn from the mistakes of our neighbours to the south. For a generation we have watched urban sprawl, innercity rot and decay, increasingly conjested living conditions breeding violence and terror in the streets, school systems which have virtually broken down, schools where hallways have to be patrolled by armed policemen, and where teachers in some cases actually have guns in their desks. We also see courageous social planners and bold and imaginative civic leaders desperately trying to turn the tide against utter social chaos.

America's faults were in part innocent. Americans were innovators. They led the way on this continent into the technological age. Their mistakes can perhaps, to some degree, be forgiven. But can ours? Because surely we are following them down the same path to urban blight with all its attendant social and economic problems. Good housing at prices people can afford, particularly those just starting a family, is the very cornerstone of a healthy urban environment. So, let us rid ourselves of the land speculators and high interest rates and the endless red tape between governments and get on with the job.

Another major problem very evident in today's society, and one which is causing a rather widespread social malaise among the young, is the type of education most schools are providing. We see before us education systems which are not only out of touch with the real challenges of the present and future, but which have placed their emphasis on brick and mortar in the past ten years. This has created a generation of ill-equipped and, to an appreciable degree, over-educated unemployables. The cost of this failure has been astronomical.

One of the reasons our students today are over-educated is that we have trained them for professional jobs that our economic policies have exported to foreign countries, notably to the United States. In the vast field of what might be termed creative technology, the field of the inventor, the architect, the designer, the quality control analyst, and so on, most of the work is being done by the parent firm outside Canada. What our workers do, by and large, is assemble, package, label and ship. This is one major reason so many of our graduates find it difficult or, at times, impossible to find meaningful employment for which they have been trained at great cost. Let us not forget that the largest share of the cost of education, at all levels, is borne by the low and middle income earner.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that technical and commercial students should, after nine years of schooling, be released from our institutions to gain on-the-job training in industry and in commerce where they would receive the remainder of their education, not at the taxpayers' expense but at the company's expense. This, I suggest, would have a multiple effect: not only would it lower school taxes, it would relieve congestion in our schools and would provide more practical training where the action is—in the factory and in the marketplace. Students would also mature faster and be better prepared to face the challenges of a real life situation. They would have five or six years behind them before marrying and starting a family, and hopefully would be in better financial shape. The same would hold true for rural youngsters who wish to pursue a career in agriculture.

As a former teacher, I saw so much of the time of many students wasted because they were being forced to stay at school to prepare for jobs that to a great degree will soon be obsolete. This situation holds true for many academic students as well. It is indeed a sad commentary on our society today to see university graduates employed as check-out girls in food stores and trained teachers driving taxis. Bitterness is growing among this young group in Canada. In talking with university students I find that many are not even planning beyond graduation day. School has become a sort of asylum for them. They feel secure in the classroom but dread the thought of job hunting. Is it any wonder that many become part of the drug subculture, or simply want to wander?

Opportunities for Youth Programs and Local Initiative Programs are not going to solve this problem. Not only are they extremely costly to the taxpayers, but they hardly make a dent in the unemployment figures relating to the young. This summer, for example, only 30,000 young people, mainly from our schools, will participate in the OFY, while approximately 210,000 young people will be left out. If we have an Opportunities for Youth program for students, why cannot we have the same kind of program for the thousands of youths who cannot find work in our factories?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to devote the remainder of my time to yet a third major cause of social malaise among our younger people. I am referring to the absolute boredom that comes from the menial, mind-numbing jobs to which so many of our younger workers—be they blue or white collar—are subjected in our factories and offices across the country. In a recent article in the Toronto Star, Sydney Katz reports that "of the thousands of men who work on the auto-assembly lines in Oshawa, 56 per cent are taking tranquilizers or some other kind of drug, many to help them cope with their mind-numbing jobs". Further, "we are notorious for the extent of our drug use", said Albert Taylor, president of local 222 of the United Automobile Workers Union. "The men move zombie-like performing the same mindless, minor operations, over and over again, their senses befogged and distorted by their robot-like movements and the hellish howls and shrieks of the machines."

To me this reads like an industrial history of Great Britain in the 19th century. Industrial development has not really improved working conditions at all. In fact, emotionally and psychologically, workers are worse off today. When one considers that the majority of these workers are in their twenties and thirties, it is not difficult to understand a host of social and financial problems emanating from this boredom and entering the homes and families of these workers. This boredom is also prevalent in office work as well where pool typists, copying machine operators, keypunch operators and filing clerks never see the beginning or the end of their jobs.

So, Mr. Speaker, all in all we seem to be nurturing a generation of young people who are suspicious of traditional professions because of lack of opportunity in many of those professions, bored and numbed by jobs that require no creative or challenging skills, disillusioned about traditonal work patterns, disinterested in learning because of antiquated educational systems, and lacking proper and decent living conditions in ever-growing congested cities. This is a pretty bleak picture, and a pretty sobering one.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the points put forward this afternoon both by the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), and by the speaker who has just preceded me cover a wide range. If I remember correctly, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, in attempting to put forward some alternative ideas, said he approved of the on-the-job training programs of the government and that he would want to see these programs extended with the aid of increased financial support. When addressing himself to the Opportunities for Youth program, he made a rather interesting observation, which I share with him, namely that these programs should be more intensively redirected to those who need employment and made available more on the basis of need than has been the case so far. But both speakers, by their own admission, seemed to approve of and support the concept of training on the job and also Opportunities for Youth.

If that is the case as stated by them, then it becomes very difficult to understand the logic of the motion before us today which accuses the government of disregarding youth's legitimate aspirations. The word "disregard" is used in the motion. I ask, how can you, on the one hand, accuse the government of this disregard and, on the other hand, say that some of the programs that have been developed and made available to the people about whom the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville is so concerned should be extended? It seems to me that there is a contradiction in terms. The hon. member is agreeing that the programs that have been developed so far are good and perhaps we should have more of the same. I expected him to suggest that these programs were not good and should be replaced by a different approach, in view of his use of the word "disregard" in the motion before us today. In other words, the hon. member cannot have it both ways. He cannot accuse the government of disregarding youth's legitimate aspirations and at the same time say yes, we need more of the kind of program that has been developed over the years.

Not only has the government conceived of the idea of an Opportunities for Youth program, it has also had the courage to put it into effect, to make it available under some very simple, basic conditions, with almost no red tape, on the terms of the job seekers, and for the purpose of community betterment. All of this has been done in an attempt to catch and to understand the moods and values, the aspirations and changing conditions of our young people today. Certainly, the idea was not put forward by members on the opposition benches, for once having suggested such a concept they would find it difficult to disapprove of the program and to suggest that it be replaced by other programs. Indeed, it is obvious that the program is a popular one. The only route that then remains available to them is to outbid and ask for more, and to demand greater emphasis on these programs. Of course, we obviously all agree that when a concept proves to be good, in spite of all the predictions of gloom such as those that came from the opposition benches two summers ago when this idea was launched for the first time, everybody wants to support it. In that sense, we share the same approach.

It is a pity this motion is drafted in such narrow terms and deals only with young unemployed, as if this were a matter of a more serious concern than the unemployment of older people. There is a broad group of Canadians with which we are concerned here, and to select the young ones only seems to indicate the concern is not shared equally for other sectors of our community. If you are in your fifties or early sixties, mature and unemployed today, it is a very serious and very tragic circumstance. It would have been more desirable, and reflect greater concern had the motion been drafted in a manner dealing with the total spectrum of those unemployed in an attempt to find the answer in these difficult years of providing new avenues of employment in our nation.

The impression that this motion creates is very serious and I should like to deal with it for a moment. The impression is created that we are dealing with a chronic period of unemployment, while at the same time employment is retaining the same level. This is far from being so. Anyone who wishes to become aware of the picture must look at the figures published by Statistics Canada from month to month and from year to year. He will see that, for instance between spring of 1971 and spring of 1972, employment in Canada has risen by over 300,000 new jobs, and that the figure for the same period perhaps a year before was somewhere in the neighborhood of 300,000 or just below that mark.

While unemployment in this country is with us at a disturbing level, in order to get a complete and correct picture one has at the same time to look not only at unemployment figures but also at employment figures. Then, one will realize that employment figures are rising constantly from year to year at a phenomenal degree, a rate of almost 300,000 new jobs per year. That is no minor performance for a small nation with a population base of only 22 million. It is a remarkable performance because, according to studies and statistics, it outdoes the performance of five or six western European countries put together in their ability to create new jobs. The population of those five or six countries, namely West Germany, France, Italy and so forth is something in the range of about five to 10 times the population of Canada. Here we have a comparatively small nation able to generate and produce jobs to the extent of approximately 300,000 from one year to the next.

We are asked now to deal with a narrow motion that creates the impression that employment in Canada is a stagnant factor. How blind can one be in putting forward this kind of a proposal? One should have the courage or wish to look at the over-all picture, and admit that while we have shortcomings and weaknesses in our unemployment levels, which leave much to be desired, we have at the same time a substantially increasing labour force since our economy has been able to generate new jobs to the tune of about 300,000 per year. This is no minor feat.

Going back to the basic motion of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, I suspect his speech will read in the record tomorrow like the commentary of a biblical figure or prophet, because the whole tone of his approach to the question was one of sadness, a forecast of disaster, depicting the picture of Canadian youth as far from the one with which most of us are familiar. Some of these young people are here in the galleries with their teachers. We see them going through these buildings by the thousands each day. These are vibrant, competent young people looking to the future, which is very bright indeed. We certainly disagree with any member of this House who depicts the picture of Canadian youth as the one the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville painted.

The hon. member's motion has done something useful in that it asks this House to stop for a moment and give thought to how we should improve our approach to and understanding of the new developments in society, how to understand why, in the area of employment, new values are creeping in and old ones are being rejected, while situations are developing within our industrial society that are becoming too difficult to accept when contrasted with the idea of working every day in the factory, and so forth.

The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) concluded his remarks a moment ago by quoting an interesting article from a daily newspaper which indicated that a high percentage of people were resorting to certain drugs in order to come to terms with an environment in which they have to work. It is possible that we live in times when it is much more enjoyable to be outside the working situation, because at work, as we all know and have been told, there is an increasing dehumanization as a result of lack of identification, and the limited satisfaction of assembly line situations. We do not know the answers, nor do we know why these new values of young people are developing.

Both the preceding members spoke about the desirability of extending the Opportunities for Youth Program to young farmers and young people who are not students. I suggest this has been done already, at least partially through LIP. Thousands of young people who are not students are engaged in some of the LIP programs across the nation. However, it is much broader in its scope because it permits people to actively participate regardless of age. Perhaps had we done what has been proposed, we would have been accused of age discrimination by offering programs only to youngsters and not to other people. By means of LIP, we have an approach which tends to be universal. This is a program which states that any person, regardless of age, who is unemployed and wishes to contribute to the betterment of his community has an opportunity to do so.

• (1650)

One would hope in a debate like this that one could provide some help in discovering new answers to the present challenge, which is a very complex one. The challenge is to try to place the government in a position to adjust its approach from year to year to a society whose values change rapidly, as we all know, and to offer programs totally apart from the trend of the programs we have seen in the past. It is a fact, and it is a pity that none of the members opposite have admitted this, that in this situation the government of Canada, through LIP, has produced a program in respect of employment which is most imaginative and the envy of perhaps all western industrialized nations. People from other parts of the world have inquired how this program was conceived and how it is administered. They have asked also how politically dangerous it is. Usually the inquiry asks whether we do not think we took a great risk in launching a program of this nature. The government certainly did, but in the end the program seems to have worked out fairly well despite the criticisms, despite the newspaper articles and despite some of the questions asked in this House. I remember very clearly that in the spring of 1971, the opposition was determined to demonstrate that the Opportunities for Youth Program was ill conceived and hastily conceived. Now, 15 months later, we witness this beautiful example of one speaker after another not only praising the program but saying, "Please give us more of this".

I could not think of a better testimonial to this policy or this program. It might be repetitive to say we think that unemployment in the 1970's is a phenomenom which will stay with us for reasons stated by others, and that it will be a constant and a complex challenge for any government to try to find adequate answers which will be acceptable to those who are unemployed as well as to those who are working. It is those who are working who, through their income tax, will have to support these programs and who will constantly, as has been the case so far, question the quality and validity of the program. This is a problem which is constantly before us. The beginning, however, has been good. The results have been outstanding. At least in our cities we know of the outstanding programs which have been carried out to the satisfaction of the community, the participants themselves and the establishment. What is being provided today, obviously, is an opportunity for us to hear from some members of the opposition what should be the answer in the years to come.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this motion before the House. Probably it is time the motion was repeated. I do not think it has been repeated since the debate started. The motion reads:

That this House regrets the failure of the government to produce a comprehensive—

I underline the word "comprehensive".

—and coherent program—

I underline the words "coherent program".

—to deal with the growing unemployment among our young people and its disregard of youth's legitimate aspirations.

It is a very timely motion, and one which I believe the House ought to appreciate being brought before it for discussion and debate. Why is it important? It is important because last year in Canada, in 1971, there were 46.3 per cent of people aged 14 to 24 unemployed, roughly one quarter of a million of our young people. It is also a fact that 30.4 per cent of the unemployed people had a grade eight education or less. Over one million young people graduated from universities, last year only a fraction of whom have been able to find employment. Many parents told their children they should attend university because if they did not they would not have as good an opportunity to obtain a job. They attended university, received a degree, entered the labour market and were unable to find a job. This is a very sad situation. It certainly affects those parents who told their children they should attend university. People who have Ph.D. degrees are driving taxis and girls who have B.A. degrees are working as check-out girls in supermarkets. I am not suggesting there is anything wrong with such occupations, but these young people attended university in the hope of obtaining jobs of higher rating and with higher pay than they have been able to obtain.

These are very serious situations. This government has had an ad hoc approach to this whole problem. Under Prime Minister Pearson, the Liberals introduced the Company of Young Canadians. What happened to that? It should have been the answer to many of the problems before us today. Instead of building up the Company of Young Canadians and having it do the job it was intended to do, the government jumped from pillar to post and brought in another program called the Opportunities for Youth. These programs overlapped. They should have been co-ordinated in some way. The Company of Young Canadians seems to have passed into oblivion. Now we have new programs, the Opportunities for Youth program, the Local Initiatives Program, a sort of ad hoc approach to the whole situation. I am not here to criticize. I think perhaps we should offer some constructive suggestions that would help clear up the unholy mess in which the young people find themselves after obtaining an education, whether at a university, a community college or a manpower retraining program.

I intend to keep my remarks along these lines. I wonder how the three levels of government allowed us to get into this situation. Surely, in this computer age it would not have been too much of a task to visualize the future requirements in respect of the various professions and the various disciplines studied at university. Surely, we could have anticipated 4, 8 or 12 years ahead the number of doctors, the number of engineers, the number of lawyers, the number of History and Political Science graduates and so on, that would be required. We should have been able to survey the demand and estimate the number of students which would be required in these various professions.

I am the first to agree that it is very difficult to say to a young fellow or to a young girl whose leanings are toward literature and writing "you should go into engineering" or "you should be a doctor". It should not be very difficult to say to them that four years from now there will be four times as many sociologists or engineers as we need, or the reverse. I do not know why the three levels of government have not joined together to work out a system to provide this information. I grant that education is not the responsibility of the federal government but is a provincial matter. However, we entered the field of education, perhaps by the back door, and since we are there let us give some guidance and direction in this very serious matter.

There is another problem to which we should give serious thought. I am one of those who believe that every young person who goes to university is independent enough to want to pay his own way. Many of these young people do not even want to borrow money from their parents or to obtain a student loan. They want to be able to say that they have earned the money and put themselves though university.

Mr. Knight: They cannot earn that much money.

Mr. Hales: I will tell you how they can earn that money. I will suggest a new approach to education. Let us take the example of a university student who is taking a course in commerce. He can study the theory for three or four months and for the next three or four months he might work for a large company, in a bank or some other place, to get practical experience. His place of work he would not be able to earn a sufficient amount of money to pay his way through university. So I say, let us scrap the student loan program and use the money for that program to subsidize the employer of these students under the work and learn program. Let us say to the student "you will have to learn to save to put yourself through university". He would be proud of the fact that he was able to earn enough money to put himself through university and that he did not even have to ask his father or mother to help him.

There would also be another benefit. The young person, after having worked four months in the profession in which he thought he was interested, might find that this was not what he wanted, that he was in the wrong course. He could stop right there and enroll himself in a course where his interests lie.

I believe that if we adopted such a system as this which would enable students to pay their way through university we would be accomplishing something.

This brings me to another aspect where we are badly adrift, as I see it. I am referring to the guidance counsellors at the high schools and universities. I do not feel they are in tune with what is ahead for our young people, and perhaps the young people are not getting the guidance which they should have. It seems to me that guidance counsellors at high schools and universities are the most important people on the staff and they should be paid the highest salary.

The program that the government introduced 15 months ago called the Opportunities for Youth program is one that I support. I agree with the principle of the program, but I am not satisfied with the way in which it has been operated. First of all, there is the matter of selection of the programs. The selection is being made by someone here in Ottawa, in an ivory tower. How can someone here in Ottawa know which is the best program for a community? Surely, the government should say to the community that they will support an Opportunities for Youth program but they would like the program to have the blessing and the approval of the community. Surely, there are groups of people who should either endorse or reject such a program.

One such program was adopted in my riding. I think the selection was made from an application on a piece of paper which was received here in Ottawa. This particular program happens to interfere with the work of the YM and YWCA. They got $7,000 for this program, and what was the result? The YWCA was operating the same kind of program before the Opportunities for Youth program was introduced. As a result of the acceptance of the OYP, the people working on the YWCA program lost their jobs, so four people were hired and four people lost their jobs. The net result was zero.

The principle of the program may be all right, but the selection and supervision of these projects leaves much to be desired. Last week I spoke briefly about supervision. I was informed that any expenditure below $15,000 for these programs would not have to be audited. In other words, when a group of people get $8,000 or $10,000 for a program they are not asked to account for the money; they are not required to produce vouchers. If this is a fact, then it is very serious and I for one will make a request, which I am sure would be supported by the public generally, that all the money granted for OYP must be accounted for and audited as all public money should be. Even if that cannot be done for all the programs, certainly spot checks should be made so that the OYP people would know they were being held accountable for the money given to them under the program.

Let us now take a look at the Manpower offices and see what they might do to assist the young people in finding employment. I, for one, give the Manpower offices full marks for what they do in the summertime to assist young people to obtain employment. However, this work should be continued throughout the year, even though primarily it is just a summer program. Speaking of the Manpower offices and of the regulations under which they work, I give those officials full marks for removing the three year attachment to the labour force clause which meant that training allowances could be granted and the period shortened. This is a good thing.

Since we are speaking primarily about youth and their problems today, I would just like to repeat that the Department of Manpower and Immigration is focused mainly on summer employment for post-secondary students and the needs of young job seekers 16 and 17 years old appear to be neglected. Young workers need special attention and counselling to assist them in finding suitable employment. It is doubtful if this can be accomplished in the broad approach taken by the Canada Manpower Centres.

• (1710)

The Canadian Council on Social Development conducted a study on this matter, and I wish to quote from its report at page 253 as follows:

> Only 10 per cent of the respondents interviewed for this study had good things to say about their contacts with Canada Manpower Centres. Perhaps they expected too much, perhaps they deserved better. Some displayed a mixed reaction. The majority were critical of the treatment and help received. Sixty per cent resented or were critical of the attitudes projected by Manpower counsellors.
>
> There is much more at stake than Manpower's search for job orders when the employment needs of new, young workers are under consideration. A more personal, sympathetic and conselling intensive approach is required if widespread discontent and despair among youth is to be avoided.
> As a short-term measure, the Department of Manpower and Immigration should develop a network of youth manpower centres, separate and distinct from, but closely co-ordinated with existing Canada Manpower Centres. These should be staffed by carefully selected, specially trained personnel with an understanding of and respect for the needs and values of young people. The youth centres should be oriented to youth and should conduct continuing aggressive outreach programs with both youth and employers.

I think this would be a step in the right direction. The counselling in the Manpower offices leaves much to be desired. Many people are misdirected to the upgrading courses which Manpower conducts. People are put into the wrong courses. Sometimes after a person has taken a course there is no job available for him. I wish to quote one example that is given in the study to which I have already referred. It is typical and bears out many of the things people have told me. The young fellow involved is called John. Here is his story:

> John, aged 20, was raised on a farm and completed Grade 12. He came to the city two years ago to take a commercial art course at the community college. He received no counselling on graduation from high school or on admission to the community college. John completed his art course but then found that there was no demand for his services. To his chagrin he learned that only a very small proportion of any commercial art class ever found employment in that field. John has registered at Canada Manpower for any kind of job but has failed to obtain a position as yet. He shares accommodation with friends in a commune and feels their friendship and support keeps him going. He doesn't like to be dependent on those who are working and so applied for social assistance. His parents are still on the farm and he feels they would welcome his return as they were disappointed that he did not want to make farming his way of life. But it appears to him that they have always just barely "got by" and he can't see any future there. When interviewed he was discouraged and depressed.

Why would he not be discouraged and depressed? There are many others like him. Mr. Speaker, I see my time is up. I would have liked to develop my argument, but I am grateful to have had this opportunity, short as it was, to participate in this debate.

Mr. William Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate because of the immense importance of the motion introduced by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). I was somewhat intrigued by the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) who made some ridiculous statements concerning the fact that the motion was somewhat abrasive. I want to point out to the hon. member that if we had introduced a motion that could have been agreed to by all hon. members, a wishy-washy kind of motion, we would have been attacked for that very reason.

The hon. member referred to the Opportunities for Youth program. He could not understand why we were offering criticisms of it and yet suggesting that it be expanded. May I refer the hon. member to a report of the National Council of Welfare on guaranteed incomes and guaranteed jobs, at page 9, where it states:

> The hopeful developments of the past year, as embodied in the Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives Programs, is that this re-definition can be seen to have begun. It has begun, however, through programs designed only as ad hoc and short-term responses. Instead of building new permanent concepts of work in terms of community service, these programs have created only insecure, short-term, filler jobs. Thus, someone may for years have carried out various community service activities on an unremunerated volunteer basis. In June of 1971 under the Opportunites for Youth program that activity suddenly became a "job" and the person doing it received pay for this employment—till September when it suddenly ceased to be employment and again became unpaid volunteer activity—until December when the Local Initiatives Program again declared it a "job" and provided remuneration—until May when this program substantially expired and it again became unpaid non-employment. The May 31 expiry of the main part of the Local Initiatives program not only saw more than 70,000 Canadian workers "laid off," with all the attendant affects upon them and their families, but an end to thousands of projects providing valuable community services. That many projects were continued beyond this date is commendable, but they survive on the same insecure basis of facing a guillotine which has merely been postponed till September.

That is why the Opportunites for Youth and Local Initiatives programs are very much open to debate in this House. My colleagues have done an excellent job in spelling out the difficulties therein. I would like to deal with the problems facing youth in our rural society. Often, we fail to develop opportunities for young people who do not wish to live their lives in the urban centres. We need to develop a program that will allow these people to live in our rural society. What is the situation in this day and age, Mr. Speaker? In terms of unemployment, most of the 512,000 unemployed in Canada are between the ages of 28 and 44 years. I point out that the average age of the farmers in rural Canada is 57 years. He will soon reach an hour of decision with respect to what kind of people we want to live in the rural areas, and with respect to whether young people will be involved in farming.

According to the 1971 census, there are 15 per cent fewer farms in Canada than there were in 1966, a mere five years ago. The 1966 census showed that there were 85,686 farms in Saskatchewan, and the 1971 census showed only 76,970 farms there, a negative variation of 10.2 per cent. This illustrates the fast dwindling population of the rural areas. Most of those who are still there are in the age bracket over 50 years. The loss of these farms is directly related to the loss of jobs in the small communities, towns and villages that serve the rural areas. We also find a loss in the populations of these small towns and villages. You find, for example, that the 1971 population of Saskatchewan was 926,000 while in 1966 it was 955,000. Further studies of the figures for farm population show that the age groups 20 to 24 and 25 to 29 were lowest in 1966. The urban population in this country has increased to 73.6 per cent in 1971 from 69.6 in 1966. There is an ever-increasing number of people living in urban areas, quite often in urban squalor, having abandoned the rural way of life. It is well known that the move to large urban centres has been the trend over the last number of years, not only in Canada but in all parts of the world.

The policies introduced by the federal government following the task force report on agriculture have accelerated the depopulation of the rural areas because they introduced the concept of the elimination of two out of every three farms in Canada by 1990. This was proposed in the name of efficiency. The agriculture industry is expected to be self-sufficient, though it competes on the international market, while the industrial sector is subsidized through grants, forgivable loans, grants for research work, while at the same time having its markets controlled through administered prices. Not only does that situation affect the interests of young people who want to go into farming, but it affects young people in other government programs.

One of these policies is related to the Farm Credit Corporation. This Corporation has been very useful in the past in helping farmers get a certain amount of credit but the kind of collateral needed to get a loan puts young people, farmers and others, out of the running. There is no provision for the non-farmer who may have grown up on the farm, who now works in an urban setting but wishes to return to the land. Perhaps the third or fourth son of the family works in a co-op or a steel plant in Regina. He may grow tired of an eight hours a day job with no control over his production, and faced with a certain amount of boredom, may wish to take up farming. However, under these policies he does not have the option of going back to the land.

[Mr. Knight.]

Speaking of the federal government policy to accelerate the depopulation of rural areas, I need only point to the small farm consolidation plan introduced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) under the guise of amendments to the Farm Credit Act. This is a program to further rationalize the agricultural sector. It should be called the "bigger farm consolidation plan"—take two farms and make one or take three farms and make two. There are no options in the plan for a young man who wants to take over his father's farm. If he wants to expand a half section to one section, there is no option for him within the plan. The only option is for the young farmer to move off the land and to sell it to people presently in the farming industry. There is no option to go back on the land, Mr. Speaker, and I think this is an important point.

I need not go into detail about the difficulties facing a young man who wishes to go into the dairy business or the difficulty he has in getting a quota from the Canadian Dairy Commission. He must get this from a farmer who is selling out and usually he must buy the herds as well. The task force report talked about the elimination of farms, the need for larger farm units and this puts small farmers and young couples who want to go into farming at a distinct disadvantage.

It is often stated in this House that it is the duty of the opposition to oppose, but what I want to do today is to point out to the government some of the real dangers in their philosophy and policies and try to change this trend toward depopulation of the rural area. What is needed is a new rural development policy, a policy of "back to the land and a rural setting". Though it may sound conservative in some ways, I suggest this is a radical approach to the problem of unemployment in Canada. The world population trends are toward the development of large urban areas at the expense of rural areas. A rural development policy should contain a positive provision for income maintenance to show there is a future in farming, creating the incentive for a young man to go into farming. There must be a kind of quarantee that he can earn a reasonable income on the farm. There is no need for cases such as those in my constituency in which a young man with a wife and family finds it necessary to go to work in the mines in order to supplement the income from five quarters of land.

What is needed is an over-all income support program and guaranteed price levels for grain and other commodities. For the young man who wants to go into farming, there should be easy credit facilities to enable him to return to the land. This could be done if less collateral were needed to obtain a loan from the Farm Credit Corporation, and if there were a subsidized interest rate. A young man working in a plant in Moose Jaw or Regina who goes to the Farm Credit Corporation is asked what kind of collateral he has. Coupled with that kind of loan program, what is needed is a national land bank scheme to make land available to young farmers who have no capital. This program is being worked out in the province of Saskatchewan. I suggest that a land bank scheme across Canada, aided by the federal government, would be of benefit to young people interested in going to rural areas.

Most people who are not familiar with rural areas think only of farmers in that setting, but we need to develop options for professional people as well, those who wish to live in small communities where the air is cleaner. That can be developed through a system of special grants for medical students who wish to practice in rural settings. Nurses, dentists, teachers and lawyers who go into the educational system can say that when they have completed their education they wish to practice in a rural setting. On that basis we would enhance the development of a rural area for the production of goods by people on family farms, and not other interest groups.

Further to that, at the national level we need legislation which prevents foreign ownership of land. We need strong legislation, not the piecemeal kind of legislation we see in the foreign takeovers bill now before the committee. We must prevent foreign ownership of land. We want to prevent situations where you have an Oklahoma lawyer buying 45 sections of the top land in Saskatchewan. Further, we must prevent the corporate ownership of land by such companies as the National Grains Company. We must prevent corporations in the food processing industry buying large tracts of land for their own purposes.

It is not, as some people suggest, a selfish motive on the part of those of us who represent rural areas to speak of the development of a kind of option for unemployed young people and young couples to move into rural areas. If you develop a strong rural community with support services to take off the pressure from already overpopulated cities, as well as creating a domestic market for urban manufactured goods you attack the problem of unemployment in the age group about which I spoke at the beginning of my speech. This enhances the number of people involved in the rural areas and at the same time creates purchase and demand power for goods manufactured in the cities. This further enhances the employment situation in the large urban industrial areas.

It is very easy to speak in that manner. Even with the loss of 15 per cent of our farmers in the past six years, the farmers of this country still use more horsepower than Canadian industry. They need the equipment with which to operate. In terms of the entire food industry, farmers constitute 35 per cent of the work force in terms of employment; they purchase 30 per cent of the fuel requirements within the boundaries of Canada, 40 per cent of the tires and 40 per cent of the iron and steel sold in this country. In this way they keep the farm machinery workers employed in the city of Brantford and people working in iron and steel production areas. They create employment throughout this country. They create consumer demand which helps reduce the unemployment problem throughout this nation.

If we continue the present trend of depopulation and the federal government accelerates the trend in respect of rural areas, markets for domestic goods will further decline and there will be more unemployment in urban areas. When we developed this nation at the turn of the century—I do not like mentioning his name because of this political allegiance—Mr. Sifton produced an over-all policy of developing the west as a market for eastern goods. Essentially, we still live in the kind of society where rural areas are important trade areas for industrial goods.

We sometimes complain about eastern tariff protection, and justly so, unfair freight rates and the unfair prices we pay for farm machinery; but what could hold confederation together through the development of a strong rural population which produces the grains which keep our balance of payments in order as well as creates a domestic market for manufactured goods. We must change agricultural policy so that the age of the average farmer is 27 or 37 and not 57. We must come to grips with this kind of rural development policy in the seventies or eighties, before it is too late.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PRODUCE PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House regrets the failure of the government to produce a comprehensive and coherent program to deal with the growing unemployment among our young people and its disregard of youth's legitimate aspirations.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is rather interesting to follow the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight). I sympathize with the concern that he has, particularly when he represents a constituency that has produced great men like himself and his late and very respected predecessor who served on the other side of the House.

The lack of youth working on farms creates a great problem. I wonder whether the hon. member is trying to turn back the laws of economics to the time when 70 per cent of the population in this country lived and worked on farms at the beginning of the century. It is now about 10 per cent of the population. I would hate to question these economics, when the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and others of her party get up on the "late show" and question the cost of food, if we hope artificially to stimulate in a non-economic way the cost of producing food. I do not know about the dairy farmer: I think he faces some "udder" frustrating situations; I suggest he is on the horns of a dilemma.

The hon. member spoke about foreign ownership of land. That is an interesting point, because his Saskatchewan government considers any land owned by people outside that province to be foreign owned. That would make René Levesque look like a federalist. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales), who preceded the hon. member for Assiniboia—

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Knight: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Danson: I would like to continue, Mr. Speaker, because my time is so short. If there is time at the end of my speech, I would be delighted to answer the hon. member's question. The hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Wellington referred to an ad hoc approach. I suggest it is a very flexible and responsive approach, responding to the reasons which the hon. member for Wellington gave, such as lack of ability to project into the future. I disagree with him that the Company of Young Canadians has disappeared. I think it has found its role. Mistakes were made, they were seen to be mistakes by the government and the CYC was reorganized. We think it has disappeared because it is operating efficiently and quietly. These are the flexible and sensitive approaches which a responsive government takes.

The hon. member pointed out that there may have been some conflict in municipalities. I know that when the Opportunities for Youth and LIP programs were first presented I spoke to the community leaders in my constituency. They were delighted not to interfere. They realized the scope of the project and that we could achieve co-ordination as we developed more experience in these types of programs. We cannot expect perfection, but we are making progress.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) referred to the book entitled "Future Shock." It is interesting to note that in "Future Shock" Toffler says: "In dealing with the future it is more important to be imaginative and insightful than to be 100 per cent right." I think it is terribly important that that be the principle. If we work until everything is perfect and we cannot make mistakes, we usually end up, to use the cliché, with too little and too late. We must be prepared to experiment and make mistakes.

I wish to quote from a lead editorial which appeared in the June 10 edition of the Financial Post. It refers to LIP which was started in a hurry and mistakes were made. The article reads in part:

> The success of LIP is now well documented and it is easy to understand why manpower minister Bryce Mackasey should want to see it continue in some form far into the future ... At a time when jobs were needed, it created an impressive 92,000. Perhaps even more significant, almost half of the people involved in the program were removed from the ranks of those drawing unemployment insurance or receiving welfare.

It is interesting and significant that a financial journal should say this. The editorial continues:

• (1740)

> To a whole generation of young adults who had been bombarded with anti-establishment views, here was the establishement coming to them on their own terms and providing the funds needed to carry out projects that the young felt were important and valuable. Young and not so young found themselves working side by side, and getting satisfaction from it.

I think this is very significant, because I have the impression that when the history of the period is recorded, one of the greatest accomplishments of this government will prove to have been its ability to participate, to "tune in" a whole generation of youth which had been disenchanted by and alienated from the structure of society in all its forms, including government. Now, instead of opting out they are opting in. Government was responsive to their needs and they in turn responded nobly.

I hope this is not a caucus secret among my hon. friends, but when this matter was discussed in the early stages I know many of us felt severe criticism would be forthcoming, that mistakes would be made, that misunderstandings would arise. And I was proud of my colleagues in caucus when, having recognized that mistakes might be made, they agreed to go ahead nevertheless because they believed it was right to do so, and take the flak if the flak came. And the flak did come: it came at the beginning; but as the program developed and the thoughtful people saw what was happening—I am not talking about the stupid people who refuse to look further than long hair and shaggy beards and floppy hats—they applauded these projects.

When I hear of a project in my own constituency or in the Toronto region which is criticized in the press, in letters written to the editor or in letters which I receive, I investigate each case individually; and I have yet to find one which was not serving a very worth while purpose, not to perfection but doing a useful job.

I agree with the hon. member for Wellington in two respects. As the father of four sons, I believe counselling is of primary importance and I like the priority he places on it. I agree, too, on the importance of trying to determine the direction in which the whole of our society is moving. As to our ability to project future trends, there are areas in certain disciplines in which we can forecast when shortages will arise. But there are many other areas where projections made today would not be valid in ten years. The velocity of change has been so great that we can well remember when society seemed to turn itself around every 20 years, then every ten years and, later, every five years. Now the rate of change is so fast that I suggest it does so in even less time.

Governments alone do not change faster than they did: good governments even more so. I suggest that future shock is current shock, and I do not mean that in the hydro electric sense of the word. It is constantly with us. This change is what disturbs us, and it is reflected in the mail we receive from our constituents, especially from the older people. Those who are most capable of dealing with change are, in my opinion, the younger people whom we are dealing with now.

I agree we have a great responsibility to project to the greatest extent possible, to listen to Toffler and what he says in "Future Shock," to try not to be 100 per cent right. It is better to make mistakes through bad planning than to fail to plan at all. It is better to make mistakes in an effort to progress than to settle for the status quo.

It seems to have been forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that youth is part of the total economy and that many things have been done to stimulate the economy. Our economic growth has been quite admirable, our exports have reached record levels. After a temporary decline last month, business is again picking up, strengthening our dollar to almost embarrassing levels but showing confidence in the Canadian economy. More jobs have been created than at any other time in our history, more than have been created by any other western nation—more, in fact, than almost all the European Common Market countries combined, with 12 to 16 times our population.

This does not excuse our high level of unemployment, of course, but there are stimulating programs being employed in this regard. For example, there is PAIT from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and IRDIA for research and development. The Industrial Development Bank is answering a need—I think it could do even more if we extended its terms of reference—in extending half a billion dollars in loans to the private sector. Then there is the general adjustment assistance program, with $60 million at its disposal.

I would also call attention to the use of tax reductions. We must not forget that tax reductions, particularly as applied to the lower income groups, unemployment insurance and welfare payments are made to those in our society who need them the most. For these it is disposable income and it goes primarily in food, clothing and shelter. It finds its way directly into the economy and thereby helps stimulate the entire economic scene. In my opinion it is the greatest stimulant possible. It is not money just given out; it comes back almost at once. The velocity with which money expended in this way moves around is clearly of importance. More people get into the middle income or the upper income group, so we can really scream about our taxes with more legitimacy.

The recent budget, in serving to channel funds to the senior citizens and veterans, a move which everybody applauds, in turn provides a stimulus to our manufacturing sector of the economy. I have seen examples of this in my own constituency as well as across the country. It is amazing to realize what has been done. I recall that after provision for rapid depreciation of capital investment in 1952 we saw the greatest growth in our economy we had ever witnessed, though I am sure there were other factors at work just as there are other factors at work now.

Unemployment among Youth

Our concern today is about unemployment, particularly as it affects the youth of the country. Mr. Speaker, a few months ago I took a survey in my constituency. I would not pretend that it was in the form of a scientific study, and I did not publish the results for that reason. However, it did serve to give me a reading of the feelings of the people in my constituency with respect to unemployment and, more specifically, the nature of the unemployment affecting youth, particularly as I was receiving complaints from firms that they were unable to get people to fill the vacancies which existed.

The greatest response I received to my questionnaire was from youth up to about 24 years of age. They had left school and had never held a job or had held a job for only a short time. I think it is tragic, but we must accept it as something which happens in our society. I do not think we should wring our hands unduly, because this group is the most flexible in our society. However, I agree it is a problem we must deal with.

The next largest group from whom I received a response was that comprising married women. The tragic group which the member from Davenport (Mr. Caccia) mentioned earlier today consisted of men over the age of 45. I think these men deserve a great deal of consideration because they were caught up, perhaps, by the Peter principle as the post-war boom occurred. They may have got into jobs over their heads, and when cutbacks came they were the first victims. Maybe this should have happened; perhaps they were capable at a certain level but found employment which took them beyond that point. There is nothing to be ashamed of there. There are many of us here who must admit that. But the fact is that these people will have a very difficult time ever getting back into the labour force. I would like to see priority attention given to this group. However, that is not the purpose of the debate today.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I believe it was the member for Wellington who mentioned the Manpower offices. According to the results of the survey I have referred to, I do not believe there was a single complaint registered among the many hundreds of responses I received with regard to Manpower offices and the attention applicants received in them. It is interesting to note that 15 per cent of those who replied to the survey had jobs to offer which they could not fill. Somehow we are not meshing. This is part of the approach taken by the hon. member for Wellington.

I am glad this subject has been raised, even though I do not accept the premise of the motion. I think that suddenly people have begun to listen to what is said on this side of the House; perhaps not only what is being said in the House but also outside. They took it as an excuse for high unemployment. We recognize that, and no one can be happy or satisfied about it until it is overcome. But we have to recognize that with this great change in society we are taking new approaches through programs such as Opportunities for Youth and LIP.

However, we are in the post-industrial society, a technological age, an age in which we are producing more with fewer people, and our economy must be adjusted to face that fact. When I talk of unemployment caused by this period of change, I am not talking about hard-core unemployment or saying all unemployment is caused by this change. Leisure time will be expanding as we move into the four-day week. But leisure time does not necessarily mean wasted time.

As pointed out this afternoon, people are entering the educational system today and emerging with training for jobs that do not exist any more. So there has to be retraining, and it might happen that people might have to be retrained several times in the course of their lives. Hence our educational approach might have to be shifted on to a more general basis.

With regard to early retirement, the age of 65 is now perfectly acceptable as the age of retirement. We must look at the structure of our society and not categorize something as employment or as unemployment. There is nothing disgraceful about being unemployed, about doing something that is not necessarily in the productive process; but I would challenge youth to get into the productive process.

When I speak to students at schools and universities, or young people in my constituency or elsewhere, I often ask how many of them are going into business and management—at this stage of the discussion we are usually talking about foreign ownership—and at most two or three hands will go up. Then you point out that someone has to operate this particular segment of society; if someone in our country does not do so, someone from another country will. This is why we have to look at youth training and motivation. It is a two-way street.

I suggest that if our youth do not move into the productive and economic processes of this country, these processes will be managed by somebody else unless we are satisfied simply to live in our commune. Again, when I talk to students and we are discussing all this doom and gloom about foreign ownership, if it is a university group I usually ask them how many of them have cars and 50 or 60 per cent of the hands go up. Then I ask them how many have cars built under the automotive trade agreement. They look a little perplexed at that question. Then I ask how many of them are driving Datsuns, Toyotas, Volkswagens, Fiats or Morris Minors, and probably 99 per cent of the car owners put up their hands. They buy those cars because they are cheaper. I tell them that that is the price we would have to pay for economic nationalism.

We all remember the baby boom just after the war which started a great run on cribs, diapers and things like that. Then we needed nursery schools, day-care centres, elementary schools, high schools. Now this baby boom has found its way into the labour market. I do not know why this projection was not made sooner, but it was not. Let us just project the picture a little further, to the end of the century which is only 28 years away, or perhaps as far as 35 years from today. At that time these youngsters will be our senior citizens. If we do not have a society that is structured to look after our senior citizens, we will be having a baby boom of old age pensioners. At the moment I do not think the Canada Pension Plan is properly funded. We must invest the funds properly to compensate for inflationary factors that may come into play at that time.

[Mr. Danson.]

There are a lot of challenges facing our youth today, and youth are responding to them in a way that I think is most encouraging. We are challenging them in a way they can understand, in a way that is relevant. This is the job that we as parliamentarians must do. Even with all their imperfections, I believe all parties agree that these are good programs. But they must be explained carefully. I know it is difficult not to try to take a political advantage in an election year by pooh-poohing programs such as these or underlining their defects. But we have a special responsibility to make sure that these programs are understood and appreciated for what they are.

They are the forerunners of what might in the future be make-work programs. I know we all have the idea that such programs consist of someone digging a ditch and then filling it in again. But let us have programs of a stand-by nature that we can keep on the shelf, as it were, until they are needed and which can be developed with the co-operation of all over the years. Then in a period of unemployment the programs can be put to good use and enable our people to play a useful part in society.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in order not to break the thread of my remarks this afternoon, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACQUARRIE—EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PROPOSED NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—WHEREABOUTS OF "GREENPEACE III"

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege at the first possible opportunity, which is according to our rules. This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) advised me and the House that Greenpeace III was not a Canadian ship. I have since been advised that it is indeed, by the appropriate laws and conventions governing such things, a craft of Canadian registry, a Canadian ship. I am further advised that for a worrisome length of time there has been no communication from Greenpeace III and disturbing rumours of her apprehension by vessels of the French navy.

I therefore urge the government to move with utmost dispatch to concern itself about the safety and well-being of Canadian citizens aboard this ship in grave danger, and

I urge that the House by unanimous consent allow an opportunity for a representative on the government side to set the record straight since this matter concerns Canadian citizens in a dangerous area abroad.

Mr. Paproski: They just don't care over there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member has raised a question of privilege before the House. I must refer him to Standing Order 17 which provides that whenever an hon. member has a question of privilege not related to the debate taking place, he should provide notice of one hour to the Chair before raising the question. Because the hon. member did not follow up his question of privilege with a motion, I think I should call upon the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PRODUCE PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, when I called it six o'clock the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) was speaking about the Opportunities for Youth program. I fail to follow his line of reasoning or the reasoning of the government in dealing with an Opportunities for Youth program for Canadians. I am happy to be able to speak on the NDP motion put forward by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), who happens to have the honour of being the youngest member in the House. Certainly he is concerned about employment for youth.

Unemployment in Canada during the four years I have been here has, unfortunately, faced the most important component of our working society, that is, the young people. Figures released just last week show that almost half of Canada's unemployed in May were under the age of 25, even though this age group forms only one quarter of our total labour force. The Economic Council of Canada has estimated that only about one quarter of the total increase in the labour supply during the first half of the 1970s will come from the 14 to 24 age group. However, because unemployment rates are so high in this group, the growth in employment needed to reduce unemployment to a level consistent with an over-all national figure of 3.8 per cent of the labour force remains extremely high. In fact, the council estimates a need for 364,000 new jobs for youth the 1970-75 period if the goal of reducing unemployment is to be met.

• (2010)

The record of the government in coping with the challenge outlined by the Economic Council has been extremely poor. In the first two years of the 1970-75 period only 78,000 new jobs were created for Canada's young people. This is only one-fifth of the total requirement of 364,000 jobs forecast by the Economic Council. At this rate, barely half the jobs needed for Canada's young people will be created by the target date of 1975.

The Opportunities for Youth program and the Local Initiatives Program have been the government's main answer to youth unemployment. Both these programs fall incredibly short of filling the demand. For example, this past winter the Local Initiatives Program provided non-construction jobs to only 25,500 young people during the November to May period when unemployment for that group averaged 253,000.

One must also consider the fact that slightly more than 100,000 jobs will be provided by the federal government in the program for the summer of 1972. This can hardly be expected to meet the demand of 1.3 million students hitting the labour force this summer. To date, the government's initiatives in dealing with youth unemployment have fallen far short of meeting the need.

In my region, the Atlantic region, the need is certainly great. In May, 1972, 9.9 per cent of Canada's youth labour force were in the Atlantic region but over 12 per cent of the unemployed youth lived there. Last summer, the unemployment rate for students intending to return to school in the fall was 21.5 per cent, far above the national average of 17.9 per cent.

The problem of youth unemployment and the failure of the government to deal with this problem has resulted in a great deal of human tragedy. Across the country thousands of young people are being forced to apply for welfare when no other channels of support are open to them. Unfortunately, there is too much suspicion today that young applicants for welfare are scheming to gain an easy life at the expense of society and the taxpayer. Cries have been raised that welfare benefits should be withdrawn from most young people or that their requests should be severely scrutinized and assistance, if granted, kept to the bare minimum.

To get an objective, factual view of this problem and attitudes toward it, the Canadian Council on Social Development interviewed some 300 young applicants for welfare across the country. A major conclusion reached by the council was that the current high rate of unemployment was a significant cause for the rise in the number of young people applying for welfare. It is not a case, as many people think and as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated publicly, of youth actively choosing a new way of life that negates the work ethic and accepts, instead, the desirability of the full-time pursuit of leisure and non-material goals. There is a strong contrast between the reasoned and factual study by the Canadian Council on Social Development and the erratic, misinformed whinings of the Prime Minister. The council said:

> A lot of young people cannot find employment; and many of them complain that they cannot find meaningful work. In a highly industrialized society, where relationships are becoming more and more depersonalized, young people are desperately trying to find someone who will care enough to try and understand the ordeal of looking for jobs that seem non-existent, of having to face the humiliating experience of asking for the means of subsistence, and, moreover, of struggling with the feeling of unworthiness that comes after repeated failure.

Compare with this compassionate appeal the arrogant approach of the Prime Minister who said in London last November:

> Isn't it true that perhaps more and more people are turning away from the work ethic and they don't accept that meaningful employment is employment necessary to produce more material goods . . . More and more of the young people are sort of saying, "Well, it's the quality of life more than the abundance of material goods". And some of them are unemployed, but their life is more meaningful being unemployed—that's their judgment—than somebody else who works a 40-hour week and produces something which in their judgment is of no use to society and perhaps may even be of negative use—

Not only is the Prime Minister lacking in compassion but he has used a non-existent youth anti-work ethic as an excuse for glossing over a major problem which he lacks the desire or ability to cope with. Youth is not content to live a passive life, nor to live on welfare, the council found, but instead are just as zealous in their job-seeking and just as intent on being self-sufficient as are older generations. Unlike the Prime Minister, who believes that unemployment among youth is meaningful, according to the just quoted excerpt from his speech in London, Ontario, the council found just the opposite. The report of the Canadian Council on Social Development states:

> —the young social assistance applicants who were interviewed have by no means rejected the concept of work and its central importance to their development and self-fulfilment. Most of the young people interviewed bitterly resented being forced to apply for welfare . . . The need for meaningful activity and the desire to be self-supporting are deeply ingrained in them.

The Prime Minister's opinion that youth have rejected the work ethic is not the only fallacy of his that is destroyed by the council's research project. The Prime Minister has frequently moaned about the apparent refusal of people, particularly young people, to move to new locations where jobs are supposedly available. Again, the evidence shows the Prime Minister is wrong. In Niagara Falls on April 2, 1971, the Prime Minister made a claim that he has repeated often before and since that date:

> We would make sure that the unemployed in Canada is much lower if you were to allow us to send you, or your young children to work where there is work in Canada. And there is indeed a lot of work in Canada which is going without being filled. Several members of northern Ontario have told me . . . any number of young people who want to go and find jobs up there in the mines, they can find them. So, there's unemployment in one area, perhaps because some of the young people don't want to leave their homes or their girlfriends, or I don't know why—

The Canadian Council on Social Development, like all other responsible analysts of the situation, rejects this charge against unemployed young people. It says:

> Young (welfare) applicants seeking employment cannot be reproached for lack of mobility. Of those who had turned down a job only 8.7 per cent did so because it was in a place where they did not want to live. These individuals represent only 2 per cent of the total population of young (welfare) applicants.

The Prime Minister's slurs against Canada's youth are therefore shown by the council to be ill-founded. The cause of the problem, according to the council, is not that young people are inherently lazy or anti-establishment; instead, it states:

> Collectively these young people are largely victims of circumstances over which they have virtually no control. Among these circumstances are rapid technological and social changes and the trade-off between full employment and inflation.

[Mr. Marshall.]

The figures on the number of unemployed young people victimized by federal economic policies and forced to apply for welfare are appalling. In my home province of Newfoundland the number of welfare cases in the 15 to 19 age group jumped from 626 to 1,425, and in the 20 to 24 age group the number increased from 1,044 to 1,311 during the period March, 1970, to March, 1971, even though the total number of short-term social assistance cases decreased by 6 per cent over this period. These young people do not opt for a welfare way of life; they are, quite literally, forced into it.

• (2020)

According to the report of the Canadian Council on Social Development there is evidence that some young people are prepared to go hungry before they apply for welfare. The values ingrained in them by their upbringing have made them consistently hostile to the idea of welfare, and they are difficult to shake off even when the young people are faced with hunger and deprivation.

Most of the young persons told the council's interviewers that they rejected welfare as a way of life; 97.3 per cent said welfare was only a temporary form of relief for them, and more than a third considered it "a big trap". But most had no other option. The majority came from homes with large families and below average incomes and were unable to return home. For most, a low level of education was also a major handicap. Canada's young people do not want to live on welfare. As stated in the Ottawa Journal of June 12, 1972:

> This is a most depressing and worrying situation. Somehow our society in the private as well as government sectors must shape itself so that the young can go to work. If they do not it will mean far more than so many statistics about unemployed—it will mean the people who will compose the future of this nation are soured and frustrated, and their spirit no less than their citizenship will bear blighted fruit.

One of the things that really surprises me about this government, Mr. Speaker, is how they can destroy a good idea instead of capitalizing on it. I am referring to the Department of National Defence student summer programs. Last year the government conducted reserve force and cadet training with some innovations that were excellent. I refer mainly to that part of the program which afforded work at defence establishments for thousands of youths and which taught them leadership, citizenship, first aid, pollution prevention, and gave them other valuable experience which would stand them in good stead in their adult years besides providing them with a few hundred dollars to further their education.

The Department of National Defence went so far as to conduct a survey of students and parents and found that in 90 per cent of cases the results were tremendous and the programs were acceptable to both students and parents. One of the oldest fundamental lessons of military leaders is to reinforce success. I do not know how many times I have commended the government on this program and asked them to expand it, but all to no avail. This year, again, there are three levels of training for the army reserves. First and second year courses will follow the seven-week format of last year, and a new course will be offered to those who passed the second year training program last summer.

Civilian leadership and citizenship training will again be offered, as was stated in the department's news releases. This year, however, the emphasis will be on community assistance projects such as anti-litter and anti-pollution activities and applicants are to apply again to Manpower Centres. What happens in my province of Newfoundland which, as everyone knows, is one of the regions where unemployment is always the highest in the country? A quota of 50 has been allotted to the whole province of Newfoundland, in the city of St. John's where it is needed, when last year there was a quota of some 300 for the province.

This is a program designed to provide employment for students in the 17 and 18-year age group to work toward community assistance, to clear debris on beaches, to provide recreational facilities, to teach them first aid, safety and leadership. They earn about $500 for the summer, which enables the matriculating student to pay for his education at a higher grade or helps him pay for university education. So what did they do? They cut the Newfoundland quota by more than 50 per cent and they allocated it to one city.

The most surprising thing about this program, however, is the fact that it is limited to just over 2,000 youths across Canada. Again, who suffers? It is the student in the outlying, remote and isolated areas who also wants to further his education but who is discriminated against. For some reason or other we discriminate against people outside the larger cities and fail to realize that they are Canadians also.

The same situation has occurred with regard to the approving of Opportunities for Youth programs. The government failed to realize that we have a rural Canada whose citizens are Canadians also, and these Canadians want to take advantage of the quality of life and of the participation that this government talks about repeatedly. In my province the government has selected only one in ten projects without giving any consideration to the people who should have benefited. They are so concerned about moving 80 per cent of our Canadians to three or four urban centres that they have lost all consideration for the needs of the people. The rural youth of our country and their parents are asking Members of Parliament why their projects are being turned down continuously under the bogus proclamation of equality of all Canadians regardless of the part of the country from which they come. These words are meaningless, Mr. Speaker; they are empty and false.

One of the major policies of the Opportunities for Youth program is that priority will be given to post-secondary students who submit programs. I feel that this specification conflicts with the idea that regional disparity be given major consideration when assessing a project. Little allowance has been made for young people between the age of 14 and 24 who, because of social deprivation due to poverty, have had little opportunity to achieve post-secondary educational status let alone achieve a post-secondary education. Where poverty is intense, aspirations for further education are stifled by the primary need for food and shelter.

Unemployment among Youth

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

• (2030)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) who apparently wanted to speak but as he waves me on, I thank him. He is a real gentleman.

The motion of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is very interesting. I congratulate him for giving the House the opportunity of studying once again this sad problem of unemployment, which is so distressing for young people who want to enter the labour market.

I would like to consider this problem very objectively because it is very serious. And I must say that every one of us is trying to help the government solve it so that society will fare better.

It is a fact that unemployment leads to misery. Statistics have shown us that where unemployment is high, problems are numerous, including poverty which often leads to disorder, one of the most difficult issues we have to face. Despite all the government's efforts and those of the private sector, the fact still remains that unemployment is stubborn and its seriousness is becoming very disturbing.

On top of unemployment among students who are looking for summer jobs, a great many young people regularly enter the labour market and wish to contribute and make others benefit from the results of their studies because, for the majority, they are educated unemployed. Yet, they were told that education was the solution of their problems.

I have here evidence submitted by someone highly qualified in that field, former university rector Davidson Dunton. He made a statement which should give food for thought, saying:

> The 60's were the golden age of enthusiasm for universities. After the relative shrinkage in attendance during the previous decade, universities then went through a period of extremely rapid expansion, moreover with the blessing of governments which launched policies of general availability of education and of financial support for learned institutions. But a major change was to come about at the turn of the decade, with the appearance of the phenomenon called educated unemployed. It was realized that the university can no longer be considered as the most reliable passport to good jobs and a high standard of living.

That is a fact which we are now experiencing.

It is extremely deplorable to meet people—which happens very often—who have studied for years, who have obtained a degree, who have made efforts, who have been subsidized as students by society so that they could earn a living and be useful to the community, but who cannot find a job once they enter the work force because of an economic context that will necessarily have to be changed. All sorts of things have been proposed to help them and prepare them for a working life but nevertheless they remain unemployed. Some of them are disgusted as a result of this.

Very often representations are made to me by young workers who could get a job but lack an identification card and work permit. I will admit this is not a matter of federal responsibility, but the same people have nonetheless to come under both the federal and the provincial jurisdiction. They are asked to meet requirements beyond their power, in the sense that they must have been part of the labour market for a certain number of hours before they can apply for a permit to work in the building trade.

Nowadays, the construction field covers so much that it involves most of the sectors of Canada's economic activity. That is how these people have to travel from one office to another, they are told to report at such a place, at such a manpower centre, and after having been through all that, they return home flat broke, without a building trade permit or any identification card which would have been their only key to the labour market.

A few months ago, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) declared during an interview, and I quote a newspaper article entitled "Apparently more jobs available than people to hold them".

> If people are not found for all the jobs, he said, it is because they are not prepared to work for lower salaries or to move.

This is fact, he was telling the truth. Most people do not want to work for a salary lower than the benefits paid to those who do not work, people who are on welfare or who receive unemployment insurance benefits. It also happens that some workers do not want to move because they have no assurance that they will be able to establish themselves permanently and make a home. These are problems that all arise at the same time and which make life extremely difficult for them.

As a solution the Prime Minister suggested that it might be a good thing for the students to attend classes 12 months a year. But since education falls under provincial jurisdiction, he let the door open for the provinces to arrange the academic year in accordance with the present context.

Here is that part of his comments which I think is quite appropriate and I quote from a newspaper:

> Were it not for the type of school year set-up that now prevails, a school year related to rural life where schools and universities are attended during the winter months and where summer work on the farm is provided to pay for winter expenses, and so forth, we would certainly not have this sudden thrust of young unemployed people seeking work in summer-time.

There was a time when farming was one's last chance. There was plenty of room there. Those who could do nothing good elsewhere, would be told: "Find a job on a farm".

However now, farming has become a noble profession, but it is not profitable enough to allow farmers to pay wages as high as those paid in other industries. The farmers have a real problem: how to secure the necessary manpower. Jobs are available, but farmers can't hire workers because of their inability to pay them fair wages or, at least, wages equivalent to those paid in industry.

Therefore, there are two problems in Quebec: The farmer is unable to hire the necessary manpower for his operations and the farm help refuses to work because wages are not high enough.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

• (2040)

The other day I was flabbergasted when I heard the Deputy Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba say at the committee on agriculture that the same phenomenon existed in Manitoba. And I imagine the situation is the same all across Canada.

At present, large herds are being auctioned. In fact, agriculture is being destroyed throughout Canada because of the problem of manpower which prevents mature people from continuing to operate their farms.

Some attention will have to be paid to this problem to make agriculture more profitable and to enable farmers to pay higher wages in order to meet the labour market requirements.

Mr. Speaker, much could be said in this regard, but I must, of necessity, summarize my remarks to submit certain proposals to the attention of the government.

If students are to attend school for longer periods, they will have to be guaranteed a minimum income to face their main obligations; parents do not generally have the means to provide for their sustenance over a 12-month period because of the high cost of living.

I have here an article published in L'Action on May 29th, 1972 and whose author is not without distinction since he is Mr. Fernand Dumont who knows what he is talking about. I quote:

> Pointing out that one fourth of all families with children of eighteen or under are poor, Mr. Dumont deplored the absence of a federal family policy and forecast difficult days ahead for the working force of tomorrow which will have to support a heavy load of dependents, children and aged people.

That amounts to what a Liberal member was saying this afternoon, namely that a middle-class man who is operating a business or an industry or who holds a rather lucrative job will necessarily and increasingly bear the costs of a disorganized community suffering from unemployment and where destitution will soon be rampant.

And Mr. Dumont added the following:

> "I do not understand why more emphasis is not laid on the family aspect of the financial policy" stated the speaker who maintained that "lack of concern" of the state for the family is one of the main causes of poverty in Canada.

This is why I urge the government to have the family allowances bill passed as soon as possible so that needy families may enjoy increased benefits. This is a modern way of increasing family incomes without affecting either salaries or the income tax of the persons I referred to earlier.

I keep on quoting:

> "Undeniably, starting with an awareness of poverty, we will have to undertake a thorough social reform", he added.
>
> And this social reform, according to the sociologist, must be something more radical than the $100 minimum weekly salary requested for public servants by labour unions.
> "We are not truly wealthy and our standard of living rests upon extremely precarious foundations" Mr. Dumont said, noting that among industrialized nations Canada has the highest rate of unemployment.

This afternoon, I heard a member say that the number of jobs in Canada had increased more proportionately to the population than in any other countries.

This is possible; I do not challenge this statement but I suggest that the number of jobs is not increasing fast enough to meet the demand of qualified persons that could work and participate in the economic development of our country and insure greater prosperity to all of us.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, as I have said before and say again tonight, we should reconstruct our policy if possible and if it is the government's wish. We have put all our eggs in the same basket; as of 1960, we have witnessed a rush towards education which was supposed to solve all problems. We would say to the young: Get an education. Once you have your diploma you will be able to enter the labour market and earn a decent living.

At that time, we were able to use data from previous years to make such statements. I think these were made in good faith, but I deplore as I did at that time that provinces spent the most part of their budget on education and that they neglected to develop industry and the public sector so as to create jobs for young people who would complete their education. Unfortunately, they have been caused to miss the boat, because we neglected to act in that field.

One of the solutions that we would implement right away in order to allow young people to enter the work force as soon as possible would be to lower the age of eligibility to pension from 65 to 60. Of the numerous letters that I have been receiving about this subject, only one was written by a person who asked not to lower the age of eligibility to 60 because he wishes to continue working. He will always remain free to work until he is 72, if he wants to.

Saturday, I met a man of 74 in Saint-Michel-de-Bellechasse in my constituency, who is a plasterer and will not "give up". He wants to do plastering. That is his business, but it does not prevent him from receiving an old age security pension. However, there are 60-year old people who cannot do that type of work, and who are in need.

My eminently practical suggestion should be accepted, and the act should be changed in order for people 60 years old and over to receive an old age security pension so that jobs may be freed and young people may have a chance to enter the labour market.

I feel this would be good policy, as young people are full of energy, and if they do not do good they will do bad. This is the way I was, and I do not think that today's youth is any different. Once you reach a certain age your experience of life makes you a little more settled. You can be idle without putting your time to bad use.

This is why I feel we should change the act as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, here is another means to solve this serious problem: to increase the budget for public works. Several projects could be carried out and used to advantage by the people. We have several at present under the Local Initiatives Program, a program which in most cases has been welcomed by the population, although it is only seasonal. We should try to make it more permanent, to the extent that it meets the needs of the people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Unemployment among Youth

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not taking the opportunity of staying in the House all day and listening to the contributions made by various hon. members on the opposition motion proposed by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) which reads:

> That this House regrets the failure of the government to produce a comprehensive and coherent program to deal with the growing unemployment among our young people and its disregard of youth's legitimate aspirations.

In introducing the subject I think the hon. member has given members from all parties an opportunity to express their opinions on what I believe to be one of the most serious problems of the day and certainly of the decade. In the four or five speeches that I have listened to, however, I have noted that not too much distinction has been made between university students, young people, young married people, between unemployment as a whole and unemployment as it relates to certain categories of the population, in this case young people.

Statistics bore me, as I am sure they bore most people, but there are a few that I should like to put on record in light of some of the statements that have been made. Before doing so, however, I would like to take the opportunity of enunciating my own philosophy as Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In his opening remarks the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville quite properly and quite astutely anticipated what argument would be advanced because it is a logical argument, and that is, the peculiar, unique fact that in Canada at the present moment we are, and for a few more years we will be, experiencing the largest growing work force amongst young people in the world. This goes back to the years after the war when so many of our young people came back to set up family life. The fact remains that the growth in young people in the work force in Canada is greater than in any other industrialized society. This by itself is not a very good excuse. As a government, as a nation, we have a responsibility in light of this peculiarity, I might say, in the work force to try and meet the challenge.

In 1965, the House leader piloted through the House of Commons the Department of Manpower Act, which department I now have the privilege of administering. As far back as 1965 the department was fairly well oriented toward the work force as it was then composed. I do not think the characteristics and problems of the work force today are quite the same. This is reflected in my bringing forth Bill C-195 which is presently in committee and should be before the House any day for third reading.

Before we talk about manpower in the future, the potential of the department and where we should and might be going with a proper degree of co-operation, I want to point out that the growth in employment over the past ten years of those between the ages of 14 and 24, which is the group of youngsters we are talking about today, has been 57.8 per cent, compared to a rise of only 33.4 per cent in employment for all other ages. This is hardly a record of a government that has been callous, negligent or unaware of the problems of the particular group of Canadians mentioned in the notice of motion, the young people of Canada. I repeat that over the past ten years we have increased the number of young employees by 57.8 per cent, compared to 33.4 per cent in the growth of employment in all other age groups.

When we get into the question of Manpower programs, in their scope they embrace the whole work force from age 14 on, in some cases past age 65. These Manpower programs have been quite properly tilted in favour of young people. Although the young people form 24 per cent of the labour force, under the occupational training program no less than 40 per cent of the courses are placed at the disposal of this 24 per cent of the labour force. This indicates, once again, that we are quite logically devoting a disproportionate number of courses under the Manpower occupational training program to the young people of Canada.

With regard to Canada Manpower mobility programs, the young man who introduced the motion claimed that we have not done anything at all about youngsters with legitimate aspirations, or have not in any way taken into consideration their particular problem. We find that the young workers under age 24 have taken advantage of this mobility program, and that 35 per cent of all Canadians relocated through the mobility program in 1970-71 were youngsters under age 25, again well above the 24 per cent of the work force which they represent. I could give a lot of statistics. Each and every case indicates that a disproportionate amount of money, number of places and emphasis has been placed on the youngsters coming into the work force for the first time.

Opportunities for Youth is not the type of program that I consider to be particularly geared to alleviate unemployment. I think its main purpose is to provide a quality of life and some diversion for our youngsters in high school and university. It provides them with an opportunity to travel, to see this country, even to virtually loaf, if one wants to use that expression, and at the same time contribute usefully to society. It has been a very imaginative program but its main thrust is not solely to create jobs. The winter employment program introduced by my predecessor early last winter was definitely instituted for the specific role of alleviating unemployment. It was highly successful and provided 100,000 to 150,000 jobs and training opportunities. This is a considerable number of jobs and placements.

In addition to the Local Initiatives Program and the programs inspired by the municipalities with their funds, we embarked for the first time on an experiment called on-the-job training—at least for the first time in this country. We allocated $30 million to this program and quite rapidly raised that amount to $50 million. Of those who participated in the program known as on-the-job training, 64 per cent were youngsters under the age of 25. What is even more surprising is that of the $180 million which went to the Local Initiatives Program, or LIP as it is commonly called in this place, 40 per cent went to participants under the age of 25.

If hon. members have the chance tomorrow to review Hansard and these statistics they will see that practically every project or program that the government has devised in recent years to offset unemployment, as well as the permanent programs which flow under the Department of Manpower, have all been geared to take into consideration the special characteristics of Canada's work force, namely, the heavy participation in that work force by youngsters under the age of 25. We are very heavily committed to the future along these lines. For the most part, Manpower programs are devised in conjunction with the provinces. We have certain commitments to carry them on from year to year, after consultation with the provinces, according to formulas that are built into the act. So it is safe and logical to say that over the next few years, as the economy improves the emphasis in my department will continue to be directed to the young people of this country.

Reference has been made several times today to the study which was carried out in 1969 to discuss the aspirations of young people. This report, which was entitled, I believe, "It's Your Turn" was submitted in 1971. It was based on extensive interviews with youth across this country, ascertaining their demands and desires and taking account of their suggestions. It is now receiving detailed study in order that our future programs may be based on the desires and suggestions of this important segment of Canadian society.

In Ontario, as other speakers have already mentioned, a similar task force has been carrying out a study on employment opportunities for welfare recipients. We in the federal Department of Manpower were pleased to assist in the preparation of this report by supplying at least two of our senior officials as well as by preparing statistical and other information. This report deals extensively with young people and their problems.

I might mention the work of our special Canada Manpower centres set up to assist students seeking employment. Hon. members might be interested to hear that last summer these special centres were instrumental in finding work for 89 per cent of those who registered for employment. Every fall we survey students to inquire about their summer employment experience, their earnings and their degree of satisfaction with what they had done. Last fall, for example, we learned from students that 80 per cent were satisfied with their summer employment and that 70 per cent felt the work was valuable in relation to their future studies and aspirations. I believe a report based on this survey is now available.

Although our activities among young people have been heavily oriented toward students, they are not limited to students. The department is engaged in a number of pilot projects related to the special problems encountered by young people seeking satisfying employment opportunities, and each year hundreds of thousands of young people come into contact with the counsellors in our Manpower centres across the country. Last year, for example, our counsellors interviewed some 300,000 young people and discussed with them matters of common concern.

I believe I have quoted enough statistics to rebut the insinuations of the sponsor of this motion and to refute the suggestion that we have been callous, that we have disregarded the problems of the young people. However, it is wrong to think the government is complacent or that the problem will disappear along with growing employment. I feel very strongly that we are living in an age in which the young people of Canada rank among the finest ever produced in this nation.

I have said on many occasions publicly that I sense this to be a time at which, in essence, civilization, if one may use that expression, pauses to take stock, almost as though we had reached another plateau and begun, from that plateau, to question values which had hitherto been accepted uncritically. The young people of this generation are very wonderful people. They have made the politicians of our generation, not only in Canada but in the United States and other countries, pause to take stock, to consider where they are going, what their philosophy should be. Most of the young people I know, in Montreal at least—and I spend a lot of time with them—are looking for jobs. They want jobs, but they need an education as well. In addition to finding employment, they are interested in the quality of their lives. They are questioning the continued existence of slums. They are wondering why there should be so much unemployment when there are so many things to be done to improve the quality of life. They are wondering why in a day of advanced technology we should tolerate poverty and pollution.

It is my belief that the present generation, having posed these questions, will not tolerate a generation of politicians in the future who fail to provide the solutions to those problems. It is because we find before us a myriad of opportunities for improvement in this country and in the world that I am not one of those who endorse the concept of obliging people to retire prematurely in order to give a chance to the young. If we marshall our forces properly and know where we are going as a nation, we can do a great deal to improve quality of life while at the same time reducing unemployment. There is a lot of work to do.

One of the greatest successes of the Local Initiatives Program this winter, regardless of whether projects were initiated in big cities or in small hamlets, has been the willingness of so many young people to accept jobs at moderate rates of income because they felt they were achieving both their goals—first, a quantum of purchasing power as a result of their work and, second, the making of a contribution to the quality of life by the very nature of the project upon which they are engaged. This is to the everlasting credit of these young people and of people in general.

Some of the studies to which reference has been made this afternoon disclose that more than 52 per cent of the people who worked on local initiative programs this winter previously had been in receipt of unemployment insurance or welfare assistance. In other words, despite what reactionaries say—there are still a few of them around—these people could very well have remained on unemployment insurance or on welfare without going beyond the norms of social behaviour. Instead, they felt morally bound to go off the welfare rolls or the unemployment insurance rolls and become involved in projects of the type which they feel are of help to the community.

In conclusion, I shall again mention Bill C-195 which will be before the House very soon and which has received unanimous support in the committee. In addition to this support we have received the benefit of ideas from the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) and spokesmen for other parties as to where the department should be directing its efforts over the next five years. Bill C-195 will remove the three-year rule for the first time since the department became engaged in occupational training. When it is passed we shall be able to provide financial assistance to youngsters who have been in the work force for only one year.

This is in line with one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women; the change will benefit young ladies entering the work force or, perhaps, widows who need retraining to help them adapt to the requirements of modern-day living. The other main feature of the bill will be to provide on-the-job training for the first time as a permanent feature rather than as an ad hoc program attached to the winter employment plan with the consent of the provinces, as was the case last winter.

Generally, on-the-job training has been a huge success. It has provided jobs, for the most part for young people who are coming into the work force for the first time. The criteria are very stringent, demanding that these people at least be paid the minimum wage and other fringe benefits such as unemployment insurance. It was readily and happily endorsed by industry. The fact that we spent $50 million in a short period of time indicates the ready acceptance of on-the-job training.

I believe that the thrust of Manpower in future will be toward this type of vocational, on-the-job training rather than the traditional type of training in the classroom which the Department of Manpower has been doing very effectively for the last five, six or seven years. I see Manpower in the future adopting the strategy of taking young people at the age of 16, 17 or 18 of perhaps subnormal, or abnormally low levels of education and over a three, four or five-year period giving them an accelerated high school course, a year or two of vocational training and perhaps another year of on-the-job training, hopefully as part of an industrial strategy. Then when we turn out these well rounded young people all across Canada, jobs will be available for them. At the same time, the program will maintain a degree of flexibility so that in its last year or so we may be able to redirect or reorient their final year of training so that jobs are readily available to them and they are readily available to fill the jobs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see that two hon. members wish to ask questions of the minister. I should indicate at this point that there have been discussions directly between a number of hon. members in an attempt to apportion the time remaining between now and ten o'clock, namely, 45 minutes. There are three members who wish to take part in the debate, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner), the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). If all hon. members agree, perhaps 15 minutes might be allocated to each of these three members before we call it ten o'clock. If that is done I think it might be difficult to take time for questions, but that is up to hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, may I remind you of the motion now before the House which reads as follows:

That this House regrets the failure of the government to produce a comprehensive and coherent program to deal with the growing unemployment among our young people and its disregard of youth's legitimate aspirations.

It is with the latter part of the motion that I want to deal in my remarks. My colleagues from Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) devoted considerable time to documenting the disastrous level of unemployment which affects the young people of this country, the lack of opportunities that such a level of unemployment represents, as well as the degrading effect that continued lack of employment opportunities has upon a young person just entering the job market in a work-oriented society.

To be without work in a society that tends to judge a person on the basis of his or her income, to be forced to seek social assistance in a society which tends to believe that it is lack of application—laziness, if you will—rather than lack of opportunity which makes people accept welfare, to be short of cash in a society which tends to equate worth and material possessions, to be unsuccessful in finding employment in a society which still believes in the great myth of Horatio Alger, in a society which tends to forget that circumstances, as well as ability and application, affect the degree of success that a person may achieve, is truly soul destroying.

Many people, I have no doubt, on reading this motion would be totally puzzled by it. Is there not an Opportunities for Youth program which singles out for special attention young people who have already had opportunities for secondary and post-secondary education? Are there not programs to permit groups of young people to visit different parts of the country? Is not the government even offering assistance to kids who are spending their summers hitch-hiking throughout the country rather than seeking gainful employment?

What more do today's youth want? They have been given everything they wanted since the day they were born. They have never wanted for anything. They have never experienced a war or a depression. More government catering to their whims can lead only to more of them becoming bums, living on welfare and taking advantage of the efforts of the already overtaxed working population.

It is almost impossible to avoid having considerable sympathy for these kinds of arguments, especially when they are presented, as they most frequently are, by people who have worked hard all their lives at jobs which may not have held a great deal of intrinsic interest for them in order that they could provide for their families and contribute to the well-being of the nation, as they believed and as they continue to believe is their duty. To them, the young people who are so obvious on our highways in the summer, who are so free in their criticisms of our society, are saying that the people who have taken pride in hard work are patsies to be exploited, and government programs to assist young people simply confirm such impressions.

Just what is happening, Mr. Speaker? Is the able-bodied young man or woman who is living on welfare payments doing so simply because he or she is lazy, or self-indulgent, or both? Are such young people living on welfare because jobs are simply not available, or is it that the jobs which are available are not to their taste? And do people have the right to refuse work because they do not find it personally appealing, when their refusal means that other people must support them? Or are such young people cynically exploiting their society and justifying that exploitation on the basis that society is hypocritical in the extreme; that while it pretends to honour effort and application, it simply honours wealth, however obtained; that there is no reason to give way to such hypocrisy and that to exploit a society based on exploitation is no sin?

I do not pretend to know the answers to those questions. Like most human phenomena, I do not suppose that it has any single explanation. But I do know, Mr. Speaker, that if there is no change made in the employment pattern that is available to our young people, if as a result increasing numbers take the course of exploiting the welfare system, and if government programs to assist youth continue to be presented in a manner guaranteed to make the public think of them as special grants to a special group rather than as part of an over-all scheme for social development, then very shortly, probably within the next two or three years, this country will be faced with a confrontation, certainly angry, possibly violent, between the working people who carry the tax burden in this country and those young people who, for whatever reason, will refuse to assist or have been denied the opportunity of assisting in bearing the cost of running this country.

We are in the midst of a social revolution of the magnitude of the Renaissance or the Reformation. The major difference between our social revolution and the other two which have now passed into history is the time span in which our revolution has taken place. The Renaissance and the Reformation took place over centuries. Our social revolution is being compressed into decades. Old value systems are being destroyed and rejected with such rapidity that new value systems which might have the potential for providing society with some stability have not yet had time to become fully articulated and understood, and thus remain incapable of acting as replacements.

Values shift so rapidly that I would venture to guess that the gap between the way a person of my generation thinks and the way a person of my grandfather's generation would have thought is a great deal narrower than the gap between what a person of 40 years of age thinks and a person of 18 years of age thinks. Indeed, it may be narrower than the gap between what a person of 25 years of age thinks and a person of 18 years thinks.

Probably just because the majority of young people have never known want, to which I referred earlier, and probably just because the majority of young people have had made available to them opportunities which would have been beyond the wildest dreams of their parents, young people are challenging the values of the society which provided them with these benefits. I am not suggesting they are unjust or ungrateful, rather, I submit that is an entirely logical result. Because these young people are secure and have not known want, they are sufficiently without fear to be able to devote their energy to a critique of society's values, and when they find them wanting, to undertake many forms of rebellion against these values. They are free, as no previous generation has been, to say they just do not want to work, or the work must be worth while both in terms of its contribution to society and in terms of its contribution to the development of their potential as individuals before they will accept it.

What many of the young people are really engaged in is a redefinition of what constitutes a worth-while lifestyle and what constitutes a worth-while contribution to society; in fact, it is a redefinition of the meaning of work itself. It is becoming increasingly clear that to growing numbers of young people work is not to be the principal and dominant factor in their lives, as it is with most of the working population today. Increasingly, work is seen as providing them not with their principal role but with an avenue to a better life and the wherewithal to exploit what has heretofore been called leisure time.

Perhaps I could give an example of the sort of thing which indicates to me that this is the kind of thinking among the young people of this country. May I suggest to hon. members that they look at the decrease in the rate of anticipated enrolment in universities as compared to the completely unexpected rise in enrolment in junior colleges. This suggests that the young people are not going to be deliberately seeking to entrench themselves in occupations which must dominate, by definition, their entire lives but, rather, they are trying to seek meaningful employment which will give them enough free time to engage in other occupations and avenues of interest.

Growing numbers of young people tend to define quality of life not in economic terms or in terms of numbers of material possessions, as we have been accustomed to do, but rather in terms of humanity, in the liberation of the human spirit and in man's relation with nature. Quality of life thus becomes a sort of social ecology. Therefore, among many young people there is concern for our environment and that is why in any environmental group by far the majority will be persons under 30.

A lot of what I have just said may appear to be lacking in substance, vague, woolly and avoiding reality. Each of these charges might have some validity. But I submit that the very nature of the phenomena with which we are dealing, a social revolution, a destruction of old ways and thinking and a replacement of them by new ways, a change in society's system of values, simply does not permit one to speak with any great precision. As an aside, I might suggest that it is this very fact which helps to account for what is often perceived to be an exasperating inarticulateness on the part of young people attempting to explain their thinking, because for the most part the young are in the forefront of the social revolution we are experiencing.

What is becoming increasingly apparent to me is that the changes taking place in our value system, especially the abandonment of the protestant work ethic, will find their first concrete manifestations in changed attitudes toward employment and corresponding changes in our institutions of commerce, industry and government. There will be increasing pressure for shorter working days, combined with a shorter work week. Both have already been achieved by limited numbers of workers, especially in the craft unions. Experiments are being carried on in a number of industries, a good example of which is currently under way in the Imperial Oil refinery in my constituency where shift workers in the processing unit are working 12-hour shifts three or four days a week instead of an eight-hour shift five days a week, so as to give them larger blocks of time to devote to their families, hobbies and avocations as opposed to their work. It appears they are successful at the moment.

Such demands are being made and such experiments are being conducted not because people want to get away with doing less, but because they want to live more. A life arranged around the demands of the factory is no longer, if it ever was, considered to be very attractive. Public policy can either encourage or discourage this trend, or it can remain indifferent to it. I think it is this government's attitude to ignore the trend if, indeed, it is aware such a trend exists. My feeling is that the trend should be actively encouraged.

I would remind hon. members that federally and provincially there are laws on the statute books governing hours of work, conditions of employment and vacations. They are there because legislators eventually, after much effort was expended by trade unions and other organizations to convince them of the fact, became persuaded that such laws were necessary to the health of the working population. Surely it is as much our concern to ensure that the working population has the time available to it to live a meaningful life as it is our concern to legislate for the health of that same working population.

I see a need for revision of legislation governing hours of work and I suggest that the government, if it were doing its job, would be actively concerning itself with such considerations at this moment. In any event, it will soon be forced to do so because the young people now entering the labour force in such great numbers will demand that it do so, and that demand will be strong enough to necessite a response.

I see as a second major trend in new employment patterns arising out of the changing value system, increasing demands on the part of the organized labour force for participation by the worker in the making of decisions, long thought to be the prerogative of management, about such things as the introduction of new technology, about production, about the allocation of capital, about the nature and price of products and about the distribution of profits.

Once again there are immense implications for public policy involved, and once again the government should be actively preparing itself to meet these demands as they arise, as they surely will, if social and economic chaos is to be avoided. The degree of education, both formal and informal, which our young people have simply will not permit industry and commerce to continue to operate, if I can exaggerate slightly, on the basis of the master and slaves principle. The labour force will not permit that, and the government should realize the fact. The government should be preparing itself to act because these demands will become clear and will have to have a response.

A third major trend I see developing in response to changing attitudes toward work are demands for altering the organization of our places of work so that they suit, not the demands of machines which they contain but, rather, the needs of the men who are operating those machines.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I understand that by a special arrangement I am to call hon. members to order after 15 minutes. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I suppose if this debate so far has served any useful purpose at all it has served at least the purpose of exploding the myth, I hope once and for all, that the Opportunities for Youth program is this government's total response to youth unemployment. Not even the hon. member who moved the motion subscribed to that notion, a notion that is as silly as it is false but one often perpetrated in other parts of the country as a means of criticizing the government.

The brunt of our argument today was handled by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey); the motion deals with youth unemployment and that is precisely as it should be. The Opportunities for Youth program is not central to this debate at all, but is only one part of the student summer employment program. To the extent it has been brought into the debate it should perhaps be referred to briefly. The government has met a relatively small section of student summer employment through Opportunities for Youth. It has never been presented to this House or the public as more than that; it is simply part of the student summer employment program.

I congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), who made a very thoughtful speech about the malaise among non-youth or non-students and the degree of attention which students are receiving from this government. He raises, I think quite rightly, the sort of uneasiness and frustration which exists in these people's minds. He uses terms like "special grants to special groups." Frankly, I do not know how any government can possibly avoid at least giving the impression that special grants and special groups exist so long as our educational system is so structured that on May 3 in respect of universities, and on June 30 in respect of high schools, a whole lot of our youth are out looking for jobs.

How can we avoid dealing with special groups with special grants when our educational system is so structured? The government would not be very responsible—and I am sure the member who introduced the motion would not subscribe to the idea—if it did not provide special grants to special groups, if it ignored the students and let the Manpower offices deal with both the army of students as well as those who represent the heads of families. It would be an abdication of responsibility to do this. No government can fail to recognize that so long as our educational system thrusts these students out of school all at the same time, it would be an abdication of its responsibility not to try to meet their legitimate needs for summer employment.

Another myth was not very effectively destroyed today. It was, in fact, further perpetuated by the hon. member who moved the motion and who said that jobs had gone, not to students who needed them but to students who did not need them. I strongly suggest to the hon. member that he get out and meet some of the students who have been working on Opportunities for Youth projects. He will find, after talking to them, that they do need the summer employment, that they are not all sons of wealthy parents and that they do have financial obligations. I say, with deference, that his statement this afternoon was made out of ignorance.

In point of fact, we have made a greater effort this summer than we did last summer to get to the disadvantaged families and to the rural areas. I think it will be demonstrated that the Opportunities for Youth program this summer will be much more successful than in the past—although it has been successful in the past—in getting to the sort of students who are financing themselves through university and whose families in many cases do not have the necessary resources to support them.

I think it is a disservice to suggest, as the hon. member did this afternoon and as his party has in the past, that somehow this is a middle-class operation pampering the children of the wealthy, and so on—implying that it is a waste of money. The facts do not bear this out. Even a cursory visit to any of these projects would establish that this is not a charge which could be made with any credibility against the Opportunities for Youth program.

The Opportunities for Youth program is simply a summer employment program. It is not the total answer. I suggest, however, that the summer student employment program demonstrated a considerable degree of courage and leadership on the part of the federal government. Although the federal government gave the leadership, this program elicited the support of not only the provincial government but of most municipalities and the private sector. I think it is fair to give the government credit for having led the way and for having launched such a program so that this particular problem of student summer employment could be met.

I find the position of the opposition to be somewhat contradictory. On the one hand they condemn or criticize the program, yet pretty well uniformly say that what they really want, despite their criticism, is more of the same. I might go back to the position formerly adopted by the spokesman on these matters of the Progressive Conservative party, the official opposition, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), who issued a statement following the announcement of this year's summer employment program contratulating the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) on the early announcement of summer programming for young Canadians and pointing out specifically:

> —the many criticisms and suggestions offered by various concerned groups as well as the opposition have obviously been heard and incorporated by the minister in OFY 72; this type of approach cannot but be in the interest of young Canadians everywhere.

That is a very encouraging statement. I do not know why they criticized the program in the beginning. It may not have had very much political impact. The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) said in a statement made on January 11, 1972:

Opportunities for Youth is a worthwhile approach and I cannot think of a single good reason why it should be limited to students—

Mr. Rowland: That is the problem.

Mr. Faulkner: The hon. member says that that is the problem. It is a little difficult to detect, from the range of criticism I have listened to in committee from various spokesmen of that party, that their hearts are really in the statement that it is a good program and should be available to everyone. However, I will take them at their word that they think it is a great program which should be made available to everyone.

Mr. Rowland: An "E" for effort.

Mr. Faulkner: I want to deal briefly with Opportunities for Youth as a program—because, as I said, it had been brought into the debate—some of the thinking behind it and, more particularly, some of the criticism as well as some of the doubts expressed by members of this House about the young people.

It was in the first instance an attempt to get away from simply make-work projects which could be made available in the public service. I think both the government and the young people were agreed that make-work projects were not particularly useful to either of them.

The government has shown wisdom in getting away from the more conventional, more comfortable and more easily administered summer-type program. We went into something far more experimental and innovative. It was simply a response by the government to the claims young people were making across this country that there were things to be done in communities which private enterprise could not do, or was not doing, that municipalities could not afford to do or were not doing, and which voluntary agencies did not have the funds to do.

The young people suggested that if these projects could be undertaken, not only would they provide meaningful work for students but they would benefit the community in which the projects took place. That was the principle behind the Opportunities for Youth program. It is open to certain criticism because not everyone agrees what constitutes useful projects in any given community. No one is more aware of that than I am, because I have had wide-ranging discussions on the philosophical meaning of usefulness with members of all political parties. I realize that between some members and myself there is a rather large gap in our understanding of what that term means.

The point is, however, that despite that apparent risk and despite the differences of opinion which are bound to arise, the government conceded as an act of faith and as a commitment to the young people that their contention was correct and that given the resources they needed to carry out these projects, the community would benefit, they would benefit generally and they would contribute to the growth and development of the country. That is what Opportunities for Youth fundamentally is all about. It is certainly a student summer employment program, but it is not simply a make-work program.

It is a program designed to provide resources to young people to carry out the sort of things they believe are important within their community. It is very easy to knock it, to enter into a discussion about the Opportunities for Youth program in general on the basis of one particular failure. But that type of argument is counter-productive because it tends to ignore the tremendous number of very good projects that are going on across this country.

Let me turn to another charge often made, the charge of alienation which is often incorporated in this type of debate. It is a glib and easy charge to make. The whole matter of alienation has never been more seriously challenged than it has been by two government programs, Opportunities for Youth and the Local Initiatives Program. If there are two government programs which we have introduced that have been understood, supported and welcomed by young people across this country, it is these two.

I suggest that the charge against this government that somehow we are contributing to the alienation of our young people is a phony charge that cannot be supported. If anything, this government has done much more than any other government in the western world to recognize the priorities that exist in the minds of young people. The concerns they have about their country are different, not simply because they are young but because their whole upbringing has been different, a point which has been made by the hon. member for Selkirk.

The government has recognized this fact and it has therefore provided resources for young people, to prevent not only the alienation which would naturally occur if we did nothing but to allow for the participation of young people in the growth and development of their community and their country. The charge that alienation is rampant among the young people of this country cannot be supported and substantiated by the facts.

I say, further, that this government has gone beyond simply meeting this particular problem through the two programs. Speaking about the priorities that have clearly come through these government programs, I could cite what has been done on the pollution front, the leadership exercised by this country in Stockholm which has struck a responsive chord in the minds of thousands of young Canadians because it is a priority they share with this government.

I suggest that the whole business of redefining the concept of jobs—a matter which the hon. member for Selkirk raised—is implicit in the OFY program and LIP, and something which the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has recognized on several occasions. It is easy to make these charges but I suggest that the record of this government, not only in these two particular programs but in others, demonstrates that the government has provided an opportunity which has been provided by no other government in this country, and no other government that I can think of outside this country, to involve young people in a participatory role within society, not as young people and as a select group, not as pampered children of the wealthy but on the only rational basis, as Canadians contributing to the development of this country.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight will be brief. Hon. members on this side of the House who spoke in the debate earlier placed on record the sorry story of the number of unemployed youths in this country. Having just listened to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner), I can well imagine how encouraged the vast majority of the unemployed in Canada, indeed the 48.7 per cent of our people who are under 25 years of age, must be and will be tomorrow morning on reading the hon. member's statements.

I can sympathize with the hon. member in his efforts to defend the Opportunities for Youth program. I am sure that we all realize that in some areas the program has had some effect. But for the vast majority of our unemployed young people the program is nothing more than a farce and is of very little consequence to the large number of our youth who this summer are facing the prospect of unemployment.

The position taken by our party has been outlined to the House by my colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan). He has outlined the Stanfield program which we intend to put into effect when we form the next government. We feel that this program will attack the major social ills in this country, particularly with respect to our young people who are unemployed.

I want to impress on the House how crucial this problem is in a province like Newfoundland. Newfoundland, being thinly populated and underdeveloped, is still struggling to find its way economically into the Canadian mainstream. Our young people in Newfoundland are even more frustrated than young Canadians on the mainland because the frustrations faced by young people in the province of Ontario, for example, are even greater in a province like Newfoundland because of its geographic position and the other major problems affecting industry in our province.

It is much more difficult for young Newfoundlanders to go to another part of Canada to look for work. It is not simply a matter of getting out on the Trans-Canada Highway and thumbing your way, because you cannot thumb your way across the 100 miles of water which separate our province from the mainland of Canada. In a province like Newfoundland there are no major industrial giants such as General Motors, Ford, Stelco, Inco or federal government departments such as we have in Ottawa which can absorb a large number of young people for summer work.

Like other hon. members, I am sure, my office files are bulging with letters from young people, letters that come in almost daily from young people seeking assistance in obtaining jobs for the summer. Only this morning one young man from my constituency was in my office looking for a job because he, like many others, will have to work for a year to get enough money to continue his courses at university.

In Newfoundland we have just had graduation day at our very Fisheries College. Hundreds of young men are now ready to introduce new skills and efficiency into our primary industry the fishery. There are thousands of young men who want to join their fathers in their fishing boats, but many of our finest fishermen are not able to ply their trade because of the many obstacles placed in their way by the federal government, a federal government which allows foreigners to come to our fishing banks and take all the fish. This government stubbornly refuses to make assistance available to the fisheries under DREE.

The problem of unemployed youth is closely tied to the over-all problem of unemployment. I am sure the same is the case in other provisions, but it is even more so in ours because in Newfoundland we cannot afford to lose our young people. We cannot afford to have university students such as those at Memorial University, with a rapidly increasing enrolment soon to approach 10,000 students who are trained to use their skills, forced to leave the province to find employment. We cannot afford to have our Fisheries College graduate skilled craftsmen, only to see them leave Newfoundland to seek employment on the Canadian mainland.

We Newfoundlanders have just selected a new business-like government committed to giving the fishing industry a new lease on life. It has also established definite priorities for development. What we need now is an understanding and sympathetic government in Ottawa to work with our provincial government to help us achieve these aims.

• (2150)

More than half of the work force in Newfoundland falls into the category of youth under 25 years of age. They must not be allowed to fall victims of the welfare trap. They must not be made the pawns of a cynical, arrogant federal government which has deliberately created unemployment.

A solution for young Newfoundlanders and for young Canadians in general is an over-all policy developed by governments which will set out the long-term utilization of the skills of the young. Our educational system must be geared to turn out trained young men and women whose skills will be needed. Perhaps we should de-emphasize the attaining of a university degree, especially if the degree is only going to add to the longest list of unemployment university graduates in Canada's history. Our universities and trade schools should be better geared to the manpower market. This trend is already apparent in the United States where university enrolments are down and more and more young people are turning to trades colleges.

There are also some short-term solutions. I endorse the proposal put forth by the Canadian Council on Social Development last week, namely, the establishment of a network of youth manpower centres, setting up a youth employment directorate, improving liaison between manpower centres and welfare agencies, making special travel and settlement allowances to young people and improving manpower training by such steps as removing the 52-week limitation on upgrading courses. These, of course, are just suggestions for improving the facilities available to the young people to assist them in finding jobs. I think it is apparent that the real solution rests with a return to proper fiscal and economic policies by the federal government. When private industry is encouraged to expand and develop, the major problems of unemployment will be substantially reduced.

However, Sir, for many years we will still be facing the annual problem of high unemployment among youth, especially during the summer months. Canada's young people are clinging desperately to the hope that the federal government will end its ad hoc efforts to find them jobs—too many of them are not meaningful—and will develop a long-term strategy which will allow them to lend their considerable skills to the development of a thriving and better nation.

It is obvious that the programs introduced by the government have not had the desired affect, especially with respect to our young people. As I said at the outset, there are many hundreds of young people in my riding, indeed in my province and all across Canada, who are facing a very serious problem. Many of them depend upon summer employment in order to continue their education. But too many of them will be faced with the stark reality that the government is unable to provide them with jobs and thereby the opportunity to earn a few dollars during the summer so they may return to university.

In my riding and province the situation is even more critical in that we do not have the industrial giants from whom we can get summer employment for our youth. Many of our young people have been encouraged to go to the trade schools, the fisheries college, and to Memorial University to get an education, only to find later that they are unable to get jobs in their own province. If they hope to get a few months' work during the summer, they must travel to other parts of Canada, thereby denying Newfoundland the benefits of the education they have received. It is a very sad story.

The program which the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) tried to defend is responsible for employing less than one-tenth of the young people in our country. In my riding large groups of young people were encouraged to apply for assistance through the Opportunities for Youth program only to be refused without an explanation. Some of their proposed projects were extremely worth while, good for the students who applied and also good for the communities in which they live. In all too many cases the programs that were approved were slipshod and badly thought out. They were approved at the expense of other programs that could have had a worth-while effect on the province and local communities.

It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that something has to be done. I think that the program to which the hon. member referred a moment ago was conceived in haste and obviously will not have the desired effect for the young people concerned. I think the program was well summed up by a young man who was a project officer for OFY, when he said that Opportunities for Youth is a human lottery and the most politically partisan job program under federal sponsorship.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CONSIDERATION OF INCREASE IN BASIC RATE OF WAR DISABILITY PENSION AND VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question tonight relates to the need for consideration to be given to an increase in the basic rate of the war disability pension and also to an increase in the basic rate of the war veterans allowance. I must say at the outset that in recent weeks we have been getting the right answers to our questions concerning this matter. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Francis) may therefore wonder why I raise the question again if I admit that we have been getting proper answers.

The fact is that even though we have been given assurances, we have to be on guard to make sure that those assurances are not lost in the scramble to get the present session recessed. And I am also going to be bold enough tonight to make a suggestion of the kind that might not receive the applause of every member of the House if this were two o'clock in the afternoon and all the members were here. But at this time of night, when only the hard workers are still present, I am sure my suggestion will be approved unanimously.

Just to recite briefly what has happened, and without covering all the questions and answers, I would point out that on Friday, March 17, 1972, as reported at page 916 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) if consideration was being given to increasing the basic rate of the war disability pension. The minister's answer was an unequivocal yes. I then asked if consideration was being given to increasing the basic rate of war veterans allowance. The minister made an answer which was a little unequivocal but I dare to believe that he meant yes.

On Friday, May 12 of this year, as recorded at page 2233 of Hansard, when the minister was speaking to the bill to attach an escalator clause to pensions and allowances that come under the responsibility of the Department of Veterans Affairs he said very clearly, and we appreciated it, that the escalator clause being put on the basic rate of the war disability pension did not mean that the question of the basic rate had been dealt with; indeed, he gave the firm commitment that it would be dealt with at a later time.

Later in the session the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles)—a Tory with a good name—started asking questions and eventually got from the Minister of Veterans Affairs the assurance that it would meet with his approval if this matter were referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I followed through by asking the chairman of that committee if he would do what he could to get the necessary reference so that the committee could study the matter and he, too, said yes.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have had the right answers all down the line; the only trouble is that time is going by. There is now talk of trying to recess this session on June 30 to an unknown date, with some uncertainty as to whether we will come back on that date, and this raises the question of whether we should not do our best to get action on this matter soon.

A letter has just come to all of us from Mr. J. C. Lundberg, chairman of the National Council of Veterans Associations in Canada, enclosing a copy of the submission of that association to the minister on the basic rate of the disability pension. The letter expressed the hope that this matter might be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs for immediate consideration, and it also expressed the hope that this would result in a recommendation being made to the House of Commons during the present session.

If there is a recess on June 30 I know that it is going to be difficult to get this matter dealt with by then, but an attempt could and ought to be made. The suggestion that I make tonight, Mr. Speaker, is that if necessary serious consideration be given to holding meetings of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs during the recess. I am not suggesting that those meetings have to be held in the heat of summer or at some awkward time, but I think the members of that committee would be willing to meet at an appropriate time to deal with this matter so that a recommendation could be made while this session is still in existence and, hopefully, while this Parliament is still alive. I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs agrees that it would be most unfortunate if the good will that has been built up and the expertise that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has attained were lost and we had to start all over again.

In this spirit of amity that exists between us, I hope the parliamentary secretary will make it clear tonight that the assurances of the minister are being kept alive and that something will be done on this as soon as possible, and that if there is no way to get a study of this matter by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs before June 30, arrangements will be made for that committee to meet during the recess. Surely we can do no less.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister appreciates the very complimentary remarks which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made about him. I know that all members of the House share the general views that he expressed in regard to the legislation recently put before this place and now being considered concerning improvements in veterans pensions. As the hon. member pointed out, the statement of the minister was abundantly clear. The escalation of pensions did not deal with the problem of the basic rate of pension. The minister indicated that the government was reviewing this matter.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has before it a reference by this House concerning prisoners of war, and it has had testimony presented to it by associations representing former prisoners of war. Until the committee has discharged the terms of the present reference I do not believe it is the intention of the government to place before it any other reference.

However, the minister has indicated his basic sympathy with the objectives expressed by the hon. member. He has indicated that he has an open mind concerning reference of the basic rate of pension. At this stage I think that is all I can say on the matter. I do know that the government is considering it.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—DENMARK—DENIAL THAT DANISH FISHING CAUSE OF DEPLETION OF ATLANTIC SALMON STOCKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on May 4 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) if he shared the view of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) regarding that gentleman's suggested boycott of Danish goods. The minister replied that his colleague had been expressing a personal view. Although subsequent events and further failures of Canadian diplomacy in fisheries matters may have obscured this episode, it still merits attention.

Apart from the serious issue of the depredation upon our fisheries, there are two interesting aspects: one concerns the fundamental principle of cabinet solidarity and the other is the question of the separation of the public and private personality of ministers of the Crown. On May 2 the Minister of Fisheries was widely quoted as suggesting that a boycott on Danish goods by Canadian consumers was probably a good idea. He said:

> Such action could be very effective.

Interestingly enough, the minister noted that there could be no official boycott of Danish goods because such action would be in violation of GATT. He went on to recommend that the people of Canada should do what the government would not do. However, the brave boycott of May 3 became something less than a major theme as days went by. It became a personal opinion.

Many years ago the premier of Ontario, Sir James Whitney, said that any public man who has no public view on public issues is a public fool. Being less abrasive than Sir James, I would avoid such polemics, but after a good many years in the study and practice of politics I am puzzled when a public official, as a minister surely is, speaks of a public matter and still remains a private person.

A minister has, of course, a private life and a private capacity. He does not speak ex cathedra at the breakfast table or at private gatherings. However, it is a bit subtle to suggest that some press conference dicta are private utterances and others public proclamations. One is inclined to believe that the minister's call for a boycott did not win the endorsation of his colleagues and his chieftain, the Prime Minister. Indeed, who knows, he may have felt the condemnation of someone from on high. If that is the case, if he was overruled as his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), was some months ago, why not say so? It is disquieting to have the device of private opinion used in such cases.

It is likely that the minister would prefer a stronger stand than that taken by the government as a whole. Truly, in our dealings with Denmark we have been mealy-mouthed and passive. Not only in reference to Denmark but to many other countries trespassing on our rights, the same pusilanimous attitude is being revealed. The fishing industry in our country is in grave danger; our fishermen face grave hazards. As my colleague for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) put it some weeks ago, Canadian fishermen are the sacrificial lambs in governmental negotiations. He and my colleagues from Newfoundland and the maritime provinces have pressed vigorously for a more alert, aggressive and articulate attitude on the part of Canada on behalf of its long suffering fishermen.

Polite notes have not been productive. Perhaps the time has come for some straightforward action and assertion of our rights. It is passing strange that we are unable or unwilling to slow the verve and stamina of such countries as Iceland and Peru. Surely we can produce something more than failed and frustrated efforts at international gatherings, and publicly-proclaimed private boycotts which are phased out as mere personal opinions.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) is in full flight tonight with phrases such as "mealymouthed" and "passive". I cannot agree with him that that has been the government's record. We are all aware that the recent meeting of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries in Washington did not accept the Canadian view that there must be an immediate ban on high seas fishing for Atlantic salmon. The strenuous efforts we have made over the past months and years to achieve this goal will therefore continue.

The hon. member for Hillsborough inquired in recent weeks whether the views of the Canadian government had been presented to the government of Denmark. I can repeat the assurance which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) gave him, that we have repeatedly urged the Danish government to co-operate with us. Over the past year the government of Denmark has been made fully aware of our position on this urgent matter, not only through bilateral contacts such as the visit of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) to Copenhagen, but through scientific meetings at which the matter has been fully discussed.

Canadian scientists attending these sessions have taken the opportunity to present as forcefully as possible to the scientific experts of other ICNAF countries, including Denmark, our information on the decline of Atlantic salmon stocks. Indeed, the recent ICNAF meeting, while it did not accept our call for an immediate ban on high seas fishing, did accept that Canadian rivers especially those flowing into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, contribute substantially to the Greenland salmon fishery and that losses suffered by that fishery may be greatest for rivers flowing into the Gulf. It was also recognized that data for the Miramichi River shows a steady decline in the stock of large salmon in this river.

In addition to the scientific information which Canada has presented in recent months, the government of Denmark has also been informed of the drastic action taken by the Canadian government in closing commercial salmon operations on the east coast, as well as about the motion on Atlantic salmon adopted by this House on April 25. In light of these actions the Danes were urged to re-examine their position prior to the May ICNAF meeting.

The suggestion of a consumer boycott of Danish products has been dealt with previously in this House. As the Prime Minister pointed out on May 10, such a boycott is not the position of the Canadian government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT FOURTH TRAINING SQUADRON BASED AT ESQUIMALT WILL BE OPERATIONAL THIS SUMMER

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, Hansard reports that on June 16 I asked the following question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Benson):

> During the course of the hearings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence with respect to the defence white paper, it was suggested to the committee that the fourth training squadron based at Esquimalt might not be operational this summer because of the difficulties of finding the four to eight necessary engine room personnel. Since the squadron is capable of training some 500 reservists from all parts of the country during the summer, can the minister assure the House that it will be operational this summer?

The minister's reply was as follows:

> I will have to check on its current status and report back to the House.

That answer annoyed me, Mr. Speaker, because we only have about 40 vessels in commission in the fleet and the fourth training squadron represents about one-tenth of the total number of commissioned vessels. I should have thought that in that kind of situation—a fleet of that small size—the minister might have been expected to be aware of what was happening to an entire squadron of ships, especially when one considers that what this squadron does affects directly or indirectly the capabilities of some 2,800 naval reservists in this country.

Beyond that, in the long run it affects the capability of the fleet to respond to a challenge, because the fleet relies upon the reserves to supplement its numbers in an emergency. Since the number of naval personnel now available for manning ships is so low, none of the ships at sea have a full-time war complement. I think it is extremely important to know what is happening to the fourth training squadron, and I should expect that with only two weeks remaining before the peak of the training season the minister might know whether it is to be operational.

I sincerely hope to get an answer this evening. That is the reason I posted the question for discussion. I think the inability of the training squadron, possibly, to go to sea because of difficulties in finding two engine-room personnel for each of four ships and, in addition, one administrative person for each ship—a total of 12 people—is indicative of what is happening to the armed forces as a whole under the direction of the government, and of the government's total lack of appreciation of the needs of the military. The military in this country is currently suffering a desperate lack of resources.

In that kind of situation only a limited number of alternative actions are available to the government. It can ignore the situation, which is what it is doing. It can increase the resources available to the forces through removing the freeze on the budget with respect to armed forces expenditures. It can reduce the tasks assigned to the armed forces. It can undertake a combination of a reduction of tasks and an increase in the allocation of resources. Or it can look at a means of better applying resources now available to the military—for example, more effective use of reserve forces in this country.

I suggest that it is the latter alternative, though not exclusively, that the government should look at first, namely, the effective employment of the reserves. The new assignment of priorities and tasks that the government has given the armed forces in its defence white paper issued in 1970, which listed the defence of Canada and North America as of highest priority, coupled with the government's appreciation that there is a reduction of the possibility of an all-out nuclear war, thus reducing the necessity for a large number of highly trained forces in being, means that use of reserves for more tasks is not only possible in terms of the level of attainment necessary to complete the tasks, but is also desirable in terms of potential savings in the total allocation of moneys for defence, which savings could then be applied to the purchase of new equipment so desperately needed by at least two elements of the armed forces, the land element and the air element.

The government has yet to act on the basis of this kind of analysis. Reserve training, despite recent modifications, suffers desperately from lack of regular force support. When I talk of regular force support I mean regular force personnel who are allocated to reserve units for the purpose of training those units during the course of the winter months. These resources are not being made available to the reserves because the government has not yet seen fit to inform the military that its priorities have altered sufficiently to free men for training reserves.

The most astounding evidence I have yet encountered of government neglect of reserve forces is the possibility that the fourth training squadron might not be available to train reserves this summer. As I have indicated in the course of several questions over a period of two months, that squadron can provide training to 500 reserve force personnel in the form of ship navigation for young officers, seamanship, communications and other tasks allotted to enlisted men. All it takes to make the squadron operational is 12 personnel. I have served in one of the gate vessels, and this squadron is composed of four gate vessels. It takes no more than three regular force personnel to put one of these ships to sea with a reserve crew. In other words, it takes 12 men to make a squadron operational—and the government does not know whether it can find those 12 men. That astounds me.

This evening I am asking for the assurance that the fourth training squadron will be operational this summer. If the parliamentary secretary feels free to comment, I should also like the assurance that the government will give a great deal more attention to training our reserve forces in the future.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the concern and interest of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) in this matter of naval training is well appreciated. I think he will recall that at the time of the briefing of the committee on the summer training program it was indicated that it was becoming increasingly difficult to find the required number of diesel engineering staff with the required engineering certificate. However, this was an indication of the nature of the problems facing the maritime commander in meeting his respective roles; it was not intended, I am informed, to be interpreted as meaning that they could not be provided or that they would not be provided.

• (2220)

I have been advised that the fourth training squadron based at CFB Esquimalt will be operational this summer and that the required technical and specialist personnel will be available for this most important training program for the youth of this country.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD (SKEENA)—USE OF UNITED STATES POSTAGE STAMP BY "TIME INTERNATIONAL" ON POSTCARD MAILED IN CANADA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I desire to rise on a question of privilege of which I have given Your Honour notice. My question of privilege relates to the use of United States of America postage stamps to mail certain material within Canada.

As a prelude I think I should indicate that the Post Office Act passed by this Parliament defines what is a postage stamp. Without quoting the section, it is whatever stamp or impression is authorized by the Postmaster General. Further, the act also provides that the Postmaster General may prescribe the conditions under which mailable matter will be mailed within Canada.

I have in my hand a postcard and it is necessary for me to read the very first sentence, though no other part. It reads:

May we ask your co-operation in a special survey of Time subscribers?

It is signed by a Ralph P. Davidson, associate publisher of Time International of Canada. It is postmarked Montreal at 1 p.m. on the 18th day of June and has a Canadian post office cancellation mark on it. The stamp is a United States of America six-cent stamp.

I am sure the Postmaster General did not authorize, as is his right under the Post Office Act, use of that particular stamp as an official stamp to be used within Canada, but for Time International to use that stamp to mail material—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should indicate as quickly as he can how he thinks parliamentary privilege is affected. From what the hon. member has said up to now I think there is not even a remote connection between the grievance that he has and parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in order to try to argue that there is a question of privilege I thought it worth while to put forward what this Parliament has said should be the law. I think that the privileges of Parliament have been offended. The Post Office Act was passed by this Parliament. The Postmaster General is charged with authority in postal matters and, if nothing else, he has been embarrassed by the use by Time International of a United States stamp to mail material within Canada, quite apart from it being offensive to Canadians as a whole.

If Your Honour finds that there is a prima facie question of privilege and that the matter should be inquired into, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the question of the use of United States of America postage stamps by Time International of Canada to post mail within Canada be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: I have to repeat what I said a moment ago, that there is not even a remote connection between the circumstances described by the hon. member and parliamentary privilege. I will not abuse the time or the patience of hon. members by repeating what parliamentary privilege is for the guidance of hon. members. I am sure the hon. member for Skeena, who has been here for many years, knows this at least as well and probably better than I. I am sure he will not require a long speech from the Chair to be convinced there is not a prima facie case of privilege. The hon. member may have a complaint or a grievance, but I fail to see how it is related in any way to his privileges as a member of this House.

IMPENDING NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in view of the impending French nuclear test in the Pacific I seek, under Standing Order 43, unanimous consent of the House to move a resolution in similar terms to the one adopted by this chamber in particular reference to the Amchitka test by the United States.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) that:

Whereas the continued testing of nuclear warheads by the nuclear powers adds to the dangers of the nuclear arms race and may seriously pollute the human environment, this Canadian House of Commons again calls on all nuclear powers to cease all testing of nuclear devices and particularly calls on the government of France to cancel the latest of its tests in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires unanimous consent. Is the hon. minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would be quite happy to consent to the putting of the motion if, in order to protect the opposition day, we can agree not to debate it at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure what the position of the House is at the moment. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be unanimity, and the motion will therefore be put.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I say, with respect, that I understood there was a condition to the motion being put.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, without debate.

Mr. Baldwin: Without debate, that is the condition attached.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Speaker: I will put the motion to the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMMITMENT OF MONEY IN ANY FISCAL YEAR

On the order: Introduction of Bills.

June 16, 1972—Mr. Broadbent—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act".

Mr. Broadbent: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: While the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby requests that this notice of introduction of a bill to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act stand, I think I should at this time enter a caution by indicating to the hon. member that in the view of the Chair there may be some procedural difficulty in respect of this motion in that there might be financial implications. It seems to the Chair that the hon. member is attempting to redirect funds which have been allocated by Parliament on the basis of a royal recommendation. As the hon. member well knows, this is not in order. In any event, we will allow the matter to stand for the time being and whenever it is called the hon. member may wish to argue the procedural point at that time.

AMENDMENT TO ENSURE PROPER EVALUATION OF EFFECTIVENESS OF DISBURSEMENTS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-216, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knight: The purpose of the bill is to ensure that the effectiveness of disbursements from the public purse is properly evaluated and that improvements in the grant system can be made promptly on the basis of such an evaluation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO ENSURE THAT APPLICANTS FOR GRANTS USE ACCURATE INFORMATION AND DATA

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-217, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knight: The purpose of the bill is to ensure that applicants for federal grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act use accurate information and data which are subject to public scrutiny, so as to have public scrutiny of questionable grants such as $3 million to Noranda Mines Limited, $2 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that Standing Order does not allow an explanation of the type he is attempting to give at this time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR MONTHLY REPORTS INDICATING AMOUNTS OF GRANTS AND NAMES OF COMPANIES

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-218, to amend the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knight: The purpose of this bill is to require the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to make monthly reports on the operation of the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act, indicating the names of the companies and the amounts of the grants in the same way the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is supposed to make reports under section 16 of the Regional Development Incentives Act, thus ensuring—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he can give only a brief explanation by virtue of Standing Order 68(2).

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—POLICY RESPECTING POSSIBLE USE OF WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of State from Calgary South expressing government policy when he said outside the House on June 11 that, while the government had contingency plans for dealing with the expected increase in inflationary pressures, price and wage controls were not part of those plans because he did not think they would work? Was the minister expressing government policy when he indicated that price and wage controls were not part of the contingency planning of the government with regard to the control of inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check exactly what was said by the minister, but to the extent he has been quoted correctly by the Leader of the Opposition it is not government policy. There are contingency plans and these are part of them.

INFLATION—TERMINATION OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION—CONTINGENCY PLANNING BY CONTINUING GROUP

Mr. Stanfield: Has the government authorized the continuance of a contingency planning group, perhaps a remnant of the Prices and Incomes Commission or, in any event, a continuing planning group, to carry on research on the role of a prices and incomes policy with regard to inflation, and is the planning of such a prices and incomes control policy within the terms of reference of that group?

Mr. Trudeau: With regard to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, yes. I recall answering a similar question in the House several weeks ago. I said then that after the Prices and Incomes Commission had reached the end of its mandate there would be kept in the government a small group of people who would be dealing with the problem on a continuing basis. One of the aspects, I am sure, of their work will be to keep various contingency plans updated in the event that the government might want to use them.

Mr. Stanfield: Is a contingency plan for wage and price controls specifically within the terms of reference of that group? Can the Prime Minister also tell the House to what minister that group will be reporting and to what minister the government will be looking for recommendations with regard to anti-inflationary measures and the development of contingency plans?

Mr. Trudeau: With regard to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference are generally as I stated them in my first answer. With regard to the second part of the question, the Prices and Incomes Commission will continue reporting to the same minister, at present the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, until such time as it finishes its work. The small working group which will be kept on will be an assignment of some minister whom I have not yet determined.

TRADE

REASON FOR POSTPONEMENT OF HEARING BY UNITED STATES TREASURY BOARD ON MICHELIN CASE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the House as to the reasons for the postponement of the hearing on the Michelin case by the United States treasury board and, more particularly, whether the postponement was at the request of the government of Canada? If so, does the government intend to make public its own brief on the subject?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the secretary of the treasury board in the United States is free to allow any period of time for the receiving of representations in cases of countervailing action. He had given a one month period. At our request, and in view of the complexity of the matter that period has been extended for another month until July 12.

MICHELIN TIRE COMPANY—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON AMOUNT OF GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL AID, PROJECTED CAPITAL COST AND EQUITY PROVIDED BY COMPANY

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I gave the minister notice this morning of my supplementary question. I hope he has the information. Will the minister inform the House (a) as to the amount of financial assistance the Michelin Company of Nova Scotia has received from the federal and provincial governments in the form of grants and loans, whether already paid or agreed to, (b) the projected capital cost of these facilities and (c) the amount of equity the Michelin Company has actually provided?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I will allow the minister to reply to the first part of the question. The hon. member is asking for statistical information. This is not normally the type of question that is allowable at this time. The hon. member indicated that he gave the minister notice of his intention to ask the question. I am not sure that brings him within the rules. In any event, the minister will be allowed to reply if he has the information.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I answered the previous question because it fell under my jurisdiction. This other aspect of the Michelin case, if you want to call it that, falls under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. He is aware of the hon. member's request which has been made previously. I presume that in due course he will deny or confirm the information available from the press on this subject.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister because I understand his department is responsible, directly or indirectly, for carrying this case before the United States government, and so he may have the answer to my final question. Can the minister inform the House whether or not it is a fact that, of the approximately $90 million that has been so far allocated for this project of the Michelin Company, less than 10 per cent of the capital was put up by the company itself?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it will be the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to answer that.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, while the minister is securing that information for the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby would he be good enough to ascertain who is more opposed to industrial progress in Nova Scotia, the straight NDP, the Lewisites, or the Waffle?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Pepin.]

AWARENESS BY UNITED STATES OF CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING USE OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, has the minister made it very clear to the government of the United States that to embark upon a program of countervailing duties, as might be the case in this instance, would be a very serious step for the United States government to take? Are the Americans quite well aware of our stand in this regard?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes. The representations we will make will cover all aspects of this question in terms of what is needed to undertake regional development in Canada, and in terms of comparing the situation of Canadian business with American business. American businessmen can enter the Canadian market much more easily than we can normally enter the U.S. market, in view of the fact that Canadians have to have quite a high export content in order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pepin: —to develop viable plants.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will return to the hon. member in a moment after we have completed the first round of questioning.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: As a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the government has known all about this very serious case for many months, is it a fact that the government has not already made a very serious presentation to the United States government, or is it waiting until some time in the future to make a vague presentation?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I have in front of me a number of clippings of previous answers where I made that very point.

EGGS—ADEQUACY OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION RESPECTING IMPORTATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Referring to an answer published in yesterday's Hansard concerning the production of eggs, may I ask the minister to say—without naturally giving any figures—whether the production of eggs in Canada meets the needs of the domestic market?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and it is slightly larger than the demand on the domestic market.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell the House why Canada imported eggs in 1971?

[English]

Mr. Olson: I suppose because the prices were higher here, the same motivation that caused us to export about 180,000 cases in some years.

INSECTICIDES

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF CONTROLLED USE OF DDT TO KILL MOSQUITOES AND BLACK FLIES

Mr. G. W. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the government considering the controlled introduction of DDT for residential and recreational spraying of mosquitoes and black flies? I ask this question because of certain reports that have been circulated.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there may be some consideration going on from time to time by an interdepartmental committee respecting this matter because it is charged with the responsibility of looking at alternatives, but I know of no action that is contemplated immediately in this regard.

• (1430)

Mr. Aiken: Has an effective alternative or substitute for DDT been developed and is the minister's department working on an alternative?

Mr. Olson: We are, Mr. Speaker, but it is too simple to say it is an alternative because there are alternative products for some purposes and there are no satisfactory alternatives for other purposes.

EXCHANGING OF RESEARCH INFORMATION WITH UNITED STATES ON CONTROL OF DDT AND SEARCH FOR ALTERNATIVES

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very severe ban the United States has placed on the use of DDT, is there cross-research between the two countries? Are we exchanging research information on the control of DDT and on the search for alternatives?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I should remind you, Sir, and the House that we did restrict the purposes for which DDT could be used by about 90 per cent only a few months ago.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED INADEQUATE QUOTA FOR NEWFOUNDLAND IN PROVISION OF WORK UNDER STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the continuing serious need for employment for students, particularly in the Atlantic region, would the minister investigate the reasons for the fact that the Newfoundland share of the 15,000 opportunities under the student summer employment program in the Department of National Defence was less than half of one per cent, other than militia training which is an ongoing program, and would the minister review the quotas allocated with a view to showing equality to all the provinces?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the application of Dominion Aircraft Corporation which is seeking to build planes in the lower mainland of British Columbia. I believe the minister indicated some time ago that consideration was being given to their application under PAIT. May I ask whether a decision has been reached and, if so, what that decision is?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I replied a few days ago to the hon. member for Peace River that I would be in a position to announce the decision in a week or two. I hope I still have a few days left under that statement.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF EXCURSION FARES WITHIN CANADA

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the growing imbalance in tourist account between Canada and the United States, can the minister inform the House whether Air Canada is planning any excursion fares that would encourage Canadians to travel in Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was informed this morning by a letter from the chairman of the board of Air Canada that he has on their way to me in the mail, or they will be here in a short time, some proposals for fare revisions. He did not indicate the nature of these proposals, but as soon as I receive them and discussions take place I shall be glad to inform the House.

Mr. Dinsdale: When the minister reports, will he indicate whether the double discount family fare, which is restricted to Air Canada flights to the United States at the moment, will apply to Canadian domestic flights as well?

Mr. Jamieson: I will certainly take that up with the officials of Air Canada, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—TELEGRAM FROM MONTREAL PORT AUTHORITY—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour being absent, I shall direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Still with regard to the longshoremen's strike in Montreal, I hear the minister has had consultations with the maritime association, and today with the union. Did the right hon. Prime Minister receive a telegram this morning from the Montreal Port Authority and, if so, has he sent a reply and what was it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe I did receive such a telegram from the Montreal Port Authority. I just read it on my way to the House. No reply has yet been sent except for acknowledging it, I believe.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—RESULTS OF MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER AND PARTIES

Mr. Caouette: I should like to put a supplementary question Mr. Speaker.

Does the Prime Minister know what are the results of the meetings held yesterday and this morning with the Minister of Labour and is the settlement of that conflict expected in the near future?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Minister of Labour is now trying to settle that conflict by meeting with the parties involved in Montreal. I do not have any further report for the moment.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF TRUSTEESHIP AS SOLUTION TO DISPUTE—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the suggestion made by the Montreal Port Authority, in a telegram sent to the Prime Minister this morning, of trusteeship as a solution to the conflict, can the Prime Minister tell us whether he is considering this possibility?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Once more, Mr. Speaker, I was apprised of the telegram only a few moments ago and I have not yet sent a reply.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, since the Montreal Port Authority does recommend trusteeship in the telegram and since I am informing the Prime Minister of this position of the Montreal Port Authority, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he considers that the action recommended is likely to settle the conflict?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I tell the hon. member again that I have just been apprised of the telegram. Therefore, I have not yet considered the reply to be made nor the other matter mentioned by the hon. member.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSSIBLE INTERVENTION OF QUEBEC MINISTER OF LABOUR—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Because of the absence of the Minister of Labour, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it was the statement of the Quebec Minister of Labour to the effect that he would intervene personally if the conflict was not soon settled, which has incited the federal government to act and take remedial measures immediately.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the Quebec Minister of Labour, judging by his past performances, could not be very useful to us in this matter.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GROUNDS FOR TEMPORARY RELEASE OF CHARLES DAVID HEAD FROM PENITENTIARY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a very serious question. What grounds and what formula were used in granting a temporary release to Charles David Head who was convicted on May 26, 1967 and sentenced to life for the rape of a six-year old girl and given a five-year concurrent sentence for attempted rape of a nine-year old girl and prior to that time had two charges of rape and indecent assault on a six-year old girl and was given life imprisonment and declared criminally insane and given an indeterminate sentence? On what grounds was this man given a temporary release under the plan the Solicitor General seems to be using and which is contrary to section 684(3) of the Criminal Code?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): For the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that he is still a man and a citizen of this country.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: He may be a man and a citizen of the country but I would assume that Tanya Bush of Vancouver who was recently found dead, probably due to foul play, is also a girl and a citizen of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I see that the Prime Minister wants to get into the act. If he wants to tell the House the formula—

Mr. Trudeau: Are you linking the two? Are you making an accusation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was given the floor for a supplementary. Perhaps he might ask it now.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to put the question again. Under what formula and what rule of law—I am not asking a question of law, I am asking a question of fact—was this man given temporary release and was his release signed properly by anyone in the proper office or was it a forged release?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, this great lawyer from western Canada should know that one does not make reflections which can cause people to bear judgment on a man's actions before this man appears before the courts. This is the law of this country, and this great lawyer should respect it.

[English]

Mr. Ricard: Don't be so smart. Give an answer.

Mr. MacInnis: You are breaking the rules here. You can't even live up to the rules of the House.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to ask one further question, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind the insinuations or insults. I am seeking information on a serious matter. There are certain rules and laws laid down in the Criminal Code and the Penitentiary Act in reference to temporary release. I am asking the Solicitor General—if he does not care to answer that is his prerogative and I appreciate that—on what grounds was this man released? What were the grounds?

Mr. Diefenbaker: This fine citizen!

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, this citizen has been granted temporary release for the third time and we have no evidence to date that he has not behaved properly; on the contrary, all evidence goes to show that he has behaved very well. In the past, over a period of four years, we have granted temporary release on 133 occasions to 25 of these inmates convicted for sexual offenses and we have had not one serious case to deplore.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one more supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might ask a supplementary and then we might go to the next subject.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister make a full statement on motions in reference to the granting of the temporary release, indicating whether there was any supervision after the man was released and also setting out the rules, the law and the grounds by virtue of which this person was released in those circumstances?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not see any reason why I should comment on the private life of an individual at this time. If circumstances warrant it, I will do so then.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSITION OF DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESCALATION OF PENSIONS IN ACCORDANCE WITH FULL COST OF LIVING INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. On May 9, in response to a question of mine, the minister referred to the possibility of consultations being held with the representatives of the public service employees with respect to the escalating of the pensions of retired public servants in accordance with the full increase in the cost of living. Can the President of the Treasury Board say whether those consultations are taking place and, if so, how they are progressing?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there was some discussion about the particular form these discussions should take. I think it has now been agreed what the appropriate form should be and they are now in progress.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WHEREABOUTS OF VESSEL, "GREENPEACE III"

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or to the parliamentary secretary. Has the government any information on the present whereabouts of the Canadian-owned and Canadian-skippered ship, Greenpeace III? Also, has the government of France been asked for any information on the location of this vessel and the well-being of its crew?

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government does not know the exact location of Greenpeace III at this time. If I may respond to the second part of the hon. member's question, the government of France has, we understand, publicly stated that it will not permit the occupants of Greenpeace III to place themselves in a position of danger.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask whether it is the view of the government of Canada that the government of France has the right to arrest ships on the high seas in these circumstances?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for a legal interpretation and I doubt that the question is in order.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I am interested in what compels Marc Lalonde, the right hon. gentleman's principal private secretary, to make the rounds of Time Magazine and the Toronto Sun and suggest by letter and interview that these journals have been unduly critical of the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think the country is entitled to know whether the Prime Minister's concept of democracy is so fragile that it only accepts that rare remnant of comment that is favourable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last June 19, the Health Minister of the Province of Quebec stated at the Canadian Welfare Conference that it was imperative to renew negotiations about the constitution.

Would the Prime Minister tell the House if, on the one hand, the Premier of Quebec has advised him of such a wish and, on the other hand, if he himself is ready to renew these negotiations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on this subject, I have always said to whoever wanted to hear that the last series of constitutional conferences was not successful because the Province of Quebec did not agree with all the other provinces and the federal government. If this province wants to renew constitutional debates, it should do so from a clear, definite and known position and I hope that there would be then some chance of success.

INDUSTRY

RECOMMENDATIONS OF TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD RESPECTING CERTAIN YARNS AND FABRICS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister received recommendations from the Textile and Clothing Board regarding its investigation into three important areas of Canada's foreign trade, acrylic yarns for use in machine knitting operations, double knit and warp knit fabrics, and broad woven polyester filament fabrics? If so, will he give the House the substance of these recommendations and his reaction to them?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the minister can reply to that question briefly. Normally the answer ought to be given by way of a statement on motions. The minister will be recognized for the purpose of giving a brief answer.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me well, I have received reports on the first two items mentioned. These reports will be tabled in due course.

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask the minister what safeguards are provided by the minister to ensure that the operations of the board are not detrimental to the Canadian policy of freer world trade, a policy to which the minister so often gives lip service?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it is very simple—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question, in those terms, is not in order. I believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert has a supplementary to the previous question.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is he giving consideration now to the reconvening of a Canadian conference on the constitution? I should like to know what his position is because I seem to recall that all these problems were going to be solved under his regime.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not, as I said just a moment ago in answering the question of the hon. member for Joliette, giving consideration at this time to reconvening the constitutional conference, and I seem to recall, too, that back in the early sixties all these problems were going to be solved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am amused because the Prime Minister is rewriting history. That statement is false.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If any conference were to be called, would the Victoria charter provisions be the general base from which to start? I should like to ask what the Prime Minister's views are in that regard and whether he has not found, since Premier Bourassa turned down the Victoria charter, that Mr. Bourassa was right in his stand?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that is debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not want debate.

TEXTILES—INQUIRY AS TO DESIGNATION AS SENSITIVE AND MORATORIUM ON GRANTS FOR NEW PLANTS OR EXPANSION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the previous question that was directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. May I ask the minister whether he has designated the textile industry as one of the sensitive industries and is he recommending or has he recommended to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that a moratorium be placed on grants to new textile plants or for expansions until markets have had a chance to stabilize?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the philosophy of the textile policy, as announced in May of 1970, is that there are a number of viable sectors in this industry and that these only should be encouraged. That is why, through our regional development subsidies or otherwise, we have concentrated on these viable sectors. The Textile and Clothing Board helps in identifying these sectors and the quality of the plans developed and it makes recommendations to the Canadian government as to the degree of protection that might be needed at that time. The commission does not make policy; it makes recommendations on trade policy in textile matters.

PROPOSED LINKING OF KOOTENAY AND ELK RAILWAY TO U.S. LINE FOR CARRIAGE OF COAL—RESULTS OF STUDY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada regarding the Kootenay and Elk Railway, and the announcement in the House by the minister that the matter was being studied, may I ask the minister whether this study has been completed and when a report will be made to the House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the judgment has been studied. The position, of course, is that the decision of the Supreme Court left an option open to the applicant company to reapply to the Canadian Transport Commission. To my knowledge they have not done so so far. Simultaneously, incidentally, with the action before the Supreme Court of Canada an appeal was filed with the CTC on different grounds or under a different process. Both these matters are still pending. Presumably the next step is up to the applicant railway.

• (1450)

LEGALITY OF LICENSING OF KOOTENAY AND ELK RAILWAY BY GOVERNMENT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Harding: Has the department investigated the licensing of the Kootenay and Elk Railway by the government of British Columbia to ascertain whether the terms of the Railway Act have been contravened, bearing in mind the international purpose for which this spur railway line is to be used?

Mr. Jamieson: I will have to take notice of that question, if the hon. member does not mind. It is quite complicated in law and I should like to get a legal opinion.

RESPONSIBILITY OF RAILWAYS TO PEOPLE OWNING LAND ALONG LINES ON WHICH SERVICE ABANDONED

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. When the Canadian Transport Commission grants to railways the right to abandon service on certain lines, does this include the abandonment of responsibility to the general public owning land along the right of way with regard to the upkeep of fences—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is debate or argument rather than a question. At this point I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members that there are about six minutes left before the end of the question period and there are at least 20 members seeking an opportunity to ask questions. When 50 members enter the House and rise at two o'clock all thinking they are going to ask questions, I suggest that hon. members should look around them and notice what is happening and resign themselves at that point to the fact that they are not all going to have an opportunity to ask a question on every day. It just cannot work that way.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): A preliminary meeting has been held which was attended by the regional director and, I believe, by representatives of the air administration. NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Why has the report not been tabled this year? Has it been certified by the Auditor General?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): It will be tabled, I believe, tomorrow. I had a letter from the Auditor General two or three days ago in which he indicated there were certain things with regard to the report which did not enable him to give it the necessary authorization or certification. But it will be tabled this week along with the Auditor General's letter and comments.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): When the minister tables it, will there be a financial statement certified by the Auditor General?

Mr. Jamieson: Rather than seek to answer the question in that form I will simply table the letter along with the documents which have been provided by the National Harbours Board. As I understand it, it is not certified in the sense the hon. member has mentioned, but I am not absolutely certain about the exact use of that word.

FREIGHT RATE INCREASES—ALLEVIATION OF EFFECT ON CAPE BRETON INDUSTRIES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In light of the most recent freight rate increase in the Atlantic provinces and in view of a statement by a spokesman for General Instruments of Canada Limited that the potential advantages of being located in Cape Breton are slowly diminishing as a result of increased freight rates, may I ask what proposals the hon. gentleman can offer this employer of close to 1,000 people to alleviate the situation so that this operation is not placed in jeopardy as stated by the same spokesman?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I would have to know the details but if the hon. member would be good enough to let me see the item in question I would be glad to talk with the company concerned.

Mr. Muir: I thank the minister for his reply; I shall be glad to provide him with information. In view of the fact there have been 12 domestic freight rate increases since 1968 when the Sydney Steel Corporation came into being, and bearing in mind that this company employs close to 3,000 people, what relief can the minister offer this corporation so that it will not be forced out of business?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF HIGHER FOOD COSTS IN NORTHERN MANITOBA COMMUNITIES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with reference to a recent survey of food costs carried out in 21 northern Manitoba communities under the authority of the medical services branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The report states that the average cost of food in these 21 communities is 73 per cent higher than the cost of comparable food in Winnipeg. I should like to ask the minister whether this report has been brought to his attention and whether he intends to look into this unacceptable situation.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Frankly, the report has not been brought to my attention. I appreciate the hon. member raising the matter in the House, and I will look into it.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF INDEPENDENT CONSULTANT TO STUDY SURFACE TRANSPORTATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport when he will be in a position to announce the appointment and the name of the independent consultant to carry out the study in connection with surface transportation in Newfoundland as announced by the Minister of Transport through the Canadian Transport Commission during the examination of the estimates of his department in committee?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I would hope to be in a position next week to announce, if not the name of the consultant, then certainly the terms of reference. That has been the cause of the delay—the determination of the terms of reference.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION BY PANARCTIC IN CONSORTIUM

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is it the intention of the government to encourage Panarctic Oils to join the consortium recently formed in Calgary to build the Mackenzie Valley pipeline?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Not at the moment.

FARM MACHINERY—IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It is one which has been asked a number of times but has never received a positive answer. Bearing in mind that the final report of the Barber Commission on the prices of farm machinery and repair parts was tabled in the House over a year ago, can the minister tell us whether the government plans to take any action with regard to some of the recommendations contained in this report before the twenty-eighth Parliament ends?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I am not sure we can give any reports respecting this matter further than those already given. I am sure the hon. member will recall that several positive steps were taken shortly after the first recommendations came out.

FUTURE OF SAINT JOHN-DIGBY FERRY IN LIGHT OF FREIGHT RATE INCREASES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport with reference to the specific freight rate increases involving the Saint John-Digby ferry. I know this has been brought to the minister's attention, but I wonder whether he has had an opportunity to consider some of the information on his desk and whether he is prepared to make a statement on the future of the ferry in view of the fact that freight rate increases amount in some cases to 50 per cent, the tourist season is upon us, the ferry lost over half a million dollars last year, and there is no federal subsidy paid?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): As often happens, there are a great many parts to the hon. member's question. The short answer is that my officials are in discussion with representatives of Canadian Pacific on all these subjects at the present time.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Would the minister assure us that he will take into consideration in this review the fact that there is a competing ferry which receives a subsidy from the government amounting to more than a million dollars?

SUICIDE OF ALICIA WIERCIOCH—INVESTIGATION OF PROVISION OF WRONG INFORMATION TO MINISTER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I am wondering whether the investigation into the Alicia Wiercioch case has resulted in pinpointing those people who misinformed him. Has it been completed and, if so, how many persons are involved and what has happened to them?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): It is safe to say there has been some internal discussion between myself and the officials at headquarters about the type of information provided to be used in the question period in order that the House may not be unintentionally misled.

NATIONAL REVENUE

POSSIBLE REQUIREMENT FOR ADDITIONAL SERVICES TO ASSIST TAXPAYERS IN SUBMITTING PROPER INCOME TAX RETURNS NEXT YEAR

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and it arises out of reports that more than one million tax returns submitted this year contained errors and must be processed at least twice by the department. In view of the increased complexities of the new tax legislation, would the minister say whether he has made any projection of the requirement for additional services to assist taxpayers in submitting proper returns next year?

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that question should be placed on the order paper or discussed at the time of the adjournment. I apologize to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others. Perhaps they might be given some priority tomorrow. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENTS INCENTIVE PROGRAMS TO STIMULATE TRADE AND CREATE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Hees, Prince Edward-Hastings (for Mr. Baldwin) moved:

This House regrets that the government's expenditures for incentive programs have failed to stimulate production and trade in Canadian goods and services and to open increased opportunitite for productive employment to Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise if someone in the official opposition is going to do so, but I thought there was an agreement about the length of speeches today. I think the agreement was 30 minutes for the mover of the motion, 30 minutes for the member replying for the government, 20 minutes for the first speaker of the two parties at this end of the chamber and 15 minutes for everybody else.

Mr. Bell: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but our House leader did try to get complete agreement on this matter. However, it was not possible because some members had prepared their speeches on the basis of the time allotted by the Standing Order. Therefore, I would suggest we leave it the way it was proposed yesterday, that all the rules stand, but if at six o'clock it looks as though some members are being deprived of opportunities, then we will negotiate on that basis.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Fair enough; I agree.

Mr. Fortin: Agreed.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the most accurate measure of a government's performance in stimulating production and jobs is the figures produced each quarter by Statistics Canada which show the real growth in output during that three month period. These figures are arrived at by subtracting the increase in inflation from the increase in the gross national product, and the resultant figure shoes the increase in real economic growth that has taken place during that period of time.

[Mr. Scott.]

I suggest that we begin this afternoon by examining the figures over the past ten years in order to judge the performance today compared with the industrial effort this country has made during the past ten years. During 1962, the first of those ten years and the last year the Conservative government was in office, the real output achieved in this country increased by 6.8 per cent. The average yearly increase during that ten year period has been 5.5 per cent. The figure released last Friday by Statistics Canada shows that during the first quarter of this year real output in this country increased at an annual rate of only 4 per cent, following a similar rate of increase during the last quarter of 1971. So we see, Mr. Speaker, that our industrial performance today is considerably below the performance over the past decade, and it gives a clear indication why unemployment remains well above the 6 per cent level. The natural question that arises is this: Why should our performance today be so far below what it has been in recent years? The obvious answer is that the government has failed to introduce adequate measures to stimulate the economy.

The next logical question is: What should those measures be? In answering that question, I suggest that we first take a look at the proposal the government made on May 8 last for stimulating the economy. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) announced a reduction in corporation income tax paid by manufacturers and processors, to come into effect on January 1 next. However, this tax reduction will be largely nullified by two important tax increases which are to come into effect on that very same day. I think it is interesting to note that in his budget address the Minister of Finance made no reference whatsoever to these two tax increases. One member on the government side, who was recently a member of the cabinet, suggested the other day that the Minister of finance simply did not know that these taxes existed, but that, of course, is nonsense. The Minister of Finance must have known. Obviously he did know, and he did not mention either of these tax increases on that occasion simply to avoid embarrassment.

The first of these tax increases is the additional 5 per cent corporation tax that will be paid by all companies other than manufacturers and processors on January 1 next. As hon. members very well remember, last October the former Minister of Finance reduced all corporation income taxes in an attempt to stimulate business in general, but this tax reduction was only effective until January 1, 1973. On that date the amount of corporation income tax payable by all companies, other than manufacturing and processing companies, will go up by 5 per cent. Since businesses, other than manufacturing, comprise 65.8 per cent of the Canadian economy, this 5 per cent tax increase can be counted upon to slow down the pace of the economy to a considerable extent since these companies will have less capital with which to expand their operations. This impending tax increase is today slowing down any plans these companies might otherwise have had to expand their operations at this time.

Second, all personal income taxes will be raised by 3 per cent on January 1 next. When he brought in his budget last October, the former Minister of Finance lowered personal income taxes by 3 per cent until January 1, 1973, when they will return to their former level. It is obvious that this increase in personal income tax will take an important amount of money out of the pockets of the Canadian buying public from January 1, 1973 onward. Sales and production will be slowed down by the amount of purchasing power taken out of circulation, and this knowledge is at present slowing down plans for expansion by all businesses because these companies know they will all be adversely affected by this brake on purchasing power.

• (1510)

What is needed to get the economy going is a shot in the arm right now, not sometime six months hence, eight months, 10 months or a year. We are facing very serious unemployment today and the economy of this country has been moving very sluggishly for at least three years. The kind of government actions needed to bring about such a shot in the arm right now to get the economy moving again are the following. First of all, the government should make the reduction in corporate income tax for manufacturers and processors effective on July 1 next instead of waiting until July 1, 1973, so that important segment of the economy will be encouraged to expand its operations now, not six months, nine months or a year from now.

Mr. Pepin: We need time to plan and put it into effect.

Mr. Hees: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) queries that statement. This government has introduced, on the average, two budgets a year for the past three years. It has brought in these budgets because each budget was supposed to stimulate the economy and get it moving, but a couple of months following the presentation of each budget it was found they were not able to do the job. The government had to start all over and bring in another budget to stimulate the economy. A couple of months later it was found that the measures introduced did not do any better, and so there were tax changes galore. This government never knows where it is going and it desperately grabs at anything on which it can get its hands. It changes taxes in every way it can, and the manufacturers and processors of this country have no way of knowing whether in two or three months time the government will find that this move is unproductive and change the whole tax structure again, so what they are planning on now will simply not come into effect. That is why these tax reductions should have been made available on July 1 next, not on January 1, 1973.

The second thing the government should do is announce that corporation income taxes for all businesses, other than manufacturing and processing, will not be restored to their former level on January 1, 1973. As I have said, at that time those taxes will increase by a little more than 5 per cent.

The third thing the government should do is announce immediately that personal income taxes will not be restored to their former level on January 1, 1973, but will be reduced by a further 5 per cent on July 1 next. Such a move is very much needed now to put the additional purchasing power needed today into the hands of the Canadian buying public so it can increase purchases, which in turn will increase production, get the economy moving and create the jobs so very badly needed in this country today. That increase in personal income tax will take a very severe bite out of the purchasing power of the Canadian people and will materially slow down the orders factories receive from stores where customers place their orders. When this comes into effect, it will have a very serious impact on our economy.

The fourth thing this government should do is introduce a massive export drive to greatly increase sales of Canadian products in the markets of the world where sales have been decreasing.

Mr. Pepin: You are asking us to do things we have already done.

Mr. Hees: The minister interjects by saying he is doing this. As a former minister of this department I have followed his moves very carefully, indeed. If he knew how dejected the members of his department are, from the top to the bottom, about the inadequacy of the juvenile approach he is taking to this whole matter as compared to what they know is needed he would be shocked. The effort today can only be described as very inadequate.

I have been hoping for a long time that the department would finally get into gear, that the minister would get the spirit of the thing and we would see a massive trade drive moving forward. That drive has not materialized. The minister has called some of his trade commissioners back to Canada and asked them what they thought should be done. They have told him what they think should be done, but he has not done anything. There does not seem to be any indication that the minister will do anything about this. My purpose today is to try to prod him into doing something. These men know what is needed to increase sales of Canadian products in the markets of the world. Many of them were in the department 10 years ago when exactly what I am suggesting was done. A massive trade drive took place and in one short year the 10 years of Liberal trade deficits were turned into our first trade surplus. Our sales abroad increased year after year and laid the foundation for the prosperity of the 1960's. Those men were here then and know this can be done. They know what must be done and they have asked the minister to do it.

My information is that the minister has taken these propositions to the Cabinet, and I give him credit for this, but the cabinet has turned him down as they would involve spending money. Certain of his colleagues have said they want to see the government spend money in other directions rather than in this way, or that is my information.

Mr. Pepin: Be specific, otherwise I cannot judge.

Mr. Hees: I am trying to give the minister the best of it. I am trying to picture him in the best possible light. If he does not want to be pictured in that way, I would simply say he has to take full responsibility. I think he has done his best. I am told he has gone to the Cabinet but cannot sell his ideas to his colleagues. He is a very frustrated minister. If he has not done what I am told he has done, then 100 per cent of the blame rests on his shoulders.

Mr. Pepin: I cannot judge because no specific suggestions have been made.

Mr. Hees: The fifth thing the government should do is introduce tax incentives to induce greater productivity and, by reducing costs and selling prices, make our products more competitive both in Canada and in the world markets. In this way, our Canadian products would sell in greater volume in Canada and in markets of the world and, as a result, production would be increased and jobs created. These tax incentives would be paid on the basis of increased productivity in individual plants and would give industrial leaders in this country the incentive they need to persuade them to buy expensive new plant equipment and production systems necessary to get costs down, making it possible to sell Canadian products at more competitive prices.

• (1520)

Now, having told the government what it should do, the question is what are the chances of the government adopting these very sensible suggestions. The answer I am afraid is that the chances of that happening are very slight. There seems to be ingrained in all Liberal governments a certain arrogance which makes it impossible for them to accept suggestions from anybody else. When I was here before we formed the government, when the St. Laurent government was in power, Mr. Howe, Mr. Harris and all the others would not consider a suggestion. They did not realize how wrong they were until they woke up around eleven o'clock on June 11, 1957 and found they were out of office. Now, I see exactly the same situation developing again on the other side of the House. There is the same arrogance, the same conceit and the same unwillingness to accept any suggestion, no matter how constructively it is put forward.

I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the next couple of months once again having the same tremendous debate in his own mind concerning whether he will have the election this fall or put it over until next spring. The story about what went on here a few weeks ago is well known. The Prime Minister was all set to go. He thought he had it in the bag for the Wednesday, and then he received the polls from across the country which showed he would lose a great many seats. His pollsters told him they were not sure whether the result would be a minority Liberal government or a minority Conservative government. So, at the last moment, the Prime Minister decided not to go to the country. He gave the vague excuse we all heard and laughed at. He simply turned tail and ran.

What is to happen when the government will not accept these sensible suggestions so that the economy could get going during the summer or early fall? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) had hoped his incentives which were introduced on May 8 would do the job. They will not for the reasons I have mentioned. We will see the Prime Minister trying to decide once again whether he should hold the election in the fall, as he did when he tried to decide about the spring election, or hope that things will get a little better next spring. I say things will not get better, and for a very good reason. I say that reluctantly because I would like to see things get a whole lot better in this country.

The incentives of the Minister of Finance will not work for the two reasons I mentioned earlier. Two matching tax increases will take place simultaneously. His tax increase for all companies, other than manufacturing and processing, largely nullifies the benefit of the decrease to manufacturing and processing industries, and for a very good reason. In the minister's proposition which he mentioned on the night of May 8, there is absolutely no requirement that business spend the benefit from that tax reduction granted to manufacturers and processors in the way the government wishes them to which is to increase their production and provide more jobs for the Canadian people. These manufacturers and processors can take that tax reduction and do any one of three things with it. First, they can do what the government and the country wants, which is increase their operations, increase their production and make it possible to provide jobs for the people in Canada who want to work. Second, they can pay out the benefit from the tax increase in the form of annual dividends or, third, they can put the benefit from the tax decrease into the company reserves.

There is no indication at all concerning what the manufacturers and processors of this country will do with the windfall which will come to them starting January 1 next. The government is reducing taxes to one segment of the economy which means that another part of the economy will have to make up the loss. The general taxpayer will have to make it up in some way or other. Any businessman will tell you that if you want businessmen to do something you do not simply hand them a lump sum of money, as this government is doing, and trust in God that they will do what you want them to do. A good many businessmen in this country are laughing up their sleeves at the Minister of Finance today. There is no requirement that they spend the money in the way the government wants them to do.

What the government should have done, and should do now, is say to businessmen that this is what we want you to do; if you do it you will be rewarded generously at the end of the year in exact proportion to the way in which you carry out the government's wishes. In other words, the government should say to them that if they increase production and increase jobs in their plants to a certain percentage they will receive a proportionate tax rebate; the more they do this the greater the tax rebate they will receive. In that way, business is being paid when it has done what the government wants it to do rather than being given the money ahead of time in the hope that it will do it. That is the kind of thinking fuzzy-minded theorists do and believe will work. It will not work because many manufacturers and processors in this country simply will not use that reduction in the way in which the government wishes, and there is absolutely nothing the government can do about it.

I am afraid the government will not accept these very sensible, business-like suggestions. There is no member on the other side of the House who could claim for a moment that any one of the suggestions I have made is not sensible, straightforward and businesslike in respect of getting the economy going. Because the government will not accept these suggestions, I am afraid we are destined to see the economy move along in the same sluggish and ineffective way it has been for three years now. I am afraid also that the Prime Minister, as he discusses the situation with himself, will be putting to himself the proposition of whether he should have an election now or put if off until the spring in the hope that some improvement will take place. What a prospect! We will just have to look forward to such a discussion going on and the prospect of going through another year of Liberal misrule and mismanagement as well as very poor economic conditions. This is something the government of this country has no right to impose on the people of the country.

Once again, I say the government should forget its arrogance and for heaven's sake for once accept some sensible suggestions and get the economy of the country going, so that we will be in a position where the Prime Minister can have sufficient confidence to go to the country next fall. Let us have the economy of this country run well for the first time in many years.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the failure of the government's various incentive programs is proven by the state of the economy. From the fiscal year 1968-69 up to and including the present fiscal year, the government will have paid out in hand-outs to corporations in this country the staggering sum of $2,162,217,000. The Canadian people have a right to ask what they are getting for this very large gratuity. What is the situation in the economy? We now have over half a million unemployed. If you add to that those on manpower training, those temporarily employed, in Opportunities for Youth and the Local Initiatives programs, the unemployment figure is probably closer to three quarters of a million.

• (1530)

The figures just issued by the government show that in the first quarter of this year the rate of growth in real terms is only 1 per cent. It is significant to note that each year the handouts by the government have increased. For example, in 1968-69, the grants were $390,593,000. They went up each year until this year they are $530 million. One would have expected that these increased grants would have resulted in declining unemployment, but that is not the case.

In 1968, the seasonally adjusted figure for unemployment was 4.8 per cent. In 1971, it had reached 6.4 per cent. While the government has poured out more money, the state of the economy has not improved. Unemployment has gone up. Our rate of productivity has remained more or less stagnant and the economy is lagging far behind its potential. That is why I say the people of this country have a right to ask why these incentive programs have been a failure.

I suggest there are three reasons why they have been a failure. The first is that incentive grants by themselves are not the answer. Both the Liberal and Conservative parties have a great deal of faith in the trickle down theory. They believe that if you pump in enough money at the top, it will trickle down to the people at the bottom. It has not worked that way.

As a matter of fact, the corporate sector of the economy does not particularly need great financial assistance. Figures have just been issued for the first quarter of 1972.

A survey made of 426 firms shows that after taxes, I repeat after taxes, profits rose by 36.2 per cent. Last year the chartered banks made record profits. Of the eight banks surveyed, they showed an increase in the first quarter of this year of 41.3 per cent. What the government has failed to do has been to recognize that this economy needs stimulation by increasing the aggregate demand.

The New Democratic Party has been telling the government in season and out of season that if they want to get the economy moving and if they want to provide jobs for our people, instead of pouring money in at the top, very little of which trickles down to the people, they should put the money where it will create a demand for goods and services. We recommended many things, such as the reduction of personal income tax in the middle and lower income groups. We suggested lowering interest rates, making money available for low cost housing and making large sums of money available to the provinces and municipalities for socially useful projects. Even if the government wants to give some incentives to industry, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has done in his budget to the tune of $500 million, those incentives ought to be given on the basis of labour intensive industries rather than capital intensive industries. Giving accelerated depreciation and reduced taxes to large corporations does not guarantee that they will use those savings to create jobs. If the government wants to provide an incentive, let it do so on the basis of jobs created rather than on the basis of profits made.

The second reason this incentive program has failed is that there has been an unequitable distribution of these grants across this country. For some time members in this party have been trying to find out the formula upon which industrial incentive grants are given. I must confess that that formula is like the peace of the Lord, it passeth all understanding.

If we take the period from July 1969 to June 1971, we find that in the province of Quebec there were 37.2 per cent of the unemployed in Canada. They received 38.8 per cent of the money paid out. In my opinion, that is fairly equitable distribution. However, in the province of British Columbia in the same period we had 12.6 per cent of the unemployed people in Canada and we received one half per cent of the money paid out.

If one turns to the period from July 1971 to February 1972, the picture is even worse. We find that the province of Quebec, where they had 35.7 per cent of the unemployed, received 61.1 per cent of the money paid out. In the province of British Columbia, where we had 11.8 per cent of the unemployed in Canada, we received 3 per cent of the money paid out in incentive grants. It will be said that Quebec has very high unemployment, and it has. However, I point out that British Columbia, according to the figures for May 1972, has exactly the same unemployment rate as the province of Quebec, namely 8.1 per cent. That is exceeded only by the Atlantic provinces which have a seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment of 9.7 per cent.

As an illustration of the tendency of this government to forget the west and be completely oblivious to the needs of British Columbia, I point to the case of Dominion Aircraft Corporation about which I asked the minister a question this afternoon. This company is seeking to manufacture STOL aircraft with the prospect of providing employment for between 400 and 500 persons on the lower mainland in the Sea Island plant it hopes to open there. I do not have the technical competence to say whether this is a good or marketable aircraft, but the company claims that it has firm orders for 23 aircraft, and it has orders held in abeyance for 17 aircraft at $130,000 per aircraft.

This company did not ask for a grant. They merely asked the government to guarantee their loan from the bank for a figure, I believe, of some $3.5 million. Their application was rejected. They have now been told to apply under PAIT. This company has been waiting months for an answer. The minister told me this afternoon that he expects to be able to make an announcement regarding the decision of his department within a week or two. This group has been waiting for months. When I recall that the two aircraft industries in central Canada, De Havilland and Canadair, have had grants totalling $90 million, I find it extremely difficult to understand why the government could not underwrite a bank loan of $3½ million to put 300 or 400 people to work in the lower mainland of British Columbia and to provide western Canada with an aircraft industry.

It is passing strange that of the more than $2 billion we have paid out in incentive programs over half of it has gone to foreign-owned and controlled multinational corporations. We have been able to spend hundreds of millions of dollars helping foreign companies to come into Canada, acquire a stake in this country and take over part of our economy, but when a Canadian company seeks to get started in Canada the government seems to have no facilities to help it.

That brings me to the third reason why I think this incentive program has been a dismal failure, and that is that it has completely ignored small Canadian companies and small Canadian businessmen. After all, Mr. Speaker, these small Canadian businesses, these retail merchants and wholesalers and those in the service industries, provide employment for hundreds of thousands of Canadians in the cities, towns and smaller communities of Canada. They are being discriminated against. First of all, they are being discriminated against in the matter of taxation. Under the recent budget they are going to pay the full corporation tax, whereas the manufacturing and processing sectors of the economy will have their tax frozen at 40 per cent. And when the tax cuts of last December expire, as they will on December 31 of this year, and personal income tax goes up by 3 per cent and corporation tax goes up by 7 per cent, the small businessmen, the retailers, wholesalers and those in the service industries will find that in 1973 they will be paying a tax rate 20 per cent higher than the manufacturers and processors.

As the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) has pointed out, it is not only a matter of higher tax rates. It is also a matter of the higher or accelerated depreciation and depletion allowances that are given to the capital intensive industries. He pointed out that a retail merchant pays taxes on 90 per cent of his book profits whereas the metal mining industry pays taxes on only 13 per cent of its book profits, and the oil and gas industries on only 5.7 per cent of their book profits.

The small businessmen are also discriminated against in that they do not have access to the capital markets to secure the money they need to expand their operations. Big corporations have little difficulty in this regard. They are able to borrow money. The lastest figures show that the corporate sector of the economy in the last year increased its demand on term loans with the banks at a rate of 30 per cent annually. That has forced the Bank of Canada to increase the money supply at a rate of 25 per cent annually. That in turn has pushed up interest rates. It has encouraged short-term capital to move into Canadian banks, and pushed up the value of the Canadian dollar with disastrous results for Canadian exports.

As a matter of fact, what has happened has been that the corporations have been monetizing their debts. But what happens to a small businessman when he wants capital? Mr. Speaker, never in all the years that I have been in public life have I had so many communications from small businessmen and entrepreneurs asking how they can get some assistance to secure adequate capital to meet their needs.

The Small Businesses Loans act is a farce and everyone knows it. All of this was completely substantiated in the statement made by the newly elected president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, Mr. Daniel Sprague, when he said:

> If we want to maintain small Canadian companies then a source of capital definitely has to be created . . . Perhaps the new Canada Development Corporation could fulfil this function, but it would be better if the private sector took on the responsibility . . . In fact, the large private holders of funds, such as banks and trust companies, could devote some portion of their energies to supplying venture capital to Canadian companies.

I am not very hopeful that the trust companies and the banks will supply that venture capital.

There are three possibilities. The first is that the Canada Development Corporation will do it, but only if the government is prepared to remove the provision that an applicant must have assets of $1 million or over. The second possibility is that the government will require the banks and lending institutions to set aside a portion of their liquid assets to help finance small business and housing. The third is that the government set up an agency to make capital available to these small entrepreneurs.

I want to point out that these small entrepreneurs, if they are able to expand, will provide jobs. They will provide jobs in many of the communities that the big corporations do not locate in and, even more important, these companies of Canadian citizens, if they are assisted in their development, will enable us to retain a greater degree of Canadian control of the economy. It seems to me that the government has to rethink its various incentive programs. It has to stop depending upon handouts to large corporations. The results prove that this has done nothing either to stimulate the economy or to provide jobs. Even more serious, it has done the opposite because half the money has gone to enable foreign corporations to develop in this country at the expense of Canadian companies.

The time has come for the government to think in new terms, to think in terms of putting these large sums of money where they are needed to create aggregate demand, higher pensions, municipal and provincial works, housing programs, and assistance to small Canadian companies and Canadian businessmen, so that they can play the part they are prepared to play if given a chance in developing this country and making it a prosperous nation.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, once again the House has before it this ever present motion aiming at providing meaningful employment in Canada, and I quote:

This House regrets that the government's expenditures for incentive programs have failed to stimulate production and trade in Canadian goods and services and to open increased opportunities for productive employment to Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, it is disheartening to note the extent to which members, and even political parties, can be irrational. Only a few days ago, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) was in Cabano which, two years ago, was promised that a cardboard industry would be established there. Both federal and provincial authorities had then suggested to the citizens of Cabano and its surroundings to undertake a subscription campaign in order to collect the necessary funds after which the federal and provincial governments would provide grants for building a plant in replacement of the Irving facilities.

Mr. Speaker, to this day the citizens of Cabano have saved up almost $700,000. It should be stressed that these people are workers, farmers, settlers, small merchants and a few professionals who have subscribed this amount to win over the participation of the governments through grants. Last Sunday, however, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion speaking before 2,000 people, declared in substance the following: Gentlemen, as there is no available market for the cardboard you intend to produce, we are not interested in providing grants. After two years during which they have saved $700,000, people are disappointed to hear the government simply say: For the moment, we are not interested, we are going to proceed with our studies to see whether it is possible to export the production of the intended industry.

Mr. Speaker, there are too many products on the market and the official opposition blames the government for its failure to create new jobs to increase production. It is not production that is lacking in any field of economic activity, for we have plenty of everything. Let us take, for instance, farm machinery, of which you can see thousands of items of all kinds at the Massey-Ferguson Industries Limited. There are lots of them, and we go and subsidize the company in order for it to maintain employment, while those who need farm machinery would buy it if only they had the necessary purchasing power.

It is not production which is lacking, be it in the clothing industry, the food industry, or any other, but rather the purchasing power of consumers. Yet, instead of tackling that problemm, we keep talking about creating new jobs, or discussing a program of subsidies designed to create temporary jobs. But what happens afterwards? Unemployment again.

We spend $150 million on the Local Initiatives Program. It is like a drop in the ocean. This is why some grants are refused. I think that out of some 18,000 LIP projects, 5,700 have been approved by the government; about 12,000 have been turned down because the government had no money left. Thus, $150 million have been spent on the Local Initiatives Program for the period which will end on September 30 next. What will happen after that date? Unemployment. People will then be encouraged to apply at manpower centres, where they will be told: Come and be trained again. In fact, we spend our time training, retraining, and untraining people under the pretense of creating productive jobs. This is really mocking people to their faces. We have spent $150 million on the Local Initiatives Program. Yet, I know very well that in all constituencies some of the projects have been turned down.

Here is a case which I noted in my own constituency. The town of Noranda gets its water supply from a certain lake called Lake Dufault, in which the people who live in the northern part of the town dump their rubbish, polluting the waters of the lake which supplies both towns of Rouyn and Noranda. We asked for assistance under the Local Initiatives Program. Moreover, Quebec City as well as Ottawa wish to fight pollution. Now then, here is a case in which pollution might be fought and at the same time something lasting could be created, but we come up against a refusal. The government has no money for this project, while it approves some which are much less important. Anyway, $150 million were earmarked for the Local Initiative Program, and more than that has already been spent.
